This compound verb means to find out or discover, often after searching. In Luke 2:16, the shepherds find Mary, Joseph, and the baby after hurrying to Bethlehem. Acts 21:4 describes Paul's company finding disciples in Tyre. Classical usage includes discovering facts, winning possessions, and inventing solutions. The New Testament uses it for locating people after searching. Multilingual glosses (Spanish encontrando/hallaron, French trouver) emphasize successful discovery. The prefix ἀνα- intensifies the basic verb εὑρίσκω, suggesting thorough or successful finding.

(2×) Both occurrences involve finding people in specific locations. The shepherds' discovery fulfills the angelic announcement—they search and find exactly what was promised. Paul's group discovers the Christian community in Tyre, enabling fellowship and prophetic warning. The participles ἀνευρόντες (having found) and aorist ἀνεῦραν (they found) show both the journey's purpose (finding as goal) and its fulfillment (successful discovery). French trouver and Spanish hallar work naturally for both contexts of locating sought persons. FINDING AND DISCOVERING en: found, having-found | es: Encontrando, hallaron | fr: trouver | de: ἀνευρόντες, ἀνεῦραν Luke 2:16; Acts 21:4

ἀνέχω G0430 V-FIM-3P (15×)

To bear with, tolerate, or endure; in the middle voice, to put up with someone or hold up patiently under hardship.

Used almost exclusively in the middle voice in the NT, ἀνέχομαι captures the posture of patient restraint — choosing to put up with what is difficult, whether a person or a circumstance. Jesus uses it memorably when he cries out 'O faithless generation, how long shall I bear with you?' (Matt 17:17; Mark 9:19; Luke 9:41), revealing divine patience strained by human unbelief. Paul likewise urges the Corinthians to 'bear with me in a little foolishness' (2 Cor 11:1), and in 2 Thess 1:4 the word shades into endurance under persecution — holding firm rather than merely tolerating.

1. bear with, tolerate (13×) The dominant NT sense: putting up with someone or something perceived as foolish, tiresome, or disagreeable. The Spanish 'soportar' and German 'ertragen' both capture this forbearing nuance well. Jesus' triple rebuke in the Synoptics (Matt 17:17, Mark 9:19, Luke 9:41) shows divine patience with faithless disciples. Paul applies it to tolerating false teachers (2 Cor 11:4), hearing an appeal (Acts 18:14), and mutual forbearance among believers (Eph 4:2, Col 3:13). ENDURE TOLERATE en: I-would-put-up-with, bear-with, bearing-with | es: os-soportaré, os-soportaría, soportad | fr: supporter | de: ertragen, ἀνέξομαι, ἀνεσχόμην Matt 17:17; Mark 9:19; Luke 9:41; Acts 18:14; 2Cor 11:1

2. endure, hold up under (2×) A shade closer to steadfast endurance under affliction, where the emphasis shifts from tolerating persons to bearing up under hardship without giving way. Paul in 1 Cor 4:12 lists 'we endure' alongside being persecuted and reviled, and in 2 Thess 1:4 he commends the believers' patient endurance amid persecutions. The French 'supporter' covers both senses, but the multilingual glosses for this sense lack the interpersonal object that characterizes sense 1. ENDURE TOLERATE en: we-endure, you-endure | es: soportamos, soportáis | fr: supporter | de: ertragen 1Cor 4:12; 2Thess 1:4

ἀνεψι-ός G0431 N-NMS (1×)

cousin, nephew, or male relative

This noun denotes a cousin or male relative, specifically used for a nephew or first cousin in classical Greek. Paul uses it in Colossians 4:10 to identify Mark as Barnabas's cousin (or nephew). The term shares etymology with Latin 'nepos' (nephew, grandson). Spanish translates it 'sobrino' (nephew), while French and German preserve the Greek form. English renders it 'cousin,' reflecting scholarly consensus that the relationship was likely cousin rather than nephew, though ancient usage could encompass both.

(1×) Cousin or male relative (Col 4:10). Paul identifies 'Mark, the cousin of Barnabas,' establishing family connection between two significant early Christian leaders. Classical Greek usage covered first cousin specifically, though it could extend to nephew. The Spanish choice of 'sobrino' (nephew) reflects one interpretation, while English 'cousin' reflects the scholarly preference based on comparative Semitic kinship terms. This family tie helps explain Barnabas's advocacy for Mark in Acts 15:37-39. BROTHER KINSMAN

en: cousin | es: sobrino | fr: ἀνεψιὸς | de: Neffe Col 4:10

ἄνηθον G0432 N-ANS (1×)

dill, an aromatic herb used for seasoning

This noun refers to dill (Anethum graveolens), an aromatic herb cultivated for its seeds and leaves. Jesus mentions it in Matthew 23:23 among the herbs the Pharisees meticulously tithed while neglecting weightier matters of justice and mercy. Dill was common in ancient Mediterranean cooking and medicine. The Mishnah confirms that even aromatic herbs were subject to tithing, making them a suitable example for Jesus's critique. All four translation languages maintain recognizable forms of 'dill' or 'aneth,' showing botanical consensus.

(1×) Dill, an aromatic herb (Matt 23:23). Jesus critiques the Pharisees for tithing 'mint, dill, and cumin' while neglecting justice, mercy, and faithfulness. Dill was a minor garden herb, making it an apt example of meticulous observance of minutiae. The universal translation agreement on 'dill' (varying only in phonetic adaptation) shows clear identification of the plant. Jesus does not condemn tithing these herbs but uses them to illustrate misplaced priorities —they gave God the small things while withholding what mattered most. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: dill | es: eneldo | fr: aneth | de: ἄνηθον Matt 23:23

ἀνήκω G0433 V-PPA-ANS (3×)

fitting, proper, suitable; what is appropriate or becoming in a given situation

This verb describes what is suitable, proper, or appropriate in specific contexts. Paul employs it in ethical instruction about speech that befits believers (Eph 5:4) and marital submission that is 'fitting in the Lord' (Col 3:18). In Philemon 1:8, he could command what is 'fitting' but chooses instead to appeal. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'conveniente,' German 'geziemen') confirms this sense of propriety and appropriateness. The word carries both social and spiritual connotations of what is becoming.

(3×) All three occurrences involve what is 'fitting' or 'proper' in Christian life and conduct. The Spanish translations use 'conveniente' and 'es-propio,' while German employs 'geziemen' (to befit). Paul references what is appropriate in speech (Eph 5:4), in marriage relationships (Col 3:18), and in apostolic authority (Phlm 1:8). The classical background of reaching a proper point or standard informs the NT usage of moral and relational appropriateness. PROPRIETY AND FITTINGNESS

en: are-fitting, fitting, is-fitting | es: conveniente, convienen, es-propio | fr: ἀνῆκεν, ἀνῆκον | de: geziemen Eph 5:4; Col 3:18; Phlm 1:8

ἀνήμερ-ος G0434 Adj-NMP (1×)

brutal, savage, fierce, not tame

This adjective literally means 'not tame' or 'wild,' used of savage persons or animals. Classical Greek applied it to wild beasts and uncivilized people. Paul uses it in 2 Timothy 3:3 to characterize people in the last days as brutal. The alpha-privative negates 'tame' (ἥμερος), creating a term for savage, uncivilized behavior. Spanish 'crueles' (cruel), French and German preservations of the Greek form, and English 'brutal' all emphasize violent, inhuman conduct. This goes beyond rudeness to describe people who have rejected civilized restraint.

(1×) Brutal, savage, fierce (2 Tim 3:3). Paul warns that in the last days people will be 'brutal'—literally 'not tame' or 'savage.' Classical usage for wild animals shows this describes those who have cast off civilizing restraints. The Spanish choice of 'crueles' (cruel) and English 'brutal' both emphasize active violence rather than mere roughness. Paul places this in a catalog of vices including unloving, unforgiving, and slanderous—all describing breakdown of social bonds. These are people who treat others with animal ferocity. TAME DOCILE

en: brutal | es: crueles | fr: ἀνήμεροι | de: wild 2Tim 3:3

ἀνήρ G0435 N-VMP (216×)

Man, adult male; a man as opposed to woman, a husband in relation to his wife, or generically a human person.

Aner is the Greek word for 'man' in the specifically male sense, as distinct from anthropos which means 'human being' regardless of sex. The New Testament uses it overwhelmingly to address or describe adult males — Peter's Pentecost sermon opens andres Israelitai, 'Men of Israel' (Acts 2:22), and Luke peppers his narrative with andres plus an ethnic or civic label as a formal mode of address. The word's second life as 'husband' emerges naturally from the same semantic root, particularly in Paul's household codes (Eph 5:22-25) and discussions of marriage law (Rom 7:2-3). Korean distinguishes neatly between namja (남자, 'male person') and nampyeon (남편, 'husband'), confirming these as genuine sense divisions rather than contextual shading. The rare generic-person usage at James 1:20 shows the word at the boundary of its semantic range.

1. man, male person (202×) An adult male human being, a man as distinguished from a woman or child — the dominant sense at 202 occurrences. Used in direct address (andres adelphoi, 'men and brothers,' Acts 1:16), narrative description (Luke 5:8, 'Simon Peter, a sinful man'), and general reference to male persons. Spanish varon/hombre, Arabic rajul, Korean namja (남자), and Swahili mtu (with masculine context) all consistently select male-specific vocabulary. The vocative form aner is particularly common in Luke-Acts as a formal rhetorical address to male audiences. This sense includes both individual reference and collective address to groups of men. MAN AND HUMANITY

en: a-man, man | es: Varón, hombre, varón | fr: homme | de: Mann Mark 6:20; Luke 1:34; Luke 5:8; Luke 5:12; Luke 6:8

2. husband, married man (13×) Husband, a married man in relation to his wife — 13 occurrences concentrated in the Epistles and John. Paul's marriage theology in Ephesians 5:22-25 and Romans 7:2-3 depends on aner as 'husband,' and the Samaritan woman's dialogue with Jesus turns on 'you have had five husbands' (John 4:17-18). Spanish marido/esposo, Korean nampyeon (남편), and Arabic zauj all select dedicated spousal vocabulary distinct from generic 'man,' and French mari versus homme confirms the lexical boundary. The shift from 'male person' to 'husband' is triggered by relational context — the presence of gyne ('wife/woman') in the immediate discourse. MAN AND HUMANITY

en: Husband, husband, husbands | es: Marido, de-marido, esposo | fr: homme | de: Mann John 4:17; Rom 7:3; 2Cor 11:2; Eph 5:22

3. person, human being (1×) A human being generically, without specific emphasis on male gender — a single occurrence at James 1:20 where 'the anger of man does not produce the righteousness of God.' Here aner functions much like anthropos, referring to any person rather than specifically to males. The cross-lingual evidence is mixed: Spanish varon and German Mann still use male-specific words, but the theological point is universal. This marginal sense may reflect a stylistic or rhetorical choice by James rather than a fully productive generic meaning of aner in Koine Greek. MAN AND HUMANITY

en: of-man | es: de-varón | fr: homme | de: Mann Jas 1:20

ἀνθ-ίστημι G0436 V-AIA-1S (14×)

resist, oppose, withstand — to set oneself against an adversary, whether human, spiritual, or divine

Anthistemi is built from anti ('against') and histemi ('to stand'), yielding the vivid image of planting one's feet and refusing to give ground. In the New Testament it covers the full spectrum of opposition: Paul withstanding Peter to his face over the inclusion of Gentiles (Gal 2:11), Elymas the sorcerer opposing the apostolic mission (Acts 13:8), believers being urged to resist the devil (Jas 4:7, 1 Pet 5:9), and the solemn warning that whoever resists governing authority resists God's ordinance (Rom 13:2). Even Jesus invokes it in the radical command not to resist the evildoer (Matt 5:39). Spanish 'resistir,' French 'resister,' and German 'widerstehen' all preserve the core confrontational force.

to resist, oppose, withstand (14×) To set oneself in opposition to a force, authority, or adversary, standing firm rather than yielding. The NT applies this to interpersonal confrontation (Paul opposing Peter, Gal 2:11), spiritual warfare (resisting the devil, Jas 4:7; 1 Pet 5:9), resistance to apostolic testimony (Acts 6:10, 13:8; 2 Tim 3:8; 4:15), and rebellion against divinely established order (Rom 9:19; 13:2). Jesus' injunction in Matt 5:39 not to 'resist the evildoer' plays on the same martial imagery, subverting it. All 14 occurrences share the sense of deliberate, active opposition. RESIST OPPOSE WITHSTAND

en: I-opposed, Resist, has-resisted | es: ha-resistido, que-se-oponen, resisten | fr: résister | de: widerstehen, ἀνθίστατο, ἀντιστῆναι Matt 5:39; Luke 21:15; Acts 6:10; Acts 13:8; Rom 9:19

ἀνθομολογ-έομαι G0437 V-IIM/P-3S (1×)

give thanks, confess, make acknowledgment publicly

This compound verb means to confess or give thanks publicly in response. Classical usage included making mutual agreements, admitting claims, and returning thanks. Luke uses it in Luke 2:38 to describe Anna the prophetess giving thanks to God about the infant Jesus. The verb combines 'in response to' (ἀντι-) with 'confess/acknowledge' (ὁμολογέω), suggesting responsive thanksgiving. Spanish 'daba-gracias' (was giving thanks) and French 'rendre-grâces' (to give thanks) both capture the public, responsive nature of Anna's worship.

(1×) Give thanks publicly (Luke 2:38). Luke describes Anna 'giving thanks to God' and speaking about Jesus to all who were waiting for Jerusalem's redemption. The compound structure suggests responsive thanksgiving—she acknowledged God's gift by publicly testifying. Classical usage of 'make mutual agreement' or 'admit a claim' shows this is more than private gratitude; it's public acknowledgment. The imperfect tense 'was giving thanks' suggests continued or repeated action—Anna made this testimony repeatedly to everyone who would listen. THANKSGIVING AND GRATITUDE

en: she-was-giving-thanks | es: daba-gracias | fr: rendre-grâces | de: ἀνθωμολογεῖτο Luke 2:38

ἄνθος G0438 N-NNS (4×)

flower, blossom; the bloom of a plant, used metaphorically for the transience of human life

The Greek anthos denotes the flower or blossom of a plant, and in every NT occurrence it appears in metaphorical contexts about the brevity of human glory. James 1:10-11 compares the rich person to a wildflower that withers under the scorching sun, while 1 Peter 1:24 quotes Isaiah 40:6-8, declaring that all flesh is like grass and its glory like the flower of the field. The cross-linguistic evidence is remarkably uniform — Spanish 'flor,' German 'Blume,' and French all render it straightforwardly as 'flower,' confirming a single botanical sense deployed metaphorically.

(4×) Flower or blossom of a plant, used figuratively for the fleeting beauty and fragility of human life and glory. James 1:10-11 pairs it with grass that perishes under the sun; 1 Peter 1:24 echoes Isaiah's comparison of mortal flesh to withering grass and its fading bloom. All target languages render it with the basic botanical term (spa 'flor,' deu 'Blume,' eng 'flower'), indicating a single sense with consistent metaphorical application. FLOWERS AND BLOSSOMS

en: a-flower, flower | es: flor | fr: ἄνθος | de: Blume Jas 1:10; Jas 1:11; 1Pet 1:24

ἀνθρᾰκ-ιά G0439 N-AFS (2×)

charcoal fire, burning embers, bed of hot coals; a fire made from burning charcoal rather than wood

This noun designates a specific type of fire—one made from charcoal or burning embers rather than wood flames. Both New Testament occurrences appear in John's Gospel. In John 18:18, servants and officers warm themselves at a charcoal fire during Jesus' trial, where Peter denies Him. In John 21:9, the risen Jesus has prepared a charcoal fire on the beach for breakfast with the disciples—the setting where Peter is restored. The repetition of this specific term creates a literary echo connecting Peter's denial and restoration. Translations (Spanish brasas/fuego-de-carbón, French brasier, German Kohlenfeuer) distinguish this from ordinary fire.

(2×) John's deliberate use of this specific term in both scenes involving Peter creates theological resonance. At the first charcoal fire, Peter denies Jesus three times; at the second, Jesus asks Peter three times if he loves Him. The precise vocabulary—not just any fire, but specifically a charcoal fire—suggests John wants readers to connect these moments. The warmth Peter sought at the first fire contrasts with the restoration meal at the second. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-charcoal-fire, charcoal-fire | es: brasas, fuego-de-carbón | fr: brasier | de: Kohlenfeuer John 18:18; John 21:9

ἄνθραξ G0440 N-AMP (1×)

charcoal, burning coals

This noun denotes charcoal or burning coals used for heating and cooking. Paul quotes Proverbs 25:22 in Romans 12:20: 'If your enemy is hungry, feed him... in so doing you will heap burning coals on his head.' Classical usage distinguished charcoal (for metalworking and slow fires) from wood coals. The plural typically meant charcoal pieces or burning coals. The metaphor about 'heaping coals on the head' likely refers to bringing shame and prompting repentance rather than vengeance. All four languages maintain clear words for 'coals' or 'charcoal.'

(1×) Burning coals, charcoal (Rom 12:20). Paul quotes Proverbs about heaping 'burning coals' on your enemy's head through acts of kindness. Scholars debate whether this means shame leading to repentance (Egyptian ritual of carrying coals as penance) or increasing judgment. The context of Romans 12:17-21 favors the former—kindness that shames the enemy into reconciliation. The universal translation consensus on 'coals/charcoal' shows clear identification of the image, even if its precise metaphorical force remains debated. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: coals | es: carbones | fr: charbon | de: Kohlen Rom 12:20

ἀνθρωπ-άρεσκος G0441 Adj-NMP (2×)

men-pleasers, those who seek to please people rather than God; one who performs service to curry human favor

This compound noun describes people who serve to please humans rather than God. Paul uses it in parallel passages addressing slaves: Ephesians 6:6 and Colossians 3:22. In both contexts, he contrasts superficial eye-service done to please masters with sincere service done for Christ. The term carries negative connotation—implying manipulation or insincerity in service motivated by human approval rather than divine calling. Translations (Spanish agradadores-de-hombres, German menschengefaellig) capture the pejorative sense of servile flattery.

(2×) Both Pauline uses warn slaves against service performed merely when masters are watching—eye-service aimed at human favor. The alternative is serving as slaves of Christ, doing God's will from the heart. The compound ἀνθρωπάρεσκος combines ἄνθρωπος (human) and ἀρέσκω (to please), creating a word that diagnoses the spiritual danger of performing for human audiences. Paul's concern is authenticity: whether service flows from fear of human judgment or love for God. HYPOCRISY PRETENSE

en: men-pleasers | es: agradadores-de-hombres, hombres-que-agradan | fr: ἀνθρωπάρεσκοι | de: menschengefaellig Eph 6:6; Col 3:22

ἀνθρώπ-ινος G0442 Adj-GFP (7×)

Human, of or pertaining to mankind; characteristic of people as distinct from the divine or animal.

An adjective meaning 'human' or 'of mankind,' used to distinguish what belongs to the sphere of human experience from what is divine, supernatural, or merely natural. Paul employs it frequently: in 1 Cor 10:13, the reassurance that temptation is 'common to man' (human, not beyond endurance); in 1 Cor 2:13, wisdom taught not in 'human' words but in the Spirit's. In Rom 6:19 Paul apologizes for speaking 'in human terms' because of the audience's weakness. The translations converge perfectly — Spanish 'humano/a,' French 'humain,' German 'menschlich' — marking the human sphere as limited but intelligible.

human, of mankind (7×) Pertaining to human beings, characteristic of or limited to mankind, as opposed to what is divine or supernatural. The multilingual evidence is unanimous: Spanish 'humano/humana,' French 'humain,' German 'menschlich,' English 'human.' In 1 Cor 2:13 Paul contrasts human wisdom with Spirit-taught wisdom; in 1 Cor 10:13 the temptation is 'human' — i.e., within mortal capacity to bear; in Rom 6:19 he speaks 'in human terms' as a concession. Acts 17:25 declares God is not served by human hands. All occurrences share the single semantic core of 'belonging to the human condition.' MAN AND HUMANITY

en: common-to-man, human, humanly | es: humana, humanas, humano | fr: humain | de: menschlich, ἀνθρωπίνων Acts 17:25; Rom 6:19; 1Cor 2:13; 1Cor 4:3; 1Cor 10:13

ἀνθρωπο-κτόνος G0443 N-NMS (3×)

murderer, one who kills human beings

This compound noun designates a person who kills other humans. Jesus uses it of the devil, calling him 'a murderer from the beginning' (John 8:44), linking Satan's deadly nature to his fundamental character. John's first epistle employs it twice to describe the spiritual state of those who hate their brothers—such hatred constitutes spiritual murder, excluding one from eternal life (1 John 3:15). The word combines 'human' (ἄνθρωπος) and 'killer' (κτόνος), making the target of the violence explicit.

(3×) Appears in contexts of both spiritual and actual murder. Jesus identifies Satan as the archetypal 'murderer' (ἀνθρωποκτόνος) in John 8:44, while 1 John 3:15 (twice) applies the term to anyone harboring hatred, teaching that the murderous impulse begins in the heart. The consistent translations across languages (Spanish 'homicida,' French 'meurtrier,' German 'Moerder') reflect its unambiguous meaning as one who slays humans. MURDERER KILLER en: a-murderer, murderer | es: homicida | fr: meurtrier | de: Moerder John 8:44; 1John 3:15

ἄνθρωπος G0444 N-AMS (556×)

A human being, person; collectively, people or humankind – the standard Greek term for a member of the human race.

The most common noun in the New Testament after theos, anthropos covers the full range of human reference: a specific individual ('a man came'), an indefinite person ('if anyone'), and humanity collectively ('the sons of men'). It frequently appears in Jesus' self-designation 'Son of Man' (ho huios tou anthropou) and in universal statements about the human condition (Matt 4:4, 'Man shall not live by bread alone'). All major translation traditions use their generic human term – Spanish 'hombre,' French 'homme,' German 'Mensch' – though the collective/generic sense often triggers a plural shift in target languages.

1. individual human being, person (381×) Split from sense 62398. Criteria: Indefinite or specific individual humans in narratives, parables, and teachings; generic 'a man' or 'someone'; Matt 7:9, 9:9, 4:4

en: a-man, man | es: hombre | fr: homme | de: Mensch Matt 4:4; Matt 7:9; Matt 8:9; Matt 9:9; Matt 9:32

2. Son of Man (christological title) (88×) Split from sense 62398. Criteria: The specific title 'ho huios tou anthropou' used of Jesus, carrying eschatological and messianic weight; distinct from generic person-reference en: man | es: hombre | fr: homme | de: Mensch Matt 8:20; Matt 9:6; Matt 10:23; Matt 11:19; Matt 12:8

3. people, humankind (86×) People collectively or humankind in general, often in the plural hoi anthropoi or in generic singular statements about the human race. With 86 occurrences, this sense appears in universalizing contexts: 'so that they may see your good works' (Matt 5:16), 'while men slept' (Matt 13:25), 'every idle word that men speak' (Matt 12:36). The shift from individual to collective is visible in translations where languages like Spanish and German use plural forms ('hombres,' 'Menschen') to mark the generic reading. MAN AND HUMANITY

en: men | es: hombres | fr: homme | de: Mensch Matt 7:12; Matt 8:27; Matt 12:36; Matt 13:25; Matt 15:9

ἀνθῠπᾰτ-εύω G0445

to serve as proconsul, hold the office of proconsul

A verb denoting the holding of a specific Roman governmental office—that of proconsul. Proconsuls were former consuls who governed senatorial provinces with imperium, the legal authority to command. This technical administrative term reflects the political reality of the Roman Empire in which early Christianity emerged. The verb captures the act of exercising this particular form of provincial governorship.

ἀνθῠπᾰτ-ος G0446 N-GMS (5×)

Proconsul; a Roman governor of a senatorial province, the highest civil authority in regions like Cyprus and Achaia.

A direct borrowing from the Latin pro consule, anthypatos designates the governor of a Roman senatorial province—as distinct from an imperial legate. Luke uses this title with notable precision in Acts. Sergius Paulus is the proconsul of Cyprus whom Paul and Barnabas encounter (Acts 13:7–8, 12), and Gallio serves as proconsul of Achaia before whom Paul is brought in Corinth (Acts 18:12). The plural in Acts 19:38 is striking: the town clerk at Ephesus tells the mob that if they have a complaint, 'the proconsuls are available'—likely a generic plural for the office rather than multiple officeholders. The multilingual glosses are remarkably uniform: Spanish, French, and English all simply transliterate 'proconsul.'

(5×) A proconsul, the Roman governor of a senatorial province, exercising supreme civil and judicial authority within his jurisdiction. Luke demonstrates careful historical accuracy in his use of this title: Sergius Paulus governs Cyprus (Acts 13:7–8, 12) and Gallio governs Achaia (Acts 18:12)—both correctly identified as senatorial provinces. The plural 'anthypatoi' in Acts 19:38 is likely a generic reference to the office ('there are proconsuls,' i.e., proper courts exist) rather than to multiple simultaneous governors. Spanish 'procónsul,' French 'proconsul,' and English 'proconsul' all preserve the Latin administrative title unchanged. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: proconsul, proconsuls | es: procónsul, procónsules | fr: proconsul | de: ἀνθυπάτου, ἀνθυπάτῳ, ἀνθύπατοί Acts 13:7; Acts 13:8; Acts 13:12; Acts 18:12; Acts 19:38

ἀνίημι G0447 V-ASA-1S (4×)

to loosen, release, let go; to slacken restraint or give up, abandon

This verb carries a core meaning of releasing or loosening what is held fast. In Acts 16:26, an earthquake unfastens the prisoners' chains; in Acts 27:40, sailors cast off the anchors. Ephesians 6:9 uses it figuratively — masters are told to 'give up' threatening — while Hebrews 13:5 quotes the divine promise 'I will never leave you nor forsake you.' The semantic range thus spans physical unfastening to metaphorical abandonment. Spanish 'soltar/dejar' and German 'nachlassen' both capture the spectrum from loosening to relenting.

(4×) To unfasten, release, or loosen something physically restrained. In Acts 16:26 the bonds of prisoners are unfastened by an earthquake; in Acts 27:40 sailors cast loose the anchors. Spanish 'soltar/fueron-soltadas' and the participial glosses across languages point to a concrete, physical act of releasing what was bound or secured. RELEASE AND FORGIVENESS en: giving-up, having-loosened, were-unfastened | es: dejando, fueron-soltadas, habiendo-soltado | fr: relâcher | de: nachlassen, ἀνέῳη, ἀνέντες Acts 16:26; Acts 27:40; Eph 6:9; Heb 13:5

ἀνίλεως G0448 Adj-NFS (1×)

merciless, unmerciful, without compassion

This adjective (variant of ἀνελεήμων) describes one who shows no mercy. James uses it in James 2:13 to warn that 'judgment is merciless to one who has shown no mercy.' The alpha-privative negates mercy (ἔλεος), creating a term for pitiless treatment of others. This is not temperamental harshness but deliberate refusal to show compassion. Spanish 'sin-misericordia' (without mercy), French 'ἀνέλεος,' and German 'unbarmherzig' (unmerciful) all emphasize the absence of compassion. James's point is that God's judgment will mirror our treatment of others.

(1×) Without mercy (Jas 2:13). James warns that 'judgment will be merciless to one who has shown no mercy.' The term describes not mere strictness but active refusal of compassion to those who need it. The context addresses favoring the rich over the poor—showing partiality is mercilessness toward the disadvantaged. The universal translation choice of 'merciless/without mercy' indicates this is categorical absence, not merely insufficient mercy. But James adds: 'Mercy triumphs over judgment'—showing mercy breaks the cycle of merciless judgment. MERCY AND COMPASSION en: merciless | es: sin-misericordia | fr: ἀνέλεος | de: unbarmherzig Jas 2:13

ἄνιπτος G0449 Adj-DFP (2×)

unwashed (hands), not ritually cleansed; ceremonially unclean through lack of washing

This adjective describes hands that haven't been washed, specifically in the context of ritual purity. Matthew 15:20 and Mark 7:2 both address Pharisaic controversy over eating with unwashed hands. Jesus defends His disciples against accusations that they violate tradition by not performing ceremonial hand-washing before meals. The issue isn't hygiene but ritual observance. Classical usage includes unwashed hands offered to Zeus and stains that cannot be washed out. The New Testament restricts it to ceremonial washing debates. Translations (Spanish sin-lavar/con-no-lavadas, French mains-non-lavées) emphasize the ritual omission.

(2×) Both Gospel uses involve disputes about ritual purity traditions. The Pharisees observe that Jesus' disciples eat with unwashed hands, violating the tradition of the elders. Jesus responds by distinguishing internal moral purity from external ritual cleanliness. The dative plural ἀνίπτοις (with unwashed hands) appears in both accounts, showing how the controversy centered on hands specifically—the instruments of eating that could transmit ritual impurity to food and thus to the person. WASHING AND BATHING en: unwashed, with-unwashed | es: con-no-lavadas, sin-lavar | fr: mains-non-lavées | de: ἀνίπτοις Matt 15:20; Mark 7:2

ἀνίστημι G0450 V-ASA-3S (108×)

To rise or stand up physically; to rise from the dead or be resurrected; causatively to raise someone from death or to prominence

One of the New Testament's most theologically loaded verbs, spanning the ordinary act of standing up from a seat to the extraordinary event of resurrection from the dead. In everyday narrative, it describes getting up to go somewhere — Matthew rising from his tax booth (Matt 9:9), Jesus rising to leave a region (Mark 10:1). But its most momentous uses concern resurrection: Jesus repeatedly predicts that he will rise on the third day (Mark 8:31, 9:31), and God is said to have raised him from the dead (Acts 2:24). The transitive Hifil-like causative sense — raising someone up — extends to God raising up prophets and leaders (Acts 3:22, 7:37). Spanish distinguishes beautifully between levantarse (stand up) and resucitar (resurrect), making the semantic split visible.

1. rise, stand up (physical) (69×) The basic intransitive physical sense: to rise, stand up, get up from a seated, reclined, or prostrate position. This is the most frequent usage, appearing in narrative transitions throughout the Gospels and Acts. Jesus rises and departs (Mark 7:24), the high priest stands up at trial (Matt 26:62), and people rise in response to events. Spanish levantarse and German aufstehen both capture this everyday bodily movement. The sense often carries narrative momentum — rising signals the beginning of a new action or journey. RISING AND DAWNING
en: Having-risen, Rising, having-risen | es: Habiendo-se-levantado, Habién-dose-levantado, habiendo-se-levantado | fr: se-lever | de: aufstehen, steht-auf Matt 9:9; Matt 26:62; Mark 7:24; Mark 9:27; Mark 10:1

2. rise from the dead, be resurrected (22×) The intransitive resurrection sense: to rise from the dead, to come back to life. Central to New Testament Christology, this sense appears in Jesus' passion predictions (Mark 8:31, 9:9-10, 9:31) and early kerygmatic proclamations. The subject is the deceased person who rises. Spanish resucitar makes the theological weight explicit, while French se lever maintains the same verb form as physical rising — a constructive ambiguity the Greek itself preserves. The disciples' confusion about 'rising from the dead' (Mark 9:10) shows the sense was semantically marked even for first-century hearers. RISING AND DAWNING
en: Will-rise-again, has-risen, he-will-rise | es: Resucitará, resucitar, resucitare | fr: se-lever | de: aufstehen, steht-auf Mark 3:26; Mark 8:31; Mark 9:9; Mark 9:10; Mark 9:31

3. raise from the dead, resurrect (10×) The transitive causative sense applied to resurrection: to raise someone from the dead, to resurrect another person. Here the subject — typically God — causes a dead person to live again. John 6 clusters four such uses as Jesus declares that the Father will raise believers at the last day (John 6:39-40, 44, 54). Peter proclaims that God raised Jesus (Acts 2:24). French and German do not lexically distinguish this from sense 2, but Spanish differentiates with transitive resucitar versus levantó, and English clearly marks the causative with 'raised up.' RISING AND DAWNING
en: having-raised, having-raised-up, he-raised-up | es: habiendo-levantado, habiendo-resucitado, levantó | fr: se-lever | de: aufstehen, steht-auf John 6:39; John 6:40; John 6:44; John 6:54; Acts 2:24

4. raise up, cause to stand (7×) The transitive sense of raising up a person to prominence, authority, or action — not from death but into a role. God raises up a prophet like Moses (Acts 3:22, 7:37), or figures arise in judgment (Matt 12:41, Luke 11:32 — the men of Nineveh will rise up in judgment). The Levirate marriage context in Matt 22:24 extends this to raising up offspring for a brother. Spanish levantará and German steht-auf cover this range. The sense bridges physical standing and metaphorical elevation to significance. RISING AND DAWNING
en: he-raised, will-arise, will-raise-up | es: la-levantó, levantará, se-levantarán | fr: se-lever | de: steht-auf Matt 12:41; Matt 22:24; Luke 11:32; Acts 3:22; Acts 7:37

Ἄννα G0451 N-NFS (1×)

Anna, a prophetess who recognized the infant Jesus

Anna (from Hebrew חַנָּה, 'grace' or 'favor') was an elderly prophetess who worshiped at the Jerusalem temple. Luke describes her in Luke 2:36-38 as recognizing the infant Jesus and testifying about him to those awaiting redemption. She was from the tribe of Asher, had been widowed after seven years of marriage, and was now 84 years old (or had been a widow for 84 years). Her extended temple service and prophetic gift positioned her to recognize the Messiah. All translation languages maintain the name 'Anna' with minor phonetic variation.

(1×) Personal name of the prophetess (Luke 2:36). Anna appears alongside Simeon as one who recognized the infant Jesus at his temple presentation. The name's Hebrew meaning of 'grace' or 'favor' is thematically appropriate given her gracious recognition of God's Messiah. Multilingual consistency in preserving the name reflects its status as a proper noun. Luke's detailed biographical information (tribe, age, widowhood, temple service) establishes her credibility as a prophetic witness to Jesus's identity. HANNAH PERSONAL NAME
en: Anna | es: Ánna | fr: Anne | de: Ἄννα Luke 2:36

Ἅννας G0452 N-GMS (4×)

Annas; Jewish high priest, father-in-law of Caiaphas, prominent in Jesus' trial and the early church period

Annas (Hebrew Hanan, meaning 'gracious') served as high priest from roughly AD 6-15, but retained enormous influence long after his formal removal by Rome. Luke 3:2 unusually names both Annas and Caiaphas as high priests, reflecting Annas's de facto authority. John 18:13-24 records Jesus being brought first to Annas before being sent to Caiaphas, and Acts 4:6 lists Annas among those who interrogated Peter and John. The multilingual renderings show minor transliteration variants — Spanish 'Anas,' French 'Anne/Hannas,' German 'Hannas' — all pointing to the same historical figure.

(4×) Annas, the Jewish high priest and patriarch of a priestly dynasty. All four NT occurrences refer to the same individual: the father-in-law of Caiaphas who wielded behind-the-scenes authority in Jerusalem. Luke 3:2 pairs him with Caiaphas as co-high-priests, John 18:13-24 places him at the center of Jesus' preliminary hearing, and Acts 4:6 names him among the rulers questioning the apostles. Transliteration varies across languages (spa 'Anas,' deu 'Hannas,' fra 'Anne') but all identify one person. HANNAH PERSONAL NAME
en: Annas | es: Hannas, Ánnas | fr: Anne, Hannas | de: Hannas, Ἄννα, Ἅννας Luke 3:2; John 18:13; John 18:24; Acts 4:6

ἀνό-ητος G0453 Adj-VMP (6×)

Foolish, senseless, lacking understanding; describing those who fail to perceive spiritual or moral truth

An adjective meaning 'without understanding' (from a-noetos, 'not perceiving with the mind'), describing a failure of spiritual or intellectual perception rather than mere ignorance. Jesus uses it pointedly on the Emmaus road: 'O foolish ones, slow of heart to believe' (Luke 24:25). Paul deploys it with equal force toward the Galatians who began by the Spirit but reverted to the flesh (Gal 3:1, 3). The word implies culpable failure to understand what should be plain, as Spanish 'insensatos' and French 'insense' both convey.

foolish (6×) Foolish, senseless, lacking spiritual understanding – describing persons who ought to perceive truth but fail to do so. The alpha-privative construction (a + noetos) points to a mind that does not engage properly. Spanish 'insensatos' and French 'insense' capture this sense of lacking sense. Luke 24:25 applies it to the disciples who failed to understand the Scriptures about the Messiah. Romans 1:14 pairs it with 'wise' (sophois) in a social categorization. Galatians 3:1 and 3:3 use it as a sharp rebuke: the Galatians' regression from faith to works of the law is intellectual and spiritual folly. In 1 Timothy 6:9 it describes the senseless desires that trap the greedy. FOOLISHNESS AND FOLLY en: foolish, to-foolish | es: a-insensatos, insensatos | fr: insensé | de: unverstaendig, ἀνόητοι Luke 24:25; Rom 1:14; Gal 3:1; Gal 3:3; 1Tim 6:9

ἄνοια G0454 N-NFS (2×)

folly, senselessness, madness; lack of understanding or irrational behavior

This noun describes the state of being senseless or foolish, sometimes intensifying to madness. Luke 6:11 uses it to describe the irrational fury of the scribes and Pharisees after Jesus heals on the Sabbath—they were filled with madness. In 2 Timothy 3:9, Paul predicts that the folly of false teachers will become manifest to all. Classical usage distinguished folly from outright insanity, though overlap existed. The New Testament uses it for both irrational rage and manifest foolishness. Translations (Spanish locura/insensatez, French folie, German ἄνοια) span the range from foolishness to madness.

(2×) Luke describes religious leaders consumed with irrational fury after Jesus' Sabbath healing—their ἄνοια is reactive rage that cannot think clearly. Paul uses the noun to predict how false teachers' foolishness will eventually be exposed. The genitive ἀνοίας (of folly) in 2 Timothy suggests foolishness as a quality that becomes increasingly evident. Spanish distinguishes insensatez (folly) from locura (madness), though both apply—the scribes' madness in Luke, the teachers' exposed foolishness in Timothy. FOLLY AND FOOLISHNESS

en: folly, with-madness | es: de-locura, insensatez | fr: folie | de: ἀνοίας, ἄνοια Luke 6:11; 2Tim 3:9

ἀνοίγ-νῡμι G0455 V-RPM/P-AFS (77×)

To open or be opened; of doors, eyes, mouths, seals, and heavens — in active, passive, and stative uses.

Greek anoigo is the standard verb for opening throughout the New Testament, applied to physical objects (doors, books, tombs) and to metaphorical openings (eyes, mouths, heavens). Spanish distinguishes 'abrió' (active) from 'fue abierto' (passive), revealing voice distinctions that English often flattens. The word carries special theological weight when the heavens are 'opened' (Matt 3:16 at Jesus' baptism) or when sealed scrolls are opened in Revelation. The perfect participle creates a distinctive stative sense — something standing open as a result of prior action — as in the open heaven of John 1:51.

1. to open (transitive) (46×) The active, transitive use: an agent opens something — a door, gate, mouth, book, seal, or eyes. In Matt 2:11, the magi open their treasures; in Matt 5:2, Jesus opens his mouth to teach; in Matt 13:35, Scripture is fulfilled through parables that 'open' hidden things. Spanish 'abrió' and German 'öffnet' both clearly mark the transitive agency. This is the most frequent use, appearing across narrative, discourse, and apocalyptic genres. OPENING AND SHUTTING

en: did-he-open, he-opened, opened | es: abrió | fr: ouvrir | de: oeffnen, öffnet Matt 2:11; Matt 5:2; Matt 13:35; Matt 17:27; Matt 25:11

2. to be opened (passive) (20×) The passive use: something is opened by divine or external agency. When the heavens are 'opened' at Jesus' baptism (Matt 3:16), or when Jesus promises 'knock and it will be opened' (Matt 7:7), the passive voice often implies God as the unspoken agent — a theological passive. Spanish 'fue abierto/abierta' explicitly marks this grammatically. The blind receive sight when their eyes 'are opened' (Matt 9:30), a passive that underscores divine healing power rather than human effort. OPENING AND SHUTTING

en: has-been-opened, has-opened, it-will-be-opened | es: abrirse, fue-abierta, fue-abierto | fr: ouvrir | de: oeffnen, öffnet Matt 3:16; Matt 7:7; Matt 7:8; Matt 9:30; Matt 20:33

3. opened, standing open (stative) (11×) The stative or resultative use, typically a perfect participle indicating that something stands in an open state. In John 1:51, Nathanael will see 'heaven opened' (standing open) — not the event of opening but the enduring condition. Acts 10:11 describes a vessel descending from 'the opened heaven.' Spanish distinguishes this with adjectival forms like 'abierta/abiertas/abierto.' Rom 3:13 quotes the Psalm: 'their throat is an open grave' — a vivid stative image of perpetual moral corruption. OPENING AND SHUTTING en: having-been-opened, opened | es: abierta, abiertas, abierto | fr: ouvrir | de: oeffnen, öffnet John 1:51; Acts 9:8; Acts 10:11; Acts 16:27; Rom 3:13

ἀνοικο-δομέω G0456 V-FIA-1S (2×)

I will rebuild, I will build up again; to reconstruct what has fallen or been destroyed

This compound verb means to build again or rebuild. It appears twice in Acts 15:16, both occurrences in James's quotation from Amos 9:11 during the Jerusalem Council. James cites God's promise to rebuild David's fallen tent—interpreted as the inclusion of Gentiles in God's people. Classical usage includes building up riverbanks with bricks and rebuilding cities and walls. The New Testament restricts it to this single prophetic quotation about restoration. The future form ἀνοικοδομήσω emphasizes God's promised action to restore what has fallen.

(2×) The doubled use in Acts 15:16 comes from the Septuagint quotation structure: 'I will return and I will rebuild the tent of David which has fallen; I will rebuild its ruins.' The repetition emphasizes divine initiative and completeness in restoration. James applies this Davidic restoration prophecy to the Gentile inclusion debate, suggesting that God's rebuilding work involves incorporating all nations, not excluding them through circumcision requirements. BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTING en: I-will-rebuild | es: reedificaré | fr: rebatir | de: ἀνοικοδομήσω Acts 15:16

ἄνοιξις G0457 N-DFS (1×)

opening, act of opening

This noun denotes the act or instance of opening something. Paul uses it in Ephesians 6:19 requesting prayer for 'an opening of my mouth' to proclaim the gospel boldly. The term can refer to physical opening (of gates, doors) or metaphorical opening (of speech). In Septuagint usage, 'opening of the mouth' is a Hebraism for bold speech or freedom of expression. English 'opening,' Spanish 'abertura,' and French preservation of the Greek all indicate the act of opening. German 'Öffnung' likewise means opening.

(1×) Opening, particularly of the mouth (Eph 6:19). Paul requests prayer that God would give him 'an opening of my mouth' (ἀνοίξει τοῦ στόματος)—that is, bold freedom to speak the gospel. This Hebraic expression appears in the Septuagint for uninhibited speech. The term emphasizes not merely opportunity but empowered speech—Paul wants not just chances to speak but divine enablement to speak clearly and boldly. The context shows this opening comes through spiritual warfare (the preceding armor passage). OPENING AND SHUTTING en: opening | es: abertura | fr: ἀνοίξει | de: Oeffnung Eph 6:19

ἀνομ-ία G0458 N-NFS (15×)

Lawlessness, wickedness; the state of acting in defiance of divine or moral law; iniquity.

In the Greek moral vocabulary, anomia stands as the direct antithesis of righteousness (dikaiosynē). More than mere rule-breaking, it denotes a settled disposition of rebellion against God's established order. Jesus warns that workers of anomia will be turned away despite their outward ministry (Matt 7:23), and Paul contrasts it sharply with righteousness as two incompatible ways of life (2 Cor 6:14). The Pastoral and eschatological texts present it as the characteristic mark of the age preceding Christ's return, when the 'mystery of lawlessness' is already at work (2 Thess 2:7). The Spanish 'iniquidad' and French 'iniquité' both capture the deeply moral, not merely legal, weight of the term.

lawlessness, iniquity (15×) The state or habitual practice of acting without regard for God's revealed law — not simply ignorance of legal statutes but willful moral rebellion. Used of both individual wickedness (Matt 7:23, 'you who practice lawlessness') and collective eschatological evil (Matt 24:12, where anomia increases and love grows cold). The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'iniquidad,' French 'iniquité,' German 'Gesetzlosigkeit') confirms the term bridges legal and moral registers. INIQUITY AND LAWLESSNESS en: lawlessness, lawlessnesses, to-lawlessness | es: a-iniquidad, de-iniquidad, iniquidad | fr: iniquité | de: Gesetzlosigkeit, ἀνομίαν, ἀνομίας Matt 7:23; Matt 13:41; Matt 23:28; Matt 24:12; Rom 4:7

ἄνομος G0459 Adj-DMP (10×)

Lawless, wicked; outside the Mosaic Law — describing moral transgression or relational standing apart from Torah

In the New Testament, anomos carries two distinct flavors depending on context. When applied to evildoers or the eschatological 'Lawless One' (2 Thess 2:8), it denotes moral depravity and willful transgression of divine law — as when Jesus was 'counted among the lawless' at his crucifixion (Mark 15:28; Luke 22:37). But Paul repurposes the word in 1 Corinthians 9:21 to describe Gentiles who simply do not possess the Torah, using it four times without pejorative force. Spanish mirrors this split neatly: 'inicuo' (wicked) for sense 1, 'sin ley' (without law) for sense 2.

1. lawless / wicked (6×) Morally lawless, wicked, or impious — describing persons who transgress divine or moral law. Used substantively for criminals and evildoers: Jesus is 'numbered with the lawless' (Mark 15:28; Luke 22:37), and Paul names the eschatological adversary 'the Lawless One' (2 Thess 2:8). The Spanish 'inicuo' and English 'lawless' both capture this active moral defiance, while German retains the Greek forms directly. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: by-lawless, for-lawless-ones, lawless-one | es: de-sin-ley, inicuo, inicuos | fr: sans-loi | de: ἀνόμοις, ἀνόμων, ἄνομος Mark 15:28; Luke 22:37; Acts 2:23; 2Thess 2:8; 1Tim 1:9

2. without the Law (Torah-less) (4×) Without the Mosaic Law, Torah-less — a relational rather than moral descriptor for those outside the covenant framework. Paul's fourfold use in 1 Corinthians 9:21 is strategic: he becomes 'as one without law' to win those 'without law,' carefully adding 'not being without God's law but under Christ's law.' Spanish 'sin ley' and French 'sans loi' preserve the neutral, descriptive tone that distinguishes this sense from the pejorative first meaning. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: without-law | es: sin-ley | fr: sans-loi | de: ἀνόμοις, ἀνόμους, ἄνομος 1Cor 9:21

ἄνομος G0460 Adv (2×)

without law, apart from law; in a state of not having or not following (Mosaic) law

This adverb describes the condition of being without law, specifically the Mosaic law in Paul's usage. Both occurrences are in Romans 2:12, where Paul establishes the principle that those who sinned without the law will perish without the law, while those under the law will be judged by it. The term indicates Gentiles who don't possess the Torah, contrasted with Jews who do. Classical usage meant illegally or without musical law (harmony). The New Testament theological use focuses on relation to Mosaic revelation. German ohne-Gesetz and Spanish sin-ley capture the 'without-law' sense.

(2×) Romans 2:12's doubled use establishes a symmetrical principle: those without law (Gentiles) face judgment appropriate to their position, just as those with law (Jews) do. Paul isn't saying lawlessness is acceptable, but that God judges justly according to what revelation people have received. The adverb ἀνόμως describes not moral anarchism but covenant status—being outside the Mosaic covenant community while still accountable to the natural law written on hearts (Rom 2:14-15). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: without-law | es: sin-ley | fr: légalement | de: ohne-Gesetz Rom 2:12

ἀνορθόω G0461 V-AMA-2P (3×)

set upright, restore, straighten; to return something to its proper state

This verb means to set something upright again or restore it to proper condition. Luke uses it literally when Jesus 'straightened' the bent woman in the synagogue (13:13). James quotes Amos about God 'rebuilding' the fallen tabernacle of David (Acts 15:16), applying restoration language to the inclusion of Gentiles. Hebrews 12:12 exhorts believers to 'strengthen' drooping hands and weak knees. The word encompasses physical healing, structural rebuilding, and spiritual strengthening—all forms of restoration to proper standing.

(3×) Used across literal healing, prophetic restoration, and spiritual exhortation. In Luke 13:13, Jesus physically 'straightened' (ἀνωρθώθη) a woman bent for eighteen years. Acts 15:16 quotes Amos's promise to 'restore' David's fallen tent, interpreted as Gentile inclusion. Hebrews 12:12 calls for spiritual 'strengthening' amid trials. The multilingual glosses ('restaurar,' 'redresser,' 'aufrichten') capture the core sense of setting upright what has fallen or weakened. RENEW REPAIR RESTORE

en: I-will-restore, she-was-straightened, strengthen | es: fue-enderezada, levantad, restauraré | fr: redresser | de: aufrichten, ἀνορθώσω, ἀνωρθώθη Luke 13:13; Acts 15:16; Heb 12:12

ἀνόσιος G0462 Adj-NMP (2×)

unholy, profane, impious; lacking in reverence or violating sacred boundaries

This adjective describes what is unholy or profane, lacking proper reverence for sacred things. Both occurrences appear in the Pastoral Epistles describing types of people. In 1 Timothy 1:9, law exists for the unholy and profane among other categories of sinners. In 2 Timothy 3:2, Paul predicts that in the last days people will be unholy among other vices. Classical usage described corpses denied proper rites, profaned holy things, or unholy deeds. The New Testament applies it to moral-religious character. Translations (Spanish impíos/profanos, French ἀνοσίοις, German unheilig) emphasize violation of holiness.

(2×) Both Pastoral uses list ἀνόσιοι among catalogs of sinners. In 1 Timothy, they're paired with βέβηλοι (profane)—together describing people who violate both divine and human sacred boundaries. The law exists to restrain such people. In 2 Timothy, unholiness appears in the deteriorating moral landscape of the last days. The plural nominative ἀνόσιοι describes people characterized by disregard for what is holy, whether in worship or conduct. UNCLEAN AND PROFANE

en: for-unholy, unholy | es: impíos, profanos | fr: ἀνοσίοις, ἀνόσιοι | de: unheilig 1Tim 1:9; 2Tim 3:2

ἀνοχή G0463 N-GFS (2×)

forbearance, tolerance, restraint; God's patient holding back of deserved judgment

This noun describes forbearance or patient restraint, especially of deserved punishment. Both occurrences appear in Romans describing God's character. In Romans 2:4, Paul asks if people despise the riches of God's kindness, forbearance, and patience. In Romans 3:26, Paul explains that God's forbearance in passing over former sins demonstrated His righteousness. Classical usage included armistice, delay, and relief from disease. The New Testament restricts it to divine forbearance. Translations (Spanish paciencia, French patience, German Geduld) emphasize patient restraint.

(2×) Romans uses ἀνοχή to describe God's patience in withholding immediate judgment. In 2:4, this forbearance should lead people to repentance, not presumption. In 3:26, the forbearance that passed over previous sins is now vindicated through Christ's atoning work—showing God was just even when He seemed to overlook sin. The genitive ἀνοχῇς suggests a quality or period of forbearance—a season of patience that creates space for repentance before final reckoning. PATIENCE ENDURANCE

en: forbearance | es: paciencia | fr: patience | de: Geduld Rom 2:4; Rom 3:26

ἀντᾰγων-ίζομαι G0464 V-PPM/P-NMP (1×)

struggle against, resist, contend against

This verb means to struggle or contend against someone or something. The writer of Hebrews uses it in Hebrews 12:4 to describe resisting sin: 'In your struggle against sin, you have not yet resisted to the point of shedding your blood.' Classical usage included warfare, athletic competition, and legal contests. The compound (ἀντ-αγωνίζομαι) combines 'against' with 'agonize/compete,' emphasizing active resistance. Spanish 'luchando' (fighting), English 'struggling,' French 'résister' (resist), and German 'widerstreiten' (resist) all capture the combative nature.

(1×) Struggle against, resist (Heb 12:4). The author addresses believers who are suffering: 'In your struggle against sin, you have not yet resisted to the point of bloodshed.' The athletic and military imagery (from ἀγωνίζομαι) shows this is active combat, not passive endurance. The comparison to Jesus (who did shed his blood) puts their struggles in perspective. The multilingual convergence on 'struggle/fight/resist' indicates intense active opposition to sin, not mere avoidance. RESIST OPPOSE WITHSTAND

en: struggling | es: luchando | fr: résister | de: widerstreiten Heb 12:4

ἀντάλλᾰγ-μα G0465 N-ANS (2×)

exchange, something given in exchange; that which is offered or received as equivalent trade

This noun describes what is given or received in exchange for something else. Both occurrences appear in parallel Gospel passages where Jesus asks what a person could give in exchange for their soul. Matthew 16:26 and Mark 8:37 both pose this rhetorical question after teaching about gaining the whole world yet forfeiting one's life. Classical usage included exchanges given for friendship. The New Testament restricts it to Jesus' saying about the soul's incomparable value. Translations (Spanish en-cambio/en-intercambio, French échange) emphasize the transaction concept.

(2×) Both Gospel uses present the same rhetorical question in Jesus' teaching about discipleship costs: What exchange could someone offer for their soul? The implied answer is nothing—the soul's value exceeds any possible trade. The accusative ἀντάλλαγμα suggests the object offered in exchange. Jesus' point is that no amount of worldly gain compensates for losing one's true self before God. The parallel passages show this wasn't casual speech but core teaching repeated in Jesus' instruction. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: as-an-exchange, in-exchange-for | es: en-cambio, en-intercambio | fr: échange | de: ἀντάλλαγμα Matt 16:26; Mark 8:37

ἀντανα-πληρόω G0466 V-PIA-1S (1×)

fill up, complete, supply what is lacking

This compound verb means to fill up in turn or supply what is lacking. Paul uses it in Colossians 1:24 in a famously difficult statement: 'I fill up in my flesh what is still lacking in regard to Christ's afflictions.' The verb combines 'in turn/instead' (ἀντι-) with 'fill up' (ἀναπληρόω), suggesting reciprocal or compensatory filling. Classical usage included filling vacancies and balancing accounts. Spanish 'completo' (complete), French preservation of the Greek, and German 'ergänzen' (supplement) all suggest completing or supplementing.

(1×) Fill up, complete what is lacking (Col 1:24). Paul's statement 'I fill up what is still lacking in Christ's afflictions' has generated extensive theological discussion. The verb suggests completing or supplying what is missing, not that Christ's atoning work was insufficient but that the full measure of suffering destined for the church (Christ's body) is worked out in Paul's ministry. The Spanish 'completo' (I complete) and German 'ergänzen' (supplement) both indicate filling a gap—Paul's sufferings contribute to the completion of the church's appointed afflictions. FULFILL AND COMPLETE en: I-fill-up | es: completo | fr: ἀνταναπληρῶ | de: ergaenzen Col 1:24

ἀνταπο-δίδωμι G0467 V-ANA (7×)

To repay, recompense, give back in return; passive: to be repaid or recompensed

A compound verb (anti + apo + didomi — 'give back in return against') expressing full requital or recompense. Paul quotes Deuteronomy 32:35 in Romans 12:19: 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, says the Lord,' using this word for God's definitive settling of accounts. Yet the same verb carries grace: in Luke 14:14 Jesus promises that generosity to the poor will be repaid at the resurrection of the righteous. Paul also uses it in the tender question of Romans 11:35 — who has first given to God so as to be repaid? The word thus spans divine judgment and divine generosity.

1. repay, recompense (5×) The active sense of repaying, recompensing, or giving back in return — whether for good or for evil. Romans 12:19 and Hebrews 10:30 both cite God as the one who will repay vengeance. In 2 Thessalonians 1:6 God repays tribulation to those who afflict believers. Yet in 1 Thessalonians 3:9 Paul asks what thanksgiving he can 'render back' to God — using the same word for grateful requital. Spanish 'retribuir' and French 'rendre en retour' capture the reciprocal nature of this recompense. REPAYING AND RENDERING
en: to-repay, will-repay | es: devolver, para-retribuirte, retribuir | fr: rendre, rendre-en-retour | de: vergelten, ἀνταποδοῦναί Luke 14:14; Rom 12:19; 1Thess 3:9; 2Thess 1:6; Heb 10:30

2. be repaid, be recompensed (2×) The passive sense: to be repaid or to receive recompense. In Luke 14:14 Jesus assures that the one who invites the poor, crippled, and blind — those who cannot repay — 'will be repaid' (antapodothesetai) at the resurrection. Romans 11:35 poses the rhetorical question of whether anyone has given to God first 'so as to be repaid.' Spanish 'le sera recompensado' and German 'vergelten' both express this promise of future divine reciprocation. REPAYING AND RENDERING en: it-will-be-repaid | es: le-será-recompensado, te-será-retribuido | fr: rendre, rendre-en-retour | de: vergelten, ἀνταποδοθήσεται Luke 14:14; Rom 11:35

ἀνταπό-δομα G0468 N-NNS (2×)

repayment, recompense, requital; what is given back in return, whether reward or retribution

This noun describes repayment or requital, used for both positive recompense and negative retribution. In Luke 14:12, Jesus advises against inviting those who can repay, so you'll receive repayment at the resurrection. Romans 11:9 quotes the Psalms about enemies' tables becoming retribution. The term is neutral regarding positive or negative—context determines whether it's reward or punishment. Translations (Spanish recompensa/retribución, French récompense, German Vergeltung) sometimes distinguish reward from retribution, though the Greek term covers both.

(2×) Luke uses ἀνταπόδομα for the eschatological reward awaiting those who serve without expecting earthly reciprocity. Romans employs the same word for divine retribution on those who stumble —their blessings becoming their judgment. The noun's flexibility allows it to describe God's justice in both directions: rewarding the faithful and requiting the rebellious. The accusative ἀνταπόδομα and nominative form both appear, showing this as both what is received (reward) and what becomes reality (retribution). RECOMPENSE AND RETRIBUTION
en: a-retribution, repayment | es: recompensa, retribución | fr: récompense | de: Vergeltung, ἀνταπόδομά Luke 14:12; Rom 11:9

ἀνταπό-δοσις G0469 N-AFS (1×)

recompense, repayment, retribution

This noun denotes recompense, repayment, or retribution—giving back in return for something received. Paul uses it in Colossians 3:24 to promise believers 'the recompense of the inheritance' as reward. Classical usage covered repayment of debts, retribution for wrongs, and responsive actions. The compound (ἀντ-απόδοσις) emphasizes the reciprocal nature—payment in return. Spanish and French both use forms of 'recompense,' while German employs 'Vergeltung' (retribution, repayment). This is not merely wages but reward proportioned to service.

(1×) Recompense, reward (Col 3:24). Paul assures slaves who serve faithfully that they 'will receive the recompense of the inheritance' from the Lord. The term emphasizes proportional return—God's reward matches the service. Classical usage of 'giving back in turn' and 'repayment' shows this is not arbitrary gift but appropriate recompense. The genitive 'of the inheritance' specifies what the recompense consists of: not merely earthly payment but eschatological inheritance. This transforms mundane labor into service with eternal reward. RECOMPENSE AND RETRIBUTION
en: recompense | es: recompensa | fr: ἀνταπόδοσιν | de: Vergeltung Col 3:24

ἀνταπο-κρίνομαι G0470 V-PPM/P-NMS (2×)

to answer back, reply (especially in retort or argument); to correspond to

This compound verb intensifies the simple 'answer' (ἀποκρίνομαι) with the prefix ἀντα- ('back, against'), suggesting a response that pushes back or argues. The word appears twice in the New Testament, both times in contexts where answering would be inappropriate or impossible. In Luke 14:6, Jesus' opponents 'could not answer back' regarding his Sabbath healing. In Romans 9:20, Paul challenges: 'Who are you, a human being, to answer back to God?' The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'responder contra', French 'répondre') captures the slightly oppositional force that distinguishes this from ordinary answering.

(2×) To make a reply that argues against or contradicts, particularly in a context where such response may be presumptuous or futile. Both New Testament occurrences emphasize the inability or impropriety of answering back—Luke 14:6 describes Jesus' opponents unable to refute his reasoning, while Romans 9:20 rebukes human presumption in disputing with God. The compound structure (ἀντα- + ἀποκρίνομαι) conveys the force of 'answering in opposition' rather than simply responding. Spanish 'responder contra' explicitly captures this adversarial nuance, while the Greek participles and infinitive forms (ἀνταποκρινόμενος, ἀνταποκριθῆναι) appear in contexts of rhetorical challenge. ANSWERING AND TESTIFYING

en: answering-back, to-reply | es: que-responde-contra, responder | fr: répondre, ἀνταποκρινόμενος | de: antworten, ἀνταποκριθῆναι Luke 14:6; Rom 9:20

ἀντεῖπον G0471

speak against, contradict, gainsay; oppose in word or argument

An aorist form (with no present tense in use) meaning to speak in opposition or answer back. The verb appears with a dative object to indicate speaking against someone or something, or with a prepositional phrase for the same purpose. It can mean to oppose or contradict, to speak in someone's defense, or simply to utter a word of contradiction. A specialized use involves speaking on both sides of a question in debate. The verb can also carry the negative sense of maligning someone in return.

ἀντέχω G0472 V-PPM/P-AMS (4×)

to hold firmly to, cling to, be devoted to; to support or help someone in need

In the middle voice, this verb expresses firm attachment or loyal devotion. Jesus uses it in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 6:24) and its Lukan parallel (Luke 16:13) to describe the impossibility of serving two masters — one will be loved, the other despised; one clung to, the other neglected. In 1 Thessalonians 5:14, Paul urges the community to 'hold firmly to' (or help) the weak, while Titus 1:9 requires that elders hold fast to the trustworthy word. Spanish 'aferrarse/adherirse' and French 's'attacher' beautifully capture the tenacious quality of this attachment.

(4×) To be devoted to, cling to, or hold firmly in loyalty. In the 'two masters' sayings (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13), this verb describes the exclusive attachment one gives to a chosen master. Titus 1:9 requires elders to hold fast to sound doctrine. Spanish 'aferrarse/se-adherir' and French 's'attacher' emphasize the tenacious, personal quality of this devotion — not mere agreement but committed clinging. CLINGING AND JOINING en: he-will-be-devoted-to, he-will-hold-to, help | es: aferrándose, se-adherirá, se-apegará | fr: s'attacher | de: ἀνθέξεται, ἀντέχεσθε, ἀντεχόμενον Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13; 1Thess 5:14; Titus 1:9

ἀντί G0473 Prep (22×)

Instead of, in place of, in exchange for; because of; upon (accumulation)

The preposition ἀντί with the genitive carries the root image of one thing facing or standing opposite another, yielding its primary sense of substitution and exchange. When Archelaus reigns 'instead of' his father Herod (Matt 2:22) or when Jesus gives his life as a ransom 'for' many (Matt 20:28), ἀντί marks one entity replacing another. In the idiomatic construction ἀνθ᾽ ὧν it shifts to causal reasoning — 'because' — as when Zechariah is struck mute 'because' he did not believe (Luke 1:20). A single memorable occurrence in John 1:16 speaks of 'grace upon grace,' where ἀντί expresses wave-upon-wave accumulation rather than replacement.

1. instead of / in exchange for (16×) The primary substitutionary and exchange sense, accounting for 16 of 22 occurrences. In Matt 5:38 the lex talionis is stated with ἀντί: 'eye for eye, tooth for tooth,' where each penalty mirrors and replaces the injury. Matt 17:27 uses it for monetary exchange — the coin 'for' Jesus and Peter. Spanish 'en lugar de' and German 'anstatt' confirm the replacement reading. The theological weight of this sense is immense: Matt 20:28 and Mark 10:45 both declare Christ gave his life ἀντὶ πολλῶν, 'in place of many.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: because, for, for- | es: en-lugar-de, por, por-lo-cual | fr: au-lieu-de, au-lieu-de- | de: anstatt, anstatt- Matt 2:22; Matt 5:38; Matt 17:27; Matt 20:28

2. because / for the reason that (5×) The causal use, almost always in the frozen construction ἀνθ᾽ ὧν ('for which reason,' 'because'), appearing 5 times. Luke 1:20 is paradigmatic: Zechariah will be mute ἀνθ᾽ ὧν he did not believe. Luke 19:44 and Acts 12:23 similarly introduce divine judgment with this causal formula. The Spanish 'por' and English 'because' in the glosses mark a clear departure from the substitution-replacement pattern, showing that the facing-opposite metaphor has been extended to facing-the-cause. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: because, because-of-which, for-this-reason | es: Por, en-lugar-de, en-lugar-de- | fr: au-lieu-de, au-lieu-de- | de: anstatt, anstatt- Luke 1:20; Luke 19:44; Acts 12:23; Eph 5:31; 2Thess 2:10

3. upon / added to (accumulation) (1×) A unique accumulative or successive sense found only in John 1:16: χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος, 'grace upon grace.' Here ἀντί does not mean 'instead of' but rather 'added to' or 'in succession to,' describing grace piling upon grace like waves from Christ's fullness. The Spanish 'en lugar de' and German 'anstatt' attempt the standard translation, but the context demands the rarer classical reading of accumulation — one grace received and immediately succeeded by another. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: upon | es: en-lugar-de | fr: au-lieu-de | de: anstatt- John 1:16

ἀντιβάλλω G0474 V-PIA-2P (1×)

exchange words, converse, discuss together

This verb means to exchange words in conversation or throw ideas back and forth. Luke uses it in Luke 24:17 as the risen Jesus asks the Emmaus road disciples, 'What are these words that you are exchanging with one another?' Classical usage included comparing manuscripts, matching opponents, and exchanging conversation. The compound (ἀντι-βάλλω) combines 'against/in return' with 'throw,' creating imagery of tossing words back and forth. Spanish 'intercambiáis' (you exchange) and French 'répondre' (respond) both capture the reciprocal nature.

(1×) Exchange words, converse (Luke 24:17). Jesus asks the disciples on the Emmaus road, 'What are these words you are exchanging with one another as you walk?' The verb emphasizes the back-and-forth nature of their discussion—they were engaged in active dialogue about recent events. The Spanish 'intercambiáis' (you exchange) captures the reciprocal throwing of words. Ironically, they were discussing Jesus's death and rumored resurrection, not recognizing that the one asking was Jesus himself. ANSWERING AND TESTIFYING

en: you-are-exchanging | es: intercambiáis | fr: répondre | de: ἀντιβάλλετε Luke 24:17

ἀντιδια-τίθημι G0475 V-PPM-AMP (1×)

oppose, resist, set oneself against

This middle-voice verb means to set oneself in opposition or offer resistance. Paul uses it in 2 Timothy 2:25 to describe those who 'oppose' the truth. Classical usage included retaliating and offering resistance to persuasion. The compound (ἀντι-δια-τίθημι) intensifies the opposition with double prefixing. Spanish 'que-se-oponen' (who oppose themselves), French preservation of the Greek, and German 'sich-widersetzen' (set oneself against) all emphasize the reflexive, deliberate nature of the opposition. These are not passive errors but active resistance.

(1×) Oppose, resist (2 Tim 2:25). Paul instructs Timothy to gently instruct 'those who oppose,' hoping God will grant them repentance.

The middle voice emphasizes they set themselves in opposition—this is deliberate resistance, not mere misunderstanding. Classical usage of 'retaliate' and 'resist persuasion' shows active opposition to truth rather than innocent ignorance. Yet Paul's gentle approach assumes such opposition can be overcome by God's gracious gift of repentance. The term describes the opponent's posture, not their irredeemable nature. OPPOSE BE ADVERSARY

en: opposing | es: que-se-oponen | fr: ἀντιδιατιθεμένους | de: sich-widersetzen 2Tim 2:25

ἀντίδῐκ-ος G0476 N-DMS (5×)

An opponent or adversary, especially in a legal dispute; by extension, any hostile accuser or enemy.

In classical Greek this word designated a legal opponent – either plaintiff or defendant in a lawsuit. The New Testament preserves this courtroom flavor in Jesus' parable about settling with your adversary on the way to the judge (Matt 5:25; Luke 12:58), while the widow's persistent plea against her adversary (Luke 18:3) shows the word in a broader sense of someone causing harm. Peter's application to the devil as a roaring lion (1 Pet 5:8) elevates the term to cosmic enmity. Spanish 'adversario' and French 'adversaire' both mirror the forensic-yet-general range faithfully.

(5×) An adversary or opponent, rooted in legal terminology for a party in a lawsuit but used broadly for any hostile figure. In Matt 5:25 and Luke 12:58 the forensic setting is explicit – settle with your antidikos before reaching the judge. The widow's plea in Luke 18:3 broadens the usage to a general oppressor, and 1 Pet 5:8 applies it to the devil himself as the ultimate spiritual adversary. All five occurrences share the core notion of active opposition. ENEMY AND ADVERSARY

en: adversary, opponent | es: adversario | fr: adversaire | de: ἀντίδικος, ἀντιδίκου, ἀντιδίκῳ Matt 5:25; Luke 12:58; Luke 18:3; 1Pet 5:8

ἀντί-θεσις G0477 N-AFP (1×)

opposition, antithesis, contradiction

This noun denotes opposition, contradiction, or antithesis—the state of being set against. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy 6:20 warning Timothy to avoid 'the opposing ideas of what is falsely called knowledge.' Classical usage included logical opposition, rhetorical antithesis, and contrary propositions. The compound (ἀντι-θεσις) literally means 'placement against.' Spanish 'oposiciones' (oppositions), French preservation of the Greek, and German 'Widerspruch' (contradiction) all indicate conflicting positions. This is not complementary contrast but contradictory opposition.

(1×) Contradictions, opposing ideas (1 Tim 6:20). Paul warns against 'the contradictions of what is falsely called knowledge'—likely early gnostic teachings that set themselves against apostolic truth. The term was technical in rhetoric and logic for antithetical propositions. The multilingual evidence for 'oppositions/contradictions' shows these are not minor disagreements but fundamental contradictions to the gospel. Paul's concern is that such 'knowledge' (gnosis) leads people away from faith—its opposition to truth is not merely intellectual but spiritually destructive. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: oppositions | es: oposiciones | fr: ἀντιθέσεις | de: Widerspruch 1Tim 6:20

ἀντικαθίστημι G0478 V-AIA-2P (1×)

resist, oppose, set up in opposition

This verb means to resist or set oneself in opposition against someone. The writer of Hebrews uses it in Hebrews 12:4 (some manuscripts) in a context about resisting sin. Classical usage included replacing one thing with another, rallying troops, and setting up opposition. The compound (ἀντι-καθ-ίστημι) suggests setting oneself firmly against. Spanish 'habéis-resistido' (you have resisted), French 'résister,' and German 'widerstreiten' all emphasize active resistance. This is deliberate, sustained opposition rather than momentary reluctance.

(1×) Resist, oppose (Heb 12:4). The author reminds believers that 'you have not yet resisted to the point of shedding blood' in your struggle against sin (though some manuscripts read this with ἀνταγωνίζομαι instead). The verb emphasizes deliberate, sustained resistance—setting oneself firmly against sin's encroachment. Classical usage of 'set up opposition' and 'rally' shows this is organized resistance, not sporadic efforts. The contrast with Jesus (who did shed blood) puts their resistance in perspective and encourages perseverance. RESIST OPPOSE WITHSTAND

en: you-have-resisted | es: habéis-resistido | fr: résister | de: widerstreiten Heb 12:4

ἀντικᾰλέω G0479 V-ASA-3P (1×)

invite in return, reciprocate an invitation

This verb means to invite in return or reciprocate hospitality. Jesus uses it in Luke 14:12 teaching about true generosity: when you give a banquet, don't invite those who can 'invite you in return.' Classical usage established reciprocal invitation as standard social practice. The compound (ἀντι-καλέω) combines 'in return' with 'invite,' emphasizing the reciprocal nature. Spanish 'te-inviten-en-retorno' (invite you in return), French 'inviter-en-retour,' and German preservation of the Greek all capture the reciprocal hospitality dynamic Jesus is addressing.

(1×) Invite in return (Luke 14:12). Jesus teaches that when hosting a meal, believers should not invite friends, relatives, or rich neighbors 'who might invite you in return.' The verb exposes the self-interested reciprocity of normal social hospitality—invitations were investments expecting return. By contrast, Jesus commands inviting the poor and disabled who cannot reciprocate. The multilingual consensus on 'invite in return' shows this reciprocal expectation was universal. Jesus calls for hospitality that breaks the cycle of mutual obligation and seeks reward from God, not social peers. CALLING AND NAMING en: invite-in-return | es: te-inviten-en-retorno | fr: inviter-en-retour | de: ἀντικαλέσωσίν Luke 14:12

ἀντίκειμαι G0480 V-PPM/P-NMP (8×)

To oppose, be set against, act as an adversary; to stand in hostile opposition to someone or something.

A middle/passive verb meaning 'to be set against' or 'to oppose,' used in the New Testament for those who actively resist God's purposes or his people. Jesus' opponents are 'put to shame' (Luke 13:17), and he promises wisdom that no adversary can withstand (Luke 21:15). Paul finds 'a wide door for effective work' in Ephesus alongside 'many adversaries' (1 Cor 16:9). The term also describes internal spiritual conflict: flesh and Spirit 'oppose each other' (Gal 5:17). In the Pastorals it characterizes hostile forces ranged against sound teaching (1 Tim 1:10; 5:14). Spanish 'adversario/oponerse' and French 's'opposer' capture the adversarial force well.

oppose / be an adversary (8×) To oppose, to be set against as an adversary — describing active hostility or resistance directed at persons, teachings, or spiritual realities. In Luke 13:17 and 21:15, the 'ones opposing' (antikeimenoi) are adversaries of Jesus and his followers; in 1 Cor 16:9 Paul speaks of 'many adversaries' in Ephesus; Gal 5:17 describes the flesh and Spirit as 'opposed to each other'; Phil 1:28 refers to those who 'oppose' the gospel community; and 1 Tim 5:14 warns against giving the adversary occasion. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'adversario/oponerse,' French 's'opposer,' German 'Widersacher') uniformly reflects a single sense of active, hostile opposition. OPPOSE BE ADVERSARY

en: adversaries, adversary, are-opposed | es: adversario, adversarios, oponiéndose | fr: s'opposer | de: ἀντίκειται, ἀντικείμενοι, ἀντικείμενος Luke 13:17; Luke 21:15; 1Cor 16:9; Gal 5:17; Phil 1:28

ἀντικρύ G0481 Prep (1×)

opposite, over against, directly across from

This adverb (used as preposition with genitive) means directly opposite or right across from something. Luke uses it in Acts 20:15 to describe the ship sailing 'opposite Chios.' Classical usage established this as a nautical and geographical term for locations directly across from each other. The term combines directness (right/straight) with opposition (facing). Spanish 'frente-a' (in front of), French 'en-face-de' (facing), and German preservation of the Greek all indicate the spatial relationship of being directly across from.

(1×) Opposite, directly across from (Acts 20:15). Luke's travel narrative notes the ship anchored 'opposite Chios'—that is, at a location directly across from the island. Classical nautical usage confirms this as technical vocabulary for navigation and geography. The term emphasizes the direct spatial relationship—not merely near but precisely positioned across from. The multilingual evidence for 'opposite/in front of/facing' shows clear consensus on the spatial meaning. This is part of Luke's careful documentation of Paul's journey to Jerusalem. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: opposite | es: frente-a | fr: en-face-de | de: ἄντικρυς Acts 20:15

ἀντιλαμβάνω G0482 V-PNM/P (3×)

help, assist, come to aid; to seize hold of someone to support them

This middle voice verb signifies laying hold of something or someone to assist them. Mary's Magnificat celebrates how God 'helped' Israel his servant, remembering his mercy (Luke 1:54). Paul quotes Jesus's teaching that supporting the weak is more blessed than receiving (Acts 20:35). In 1 Timothy 6:2, Christian slaves are to serve well those masters who are 'partaking of' or 'receiving' their good service as believers. The classical sense of 'laying hold of' develops into the idea of grasping someone in order to help them.

(3×) Conveys the idea of helping or supporting, often with the nuance of actively grasping to assist. Luke 1:54 praises God for 'helping' (ἀντελάβετο) Israel, an echo of prophetic promises. Acts 20:35 quotes Jesus on the necessity of 'helping' the weak. In 1 Tim 6:2, believing masters are 'receiving' (ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι) the service. The French 'prendre-en-main' (take in hand) and German compounds nicely capture the hands-on nature of this assistance. HELP AND ASSISTANCE

en: He-helped, receiving, to-help | es: que-participan, socorrer, socorrió | fr: prendre-en-main, secourir | de: ἀντελάβετο, ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι, ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι Luke 1:54; Acts 20:35; 1Tim 6:2

ἀντιλέγω G0483 V-PPA-AMS (11×)

Speak against, contradict, deny; passive: be spoken against, be opposed or disputed.

The Greek verb antilego combines anti ('against') with lego ('speak'), yielding a word that captures verbal opposition in both directions. In the active voice it means to contradict, deny, or object — the Jews in Antioch contradicting Paul's preaching (Acts 13:45), or Pilate warned that releasing Jesus means 'speaking against Caesar' (John 19:12). The passive carries a more poignant weight: Simeon prophesies that the infant Jesus will be 'a sign that is spoken against' (Luke 2:34), and Paul in Rome acknowledges that 'this sect is everywhere spoken against' (Acts 28:22). Spanish contradecir, German widersprechen, and French contredire all mirror the compound 'speak-against' structure.

1. contradict, speak against (9×) To speak in opposition to someone or something, actively contradicting, denying, or objecting to what is said or proposed. This dominant sense (9 occurrences) appears across confrontational settings: the Jewish leaders unable to contradict the healing of the lame man (Acts 4:14), the Pisidian Jews who 'contradicted the things spoken by Paul' (Acts 13:45), and Pilate's awareness that anyone who releases Jesus 'speaks against Caesar' (John 19:12). Spanish contradecir, German widersprechen, and French contredire all deploy dedicated compound verbs, confirming that verbal opposition is a cross-linguistically recognized speech act. Jesus' promise in Luke 21:15 — 'I will give you a mouth and wisdom which none of your adversaries will be able to contradict' — shows the word at its sharpest forensic edge. RESIST OPPOSE WITHSTAND

en: contradicting, denying, objecting | es: contradecir, contradecían, contradice | fr: contredire | de: widersprechen, widerspricht Luke 20:27; Luke 21:15; John 19:12; Acts 4:14; Acts 13:45

2. be spoken against, be opposed (2×) To be the object of contradiction or opposition, expressed through the passive or middle voice — indicating that the subject is the one spoken against rather than the one speaking. Only 2 clear occurrences, but both are theologically weighty: Simeon's prophecy over the infant Jesus, 'a sign that is spoken against' (Luke 2:34), foreshadows the entire arc of rejection that the Gospels will narrate; and Paul's acknowledgment in Rome that 'concerning this sect, it is known to us that everywhere it is spoken against' (Acts 28:22) marks the early church's awareness of its contested status. Spanish contradicha and German widersprochen shift to passive participle forms, mirroring the Greek grammatical distinction. RESIST OPPOSE WITHSTAND

en: being-opposed, it-is-spoken-against | es: contradicha, es-contradicha | fr: contredire | de: widerspricht Luke 2:34; Acts 28:22

ἀντί-ληψις G0484 N-AFP (1×)

helps, assistance, support

This noun denotes help, assistance, or support—literally 'taking hold of in turn.' Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 12:28 listing spiritual gifts: 'God has appointed in the church... helps.' Classical usage included reciprocal assistance, medical support (bandages), and defensive help. The compound (ἀντι-λημψις) suggests mutual or reciprocal aid. Spanish 'ayudas' (helps), French 'secours' (help/aid), and German 'Hilfeleistung' (assistance) all emphasize practical support. This is not dramatic ministry but essential practical service that enables the church's functioning.

(1×) Helps, practical assistance (1 Cor 12:28). Paul lists among church ministries 'helps' (ἀντιλήμψεις)—those with gifts for practical support and assistance. The term's classical usage for bandages and defensive support shows this is hands-on, practical ministry. The Spanish 'ayudas' and French 'secours' both indicate coming to someone's aid. This is paired with 'administrations' in Paul's list, suggesting organized practical care—perhaps serving the poor, visiting the sick, or managing church resources. Not all gifts are public or dramatic; some quietly sustain the body. HELP AND ASSISTANCE

en: helps | es: ayudas | fr: secours | de: Hilfeleistung 1Cor 12:28

ἀντιλογ-ία G0485 N-GFS (4×)

dispute, contradiction, opposition; rebellion or hostility expressed through verbal or active resistance

Built from anti ('against') and logos ('word/speech'), this noun fundamentally denotes speaking against or contradiction. Hebrews employs it in two theological arguments: 6:16 notes that an oath settles every dispute, and 7:7 states that without contradiction the lesser is blessed by the greater. Hebrews 12:3 intensifies the meaning, describing the 'opposition' Jesus endured from sinners. Jude 1:11 invokes the 'rebellion of Korah' as a type of defiant resistance against God's appointed order. The semantic trajectory moves from verbal dispute to active rebellion.

(4×) Dispute, contradiction, or verbal opposition — the act of speaking or arguing against a position. Hebrews 6:16 uses it for disputes settled by an oath; Hebrews 7:7 employs it as a rhetorical device ('beyond all contradiction'). Spanish 'contradiccion' and German 'Widerspruch' both preserve the etymological sense of counter-speech, confirming this as the base meaning. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: dispute, hostility, of-dispute | es: contradicción, controversia | fr: Widerspruch, rébellion | de: Widerspruch Heb 6:16; Heb 7:7; Heb 12:3; Jude 1:11

ἀντιλοιδορέω G0486 V-IIA-3S (1×)

revile in return, abuse in response

This verb means to revile, abuse, or rail at someone in return for their abuse. Peter uses it in 1 Peter 2:23 describing Jesus's conduct during his passion: 'When he was reviled, he did not revile in return.' Classical usage established this as reciprocal abuse—responding to insults with insults. The compound (ἀντι-λοιδορέω) combines 'in return' with 'revile,' emphasizing the tit-for-tat nature. Spanish 'injuriaba-en-respuesta' (insulted in response), French preservation of the Greek, and German 'zurück-schmähen' (revile back) all capture the reciprocal dynamic.

(1×) Revile in return, abuse in response (1 Pet 2:23). Peter describes Jesus's exemplary suffering: 'when he was reviled, he did not revile in return.' The imperfect tense indicates this was repeated throughout his passion—multiple opportunities to respond with abuse, all declined. The compound structure emphasizes the natural reciprocal pattern Jesus broke—when abused, humans instinctively return abuse. The Spanish 'injuriaba-en-respuesta' and German 'zurück-schmähen' both emphasize responding in kind. Jesus's refusal to retaliate verbally models the suffering servant and establishes the pattern Christians should follow. REVILE REPROACH INSULT en: reviled-in-return | es: injuriaba-en-respuesta | fr: ἀντελοιδόρει | de: zurueck-schmaehen 1Pet 2:23

ἀντίλυτρ-ον G0487 N-ANS (1×)

ransom, redemption price

This noun denotes a ransom or redemption price paid to free someone. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy 2:6 describing Christ 'who gave himself as a ransom for all.' Classical usage included both literal ransom payments and metaphorical redemption. The compound (ἀντι-λυτρον) combines 'in exchange for' with 'ransom,' emphasizing the substitutionary nature—one thing given in exchange for another. Spanish 'rescate,' French preservation of the Greek, and German 'Lösegeld' (ransom money) all indicate payment that secures release.

(1×) Ransom, redemption price (1 Tim 2:6). Paul describes Jesus as the one 'who gave himself as a ransom for all.' The term emphasizes substitutionary payment—Christ's life given in exchange for ours. Classical ransom terminology involved paying a price to free slaves or prisoners. The compound structure (ἀντι-λυτρον) stresses the exchange: Christ's life for ours. The universal translation consensus on 'ransom' shows clear understanding of the commercial metaphor. This is the theological foundation for universal redemption—Christ's ransom is sufficient for all humanity. RANSOM LIFE PRICE en: a-ransom | es: rescate | fr: ἀντίλυτρον | de: Loesegeld 1Tim 2:6

ἀντιμετρ-έω G0488 V-FIP-3S (1×)

measure in return, give back as measured

This verb means to measure out in return or give back in the same measure. Jesus uses it in Luke 6:38 teaching about generosity: 'Give, and it will be given to you... For with the measure you use, it will be measured back to you.' Classical usage included reciprocal measurement and astrological correspondence. The compound (ἀντι-μετρέω) combines 'in return' with 'measure,' emphasizing the proportional reciprocity. Spanish 'será-medido' (it will be measured), French 'mesurer-en-retour' (measure in return), and German preservation of the Greek all capture the reciprocal measuring.

(1×) Measure in return (Luke 6:38). Jesus promises that the measure used in giving will be 'measured back' to the giver—generous giving receives generous return. The passive voice ('it will be measured back') suggests divine agency—God ensures the reciprocal measurement. The context specifies not merely equal return but 'pressed down, shaken together, running over'—God's return exceeds our giving. The universal translation evidence for 'measured in return' shows clear understanding of proportional reciprocity. This is not quid pro quo but promise that God rewards generosity abundantly. MEASURE PASSIVE en: it-will-be-measured-back | es: será-medido | fr: mesurer-en-retour | de: ἀντιμετρηθήσεται Luke 6:38

ἀντιμισθ-ία G0489 N-AFS (2×)

recompense, exchange, requittal; what is given back in return or as mutual response

This noun describes recompense or exchange given in return. Both occurrences appear in Paul's letters. Romans 1:27 speaks of receiving in themselves the due recompense of their error—likely referring to the consequences of sexual immorality. In 2 Corinthians 6:13, Paul requests recompense from the Corinthians, asking them to widen their hearts in return for his affection. The term indicates mutual exchange or fitting return. Translations uniformly use recompense or reward vocabulary (Spanish recompensa, French récompense, German Vergeltung).

(2×) Romans uses ἀντιμισθία for the intrinsic consequences received from moral error—recompense built into the action itself. Paul's 2 Corinthians use requests reciprocal affection—'as a fair exchange, open wide your hearts also.' The same noun covers both judicial recompense (Romans) and relational reciprocity (Corinthians). The accusative ἀντιμισθίαν suggests this as something received or requested, whether as consequence or as appropriate mutual response in relationship. RECOMPENSE AND RETRIBUTION

en: recompense | es: recompensa | fr: récompense | de: Vergeltung Rom 1:27; 2Cor 6:13

Ἀντιόχεια G0490 N-GFS (18×)

Antioch — a city name referring either to Syrian Antioch or Pisidian Antioch

The proper noun Antiocheia designates two distinct cities in the NT. Syrian Antioch (modern Antakya, Turkey) served as the launching point of Paul's missionary journeys and the place where believers were first called 'Christians' (Acts 11:26). Pisidian Antioch in Asia Minor was a key stop on Paul's first journey, where he delivered a major synagogue address (Acts 13:14) and later faced persecution (Acts 14:19; 2 Tim 3:11). Paul's confrontation with Peter at Antioch (Gal 2:11) underscores Syrian Antioch's theological significance as the Gentile mission's home base.

Antiocheia (18×) The city of Antioch (Ἀντιόχεια), referring to either Syrian Antioch — the major metropolis where Gentile Christianity flourished and where believers were first called Christians (Acts 11:26) — or Pisidian Antioch in Asia Minor, a stop on Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 13:14; 14:19). Spanish 'Antioquía' and French 'Antioche' preserve the classical name across translation traditions. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Antiocheia | es: Antiochéia, Antioquía, Antiócheia | fr: Antioche, Ἀντιοχείᾳ, Ἀντιόχειαν | de: Antiochien, Ἀντιοχείᾳ, Ἀντιόχειαν Acts 11:19; Acts 11:20; Acts 11:22; Acts 11:26

Ἀντιοχεύς G0491 N-AMS (1×)

Antiochene, citizen of Antioch

This noun denotes a citizen of Antioch, one of several cities bearing that name in the ancient world. Luke uses it in Acts 6:5 to identify Nicolas as 'a proselyte from Antioch,' distinguishing him from the other six deacons. Antioch of Syria was a major early Christian center where believers were first called Christians (Acts 11:26). Spanish 'Antiochenós,' French 'Antiochien,' and German preservation of the Greek all indicate geographic origin. This ethnic/geographic identifier establishes Nicolas's background as a Gentile convert to Judaism who then became Christian.

(1×) Native or citizen of Antioch (Acts 6:5). Luke identifies Nicolas as 'a proselyte from Antioch,' making him the only non-Jewish member of the seven deacons. The term establishes his geographic origin, likely Antioch of Syria given the prominence of that church. The multilingual preservation of recognizable forms shows consensus that this is an ethnic-geographic identifier, not merely a name. His selection as deacon shows the early church's ethnic diversity and suggests Antioch's church already had significant connection to Jerusalem. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: of-Antiocheia | es: Antiochenós | fr: Antiochien | de: Ἀντιοχέα Acts 6:5

ἀντιπαρ-έρχομαι G0492 V-AIA-3S (2×)

to pass by on the opposite side, avoid by crossing over; to deliberately evade someone by taking another route

This compound verb means to pass by on the opposite side, deliberately avoiding someone. Both occurrences appear in Jesus' Good Samaritan parable. Luke 10:31 describes the priest passing by on the opposite side, and verse 32 tells how the Levite did the same. The compound construction emphasizes crossing over to avoid the injured man. Classical usage included coming to help against an enemy and penetrating through. The New Testament restricts it to this parable about avoiding involvement. All translations emphasize the deliberate crossing to the other side to avoid contact.

(2×) Jesus' parable uses ἀντιπαρῆλθεν twice to describe religious leaders who see the wounded man but actively avoid helping by crossing to the road's far side. This isn't passive failure to notice but deliberate evasion—choosing distance over involvement. The compound prefix ἀντι- emphasizes the oppositeness: they don't just pass by; they pass by on the opposite side. The repeated action by both priest and Levite sets up the shocking reversal when the Samaritan stops to help. CROSSING OVER

en: passed-by-on-the-other-side | es: pasó-de-largo | fr: passer-de-l'autre-côté | de: ἀντιπαρῆλθεν Luke 10:31; Luke 10:32

Ἀντίπας G0493 N-NMS (1×)

Antipas, a Christian martyr in Pergamum

Antipas (abbreviated from Antipater, meaning 'like the father') was a Christian martyr in Pergamum. The risen Christ mentions him in Revelation 2:13 as 'my faithful witness, who was killed among you.' He is the only individual martyr named in Revelation's seven letters, suggesting his death had particular significance for the Pergamum church. The name was common in the Herodian dynasty. All four translation languages preserve the name 'Antipas' with minimal phonetic variation, recognizing it as a proper name.

(1×) Personal name of a martyr (Rev 2:13). Jesus commends the Pergamum church for remaining faithful even in the days when 'Antipas my faithful witness was killed among you, where Satan dwells.' The designation 'faithful witness' (μάρτυς, from which 'martyr') indicates Antipas died for his testimony. His individual mention suggests his martyrdom was recent and well-known. The multilingual consistency in preserving the name reflects its status as a proper noun. Antipas becomes an example of faithfulness unto death in the face of Satanic opposition. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Antipas | es: Antípas | fr: Antipas | de: Antipas Rev 2:13

Ἀντιπατρίς G0494 N-AFS (1×)

Antipatris, a city between Joppa and Caesarea

Antipatris was a city rebuilt by Herod the Great and named for his father Antipater. Luke mentions it in Acts 23:31 as a stopping point when Paul was escorted from Jerusalem to Caesarea under military guard. Located about 35 miles from Jerusalem, it provided a safe overnight stop beyond the range of the Jewish conspiracy against Paul. The city sat on the main road between Joppa and Caesarea. All translation languages preserve recognizable forms of 'Antipatris,' showing consensus that this is a place name.

(1×) Place name of a city (Acts 23:31). Luke's narrative describes soldiers bringing Paul 'by night to Antipatris' as they transported him from Jerusalem to Caesarea. The city's location made it a strategic overnight stop—far enough from Jerusalem to be beyond immediate danger from Paul's would-be assassins. The multilingual preservation of the name with minimal phonetic variation confirms this as a geographic proper noun. This detail of Luke's travel narrative demonstrates his careful attention to geographic and historical accuracy. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Antipatris | es: Antipatrís | fr: Antipatris | de: Ἀντιπατρίδα Acts 23:31

ἀντιπέρ-ᾱν G0495 Prep (1×)

opposite, on the other side, across from

This adverb (used as preposition) means on the opposite side or across from. Luke uses it in Luke 8:26 to describe sailing 'to the region of the Gerasenes, which is opposite Galilee.' Classical usage established this as geographical and nautical terminology for locations on opposite shores or sides. The term emphasizes the spatial relationship of being directly across. Spanish 'enfrente' (in front of/opposite), French 'en-face' (facing), and German 'Antiochien' (appears to be error for opposite) indicate the across-from relationship.

(1×) Opposite, across from (Luke 8:26). Luke describes Jesus and the disciples sailing 'to the region of the Gerasenes, which is opposite Galilee'—that is, on the opposite (eastern) shore of the Sea of Galilee. The term establishes geographic relationship between the predominantly Gentile Decapolis region and Jewish Galilee. The Spanish 'enfrente' and French 'en-face' both capture the facing relationship of opposite shores. This journey across to Gentile territory sets the stage for Jesus's encounter with the demoniac and demonstrates his mission extending beyond Jewish boundaries. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: opposite | es: enfrente | fr: en-face | de: Antiochien Luke 8:26

ἀντιπίπτω G0496 V-PIA-2P (1×)

resist, oppose, fall upon in opposition

This verb means to resist, oppose, or collide with something. Stephen accuses his hearers in Acts 7:51: 'You stiff-necked people... always resist the Holy Spirit.' Classical usage included physical collision, resistance to authority, and contrary winds. The compound (ἀντι-πίπτω) combines 'against' with 'fall,' creating imagery of falling against or colliding with something in opposition. Spanish 'resistís' (you resist), French preservation of the Greek, and German repetition of the Greek all emphasize active resistance.

(1×) Resist, oppose (Acts 7:51). Stephen's climactic accusation declares 'You always resist the Holy Spirit!' The verb emphasizes active, persistent opposition—the present tense 'you always resist' indicates habitual pattern, not isolated incidents. Classical usage of 'collide with' and 'contrary winds' shows forceful opposition, not mere reluctance. The multilingual consensus on 'resist' indicates deliberate opposition to God's Spirit speaking through the prophets. This resistance culminates in their rejection of Jesus, the Righteous One the prophets announced. OPPOSE BE ADVERSARY

en: resist | es: resistís | fr: ἀντιπίπτετε | de: ἀντιπίπτετε Acts 7:51

ἀντιστρᾰτεύομαι G0497 V-PPM/P-AMS (1×)

wage war against, make war on

This verb means to make war against or wage military campaign against someone. Paul uses it in Romans 7:23 describing the 'law of sin waging war against the law of my mind.' Classical usage was military—taking the field against an enemy or conducting a campaign. The compound (ἀντι-στρατεύομαι) combines 'against' with 'make war,' emphasizing hostile military action. Spanish 'que-guerrea-contra' (that wars against), French 'combattre-contre' (fight against), and German 'widerstreiten' (resist/oppose) all capture the warfare imagery.

(1×) Wage war against (Rom 7:23). Paul describes the internal conflict: 'I see another law waging war against the law of my mind.' The military metaphor is deliberate and vivid—this is not mere temptation but full-scale warfare. Classical usage of military campaigns shows this is sustained, organized opposition, not sporadic skirmishes. The present participle indicates ongoing warfare—the law of sin continuously conducts military operations against the believer's renewed mind. This is the warfare of sanctification, resolved only through Christ (7:24-25). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: waging-war-against | es: que-guerrea-contra | fr: combattre-contre | de: widerstreiten Rom 7:23

ἀντιτάσσω G0498 V-PPM-GMP (5×)

To set oneself against, oppose, or resist; to array oneself in opposition to authority or persons.

Derived from a military metaphor of arraying troops in battle formation against an enemy, this verb in the New Testament consistently describes resistance to authority or to God himself. James twice quotes Proverbs 3:34 – 'God opposes the proud' (Jas 4:6; 1 Pet 5:5) – where the middle voice captures the personal, deliberate nature of divine resistance. Paul warns that opposing governing authorities means opposing God's ordinance (Rom 13:2). Spanish 'resistir/oponerse' and German 'widersetzen' both capture the forceful, intentional resistance the word conveys.

(5×) To oppose, resist, or set oneself against, often with the force of deliberate, personal hostility. The middle voice underscores active self-involvement in the opposition. In Rom 13:2 resistance to civil authority is equated with resisting God's arrangement. In Jas 4:6 and 1 Pet 5:5, God himself 'arrays against' the proud – a striking military image. Acts 18:6 shows Paul's opponents actively resisting his message, and Jas 5:6 speaks of the righteous man who does not resist. Multilingual glosses (Spanish 'oponerse,' German 'widersetzen') consistently highlight the willful, combative character. OPPOSE BE ADVERSARY

en: he-resists, opposes, opposing | es: Oponiéndose, os-resiste, que-resiste | fr: s'opposer | de: widersetzen, ἀντιτασσομένων Acts 18:6; Rom 13:2; Jas 4:6; Jas 5:6; 1Pet 5:5

ἀντίτῠπ-ος G0499 Adj-ANP (2×)

antitype, corresponding figure, copy; something that corresponds to or represents a prior pattern or reality

This adjective describes something that corresponds to an original pattern—an antitype to a type. Hebrews 9:24 contrasts earthly holy places made with hands with true heavenly ones, calling the earthly ones antitypes. 1 Peter 3:21 calls baptism an antitype corresponding to Noah's ark salvation. Classical usage included echo, reflection, counterfeit, and corresponding affection. The New Testament uses it for earthly copies pointing to heavenly realities. German Gegenbild (counter-image) captures the corresponding representation concept.

(2×) The two New Testament uses establish antitype vocabulary for understanding how earthly realities correspond to heavenly ones. Hebrews uses it for the tabernacle—a copy of the true sanctuary. Peter uses it for baptism—which corresponds to the ark's water salvation. The adjective ἀντίτυπος describes not mere similarity but intentional correspondence where the earthly figure represents and points toward the spiritual reality. This theological vocabulary helps explain how Old Testament institutions prefigure New Testament fulfillment. EXAMPLES AND TYPES en: antitype, copies | es: antitipo, figura-correspondiente | fr: Gegenbild | de: Gegenbild Heb 9:24; 1Pet 3:21

ἀντίχριστος G0500 N-GMS (5×)

Antichrist: one who opposes or falsely claims to replace Christ; a deceiver denying the Father and Son.

Unique to the Johannine epistles, this compound word (anti + christos) denotes not merely an opponent of Christ but a counterfeit replacement – someone who denies the incarnation and the Father-Son relationship. John warns that many antichrists have already come (1 John 2:18), identifying anyone who denies Jesus is the Christ as 'the antichrist' (1 John 2:22). The term functions both as a specific eschatological figure and as a category encompassing present deceivers (2 John 1:7). Spanish 'anticristo' and German 'Antichrist' preserve the Greek compound directly, showing how universally recognizable this theological term has become.

(5×) One who opposes Christ or sets up a rival claim to his identity, encompassing both a prophesied end-times figure and present-day deceivers who deny the incarnation. In 1 John 2:18 the singular 'antichrist is coming' stands alongside the plural 'many antichrists have come,' showing both specific and categorical usage. 1 John 2:22 defines the antichrist as whoever denies the Father-Son relationship. 1 John 4:3 and 2 John 1:7 link the concept to denial of Jesus coming in the flesh. The prefix anti- carries dual force: opposition to and substitution for the true Christ. OPPOSE BE ADVERSARY

en: antichrist, antichrists | es: anticristo, anticristos | fr: ἀντίχριστοι, ἀντίχριστος, ἀντιχρίστου | de: Antichrist 1John 2:18; 1John 2:22; 1John 4:3; 2John 1:7

ἀντλ-έω G0501 V-RPA-NMP (4×)

to draw water from a well or vessel

All four NT occurrences of this verb appear in the Gospel of John in connection with water. At the wedding in Cana (John 2:8-9), servants draw water that has been transformed into wine. In Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman (John 4:7, 15), drawing water from Jacob's well becomes the occasion for a discourse on living water. The verb is straightforwardly practical — Spanish 'sacar,' French 'puiser,' and German 'schoepfen' all denote the everyday act of drawing water — yet John consistently places it in contexts where ordinary water points to something extraordinary.

(4×) To draw water from a well, cistern, or vessel. A concrete, everyday action appearing exclusively in John's Gospel. At Cana, servants draw (and discover wine, John 2:8-9); at Sychar, the woman draws from Jacob's well (John 4:7, 15). The cross-linguistic evidence is unanimous — Spanish 'sacar,' French 'puiser,' German 'schoepfen,' English 'draw' — all pointing to a single sense of extracting liquid from a source. The theological weight comes not from multiple senses but from John's symbolic staging of this ordinary act. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Draw, having-drawn, to-draw | es: Sacad, a-sacar, que-habían-sacado | fr: puiser | de: schoepfen John 2:8; John 2:9; John 4:7; John 4:15

ἄντλ-ημα G0502 N-ANS (1×)

bucket, water-drawing vessel

This noun denotes a bucket or vessel for drawing water from a well. The Samaritan woman uses it in John 4:11 when she asks Jesus, 'You have no bucket, and the well is deep.' Classical usage established this as standard equipment for drawing water from wells. Spanish 'recipiente' (container/vessel), French 'seau' (bucket), and German 'Schöpfgefäß' (drawing vessel) all indicate a container specifically for water-drawing. This practical detail grounds Jesus's metaphorical teaching about living water in the concrete reality of the conversation.

(1×) Water-drawing bucket (John 4:11). The Samaritan woman points out the practical problem: 'Sir, you have no bucket, and the well is deep. Where then do you get this living water?' Her literal-minded response to Jesus's metaphor about living water shows she's thinking of the physical well and practical means of drawing water. The universal translation consensus on 'bucket/vessel for drawing' shows clear identification of the implement. Her focus on the physical bucket highlights her initial inability to grasp Jesus's spiritual meaning—a common Johannine irony. DRINKING AND WATERING

en: bucket | es: recipiente | fr: seau | de: Schoepfgefaess John 4:11

ἀντοφθαλμ-έω G0503 V-PNA (1×)

to face into; to bear into (wind/waves), meet head-on, confront directly

This nautical term describes facing directly into opposition, particularly of a ship bearing into adverse wind or waves. The verb combines the sense of meeting something face-to-face with the challenge of confronting it head-on. In Acts 27:15, the ship could no longer face into the wind during Paul's storm-tossed voyage, forcing the crew to give way and be driven along. The Greek construction emphasizes direct, frontal encounter rather than evasion.

(1×) The single NT occurrence uses this verb in its classical nautical sense: a ship attempting to hold course against contrary wind. Greek maritime vocabulary distinguished carefully between facing into wind (this verb) versus running before it. The Spanish 'hacer frente' and French 'faire face' preserve the confrontational aspect, while the German simply transcribes the Greek, suggesting the technical precision of the term. MEETING AND ENCOUNTERING

en: to-face | es: hacer-frente | fr: faire-face | de: ἀντοφθαλμεῖν Acts 27:15

ἄνυδρ-ος G0504 Adj-GMP (4×)

waterless, dry, arid; lacking water, used of desolate places and metaphorically of spiritually barren agents

Formed from the privative alpha and hydor ('water'), this adjective describes what is without water. Jesus speaks of an unclean spirit wandering through 'waterless places' seeking rest (Matt 12:43; Luke 11:24) — the desert as the haunt of demons. In 2 Peter 2:17 and Jude 1:12, the word is applied metaphorically to false teachers: they are 'waterless springs' or 'waterless clouds,' promising refreshment but delivering nothing. German 'wasserlose' and Spanish 'sin-agua' both transparently preserve the privative construction.

(4×) Waterless, arid — describing a literal dry region. In Jesus' parable of the unclean spirit (Matt 12:43; Luke 11:24), the expelled demon traverses 'waterless places,' evoking the ancient Near Eastern association of desert wastelands with spiritual desolation and demonic habitation. Spanish 'sin-agua' and German 'wasserlose' directly calque the Greek privative form. WATER

en: waterless | es: sin-agua, áridos | fr: sans-eau, sans-eau, | de: wasserlose, ἀνύδρων, ἄνυδροι Matt 12:43; Luke 11:24; 2Pet 2:17; Jude 1:12

ἀνυπό-κρῐτος G0505 Adj-AFS (6×)

Sincere, genuine, without hypocrisy; describing love, faith, and wisdom that are free from pretense

A compact adjective (a-nypokritos, literally 'un-acted') meaning free from pretense or play-acting. It modifies the most central Christian virtues: love must be 'without hypocrisy' (Rom 12:9), as must faith (1 Tim 1:5; 2 Tim 1:5) and wisdom from above (Jas 3:17). Spanish 'sin hipocresia' and French 'sans hypocrisie' beautifully preserve the alpha-privative structure. The word insists that the inner reality must match the outward profession – a recurring concern in the apostolic letters.

unhypocritical (6×) Genuine, sincere, without hypocrisy or pretense – an alpha-privative adjective (a + hypokritos, 'not play-acting') applied to core Christian virtues. Romans 12:9 demands that love (agape) be anupokritos – Spanish 'sin hipocresia,' German 'ungeheuchelt' – establishing sincerity as love's essential quality. Second Corinthians 6:6 lists it among Paul's apostolic credentials. First Timothy 1:5 and 2 Timothy 1:5 apply it to faith (pistis), with Timothy's grandmother Lois and mother Eunice as exemplars. James 3:17 includes it as a mark of heavenly wisdom. The consistent pairing with love, faith, and wisdom shows that genuineness is not optional but definitional for authentic Christian character. HOLINESS AND SINCERITY en: unhypocritical | es: sin-hipocresía, sincera | fr: sans-hypocrisie, ungeheuchelt | de: ungeheuchelt Rom 12:9; 2Cor 6:6; 1Tim 1:5; 2Tim 1:5; Jas 3:17

ἀνυπό-τακτος G0506 Adj-DMP (4×)

insubordinate, unruly, not subject to authority; also 'not yet subjected' in a cosmic sense

Composed of the privative alpha and hypotasso ('to subject, arrange under'), this adjective describes what is not placed under authority. It appears in two distinct registers. In the Pastoral Epistles, it characterizes rebellious people: the lawless and insubordinate (1 Tim 1:9), children who are unruly (Titus 1:6), and the many who are rebellious and deceptive (Titus 1:10). Hebrews 2:8, however, uses it in a cosmic-eschatological sense — quoting Psalm 8, the author notes that 'nothing was left not subjected' to humanity, yet 'we do not yet see everything subjected.' German and French both render it 'ungehorsam' (disobedient), while Spanish 'insubordinado' captures the defiance.

(4×) Insubordinate, unruly, rebellious — describing persons who refuse to submit to rightful authority. First Timothy 1:9 lists the 'insubordinate' (eng 'insubordinate,' spa 'insubordinados') alongside the lawless; Titus 1:6 requires that elders' children not be accused of being unruly; Titus 1:10 warns of 'many who are rebellious.' German 'ungehorsam' and French cognates emphasize disobedience as the defining trait. DISOBEDIENCE REBELLION

en: insubordinate, not-subjected | es: insubordinados, no-sujeto | fr: ungehorsam | de: ungehorsam 1Tim 1:9; Titus 1:6; Titus 1:10; Heb 2:8

ἄνω G0507 Adv (9×)

Above, upward; an adverb of spatial position or direction, often extended to mean heavenly or spiritually higher.

This adverb conveys the basic spatial idea of 'up' or 'above,' but in the New Testament it frequently carries theological weight. Jesus tells the servants to fill the jars 'to the top' (John 2:7), a purely spatial use. Yet in John 8:23 he declares 'I am from above' (ego ek ton ano eimi), contrasting the heavenly realm with the earthly —a distinction Paul echoes in Galatians 4:26, 'the Jerusalem above is free.' Colossians 3:1-2 urges believers to seek 'the things above.' Spanish 'arriba/de-arriba' and French 'en-haut' preserve this dual spatial-and-spiritual sense, while German 'oben' captures the straightforward directional meaning.

above, upward (spatial/directional adverb) (9×) Adverb indicating spatial position ('above,' 'at the top') or upward direction, frequently extended to denote the heavenly or divine realm in contrast to the earthly. In John 2:7 it is purely spatial ('to the brim/top'), but in John 8:23 Jesus contrasts being 'from above' with being 'from below,' and Galatians 4:26 speaks of 'the Jerusalem above.' Acts 2:19 uses it for celestial signs, and Colossians 3:1-2 exhorts seeking 'the things above.' The theological extension from physical height to divine origin is the word's most distinctive NT contribution. ABOVE AND UPWARD

en: above, top, up | es: arriba, de-arriba | fr: en-haut | de: oben John 2:7; John 8:23; John 11:41; Acts 2:19; Gal 4:26

ἀνώγαιον G0508 N-ANS (2×)

upper room, upstairs chamber; the elevated story of a house used for dining or gathering

This noun designates an upper room or upstairs chamber. Both Gospel occurrences describe the large upper room where Jesus ate the Last Supper. Mark 14:15 and Luke 22:12 both use the same phrase—a large upper room, furnished and ready. Classical usage included upper floors used for storage or dining. The New Testament restricts it to this significant space where Jesus instituted the Lord's Supper. Translations (Spanish aposento-alto/salón-alto, French chambre-haute) emphasize the room's elevation and size.

(2×) Both Mark and Luke describe the same room—a large upstairs space prepared for the Passover meal where Jesus transforms the feast into Christian communion. The accusative ἀνάγαιον appears in identical phrases: 'He will show you a large upper room furnished.' This upper room becomes sacred space in Christian memory—the location of the Last Supper and likely the same room where the risen Jesus appeared and where the Spirit came at Pentecost (Acts 1:13; 2:1). CELESTIAL UPPER CHAMBERS

en: an-upper-room | es: aposento-alto, salón-alto | fr: chambre-haute | de: ἀνάγαιον Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12

ἄνωθεν G0509 Adv (13×)

From above, from heaven; from the beginning, from of old; anew, again

An adverb carrying layers of meaning that converge memorably in Jesus' words to Nicodemus about being born 'from above' (John 3:3, 7)—or is it 'again'? The deliberate ambiguity between spatial origin ('from above/heaven') and repetition ('anew') is precisely the hinge of that famous dialogue. In its dominant spatial sense, it describes the temple veil torn 'from top to bottom' (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38) and divine gifts coming 'from above' (John 3:31; 19:11; Jas 1:17; 3:15, 17). Spanish consistently renders it 'de arriba / desde arriba,' while Luke uses it temporally for investigating things 'from the beginning' (Luke 1:3). Paul repurposes it for 'anew' when warning the Galatians against returning to bondage all over again (Gal 4:9).

1. from above, from heaven (11×) Spatial: from above, from on high, from heaven. The primary NT sense, covering the temple curtain torn 'from top' downward (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38), Jesus' authority given 'from above' (John 19:11), wisdom 'from above' (Jas 3:15, 17), and the famous birth 'from above' in John 3:3, 7. Spanish 'de arriba / desde arriba,' French 'd'en haut,' and German 'von oben' uniformly point upward, confirming the heavenly-origin reading.

ABOVE AND UPWARD
en: above, from-above, top | es: arriba, de-arriba, desde-arriba | fr: d'en-haut | de: von-oben, ἄνωθεν Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 1:3; John 3:3; John 3:7

2. from the beginning, from of old (1×) Temporal: from the beginning, from the first, from of old. In Acts 26:5, Paul says the Jews have known him 'from the beginning'—that is, from his earliest life. Luke 1:3 also uses it for tracing things 'from the very first.' The temporal sense is distinguished in Spanish by 'desde el principio,' shifting from spatial height to chronological priority. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: from-the-beginning | es: desde-el-principio | fr: d'en-haut | de: ἄνωθεν Acts 26:5

3. anew, again, once more (1×) Iterative: anew, again, once more. In Galatians 4:9, Paul asks why the believers want to serve the weak elemental forces 'all over again.' This sense overlaps with the spatial meaning in John 3:3 (born 'from above' or 'again'), creating the productive ambiguity Nicodemus stumbles over. Spanish 'desde arriba' here blurs the line, but the context demands repetition. ABOVE AND UPWARD en: anew | es: desde-arriba | fr: d'en-haut | de: von-oben Gal 4:9

ἀνωτερικός G0510 Adj-ANP (1×)
upper, inland; relating to higher elevation or interior regions
This adjective describes geographic or spatial positioning at a higher level or further inland from coastal areas. In classical Greek it could refer to inland regions as opposed to coastal territories, or to upper stories versus ground floors. Acts 19:1 uses it to describe the 'upper regions' through which Paul traveled on his way to Ephesus—likely the highland route through the interior of Asia Minor rather than the coastal road. The term emphasizes elevation and interiority.

(1×) Paul's journey through 'upper regions' to Ephesus reflects standard geographic terminology for the elevated interior plateau of Asia Minor. Spanish 'superiores,' French 'supérieur,' and English 'upper' all capture the elevation sense. The German transcription preserves the Greek form, perhaps recognizing the technical geographic precision. Ancient travelers distinguished between coastal routes (faster but exposed) and highland routes (slower but safer). UPPER UPPERMOST en: upper | es: superiores | fr: supérieur | de: ἀνωτερικὰ Acts 19:1

ἀνώτερος G0511 Adj-ANS-C (2×)
higher, above; comparatively more elevated in position or mentioned earlier in text
This comparative adjective means higher or above, used both spatially and textually. Luke 14:10 describes moving up to a higher place of honor at a banquet. Hebrews 10:8 refers to what was said above earlier in the text. The word is the comparative form of ἄνω (upward, above). Classical usage included getting the better of something and positions physically higher. The New Testament uses it for both social elevation and textual reference. Translations (Spanish arriba/más-arriba, German hoeher) work spatially, while 'above' functions for textual reference.

(2×) Luke's Jesus teaches humility by advising guests to take lower seats, so the host might invite them higher—'Go up higher' using this comparative. Hebrews uses ἀνώτερον to refer back to previous quotation in the argument—'what was said above.' The neuter comparative functions adverbially in both contexts: literally higher (spatial honor) and above (textual location). This shows how a single comparative form bridges physical and literary space. ABOVE AND UPWARD en: above, higher | es: arriba, más-arriba | fr: plus-haut | de: hoeher, ἀνώτερον Luke 14:10; Heb 10:8

ἀνωφελ-ής G0512 Adj-NFP (2×)
unprofitable, useless, unhelpful; providing no benefit or advantage
This adjective describes what is unprofitable or useless—providing no benefit. Titus 3:9 calls foolish controversies, genealogies, and quarrels about the law unprofitable and useless. Hebrews 7:18 describes the former commandment as weak and unprofitable. Classical usage included both unprofitable and actively harmful. The New Testament restricts it to unhelpfulness or lack of benefit. Translations (Spanish inutilidad/inútiles, French inutile, German unnuetz) consistently emphasize uselessness.

(2×) Titus uses the feminine plural ἀνωφελεῖς to describe religious disputes—they're unprofitable, producing no spiritual benefit. Hebrews employs the same adjective for the Mosaic law regarding priesthood—it was unprofitable in that it couldn't perfect worshipers. Both uses involve religious systems or practices that fail to accomplish their ostensible purpose. The adjective doesn't mean these things are evil but that they're ineffective—unable to produce the benefit claimed or desired. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 13406 WITH 4 SENSES en: unprofitable, uselessness | es: inutilidad, inútiles | fr: inutile | de: unnuetz Titus 3:9; Heb 7:18

ἀξῖν-η G0513 N-NFS (2×)
axe; a tool with a heavy blade used for chopping wood or cutting down trees
This noun denotes an axe—a cutting tool with a heavy blade. Both occurrences appear in parallel passages from John the Baptist's preaching. Matthew 3:10 and Luke 3:9 both quote John's warning that the axe already lies at the tree's root, ready to cut down fruitless trees. Classical usage included axe-heads, battle-axes, and wood-chopping axes. The New Testament restricts it to John's prophetic imagery of coming judgment. Translations (Spanish hacha, French hache) consistently identify this as an axe.

(2×) John the Baptist uses ἀξίνη as a prophetic image for imminent judgment. The axe isn't approaching; it's already positioned at the tree's root—judgment is ready to fall. The imagery warns that profession without fruit leads to being cut down and thrown into fire. Both Matthew and Luke preserve identical wording: 'Already the axe lies at the root of the trees.' This vivid image makes judgment concrete—not distant threat but present readiness. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 13410 WITH 5 SENSES en: axe | es: hacha | fr: hache | de: ἀξίνη Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9

ἄξιος G0514 Adj-NMP (41×)
worthy, deserving, fitting — describing someone or something as meriting honor, punishment, or a particular status Axios ('worthy, deserving') derives from the root sense of 'weighing as much as' — something that tips the scale to match what is expected. In the New Testament's 41 occurrences, it evaluates persons and things against a standard of merit. Jesus declares 'the worker is worthy of his wages' (Matt 10:10; Luke 10:7), while the prodigal confesses 'I am no longer worthy to be called your son' (Luke 15:19, 21). In Revelation, the Lamb alone is 'worthy to open the scroll' (Rev 5:2, 9, 12). Spanish 'digno,' French 'digne,' German 'wurdig' all preserve the evaluative weight.

worthy, deserving, fitting (41×) Evaluative adjective: a person or thing measures up to a standard of honor, reward, or condemnation. Jesus uses it to set the hospitality threshold (Matt 10:11, 13). Paul extends it to moral exhortation: 'walk worthy of the calling' (Eph 4:1). Judicially, 'deserving punishment' (Luke 23:15; Acts 25:11). Revelation's 'worthy is the Lamb' (5:12) is the supreme positive application. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH en: I-worthy, things-worthy, worthy | es: cosas-dignas, digna, digno | fr: digne | de: wuerdig, würdig Matt 3:8; Matt 10:10; Matt 10:11; Matt 10:13

ἀξιόω G0515 V-PMM/P-3P (7×)
To deem worthy, consider deserving; passive: to be counted worthy of honor, calling, or punishment.
The Greek verb axioo carries the weight of deliberate evaluation — to look at someone and judge whether they measure up. In the active voice, it means 'to consider worthy' or 'to think fitting,' as when the centurion tells Jesus 'I did not consider myself worthy to come to you' (Luke 7:7) or when Paul's companions refused to consider Mark a worthy travel companion (Acts 15:38). In the passive, it shifts to 'be counted worthy' or 'be deemed deserving,' and here the stakes rise dramatically: the Thessalonians are counted worthy of God's calling (2 Thess 1:11), elders deserve double honor (1 Tim 5:17), Jesus is deemed worthy of greater glory than Moses (Heb 3:3), and — most soberly — apostates are judged deserving of worse punishment (Heb 10:29). Spanish considerar digno and German wuerdig erachten both capture the evaluative force, while French juger digne brings out the judicial overtone.

1. to be counted worthy, be deemed deserving (passive/middle) (4×) To be counted worthy or deemed deserving in the passive or middle voice, expressing a judgment rendered upon the subject by another authority. The four occurrences cluster around God's evaluative verdict: the Thessalonians whom Paul prays God will 'count worthy of his calling' (2 Thess 1:11), elders 'considered worthy of double honor' (1 Tim 5:17), Jesus 'counted worthy of greater glory than Moses' (Heb 3:3), and the apostate 'deemed worthy of worse punishment' (Heb 10:29). Spanish ha sido considerado digno, French juger digne, and German wuerdig erachten all preserve the evaluative-passive construction, confirming this as a judgment received rather than exercised. DEEM WORTHY

en: has-been-counted-worthy, let-be-considered-worthy, may-count-worthy | es: considere-dignos, ha-sido-considerado-digno, sean-considerados-dignos | fr: juger-digne | de: wuerdig-erachten 2Thess 1:11; 1Tim 5:17; Heb 3:3; Heb 10:29

2. to consider worthy, think fitting (active) (3×) To consider worthy, think fitting, or deem appropriate in the active voice, where the subject exercises deliberate judgment about someone's worth or suitability. The centurion in Luke 7:7 declares 'I did not consider myself worthy' (ouk emauton exiosa) to approach Jesus. In Acts 15:38 Paul 'did not think it fitting' (exiou) to take Mark. In Acts 28:22 the Roman Jews say 'we consider it worthwhile' (axioumen) to hear Paul's views. Spanish consideraba/consideramos digno and German axioun all reflect the active, deliberative quality — this is a personal decision about value, not a verdict received. DEEM WORTHY

en: I-considered-worthy, was-insisting, we-consider-it-worthwhile | es: considéraba, consideramos-digno, tuve-por-digno | fr: juger-digne | de: ἀξιοῦμεν, ἠξίου, ἠξίωσα Luke 7:7; Acts 15:38; Acts 28:22

ἄξιος G0516 Adv (6×)

Worthily, in a manner worthy of; an adverb urging conduct befitting one's calling or the gospel

An adverb derived from axios ('worthy, of equal weight') that calls believers to live in a manner commensurate with the dignity of their calling. Paul uses it repeatedly as a hinge between theology and ethics: walk 'worthily' of the calling you received (Eph 4:1), of the gospel of Christ (Phil 1:27), of the Lord (Col 1:10), and of the God who calls you (1 Thess 2:12). Spanish 'dignamente' and French 'dignement' preserve the adverbial force. Romans 16:2 asks the church to receive Phoebe 'worthily of the saints.'

(6×) In a manner worthy of, befittingly – an adverb urging conduct that matches the weight or dignity of a person, calling, or reality. From axios ('of equal weight on the scales'), it conveys proportionality: one's life should balance against the value of what one has received. Romans 16:2 applies it to hospitality – receive Phoebe 'worthily of the saints.' Ephesians 4:1, Philippians 1:27, Colossians 1:10, and 1 Thessalonians 2:12 all use it in the same exhortatory pattern: the gospel and God's calling establish a standard, and believers are urged to live up to it. Spanish 'dignamente,' French 'dignement,' and German 'wuerdig' all preserve the root connection to dignity and worth. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: worthily | es: dignamente | fr: digne, dignement | de: wuerdig Rom 16:2; Eph 4:1; Phil 1:27; Col 1:10; 1Thess 2:12

ἀόρᾱ-τος G0517 Adj-DMS (5×)

Invisible, unseen; that which cannot be perceived by physical sight, especially of God's nature and attributes.

Applied exclusively to the divine realm in the New Testament, this adjective describes what lies beyond human visual perception. Paul uses it powerfully in Rom 1:20, arguing that God's invisible qualities are paradoxically 'clearly seen' through creation – a deliberate rhetorical tension. In Col 1:15-16, Christ is the image of the invisible God, and all things visible and invisible were created through him. The term appears in a doxology to the 'immortal, invisible, only God' (1 Tim 1:17) and in Hebrews' praise of Moses who endured 'as seeing the invisible one' (Heb 11:27). Every major translation language renders this with a direct cognate: Spanish 'invisible,' French 'invisible,' German 'unsichtbar.'

(5×) Invisible, unable to be seen with physical eyes, used in the NT exclusively of divine reality and attributes. Rom 1:20 creates a striking paradox: God's 'invisible things' are 'clearly perceived' through created order. Col 1:15 calls Christ the 'image of the invisible God,' while Col 1:16 contrasts visible and invisible realms of creation. 1 Tim 1:17 includes invisibility among divine attributes in a doxology. Heb 11:27 describes Moses' faith as 'seeing the one who is invisible.' The consistent theological application to God distinguishes NT usage from the classical Greek sense of merely 'unseen.' AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 5326 WITH 3 SENSES

en: invisible | es: cosas-invisibles, invisible, invisibles | fr: invisible | de: unsichtbar Rom 1:20; Col 1:15; Col 1:16; 1Tim 1:17; Heb 11:27

ἀπαγγ-έλλω G0518 V-PPA-NMP (47×)

To report, bring back word; to proclaim or announce publicly; to be reported to Apangello covers the full arc of message delivery in the New Testament. At its core, it means to bring back a report – the shepherds 'reported' what they had seen (Luke 2:20), and the women 'reported' the resurrection to the disciples (Matt 28:8). In a more elevated register, it shades into public proclamation: Paul 'proclaimed' repentance to Jews and Gentiles (Acts 26:20), and Jesus promises to 'announce' the Father plainly (John 16:25). Spanish distinguishes informar (report) from anunciar (proclaim), while German berichten captures both nuances. A rare passive occurrence notes that something 'was reported' to Jesus (Luke 8:20).

1. report or tell news (38×) The primary and most frequent sense: to bring back a report, to relay news or information. A messenger or witness tells someone what happened – the Gadarene swineherds 'reported' to the town (Matt 8:33), Jesus tells John's disciples 'report what you hear and see' (Matt 11:4), and the women rush to 'report' the empty tomb (Matt 28:8). This is the default narrative communication verb, with equivalents in Spanish (informar/anunciar), French (rapporter), and German (berichten). ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

en: They-reported, report, reported | es: anunciaron, anunció, informad | fr: annoncer, rapporter | de: berichten, berichtet Matt 2:8; Matt 8:33; Matt 11:4; Matt 14:12; Matt 28:8

2. proclaim or announce publicly (8×) A more public, authoritative sense: to proclaim or announce, often with theological weight. Matthew 12:18 quotes Isaiah: 'he shall announce justice to the nations.' Jesus promises 'I will announce to you plainly about the Father' (John 16:25). Paul 'announced' the need for repentance (Acts 26:20). The shift from private reporting to public declaration is marked in Spanish by the move from informar to anunciar and in French by annoncer. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

en: I-was-proclaiming, I-will-announce, I-will-report | es: Anunciaré, anunciamos, anunciando | fr: annoncer, rapporter | de: berichten, berichtet Matt 12:18; John 16:25; John 20:18; Acts 26:20; 1Cor 14:25

3. be reported or informed (1×) The passive voice: to be reported to, to have information delivered to oneself. In Luke 8:20, Jesus is told 'it was reported to him' that his mother and brothers stood outside. This is a straightforward grammatical extension of the active sense into passive reception of news. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

en: was-reported | es: se-le-anunció | fr: annoncer | de: berichtet Luke 8:20

ἀπάγχω G0519 V-AIM-3S (1×)

to hang oneself, commit suicide by hanging; to strangle or throttle

This verb's middle voice carries the specific meaning 'to hang oneself,' while the active voice means 'to strangle' or 'to throttle.' The word appears in contexts of violent death, particularly self-inflicted. Matthew 27:5 uses it to describe Judas's suicide: after betraying Jesus, he went away and hanged himself. The verb's aorist middle form emphasizes the reflexive action—Judas did this to himself. Greek tragedy and historical texts used this same construction for suicide by hanging, distinguishing it from other forms of violent death.

(1×) Judas's suicide by hanging represents the tragic culmination of his betrayal. The middle voice grammatically encodes the self-directed nature of the act. Cross-linguistic glosses maintain the stark directness: Spanish 'se ahorcó,' French 'se pendre,' and English 'hanged himself' all use reflexive constructions. The German preserves the Greek aorist middle form, marking this as technical vocabulary for a specific manner of death. DEATH AND DYING

en: hanged-himself | es: se-ahorcó | fr: se-pendre | de: ἀπήγξατο Matt 27:5

ἀπάγω G0520 V-PPA-NFS (16×)

Lead away (a person under custody); passive: be led away or carried off; figurative: of a path that leads somewhere.

The Greek verb apago carries the grim gravity of arrest and execution through most of its New Testament appearances. When soldiers seize Jesus in Gethsemane, the evangelists reach for this word to describe his being led away — first to Caiaphas (Matt 26:57), then to Pilate (Matt 27:2), then out to crucifixion (Matt 27:31). Spanish llevaban, Arabic اقتادوه, and Korean 끌고 가서 all converge on forceful, custodial movement. Yet in two quietly powerful verses, Jesus repurposes the word for roads themselves: the broad way 'leads away' to destruction and the narrow way 'leads away' to life (Matt 7:13-14), where German hinführt and Arabic يؤدي shift from person-centered arrest to path-centered destination.

1. lead away (a person) (11×) To lead away or take away a person, typically one under arrest or custody, from one place to another. This dominant sense (11 occurrences) clusters around the passion narratives: Jesus is led away to the high priest (Matt 26:57; Mark 14:53), to Pilate (Matt 27:2), and out for crucifixion (Matt 27:31; Mark 15:16). Spanish lleva/llevaban, Arabic اقتادوه, and Korean 끌고 가서 all encode forceful custodial movement, confirming this as a technical arrest-and-transfer term. LEADING AWAY

en: bring, lead-away, leading-away | es: lleva, llevaban, llevad | fr: emmener | de: führt-weg, ἀπάγετε, ἀπήγαγον Matt 26:57; Matt 27:2; Matt 27:31; Mark 14:44; Mark 14:53

2. be led away (passive) (3×) Passive forms expressing being led away or carried off, whether physically to execution (Acts 12:19, where guards are 'led away' to be put to death) or figuratively by false teaching (1 Cor 12:2, 'you were led astray to mute idols'). Arabic munsaqina (منساقين), Korean kkullyeo-gamyeo (끌려가며), and Swahili -ongozwayo all employ passive voice equivalents, preserving the sense of involuntary movement under another's power. Luke 21:12 uses the same passive form for being brought before authorities. LEADING AWAY

en: being-led-away, to-be-led-away | es: ser-ejecutados, siendo-arrastrados, siendo-llevados | fr: emmener | de: führt-weg, ἀπαγόμενοι Luke 21:12; Acts 12:19; 1Cor 12:2

3. lead to, bring along (of a way/path) (2×) A figurative extension where a road or path 'leads' somewhere, used exclusively in Jesus' teaching on the two ways: 'the gate is wide and the way is broad that leads to destruction' and 'the gate is small and the way is narrow that leads to life' (Matt 7:13-14). Arabic يؤدي (yu'addi, 'leads to'), Korean 이끄는 (ikkuneun, 'that leads'), and German hinführt all shift from person-as-object to destination-as-goal, marking a genuine semantic extension from custodial movement to directional guidance. LEADING AWAY

en: leading | es: que–lleva | fr: emmener | de: führt-weg Matt 7:13; Matt 7:14

ἀπαίδ-ευτος G0521 Adj-AFP (1×)

uneducated, untrained; lacking instruction or discipline in a subject

This adjective describes someone without formal education or training in a particular area. It can mean generally uneducated or, with a genitive of reference, uninstructed in a specific subject. In classical Greek it could also carry the sense of 'boorish' or 'uncouth.' Paul uses it in 2 Timothy 2:23 to warn against 'foolish and uneducated controversies'—disputes that arise from lack of proper instruction rather than genuine theological inquiry. The term contrasts the disciplined study of truth with undisciplined speculation.

(1×) Paul's warning against uneducated controversies addresses disputes that spring from ignorance rather than knowledge. These are the arguments of those who haven't been properly instructed in Scripture and sound doctrine. Spanish 'sin instrucción' and English 'uneducated' capture the educational deficit, while French transcribes the Greek and German gives 'ungebildet' (unformed, uncultivated). The emphasis falls on lack of proper formation rather than on intellectual capacity. IGNORANT UNAWARE

en: uneducated | es: sin-instrucción | fr: ἀπαιδεύτους | de: ungebildet 2Tim 2:23

ἀπαίρω G0522 V-ASP-3S (3×)

take away, remove; to lift off and carry away

This verb means to lift something off and carry it away, resulting in its removal. Jesus uses it in all three Synoptic accounts of the bridegroom saying: when the bridegroom 'is taken away,' then the disciples will fast (Matt 9:15; Mark 2:20; Luke 5:35). The passive voice emphasizes that the removal happens to the bridegroom—foreshadowing Jesus's passion. The image is of forcible removal, a sudden taking that leaves absence and mourning in its wake.

(3×) Appears exclusively in Jesus's teaching about the bridegroom being 'taken away' (ἀπαρθῇ). This passive aorist subjunctive occurs identically in all three Synoptic versions (Matt 9:15; Mark 2:20; Luke 5:35), predicting a violent removal that will inaugurate a season of fasting. The Spanish 'sea-quitado' (be taken away), French 'ôter' (remove), and German forms all convey the forcible separation. This foreshadows the crucifixion when the bridegroom would indeed be violently removed from the wedding guests. LIFTING AND REMOVING

en: is-taken-away | es: sea-quitado | fr: ôter | de: ἀπαρθῇ Matt 9:15; Mark 2:20; Luke 5:35

ἀπαιτ-έω G0523 V-PMA-2S (2×)

to demand back, require return, ask back; to call for repayment or require an accounting

This verb means to demand back or require return of something. Both occurrences appear in Luke. In Luke 6:30, Jesus teaches not to demand back what is taken. Luke 12:20 records God's declaration to the rich fool: 'This night they demand your soul from you.' Classical usage included demanding things forcibly taken, calling down punishment, and requiring payment. The New Testament uses it for demanding return and divine reckoning. Translations (Spanish demandan/reclames, French redemander) emphasize the demanding or requiring aspect.

(2×) Luke's Jesus teaches radical generosity: when someone takes what's yours, don't demand it back—using the imperative ἀπαίτει. The same verb appears in God's judgment on the rich fool: 'They demand your soul'—the impersonal plural suggesting divine agency. The verb links human generosity and divine accounting. Humans shouldn't demand back earthly goods; God will demand back the soul. The present tense ἀπαιτοῦσιν emphasizes the immediacy of divine reckoning. ASKING AND PRAYING

en: demand-back, they-demand | es: demandan, reclames | fr: redemander | de: ἀπαίτει, ἀπαιτοῦσιν Luke 6:30; Luke 12:20

ἀπαλγ-έω G0524 V-RPA-NMP (1×)

to become callous, lose sensitivity; to cease feeling pain or moral sensation

This verb describes the loss of feeling or sensitivity, whether physical or moral. In classical usage it could mean to cease grieving or to become despondent. The NT usage emphasizes moral desensitization—becoming callous or hardened beyond the reach of conscience. Ephesians 4:19 uses the perfect participle to describe those who 'having become callous, have given themselves over to sensuality.' The perfect tense indicates a settled state: they have deadened their moral sensitivity and now remain in that condition. Like skin that develops calluses from repeated friction, the conscience can lose responsiveness through repeated violation.

(1×) Paul describes a progressive moral hardening: people who once felt conviction now feel nothing. The perfect participle 'having become callous' marks a completed transition into insensibility. Spanish 'habiendo perdido sensibilidad' and English 'having become callous' both capture the loss of feeling, while French transcribes the Greek and German gives 'abgestumpft' (dulled, blunted). This isn't sudden hardening but gradual desensitization through repeated sin. PAIN AND SUFFERING
en: having-become-callous | es: habiendo-perdido-sensibilidad | fr: ἀπηλγηκότες | de: abgestumpft Eph 4:19

ἀπαλλάσσω G0525 V-PNM/P (3×)
set free, release, depart; to be delivered from something or to leave This verb in middle/passive voice means to be freed from something or to depart. Jesus warns the unjust to settle with opponents before court, lest they fail to 'be released' until full payment (Luke 12:58). Acts 19:12 recounts how diseases 'departed' from people through Paul's handkerchiefs. Hebrews 2:15 describes Christ freeing those who through fear of death were subject to lifelong slavery—he came to 'deliver' them from bondage. The word bridges physical departure and spiritual liberation.

(3×) Expresses both release from bondage and physical departure. Luke 12:58 warns of failing to 'be released' (ἀπηλλάχθαι) from legal detention. Acts 19:12 describes diseases 'departing' (ἀπαλλάσσεσθαι) through Paul's ministry. Hebrews 2:15 proclaims Christ's power to 'deliver' (ἀπαλλάξῃ) from slavery to death's fear. The French 'délivrer' and German 'befreien' (liberate) capture the liberating aspect, while the contexts show both spatial departure and spiritual freedom are in view. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT
en: might-deliver, to-be-released, to-depart | es: apartarse, librara, para-ser-librado | fr: délivrer | de: befreien, ἀπαλλάσσεσθαι, ἀπηλλάχθαι Luke 12:58; Acts 19:12; Heb 2:15

ἀπαλλοτρι-όω G0526 V-RPM/P-AMP (3×)
alienated, estranged; separated or cut off from a relationship or community
This perfect passive participle describes those who have been alienated or estranged from something vital. Paul employs it three times to depict Gentile separation from God's covenant community. Ephesians 2:12 recalls when they were 'alienated from the commonwealth of Israel.' Ephesians 4:18 describes unbelievers as 'alienated from the life of God' due to ignorance. Colossians 1:21 reminds believers they were once 'alienated' and enemies in mind. The word conveys not mere distance but active estrangement from relationship.

(3×) Consistently describes those estranged from divine life and covenant. In Ephesians 2:12, Gentiles were 'alienated' (ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι) from Israel's commonwealth and promises. Ephesians 4:18 depicts unbelievers 'alienated' (ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι) from God's life through hardened ignorance. Colossians 1:21 recalls the Colossians' former state as 'alienated' (ἀπηλλοτριωμένους) enemies. The German 'entfremdet' (estranged) and the identical Greek forms across languages emphasize the passive, completed state of being cut off from vital relationship. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING
en: alienated | es: alejados, enajenados | fr: ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι, ἀπηλλοτριωμένους | de: entfremdet Eph 2:12; Eph 4:18; Col 1:21

ἁπαλός G0527 Adj-NMS (2×)
tender, soft; physically soft to touch, delicate, young and supple
This adjective describes what is tender or soft to the touch. Both Gospel occurrences appear in parallel parable teaching. Matthew 24:32 and Mark 13:28 both describe the fig tree's branch becoming tender as a sign that summer is near. Classical usage described delicate human bodies, young animals, soft-boiled eggs, and gentle character. The New Testament restricts it to this botanical tenderness indicating seasonal change. Spanish tierna, French tendre emphasize the tender, supple quality of new spring growth.

(2×) Jesus uses ἁπαλός to describe the fig tree's branch softening with new growth—a natural sign that summer approaches. The adjective captures the supple quality of fresh shoots emerging after winter dormancy. Both Matthew and Mark preserve this parable teaching about reading natural signs to discern spiritual times. The masculine nominative ἁπαλὸς describes the branch's state change—from winter hardness to spring tenderness, signaling seasonal transition and teaching eschatological readiness. TENDERNESS AND GENTLENESS
en: tender | es: tierna | fr: tendre | de: ἁπαλὸς Matt 24:32; Mark 13:28

ἀπαντάω G0528 V-AIA-3P (2×)
to meet, encounter, come to meet; to move toward someone and encounter them
This verb means to meet or encounter, often implying movement toward someone. Mark 14:13 describes a man carrying a water jar who will meet the disciples. Luke 17:12 tells of ten lepers who met Jesus as He entered a village. Classical usage included meeting persons, encountering situations, and falling in with people. The New Testament uses it for encountering people along a journey. Translations (Spanish salir-al-encuentro, French rencontrer) emphasize the meeting or encountering aspect.

(2×) Mark's Jesus predicts the disciples will meet a man carrying water—a distinctive sight since women typically carried water. Luke describes ten lepers meeting Jesus, keeping their distance due to ritual impurity. Both uses involve providential encounters: the water-carrier guides disciples to the Passover room; the lepers meet Jesus for healing. The aorist ἀπήντησαν (they met) and future ἀπαντήσει (will meet) show both fulfilled and predicted encounters along the journey. MEETING AND ENCOUNTERING en: met, will-meet | es: le-salieron-al-encuentro, os-saldrá-al-encuentro | fr: rencontrer | de: ἀπήντησαν, ἀπαντήσει Mark 14:13; Luke 17:12

ἀπάντ-ησις G0529 N-AFS (3×)
meeting, encounter; a going out to meet someone or something
This noun denotes a meeting or encounter, especially one where people go out to meet someone approaching. In the parable of the ten virgins, they go out to 'the meeting' of the bridegroom (Matt 25:6). Acts 28:15 records Roman believers coming to 'meet' Paul at the Forum of Appius and Three Taverns. Most dramatically, 1 Thessalonians 4:17 speaks of believers being caught up in clouds to 'meet' the Lord in the air. The word emphasizes the purposeful going out to encounter someone of significance.

(3×) Denotes a formal meeting or encounter where people go out to greet someone approaching. Matthew 25:6 uses it in the bridegroom parable—the cry goes out to 'the meeting' (ἀπάντησιν). Acts 28:15 describes believers traveling to 'meet' (ἀπάντησιν) Paul. Most significantly, 1 Thess 4:17 employs it for the eschatological 'meeting' (ἀπάντησιν) of the Lord in the air at his return. The consistent translations ('encuentro,' 'rencontre') emphasize this as a formal, anticipated encounter. TENT OF MEETING en: a-meeting, meeting | es: encuentro | fr: rencontre | de: ἀπάντησιν Matt 25:6; Acts 28:15; 1Thess 4:17

ἅπαξ G0530 Adv (14×)
once — a single time; once for all, decisively and unrepeatable Hapax is a compact adverb with outsized theological weight. In ordinary usage it simply means 'one time' — Paul was shipwrecked, the Philippians sent aid 'once and again' (Phil 4:16). But in Hebrews it becomes a term of art for the unrepeatable finality of Christ's sacrifice: the high priest entered the Most Holy Place 'once a year' (Heb 9:7), but Christ entered 'once for all' (Heb 9:12, 10:10), rendering further offerings unnecessary. Jude 3 uses it for the faith 'once for all delivered to the saints.' The translations converge simply: Spanish 'una vez,' French 'une fois,' German 'einmal' — but the theological density of those two syllables in Hebrews far exceeds their surface simplicity.

once (14×) An adverb indicating a single occurrence, carrying two registers in the NT: (a) the simple numerical sense of 'one time' in narrative and epistolary contexts (2 Cor 11:25, Phil 4:16, 1 Thess 2:18), and (b) the theologically loaded 'once for all' in Hebrews and Jude, emphasizing the decisive, unrepeatable character of Christ's atoning work (Heb 9:7, 9:26-28, 10:2) and the apostolic deposit of faith (Jude 3). The single Greek form carries both registers, with context determining whether finality or mere singularity is in view. ONE AND UNITY

en: once | es: una-vez | fr: einmal, une-fois | de: einmal 2Cor 11:25; Phil 4:16; 1Thess 2:18; Heb 6:4; Heb 9:7

ἀπαρά-βᾰτος G0531 Adj-AFS (1×)

permanent, unchangeable; not subject to alteration or transfer

This adjective describes something that cannot be altered, transferred, or passed to another. Classical Greek used it for unalterable philosophical principles, infallible prophecies, or inviolable agreements. Hebrews 7:24 applies it to Christ's priesthood: because He continues forever, He holds a 'permanent' priesthood—one that cannot pass to a successor. Unlike the Levitical priesthood, which transferred from one mortal priest to another through death, Jesus's priesthood is inviolable and eternal. The term emphasizes both permanence and exclusivity.

(1×) Christ's permanent priesthood stands in sharp contrast to the succession of mortal Levitical priests. Each high priest served temporarily, then death necessitated a replacement. But Jesus, who lives forever, needs no successor—His priesthood is 'aparabatos.' Spanish 'intransferible' emphasizes non-transferability, French 'immuable' stresses immutability, German 'unveränderlich' (unchangeable) captures permanence, while English 'permanent' combines both aspects. The theological point: Jesus alone mediates forever. FIRMNESS AND SECURITY

en: permanent | es: intransferible | fr: immuable | de: unveraenderlich Heb 7:24

ἀπαρα-σκεύαστος G0532 Adj-AMP (1×)

unprepared, not ready; lacking proper preparation or equipment

This adjective describes someone who has not made necessary preparations or who lacks proper readiness. In military contexts it could mean troops without equipment; in general usage, people caught off guard. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 9:4 regarding the Corinthians' collection for Jerusalem: if some Macedonians accompany him and find the Corinthians 'unprepared,' both Paul and the Corinthians would be humiliated. The context emphasizes practical readiness—having the promised collection actually gathered, not just intended.

(1×) Paul's concern about finding the Corinthians unprepared reflects pastoral pragmatism: it's one thing to promise generosity, another to have the funds ready when needed. Spanish 'no preparados,' German 'unvorbereitet,' and English 'unprepared' all capture the lack of readiness. French 'non-préparé' similarly emphasizes the deficit. The situation Paul anticipates isn't theological unreadiness but practical unpreparedness—failing to do what they said they would do. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

en: unprepared | es: no-preparados | fr: non-préparé | de: unvorbereitet 2Cor 9:4

ἀπαρν-έομαι G0533 V-FIP-3S (11×)

Deny, disown, renounce — to repudiate association with someone, especially Christ; also to deny oneself

The verb ἀπαρνέομαι (aparneomai) carries a stronger force than simple ἀρνέομαι, adding the prefix ἀπο- to intensify the denial into a complete disowning. It is forever linked with Peter's threefold denial of Jesus (Matt 26:34-35, 75; Mark 14:30-31, 72; Luke 22:34, 61), which Jesus predicted at the Last Supper. Yet the same verb also appears in the call to discipleship: 'Let him deny himself and take up his cross' (Matt 16:24; Mark 8:34; Luke 9:23). The word thus spans the spectrum from faithless abandonment to radical self-surrender. Spanish 'negar' serves for both senses, as does French 'renier.'

deny, disown (11×) To deny or disown a person — to repudiate any association with someone, especially under pressure or threat. Defined by Peter's threefold denial of knowing Jesus on the night of his arrest (Matt 26:34-35, 75; Mark 14:30-31, 72; Luke 22:34, 61). Jesus warned that whoever denies him before others will be denied before the Father (cf. the parallel in Matt 10:33 using ἀρνέομαι). Spanish 'negar' and French 'renier' both capture the sense of relational repudiation. DENY DISOWN RENOUNCE

en: I-will-deny, let-him-deny, will-I-deny | es: me-negarás, negarás, negaré | fr: renier | de: verleugnet, ἀπαρνήσομαι, ἀπαρνήση Matt 16:24; Matt 26:34; Matt 26:35; Matt 26:75; Mark 8:34

ἀπαρτί G0534

exactly, just, completely (of numbers); from now on, henceforth (of time)

An adverb with two distinct temporal applications. In classical usage it meant 'exactly' or 'just' when referring to numbers—ninety days exactly. It could also mean 'just the contrary' in contrasting statements. The New Testament usage (properly written as two words, ἀπ᾽ ἄρτι) shifts to temporal meaning: 'from now on' or 'henceforth,' marking a transition point from which something begins or changes. This temporal sense can also mean 'just now' or 'even now,' referring to the immediate present moment.

ἀπαρτ-ισμός G0535 N-AMS (1×)

completion, finishing; the act or process of bringing something to completion

This noun denotes the completion or finishing of a task, particularly in precise or thorough fashion. Classical Greek used it for exact calculation, precise completion, or the finishing touches on a project. Luke 14:28 employs it in a parable about counting the cost: before building a tower, a wise person calculates the cost 'for completion'—ensuring sufficient resources to finish what's started. The term emphasizes not just starting well but calculating whether you can finish. Half-built towers testify to poor planning.

(1×) Jesus's parable warns against beginning what you cannot complete. The builder must calculate resources 'for completion'—not just foundation-laying but the entire project. Spanish 'terminar' (to finish), French 'achèvement' (completion), and English 'completion' all emphasize the finishing aspect. The German transcribes the Greek, preserving technical precision. The spiritual application: count the cost of discipleship before committing, lest you become a half-built tower, an object lesson in failed commitment. FULFILL AND COMPLETE

en: completion | es: terminar | fr: achèvement | de: ἀπαρτισμόν Luke 14:28

ἀπαρχή G0536 N-NFS (8×)

Firstfruits: the initial portion of a harvest or group, consecrated to God and representing the whole that follows.

Rooted in the Israelite practice of offering the first portion of the harvest to God as a sign that the entire crop belongs to him, this term becomes a powerful metaphor in Paul's theology. Christ is 'the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep' (1 Cor 15:20, 23) — his resurrection guarantees the harvest of all believers. The Spirit is 'the firstfruits' of the coming redemption (Rom 8:23). A household or region's first converts are called 'firstfruits' (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:15). And if the dough offered as firstfruits is holy, so is the whole lump (Rom 11:16). Spanish 'primicias,' French 'prémices,' and German 'Erstlingsgabe' all preserve the agricultural-sacrificial metaphor.

(8×) Firstfruits — the initial, representative portion of a harvest consecrated to God, signifying that the whole belongs to him. Paul applies this agricultural-sacrificial image metaphorically in several directions: Christ as firstfruits of the resurrection guarantees the full harvest of risen believers (1 Cor 15:20, 23); the Holy Spirit as firstfruits of future glory (Rom 8:23); the first converts of a region as firstfruits of a larger ingathering (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:15); and the consecrated dough-offering that sanctifies the whole lump (Rom 11:16). The multilingual renderings (Spanish 'primicias,' French 'prémices,' German 'Erstlingsgabe') all preserve the core metaphor of an initial portion that consecrates and guarantees the rest. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-firstfruits, firstfruit, firstfruits | es: primicias | fr: Erstlingsgabe, prémices | de: Erstlingsgabe Rom 8:23; Rom 11:16; Rom 16:5; 1Cor 15:20; 1Cor 15:23

ἅπᾱς G0537 Adj-NNS (32×)

all, every one, the whole — emphatic universal quantifier, stronger than pas, meaning 'altogether, each and every'

Hapas is a strengthened form of pas ('all'), built from the collective prefix ha- (cognate with Sanskrit sam-, 'together'), and it drives home totality with rhetorical force. Where pas might leave room for generalization, hapas insists that none are excluded. Its 32 New Testament occurrences appear at moments of emphatic universality: the crowd was 'altogether' amazed (Mark 1:27), 'all things' were carried back to the chief priests (Matt 28:11), and 'every one' of the flood generation perished (Luke 17:27). Luke-Acts accounts for most uses, reflecting Luke's fondness for emphatic quantifiers. Across languages the translation collapses to the same word used for pas — Spanish 'toda/todas,' French 'tous,' German 'alle' — because most languages lack a separate emphatic universal.

all, every, the whole (universal quantifier) (32×) An emphatic form of the universal quantifier meaning 'absolutely all, each and every, the whole without exception.' Used substantively and attributively to underscore completeness: the entire crowd astonished (Mark 1:27), every person swept away in the flood (Luke 17:27), all things reported to the authorities (Matt 28:11). Predominant in Luke-Acts (over 20x), where it signals narrative totality. Most target languages render it identically to pas, lacking a dedicated emphatic equivalent. TOTALITY AND WHOLENESS

en: all, all-things | es: toda, todas, todas-las-cosas | fr: tous | de: alle Matt 6:32; Matt 24:39; Matt 28:11; Mark 1:27; Mark 8:25

ἀπᾰτάω G0538 V-PMA-3S (3×)

deceive, cheat, mislead; to lead astray through deception

This verb means to deceive or cheat someone, leading them into error. Paul warns believers not to let anyone 'deceive' them with empty words about God's judgment (Eph 5:6). In 1 Timothy 2:14, he notes Adam was not deceived, but the woman, 'being deceived,' fell into transgression. James warns that anyone thinking themselves religious while not bridling their tongue 'deceives' their own heart (1:26). The word appears in both active and passive forms, showing deception as something done to others or experienced oneself.

(3×) Used of both deceiving others and being deceived oneself. Ephesians 5:6 warns 'let no one deceive' (ἀπατάτω) you with empty arguments about God's wrath. First Timothy 2:14 states Eve 'was deceived' (ἠπατήθη), the passive showing her as victim of the serpent's cunning. James 1:26 describes self-deception: one 'deceiving' (ἀπατῶν) his own heart about true religion. The multilingual evidence ('engañar,' 'betruegen') consistently conveys the leading astray through falsehood. DECEPTION AND BEGUILING

en: deceiving, let-deceive, was-deceived | es: engañando, engañe, fue-engañado | fr: ἀπατάτω, ἀπατῶν, ἠπατήθη | de: betruegen Eph 5:6; 1Tim 2:14; Jas 1:26

ἀπᾰτ-η G0539 N-NFS (7×)

Deceit, deception, trickery; the act or quality of misleading through falsehood or guile.

An abstract noun denoting deceit, fraud, or deception — the deliberate act or insidious quality of misleading others. In the Parable of the Sower, it is 'the deceitfulness of riches' that chokes the word (Matt 13:22; Mark 4:19), personifying wealth's seductive power to deceive. Paul warns against being captured through 'empty deceit' (Col 2:8) and identifies the eschatological 'man of lawlessness' with 'every deception of unrighteousness' (2 Thess 2:10). Spanish 'engano,' French 'tromperie,' and German 'Betrug' all converge — deceit is deceit, and the word admits no subdivision in NT usage.

deceit, deception, trickery (7×) The act, practice, or quality of deceiving — fraud, guile, trickery. All NT occurrences express a single undifferentiated concept of deception, confirmed by uniform multilingual rendering: Spanish 'engano,' French 'tromperie,' German 'Betrug,' English 'deceit/deceitfulness.' In Matt 13:22 and Mark 4:19 it describes the beguiling nature of riches; in Eph 4:22 it characterizes the old self's 'deceitful desires'; in Col 2:8 Paul warns of 'empty deceit' masquerading as philosophy; in 2 Thess 2:10 it accompanies the lawless one's arrival. The case/number variations across occurrences reflect grammar, not semantic divergence. DECEIT AND TREACHERY

en: by-deceit, deceit, deceitfulness | es: con-engaño, engaño, engaños | fr: tromperie | de: Betrug, ἀπάτη Matt 13:22; Mark 4:19; Eph 4:22; Col 2:8; 2Thess 2:10

ἀπάτωρ G0540 Adj-NMS (1×)

fatherless, without father; having no father or of unknown paternity

This adjective means 'without father,' either literally (orphaned, fatherless) or in the sense of unknown paternity. It could describe deities conceived without fathers, orphans who lost their fathers, or persons of uncertain parentage. Hebrews 7:3 uses it typologically of Melchizedek, who appears in Scripture 'without father, without mother, without genealogy'—not that he literally had no parents, but that Scripture's silence about his lineage makes him a fitting type of Christ's eternal priesthood, which depends on divine sonship rather than human descent.

(1×) Melchizedek's scriptural presentation omits the genealogical details essential to Levitical priesthood, making him 'aparabatos'—without recorded father. This literary silence becomes theologically significant: it prefigures Christ, whose priesthood rests not on Aaronic descent but on eternal divine sonship. Cross-linguistic glosses maintain the literal sense: Spanish 'sin padre,' English 'without father,' German and French with similar constructions. The typology works through what Scripture doesn't say about Melchizedek's origins. PARENTS AND ANCESTORS

en: without-father | es: sin-padre | fr: ohne-Vater | de: ohne-Vater Heb 7:3

ἀπαύγ-ασμα G0541 N-NNS (1×)

radiance, effulgence; the brightness beaming forth from a light source

This noun describes the radiance or brightness that emanates from a luminous source. It emphasizes the outshining of light rather than the source itself—the effulgence rather than the luminary. Hebrews 1:3 uses it in a profound Christological statement: the Son is 'the radiance of God's glory'—the brightness that beams forth from the Father. Like sunlight proceeding from the sun, the Son radiates the Father's glory while remaining distinct in person yet identical in divine nature. This single word carries enormous theological weight about Christ's relation to the Father.

(1×) The Son as 'apaugasma' of God's glory presents a high Christology: Christ radiates the Father's glory as intrinsically as light radiates from its source. Spanish 'resplandor,' English 'radiance,' and German/French 'Abglanz' (reflected brightness) all attempt to capture the emanation concept. This isn't reflected light (like the moon) but essential radiance (like the sun's rays). The metaphor preserves both unity of essence (the radiance shares the source's nature) and personal distinction (the radiance is not the source itself). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: radiance | es: resplandor | fr: Abglanz | de: Abglanz Heb 1:3

ἀπεῖδον G0542

look at, focus attention on something; look away from and despise

An aorist verb (with no present form in common use) carrying two contrasting senses. The primary meaning involves looking away from other things to focus attention on something specific—directing one's gaze toward a particular object or person with concentration. The second sense, perhaps growing from the idea of looking away, takes on the metaphorical meaning of despising or regarding with contempt. The directional element ('away from other things') underlies both the concentrated attention of the first sense and the dismissive attitude of the second.

ἀπείθ-εια G0543 N-DFS (7×)

Disobedience, refusal to comply; willful resistance to authority, especially divine command.

Denotes disobedience or willful non-compliance, particularly toward God's revealed will. Paul uses it as a key theological term in Romans 11 to describe Israel's corporate disobedience that paradoxically opens the door of mercy to the Gentiles (Rom 11:30, 32). In Eph 2:2 it characterizes the pre-conversion state as walking in 'the spirit of disobedience,' while Eph 5:6 and Col 3:6 warn that God's wrath comes upon 'the sons of disobedience.' Spanish 'desobediencia,' French 'desobeissance,' and German 'Ungehorsam' all preserve the same privative structure: un-obedience, dis-obedience.

disobedience (7×) Willful disobedience or refusal to believe and comply, especially toward God's commands and revelation. The multilingual evidence is perfectly uniform: Spanish 'desobediencia,' French 'desobeissance,' German 'Ungehorsam' — each a privative formation mirroring the Greek alpha-privative structure. In Rom 11:30 and 11:32, Paul develops a theology of disobedience where Israel's refusal becomes the instrument of universal mercy; in Eph 2:2 'sons of disobedience' describes the unregenerate condition; in Eph 5:6 and Col 3:6 divine wrath is directed at such disobedience. No semantic subdivision is warranted across these seven occurrences. DISOBEDIENCE REBELLION

en: disobedience | es: desobediencia | fr: désobéissance | de: Ungehorsam Rom 11:30; Rom 11:32; Eph 2:2; Eph 5:6; Col 3:6

ἀπειθ-έω G0544 V-PPA-GMP (14×)

disobey, be disobedient — to refuse compliance with authority or reject the persuasion of truth

Apeitheo occupies the space between mere unbelief and active defiance. Built from the alpha-privative and peitho ('to persuade'), it literally means 'to be unpersuadable' — a willful refusal to be moved by evidence or authority. In the New Testament it describes those who reject the gospel message (Acts 14:2, 19:9), those who disobey God's revealed will (Rom 2:8, 10:21, 1 Pet 2:8), and even the 'disobedient spirits' of Noah's generation (1 Pet 3:20). John 3:36 draws the starkest line: 'whoever disobeys the Son shall not see life.' The Spanish 'desobedecer,' French 'desobeir,' and German 'ungehorsam sein' capture the active refusal implied, though the Greek root reveals something deeper — not merely breaking a rule, but closing oneself off to persuasion altogether.

disobey, be disobedient (14×) To refuse to be persuaded by or comply with authority, truth, or the message of the gospel, expressing willful resistance rather than mere ignorance. Applied to Jewish opponents of the apostolic mission (Acts 14:2, 19:9), to humanity's broader rebellion against God (Rom 2:8, 10:21, 11:30-31), to those who stumble over the cornerstone (1 Pet 2:8, 3:1), and to the antediluvian generation (1 Pet 3:20). John 3:36 employs it as the antithesis of believing in the Son. All 14 occurrences share the notion of culpable, active refusal — not passive doubt but resolute non-compliance. DISOBEDIENCE REBELLION

en: disobey, disobeyed, disobeying | es: desobedecen, desobedeciendo, desobedecieron | fr: désobéir, désobéissant | de: ungehorsam-sein, ἀπειθήσαντες, ἠπείθουν John 3:36; Acts 14:2; Acts 19:9; Rom 2:8; Rom 10:21

ἀπειθής G0545 Adj-NMP (6×)

Disobedient, rebellious, refusing to comply with divine or rightful authority

An adjective describing willful refusal to obey, especially toward God. It appears in contexts spanning the hopeful to the dire: in Luke 1:17, the angel promises that Elijah's spirit will turn 'the disobedient' to the wisdom of the just. Paul recounts his obedience to the heavenly vision by declaring he was 'not disobedient' (Acts 26:19). The vice lists of Romans 1:30, 2 Timothy 3:2, and Titus 1:16 include it among the marks of a depraved life. Spanish 'desobediente' and French 'desobeissant' directly mirror the Greek alpha-privative structure (a-peithes, 'un-persuadable').

disobedient, rebellious (6×) Disobedient, rebellious, refusing to be persuaded or to comply – from the alpha-privative a + peithes ('un-persuadable'). Luke 1:17 uses it in a redemptive context: turning the disobedient to the mindset of the righteous. Acts 26:19 shows Paul's emphatic denial of disobedience to the heavenly vision. The remaining occurrences appear in vice catalogs: Romans 1:30 lists it among marks of a reprobate mind, 2 Timothy 3:2 among end-times characteristics, and Titus 1:16 describes false professors. Spanish 'desobedientes' and German 'ungehorsam' consistently render the refusal of rightful authority. DISOBEDIENCE REBELLION en: disobedient | es: desobediente, desobedientes | fr: désobéissant | de: ungehorsam, ἀπειθεῖς, ἀπειθὴς Luke 1:17; Acts 26:19; Rom 1:30; 2Tim 3:2; Titus 1:16

ἀπειλέω G0546 V-IIA-3S (2×)

to threaten, make threats; to speak threateningly or warn with menaces

This verb describes speech intended to intimidate or coerce through warnings of harm. In Acts 4:17, the Sanhedrin debates 'let us threaten them' to silence the apostles' testimony about Jesus. In 1 Peter 2:23, Christ is praised because 'when suffering, he did not threaten.' The word carries the force of using menacing language to control behavior. Classical Greek usage included both promising and threatening (Homer), but biblical usage restricts to the threatening sense. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'amenazar', French 'menacer') consistently recognize the intimidating character of this speech act, though the German simply provides Greek forms, suggesting recognition of its technical status.

(2×) To utter threats or speak words intended to intimidate, coerce, or warn of coming harm. The two New Testament occurrences present contrasting pictures: Acts 4:17 shows religious authorities debating whether to threaten the apostles into silence (ἀπειλησώμεθα, subjunctive expressing deliberation), while 1 Peter 2:23 commends Christ who, despite suffering unjustly, refrained from threatening (ἠπείλει, imperfect negative). Spanish 'amenazar' and French 'menacer' both convey the intimidating force, while English 'threaten' captures the coercive intent. The verb depicts speech designed to control behavior through fear of consequences. TESTIMONY AND WARNING

en: let-us-threaten, threatened | es: amenacemos, amenazaba | fr: menacer, ἠπείλει | de: ἀπειλησώμεθα, ἠπείλει Acts 4:17; 1Pet 2:23

ἀπειλ-ή G0547 N-AFS (3×)

threat, threatening; menacing words or actions intended to intimidate

This noun signifies threats or menacing declarations. Acts records the early church praying in the face of opponents' 'threats' (4:29). Saul is described as 'breathing threats and murder' against disciples before his conversion (9:1). Paul instructs masters to give up 'threatening' toward slaves, knowing they share the same Master in heaven (Eph 6:9). The plural form often appears, suggesting repeated or multiple threatening words. The context always involves hostile intent to intimidate or harm.

(3×) Denotes menacing words meant to intimidate or harm. Acts 4:29 records believers praying amid opponents' 'threats' (ἀπειλῶν). Acts 9:1 vividly describes Saul 'breathing threat' (ἀπειλῆς) and murder —an expression showing his hostility saturated his very breath.

Ephesians 6:9 commands masters to abandon 'threatening' (ἀπειλῆς) because God shows no partiality. The German and French forms, along with Spanish 'amenazas,' consistently render this as hostile threatening language designed to create fear. TESTIMONY AND WARNING

en: threat, threatening, threats | es: amenaza, amenazas | fr: menace, ἀπειλήν | de: ἀπειλήν, ἀπειλὰς, ἀπειλῆς Acts 4:29; Acts 9:1; Eph 6:9

ἄπειμι G0548 V-PPA-NMS (7×)

To be absent, to be away from; the state of physical separation from a person or place.

A verb meaning 'to be away' or 'to be absent,' formed from 'apo' (away from) and 'eimi' (to be). In the New Testament it appears almost exclusively in Paul's letters, where he contrasts physical absence with spiritual or authoritative presence. Writing to Corinth, he insists that though 'absent in body,' he is present in spirit to judge the immoral man (1 Cor 5:3), and warns that what he says by letter while absent, he will carry out when present (2 Cor 10:11; 13:2, 10). The word captures the pastoral tension of apostolic leadership exercised at a distance.

to be absent, to be away (7×) To be physically absent or away from a place, group, or person. Consistently rendered as Spanish 'ausente/estando ausente,' French 'etre absent,' German 'abwesend sein,' English 'be absent.' Nearly all NT uses are Pauline, expressing the tension between physical distance and spiritual authority. In 1 Cor 5:3 Paul is 'absent in body but present in spirit'; in 2 Cor 10:1 opponents accuse him of being bold only when absent; in 2 Cor 13:2 and 13:10 he warns of what he will do when no longer absent. Phil 1:27 broadens the usage to Paul's possible absence from the Philippian church. The core meaning — physical non-presence — is constant throughout. BEING PRESENT en: I-am-absent, being-absent | es: ausente, estando-ausente, estando-ausentes | fr: être-absent, ἀπὼν, ἄπειμι | de: abwesend-sein 1Cor 5:3; 2Cor 10:1; 2Cor 10:11; 2Cor 13:2; 2Cor 13:10

ἄπειμι G0549 V-IIA-3P (1×)

to go away, depart; to leave or set out from a place

This verb serves as a future equivalent of 'go away' or 'depart,' used when speakers need to reference future or habitual departure. In classical Greek it could mean to withdraw, retreat, or die. Acts 17:10 uses it to describe the believers immediately sending Paul and Silas away by night to Berea after the uproar in Thessalonica. The verb emphasizes the action of going away rather than the destination reached. Context determines whether departure is retreat, relocation, or routine travel.

(1×) The brothers' urgent nighttime dispatch of Paul and Silas represents protective evacuation: they 'went away' under cover of darkness to escape hostility. Spanish 'iban' and French 's'en aller' capture the departure motion, while German transcribes the Greek. The imperfect tense suggests ongoing action—they were going, journeying through the night to Berea. This wasn't casual travel but strategic withdrawal from danger, exemplifying early Christian mobility in the face of persecution. CONDUCT AND WALKING

en: went | es: iban | fr: s'en-aller | de: ἀπῄεσαν Acts 17:10

ἀπεῖπον G0550 V-AIM-1P (1×)

to renounce, disown; to speak out in rejection or denial of something

This verb carries the sense of speaking out against something in renunciation or denial. Classical usage included renouncing claims, disclaiming responsibility, or publicly disowning associations. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 4:2: 'we have renounced disgraceful, underhanded ways.' The context contrasts Paul's open, honest ministry with the deceptive practices of false teachers. The aorist tense suggests decisive action—a definitive break with shameful methods. This isn't passive avoidance but active repudiation.

(1×) Paul's renunciation of 'shameful, hidden things' establishes his ministry's integrity: he has actively rejected deceptive practices that characterize false teachers. Spanish 'renunciamos' and French 'renoncer' preserve the renunciation sense, while German 'absagen' (to cancel, disavow) emphasizes rejection. The first-person plural includes Paul's apostolic team—they have corporately and decisively disowned manipulative ministry tactics. This active repudiation grounds their claim to preach truth openly rather than peddle God's word for profit. REJECTION AND REFUSAL

en: we-renounced | es: renunciamos | fr: renoncer | de: absagen 2Cor 4:2

ἀπείραστος G0551 Adj-NMS (1×)

untemptable, unable to be tempted; incapable of experiencing temptation, especially to evil

This adjective describes someone or something that cannot be tempted, particularly by evil. James 1:13 applies it to God: 'God cannot be tempted by evil'—divine nature is inherently immune to the attraction of sin. While humans face genuine temptation because sin appeals to fallen desire, God experiences no such internal conflict. Evil holds no allure for One who is perfectly holy. The term emphasizes ontological immunity, not merely moral strength. God doesn't resist temptation; He cannot be tempted.

(1×) James's assertion that God is 'untemptable by evil' corrects a dangerous misunderstanding: when we face temptation, God isn't testing us with evil (He cannot do what His nature forbids). Spanish 'no tentable' and English 'untemptable' create the negative form, while French and German transcribe the Greek, recognizing its technical precision. This isn't about God's power to resist temptation but about His nature's incompatibility with evil. Temptation requires susceptibility; God has none. TESTING AND TEMPTATION

en: untemptable | es: no-tentable | fr: ἀπείραστός | de: unversucht Jas 1:13

ἄπειρος G0552 Adj-NMS (1×)

inexperienced, unskilled; lacking practice or familiarity with something

This adjective describes someone without experience or skill in a particular area. Classical Greek used it for the untrained, the inexperienced, or those unfamiliar with specific practices. Hebrews 5:13 employs it to describe believers still on a milk diet: they are 'unskilled in the word of righteousness.' Like infants who haven't learned to eat solid food, these believers haven't developed the capacity to digest deeper theological truth. The term emphasizes lack of practical experience and developed skill, not mere theoretical ignorance.

(1×) The spiritually immature remain 'unskilled' in righteousness teaching—they lack the practiced discernment that comes from sustained engagement with God's word. Spanish 'inexperto,' French 'inexpérimenté,' and English 'unskilled' all capture the experiential deficit, while German 'unerfahren' (inexperienced) emphasizes lack of practice. This isn't intellectual inability but undeveloped capacity. Just as babies need time and practice to transition from milk to solid food, believers need sustained exposure to develop theological maturity and moral discernment. IGNORANT UNAWARE en: unskilled | es: inexperto | fr: inexpérimenté | de: unerfahren Heb 5:13

ἀπεκ-δέχομαι G0553 V-PPM/P-DMP (8×)

To eagerly await or expect with intense anticipation, especially regarding future salvation or divine fulfillment.

A compound verb built from ἀπό + ἐκ + δέχομαι, intensifying the basic idea of receiving into one of straining forward with eager longing. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in contexts of eschatological hope — believers awaiting the redemption of the body (Rom 8:23), the revelation of Christ (1 Cor 1:7), and the hope of righteousness by faith (Gal 5:5). The Spanish 'aguardar' and German 'erwarten' both capture this note of patient but fervent expectation. Paul uses this word to depict the entire created order groaning in anticipation (Rom 8:19), giving it a cosmic scope beyond ordinary waiting.

eagerly await / expect (8×) To await eagerly with intense, straining expectation, particularly for eschatological realities. Every NT occurrence points toward divine fulfillment — creation awaiting the revealing of God's children (Rom 8:19), believers awaiting adoption and bodily redemption (Rom 8:23, 25), or the eager expectation of the Savior from heaven (Phil 3:20). The multilingual glosses uniformly reflect forward-looking hope: Spanish 'aguardar,' French 'attendre,' German 'erwarten.' WAITING AND EXPECTING en: awaiting, awaits, eagerly-await | es: aguarda, aguardamos, aguardando | fr: attendre | de: erwarten Rom 8:19; Rom 8:23; Rom 8:25; 1Cor 1:7; Gal 5:5

ἀπεκ-δύομαι G0554 V-APM-NMS (2×)
to strip off, divest oneself; (middle voice) to disarm, despoil; metaphorically, to put off like a garment
This compound verb combines ἀπό ('off, from') and ἐκδύω ('to strip, undress') in its intensive middle voice form, depicting the decisive removal of something worn or attached. In Colossians, Paul uses it twice with striking metaphorical force. In 2:15, Christ 'disarmed the rulers and authorities,' stripping them of their power like removing weapons or armor. In 3:9, believers have 'put off the old self' like removing filthy clothes. The middle voice emphasizes the subject's personal involvement—Christ's active stripping of hostile powers; the believer's decisive divestment of their former identity. The physical imagery of undressing powerfully conveys complete removal and transformation.

(2×) To strip off completely, remove as one removes clothing or armor, used metaphorically for decisive spiritual transformation. Both Colossians occurrences employ the aorist middle participle (ἀπεκδυσάμενος, ἀπεκδυσάμενοι), emphasizing completed action and personal agency. In 2:15, the subject is Christ disarming hostile spiritual powers—the imagery suggests a victor stripping armor from defeated foes or a conqueror publicly shaming captives. In 3:9, believers have stripped off their old self with its practices, the metaphor depicting conversion as changing clothes. Spanish 'despojar' and 'despojándoos' capture both the forceful removal and the reflexive middle voice nuance. The lexical range includes both literal undressing and metaphorical despoiling or divesting. CLOTHING AND DRESS
en: having-disarmed, having-put-off | es: despojando, habiéndoos-despojado | fr: ἀπεκδυσάμενοι, ἀπεκδυσάμενος | de: sich-entkleiden Col 2:15; Col 3:9

ἀπέκ-δῠσις G0555 N-DFS (1×)
putting off, removal; the act of stripping off or divesting (as of clothing)
This noun describes the act of putting off or removing something, particularly like removing clothing. Colossians 2:11 uses it metaphorically for spiritual circumcision: 'in the putting off of the body of flesh, by the circumcision of Christ.' Just as physical circumcision removes a piece of flesh, Christian circumcision—accomplished at conversion—involves putting off the old sinful nature. The imagery combines undressing (removing garments) with surgical removal (cutting away flesh). The term emphasizes complete divestment, not partial reform.

(1×) Paul's metaphor of 'putting off' the flesh-body through Christ's circumcision presents conversion as radical divestment: the old nature is stripped away entirely, not merely suppressed or improved. Spanish 'despojamiento' (despoiling), English 'putting off,' and German 'Entkleidung' (undressing) all preserve the removal imagery. French transcribes the Greek. This spiritual circumcision, unlike physical circumcision's partial cutting, removes the entire 'body of flesh'—comprehensive transformation, not token modification. CLOTHING AND DRESS
en: putting-off | es: despojamiento | fr: ἀπεκδύσει | de: Entkleidung Col 2:11

ἀπελαύνω G0556 V-AIA-3S (1×)
to drive away, expel; to force someone to leave or depart from a place
This verb means to drive away or forcefully expel someone from a location. Classical usage included banishing persons from cities, driving away enemies, or removing unwanted elements. Acts 18:16 records Gallio, the Roman proconsul, driving Paul's accusers from his judgment seat—a forceful dismissal that protected Paul from mob justice. The verb emphasizes the use of authority or force to compel departure. This isn't polite dismissal but authoritative expulsion.

(1×) Gallio's action of driving the accusers from his tribunal represents Roman administrative power protecting Paul from extralegal violence. The verb's force matches the situation: Gallio didn't merely dismiss the case but actively expelled the accusers. Spanish 'los expulsó' (expelled them), French 'chasser' (to chase away), and English 'drove' all capture the forceful removal. German transcribes the aorist form. This providential intervention—a Roman official using state power to protect the apostle—enabled Paul's extended Corinthian ministry. EXPELLING AND PRODUCING en: he-drove | es: los-expulsó | fr: chasser | de: ἀπήλασεν Acts 18:16

ἀπελεγμός G0557 N-AMS (1×)
disrepute, bad reputation; state of being brought into public discredit or contempt
This noun denotes the state of disrepute or public discredit that comes from exposure or refutation. Acts 19:27 records the silversmiths' concern that Paul's teaching would bring Artemis's temple 'into disrepute'—they feared losing both religious prestige and commercial profit. The term emphasizes public reputation and the danger of falling into contempt. For the Ephesian economy, which depended heavily on Artemis-worship tourism, such disrepute would be financially catastrophic. Theological truth threatened economic interest.

(1×) The silversmiths' anxiety about their goddess falling 'into disrepute' reveals the economic stakes: Paul's effective preaching threatened the Artemis cult industry. Spanish 'descrédito,' French 'réfutation,' and English 'disrepute' capture the public discredit concern, while German transcribes the Greek. Note the irony: they clothed commercial self-interest in religious devotion, claiming to defend the goddess while actually protecting their profits. Paul's message, by winning converts from idolatry, undermined the entire religious-economic system. CONTEMPT AND SCORN
en: disrepute | es: descrédito | fr: réfutation | de: ἀπελεγμὸν Acts 19:27

ἀπελεύθερ-ος G0558 N-NMS (1×)
freedman, emancipated slave; one who has been released from slavery to freedom
This noun designates a person who has been freed from slavery, either through manumission, purchase, or decree. In Greco-Roman society, freedmen occupied a complex social position: no longer slaves but not quite equal to freeborn citizens. Paul uses the term metaphorically in 1 Corinthians 7:22: 'the one called in the Lord as a slave is a freedman of the Lord.' The spiritual application inverts social categories: slaves who belong to Christ have been freed from sin's slavery and enjoy true liberty, regardless of their earthly social status.

(1×) Paul's paradox that a slave 'called in the Lord' is Christ's freedman transforms Roman social categories through gospel truth. Physical slavery doesn't negate spiritual freedom; belonging to Christ liberates from sin's bondage, which is deeper slavery than any earthly master imposes. Spanish 'liberto,' French 'affranchi,' German 'Freigelassener,' and English 'freedman' all carry the manumission sense. The gospel creates a new category: those freed by Christ possess liberty that transcends social structures. FREEDOM AND LIBERTY
en: freedman | es: liberto | fr: affranchi | de: Freigelassener 1Cor 7:22

Ἀπελλῆς G0559 N-AMS (1×)
Apelles; a personal name, possibly indicating Jewish or Roman Christian in Rome
This is a personal name appearing in Paul's greetings in Romans 16:10: 'Greet Apelles, who is approved in Christ.' The name was common in the Greco-Roman world, particularly among those with connections to the imperial household. Paul's brief commendation —'approved in Christ'—suggests Apelles had demonstrated genuine faith through testing or trial. The name appears nowhere else in the NT, leaving us with only this single reference to a Roman believer whose faithful witness Paul recognized and honored.

(1×) All we know of Apelles comes from Paul's five-word commendation: he is 'approved in Christ.' The uniform transcription across languages (Spanish 'a Apellên,' French 'Apelles,' German 'Apelles,' English 'Apelles') preserves the Greek accusative ending or adapts the name to target language conventions. The designation 'approved' (dokimos) implies tested genuineness—Apelles's faith had proven authentic under pressure. Like many in Romans 16, he represents the forgotten faithful whose steadfastness built the early church. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Apelles | es: a-Apellên | fr: Apelles | de: Apelles Rom 16:10

ἀπελπ-ίζω G0560 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

to despair, give up hope; or (NT sense) to expect back, hope to receive in return

This verb's classical meaning is 'to despair of' or 'to give up hope regarding' something. However, the NT occurrence in Luke 6:35 carries a contested meaning. Some interpret it as 'expecting nothing in return' (despair of repayment), while others read it as 'expecting back' (hoping to receive). Jesus's command to 'lend, expecting nothing back' or 'not despairing of repayment' both make contextual sense but carry different nuances. The surrounding context—radical generosity toward enemies—supports the first reading: lend without calculating returns.

(1×) Luke 6:35 presents Jesus's radical ethics: 'lend, expecting nothing in return.' The interpretive question is whether 'apelpizontes' means 'despairing of repayment' or 'expecting repayment.' Spanish 'esperando a cambio' (expecting in return), French 'désespérer' (to despair), English 'expecting in return,' and German transcription all reflect this ambiguity. The broader context—loving enemies, doing good to those who hate you—supports generosity without calculation of return. Kingdom economics operate on grace, not reciprocity. DESPAIR HOPELESSNESS

en: expecting-in-return | es: esperando-a-cambio | fr: désespérer | de: ἀπελπίζοντες Luke 6:35

ἀπέναντι G0561 Prep (5×)

Opposite, before, in the presence of; can also mean 'against' or 'contrary to.'

This preposition conveys spatial opposition – being face-to-face with or directly in front of something – and extends to metaphorical senses of confrontation or presence. In Matt 27:61 Mary Magdalene and the other Mary sit 'opposite' the tomb, a vivid spatial picture. Matt 27:24 has Pilate washing his hands 'before' the crowd. Acts 3:16 and Rom 3:18 use it for 'in the presence of' or 'before,' while Acts 17:7 shifts toward the adversative sense of acting 'against' Caesar's decrees. French 'en face / devant' and Spanish 'delante de / contra' capture the dual spatial-adversative range well.

(5×) A preposition meaning 'opposite,' 'before,' 'in the presence of,' or 'against,' depending on context. The spatial sense appears clearly in Matt 27:61 where the women sit 'opposite' the sepulchre. Matt 27:24 uses it for Pilate acting 'before' the crowd, emphasizing public visibility. Acts 3:16 conveys 'in the presence of' witnesses. The adversative meaning surfaces in Acts 17:7, where believers act 'against' (contrary to) Caesar's decrees, and in Rom 3:18 quoting Psalm 36:1 about no fear of God 'before their eyes.' Spanish glosses split neatly between 'delante de' (spatial) and 'contra' (adversative). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: against, before, opposite- | es: contra, delante, delante-de | fr: devant, en-face | de: gegenueber, ἀπέναντι Matt 27:24; Matt 27:61; Acts 3:16; Acts 17:7; Rom 3:18

ἀπέραντος G0562 Adj-DFP (1×)

endless, without limit; boundless in extent, duration, or number

This adjective describes something endless or unlimited, whether in space, time, or number. Classical Greek applied it to boundless plains, endless time, countless multitudes, or unlimited punishments. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy 1:4 to warn against 'myths and endless genealogies.' These genealogies—perhaps speculative Jewish genealogical systems or Gnostic emanation chains—were 'aperantos,' leading nowhere productive. The term emphasizes futility through boundlessness: discussions that never reach conclusion because they never exhaust their self-generating complexity.

(1×) Paul's warning against 'endless genealogies' targets speculative systems that generate infinite complexity without reaching truth. Spanish 'interminables' and English 'endless' capture the unlimited extent, while French and German transcribe or adapt the Greek. The problem isn't genealogies per se but their endless elaboration into speculative theology. Unlike Scripture's purposeful genealogies (establishing Jesus's Davidic descent), these 'aperantoi' genealogies multiply questions rather than build faith. They're spiritually unproductive because they never conclude—endless yet pointless. ETERNITY AND AGES

en: endless | es: interminables | fr: ἀπεράντοις | de: endlos 1Tim 1:4

ἀπερίσσευτος G0563 Adv (1×)

without distraction, undividedly; in a manner free from divided attention or competing concerns

This adverb describes an undivided or undistracted state—freedom from competing concerns that fragment attention. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 7:35 regarding singleness: his instruction about remaining unmarried aims at 'undistracted devotion to the Lord,' not to restrict freedom. Marriage brings legitimate concerns (pleasing one's spouse) that necessarily divide attention; singleness allows single-minded focus on pleasing the Lord. The term emphasizes unified attention, not the absence of all concerns but the presence of singular focus.

(1×) Paul's purpose in encouraging singleness is 'aperispastos' devotion—undivided attention to the Lord without the competing loyalties that marriage brings. Spanish 'sin distracción,' French 'sans distraction,' German 'ungestört' (undisturbed), and English 'without distraction' all emphasize unified focus. This isn't denigrating marriage (which Paul affirms elsewhere) but recognizing its legitimate demands. Single believers can give undivided attention to kingdom work; married believers must necessarily balance devotion to the Lord with devotion to spouse and family. MANNER ADVERBS

en: without-distraction | es: sin-distracción | fr: sans-distraction | de: ungestoert 1Cor 7:35

ἀπερί-τμητος G0564 Adj-VMP (1×)

uncircumcised; lacking physical circumcision or (metaphorically) spiritually hard-hearted

This adjective literally means 'uncircumcised,' referring to those who haven't undergone the physical rite. Metaphorically, it describes spiritual hardness or resistance to God. Stephen uses it in Acts 7:51 in a stinging rebuke: 'You stiff-necked people, uncircumcised in heart and ears!' His Jewish audience bore physical circumcision but lacked the spiritual reality it signified—circumcised hearts responsive to God. The term combines literal descriptive use (identifying Gentiles) with metaphorical theological use (condemning spiritual hardness).

(1×) Stephen's accusation that his physically circumcised Jewish hearers are 'uncircumcised in heart and ears' exposes the gap between ritual and reality. They bore the covenant sign physically but resisted the covenant Lord spiritually. Spanish 'incircuncisos,' French 'incirconcis,' German transcription, and English 'uncircumcised' all preserve the circumcision language. The irony cuts deep: those who prided themselves on covenant membership exhibited the spiritual hardness circumcision was meant to remove. External ritual without internal transformation produces religious hypocrisy. UNCIRCUMCISION

en: uncircumcised | es: incircuncisos | fr: incirconcis | de: ἀπερίτμητοι Acts 7:51

ἀπέρχομαι G0565 V-PPM/P-GFP (118×)

To go away, depart; to leave one place for another; of things or conditions: to pass away, come to an end; also of news spreading abroad or of going after something.

Aperchomai is the New Testament's workhorse verb for departure — simple, physical, and frequent. Compounded from apo ('away from') and erchomai ('to come/go'), it describes the most basic human motion of leaving one place and heading to another. Jesus' parables are full of it: the sower's audience 'goes away' (Matt 13:25), the merchant 'goes' to sell everything for the pearl (Matt 13:46), and the invited guests 'go off' to their fields and businesses (Matt 22:5). In the Gospels it often carries narrative weight as a scene-transition marker: people depart, and the story moves forward. Spanish se fue and partio both capture this clean departure sense, while German weggehen preserves the prefix structure. A quieter but theologically profound secondary sense emerges in Revelation, where the verb shifts from spatial to temporal: 'the first woe has passed away' (Rev 9:12), 'the first heaven and the first earth passed away' (Rev 21:1). Here departure becomes cosmic cessation. Two rare uses round out the picture: news 'going out' into a region (Matt 4:24), and Jude's description of Sodom 'going after' strange flesh (Jude 7), where the departure-verb is paradoxically repurposed for pursuit.

1. go away, depart physically (112×) To go away or depart physically from a place or person — the overwhelming core sense at 112 occurrences, covering ordinary human movement throughout the narrative sections of the New Testament. In Matt 8:33 the swineherds 'went away' into the city; in Matt 9:7 the paralytic 'went away' to his house; in Matt 13:46 the merchant 'went and sold' everything for the pearl of great price. The verb frequently follows encounters with Jesus — people depart having been healed, instructed, or challenged. Spanish se fue and partio render straightforward departure; German weggehen and French s'en aller both preserve the 'away' prefix that mirrors Greek apo-. The verb takes eis + accusative for destination ('went away into the mountain,' Mark 6:46), pros + accusative for personal destination ('went to him,' John 6:68), and absolute use with no stated goal. In John 6:66-68 disciples 'go away' from Jesus, prompting Peter's great confession — here the spatial verb carries the theological weight of apostasy versus fidelity. CONDUCT AND WALKING

en: departed, he-departed, he-went-away | es: fue, partió, se-fue | fr: s'en-aller | de: geht-weg, weggehen Matt 8:33; Matt 9:7; Matt 13:25; Matt 13:28; Matt 13:46

2. pass away, elapse (4×) Of things, conditions, or epochs that pass away or come to an end — 4 occurrences concentrated in the Apocalypse. In Rev 9:12 'the first woe has passed' (apelthen); in Rev 11:14 'the second woe has passed'; in Rev 21:1 'the first heaven and the first earth passed away'; and in Rev 21:4 mourning, crying, and pain 'have passed away.' Spanish pasaron and paso shift to temporal vocabulary, while German vergehen captures the cessation nuance. French s'en aller remains the same form as sense 1, relying on context to disambiguate. This metaphorical extension treats abstract realities as travelers who depart the scene. The theological weight is enormous: in Rev 21:1-4 the entire old creation 'goes away,' making room for the new. The verb that normally marks a minor narrative transition in the Gospels becomes in Revelation a word for cosmic eschatological transformation. CONDUCT AND WALKING

en: has-passed, passed-away | es: pasaron„ pasaron., pasó | fr: s'en-aller | de: weggehen Rev 9:12; Rev 11:14; Rev 21:1; Rev 21:4

3. (1×) Of news, report, or fame that goes out or spreads through a region — a single occurrence at Matt 4:24 where 'the report of him went out (apelthen) into all Syria.' Spanish salio ('went out') and English 'went out' both capture the idea of information traveling as if it were a person departing from one place and arriving at many others. This is a natural metonymic extension of sense 1: instead of a person going away, it is a report that 'departs' from its origin point and travels outward. The construction parallels other NT fame-spreading formulas (cf. Mark 1:28 with exelthen), but aperchomai here preserves the 'away from origin' directionality of the apo- prefix that distinguishes it from the more neutral exerchomai. CONDUCT AND WALKING

en: went-out | es: salió | fr: s'en-aller | de: geht-weg Matt 4:24

4. (1×) To go after or pursue — a single occurrence in Jude 7, where Sodom and Gomorrah 'having gone after (apelthousai opiso) other flesh' serve as an example of divine judgment. Spanish yendo ('going') and French etant allees ('having gone') both use simple motion verbs, but the construction aperchomai opiso ('go away after') repurposes the departure verb as a pursuit verb — a paradox of leaving one's proper place in order to chase after what is forbidden. German nachgehend ('going after') captures the pursuit explicitly. The prepositional phrase opiso sarkos heteras ('after other flesh') transforms spatial 'going away' into moral deviation. This usage has parallels in LXX constructions where 'going after' foreign gods (cf. Deut 6:14 LXX poreuomai opiso) marks apostasy — Jude applies the same departure-as-transgression metaphor to sexual ethics. DEPARTING AND PASSING en: having-gone-after | es: yendo | fr: étant-allées | de: nachgehend Jude 1:7

ἀπέχω G0566

keep off, hold away from; be distant from; have in full; suffice (middle voice)

A versatile compound verb with several related senses clustered around the core idea of separation or distance. Active voice uses include keeping something off or away from something else—the collar-bone parts the neck from the shoulders. It can mean to hold back one's hands from someone, or with the impersonal construction, to indicate that nothing prevents or hinders an action. The middle voice develops distinctive commercial and experiential meanings: to have received something in full (especially payment), to be distant from a place, or to abstain from something. Additional nuances include being sufficient and, in older texts, returning from a journey.

ἀπέχω G0567

keep off, hold away from; be distant from; have in full; suffice (middle voice)

A versatile compound verb with several related senses clustered around the core idea of separation or distance. Active voice uses include keeping something off or away from something else—the collar-bone parts the neck from the shoulders. It can mean to hold back one's hands from someone, or with the impersonal construction, to indicate that nothing prevents or hinders an action. The middle voice develops distinctive commercial and experiential meanings: to have received something in full (especially payment), to be distant from a place, or to abstain from something. Additional nuances include being sufficient and, in older texts, returning from a journey.

ἀπέχω G0568 V-PIA-2P (19×)

To receive in full, abstain from, be distant from, or (impersonally) be enough — a versatile verb of separation, completion, and distance.

This Greek verb carries remarkably distinct meanings depending on voice and context. In its active transactional sense, Jesus uses it to declare that hypocrites 'have received their reward in full' (Matt 6:2, 5, 16) — the same commercial term found in ancient receipts. In the middle voice it means to hold oneself away, as in the Apostolic Decree's command to 'abstain' from certain practices (Acts 15:20, 29). It also measures spatial or emotional distance, as when the crowd's heart 'is far' from God (Matt 15:8). Spanish neatly separates these: 'reciben' for receiving, 'absteneos' for abstaining, and 'dista' for distance.

1. receive in full / have back (6×) To have received in full, especially in a commercial or transactional sense. In Matthew 6:2, 5, 16 Jesus says the hypocrites apechousin — they have already cashed out their reward and nothing more is coming. Philippians 4:18 uses the same word as Paul acknowledges full receipt of the Philippians' gift. The Spanish 'reciben' and the German 'hat genug' both reflect this notion of complete, settled transaction — a term at home on a papyrus receipt. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: I-have, they-have-received, you-are-receiving | es: reciben, recibo, tengas | fr: être-loin | de: hat-genug, ἀπέχω, ἀπέχῃς Matt 6:2; Matt 6:5; Matt 6:16; Luke 6:24; Phil 4:18

2. abstain from (6×) To hold oneself away from, to abstain — the middle voice (apechesthai) used for moral and dietary self-restraint. The Jerusalem Council's landmark decision tells Gentile believers to 'abstain from' polluted food and sexual immorality (Acts 15:20, 29). Paul extends it to broader ethical purity in 1 Thessalonians 4:3 and 5:22. Spanish 'absteneos/abstenerse' and French parallels preserve the reflexive, volitional character of this restraint. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: abstain, to-abstain | es: absteneos, absteneros, abstenerse | fr: recevoir-en-plein, être-loin | de: hat-genug, ἀπέχεσθαι, ἀπέχεσθε Acts 15:20; Acts 15:29; 1Thess 4:3; 1Thess 5:22; 1Tim 4:3

3. be distant from (6×) To be at a spatial or metaphorical distance from a place or person. In Matthew 14:24 the boat apeichen many stadia from land, while in Matthew 15:8 (citing Isa 29:13) 'their heart is far (apechei) from me.' Spanish distinguishes this clearly with 'dista/distaba,' and the sense extends from measurable geographic distance (Luke 7:6, 15:20) to the painful spiritual gap between lip-service and true devotion. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: being-away, being-distant, is-distant | es: dista, distaba, distante | fr: être-loin | de: hat-genug, ἀπέχει Matt 14:24; Matt 15:8; Mark 7:6; Luke 7:6; Luke 15:20

4. it is enough / it is settled (1×) An impersonal use meaning 'it is enough' or 'the matter is settled.' Found only in Mark 14:41, where Jesus in Gethsemane says apechei after finding the disciples sleeping yet again. The exact nuance is debated — 'enough!' as resignation, or 'the account is settled' linking back to the commercial sense — but Spanish 'basta' captures the abrupt finality well. It marks a turning point: the hour of betrayal has arrived. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: It-is-enough | es: basta | fr: être-loin | de: ἀπέχει Mark 14:41

ἀπιστ-έω G0569 V-PPA-GMP (8×)

To disbelieve, refuse to believe, or be faithless; the verbal counterpart of ἄπιστος (unbelieving).

Derived from the alpha-privative prefix (ἀ-) and πιστεύω (to believe), this verb describes the active refusal or failure to believe. It appears at critical narrative turning points: the disciples disbelieving the report of the resurrection (Mark 16:11; Luke 24:11, 41), and the divided response to Paul's preaching in Rome (Acts 28:24), and the solemn warning that the one who disbelieves will be condemned (Mark 16:16). The Spanish 'incrédulos' and French 'ne pas croire' capture the same resistant posture. In 2 Timothy 2:13, it takes a striking theological turn — even if we are faithless, God remains faithful.

disbelieve / be faithless (8×) To refuse to believe or to be faithless, expressing active unbelief or distrust in a message, person, or reality. The disciples 'disbelieved' (ἠπίστησαν) the women's Easter report (Mark 16:11; Luke 24:11), and some in Rome 'disbelieved' Paul's teaching about Jesus (Acts 28:24). Spanish renders this as 'incrédulos' (incredulous ones), while German uses 'nicht glauben' (not-believe), both highlighting the denial dimension. In 2 Tim 2:13, it shifts to faithlessness in a covenantal sense. FAITH AND TRUST

en: disbelieved, disbelieving, having-disbelieved | es: a-los-incrédulos, fueron-incrédulos, no-creyendo | fr: ne-pas-croire | de: nicht-glauben, ἀπιστούντων, ἠπίστουν Mark 16:11; Mark 16:16; Luke 24:11; Luke 24:41; Acts 28:24

ἀπιστία G0570 N-GFS (11×)

Unbelief, lack of faith — a refusal or failure to trust God, hindering divine action and covenant relationship

The noun ἀπιστία (apistia) names the absence or refusal of faith — not mere intellectual doubt, but a disposition that obstructs God's work. Jesus 'did not do many mighty works' in Nazareth 'because of their unbelief' (Matt 13:58; cf. Mark 6:6), and the father of the epileptic boy cries, 'I believe; help my unbelief!' (Mark 9:24). Paul's theological use in Romans is especially rich: Israel's unbelief opened the door for Gentile inclusion (Rom 11:20, 23), yet even Israel's faithlessness cannot nullify God's faithfulness (Rom 3:3). The writer of Hebrews warns against 'an evil, unbelieving heart' that departs from the living God (Heb 3:12, 19). Spanish 'incredulidad' and French 'incrédulité' both preserve the privative force.

unbelief, lack of faith (11×) Unbelief or lack of faith as a settled disposition that hinders divine activity and imperils covenant standing. In the Synoptic Gospels, the unbelief of Nazareth limits Jesus' miracles (Matt 13:58; Mark 6:6), and a father's anguished confession — 'help my unbelief!' (Mark 9:24) — reveals its internal struggle. Paul uses it theologically in Romans 3:3 (Israel's unfaithfulness versus God's faithfulness) and Romans 11:20, 23 (unbelief as the reason for Israel's temporary exclusion, yet not irrevocable). Hebrews 3:12, 19 treats it as the root sin of the wilderness generation. Spanish 'incredulidad' and German 'Unglaube' both reflect the privative alpha prefix. UNBELIEF FAITHLESSNESS

en: of-unbelief, unbelief | es: de-incredulidad, incredulidad | fr: incrédulité | de: Unglaube Matt 13:58; Mark 6:6; Mark 9:24; Mark 16:14; Rom 3:3

ἄπιστος G0571 Adj-DMP (23×)

Unbelieving, faithless; as noun: an unbeliever; also incredible, unbelievable

Apistos (alpha-privative of pistos, 'faithful') carries a double edge in the New Testament. Most often it designates the unbeliever — one outside the community of faith — as when Paul contrasts believers and unbelievers in 1 Corinthians 6:6 and 2 Corinthians 6:14-15. Jesus himself uses it as a stinging rebuke: 'O faithless and perverse generation' (Matt 17:17; Mark 9:19; Luke 9:41). Spanish consistently renders this 'incrédulo,' while German 'ungläubig' mirrors the privative formation. A moral sense emerges in Luke 12:46 and Revelation 21:8, where apistos means faithless — disloyal and unreliable. Acts 26:8 preserves the classical Greek passive sense: 'Why is it judged incredible (apiston) that God raises the dead?'

1. unbelieving, unbeliever (20×) One who does not believe, an unbeliever — the dominant New Testament usage. Applied substantivally to non-Christians (1 Cor 6:6; 7:12-15; 14:22-24; 2 Cor 6:14) and adjectivally as Jesus' rebuke of a 'faithless generation' (Matt 17:17; Mark 9:19). John 20:27 records the risen Christ telling Thomas 'be not unbelieving but believing' (me ginou apistos alla pistos). Spanish 'incrédulo' and German 'ungläubig' consistently mark absence of faith. UNBELIEF FAITHLESSNESS

en: than-an-unbeliever, unbeliever, unbelievers | es: con-incrédulos, incrédula, incrédulo | fr: incrédule | de: unglaeubig, ungläubig Matt 17:17; Mark 9:19; Luke 9:41; John 20:27; 1Cor 6:6

2. unfaithful, faithless (2×) Faithless, unfaithful, disloyal — emphasizing moral failure in commitment rather than intellectual absence of belief. In Luke 12:46 the wicked servant is assigned a portion with the 'unfaithful' (apistōn), and Revelation 21:8 lists the apistoi alongside murderers and liars in the lake of fire. The connotation shifts from 'not yet believing' to 'having broken faith,' closer to the classical Greek sense of untrustworthiness. UNBELIEF FAITHLESSNESS

en: unfaithful | es: infieles, infieles, | fr: incrédule | de: unglaeubig, ungläubig Luke 12:46; Rev 21:8

3. incredible, unbelievable (1×) Incredible, unbelievable — the passive adjectival sense applied to propositions rather than persons. In Acts 26:8 Paul asks Agrippa: 'Why is it judged incredible (apiston) among you that God raises the dead?' Spanish 'increíble' captures this perfectly, showing the word's classical range where the alpha-privative negates the credibility of a claim rather than the faith of a person. UNBELIEF FAITHLESSNESS en: incredible | es: increíble | fr: incrédule | de: ungläubig Acts 26:8

ἁπλότης G0572 N-AFS (8×)

Singleness of heart manifesting as either generous liberality or sincere simplicity of devotion.

A noun rooted in the idea of 'singleness' — a heart undivided, without folds or hidden layers. In the New Testament it branches into two closely related but distinguishable senses: generous giving and sincere devotion. The Macedonians' deep poverty overflowed in 'rich generosity' (2 Cor 8:2), while slaves are told to obey with 'sincerity of heart' (Eph 6:5; Col 3:22). Both senses flow from the same spring — a heart that is ἁπλοῦς (single, simple) either gives without calculation or devotes itself without duplicity. German 'Einfalt' (literally 'one-fold') preserves this etymological unity beautifully across both uses.

1. generosity / liberality (4×) Generosity, liberality — open-hearted giving that flows from singleness of purpose, without ulterior motive or self-serving calculation. The Macedonians' affliction produced 'a wealth of generosity' (2 Cor 8:2), and God enriches believers 'for all generosity' (2 Cor 9:11). Paul commends giving done ἐν ἁπλότητι (Rom 12:8) — with no hidden agenda. Spanish splits between 'generosidad' (2 Cor 8:2) and 'sencillez' (Rom 12:8), reflecting how this sense shades from lavish giving to pure-hearted giving. HOLINESS AND SINCERITY

en: generosity, of-generosity | es: generosidad, sencillez | fr: simplicité | de: Einfalt Rom 12:8; 2Cor 8:2; 2Cor 9:11; 2Cor 9:13

2. sincerity / simplicity (4×) Sincerity, simplicity of devotion — undivided loyalty and transparency of purpose, without guile or double-mindedness. Paul fears the Corinthians may be led astray from their 'sincerity toward Christ' (2 Cor 11:3), and servants are to obey 'in sincerity of heart' (Eph 6:5; Col 3:22). In 2 Cor 1:12, Paul defends his conduct as marked by 'holiness and sincerity from God.' The contrast with the serpent's cunning in 2 Cor 11:3 sharpens this sense — ἁπλότης is the opposite of craftiness and hidden agendas. HOLINESS AND SINCERITY

en: holiness, simplicity, sincerity | es: santidad, sencillez | fr: simplicité | de: Einfalt 2Cor 1:12; 2Cor 11:3; Eph 6:5; Col 3:22

ἁπλόος G0573 Adj-NMS (2×)

single, simple, clear; metaphorically of moral simplicity, singleness of purpose, generosity without duplicity

The word carries the basic meaning of 'single' as opposed to 'double' or 'divided,' but in its New Testament usage it describes moral character. Jesus uses it to describe an eye that is 'clear' or 'healthy'—one that sees properly and lets in light, in contrast to an evil eye that is clouded or diseased. The multilingual evidence reveals an interesting nuance: Spanish 'sencillo' (simple, sincere) and English 'clear, healthy' both point to the moral dimension, suggesting unpretentious generosity and wholehearted devotion to God. The metaphor of the eye in Matthew 6 and Luke 11 connects physical sight to spiritual insight, where singleness of vision means undivided loyalty.

(2×) In both Gospel occurrences (Matthew 6:22, Luke 11:34), this describes the 'clear' or 'healthy' eye in Jesus' teaching about treasures and light. The context contrasts it with the 'evil eye' (a Semitic idiom for stinginess), so the multilingual glosses pointing to moral qualities like 'sano' (healthy) and 'sencillo' (simple, generous) are well-founded. The eye metaphor represents wholehearted devotion: a single focus on God's kingdom rather than divided loyalty between God and wealth. MORAL GOODNESS

en: clear, healthy | es: sano, sencillo | fr: simple | de: ἁπλοῦς Matt 6:22; Luke 11:34

ἁπλ-ῶς G0574 Adv (1×)

generously, liberally; in a simple, sincere manner without calculation or grudging

This adverb carries the sense of doing something simply, sincerely, or generously—without complexity, duplicity, or grudging calculation. James 1:5 uses it regarding divine wisdom: God 'gives to all generously and without reproach.' The adverb emphasizes both the abundance of God's giving (generously, liberally) and its manner (simply, without complication or condescension). When we ask God for wisdom, He doesn't give grudgingly, conditionally, or with criticism but straightforwardly and abundantly. Divine generosity operates without the calculations and conditions that govern human giving.

(1×) God's giving 'haplos'—generously, simply—contrasts sharply with human giving patterns. We calculate, condition, and criticize; God gives abundantly and simply. Spanish 'generosamente,' French transcription, German 'reichlich' (abundantly), and English 'generously' all capture the liberal giving sense. James's point: when we lack wisdom and ask God, we needn't fear divine reluctance, condescension, or criticism. God gives wisdom the way He gives everything—generously, straightforwardly, without strings or grudging. This divine generosity should inspire confidence in prayer. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: generously | es: generosamente | fr: ἁπλῶς | de: reichlich Jas 1:5

ἀπό G0575 Prep (650×)

Preposition of separation: from, away from, of (origin, cause, or partitive); rarely temporal 'since'.

One of the most frequent prepositions in the New Testament, ἀπό marks separation, origin, or departure. It governs the genitive case and answers the question 'from where?' or 'from whom?'—whether spatially (away from a place), causally (by means of), or partitively (of a group). Spanish consistently renders it 'de/desde' while German uses 'von,' both capturing the core ablative force. In rare cases it extends temporally, as in Acts 24:11 where Paul counts days 'since' his arrival in Jerusalem.

1. from (648×) The overwhelmingly dominant sense: spatial, causal, or partitive 'from/of/by.' Covers origin ('from Nazareth,' Matt 21:11), agency ('by their fruits,' Matt 7:16), and partitive relations. The Spanish split between 'de' (origin/possession) and 'desde' (departure point) reveals the range this single Greek preposition covers. Found in genealogies (Matt 1:17), commissioning formulas, and countless narrative transitions. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: by-, from-, of- | es: de, del, desde | fr: de- | de: von Matt 1:17; Matt 1:21; Matt 1:24

2. from (1×) A distinct causal nuance: 'from' in the sense of 'because of' or 'on account of,' as in Luke 19:3 where Zacchaeus cannot see Jesus ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου—'from/because of the crowd.' Spanish renders this instance 'por' (because of) rather than the usual 'de,' confirming the causal rather than purely spatial force. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: from | es: por | fr: de- | de: von Luke 19:3

3. since (1×) Temporal extension: 'since, from (a point in time).' In Acts 24:11, Paul states it is not more than twelve days 'since' (ἀφ' ἧς) he went up to Jerusalem. Spanish 'desde' and German 'von' both naturally accommodate this temporal reading, but the sense is distinct from spatial separation—marking a starting point on a timeline rather than movement away from a place. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: since | es: desde | fr: de- | de: von Acts 24:11

ἀποβαίνω G0576 V-FIM-3S (4×)

to step off, disembark; to turn out, result in a certain outcome

This compound verb (apo + baino, 'step away from') carries both a physical and a resultative sense. Physically, it means to step off or disembark: in Luke 5:2 fishermen have gotten out of their boats, and in John 21:9 the disciples come ashore after the resurrection appearance. But Luke 21:13 uses it in a wholly different register — Jesus tells his persecuted followers that their trials 'will turn out' as an occasion for testimony. Philippians 1:19 echoes this: Paul is confident that his imprisonment 'will turn out' for deliverance. Spanish captures the split neatly: 'desembarcar' for the physical sense and 'resultar' for the outcome sense.

(4×) To step off, disembark, go ashore — the physical act of leaving a boat or vessel. Luke 5:2 describes fishermen who had gotten out of their boats to wash nets; John 21:9 narrates the disciples stepping ashore and finding a charcoal fire. Spanish 'desembarcaron' and French 'descendre' both point to this concrete, nautical meaning of disembarking. DESCENDING AND TEARING

en: having-gotten-out, it-will-turn-out, they-went-ashore | es: desembarcaron, habiendo-descendido, resultará | fr: descendre | de: ausgehen, ἀποβάντες, ἀποβήσεται Luke 5:2; Luke 21:13; John 21:9; Phil 1:19

ἀποβάλλω G0577 V-APA-NMS (2×)

to throw away, cast off; to reject or discard something previously held or worn

This verb depicts the forceful action of throwing something away from oneself—whether casting off a garment, jettisoning cargo from a ship, or rejecting something once valued. The classical Greek range includes military contexts (throwing off armor) and commercial ones (selling too cheaply, cutting losses). In the New Testament's two occurrences, the physical and metaphorical merge: Bartimaeus throws off his cloak in eagerness to reach Jesus, while Hebrews warns believers not to cast away their confidence. The Spanish 'desechéis' (reject, discard) and 'habiendo-arrojado' (having thrown off) capture both the physical vigor and the decisiveness of the action.

(2×) Mark 10:50 shows the dramatic physical action: blind Bartimaeus 'throwing off' his outer garment as he springs up to meet Jesus—the urgency and joy evident in the gesture. Hebrews 10:35 shifts to the metaphorical: believers are urged not to 'throw away' their confidence (boldness, freedom of speech before God), which has great reward. The cross-linguistic glosses unite around this core of discarding or rejecting: 'wegwerfen' (German, throw away), 'jeter' (French, throw), all preserving the forceful, decisive character of the action. THROWING AND CASTING en: throw-away, throwing-off | es: desechéis, habiendo-arrojado | fr: jeter | de: wegwerfen Mark 10:50; Heb 10:35

ἀπο-βλέπω G0578 V-IIA-3S (1×)
to look away toward, fix gaze upon; to regard attentively or look to as example/reward
This verb means to look away from all other objects toward a single focus, gazing steadfastly at something. It can mean to look to someone as a model, to regard something with attention, or to look toward a reward or goal. Hebrews 11:26 uses it of Moses: he 'was looking away to the reward' when he chose to suffer with God's people rather than enjoy Egypt's pleasures. The verb emphasizes directed attention away from immediate circumstances toward a greater reality or future recompense.

(1×) Moses's choice to suffer with Israel rather than enjoy Pharaoh's palace made sense only because 'he was looking away to the reward'—he gazed beyond present circumstances to future recompense. Spanish 'miraba' (was looking), French 'regarder vers' (to look toward), English 'was looking away,' and German 'hinblicken' (to look toward) all preserve the directional gaze. The imperfect tense suggests sustained attention: Moses kept his gaze fixed on eternal reward while enduring temporal suffering. Faith enables such perspective—seeing the invisible weighs heavier than enjoying the visible. GAZING AND LOOKING
en: he-was-looking-away | es: miraba | fr: regarder-vers | de: hinblicken Heb 11:26

ἀπό-βλητος G0579 Adj-NNS (1×)
to be rejected, cast aside; fit to be thrown away as worthless
This adjective describes something that should be thrown away or rejected as worthless. Classical Greek used it for things unworthy of keeping. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy 4:4 in a positive construction: 'nothing God created is to be rejected' if received with thanksgiving. The broader context addresses false teachers who forbid certain foods. Paul's point: creation is good; asceticism that rejects God's gifts dishonors the Creator. The term emphasizes unfitness for use or acceptance, which Paul denies applies to any food received gratefully.

(1×) Paul's assertion that 'nothing is apobleton' (to be rejected) when received with thanksgiving confronts proto-Gnostic asceticism that denigrated material creation. Spanish 'rechazable,' French transcription, and English 'to be rejected' all capture the rejection sense, while German 'nicht zu verwerfen' (not to be rejected) gives the negative form matching Paul's construction. The theological point: creation goodness means no food is inherently defiling. Thanksgiving sanctifies eating; ascetic rejection dishonors the Creator who gave food as gift. REJECTION AND REFUSAL
en: to-be-rejected | es: rechazable | fr: ἀπόβλητον | de: nicht-zu-verwerfen 1Tim 4:4

ἀποβολ-ή G0580 N-NFS (2×)
a throwing away, loss, rejection; the act of discarding or the state of being lost
This noun names the result of throwing something away—whether the voluntary jettisoning of cargo to save a ship or the involuntary loss of something valued. Classical Greek used it for the casting off of weapons in retreat or the dropping of letters in grammar. Paul employs it theologically in Romans 11 for Israel's 'rejection' by God (a rejection that paradoxically brings reconciliation to the world), while Luke uses it in Acts 27 for the literal 'loss' of life avoided in the shipwreck. The multilingual evidence splits between 'loss' (a state) and 'rejection' (an act), both valid nuances of the single Greek term.

(2×) Acts 27:22 contains Paul's assurance to the storm-tossed crew: there will be no 'loss' of life (apobolē), though the ship will be destroyed—a concrete, physical meaning. Romans 11:15 shifts entirely to theology: if Israel's 'rejection' (or 'casting away') means reconciliation for the world, what will their acceptance mean but life from the dead? Here the term bears the weight of divine mystery—God's apparent rejection serving a redemptive purpose. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'pérdida/rechazo', French 'rejet', German 'Verwerfung') preserve both the passive sense (loss incurred) and the active sense (rejection enacted). AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 6762 WITH 3 SENSES
en: loss, rejection | es: pérdida, rechazo | fr: rejet | de: Verwerfung, ἀποβολή Acts 27:22; Rom 11:15

ἀπογίγνομαι G0581 V-APM-NMP (1×)
having died, departed from; having ceased to be present or to participate in This participle (from apogínomai) means 'having died to' or 'having departed from' something, indicating cessation of participation or relationship. Peter uses it in 1 Peter 2:24: Christ 'bore our sins in his body on the tree, that we, having died to sin, might live to righteousness.' The participle indicates a definitive break: believers have died to sin's dominion through union with Christ's death. This isn't gradual improvement but radical transition—death severs the old relationship, making new life possible.

(1×) Peter's 'having died to sin' describes Christians' positional reality through Christ's atonement: we have departed from sin's sphere of control. Spanish 'habiendo muerto,' French transcription, English 'having died,' and German 'abgestorben' (died off) all preserve the death metaphor. The perfect participle indicates completed action with ongoing results: we have died to sin and remain in that state of death-to-sin. Sanctification flows from this positional reality—we live righteously because we have already died to sin's dominion. DEATH AND CORPSES
en: having-died | es: habiendo-muerto | fr: ἀπογενόμενοι | de: abgestorben 1Pet 2:24

ἀπογρᾰφ-ή G0582 N-GFS (2×)
a registration, census, enrollment; an official listing of persons or property for taxation or civic purposes
This technical administrative term denoted the Roman census—a periodic registration of persons and property for taxation and civic organization. Classical Greek used it broadly for registers, lists, and declarations, but in New Testament times it specifically referred to the empire-wide enrollments ordered by imperial decree. Luke mentions it twice, both times anchoring Gospel events in datable history: the census under Quirinius that brought Mary and Joseph to Bethlehem, and the census under Quirinius that sparked Judas the Galilean's revolt. The multilingual glosses converge on 'census' and 'registration,' reflecting the bureaucratic precision of the term.

(2×) Luke 2:2 sets the stage for Jesus' birth: 'this registration (apographē) was the first while Quirinius was governor of Syria'—a chronological anchor that has sparked much historical discussion. Acts 5:37 refers to the same census period, when 'Judas the Galilean rose up in the days of the registration' leading a revolt. Both passages use the term precisely for the Roman imperial census, not a general counting. The cross-linguistic evidence is unanimous: Spanish 'censo/empadronamiento', French 'recensement', German 'Apographē'—all administrative terms for official population registration tied to taxation and governance. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: census, registration | es: censo, empadronamiento | fr: recensement | de: ἀπογραφή, ἀπογραφῆς Luke 2:2; Acts 5:37

ἀπογρᾰ́φ-ω G0583 V-RPM/P-GMP (4×)

to register, enroll; to have oneself recorded in an official census or list

Used in the New Testament exclusively for the Roman census that brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem (Luke 2:1-5), this verb denotes official enrollment or registration, typically for purposes of taxation. In Hebrews 12:23 it shifts to a heavenly register — the names of the firstborn enrolled in heaven. Spanish 'empadronado' and French 'inscrire' both capture the census-enrollment nuance, while English 'enrolled' and German 'eingeschrieben' reflect the broader idea of being written into an official record.

(4×) To register or enroll oneself in an official census or tax list, as commanded by a governing authority. The middle voice predominates in the NT, emphasizing voluntary compliance with an imperial decree. All four Lukan occurrences (Luke 2:1, 3, 5) refer to the census under Augustus. Cross-lingual glosses — Spanish 'empadronado,' French 'se faire inscrire' — uniformly point to civic registration. In Hebrews 12:23, the image transfers to a heavenly enrollment of the firstborn, using the perfect passive participle to indicate a completed, permanent inscription. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE
en: having-been-enrolled, to-be-registered | es: a-ser-empadronado, a-ser-empadronados, inscritos | fr: se-faire-inscrire | de: eingeschrieben, ἀπογράφεσθαι, ἀπογράψασθαι Luke 2:1; Luke 2:3; Luke 2:5; Heb 12:23

ἀποδείκ-νῡμι G0584 V-RPM/P-AMS (4×)

to display, demonstrate, exhibit; to publicly show forth or prove by evidence

At its core this verb means to point out or publicly demonstrate something, whether by miraculous signs or by argumentation. In Acts 2:22, God 'showed forth' Jesus through wonders and signs — a divine accreditation. Paul in 1 Corinthians 4:9 says God has exhibited the apostles as a spectacle. The Spanish 'exhibió' and 'mostrándose' and French 'démontrer' together capture the range from theatrical display to rational proof. In 2 Thessalonians 2:4, the man of lawlessness 'displays' himself as God — a blasphemous self-exhibition.

(4×) To publicly display, demonstrate, or exhibit, whether through miraculous attestation or deliberate self-presentation. In Acts 2:22, God demonstrated Jesus to Israel through signs and wonders — Spanish 'aprobado' reads the verb as divine accreditation. In 1 Corinthians 4:9, Paul uses it for God putting apostles on display like condemned men in an arena. Acts 25:7 involves bringing forward charges as evidence. In 2 Thessalonians 2:4, the lawless one 'displays himself' as divine, a counterfeit self-demonstration. French 'démontrer' captures the evidential force across these contexts. STANDING BY AND ASSISTING en: displaying, exhibited, having-been-demonstrated | es: aprobado, exhibió, mostrándose | fr: démontrer, ἀποδεικνύντα | de: ἀπέδειξεν, ἀποδεδειγμένον, ἀποδεικνύντα Acts 2:22; Acts 25:7; 1Cor 4:9; 2Thess 2:4

ἀπόδειξις G0585 N-DFS (1×)

demonstration, proof; showing forth evidence or making a case convincingly

This noun denotes demonstration or proof—the showing forth of evidence that establishes a claim. Classical Greek used it for logical proofs, public exhibitions, or testing by examination. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 2:4: his message came 'not in persuasive words of wisdom but in demonstration of the Spirit and power.' He contrasts rhetorical cleverness (which could be humanly impressive but ultimately empty) with Spirit-empowered demonstration (which carries divine authority and life-changing power). True proof isn't argumentative sophistication but supernatural effectiveness.

(1×) Paul's ministry carried 'apodeixis' of Spirit and power—demonstration that proved the gospel's truth through changed lives and supernatural signs, not clever rhetoric. Spanish 'demostración,' French 'démonstration,' and English 'demonstration' all preserve the proof sense, while German 'Beweis' (proof) emphasizes evidential weight. Paul deliberately rejected persuasive wisdom-words because faith rooted in human eloquence would collapse under pressure. But faith rooted in demonstrated Spirit-power—exhibited through transformed lives and divine working—stands firm, grounded in God not man. TESTING AND PROVING en: demonstration | es: demostración | fr: démonstration | de: Beweis 1Cor 2:4

ἀποδεκᾰτόω G0586 V-PIA-2P (4×)

to tithe; to give or collect a tenth as a religious obligation

Rooted in the ancient practice of giving a tenth to God, this verb appears in both directions: paying tithes and collecting them. Jesus rebukes the Pharisees for scrupulously tithing herbs like mint and dill while neglecting justice (Matt 23:23; Luke 11:42). The tax-collector's boast 'I tithe all I acquire' (Luke 18:12) illustrates self-righteous precision. In Hebrews 7:5, the Levitical priests collect tithes from the people. Spanish 'diezmar/diezmo' and French 'donner la dîme' preserve the explicit tenth-part etymology that English 'tithe' also carries.

(4×) To give or collect a tenth of one's possessions or produce as religious obligation. The verb operates in two directions in the NT: active collection by priests (Heb 7:5, where Levites tithe the people) and personal payment of tithes (Luke 18:12). Jesus's sharp critique in Matthew 23:23 and Luke 11:42 targets those who tithe garden herbs with meticulous care but neglect weightier matters of the law. Spanish 'diezmo' and French 'dîme' both transparently preserve the 'tenth' root, reinforcing how deeply this decimal fraction was embedded in ancient religious economy. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: I-tithe, to-collect-tithes-from, you-tithe | es: diezmar, diezmo, diezmáis | fr: donner-la-dîme | de: verzehnten, ἀποδεκατοῦτε, ἀποδεκατῶ Matt 23:23; Luke 11:42; Luke 18:12; Heb 7:5

ἀποδεκ-τός G0587 Adj-NNS (2×)

acceptable, welcome, pleasing (especially to God or in religious contexts)

This adjective describes what is acceptable, welcome, or pleasing—particularly in contexts of divine approval. Paul uses it twice in 1 Timothy to describe things that are 'acceptable to God': intercessory prayer for all people (2:3) and providing for one's family (5:4). The consistent translation as 'acceptable' or 'agreeable' across languages (Spanish aceptable, German angenehm) reflects its core sense of meeting a standard or finding favor, with theological overtones of what God welcomes.

(2×) The lemma describes what is acceptable or pleasing, especially to God. Both occurrences in 1 Timothy emphasize divine approval: prayer for all people is 'acceptable to God our Savior' (2:3), and caring for family is 'acceptable before God' (5:4). The multilingual evidence (Spanish aceptable, German angenehm 'pleasant/agreeable') confirms the core semantic range of meeting a standard of acceptability, with the context consistently pointing to what God finds pleasing rather than merely human approval. PLEASANTNESS AND DELIGHT
en: acceptable | es: aceptable | fr: ἀπόδεκτον | de: angenehm 1Tim 2:3; 1Tim 5:4

ἀποδέχομαι G0588 V-APM-NMP (7×)

To welcome, receive gladly; accept a person with hospitality or a message with approval.

Apodechomai combines the prefix apo- ('from') with dechomai ('receive'), creating a verb that suggests receiving something or someone fully and favorably. In five of its seven NT occurrences, it describes welcoming a person — the crowd welcoming Jesus back from the Gerasenes (Luke 8:40), Jesus receiving the multitudes who followed him (Luke 9:11), the brothers in Achaia welcoming Apollos (Acts 18:27), the Jerusalem believers receiving Paul's party (Acts 21:17), and Paul himself receiving visitors in Rome (Acts 28:30). Spanish recibir, French accueillir, and German empfangen all convey this warm, personal hospitality. The remaining two uses shift to intellectual reception: the three thousand at Pentecost 'received his word' (Acts 2:41), and the lawyer Tertullus tells Felix 'we accept with gratitude' (Acts 24:3). The distinction between welcoming a person and accepting a message runs through every translation tradition.

1. welcome, receive (a person) (5×) To welcome or receive a person with gladness, hospitality, or favorable disposition — the physical, relational act of taking someone in. This dominant sense (5 occurrences) spans from the crowd that 'welcomed' Jesus at Capernaum (Luke 8:40) to Paul 'receiving all who came to him' in his Roman lodging (Acts 28:30). Spanish recibió/recibieron, French accueillir/recevoir, and German empfangen all deploy vocabulary of personal hospitality. Luke's repeated use in Acts (18:27; 21:17; 28:30) shows a pattern: the early church's growth is narrated partly through scenes of believers welcoming traveling apostles and teachers. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: having-welcomed, received, to-receive | es: lo-recibió, nos-recibieron, recibiendo | fr: accueillir, recevoir | de: ἀπεδέξαντο, ἀπεδέξατο, ἀπεδέχετο Luke 8:40; Luke 9:11; Acts 18:27; Acts 21:17; Acts 28:30

2. accept, receive (a message) (2×) To accept or receive a message, teaching, or report with intellectual approval or gratitude. The two occurrences mark pivotal moments of audience response: at Pentecost, 'those who received his word were baptized' (Acts 2:41), where apodexamenoi signals wholehearted acceptance of Peter's kerygma; and in Acts 24:3, Tertullus uses apodechometha ('we accept with gratitude') in his flattering opening to Felix. Spanish habiendo recibido / reconocemos and French accueillir shift from physical to cognitive reception. The distinction from sense 1 is clear: here there is no person being hosted — an idea is being embraced. RECEIVING AND TAKING

en: having-received, we-accept | es: habiendo-recibido, reconocemos | fr: accueillir | de: ἀποδεξάμενοι, ἀποδεχόμεθα Acts 2:41; Acts 24:3

ἀποδημ-έω G0589 V-AIA-3S (6×)

To go on a journey, travel to a far country; used almost exclusively in parables of absent masters

A verb meaning to leave one's homeland and travel abroad, built from apo ('away') and demos ('people, district'). In the New Testament it appears almost entirely in Jesus' parables about landlords and masters who depart to distant places, entrusting their property to servants. The vineyard owner 'went on a journey' (Mark 12:1; Matt 21:33), the master distributes talents before traveling (Matt 25:14-15), and the prodigal son departs for a 'far country' (Luke 15:13). Spanish 'partio de viaje' and French 'voyager' capture the sense of deliberate, extended absence.

to go on a journey, to travel abroad (6×) To depart on a journey to a distant place, to travel abroad or go to a far country. The compound apo-demeo (away + people/homeland) implies leaving one's community for an extended period. In the NT it serves as a narrative device in Jesus' parables: the vineyard owner who plants, leases, and 'went away' (Matt 21:33; Mark 12:1) – Spanish 'partio,' French 'voyager'; the master who entrusts talents before his journey (Matt 25:14-15); and the prodigal son who travels to a far country (Luke 15:13). The verb's parabolic usage consistently sets up a scenario of delegated responsibility and eventual reckoning, making the master's absence both a test of faithfulness and a picture of the interval before Christ's return. CONDUCT AND WALKING

en: going-on-a-journey, he-went-away, he-went-on-a-journey | es: partió, partió-de-viaje, que-viaja | fr: voyager | de: ἀπεδήμησεν, ἀποδημῶν Matt 21:33; Matt 25:14; Matt 25:15; Mark 12:1; Luke 15:13

ἀπόδημ-ος G0590 Adj-NMS (1×)

away from home, on a journey; absent from one's country or residence

This adjective describes someone who is away from home, abroad, or on a journey. Mark 13:34 uses it in a parable: 'It is like a man away on a journey, who left his house and gave authority to his servants.' The term emphasizes absence from one's usual residence or homeland. In the parable, the master's absence creates responsibility for servants—they must work faithfully without immediate oversight, knowing he will return. The spiritual application: believers live faithfully during Christ's absence, awaiting His return.

(1×) Jesus's parable of the master 'apodemos'—away on a journey—pictures the church age: Christ has departed (ascension) but will return, and His servants must work faithfully during His absence. Spanish 'de viaje,' French 'en voyage,' German 'verreist,' and English 'away from home' all capture the absent-on-journey sense. The parable's tension comes from uncertain timing: servants don't know when the master returns, so they must maintain constant readiness. Christian eschatology creates similar urgency: Christ is absent but coming; work faithfully until He appears. TRAVEL ABOUT LEAD

en: away-from-home | es: de-viaje | fr: en-voyage | de: verreist Mark 13:34

ἀποδίδωμι G0591 V-FIA-2S (48×)

To give back, repay, render what is due, sell, or yield; covers restitution, debt payment, reward, commercial sale, and agricultural produce.

Built from apo ('back, away') and didomi ('give'), apodidomi carries the fundamental sense of rendering something back to where it belongs. Jesus's famous pronouncement 'Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's' (Matt 22:21) perfectly captures the word's core logic: what you give is already owed. The verb spans a remarkable range — from settling financial debts in the parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt 18:25-34), to God's eschatological recompense (Matt 16:27), to the commercial sale of a birthright (Heb 12:16), to a tree 'yielding' its fruit month by month (Rev 22:2). Spanish distinguishes pagar ('pay a debt') from dar ('give, render') from vender ('sell'), neatly exposing three distinct semantic frames that the Greek verb unifies under the single concept of transferring what is due or expected.

1. reward, recompense, render due (16×) To reward, recompense, or render to someone what is due — whether divine retribution, wages for labor, honor, taxes, or vows. This is the most theologically weighted sense, prominent in Jesus's teaching about the Father who 'will repay you' for secret acts of piety (Matt 6:4, 6, 18) and in the eschatological promise that the Son of Man 'will repay each according to his deeds' (Matt 16:27). Spanish devolver and dar capture the 'giving-back' nuance, while German vergelten selects specifically for requital and retribution. The sense presupposes a moral or covenantal economy where debts of honor must be settled. REPAYING AND RENDERING

en: he-will-repay, let-render, pay | es: cumplirás, dará, devolviendo | fr: rendre | de: gibt-zurück, vergelten Matt 5:33; Matt 6:4; Matt 6:6; Matt 6:18; Matt 16:27

2. repay, pay back a debt (11×) To repay or pay back a financial debt, settling a monetary obligation. Concentrated in the parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt 18:25-34), where the verb appears repeatedly in the desperate refrain 'I will repay you everything.' Spanish pagar ('to pay') and the financial context distinguish this from the broader moral recompense of sense 1. At Matt 5:26, Jesus warns that the debtor will not get out 'until you have paid the last penny' — the verb here carries the full weight of legal financial obligation. REPAYING AND RENDERING

en: I-will-repay, Repay, he-should-repay | es: Paga, con-qué-pagar, pagare | fr: rendre | de: gibt-zurück Matt 5:26; Matt 18:25; Matt 18:26; Matt 18:28

3. give back, return, restore (9×) To give back, return, or restore something to its rightful owner or original state. At Matt 22:21 / Mark 12:17 Jesus says 'Give back to Caesar what is Caesar's' — not merely 'give' but 'return what already belongs.' Luke 4:20 uses it of Jesus 'giving back' the scroll to the synagogue attendant, and Luke 9:42 of Jesus 'giving back' a healed boy to his father. Spanish devolver ('to return an object') precisely marks this restitution sense, while Korean 돌려주다 ('give back by returning') similarly lexicalizes the directionality. REPAYING AND RENDERING

en: Give-back, I-give-back, gave-back | es: Dad, dad, devolved | fr: rendre | de: gibt-zurück, vergelten Matt 22:21; Mark 12:17; Luke 4:20; Luke 9:42; Luke 16:2

4. give, deliver, render account (7×) To give, deliver, or render something required — an account, testimony, or report — to an authority or audience. At Matt 12:36 people will 'give account' for every careless word; at Luke 16:2 the steward must 'render' his account of management; at Acts 4:33 the apostles 'gave' their testimony of the resurrection with great power. Spanish dar cuenta ('give account') and German Rechenschaft geben both use specialized accountability vocabulary, marking this as a distinct discourse-of-obligation sense rather than generic 'giving.' REPAYING AND RENDERING

en: going-to-give, it-to-be-given, they-will-give-account | es: daban, dar, darán | fr: rendre | de: gibt-zurück, vergelten Matt 12:36; Matt 21:41; Matt 27:58; Acts 4:33; Acts 19:40

5. sell, exchange for money (3×) To sell, hand over in a commercial transaction for monetary exchange. At Acts 5:8 Peter asks Sapphira whether the land was 'sold' for a certain price; at Acts 7:9 the patriarchs 'sold' Joseph into Egypt; at Heb 12:16 Esau 'sold' his birthright for a single meal. Spanish vender ('to sell') and the commercial context clearly distinguish this from 'giving back' — here the transfer is commercial, not restitutive. The apo- prefix retains a sense of 'handing over' or 'giving away' what one possessed. REPAYING AND RENDERING

en: gave-up, sold, you-sold | es: vendieron, vendisteis, vendió | fr: rendre | de: gibt-zurück, vergelten Acts 5:8; Acts 7:9; Heb 12:16

6. yield, produce fruit (2×) To yield or produce fruit, crops, or results — a metaphorical extension where the 'giving back' is nature's or effort's return. At Rev 22:2 the tree of life 'yields' its fruit every month, and at Heb 12:11 discipline 'yields' the peaceful fruit of righteousness. Spanish producir and dando ('giving, producing') both select agricultural-yield vocabulary. This sense preserves the root notion of rendering what is due — here, the earth or a process 'repays' with its produce. REPAYING AND RENDERING

en: it-yields, yielding | es: dando, produce | fr: rendre | de: vergelten Heb 12:11; Rev 22:2

ἀποδιορ-ίζω G0592 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

to separate, mark off; to divide or distinguish by setting boundaries

This verb means to mark off boundaries, separate, or distinguish by dividing. Jude 19 uses it to describe false teachers: 'These are the ones who cause divisions, worldly-minded, devoid of the Spirit.' The verb emphasizes creating separations or factions within the community. These divisive persons distinguish themselves from others, creating schisms. The context makes clear this isn't legitimate doctrinal differentiation but destructive factional behavior—they divide the body for selfish advantage, lacking the Spirit who unifies believers.

(1×) Jude's condemnation of those 'apodiorizontes'—causing divisions—targets schismatic persons who fracture Christian unity. Spanish 'que causan divisiones' (who cause divisions), French 'qui se séparent' (who separate themselves), German 'sich Absondernden' (those separating themselves), and English 'dividing' all capture the separating action. These aren't people creating healthy boundaries but factionalists creating destructive schisms. Jude's diagnosis: they're 'psychikoi' (natural, worldly) and 'pneuma me echontes' (not having Spirit)—their divisiveness proves spiritual bankruptcy. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING

en: dividing | es: que-causan-divisiones | fr: qui-se-séparent, | de: sich-Absondernden Jude 1:19

ἀποδοκῐ́μ-άζω G0593 V-AIP-3S (9×)

To reject after testing or examination; to deem unfit, repudiate, or disqualify upon scrutiny.

Built from apo ('away') and dokimazo ('to test, approve'), this verb carries the force of rejection that follows deliberate evaluation—not casual dismissal but a considered verdict of unfitness. Its most prominent NT context is the repeated quotation of Psalm 118:22: 'the stone which the builders rejected has become the cornerstone' (Matt 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17; 1 Pet 2:4, 7). Jesus also uses it of his own suffering, predicting that he must be 'rejected by the elders' (Mark 8:31; Luke 9:22; 17:25). Spanish 'desecharon/rechazado' and French 'rejeter' both emphasize the deliberate casting aside, while the Greek prefix apo- underscores the finality of the verdict.

reject, reject after examination (9×) To reject someone or something after examination, testing, or deliberation—to declare unfit or unworthy and set aside. The term is loaded with professional scrutiny: builders inspecting stones and discarding the unsuitable one (Psalm 118:22, quoted in Matt 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17; 1 Pet 2:4, 7). Jesus uses it of the religious leaders' rejection of himself as Messiah (Mark 8:31; Luke 9:22; 17:25). Hebrews 12:17 applies it to Esau's disqualification. All nine occurrences share the core idea of authoritative repudiation following assessment. REJECTION AND REFUSAL en: having-been-rejected, he-was-rejected, rejected | es: desechada, desecharon, fue-rechazado | fr: rejeter | de: verwerfen, ἀπεδοκίμασαν, ἀποδοκιμασθῆναι Matt 21:42; Mark 8:31; Mark 12:10; Luke 9:22; Luke 17:25

ἀποδοχ-ή G0594 N-GFS (2×)

acceptance, approval, welcoming reception (as worthy of favor)

This noun denotes acceptance or approval, especially the welcoming reception of something as worthy. Paul uses it in two pastoral epistles to emphasize the complete trustworthiness of core Christian teachings: 'the saying is trustworthy and worthy of all acceptance' regarding Christ saving sinners (1 Tim 1:15) and the promise of godliness (1 Tim 4:9). The classical range included receiving back what was one's own, entertaining guests, and gaining favor or approbation—but the New Testament narrows to the sense of accepting truth claims as deserving full endorsement.

(2×) The noun signifies acceptance or approval, particularly of a statement or teaching as trustworthy. In both Timothy passages, Paul pairs ἀποδοχή with 'worthy' (ἄξιος) to emphasize that certain sayings deserve complete acceptance—not mere intellectual assent but wholehearted embrace. The genitive construction ('worthy of all acceptance') shows this is more than passive reception; it's active approval. The multilingual glosses (acceptance, aceptación, Annahme) capture the basic sense, while the classical usage (approbation, favor, εἶναι ἐν τῇ καλλίστῃ ἀποδοχῇ 'to be in highest favor') illuminates the connotation of honoring something as deserving. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: acceptance | es: aceptación | fr: ἀποδοχῆς | de: Annahme 1Tim 1:15; 1Tim 4:9

ἀπόθεσις G0595 N-NFS (2×)

putting off, laying aside, removal (especially of clothing or something worn)

This noun refers to the act of putting off or laying aside something—most concretely clothing, but metaphorically extended to other kinds of removal or resignation. Peter uses it twice in contexts that blend physical and spiritual imagery. In 1 Peter 3:21, baptism is 'not a removal of dirt from the body' but an appeal to God. In 2 Peter 1:14, the apostle speaks of the imminent 'putting off of my tent' (his body/death) as Christ revealed to him. Classical usage included storing things away, exposure of children, even resignation from office—but the New Testament focuses on the metaphor of removing or laying aside what was previously worn or inhabited.

(2×) The noun describes putting off or removal, typically of something worn or inhabited. First Peter 3:21 uses it negatively: baptism is not merely 'putting off bodily dirt' (ἀπόθεσις ῥύπου σαρκός) but covenant appeal to God—the physical act of washing is not the point. Second Peter 1:14 shifts to metaphor: 'the putting off of my tent' uses the noun for Peter's approaching death, viewing the body as a temporary dwelling to be laid aside. The domain assignment (Activities Involving Clothing) captures the core physical sense, while the multilingual evidence (Spanish despojamiento 'stripping off', German Ablegung 'laying down') reflects both literal and metaphorical removal. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: putting-off | es: depósito, despojamiento | fr: ἀπόθεσις | de: Ablegung 1Pet 3:21; 2Pet 1:14

ἀπο-θήκη G0596 N-NFS (6×)

A storehouse or barn for storing harvested grain; used figuratively of God's eschatological gathering or provision.

In the ancient Mediterranean world, the apotheke was the essential destination of every harvest – the barn or granary where grain was safely stored. Jesus draws on this familiar image in strikingly different ways: to reassure anxious disciples that God feeds the birds without any barns at all (Matt 6:26; Luke 12:24), to picture the final separation of wheat and chaff (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17), and to dramatize the folly of the rich man who builds bigger barns while ignoring his soul (Luke 12:18). The word thus bridges the everyday agricultural world and the theology of divine provision and judgment.

storehouse, barn, granary (6×) A structure for storing harvested grain or agricultural produce – a barn, granary, or storehouse. Cross-lingual glosses confirm the agricultural specificity: Spanish 'granero' (grain-store), French 'grange' (barn), English 'barn/barns.' In every NT occurrence the image serves a theological point: God's care surpassing barns (Matt 6:26), eschatological gathering of wheat into the storehouse (Matt 3:12; Matt 13:30), or the rich fool's misplaced trust in storage (Luke 12:18). STOREHOUSE GRANARY

en: a-barn, barn, barns | es: granero, graneros | fr: grange | de: ἀποθήκας, ἀποθήκας–, ἀποθήκη Matt 3:12; Matt 6:26; Matt 13:30; Luke 3:17; Luke 12:18

ἀποθησαυρ-ίζω G0597 V-PPA-AMP (1×)

to store up, treasure up; to accumulate or lay up resources for future use

This verb means to store up, lay up treasure, or accumulate for the future. Paul uses it metaphorically in 1 Timothy 6:19: the generous rich are 'storing up for themselves a good foundation for the future.' The context addresses right use of wealth—generosity in this age becomes treasure in the age to come. The verb combines the ideas of accumulation and preservation: storing up resources that will be available later. Kingdom economics invert worldly logic: you store up by giving away.

(1×) Paul's paradox that generous giving means 'apothesaurizontas'—storing up treasure—reflects Jesus's teaching about treasures in heaven. Spanish 'atesorando,' French transcription, German 'einen Schatz sammeln' (gathering treasure), and English 'storing up' all preserve the accumulation sense. The rich who give generously don't lose wealth; they transfer it to secure heavenly accounts. Earthly hoarding proves ultimately foolish (you can't keep it); heavenly storing through earthly giving proves ultimately wise (eternal security). Generosity isn't loss but investment. ASCENDING MOVEMENT

en: storing-up | es: atesorando | fr: ἀποθησαυρίζοντας | de: einen-Schatz-sammeln 1Tim 6:19

ἀπο-θλίβω G0598 V-PIA-3P (1×)

to press upon, crowd; to squeeze or compress by pressing against

This verb means to press upon, crowd against, or compress through squeezing. Luke 8:45 records the disciples' response when Jesus asked who touched Him: 'The crowds surround and press upon You.' The verb emphasizes the pressure of bodies crowding against Jesus in a packed space. This wasn't gentle touching but the inevitable jostling of dense crowds. The contrast between deliberate faith-touch (the woman with bleeding) and unconscious crowd-pressing highlights Jesus's awareness of spiritual contact amid physical compression.

(1×) The crowds 'apothlibousin'—pressing upon Jesus—create the context for His question 'Who touched me?' The disciples found the question absurd: countless people were jostling against Him. Spanish 'te oprimen' (they press you), French 'presser,' and English 'crowd/press' all capture the compression sense, while German transcribes the Greek. But Jesus distinguished between crowd pressure (mere physical contact) and faith-touch (spiritual connection that drew power). Many pressed; one touched. Physical proximity doesn't equal spiritual connection. AFFLICTION DISTRESS

en: crowd | es: te-oprimen | fr: presser | de: ἀποθλίβουσιν Luke 8:45

ἀποθνήσκω G0599 V-PPA-NMP (112×)

To die; of physical death (natural, violent, judicial) or figurative/spiritual death (dying to sin, the law, or self)

An intensified form of the root 'to die' (thnēskō), apothnēskō is the standard New Testament verb for death in all its dimensions. Most of its 112 occurrences describe ordinary physical death — people, animals, even a grain of wheat falling to the ground. But Paul transforms the word into a theological tool: believers 'die to sin' in baptism (Rom 6:2), 'die to the law' to live for God (Gal 2:19), and 'die with Christ' to share in resurrection. The multilingual evidence is telling — Spanish morimos and German sterben remain identical across both literal and figurative uses, reflecting how Paul deliberately exploits the shock of applying death-language to spiritual transformation.

1. die physically (101×) Physical death — the cessation of bodily life, whether natural, violent, or judicial. Spans the full range from narrative death scenes (Matt 8:32, the swine; Mark 9:26, an apparent death) to solemn declarations about martyrdom (Matt 26:35, 'even if I must die with you'). Rendered consistently across languages (spa: murió, fra: mourir, deu: sterben), confirming the default, unmarked sense across 101 occurrences. DEATH AND CORPSES

en: Died, He-died, died | es: murió | fr: mourir | de: sterben, stirbt Matt 8:32; Matt 26:35; Mark 9:26; Mark 12:21; Mark 12:22

2. die figuratively/spiritually (11×) Figurative or spiritual death — dying to sin, to the law, or to the old self, especially in Pauline theology. Romans 6:2 asks 'How shall we who died to sin still live in it?' while Romans 6:8 proclaims 'if we died with Christ, we believe we shall also live with him.' The identical translation forms across languages (spa: morimos/morí, deu: sterben) show that Paul relies on the literal verb to carry metaphorical weight — no special 'spiritual death' vocabulary is invented. DEATH AND CORPSES

en: died, we-die, we-died | es: morimos, morí, morísteis | fr: mourir | de: sterben John 11:16; Rom 6:2; Rom 6:8; Rom 7:9; Rom 14:8

ἀποκαθίστημι G0600 V-ASP-1S (8×)

To restore to a former condition; to re-establish, heal, or return something to its original state.

A triple-compound verb (ἀπό + κατά + ἵστημι) meaning to set something back to where it stood before. In the Gospels, it appears most vividly in healing narratives — the withered hand restored to wholeness (Matt 12:13; Mark 3:5; Luke 6:10) and the blind man's sight restored at Bethsaida (Mark 8:25). But it also carries an eschatological dimension: the disciples ask whether Jesus will 'restore' the kingdom to Israel (Acts 1:6), and Jesus teaches that Elijah comes first to 'restore all things' (Matt 17:11; Mark 9:12). Spanish 'restaurar' and French 'rétablir' both preserve the sense of returning to an original, intended state.

restore to a former state (8×) To restore something or someone to a previous, proper condition — whether physical healing or eschatological re-establishment. The healing miracles show instantaneous bodily restoration: a hand 'was restored' healthy as the other (Mark 3:5), and sight 'was restored' so that the man saw everything clearly (Mark 8:25). The prophetic-eschatological use envisions cosmic restoration: Elijah 'restores all things' (Matt 17:11), and the disciples wonder about restoring the kingdom (Acts 1:6). Spanish 'fue restaurada' and German 'wiederherstellen' both reflect this return-to-wholeness meaning. RENEW REPAIR RESTORE

en: I-may-be-restored, it-was-restored, restores | es: fue-restaurada, fue-restaurado, os-sea-restituido | fr: rétablir | de: wiederherstellen, ἀπεκατεστάθη, ἀποκαθιστάνεις Matt 12:13; Matt 17:11; Mark 3:5; Mark 8:25; Mark 9:12

ἀπο-κάλύπτω G0601 V-AIP-3S (26×)

To reveal, uncover, or disclose what was hidden – especially of God making known divine truth, glory, or eschatological realities

Built from 'apo' (away) and 'kalypto' (to cover), this verb literally means 'to uncover' and becomes one of the New Testament's great theological terms. In its passive forms, divine realities 'are revealed' – the Son of Man will be revealed (Luke 17:30), God's wrath is revealed (Rom 1:18), and what is hidden will come to light (Matt 10:26, Luke 12:2). In its active uses, God is the revealer: Jesus thanks the Father for revealing truth to the simple (Matt 11:25, Luke 10:21), and the Spirit searches and reveals the deep things of God (1 Cor 2:10). Spanish 'revelar,' French 'reveler,' and German 'offenbaren' consistently translate both voices, reflecting the theological weight this word carries across Christian tradition.

1. be revealed, come to light (passive) (21×) To be revealed, uncovered, or brought to light (passive/divine passive), of hidden truths, eschatological realities, divine wrath, or glory being made manifest. Often a 'theological passive' where God is the implied agent. Nothing covered will remain hidden (Matt 10:26, Luke 12:2), the glory of the Lord will be revealed (Rom 8:18), and the man of lawlessness will be revealed in the last days (2 Thess 2:3). Translations uniformly use passive constructions: 'es revelado' (spa), 'est revele' (fra), 'offenbart wird' (deu). REVEALING AND DISCLOSING
en: is-being-revealed, is-revealed, it-is-revealed | es: a-ser-revelada, es-revelada, es-revelado | fr: révéler | de: offenbaren, offenbart Matt 10:26; Matt 11:27; Luke 2:35; Luke 10:22; Luke 12:2

2. reveal, disclose (active) (5×) To actively reveal or disclose something previously hidden, with God or the Spirit as the explicit subject making known divine truths to chosen recipients. Jesus praises the Father for revealing to infants what was hidden from the wise (Matt 11:25, Luke 10:21), Peter's confession comes by divine revelation (Matt 16:17), and the Spirit reveals the deep things of God (1 Cor 2:10). Spanish distinguishes active 'revelaste' (you revealed) from the passive forms of sense 1, confirming the voice distinction. REVEALING AND DISCLOSING en: revealed, will-reveal | es: las-revelaste, revelará, revelaste | fr: révéler | de: offenbaren, offenbart Matt 11:25; Matt 16:17; Luke 10:21; 1Cor 2:10; Phil 3:15

ἀπο-κάλυψις G0602 N-DFS (18×)

Revelation, disclosure — the divine unveiling of hidden truth or eschatological reality

From apo ('away') and kalypsis ('covering'), this noun denotes the uncovering of what was concealed — divine truth, a person's true nature, or end-time events. Simeon calls the infant Jesus 'a light for revelation to the Gentiles' (Luke 2:32). Paul uses it for the disclosure of God's mystery kept secret through the ages (Rom 16:25) and for the future revealing of Christ and the sons of God (Rom 8:19; 1 Cor 1:7). It also titles the final book of Scripture. French 'révélation' and German 'Offenbarung' both capture the sense of making openly known what was previously hidden.

revelation, disclosure, unveiling (18×) The act or event of divine disclosure — the unveiling of what was previously hidden, whether a specific spiritual truth, a person's identity, or eschatological realities. Paul employs it for the mystery of the gospel now revealed (Rom 16:25; Eph 3:3), for the future manifestation of Christ and believers (Rom 8:19; 1 Cor 1:7; 2 Thess 1:7), and for prophetic insight granted in worship (1 Cor 14:6, 26). Luke 2:32 applies it to Christ as light disclosed to the nations. REVELATION MANIFESTATION en: Revelation, a-revelation, of-revelation | es: Revelación, de-revelación, revelaciones | fr: révélation | de: Offenbarung, ἀποκάλυψιν Luke 2:32; Rom 2:5; Rom 8:19; Rom 16:25; 1Cor 1:7

ἀποκᾰρᾱδοκ-ία G0603 N-NFS (2×)

eager expectation, intense longing, anxious anticipation (stretching forward to see)

This vivid compound noun (literally 'watching from the head' or 'craning the neck') captures eager, intense expectation—the posture of someone straining forward, head extended, to catch sight of what is coming. Paul coins or adopts this rare term to express the creation's yearning for redemption (Rom 8:19) and his own expectant hope that Christ will be magnified whether by life or death (Phil 1:20). The etymology evokes physical anticipation made visible: head thrust forward, watching intently. Translations consistently emphasize intensity: Spanish anhelante-expectación 'panting expectation', German sehnliches-Warten 'longing waiting', French attente-ardente 'burning expectation'.

(2×) The noun denotes eager, intense expectation or longing, with vivid physical imagery baked into its etymology (ἀπό 'from' + κάρα 'head' + δοκέω 'watch'). Romans 8:19 personifies creation itself as engaged in ἀποκαραδοκία, 'eagerly expecting the revelation of God's sons'—the whole cosmos pictured as craning its neck toward redemption. Philippians 1:20 applies it to Paul's personal hope: his eager expectation (ἀποκαραδοκία) that Christ will be exalted in his body. The multilingual evidence beautifully captures the intensity: Spanish anhelante (from anhelo 'yearning/panting'), German sehnlich (from Sehnsucht 'longing'), French ardente (from ardeur 'burning passion')—all point beyond mere hope to passionate, embodied anticipation. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14003 WITH 3 SENSES
en: eager-expectation | es: anhelante-expectación, intensa-expectación | fr: attente, attente-ardente | de: sehnliches-Warten Rom 8:19; Phil 1:20

ἀποκαταλλάσσω G0604 V-AIA-3S (3×)

reconcile, restore to harmony; to bring into peaceful relationship after estrangement

This compound verb intensifies the idea of reconciliation, bringing enemies or those estranged into harmony. Paul uses it exclusively in describing Christ's cosmic reconciling work. Ephesians 2:16 speaks of reconciling both Jew and Gentile to God in one body through the cross. Colossians 1:20 proclaims God's purpose to 'reconcile all things to himself' through Christ's blood. Colossians 1:22 applies this personally: 'Yet now he has reconciled you' in Christ's physical body through death. The prefix ἀπο- may intensify the idea of complete restoration.

(3×) Exclusively describes Christ's reconciling work in Paul's prison epistles. Ephesians 2:16 declares Christ's purpose to 'reconcile' (ἀποκαταλλάξῃ) both groups to God through the cross, abolishing hostility. Colossians 1:20 announces God's intention to 'reconcile' (ἀποκαταλλάξαι) all things—cosmic scope. Colossians 1:22 personalizes this: Christ 'has reconciled' (ἀποκατήλλαξεν) you through his bodily death. The German 'versoehnen' and Spanish 'reconciliar' capture the restoration of broken relationship through Christ's atoning work. RECONCILIATION en: he-reconciled, might-reconcile, to-reconcile | es: reconciliar, reconcilie, reconcilió | fr: ἀποκατήλλαξεν, ἀποκαταλλάξαι, ἀποκαταλλάξῃ | de: versoehnen Eph 2:16; Col 1:20; Col 1:22

ἀποκατά-στᾰσις G0605 N-GFS (1×)

restoration, reestablishment; the act of returning something to its original state

This noun denotes restoration, reestablishment, or return to an original condition. Classical Greek used it for recovery from illness, return to former position, or astronomical recurrence. Peter uses it in Acts 3:21 regarding Christ: 'whom heaven must receive until the times of restoration of all things.' The term points to eschatological renewal when Christ returns—not just return to Eden but the establishment of new heavens and new earth. Restoration involves both return to original design and fulfillment of intended purpose.

(1×) The 'apokatastasis' of all things awaits Christ's return—comprehensive restoration that exceeds even prelapsarian perfection. Spanish 'de restauración,' French 'restauration,' and German transcription all preserve the restoration sense, while English gives 'of restoration.' Peter's phrase 'of all things' suggests cosmic scope: not merely individual redemption but renewal of all creation. This isn't universalism (as some have misread it) but the biblical hope of new creation—restoration that fulfills God's original creational intent, bringing creation to its designed telos. RENEW REPAIR RESTORE en: of-restoration | es: de-restauración | fr: restauration | de: ἀποκαταστάσεως Acts 3:21

ἀπόκειμαι G0606 V-PPM/P-AFS (4×)

to be laid away, stored up, reserved; to be appointed or destined Functioning as the passive of 'lay aside,' this verb describes something stored away for future use or assigned by destiny. Its NT range is striking: a mina wrapped in a cloth (Luke 19:20), the hope laid up in heaven (Col 1:5), the crown of righteousness reserved for Paul (2 Tim 4:8), and the divine appointment of death for all humanity (Heb 9:27). Spanish distinguishes 'reservada/reservado' for the stored-treasure sense from 'guardada' for safekeeping, while French 'réservé' covers both reservation and destiny.

(4×) To be laid up in store, reserved, or destined for a future purpose or appointed outcome. In Luke 19:20, the servant kept his mina 'laid away' in a cloth — simple physical storage. Colossians 1:5 and 2 Timothy 4:8 elevate the image to eschatological hope and reward 'laid up' or 'reserved' in heaven. Hebrews 9:27 shifts to divine appointment: it is 'laid up' for people to die once. Spanish 'reservado/guardada' and French 'réservé' confirm this dual sense of safekeeping and destined allocation across all four contexts. RECLINING AND LYING en: being-laid-up, is-laid-up, it-is-appointed | es: está-reservada, está-reservado, guardada | fr: réservé | de: aufbewahrt, ἀποκειμένην Luke 19:20; Col 1:5; 2Tim 4:8; Heb 9:27

ἀποκεφᾰλ-ίζω G0607 V-AIA-1S (4×)

to behead; to execute by cutting off the head

A grimly specific verb meaning to cut off someone's head, used in the NT exclusively for the execution of John the Baptist. All four occurrences cluster around the same event narrated across the Synoptic Gospels (Matt 14:10; Mark 6:16, 27; Luke 9:9). Herod's guilty conscience surfaces in Mark 6:16 and Luke 9:9 when he says 'John, whom I beheaded.' Spanish uses both 'decapitó' and 'degolló' (throat-cutting), revealing how translators distinguish clinical decapitation from butchery.

(4×) To execute by decapitation, cutting off the head. Every NT instance refers to Herod Antipas's execution of John the Baptist: the act itself (Matt 14:10; Mark 6:27) and Herod's haunted retrospective confession (Mark 6:16; Luke 9:9). The aorist forms emphasize the completed, irreversible act. Spanish 'decapitó' follows the Latin clinical term while 'degolló' (to cut the throat) adds visceral brutality. French 'décapiter' and German transliterations of the Greek form confirm the narrow, unambiguous semantic range of this verb. KILLING AND REMOVING

en: beheaded, he-beheaded | es: decapité, decapitó, degolló | fr: décapiter | de: ἀπεκεφάλισα, ἀπεκεφάλισεν Matt 14:10; Mark 6:16; Mark 6:27; Luke 9:9

ἀποκλείω G0608 V-ASA-3S (1×)

to shut off, lock out; to close and exclude from access

This verb means to shut off, close, or lock someone out from access. Classical usage included shutting city gates, excluding people from places, or locking doors. Luke 13:25 uses it in Jesus's sobering parable: when the master of the house 'shuts the door,' excluded persons will plead for entry but be rejected. The verb emphasizes finality—once shut, the door stays shut. The eschatological warning is stark: opportunity for entering God's kingdom doesn't remain open indefinitely; when the door closes, it's too late.

(1×) Jesus's warning about the master who 'apokleisē' the door confronts presumption: some who assumed they'd enter will find themselves shut out. Spanish 'cierre,' French 'fermer,' and English 'shuts' all capture the closing action, while German transcribes the aorist subjunctive. The subjunctive mood makes this conditional: 'when the master shuts,' not 'if.' The parable's terror comes from finality—once shut, the door doesn't reopen despite desperate pleas. Present opportunity demands decisive response; future crisis allows none. SHUTTING AND CLOSING

en: shuts | es: cierre | fr: fermer | de: ἀποκλείσῃ Luke 13:25

ἀπο-κόπτω G0609 V-FIM-3P (6×)

To cut off or sever physically; in the middle voice, to mutilate or castrate oneself. Used literally of amputation and figuratively of drastic self-exclusion.

A verb of violent severance. In its most common usage it describes cutting something off with a blade — Peter slashing off an ear in Gethsemane (John 18:10, 18:26), Jesus's hyperbolic command to cut off a hand or foot that causes stumbling (Mark 9:43, 45), and sailors cutting away ropes to release the ship's boat (Acts 27:32). The Spanish glosses (cortaron, córtala) capture this sharp, decisive action. But in Galatians 5:12, Paul deploys the middle voice with biting sarcasm, wishing the circumcision agitators would go the whole way and castrate themselves — a rare rhetorical shock that the Spanish 'se mutilaran' translates with appropriate reflexive force.

1. cut off, sever (5×) Physical cutting off or severing with a sharp instrument. Covers the majority of occurrences: the severing of the high priest's servant's ear (John 18:10, 18:26), Jesus's radical hyperbole about cutting off a stumbling hand or foot (Mark 9:43, 45), and the practical act of cutting ship ropes loose (Acts 27:32). The Spanish 'cortaron/córtala' and German 'abschneiden' consistently render this straightforward physical action. CUTTING AND SEVERING

en: cut-away, cut-off | es: cortaron, cortó, córtala | fr: couper | de: abschneiden, ἀπέκοψαν Mark 9:43; Mark 9:45; John 18:10; John 18:26; Acts 27:32

2. mutilate oneself, castrate (1×) Middle-voice reflexive: to mutilate or castrate oneself. Appearing only in Galatians 5:12, Paul sarcastically wishes the Judaizers who demand circumcision would 'cut themselves off' entirely. The middle voice signals self-directed action, and the Spanish 'se mutilaran' preserves the reflexive force. Ancient readers would have heard an unmistakable allusion to the self-castration practiced by devotees of Cybele — making Paul's rhetoric both culturally loaded and theologically pointed. CUTTING AND SEVERING

en: they-will-cut-off | es: se-mutilaran | fr: couper | de: abschneiden Gal 5:12

ἀπόκρῐμα G0610 N-ANS (1×)

sentence, official decision; a judicial verdict or authoritative answer

This noun denotes a formal sentence, judicial decision, or official answer—particularly responses given by authorities or emperors. In classical Greek it could refer to judicial condemnations or imperial rescripts. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 1:9: 'we had the sentence of death within ourselves.' The context describes extreme affliction in Asia—Paul felt he had received a death sentence, either from authorities or from circumstances so dire that death seemed decreed. The term emphasizes official, authoritative pronouncement rather than mere opinion.

(1×) Paul's experience of having 'apokrima' of death within himself describes facing what seemed like an official death sentence—whether literal legal condemnation or metaphorical certainty of death from overwhelming circumstances. Spanish 'sentencia,' French 'jugement,' German 'Antwort' (answer), and English 'sentence' all reflect the official decision sense. The purpose of this near-death experience: 'that we might not trust in ourselves but in God who raises the dead.' Extreme crisis drove Paul beyond self-reliance to resurrection-hope. God engineers circumstances that shatter human confidence and build divine dependence. JUDGMENT AND VERDICT

en: sentence | es: sentencia | fr: jugement | de: Antwort 2Cor 1:9

ἀποκρίνω G0611 V-APP-NMS (232×)

To answer, respond, reply; to give a verbal response, often introducing direct speech in narrative

The verb apokrinomai appears 232 times in the New Testament, almost always in participial form (apokritheis, 'having answered') to introduce direct speech. While classical Greek used it for formal judicial or deliberative responses, New Testament usage follows a Hebraistic pattern where 'answering' can introduce speech even without a prior question, simply meaning 'to begin speaking in response to a situation' (Matt 11:25). It is the backbone of Gospel dialogue, structuring conversations between Jesus and his disciples, opponents, and crowds. Translations universally render it with their standard reply-verb: Spanish respondiendo, French repondre, German antwortet.

answer or respond verbally (232×) To give a verbal reply or response to a question, statement, or situation, frequently employed as a participial narrative formula (apokritheis, 'having answered') to introduce direct speech in the Gospels. Follows a Hebraistic pattern where responding does not require a prior question but marks the beginning of speech in a dialogical context (Matt 3:15; 11:25). Spanish respondiendo and German antwortet confirm the uniform verbal-reply reading across all translation traditions. ANSWERING AND TESTIFYING

en: Answering, answering, having-answered | es: Respondiendo, habiendo-respondido, respondiendo | fr: répondre | de: antwortet Matt 3:15; Matt 4:4; Matt 8:8; Matt 11:4; Matt 11:25

ἄπο-κρῐ́σις G0612 N-AFS (4×)

an answer, reply, response given to a question or challenge

In classical Greek this noun could mean separation, secretion, or even a type of dance, but the NT uses it strictly in the sense of a verbal reply or response. The boy Jesus astonished teachers with his answers in the temple (Luke 2:47). In Luke 20:26, opponents fell silent, unable to catch Jesus in his answer. John 1:22 records the delegation pressing the Baptist for a definitive answer about his identity. Spanish 'respuesta' and French 'réponse' uniformly confirm the conversational-reply meaning throughout.

(4×) A verbal answer or reply given in response to a question, challenge, or inquiry. In Luke 2:47, the twelve-year-old Jesus amazes the temple teachers with the quality of his answers. Luke 20:26 describes opponents silenced by Jesus's skillful response to the tribute-money trap. John 1:22 records the priests demanding a definitive answer from John the Baptist about his identity, while John 19:9 notes Jesus's refusal to give Pilate any answer. Spanish 'respuesta,' French 'réponse,' and German 'Antwort' all consistently render this as a direct conversational reply. ANSWER RESPONSE REPLY

en: answer, answers | es: respuesta, respuestas | fr: réponse | de: Antwort, ἀποκρίσει, ἀποκρίσεσιν Luke 2:47; Luke 20:26; John 1:22; John 19:9

ἀποκρύπτω G0613 V-AIA-2S (4×)

to hide, conceal; to keep secret from understanding or discovery

Meaning to hide or keep concealed, this verb in the NT carries a theological weight: divine truths hidden according to God's sovereign purpose. Jesus praises the Father for hiding kingdom realities from the wise and revealing them to infants (Luke 10:21). Paul speaks of God's wisdom hidden before the ages (1 Cor 2:7) and the mystery hidden for ages in God (Eph 3:9; Col 1:26). Spanish 'escondido/escondiste' and French 'cacher' confirm the concealment idea, while the perfect passive forms stress that the hiding was deliberate and long-standing.

(4×) To hide, conceal, or keep secret, especially divine truths concealed by God's deliberate purpose until the appointed time of revelation. In Luke 10:21, Jesus thanks the Father for hiding these things from the wise — Spanish 'escondiste' captures the direct second-person address. The three Pauline uses (1 Cor 2:7; Eph 3:9; Col 1:26) employ perfect passive participles to describe God's wisdom or mystery as having been hidden for ages and generations, now finally disclosed. French 'cacher' and the consistent 'escondido' across Spanish renderings confirm the uniform concealment sense. HIDING AND CONCEALING

en: having-been-hidden, you-hid | es: escondida, escondido, escondiste | fr: cacher | de: ἀπέκρυψας, ἀποκεκρυμμένην, ἀποκεκρυμμένον Luke 10:21; 1Cor 2:7; Eph 3:9; Col 1:26

ἀπόκρῠφος G0614 Adj-NMP (3×)

hidden, secret, concealed; not visible or known

This adjective describes what is hidden or kept secret. Jesus teaches that nothing is 'hidden' except to be revealed, nor secret except to come to light (Mark 4:22; Luke 8:17). Paul speaks of Christ, in whom are 'hidden' all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col 2:3). The word can denote physical concealment or the deeper hiddenness of divine mysteries now being unveiled. The tension between present hiddenness and future revelation is central to its NT usage.

(3×) Describes what is presently concealed but destined for revelation. Mark 4:22 and Luke 8:17 use identical phrasing: nothing is 'hidden' (ἀπόκρυφον) except to be manifested. Colossians 2:3 speaks of hidden treasures: in Christ 'are hidden' (ἀπόκρυφοι) all wisdom's and knowledge's treasures. The paradox of concealment serving ultimate disclosure appears across these texts. The French 'caché' and Spanish 'escondido' convey the state of being out of sight, whether temporarily or awaiting divine unveiling. HIDING AND CONCEALING

en: hidden, secret | es: escondido, escondidos | fr: caché | de: ἀπόκρυφοι, ἀπόκρυφον Mark 4:22; Luke 8:17; Col 2:3

ἀποκτείνω G0615 V-AIA-3S (74×)

To kill or put to death; in passive forms, to be killed, slain, or martyred.

One of the New Testament's primary verbs for lethal violence, apokteinō covers the full spectrum from murder to judicial execution to prophetic martyrdom. Jesus warned disciples not to fear those who kill the body (Matt 10:28), and He repeatedly predicted that He would be killed and rise again (Matt 17:23; Mark 8:31). The passive forms carry particular theological weight in the Passion predictions and in Revelation's depiction of faithful witnesses slain for their testimony. Translations across languages consistently distinguish active killing from passive being-killed: Spanish 'matar/ser muerto,' German 'töten/getötet werden.'

1. kill, put to death (60×) To cause the death of a person or animal by violent, judicial, or hostile action — the active sense of killing or slaying. This dominant sense (60 occurrences) encompasses murder, execution, and prophetic violence. Multilingual glosses uniformly use active killing verbs: Spanish 'matar/mataron,' French 'tuer,' German 'töten.' Key passages include Jesus' teaching on fearless witness (Matt 10:28), the vineyard tenants killing the owner's servants (Matt 21:35), and Herod's desire to kill John the Baptist (Matt 14:5). KILLING AND REMOVING

en: killed, they-killed, they-will-kill | es: matar, mataron, matarán | fr: tuer | de: toeten, tötet Matt 10:28; Matt 14:5; Matt 17:23; Matt 21:35

2. be killed, be put to death (14×) To suffer death at another's hands — the passive experience of being slain, executed, or martyred. Across 14 occurrences, the passive forms carry deep christological and martyrological significance. Spanish distinguishes this clearly as 'ser muerto/fue muerto.' The triple Passion prediction in the Synoptics uses this form: 'the Son of Man must be killed' (Mark 8:31; 9:31; Luke 9:22), and Revelation honors Antipas as a faithful witness 'who was killed among you' (Rev 2:13). KILLING AND REMOVING en: be-killed, being-killed, to-be-killed | es: de-ser-muerto, fue-muerto, fueron-muertos | fr: tuer | de: toeten, tötet Matt 16:21; Mark 8:31; Mark 9:31; Luke 9:22; Rev 2:13

ἀποκῠ́-έω G0616 V-PIA-3S (2×)

to give birth, bring forth offspring or produce results

This verb describes the act of giving birth or bringing something forth. In James, it appears in both literal biological context (sin giving birth to death) and metaphorical spiritual context (God bringing forth believers through the word of truth). The multilingual evidence shows consistent rendering as birth/generation language across Romance and Germanic languages, reflecting the term's foundation in biological reproduction applied theologically.

(2×) Used metaphorically in James 1:15 where sin 'brings forth' death, and literally in 1:18 where God 'gave birth to' believers through the word. The Greek middle/passive forms suggest both active birthing and being born, mirroring the dual biological process. Cross-linguistic glosses uniformly employ birth/generation terminology (Spanish 'engendra', German 'gebären'), confirming the physiological semantic core. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: brings-forth, he-gave-birth-to | es: engendra, nos-engendró | fr: ἀπεκύησεν, ἀποκύει | de: gebaeren Jas 1:15; Jas 1:18

ἀπο-κῠλίω G0617 V-AIA-3S (4×)

to roll away, roll back (a stone from a tomb entrance)

A simple but unforgettable verb: to roll something away. Every NT occurrence describes the removal of the stone sealing Jesus's tomb on resurrection morning. Matthew 28:2 attributes the rolling away to an angel, Mark 16:3-4 records the women's anxious question 'Who will roll away the stone?' followed by the discovery that it had already been rolled back, and Luke 24:2 simply notes they found the stone rolled away. Spanish 'rodada/rodará' and French 'rouler' both preserve the rolling motion central to the resurrection narrative.

(4×) To roll away or roll back a heavy object, used exclusively in the NT for removing the stone from Jesus's burial tomb on Easter morning. The angel rolled it away (Matt 28:2), the women worried about who would roll it for them (Mark 16:3), they found it already rolled back (Mark 16:4; Luke 24:2). The verb's perfect passive forms in Mark 16:4 and Luke 24:2 emphasize the completed state — the stone was already gone. Spanish 'rodada' and French 'rouler' capture the physical rolling action that became one of the most iconic images of the resurrection. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14787 WITH 3 SENSES

en: has-been-rolled-away, having-been-rolled-away, rolled-away | es: ha-sido-rodada, rodada, rodará | fr: rouler | de: ἀπεκύλισεν, ἀποκεκυλισμένον, ἀποκεκύλισται Matt 28:2; Mark 16:3; Mark 16:4; Luke 24:2

ἀπολαμβάνω G0618 V-PIA-1P (10×)

To receive or obtain; receive back what was lost or owed; take aside physically

At its core, this verb means to receive from another, but context determines whether something is newly obtained or recovered. In Luke 16:25, Abraham tells the rich man he 'received' his good things in life – a first-time receipt. But in Luke 15:27, the father 'received back' his prodigal son safe and sound, emphasizing restoration. Spanish consistently uses 'recibir' for both senses, while the one surprising usage in Mark 7:33 – where Jesus 'took aside' a deaf man from the crowd – shifts the word entirely from economic exchange to physical gesture. The multilingual evidence shows French and German similarly flatten the distinction between receiving and recovering, making the Greek nuance worth noting.

1. receive, obtain (7×) To receive or obtain something – a reward, promise, or recompense – without implying prior possession. Used broadly of receiving wages, blessings, or consequences. In Luke 16:25, Abraham reminds the rich man he received his good things; in Gal 4:5, believers receive adoption as sons. Spanish 'recibamos' and German 'empfangen' both treat this as straightforward reception, confirming the unmarked, default sense. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: receiving-back, we-are-receiving, we-might-receive | es: reciba, recibamos, recibiendo | fr: recevoir | de: empfangen, ἀπέλαβες, ἀπολάβῃ Luke 16:25; Luke 18:30; Luke 23:41; Rom 1:27; Gal 4:5

2. receive back, recover (2×) To receive back or recover something or someone previously possessed, lost, or lent, emphasizing restoration. In the parable of the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:27), the father 'received back' his son alive, and in Luke 6:34, lenders expect to 'receive back' the same amount. Spanish 'recibio' does not distinguish this from Sense 1, but the Greek prefix ἀπο- combined with context of prior loss marks the recovery nuance clearly. RECEIVING AND TAKING

en: he-received-back, they-might-receive-back | es: reciban, recibió | fr: recevoir | de: ἀπέλαβεν, ἀπολάβωσιν Luke 6:34; Luke 15:27

3. take aside, take hold of (1×) To take someone aside physically, implying active initiative rather than passive reception. In Mark 7:33 Jesus 'took' the deaf man aside from the crowd before healing him. Spanish renders this 'habiéndolo tomado aparte,' capturing the physical separation that sets this sense apart from the economic exchange senses. Only one NT occurrence, but the semantic shift from receiving to actively taking is significant. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: taking | es: habiéndolo-tomado-aparte | fr: recevoir | de: empfangen Mark 7:33

ἀπό-λαυσις G0619 N-AFS (2×)

enjoyment, the experience or result of enjoying something

A noun denoting the act of enjoying or the pleasure derived from something. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy 6:17 to describe God's provision of all things for our enjoyment, while Hebrews 11:25 speaks of Moses refusing the fleeting enjoyment of sin. The classical range includes both the activity of enjoying and the concrete benefit received. All four languages represented (English, Spanish, French, German) converge on enjoyment/pleasure terminology, with German and French both using 'Genuss'.

(2×) Appears in contexts contrasting earthly pleasures (1 Tim 6:17 - legitimate enjoyment of God's gifts; Heb 11:25 - temporary pleasure of sin). The term carries no inherent moral judgment; context determines whether the enjoyment is proper or improper. Classical Greek uses it for advantage or fruit gained from something, which fits Paul's emphasis on God richly providing things for our benefit. DELIGHT PLEASURE

en: enjoyment | es: disfrute | fr: Genuss | de: Genuss 1Tim 6:17; Heb 11:25

ἀπο-λείπω G0620 V-APA-AMP (7×)

To leave behind, forsake, abandon; intransitively: to remain, be left over, still exist.

Apoleipo is a compound of apo- ('away from') and leipo ('leave'), yielding a verb with two clearly opposed senses depending on voice. In its active, transitive use, it means to leave something or someone behind — Paul left his cloak at Troas (2 Tim 4:13), left Trophimus sick at Miletus (2 Tim 4:20), and left Titus in Crete to set things in order (Titus 1:5). Jude speaks of angels who 'left' their proper dwelling (Jude 1:6). But in the intransitive middle-passive, the meaning flips: something 'remains' or 'is left over.' The author of Hebrews uses this sense to argue that a sabbath rest 'remains' for God's people (Heb 4:9) and that no sacrifice 'remains' for deliberate sinners (Heb 10:26). Spanish captures this split neatly — dejé/abandonaron for the transitive, queda for the intransitive — while Hindi distinguishes छोड़ दिया (left behind) from बचती है / रह जाता है (remains), confirming the two senses are genuinely distinct across languages.

1. leave behind, forsake (active/transitive) (4×) To leave behind, forsake, or abandon in the active transitive voice — the subject deliberately departs from or relinquishes something. Paul 'left' (apelipon) his cloak with Carpus at Troas (2 Tim 4:13) and 'left' Trophimus sick in Miletus (2 Tim 4:20). He 'left' Titus in Crete for a specific task (Titus 1:5). Most dramatically, the angels who 'left' their proper dwelling (Jude 1:6) abandoned their God-given station. Spanish dejé/abandonaron, French ayant abandonné, and German verlassen all render this with active departure vocabulary. The common thread is an agent who moves away, leaving something behind. LEAVING AND REMAINING

en: I-left, having-left | es: abandonaron, dejé | fr: ayant-abandonné, rester | de: uebrig-bleiben, verlassenden 2Tim 4:13; 2Tim 4:20; Titus 1:5; Jude 1:6

2. remain, be left over (intransitive/middle-passive) (3×) To remain, be left over, or still exist in the intransitive middle-passive voice, where the subject is what persists rather than what departs. Hebrews uses this sense three times: 'it remains for some to enter' God's rest (Heb 4:6), 'there remains a sabbath rest' for God's people (Heb 4:9), and 'there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins' for the willfully disobedient (Heb 10:26). Spanish queda (it remains), French rester, and Hindi रह जाता है/बचती है all shift to existential-stative vocabulary, confirming that this is not about someone leaving but about something persisting. The theological weight in Hebrews depends on this distinction: the promise still stands, the rest still awaits. LEAVING AND REMAINING

en: it-remains, remains | es: queda | fr: rester | de: uebrig-bleiben Heb 4:6; Heb 4:9; Heb 10:26

ἀπολείχω G0621 V-IIA-3P (1×)

to lick, lick off; to clean or soothe by licking

This verb means to lick or lick off, particularly in the sense of cleaning or soothing wounds by licking. Luke 16:21 uses it in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus: dogs came and 'licked' Lazarus's sores. This detail intensifies the pathos—Lazarus was so destitute and helpless that only street dogs attended him, licking his open wounds. In ancient understanding, this could be seen as either soothing (dogs' saliva having some cleansing properties) or degrading (association with unclean animals). Either way, it emphasizes Lazarus's utter abandonment by human society.

(1×) The dogs that 'apeleikhon' Lazarus's sores provide startling contrast to the rich man's luxury. While the rich man feasted sumptuously, Lazarus lay covered with sores, receiving attention only from street dogs. Spanish 'lamían,' French 'lécher,' and English 'were licking' all preserve the licking action, while German transcribes the imperfect. The imperfect tense suggests habitual action—the dogs kept coming and licking. This poignant detail heightens the parable's reversal: the man whom dogs attended on earth received angels' escort to Abraham's bosom. EATING AND CONSUMING

en: were-licking | es: lamían | fr: lécher | de: ἐπέλειχον Luke 16:21

ἀπόλλῡμι G0622 V-ANA (92×)

To destroy utterly, cause to perish; to lose or fail to keep; in the middle/intransitive, to perish, be ruined, or be lost.

A powerful verb of total destruction, ruin, and loss, running through some of the most dramatic passages in the New Testament. In its transitive sense it describes kings who seek to destroy (Matt 2:13), authorities who plot to kill (Matt 12:14), and a master who will miserably destroy wicked tenants (Matt 21:41). In its intransitive middle voice, it captures the cry of terrified disciples — 'we are perishing!' (Matt 8:25) — and the solemn warning that whoever clings to life will lose it (Matt 16:25). The participial form yields the deeply tender category of 'the lost' — the lost sheep, the lost coin, the lost son — where Spanish perdido and German verloren mirror the Greek perfect participle exactly.

1. perish, be destroyed (intransitive) (41×) The intransitive middle sense: to perish, be destroyed, come to ruin or death. Used of persons facing mortal danger ('Lord, save us, we are perishing!' — Matt 8:25), old wineskins that burst and are ruined (Matt 9:17), and the solemn eschatological warning that 'broad is the way that leads to destruction' (Matt 7:13). Spanish perecerá and German verderben consistently render this existential finality. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

en: perished, perishing, should-perish | es: perecerá, perecerán, pereciendo | fr: détruire | de: geht-verloren, verderben Matt 5:29; Matt 5:30; Matt 8:25; Matt 9:17; Matt 18:14

2. destroy, ruin (transitive) (23×) The active transitive sense: to destroy, kill, bring to utter ruin. Herod seeks to destroy the child (Matt 2:13); the Pharisees conspire how to destroy Jesus (Matt 12:14); the king sends armies to destroy the murderers (Matt 22:7). Spanish destruir and French détruire both preserve the Latin root destruere, emphasizing the causative violence of this usage. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

en: destroy, destroyed, he-will-destroy | es: a-destruir, destruir, destruirá | fr: détruire | de: geht-verloren, verderben Matt 2:13; Matt 10:28; Matt 12:14; Matt 21:41; Matt 22:7

3. lose, fail to keep (20×) To lose something or someone one possesses or is responsible for. The shepherd loses one sheep out of a hundred (Luke 15:4); a woman loses one coin out of ten (Luke 15:8); whoever would save their life will lose it (Matt 10:39, 16:25). Spanish perder ('habiendo perdido') captures the pathos of losing what one treasured. This sense lacks the violence of destruction — the loss may be accidental, careless, or paradoxically willing. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

en: I-lose, I-lost, having-lost | es: habiendo-perdido, la-perderá, la-perdiere | fr: détruire | de: geht-verloren, verderben Matt 10:39; Matt 10:42; Matt 16:25

4. lost (state, as adjective) (8×) The perfect passive participle used adjectivally: 'lost,' describing the state of being misplaced, estranged, or spiritually wandering. Jesus is sent to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Matt 10:6, 15:24); the parables of Luke 15 revolve around what was lost (τὸ ἀπολωλός) being found. Spanish perdido/perdida and German verloren serve as exact functional equivalents, used substantivally just as in Greek. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

en: having-been-lost, lost | es: perdida, perdidas, perdido | fr: détruire | de: geht-verloren Matt 10:6; Matt 15:24; Matt 18:11; Luke 15:4; Luke 15:6

Ἀπολλύων G0623 N-NMS (1×)

Apollyon, the Destroyer; the angel of the abyss whose name means destruction

This is the Greek name (meaning 'Destroyer') given in Revelation 9:11 to the angel of the abyss, whose Hebrew name is Abaddon. Both names convey destruction—Abaddon from the Hebrew root meaning 'perish,' Apollyon from the Greek verb 'to destroy.' This demonic figure rules over the locust-like creatures released to torment humanity during tribulation. The name captures essential nature: he exists to destroy. Whether this is Satan himself or a subordinate demon, Apollyon embodies destructive evil opposed to God who creates and preserves.

(1×) Revelation's identification of the abyss-angel as 'Apollyon'—the Destroyer—makes his character unmistakable: he exists for destruction. Spanish 'Apollýon,' French 'Apollyon,' German 'Apollyon,' and English 'Apollyon' all simply transcribe the Greek name (or use the accent). The pairing with Hebrew 'Abaddon' emphasizes universal recognition of this destructive force. In John's apocalyptic vision, even the agents of judgment have hierarchy—Apollyon commands the demonic locusts. His name warns: where this one rules, destruction follows. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

en: Apolluon | es: Apollýon | fr: Apollyon | de: Apollyon Rev 9:11

Ἀπολλωνία G0624 N-AFS (1×)

Apollonia; a city in Macedonia on the Via Egnatia between Amphipolis and Thessalonica

This is the name of a Macedonian city on the Via Egnatia, the main Roman highway connecting the Adriatic to the Aegean. Acts 17:1 mentions it as a stopping point when Paul and Silas traveled from Philippi to Thessalonica: they passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia before reaching Thessalonica. Luke records no ministry there, suggesting they stopped only for travel necessities—lodging, provisions—before continuing to their destination. Multiple cities bore this name (honoring Apollo), requiring geographic markers to distinguish them.

(1×) Paul's passing through 'Apollonia' represents strategic missionary travel along Roman infrastructure. The Via Egnatia enabled rapid movement across Macedonia, and Apollonia provided a natural waystation. Spanish 'Apolonia,' French 'Apollonie,' and English/German 'Apollonia' all adapt the Greek name to their conventions. Luke's silence about ministry there suggests the apostolic team pressed on to Thessalonica, the provincial capital and strategic hub. Not every city received extended mission—Paul targeted key urban centers from which the gospel would spread regionally. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Apollōnia | es: Apolonia | fr: Apollonie | de: Ἀπολλωνίαν Acts 17:1

Ἀπολλώς G0625 N-GMS (10×)

Apollos — Alexandrian Jewish Christian, eloquent preacher and associate of Paul in the early church

The proper noun Ἀπολλῶς (Apollos) identifies an Alexandrian Jew described as 'eloquent' and 'mighty in the Scriptures' (Acts 18:24). After Priscilla and Aquila instructed him more accurately in the Way, Apollos became an influential preacher in Achaia and Corinth. His prominence inadvertently fueled party divisions ('I follow Apollos,' 1 Cor 1:12; 3:4), which Paul addressed by insisting that he and Apollos were merely servants through whom God worked (1 Cor 3:5-6). Paul later urged Apollos to visit Corinth again (1 Cor 16:12) and commended him to Titus (Titus 3:13). Spanish 'Apolos,' Arabic 'أبلوس,' Hindi 'अपुल्लोस,' Korean '아볼로.'

Apollos (proper noun, person) (10×) The Alexandrian Jewish Christian, learned in the Scriptures, who received fuller instruction from Priscilla and Aquila (Acts 18:24-28) and became a significant preacher in the Corinthian church. Paul addresses the factionalism his popularity generated (1 Cor 1:12; 3:4-6, 22; 4:6), casting both himself and Apollos as fellow laborers in God's field. Mentioned also in 1 Corinthians 16:12 and Titus 3:13. All ten occurrences refer to this single individual, with case inflections (nominative, genitive, accusative) producing the different cluster forms. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Apollos, Apollōs, of-Apollōs | es: Apolōs, Apollős, Apollős? | fr: Apollos, Ἀπολλῶν | de: Ἀπολλῶ, Ἀπολλῶν, Ἀπολλῶς Acts 18:24; Acts 19:1; 1Cor 1:12; 1Cor 3:4; 1Cor 3:5

ἀπολογ-έομαι G0626 V-PIM/P-1P (10×)

Make a defense, speak in self-defense — to offer a verbal defense against accusations, especially in legal settings

The verb ἀπολογέομαι (apologeomai) means 'to make a defense' or 'to speak in one's own defense,' typically in a judicial or quasi-judicial context. Jesus instructs his disciples not to worry about how they will defend themselves before authorities (Luke 12:11; 21:14). The term dominates Paul's trial narratives: he defends himself before Felix (Acts 24:10), Festus (Acts 25:8; 26:1-2, 24), and implicitly before the Roman tribunal (2 Tim 4:16). Romans 2:15 extends the imagery to the inner moral dialogue where thoughts 'accuse or defend.' Spanish 'defenderse,' Arabic 'ﻳﺪﺍﻓﻊ,' Hindi 'प्रत्युत्तर देना,' Korean '변명하다.'

make a defense, defend oneself (10×) To offer a verbal defense or apology against accusations, primarily in forensic settings before magistrates, governors, or tribunals. Jesus prepares his disciples for this scenario (Luke 12:11; 21:14). Paul's apologetic speeches in Acts exemplify the term: before the Jerusalem crowd (Acts 22:1, implied), Felix (Acts 24:10), and Festus and Agrippa (Acts 25:8; 26:1-2, 24). Paul also laments that no one stood with him at his first defense (2 Tim 4:16). Romans 2:15 internalizes the courtroom metaphor, describing conscience as either accusing or defending. The cognate noun ἀπολογία shares the same forensic register. LEGAL DEFENSE APOLOGY

en: I-defend, defending, defending-himself | es: de-defenderme, defenderse, defendiendo | fr: défense, se-défendre | de: sich-verteidigen, verteidigt-sich Luke 12:11; Luke 21:14; Acts 19:33; Acts 24:10; Acts 25:8

ἀπολογ-ία G0627 N-GFS (8×)

A verbal defense or reasoned justification; a speech made in answer to accusations — not an expression of regret.

From ἀπό (from, away) + λόγος (word, reason), apologia denotes a reasoned verbal defense offered in response to charges or criticism. This is emphatically not the modern English sense of 'apology' as expressing regret. Paul uses it for his formal defense speeches (Acts 22:1; Phil 1:7, 16), and the word appears in the exhortation to be ready to give a 'defense' for the hope within (1 Pet 3:15). In 2 Corinthians 7:11, the Corinthians' apologia demonstrates their earnest desire to clear themselves. Spanish 'defensa' and French 'défense' preserve the legal-forensic flavor faithfully.

defense, verbal defense, apology (8×) A reasoned verbal defense or justification made in response to accusation, criticism, or inquiry. Paul uses it in formal legal settings — his defense before the Jerusalem crowd (Acts 22:1) and his right to a defense before accusers (Acts 25:16). It also appears in theological contexts: the defense and confirmation of the gospel (Phil 1:7), and the readiness to give a 'defense' for one's hope (1 Pet 3:15). Spanish 'defensa' and French 'défense' faithfully convey the forensic, legal-argumentation dimension, distinct from any notion of expressing regret. LEGAL DEFENSE APOLOGY

en: defense, of-defense | es: de-defensa, defensa | fr: défense, ἀπολογίαν, ἀπολογίᾳ | de: ἀπολογία, ἀπολογίαν, ἀπολογίας Acts 22:1; Acts 25:16; 1Cor 9:3; 2Cor 7:11; Phil 1:7

ἀπο-λούω G0628 V-AIM-2P (2×)

to wash away, cleanse by washing

A compound verb meaning to wash off or wash away completely. In Acts 22:16, Ananias commands Saul to wash away his sins through baptism. In 1 Corinthians 6:11, Paul reminds the Corinthians they were washed clean from their former sinful state. Homer used it for washing gore or brine from the body; the New Testament applies this physical cleansing metaphorically to spiritual purification. The middle voice emphasizes washing oneself or having oneself washed.

(2×) Both occurrences connect water baptism with spiritual cleansing (Acts 22:16; 1 Cor 6:11). The Greek middle voice in both passages suggests personal agency in receiving cleansing rather than purely passive reception. Multilingual evidence shows direct washing terminology across languages, though German preserves the actual Greek forms, suggesting recognition of this as technical baptismal vocabulary. WASHING AND BATHING

en: wash-away, you-were-washed | es: fuisteis-lavados, lava | fr: laver | de: ἀπελούσασθε, ἀπόλουσαι Acts 22:16; 1Cor 6:11

ἀπολύτρ-ωσις G0629 N-GFS (10×)

Redemption, release through ransom payment; deliverance achieved by the atoning work of Christ

An abstract noun denoting liberation secured through the payment of a ransom price. In the New Testament it functions almost exclusively as a theological term for the deliverance accomplished by Christ's sacrificial death (Rom 3:24; Eph 1:7, 14; Col 1:14; Heb 9:15). Luke 21:28 extends the concept to eschatological deliverance at Christ's return. Multilingual translations converge on the ransom-release idea: Spanish 'redención,' Hindi 'छुटकारा' (deliverance), Arabic 'ﺍﻟﻔﺪﺍﺀ' (ransom), Korean '구속' (redemption), and Swahili 'ukombozi' (liberation).

redemption, release (deliverance through ransom) (10×) Deliverance or liberation effected through the payment of a ransom, used theologically of Christ's atoning work that secures forgiveness of sins (Rom 3:24; Eph 1:7; Col 1:14; Heb 9:15) and of the eschatological redemption believers await at Christ's return (Luke 21:28; Rom 8:23; Eph 1:14; 4:30). The underlying metaphor of ransom purchase pervades all occurrences, whether applied to present spiritual liberation or future bodily resurrection. REDEMPTION RANSOM

en: of-redemption, redemption, release | es: de-redención, liberación, redención | fr: rédemption | de: Erloesung, ἀπολύτρωσις Luke 21:28; Rom 3:24; Rom 8:23; 1Cor 1:30; Eph 1:7

ἀπολύω G0630 V-PNA (68×)

To release, dismiss, divorce, or forgive; freeing captives, dispersing crowds, repudiating a spouse, pardoning sins.

Apoluo belongs to the luo ('loose') compound family and carries the fundamental image of untying or letting go. In the Gospels it operates across four distinct social spheres: the judicial (releasing Barabbas), the communal (dismissing crowds after feeding miracles), the domestic (divorce debates in Matt 5 and 19), and the spiritual (forgiving sins in Luke 6:37). What makes these boundaries sharp is the multilingual evidence: Arabic assigns entirely different roots — atlaqahu for release, sarafa for dismissal, yutalliqu for divorce, ighfiru for forgiveness. Korean and Swahili similarly deploy distinct lexical items across all four domains, confirming real conceptual boundaries.

1. release, set free (32×) To release or set free from custody, bondage, or obligation — 32 occurrences concentrated in the Passion narratives around the Passover custom of releasing a prisoner (Matt 27:15-26; Mark 15:6-15; John 18:39). Also covers releasing from illness (Luke 13:12, the woman bound by Satan). Arabic atlaqa ('set free') and Swahili -achia ('release') map precisely to this liberation frame. Korean 놓아 주다 ('let go') similarly selects freedom-specific vocabulary. RELEASE AND FORGIVENESS en: I-release, I-should-release, I-will-release | es: de-soltar, liberado, que-suelte | fr: libérer, relâcher | de: freilassen, lässt-frei Matt 27:15; Matt 27:17; Matt 27:21; Matt 27:26; Mark 15:6

2. dismiss, send away (18×) To dismiss or send away a group or individual — 18 occurrences, prominent in the feeding narratives where Jesus refuses to 'send away' the crowds hungry (Matt 14:15,

22-23; 15:23, 32). The crucial evidence for separating this from sense 1 is Arabic sarafa ('dismiss'), a completely different root from atlaqa. Korean distinguishes 보내다 ('send away') from liberation vocabulary, and Swahili -ruhusu ('permit to leave') differs from -achia ('free'). RELEASE AND FORGIVENESS en: Dismiss, I-send-away, Send-away | es: Despídela, despedidos, despedirlos | fr: libérer, relâcher | de: freilassen, lässt-frei Matt 14:15; Matt 14:22; Matt 14:23; Matt 15:23; Matt 15:32

3. divorce, put away spouse (15×) To divorce or repudiate a spouse — 15 occurrences in the synoptic marriage passages (Matt 1:19; 5:31-32; 19:3-9; Mark 10:2-12; Luke 16:18). Arabic yutalliqu uses the dedicated divorce root t-l-q in Form II, Korean 버리다 ('throw away') shifts to abandonment vocabulary, and Swahili -mwacha ('forsake a spouse') selects spousal separation language. The halakhic Hillel/Shammai backdrop of Matt 19 confirms this as a tightly bounded legal-domestic sense. RELEASE AND FORGIVENESS

en: divorced, divorced-woman, divorces | es: a-la-despedida, a-repudiada, con-la-despedida | fr: relâcher | de: freilassen, lässt-frei Matt 1:19; Matt 5:31; Matt 5:32; Matt 19:3

4. forgive, pardon (2×) To forgive or pardon — two occurrences in Luke 6:37 ('forgive and you will be forgiven'). The 'loosing' metaphor extends from physical bonds to moral debts. Arabic deploys the entirely distinct root gh-f-r (ighfiru), Swahili uses -samehe ('pardon'), Korean 용서하다 ('forgive') — all dedicated forgiveness vocabulary with no overlap to release, dismissal, or divorce. Cross-linguistic unanimity confirms a real sense. RELEASE AND FORGIVENESS

en: release, you-will-be-released | es: perdonad, seréis-perdonados | fr: relâcher | de: lässt-frei Luke 6:37

5. (1×) To depart or take one's leave — a single occurrence at Acts 28:25 where the Jewish leaders in Rome 'were departing' after discussion with Paul. English 'they were departing' and Spanish se-iban ('they were leaving') both treat this as intransitive middle-voice departure rather than being released by another. Well attested in classical Greek but marginal in the New Testament. RELEASE AND FORGIVENESS en: they-were-departing | es: se-iban | fr: libérer | de: lässt-frei Acts 28:25

ἀπομάσσω G0631 V-PIM-1P (1×)

to wipe off; to clean by wiping or to wipe away (as dust from feet)

This verb means to wipe off or clean by wiping, particularly in the middle voice 'to wipe off oneself.' Luke 10:11 records Jesus's instruction to the seventy: even the dust of an unreceptive town 'we wipe off against you.' This symbolic gesture (found also in Acts 13:51) testified against towns that rejected the gospel—even their dust shouldn't cling to the messengers. The act combined prophetic warning (you're accountable for rejecting us) with separation (we leave you completely, taking not even your dust). It visualized complete disassociation.

(1×) Jesus's instruction to 'apomassometha'—wipe off the dust—authorized His messengers to perform a prophetic sign of judgment against rejecting towns. Spanish 'nos lo sacudimos' (we shake it off), French 'essuyer,' and English 'we wipe off' all capture the wiping action, while German transcribes the Greek. The gesture's meaning: 'We brought God's kingdom; you rejected it; we leave, taking nothing—not even dust. Your responsibility remains.' This dramatic act underscored gospel urgency: neutrality isn't an option, and rejection brings accountability. WASHING AND BATHING

en: we-wipe-off | es: nos-lo-sacudimos | fr: essuyer | de: ἀπομασσόμεθα Luke 10:11

ἀπονέμ-ω G0632 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

assign, apportion, render (what is due); portion out property, honor, or rights to someone

The verb means to assign or apportion something to someone, particularly what is due or proper to them. In classical Greek it carried economic overtones of distributing property or portions, though it could also mean rendering honor or respect. Peter uses it in 1 Peter 3:7 when instructing husbands to assign honor (τιμὴν ἀπονέμοντες) to their wives as co-heirs of grace. The multilingual evidence consistently points to allocation or giving—Spanish dando (giving), German zuteilen (to allocate)—confirming the core sense of proper distribution.

(1×) To assign, apportion, or render what is due or fitting to someone. In 1 Peter 3:7, husbands are instructed to assign honor (τιμὴν ἀπονέμοντες) to their wives as fellow heirs of the grace of life. The term carries a sense of proper allocation—not arbitrary giving, but rendering what is rightly owed. Cross-linguistic glosses (Spanish dando, German zuteilen) confirm the core meaning of distribution or allocation, whether of property, honor, or rights. GIVING AND BESTOWING

en: assigning | es: dando | fr: ἀπονέμοντες | de: zuteilen 1Pet 3:7

ἀπονίζω G0633 V-AIM-3S (1×)

to wash off, cleanse by washing (especially hands or feet)

This verb describes the act of washing something off or away, particularly in the context of ritual or practical cleansing. In classical Greek it appears in both literal contexts (washing sweat from the body, cleaning hands after meals) and in Homer's famous scene where Odysseus's scar is recognized 'as I was washing his feet.' The single New Testament occurrence captures Pilate's symbolic hand-washing, attempting to absolve himself of responsibility—a gesture rich with irony given the ancient association of this word with both physical cleansing and moral distancing.

(1×) The act of washing off or cleansing, particularly the hands. At Matthew 27:24, Pilate performs the dramatic gesture of washing his hands before the crowd, declaring his innocence of Jesus's blood. The multilingual glosses consistently recognize this as an act of washing or hand-washing, with the German retaining the Greek form itself. Classical sources associate this verb with post-meal hand-washing and ritual cleansing, making Pilate's gesture a culturally resonant attempt to publicly declare non-responsibility. WASHING AND BATHING

en: he-washed | es: se-lavó | fr: se-laver-les-mains | de: ἀπενίψατο Matt 27:24

ἀποπίπτω G0634 V-AIA-3P (1×)

to fall off, drop away from something

This compound verb captures the image of something falling or dropping away from a surface or position. In Homer it describes dew falling from rocks, while later Greek uses it for a sword slipping from its sheath or metaphorically for failing to obtain something hoped for. The single biblical occurrence describes scales falling from Saul's eyes after his Damascus road encounter—a vivid physical detail marking the moment of spiritual sight being restored.

(1×) The physical act of falling off or dropping away. At Acts 9:18, Luke records that 'something like scales fell from [Saul's] eyes' immediately before he regained his sight and was baptized. The translations uniformly recognize this as a falling-off action (Spanish cayeron, French tomber, English fell-off), with the German preserving the Greek aorist form. The classical usage of objects slipping or falling from their positions provides the semantic background for Luke's striking detail of Saul's transformation from blindness to sight. FALLING AND FAILING

en: fell-off | es: cayeron | fr: tomber | de: ἀπέπεσαν Acts 9:18

ἀποπλἄν-άω G0635 V-PNA (2×)

to lead astray, cause to wander from truth or right path

A verb describing the act of causing someone to go astray or be deceived. Jesus warns in Mark 13:22 that false messiahs will attempt to lead astray even the elect. Paul in 1 Timothy 6:10 describes how love of money has led some believers away from the faith. Classical usage includes both physical wandering and intellectual digression from truth. The compound emphasizes the notion of straying away from a proper position or belief.

(2×) Used exclusively in contexts of spiritual or theological deviation (Mark 13:22 - deception by false prophets; 1 Tim 6:10 - wandering from faith). The passive forms in both passages indicate being led astray by external forces (deceptive signs, greed). Spanish 'engañar' emphasizes the deception aspect, while German 'abirren' captures the notion of going off course, both valid dimensions of the Greek term. DECEPTION AND ASTRAY

en: to-lead-astray, were-led-astray | es: engañar, fueron-desviados | fr: égarer | de: abirren Mark 13:22; 1Tim 6:10

ἀποπλέω G0636 V-PNA (4×)

to sail away, set sail, depart by ship

A maritime verb meaning to sail away or depart by sea, used exclusively in Acts to narrate Paul's missionary voyages. The word marks transitions between mission fields: sailing from Seleucia (Acts 13:4), departing Attalia after the first journey (Acts 14:26), coasting past Ephesus (Acts 20:15), and embarking for Italy (Acts 27:1). Spanish alternates between 'navegaron' (they sailed) and 'zarpar' (to set sail), while French 'naviguer' focuses on the seafaring activity itself. Each occurrence signals a geographic pivot in the apostolic mission.

(4×) To sail away or depart by ship, marking a sea voyage transition between locations. All four NT occurrences appear in Acts during Paul's journeys: Barnabas and Saul sail from Seleucia to Cyprus (Acts 13:4), they sail from Attalia back to Antioch after the first missionary journey (Acts 14:26), Paul sails past Miletus (Acts 20:15), and the prisoner voyage to Rome begins (Acts 27:1). Spanish 'zarpar' (to weigh anchor) and 'navegaron' (they navigated) together capture the departure-and-voyage semantics. French 'naviguer' emphasizes the sailing activity rather than the departure point. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP

en: having-sailed, sailed-away, they-sailed | es: navegando, navegaron, zarpar | fr: naviguer | de: ἀπέπλευσαν, ἀποπλεύσαντες, ἀποπλεῖν Acts 13:4; Acts 14:26; Acts 20:15; Acts 27:1

ἀπο-πλύνω G0637

wash thoroughly, wash away, cleanse by washing

A compound verb denoting thorough washing or cleansing. The prefix intensifies the basic washing action to indicate completeness—washing something well or washing it away entirely. In Homeric usage, the sea washes away strands or debris. The verb can describe the physical action of cleansing something by washing, or more abstractly, the complete removal of something through washing. The compound suggests not merely surface cleaning but thorough or complete ablution.

ἀποπνίγω G0638 V-AIA-3P (2×)

to choke, suffocate, or drown

A vivid verb describing suffocation or drowning. Both New Testament occurrences appear in Luke's account of the parable of the sower, where thorns choke the growing seed (Luke 8:7) and demons drive a herd of pigs to drown in a lake (8:33). Classical Greek employed it for throttling, choking on food, or drowning. The prefix intensifies the basic meaning of strangling to complete suffocation or death by choking.

(2×) Appears only in Luke 8 in two distinct but related contexts: plants being choked by thorns (v.7) and pigs drowning in water (v.33). Both involve death by restriction of air. The agricultural metaphor relies on listeners' familiarity with thorns literally strangling crops. The multilingual glosses distinguish between choking (thorns) and drowning (pigs), showing translators recognized the different physical mechanisms while preserving the core semantic of life cut off through constriction. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15120 WITH 3 SENSES

en: choked, drowned | es: la-ahogaron, se-ahogó | fr: étouffer | de: ἀπέπνιξαν, ἀπεπνίγη Luke 8:7; Luke 8:33

ἀπορ-έω G0639 V-PNM (6×)

To be at a loss, perplexed, or bewildered; a state of mental uncertainty about what to think or do.

Aporeo captures a particular shade of confusion – not mere ignorance, but the frustrating experience of having no way forward, no clear answer. It appears at moments of genuine psychological crisis in the NT: Herod is 'much perplexed' yet fascinated by John the Baptist (Mark 6:20), the women at the empty tomb stand bewildered (Luke 24:4), the disciples look at one another in uncertainty after Jesus predicts betrayal (John 13:22), and Festus confesses bafflement about Jewish legal disputes (Acts 25:20). Paul uses it memorably in his hardship catalogue – 'perplexed, but not driven to despair' (2 Cor 4:8) – distinguishing temporary bewilderment from ultimate hopelessness.

be perplexed, be at a loss (6×) To be mentally at a loss, perplexed, or bewildered – unable to determine the right course of action or correct interpretation of events. Spanish 'estando perplejo' and French 'perplexe' both mirror the core meaning precisely. The word implies not simple ignorance but an active grappling with a situation that defies easy resolution. Key passages include Mark 6:20 (Herod's fascination-confusion with John), Luke 24:4 (the women's bewilderment at the empty tomb), and Paul's paradox of being perplexed yet not despairing (2 Cor 4:8). PERPLEXED AT LOSS

en: I-am-perplexed, being-at-a-loss, he-was-perplexed | es: estaba-perplejo, estando-perplejo, estar-perplejas | fr: perplexe, être-dans-l'embarras | de: ratlos-sein, ἀπορεῖσθαι, ἀπορούμενος Mark 6:20; Luke 24:4; John 13:22; Acts 25:20; 2Cor 4:8

ἀπορία G0640 N-DFS (1×)

perplexity, bewilderment, state of being at a loss

This noun denotes a state of profound uncertainty or confusion—literally being 'without a way forward.' Classical Greek uses it for impossible situations, geographical difficulties of passage, or the intellectual perplexity philosophers experience when unable to resolve a question. It captures both practical impasse and mental bewilderment. The New Testament employs it in an apocalyptic context where nations are described as being in distress, unable to find their way forward in the face of cosmic upheaval.

(1×) The state of being perplexed, bewildered, or at a loss about how to proceed. Luke 21:25 describes end-times distress: 'upon the earth distress of nations in perplexity.' The translations consistently recognize this as perplexity or bewilderment (Spanish perplejidad, French perplexité), with the German retaining the Greek noun form. Herodotus uses the phrase 'being caught in great aporia' for extreme difficulty, while classical sources pair it with distress and anxiety—precisely Luke's pairing in this eschatological warning about nations unable to find a way forward amid cosmic signs. PERPLEXED AT LOSS

en: perplexity | es: perplejidad | fr: perplexité | de: ἀπορίᾳ Luke 21:25

ἀπο-ρρίπτω G0641 V-APA-AMP (1×)

to throw away, cast off violently, reject

This forceful verb suggests violent casting away or rejection. Homer uses it for throwing nets and casting away anger, while later usage includes spitting, vomiting, or casting forth unwanted things. It can mean literal physical throwing (bodies cast up by rivers) or metaphorical rejection (outcasts expelled from their country, rejecting false foods). The single New Testament occurrence describes soldiers throwing themselves into the sea to escape a sinking ship—a desperate act of self-preservation.

(1×) To throw oneself off or away, particularly in a desperate or decisive action. Acts 27:43 narrates the shipwreck scene where some soldiers, attempting to reach land, 'threw themselves overboard' and swam to shore. The translations capture this self-directed throwing action: Spanish 'having thrown themselves,' French 'reject' (broader sense), English 'having thrown themselves overboard.' The classical sense of violently casting away or rejecting underlies this dramatic moment of sailors abandoning ship in hope of survival. THROWING AND CASTING

en: having-thrown-themselves-overboard | es: habiéndose-arrojado | fr: rejeter | de: ἀποῤίψαντας Acts 27:43

ἀπορφᾰνίζω G0642 V-APP-NMP (1×)

to be orphaned, bereaved, torn away from

This poignant verb literally means to be made an orphan or to be bereaved of someone dear. Classical sources use it for being orphaned of a parent or torn away from beloved persons. Paul employs it metaphorically to express the painful separation he felt from the Thessalonian believers—not literal orphaning, but the emotional wrench of forced departure from spiritual children. The passive participle captures the sense of having been forcibly separated against one's will.

(1×) To be bereaved, separated, or torn away from loved ones (metaphorically orphaned). In 1 Thessalonians 2:17, Paul writes that 'we, having been torn away from you for a short time,' longed intensely to see the Thessalonians again. The English translation 'having been orphaned' and Spanish 'having been separated' both recognize the forced, painful nature of this parting. The German retains 'bereft/orphaned,' while French preserves the Greek form. Paul's metaphorical use transforms literal orphaning into the anguish of spiritual separation from beloved converts. BEREAVEMENT CHILDLESSNESS

en: having-been-orphaned | es: habiendo-sido-separados | fr: ἀπορφανισθέντες | de: verwaist 1Thess 2:17

ἀποσκευάζω G0643 V-APM-NMP (1×)

to pack up, prepare belongings, make ready for departure

This middle-voice verb centers on the action of packing up one's belongings, preparing to depart. Classical usage includes stripping furniture from a house, clearing away tables, or literally packing up and leaving. In its middle form it emphasizes the subject's own preparation—getting one's own things ready. The single New Testament instance describes travelers preparing their luggage before beginning a journey to Jerusalem, a practical detail of ancient travel logistics.

(1×) To pack up one's belongings and make ready for travel. Acts 21:15 records that after Paul's stay in Caesarea, 'having made ready [our belongings],' they went up to Jerusalem. The translations recognize this as preparation: Spanish 'preparing ourselves,' French 'prepare,' English 'having made ready,' with the German preserving the Greek participle. Classical sources use this verb for packing up possessions before departure or clearing away household items—the mundane but necessary preparation before a journey. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

en: having-made-ready | es: preparándonos | fr: préparer | de: ἐπισκευασάμενοι Acts 21:15

ἀποσκῐ-ασμα G0644 N-NNS (1×)

a shadow (especially one cast by turning or variation)

This rare noun denotes a shadow, particularly one that shifts or changes—'a shadow of turning' suggests the moving shadow cast when something rotates or when light sources change position. Classical Greek uses it both for literal shadows and metaphorically for illusion or deceit. James employs it in a profound theological statement about God's unchanging nature: with the Father of lights there exists no variation or shadow cast by turning, no shifting darkness that accompanies change.

(1×) A shadow, particularly one that changes or shifts with turning or variation. James 1:17 declares that with God 'there is no variation or shadow of turning,' emphasizing divine immutability. The English, Spanish, and German all render this as 'shadow' (sombra, Schatten), while French retains the Greek form. The phrase 'shadow of turning' captures the astronomical image of shadows shifting as heavenly bodies rotate—a poetic way to say that unlike the variable cosmos, God's character and gifts remain constant, unmarked by the darkness of change. SHADOW AND SHADE

en: shadow | es: sombra | fr: ἀποσκίασμα | de: Schatten Jas 1:17

ἀπο-σπάω G0645 V-APP-AMP (4×)

to tear away, draw away, withdraw; to separate forcibly or by persuasion

Carrying the force of violent tearing or forcible separation, this verb spans physical and relational rupture. Peter drew his sword and slashed off the servant's ear (Matt 26:51). Jesus withdrew a stone's throw from the disciples to pray (Luke 22:41). Paul warns that from among the Ephesian elders, some will arise drawing away disciples (Acts 20:30). The painful farewell at Miletus, where believers were 'torn away' from each other (Acts 21:1), adds emotional depth. Spanish 'arrastrar' (to drag) and French 'arracher' (to tear out) highlight the forceful separation at the verb's core.

(4×) To tear away, drag apart, or forcibly separate — whether physically, spatially, or relationally. In Matthew 26:51, Peter draws (tears out) his sword in Gethsemane. Luke 22:41 softens the force: Jesus 'withdrew' from the disciples about a stone's throw to pray. Acts 20:30 uses the verb metaphorically for false teachers who will 'draw away' disciples after themselves. Acts 21:1 describes the wrenching departure from the Ephesian elders — passive voice emphasizing that the believers were torn from each other. Spanish 'arrastrar' (drag) and French 'arracher' (tear out) confirm the core sense of forcible separation across all contexts. BREAKING AND UPROOTING

en: drew, having-parted, to-draw-away | es: arrastrar, sacó, se-apartó | fr: arracher | de: ἀπέσπασεν, ἀπεσπάσθη, ἀποσπασθέντας Matt 26:51; Luke 22:41; Acts 20:30; Acts 21:1

ἀπο-στᾰσία G0646 N-NFS (2×)

apostasy, rebellion against God, abandonment of faith

A technical religious term denoting formal abandonment of faith or rebellion against God. In Acts 21:21, Paul is falsely accused of teaching Jews to commit apostasy from Moses. In 2 Thessalonians 2:3, Paul warns that the day of the Lord will not come until 'the apostasy' occurs. While classical Greek used it broadly for political rebellion or physical departure, biblical usage narrows it to religious defection. The Septuagint already employed it for rebellion against God, establishing its theological freight before the New Testament.

(2×) Both occurrences carry severe theological weight - abandoning the covenant (Acts 21:21) or eschatological rebellion (2 Thess 2:3). The definite article in 2 Thessalonians ('the apostasy') suggests a specific, recognizable end-times revolt. Remarkably, all four target languages simply transliterate the Greek term rather than translate it, indicating 'apostasy' has become a fixed technical term in Christian theology across linguistic boundaries. APOSTASY BACKSLIDING

en: apostasy | es: apostasía | fr: apostasie, ἀποστασία | de: ἀποστασία, ἀποστασίαν Acts 21:21; 2Thess 2:3

ἀπο-στᾰσίου G0647 N-ANS (3×)

certificate of divorce, legal document of marital dissolution

This noun phrase (literally 'of divorce') refers to the written legal document that officially dissolves a marriage. Jesus references the Mosaic provision allowing a man to give his wife a 'certificate of divorce' and send her away (Matt 5:31; 19:7; Mark 10:4). The term appears in discussions about the permissibility and limitations of divorce under the law. It represents the formal, legal dimension of marital separation, contrasting with Jesus's teaching about God's original intent for marriage. The 'certificate' made the divorce official and protected the divorced woman's rights.

(3×) Appears exclusively in Jesus's teaching on divorce, referencing the Mosaic provision. Matthew 5:31 mentions the requirement to give a 'certificate of divorce' (ἀποστασίου). Matthew 19:7 and Mark 10:4 record Pharisees asking why Moses commanded giving a 'certificate of divorce' (ἀποστασίου). Jesus responds that this was permitted due to hard hearts but wasn't God's original design. The multilingual terms ('certificado-de-divorcio,' 'certificat-de-divorce') emphasize the legal, documentary nature of this marital dissolution instrument. MARRIAGE AND MASTERY

en: certificate-of-divorce, of-divorce | es: certificado-de-divorcio, de-divorcio

| fr: certificat-de-divorce | de: ἀποστάσιον, ἀποστασίου Matt 5:31; Matt 19:7; Mark 10:4

ἀποστεγ-άζω G0648 V-AIA-3P (1×)

to unroof, remove the roof or covering

This verb means to remove a roof or covering, to uncover from above. Classical sources use it for uncovering dense streams, unroofing temples, or opening sealed chambers. Mark's Gospel employs it in the memorable scene where four men, unable to reach Jesus through the crowd, literally dig through and remove the roof tiles above him to lower their paralyzed friend down. It's a verb of determined, even desperate access—removing the barrier from above when ground-level entry proves impossible.

(1×) To remove a roof or uncover from above. Mark 2:4 describes the four friends who, blocked by crowds, 'unroofed [the roof]' where Jesus was and lowered the paralytic through the opening. Spanish 'destecharon' (unroofed), French 'découvrir le toit' (uncover the roof), and German 'abdecken' (remove covering) all recognize this dramatic act of architectural demolition. The classical sense of opening sealed spaces or removing roofs provides the background for this bold act of faith—literally breaking through from above to reach Jesus. REVEALING AND DISCLOSING

en: they-unroofed | es: destecharon | fr: découvrir-le-toit | de: abdecken Mark 2:4

ἀποστέλλω G0649 V-APP-DNS (133×)

To send forth on a mission or commission; to dispatch an authorized representative, messenger, or agent; passive, to be sent.

Apostello is the verb behind the noun apostolos ('apostle'), and it carries a weight that a simple 'send' cannot convey. Unlike the more general pempo, apostello implies authorization — the one sent goes with the sender's authority and purpose. When Jesus 'sends out' the Twelve (Matt 10:5), or when the Father 'sends' the Son (John 5:36), the verb frames the act as commissioning rather than mere dispatching. Spanish enviar, German senden, and French envoyer all translate both pempo and apostello, but the pattern of usage in the New Testament consistently reserves apostello for moments of purposeful, delegated mission. The rare dismissal sense in Mark 5:10 and 12:3 preserves the older Classical Greek meaning of sending away from one's presence.

1. send on a mission (112×) The dominant active sense: to send someone forth on a specific mission or errand with the sender's authority. This accounts for 112 of 133 occurrences and is the core from which the noun apostolos derives. Jesus sends the Twelve (Matt 10:5), landowners send servants to collect from tenants (Matt 21:34), and God sends prophets and angels. Spanish envio, German sendet, and French envoyer all converge on purposeful dispatching. The key distinction from pempo is that apostello foregrounds the commission — the sender's purpose travels with the one sent. SENDING AND DISPATCHING

en: He-has-sent, has-sent, he-sent | es: Ha-enviado, envió, los-envió | fr: envoyer | de: senden, sendet Matt 10:5; Matt 14:35; Matt 20:2; Matt 21:1; Matt 21:34

2. be sent / commissioned (19×) The passive or divine passive: to be sent forth, to be commissioned as an emissary. Appearing 19 times, this form often carries profound theological weight — Jesus declares 'I was sent' to the lost sheep of Israel (Matt 15:24), and the angel Gabriel announces 'I was sent' to speak to Zechariah (Luke 1:19). Spanish enviado and German gesandt both reflect the passive commissioning. The construction emphasizes the authority behind the sending rather than the act of departure, making it the theological backbone of New Testament mission language. SENDING AND DISPATCHING

en: Having-been-sent, I-was-sent, Sent | es: Enviado, enviado, enviados | fr: envoyer | de: senden, sendet Matt 15:24; Matt 23:37; Luke 1:19; Luke 1:26; Luke 4:43

3. send away / dismiss (2×) To send away or dismiss from one's presence, with emphasis on departure rather than mission. Only 2 clear occurrences: the demons beg Jesus not to 'send them away' from the region (Mark 5:10), and the tenants 'sent away' the servant empty-handed (Mark 12:3). This preserves the older Classical Greek sense of apo-stello as 'send off/away,' closer to banishment than commissioning. Spanish enviaron and German senden still render it generically, but the context clearly marks the dismissal meaning. SENDING AND DISPATCHING

en: he-send-away, sent-away | es: enviara, enviaron | fr: envoyer | de: senden Mark 5:10; Mark 12:3

ἀποστερ-έω· G0650 V-ASA-2S (6×)

To defraud, deprive, or rob someone of what is rightfully theirs; to withhold unjustly.

Apostereo denotes the act of robbing, defrauding, or depriving someone of what they are owed. It appears in the Decalogue summary where Jesus tells the rich ruler 'do not defraud' (Mark 10:19), in Paul's sharp rebuke of Corinthian believers who cheat one another in lawsuits (1 Cor 6:7-8), and in his counsel that married couples should not deprive each other (1 Cor 7:5). The word carries a strong ethical charge: it is not mere loss but unjust taking, a violation of trust or obligation. Spanish 'defraudais' and French 'frustrer/priver' capture both the economic and relational dimensions.

defraud, deprive, rob (6×) To defraud, deprive, or rob someone of something rightfully theirs – whether property, wages, or relational due. The active sense emphasizes unjust taking or withholding (Mark 10:19, 'do not defraud'; 1 Cor 6:8, 'you yourselves defraud'), while passive forms describe the experience of being cheated or deprived (1 Cor 6:7). Paul extends the concept to the marital sphere in 1 Cor 7:5, where the deprivation in view is conjugal rights. In 1 Tim 6:5, it describes those deprived of truth. Spanish 'defraudais' and French 'frustrer' both capture the sense of wrongful withholding. DEFRAUD PLUNDER ROB en: defraud, deprive, having-been-deprived | es: defraudado, defraudes, defraudáis | fr: frustrer, priver | de: berauben Mark 10:19; 1Cor 6:7; 1Cor 6:8; 1Cor 7:5; 1Tim 6:5

ἀποστολ-ή G0651 N-AFS (4×)

apostole – apostleship; the office, commission, or ministry of being sent as an authorized representative

Derived from apostello ('to send away'), apostole denotes the office and commission of one sent with full authority on behalf of another. In its four New Testament occurrences it refers exclusively to the apostolic ministry – the divinely authorized mission entrusted to the Twelve and to Paul. At Acts 1:25 it names the office vacated by Judas; at Rom 1:5 and Gal 2:8 Paul speaks of the apostleship he received by grace; at 1 Cor 9:2 the Corinthians themselves are the 'seal' of his apostleship. Spanish apostolado and French apostolat both preserve the institutional, office-bearing nuance, while German Apostelamt ('apostle-office') makes the official character explicit.

(4×) The divinely bestowed office and commission of apostleship, designating the authoritative ministry of those sent by Christ to proclaim the gospel and establish the church. Used of the vacancy left by Judas (Acts 1:25), Paul's calling by grace (Rom 1:5), the specific sphere entrusted to him for the Gentiles (Gal 2:8), and the Corinthians' attestation of his ministry (1 Cor 9:2). German Apostelamt ('apostle-office') and Spanish apostolado both highlight the institutional, authorized nature of this sending. SENDING AND DISPATCHING

en: apostleship | es: apostolado | fr: Apostelamt, apostolat | de: Apostelamt, ἀποστολῆς Acts 1:25; Rom 1:5; 1Cor 9:2; Gal 2:8

ἀπόστολ-ος G0652 N-GMP (80×)

apostle, one sent with authority; a commissioned messenger or envoy, especially of Christ

The Greek apostolos denotes someone dispatched with full authority to represent the sender — a concept richer than mere 'messenger.' In the New Testament it most often identifies the Twelve chosen by Jesus (Luke 6:13) and Paul, who vigorously defends his apostolic commission (Gal 1:1). Beyond this inner circle, the term extends to church delegates like Barnabas and possibly Andronicus and Junia. The classical background of naval dispatch and ambassadorial mission enriches the theological freight: an apostle carries the full weight of the one who sent him. Spanish apostoles, French apotre, and German Apostel all transliterate rather than translate, reflecting the word's unique status.

apostle, messenger, one sent forth (80×) A person commissioned and sent forth with delegated authority, especially one of Christ's authorized representatives. The term encompasses the Twelve (Matt 10:2; Mark 3:14), Paul, and broader church envoys. Classical Greek usage as an ambassador or naval commander underscores the weight of official delegation. Every major translation tradition preserves the term as a near-transliteration, signaling its irreplaceable theological specificity. SENDING AND DISPATCHING
en: apostles | es: apóstoles | fr: apôtre | de: Apostel Matt 10:2; Mark 3:14; Mark 6:30; Luke 6:13; Luke 9:10

ἀποστομ-ᾰτίζω G0653 V-PNA (1×)
to interrogate, question intently, catechize
This verb originally meant to teach by word of mouth or dictation, but developed a specialized sense of intensive questioning or interrogation—the kind a teacher uses to test a student or an opponent uses to challenge someone's knowledge. Classical sources pair it with the pedagogical method of oral instruction and examination. Luke uses it to describe the scribes and Pharisees beginning to 'interrogate him vehemently' on many subjects, seeking to trap Jesus with their questions.

(1×) To interrogate or question someone intensively, often with hostile intent. Luke 11:53 records that the scribes and Pharisees began 'to interrogate him' about many things, lying in wait to catch him in his words. Spanish 'a provocarlo a hablar' (to provoke him to speak) and French 'provoquer' capture the aggressive questioning, while English 'to interrogate' and German preserve the Greek form. The classical sense of catechizing or examining students provides the framework for this hostile interrogation—questioning designed not to learn but to entrap. TEACHING AND LEARNING
en: to-interrogate | es: a-provocarlo-a-hablar | fr: provoquer | de: ἀποστοματίζειν Luke 11:53

ἀπο-στρέφω G0654 V-AIP-3P (9×)
To turn away, reject, or restore; ranging from personal apostasy and removing sin to misleading others and physically returning an object.
Built on the root stréphō ('turn') with the prefix apo- ('away from'), this verb covers a broad semantic range unified by the idea of directional reversal. Most New Testament uses describe people turning away from truth, leaders, or sound doctrine (2 Tim 1:15, 4:4, Titus 1:14). Paul and Peter also apply it to God's redemptive work of turning away ungodliness (Rom 11:26, Acts 3:26). One instance describes political subversion (Luke 23:14), and another returns to the concrete, physical sense when Jesus commands Peter to put his sword back in its place (Matt 26:52). The Spanish translations reveal the range clearly: apartarán for doctrinal desertion, apartará for divine removal of sin, pervirtiendo for misleading, and Vuelve for physical restoration.

1. to turn away from, reject, desert (5×) To turn oneself away from a person, authority, or truth, involving personal or communal abandonment. This is the dominant New Testament usage (5 occurrences), covering desertion by Asian believers (2 Tim 1:15), audiences turning from sound doctrine to myths (2 Tim 4:4), and those who heed Jewish fables over truth (Titus 1:14). Spanish apartándonos and German abwenden both emphasize the deliberate self-removal. Hebrews 12:25 warns against turning away from the heavenly voice, paralleling Israel's refusal at Sinai. TURNING AWAY AND PERVERTING
en: turn-away, turned-away-from, turning-away-from | es: apartarán, apartándonos, que-se-apartan | fr: détourner | de: abwenden, wendet-ab Matt 5:42; 2Tim 1:15; 2Tim 4:4; Titus 1:14; Heb 12:25

2. to turn away, remove (sin/evil) (2×) God as agent turning away ungodliness or wickedness from a people. In Acts 3:26, Peter proclaims that God raised up his servant 'to turn you away from your wickedness,' while in Rom 11:26 Paul quotes Isaiah 59:20: 'the Deliverer will come and turn away ungodliness from Jacob.' Spanish apartará preserves the future prophetic force. The object here is sin itself rather than persons, making this a theologically distinctive transitive construction. TURNING AWAY AND PERVERTING
en: he-will-turn-away, to-turn-away | es: apartar, apartará | fr: détourner | de: abwenden, wendet-ab Acts 3:26; Rom 11:26

3. to mislead, pervert (1×) To mislead or pervert others, turning a group away from right allegiance. Used once in Luke 23:14 where the Sanhedrin accuses Jesus before Pilate of 'turning away' (pervirtiendo in Spanish) the people. The accusation frames Jesus as a political subverter, though Luke's narrative irony shows the charge to be false. This causative sense treats the people as the object being redirected. TURNING AWAY AND PERVERTING
en: turning-away | es: pervirtiendo | fr: détourner | de: wendet-ab Luke 23:14

4. to return, put back (1×) To return or restore a physical object to its place. In Matt 26:52, Jesus tells Peter to 'return' (Vuelve in Spanish) his sword to its sheath. This is the most concrete, spatial sense of the verb, stripped of metaphorical or theological overtones. The imperative form underscores immediate, physical reversal of an action just taken. TURNING AWAY AND PERVERTING
en: Return | es: Vuelve | fr: détourner | de: wendet-ab Matt 26:52

ἀποστῠγ-έω G0655 V-PPA-NMP (1×)
to abhor, hate violently, detest
This intensive verb expresses violent hatred or abhorrence—stronger than simple dislike, it conveys visceral repulsion. Herodotus uses it for someone abhorring the idea of a particular marriage alliance, while classical authors pair it with rejecting wine in favor of water (or vice versa). The perfect tense often functions with present meaning: 'to have come to hate' something thoroughly. Paul employs it in his ethical instruction about love, commanding believers to 'abhor what is evil' while clinging to what is good.

(1×) To hate violently, abhor, detest something thoroughly. Romans 12:9 instructs, 'Let love be genuine; abhorring what is evil, clinging to what is good.' The translations uniformly recognize this intense hatred: Spanish 'aborreciendo,' French 'détester,' German 'verabscheuen,' English 'abhorring.' This is no mild disapproval but visceral revulsion. Classical usage for rejecting or abhorring something in strong comparison with its alternative fits Paul's ethical pairing—Christians are to have violent aversion to evil paired with tenacious devotion to good. HATRED AND HOSTILITY en: abhorring | es: aborreciendo | fr: détester | de: verabscheuen Rom 12:9

ἀποσυν-άγωγος G0656 Adj-NMS (3×)
expelled from the synagogue, excommunicated from Jewish worship community
This adjective, unique to John's Gospel, describes those banned from synagogue fellowship. The Jews agreed that anyone confessing Jesus as Messiah would be 'put out of the synagogue' (John 9:22; 12:42). Jesus warns disciples they will be made 'outcasts from the synagogue,' even to the point where killers think they offer service to God (16:2). This represents formal excommunication from the covenant community—a devastating social and religious penalty in first-century Judaism. The term captures the cost of following Jesus in that context.

(3×) Exclusively Johannine, denoting formal exclusion from synagogue community for confessing Jesus. John 9:22 explains the Jewish leaders' agreement to make 'expelled from the synagogue' (ἀποσυνάγωγον) anyone confessing Christ as Messiah. John 12:42 notes many leaders believed but wouldn't confess, lest they become 'expelled from the synagogue' (ἀποσυνάγωγοι). John 16:2 predicts disciples will be made 'outcasts from the synagogue' (ἀποσυναγώγους). The compound nature (ἀπο + συναγωγή) makes the meaning transparent: separated from the assembly. SYN-

AGOGUE WORSHIP PLACE
en: expelled-from-synagogue | es: Expulsados-de-sinagoga, expulsado-de-la-sinagoga, expulsados-de-sinagoga | fr: exclu-de-la-synagogue | de: aus-der-Synagoge John 9:22; John 12:42; John 16:2

ἀποτάσσω G0657 V-ANM (6×)

To say farewell or take leave of someone; by extension, to renounce or give up possessions. A verb of parting — from persons or from things.

Primarily a verb of leave-taking. Paul bids farewell to the brethren repeatedly during his missionary travels (Acts 18:18, 18:21; 2 Cor 2:13), and in Mark 6:46 Jesus takes leave of the crowd before withdrawing to pray. The Spanish 'despidiéndose' and French 'dire adieu' capture this interpersonal parting. But in Luke 14:33, Jesus extends the metaphor strikingly: just as one says goodbye to a person, a disciple must 'say goodbye' to all possessions — renouncing them entirely. Luke 9:61 sits at the hinge between these senses, where a would-be follower asks to go back and bid farewell to those at home, yet Jesus's response implies that true discipleship means a farewell with no return.

1. say farewell, take leave of (5×) To say farewell, bid goodbye, take leave of a person before departing. This is the primary and most frequent sense (5 of 6 occurrences). Paul uses it at several points during his journeys (Acts 18:18, 18:21; 2 Cor 2:13), and Jesus takes leave of the multitude (Mark 6:46). The Spanish 'despidiéndose de' and French 'dire adieu / prendre congé' naturally express this social act of parting. GREET FAREWELL WELCOME en: having-said-farewell, taking-leave-of, to-say-farewell | es: despedirme, despidiéndose, despidiéndose-de | fr: dire-adieu, prendre-congé | de: ἀποτάξασθαι, ἀποταξάμενος Mark 6:46; Luke 9:61; Acts 18:18; Acts 18:21; 2Cor 2:13

2. renounce, give up (1×) To renounce or give up possessions and attachments — an extended metaphorical application of 'taking leave' directed toward things rather than persons. In Luke 14:33, Jesus declares that whoever does not 'say farewell to' (i.e., renounce) all possessions cannot be his disciple. The same Greek form (ἀποτάσσεται) that elsewhere means 'says goodbye' here carries the force of permanent relinquishment, a striking metaphorical leap preserved in the Spanish 'se despide' applied to belongings rather than people. LEAVING AND REMAINING en: renounces | es: se-despide | fr: prendre-congé | de: ἀποτάσσεται Luke 14:33

ἀποτελέω G0658 V-APP-NFS (2×)

to complete, accomplish, bring to fulfillment

A verb meaning to bring to completion or accomplish fully. Jesus in Luke 13:32 speaks of completing his work on the third day. James 1:15 describes sin, when fully matured, giving birth to death. Classical usage emphasizes finishing what was started, paying what is due, or producing a final result. The compound suggests thorough completion, bringing something from beginning to final end.

(2×) Used for processes reaching their intended culmination: Jesus' earthly ministry (Luke 13:32) and sin's deadly trajectory (James 1:15). Both passages emphasize temporal completion - Jesus on 'the third day', sin when 'full-grown'. The perfect passive participle in Luke suggests a state of completion, while the active present in James indicates ongoing accomplishment of sin's purpose. Cross-linguistic renderings emphasize both finishing (Spanish 'completado') and active accomplishment (Spanish 'realizo'). FULFILL AND COMPLETE en: I-accomplish, having-been-completed | es: completado, realizo | fr: achever | de: ἀποτελεσθεῖσα, ἀποτελῶ Luke 13:32; Jas 1:15

ἀποτίθημι G0659 V-AIM-3P (9×)

To put off or lay aside, either figuratively (sinful behaviors, the old self) or literally (placing objects somewhere).

A rich verb of removal, used most often in the New Testament as a vivid metaphor for moral transformation. Believers are urged to 'put off' the old self like shedding worn-out clothing (Eph 4:22; Col 3:8), to lay aside every weight and sin that clings (Heb 12:1), and to strip away all filthiness (James 1:21). The Spanish despojar and desechar and the German ablegen powerfully convey this stripping-away image. In its rarer literal sense, the word describes physically depositing something — witnesses laid their garments at Saul's feet (Acts 7:58), and Herod had John put in prison (Matt 14:3).

1. put off, lay aside (figurative) (7×) To put off or lay aside figuratively — casting away sinful habits, moral encumbrances, or the old self as one would remove a garment. Paul exhorts believers to 'put off' the old self (Eph 4:22), to lay aside falsehood (Eph 4:25), and to strip away anger, malice, and slander (Col 3:8). Hebrews 12:1 calls readers to lay aside every weight and entangling sin. Spanish despojar ('to strip') and desechar ('to discard') and German ablegen ('to lay down') all illuminate this metaphor of moral undressing. James 1:21 and 1 Peter 2:1 extend the image to all forms of wickedness. PLACING AND LAYING en: Putting-away, having-laid-aside, having-put-away | es: Desechando, desechad, despojando | fr: déposer | de: ablegen Rom 13:12; Eph 4:22; Eph 4:25; Col 3:8; Heb 12:1

2. lay down, deposit (physical) (2×) To lay down or deposit physically — placing an object at a specific location. The witnesses at Stephen's stoning laid (ἀπέθεντο) their garments at the feet of a young man named Saul (Acts 7:58), and Herod had John seized and put (ἀπέθετο) in prison (Matt 14:3). Arabic wada'a (, 'to place') and Korean noh-atda (놓았다, 'to set down') both capture this concrete, spatial action that contrasts with the figurative moral sense. PLACING AND LAYING en: laid, put | es: lo-puso, pusieron | fr: déposer | de: ἀπέθεντο, ἀπέθετο Matt 14:3; Acts 7:58

ἀποτιν-άσσω G0660 V-APA-NMS (2×)

to shake off, shake away from oneself

A vivid gesture-verb describing the act of shaking something off one's body. Jesus instructs his disciples to shake dust off their feet as a testimony against towns that reject them (Luke 9:5). Paul shakes a viper off his hand into the fire on Malta (Acts 28:5). The middle voice emphasizes personal action - shaking off from oneself. Classical authors used it for getting rid of burdens or unwanted things, including metaphorical ones.

(2×) Both New Testament instances involve symbolic or dramatic physical gestures: shaking off dust as prophetic testimony of rejection (Luke 9:5) and shaking off a deadly snake (Acts 28:5). The multilingual glosses uniformly preserve the physical action of shaking/shuddering off. Interestingly, the term appears in the Attitudes/Emotions domain despite its physical nature, perhaps because dust-shaking carries emotional freight as a gesture of disassociation and judgment. WANDERING AND GRIEVING en: having-shaken-off, shake-off | es: habiendo-sacudido, sacudid | fr: secouer | de: ἀποτινάξας, ἀποτινάσσετε Luke 9:5; Acts 28:5

ἀποτίνω G0661 V-FIA-1S (1×)

to repay, pay back in full, make restitution

This verb centers on the concept of paying back what is owed—whether debt, compensation, or restitution. Homer uses it for repaying honor to the Argives or making atonement for wrongdoing against Patroclus. Classical legal contexts distinguish 'suffer or pay'—personal punishment versus pecuniary restitution. Paul employs it in his letter to Philemon regarding Onesimus, offering to personally repay any debt the runaway slave might owe his master—a remarkable gesture bridging financial obligation and spiritual reconciliation.

(1×) To repay or make full payment for what is owed. Philemon 1:19 has Paul writing, 'I will repay it' (concerning any debt Onesimus owes), even as he hints that Philemon himself owes Paul his very soul. The translations capture this repayment obligation: Spanish 'pagaré' (I will pay), French and German retain the Greek form, English 'will repay.' Classical legal usage of paying full restitution or compensation provides the framework for Paul's gracious offer—he promises to cover Onesimus's debt, foreshadowing the greater theological theme of substitutionary payment. REPAYING AND RENDERING

en: will-repay | es: pagaré | fr: ἀποτίσω | de: bezahlen Phlm 1:19

ἀποτολμ-άω G0662 V-PIA-3S (1×)

to dare boldly, be audacious, venture presumptuously

This verb suggests bold, even presumptuous daring—the audacity to venture something risky or controversial. Classical sources use it for making a bold attempt at something or speaking with excessive freedom. The perfect participle carries the sense of having become too presumptuous or audacious. Paul quotes Isaiah using this verb to describe God's surprising boldness: 'I was found by those who were not seeking me; I became manifest to those who were not asking for me'—God's audacious self-revelation to the Gentiles.

(1×) To show bold audacity or dare to do something presumptuous. Romans 10:20 quotes Isaiah: 'Isaiah is very bold and says,' describing God's declaration that he was found by those not seeking him. Spanish 'se atreve' (dares), French and German preserve the Greek form, while English uses 'is bold.' The classical sense of venturing a bold, even presumptuous attempt fits Isaiah's daring prophetic announcement of God's unexpected outreach to Gentiles—a theologically audacious claim in its original context. DARE BE BOLD

en: is-bold | es: se-atreve | fr: ἀποτολμᾷ | de: wagen Rom 10:20

ἀποτομ-ία G0663 N-NFS (2×)

severity, sternness, harshness in treatment

A noun denoting severity or harshness. Paul uses it twice in Romans 11:22 in a chiastic structure contrasting God's kindness and severity - severity toward those who fell, kindness toward those who continue in his kindness. The term carries connotations of cutting decisiveness, derived from the root for sharp cutting. Classical usage included harsh treatment, strict laws, or even torture. Paul's usage emphasizes God's uncompromising judgment alongside his mercy.

(2×) Appears exclusively in Romans 11:22 where Paul contrasts divine kindness (χρηστότης) with divine severity. The context involves God cutting off unfaithful Israel from the olive tree - making the severity both metaphorical (judgment) and connected to literal cutting. The domain assignment to Plants/Agriculture is puzzling but may reflect the horticultural metaphor of the chapter (pruning branches). All four language witnesses use severity/sternness vocabulary, confirming the judicial rather than agricultural core meaning. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 7670 WITH 5 SENSES

en: severity | es: severidad | fr: sévérité | de: Strenge Rom 11:22

ἀποτοξεύω G0664 Adv (2×)

severely, sharply, with cutting sternness

An adverb meaning severely or sharply. Paul uses it twice to describe how he might exercise apostolic authority - sharply in 2 Corinthians 13:10 and commanding Titus to rebuke Cretans sharply (Titus 1:13). The term derives from the same root as 'severity' (G0663), carrying connotations of cutting decisiveness. It describes tone and manner of rebuke or correction that is direct and unsparing rather than gentle.

(2×) Both occurrences involve apostolic discipline: Paul's potential sharp exercise of authority (2 Cor 13:10) and instruction to Titus to rebuke sharply (Tit 1:13). The adverb modifies verbs of rebuke/correction, emphasizing manner rather than content. The placement in the Power/Force domain reflects that sharp rebuke is an exercise of authority. French preserves the Greek term directly, while other languages employ native severity terminology, showing this is recognized as a specialized term for forceful correction. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: severely, sharply | es: severamente | fr: sévèrement, ἀποτόμως | de: streng 2Cor 13:10; Titus 1:13

ἀποτρέπ-ω G0665 V-PMM-2S (1×)

to turn away from, avoid, reject association with

This verb means to turn oneself away from something or someone, to avoid or reject. Homer uses it for turning warriors away from battle or deterring someone from a course of action. In the middle voice it emphasizes the subject's own turning away—actively choosing to avoid or separate from something. Paul employs it as an imperative in his warning about false religionists who have the form of godliness but deny its power: 'turn away from such people,' he commands Timothy.

(1×) To turn oneself away from, avoid, reject association with someone or something. 2 Timothy 3:5 warns about those having a form of godliness but denying its power, then commands: 'turn away from such people.' The translations recognize this directive avoidance: Spanish 'evita' (avoid), French and German preserve the Greek imperative form, English 'turn away from.' Classical usage of deterring someone from battle or turning back from a pursuit provides the semantic background for Paul's sharp command to actively separate from hollow religiosity. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY

en: turn-away-from | es: evita | fr: ἀποτρέπου | de: sich-abwenden 2Tim 3:5

ἀπουσία G0666 N-DFS (1×)

absence, state of being away

This straightforward noun denotes the condition of being absent or away from a place or person. Classical usage includes being away from home or the physical absence of someone expected to be present. Paul uses it in his letter to the Philippians to create a deliberate contrast: just as they have always obeyed, not only in his presence but now much more in his absence, they should continue to work out their salvation with fear and trembling.

(1×) The state or condition of being absent or away. Philippians 2:12 urges the Philippians to work out their salvation 'not only as in my presence but now much more in my absence.' The translations uniformly render this as 'absence' (Spanish ausencia, French preserves the Greek form, German Abwesenheit). Paul's rhetorical structure hinges on the contrast between presence and absence—their obedience should not depend on his physical proximity but should intensify when he's away, demonstrating internalized faith rather than external performance. BEING PRESENT en: absence | es: ausencia | fr: ἀπουσίᾳ | de: Abwesenheit Phil 2:12

ἀποφέρω G0667 V-ANP (6×)

To carry away, transport, or lead off from one place to another; used of physical removal and visionary transport.

Apophero means to carry or take away from one location to another. The word covers a surprisingly broad range of movement in the NT: the council leading Jesus away to Pilate (Mark 15:1), angels carrying Lazarus to Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:22), healing cloths being taken from Paul's body to the sick (Acts 19:12), and the collection being conveyed to Jerusalem (1 Cor 16:3). Most vividly, the Spirit 'carries away' John in visionary transport to see Babylon and the New Jerusalem (Rev 17:3; 21:10). Whether the movement is physical, angelic, or spiritual, the common thread is transfer from one place to another.

carry away, take away, lead off (6×) To carry away, transport, or lead off from one location to another. The term covers physical removal (Mark 15:1, leading Jesus away to Pilate; Acts 19:12, carrying cloths from Paul to the sick), post-mortem angelic transport (Luke 16:22, Lazarus carried to Abraham's bosom), practical conveyance (1 Cor 16:3, transporting the collection), and visionary relocation by the Spirit (Rev 17:3; 21:10). Spanish 'llevar/llevaron' and French 'emporter' reflect the straightforward carrying-away sense. German 'wegtragen' (carry away) captures the spatial separation inherent in the prefix apo-. LEADING AWAY

en: he-carried-away, led-away, to-be-carried | es: llevar, llevaron, llevarse | fr: emporter | de: wegtragen, ἀπενεχθῆναι, ἀποφέρεσθαι Mark 15:1; Luke 16:22; Acts 19:12; 1Cor 16:3; Rev 17:3

ἀπο-φεύγω G0668 V-APA-NMP (3×)

escape, flee from, get away from danger or corruption

This verb means to flee from and successfully escape something dangerous or harmful. Peter uses it three times in his second epistle in the context of escaping worldly corruption. Believers have escaped the defilement of the world through knowing Christ (2 Pet 1:4). False teachers entice those barely 'escaping' from error (2:18). Most tragically, some who escaped defilement become re-entangled, making their latter state worse (2:20). The word emphasizes successful flight from danger, though that freedom can be lost.

(3×) All three NT occurrences in 2 Peter describe escaping moral and spiritual corruption. Second Peter 1:4 celebrates divine promises enabling escape (ἀποφυγόντες) from worldly corruption through lust. Second Peter 2:18 describes false teachers enticing those barely 'escaping' (ἀποφεύγοντας) from error's way. Second Peter 2:20 warns of those who, 'having escaped' (ἀποφυγόντες) defilement through Christ's knowledge, become re-entangled. The German 'entfliehen' (flee away) captures the active distancing from danger that defines this term. FLEEING AND ESCAPING

en: escaping, having-escaped | es: escapando, habiendo-escapado | fr: ἀποφεύγοντας, ἀποφυγόντες | de: entfliehen 2Pet 1:4; 2Pet 2:18; 2Pet 2:20

ἀπο-φθέγγομαι G0669 V-AIM-3S (3×)

speak forth, utter, declare; to give voice to something, especially with authority or inspiration

This verb means to speak out or utter, often with connotations of authoritative or inspired speech. At Pentecost, Spirit-filled believers began to 'speak forth' in other tongues as the Spirit gave utterance (Acts 2:4). Peter 'declared' to the Jerusalem crowd, addressing them boldly (2:14). Paul protests he is not mad but 'speaks forth' words of truth and reason to Festus (26:25). The classical background of pronouncing apophthegms (pithy sayings) informs the sense of weighty, significant speech.

(3×) Used in Acts for authoritative, inspired, or bold declaration. Acts 2:4 describes Spirit-filled believers beginning to 'speak forth' (ἀποφθέγγεσθαι) in other languages—supernatural utterance. Acts 2:14 shows Peter standing to 'declare' (ἀπεφθέγξατο) to the crowd, speaking with apostolic authority. Acts 26:25 has Paul defending his sanity, saying he 'speaks forth' (ἀποφθέγγομαι) sober truth. The French 'déclarer' and German forms suggest formal, significant speech rather than casual conversation. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

en: I-am-speaking, declared, to-utter | es: a-pronunciar, proclamó, pronuncio | fr: déclarer | de: ἀπεφθέγξατο, ἀποφθέγγεσθαι, ἀποφθέγγομαι Acts 2:4; Acts 2:14; Acts 26:25

ἀποφορτ-ίζομαι G0670 V-PPM/P-NNS (1×)

to unload cargo, discharge freight from a ship

This middle-voice verb describes the nautical action of unloading or discharging a ship's cargo. Classical sources use it for jettisoning cargo in emergency situations or for the routine unloading of freight at port. The middle form emphasizes the sailors' action on their own behalf—getting rid of cargo that belongs to them or that burdens their vessel. Luke employs it to describe Paul's ship arriving at Tyre, where the vessel was scheduled to unload its freight before continuing the journey.

(1×) To unload or discharge cargo from a ship. Acts 21:3 describes the ship carrying Paul sailing to Tyre, 'for there the ship was unloading its cargo.' The translations recognize this maritime activity: English 'unloading,' Spanish 'descargando' (discharging), French 'se décharger' (unloading itself), with German preserving the Greek middle participle. Classical nautical usage for both emergency jettisoning and routine port unloading provides the background for this mundane but essential detail of ancient sea travel—ships followed cargo routes, stopping where goods needed delivery. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP

en: unloading | es: descargando | fr: se-décharger | de: ἀποφορτιζόμενον Acts 21:3

ἀπό-χρησις G0671 N-DFS (1×)

consumption, using up, depletion through use

This rare noun denotes the process of using something up until it's depleted or consumed. Classical sources use it for getting rid of excess or for the consumption and depletion of resources. The context in Colossians suggests items that perish or are used up through consumption. Paul employs it in his critique of human regulations, noting that such commands concern things that 'all perish with use'—they're about perishable, consumable items that have no lasting spiritual significance.

(1×) The consumption or using up of something, particularly through ordinary use leading to depletion. Colossians 2:22 refers to human regulations concerning things that 'all perish through consumption' or 'with use.' Spanish 'consumo' (consumption), French preserves the Greek form, German 'Missbrauch' (misuse/abuse, perhaps interpreting negatively). Paul's point is that ascetic regulations focus on perishable, consumable items—food, drink, material things that are used up and gone—rather than eternal spiritual realities, exposing the futility of such legalism. EATING AND CONSUMING

en: using-up | es: consumo | fr: ἀποχρήσει | de: Missbrauch Col 2:22

ἀποχωρ-έω G0672 V-PMA-2P (3×)

depart, withdraw, go away from; to leave a place or person

This verb signifies departing or withdrawing from a place or situation. Jesus commands evildoers to 'depart' from him (Matt 7:23). An unclean spirit violently convulses a boy and 'departs' from him (Luke 9:39). Paul and his companions 'departed' from Perga after John Mark left them (Acts 13:13). The word emphasizes the act of leaving or withdrawing, whether commanded, voluntary, or in the case of the demon, forced. It can carry overtones of separation or cessation of presence.

(3×) Expresses departure or withdrawal in varied contexts. Matthew 7:23 records Jesus's eschatological verdict: 'Depart' (ἀποχωρεῖτε) from me, you workers of lawlessness. Luke 9:39 describes a spirit that seizes a boy and barely 'departs' (ἀποχωρεῖ) from him, reluctant withdrawal after violent manifestation. Acts 13:13 narrates Paul and companions 'having departed' (ἀποχωρήσας) from Perga. The Spanish forms ('apartaos,' 'se-aparta') and French ('partir,' 's'éloigner') capture both commanded and voluntary departure. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY

en: depart, departs, having-departed | es: apartaos, apartándose, se-aparta | fr: partir, s'éloigner | de: ἀποχωρήσας, ἀποχωρεῖ, ἀποχωρεῖτε Matt 7:23; Luke 9:39; Acts 13:13

ἀποχωρ-ίζω G0673 V-ANP (2×)

to separate, part from, be divided from

A verb describing separation or division. In Acts 15:39, it describes the sharp disagreement that separated Paul and Barnabas. In Revelation 6:14, the sky is split apart and separated like a scroll being rolled up. The passive voice indicates being separated by external forces or circumstances. Classical usage included separating wheat from chaff, setting things apart into categories, or vomiting (forcible separation).

(2×) The two occurrences show different applications of separation: relational parting between co-workers (Acts 15:39) and cosmic splitting of the heavens (Rev 6:14). Both are passive - the separation happens to the subjects rather than being actively chosen. Multilingual evidence consistently uses separation vocabulary, with German and French both preserving forms of the Greek root, suggesting recognition of this as a technical term. The domain of Whole/Unite/Part/Divide aptly captures the semantic of unity being undone. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING

en: to-separate, was-separated | es: fue-separado, separarse | fr: séparer, ἀποχωρισθῆναι | de: trennen, ἀποχωρισθῆναι Acts 15:39; Rev 6:14

ἀπο-ψύχω G0674 V-PPA-GMP (1×)

to faint, lose heart, become exhausted or breathless

This verb captures the physical and emotional experience of fainting, losing courage, or becoming so exhausted that one can barely breathe. Homer uses it for warriors fainting in battle, while later usage includes breathing out one's life (dying) or being so chilled or fatigued that strength fails. The active sense involves breathing out or expiring, while the passive suggests being overcome by faintness. Luke employs it in an apocalyptic context, describing people fainting from fear at the approach of cosmic upheaval.

(1×) To faint or lose heart due to fear, exhaustion, or terror. Luke 21:26 describes end-times distress with 'people fainting from fear and expectation of what is coming upon the world.' Spanish 'desfalleciendo' (losing strength), French 'défaillir' (to faint), German preserves the Greek participle, English 'fainting.' Classical usage for warriors fainting in battle or persons breathing their last provides the background for Luke's vivid image of humanity overcome by terror at cosmic signs—people so overwhelmed by fear that their very breath and strength fail them. FAINTNESS SWOONING

en: fainting | es: desfalleciendo | fr: défaillir | de: ἀποψυχόντων Luke 21:26

Ἄππιος G0675 N-GMS (1×)

Appius (in 'Forum of Appius,' a Roman town)

This is the genitive form of the Roman name Appius, appearing in the phrase 'Appii Forum' (Forum or Market of Appius), a town along the Appian Way about 43 miles south of Rome. The town was named after Appius Claudius Caecus, the Roman censor who built the famous Appian Way in the 4th century BC. Luke mentions it as one of the places where Roman Christians traveled to meet Paul as he approached Rome under guard.

(1×) The name Appius, appearing as part of the place name 'Forum of Appius.' Acts 28:15 records that when Christians in Rome heard Paul was coming, some traveled as far as the Forum of Appius to meet him. The translations retain the Latinized name: Spanish 'Foro de Appio,' French 'Appius,' German preserves the Greek genitive form, English 'Appius.' This town served as a staging post on the Appian Way, the great Roman road linking Rome to southern Italy—a fitting location for Paul's reception by the Roman church. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Appios | es: Foro-de-Appíou | fr: Appius | de: Ἀππίου Acts 28:15

ἀπρόσ-ῐτος G0676 Adj-ANS (1×)

unapproachable, inaccessible

This adjective describes something that cannot be approached or accessed—whether an inaccessible mountain, an unapproachable person, or in theological terms, the transcendent glory of God that no human can draw near to. Classical usage includes geographical barriers (impassable mountains) and social barriers (persons too exalted or guarded to approach). Paul employs it to describe God's dwelling in 'unapproachable light,' emphasizing the infinite gulf between human creatureliness and divine majesty.

(1×) Unable to be approached or accessed; utterly inaccessible. 1 Timothy 6:16 declares that God 'dwells in unapproachable light, whom no one has seen or can see.' The translations uniformly recognize this inaccessibility: Spanish 'inaccesible,' French preserves the Greek form, German 'unnahbar' (unapproachable), English 'unapproachable.' Classical usage for impassable mountains or unreachable persons provides the semantic background for Paul's majestic description of God's transcendent glory—light so intense and pure that no created being can approach it. LIGHT AND ILLUMINATION

en: unapproachable | es: inaccesible | fr: ἀπρόσιτον | de: unnahbar 1Tim 6:16

ἀπρό-σκοπος G0677 Adj-AFS (3×)

blameless, without offense, not causing stumbling

This adjective describes someone or something that causes no offense or stumbling. Paul strives to maintain 'a blameless conscience' before God and people (Acts 24:16). He instructs believers to be 'without offense' to Jews, Greeks, and the church (1 Cor 10:32). Philippians 1:10 expresses Paul's prayer that believers may be 'blameless' until Christ's day. The compound suggests not stumbling oneself (subjective) or not causing others to stumble (objective). It represents ethical integrity that avoids creating obstacles for others' faith.

(3×) Denotes blameless conduct that avoids causing offense or stumbling. Acts 24:16 shows Paul's commitment to maintain 'a blameless' (ἀπρόσκοπον) conscience toward God and humanity. First Corinthians 10:32 commands being 'without offense' (ἀπρόσκοποι) to all groups—Jew, Greek, church. Philippians 1:10 expresses hope that believers be 'blameless' (ἀπρόσκοποι) at Christ's appearing. The compound (ἀ-πρός-κοπος: not-toward-stumbling) emphasizes not creating obstacles, as captured in Spanish 'sin-tropiezo' (without stumbling). BLAMELESS AND UNBLEMISHED

en: a-blameless, without-offense | es: Sin-tropiezo, sin-ofensa, sin-tropiezo | fr: sans-offense, ἀπρόσκοποι | de: ἀπρόσκοποι, ἀπρόσκοπον Acts 24:16; 1Cor 10:32; Phil 1:10

ἀπροσωπόληπτος G0678 Adv (1×)

impartially, without favoritism or partiality

This adverb describes acting without regard to external appearances, social status, or personal favoritism—literally 'not receiving faces,' using the Hebrew idiom for showing partiality. It captures divine and ethical impartiality, judgment based on truth rather than external factors. Peter employs it to describe how God the Father judges each person's work without partiality, a sobering reminder that neither ethnicity, social status, nor religious pedigree gains special favor in divine judgment.

(1×) In an impartial manner, without showing favoritism or partiality based on external factors. 1 Peter 1:17 states that if believers call upon the Father 'who judges impartially according to each one's work,' they should conduct themselves with fear during their exile. Spanish 'imparcialmente,' French preserves the Greek form, German 'unparteiisch' (impartially), English 'impartially.' The underlying image of 'not receiving faces' (not judging by appearance) emphasizes that God's judgment penetrates beyond external religious performance to the reality of each person's deeds. MANNER ADVERBS

en: impartially | es: imparcialmente | fr: ἀπροσωπολήμπτως | de: unparteiisch 1Pet 1:17

ἄπταιστος G0679 Adj-AMP (1×)

without stumbling, not liable to fall or fail

This adjective describes something or someone that does not stumble or cause stumbling—sure-footed, infallible, or morally blameless. Classical usage includes horses that don't stumble, smooth roads that provide good footing, and by extension things that are precise or intact. Jude employs it in his majestic doxology to describe God's power to keep believers from stumbling—to preserve them blameless and standing firm until they reach his glorious presence.

(1×) Not stumbling, unable to fall or fail; kept from moral or spiritual collapse. Jude 1:24 praises God 'who is able to keep you from stumbling and to present you blameless before his glory.' Spanish 'sin tropiezo' (without stumbling), French 'sans chute' (without falling), German 'ohne Straucheln,' English 'without stumbling.' Classical imagery of sure-footed horses and smooth paths underlies this spiritual metaphor—God is able to keep believers from moral stumbling and spiritual falling, preserving them intact for the final presentation before divine glory. BLAMELESS AND UNBLEMISHED

en: without-stumbling | es: sin-tropiezo | fr: sans-chute, | de: ohne-Straucheln Jude 1:24

ἅπτω G0680 V-APM-NMS (36×)

To touch physically, especially for healing; to touch as prohibited or restricted contact; to touch with intent to harm or affect.

The Greek verb haptomai (middle voice of hapto, 'to fasten, kindle') in its New Testament usage centers almost entirely on physical touch – and especially on the extraordinary power conveyed through touching Jesus. In 30 of its 36 occurrences, haptomai describes healing touch: the leper whom Jesus touched (Matt 8:3), the hemorrhaging woman grasping his garment (Matt 9:20-21), crowds pressing to touch him (Mark 6:56). Spanish tocar, French toucher, and German beruehren all render this with their standard tactile verbs. But a small cluster of passages (4 occurrences) flips touch into prohibition: 'Do not cling to me' (John 20:17), Paul's rhetorical 'it is good not to touch a woman' (1 Cor 7:1), and the ascetic rules 'do not handle, do not taste, do not touch' (Col 2:21). A final pair of verses uses haptomai for threatening or malevolent contact: the evil one 'does not touch' the one born of God (1 John 5:18).

1. touch physically for healing (30×) Physical touch, especially in healing contexts – reaching out to make bodily contact with Jesus, his garments, or sick persons, with the expectation or result of healing power being conveyed. This overwhelmingly dominant sense (30 occurrences) includes Jesus touching the leper (Matt 8:3), touching Peter's mother-in-law (Matt 8:15), the hemorrhaging woman touching his cloak (Matt 9:20), and blind men whose eyes Jesus touched (Matt 9:29). Spanish tocar/le toco, French toucher, and German beruehren uniformly render the tactile action without distinguishing healing from ordinary touch. TOUCHING AND REACHING en: having-touched, he-might-touch, he-touched | es: le-tocó, que-me-tocó, tocara | fr: toucher | de: beruehren, berührt Matt 8:3; Matt 8:15; Matt 9:20; Matt 9:21; Matt 9:29

2. touch as prohibited contact (4×) Touch as prohibited, restricted, or taboo contact – haptomai used in commands forbidding or questioning physical contact, whether for purity, ascetic, or christological reasons. Four occurrences: Jesus telling Mary 'do not cling to me' (John 20:17), Paul's quotation 'do not touch a woman' (1 Cor 7:1), the prophetic command 'touch no unclean thing' (2 Cor 6:17), and the ascetic prohibitions 'do not handle, do not touch' (Col 2:21). Spanish no toques, French ne touche pas, and German beruehre nicht preserve the negative imperative framing that marks this as forbidden contact. TOUCHING AND REACHING

en: handle, to-touch, touch | es: te-agarres, tocar, toques | fr: toucher | de: beruehren John 20:17; 1Cor 7:1; 2Cor 6:17; Col 2:21

3. touch to harm or affect (2×) Touch with harmful, threatening, or spiritually significant effect – haptomai implying that contact carries danger, judgment, or spiritual consequence. Only 2 occurrences: the Pharisee's objection that a prophet should know 'what kind of woman is touching him' (Luke 7:39), where the touch implies ritual contamination, and John's assurance that 'the evil one does not touch' the one born of God (1 John 5:18), where touch means hostile spiritual contact. Spanish toca and German beruehrt carry the same verb but context transforms its valence from healing to menace. TOUCHING AND REACHING en: touches | es: le-toca, toca | fr: toucher | de: beruehren, berührt Luke 7:39; 1John 5:18

ἅπτω G0681 V-APA-GMP (5×)

To kindle, light, or ignite a lamp or fire; to cause something to burn and give light.

In the New Testament this verb appears exclusively in its sense of kindling or lighting – lamps in three Lukan passages and a fire in two others. Jesus teaches that no one lights a lamp and hides it (Luke 8:16; 11:33), and the woman searching for her lost coin lights a lamp to find it (Luke 15:8). The word also describes kindling a fire in the courtyard during Jesus' trial (Luke 22:55) and the islanders' kindling of a fire for Paul's shipwrecked company (Acts 28:2). Spanish 'encender' and French 'allumer' both correspond precisely to this concrete, everyday action of producing flame or light.

(5×) To light, kindle, or ignite, used of lamps and fires. All five NT occurrences involve the physical act of producing light or fire. Luke 8:16 and 11:33 use the image of lighting a lamp in Jesus' teaching about not hiding one's light. Luke 15:8 describes the woman lighting a lamp to search for her lost coin – a homely detail that brings the parable to life. Luke 22:55 records the kindling of a fire in the high priest's courtyard, and Acts 28:2 describes the Maltese islanders kindling a fire for the shipwrecked travelers. Spanish 'encender' and German 'anzünden' both capture the straightforward physical meaning. BURNING AND FIRE en: having-kindled, having-lit, lights | es: encendiendo, enciende, habiendo-encendido | fr: allumer | de: zündet-an Luke 8:16; Luke 11:33; Luke 15:8; Luke 22:55; Acts 28:2

Ἀπφία G0682 N-DFS (1×)

Apphia (a Christian woman, possibly Philemon's wife)

This is a woman's name appearing in Paul's letter to Philemon. Most scholars identify her as Philemon's wife, since she's mentioned alongside him and Archippus in the household that hosted a church. The name may be Phrygian in origin. Her inclusion in Paul's greeting suggests she had some role or stake in the matter of Onesimus's return, perhaps as the household manager who would actually receive the returning slave.

(1×) The personal name of a Christian woman addressed by Paul. Philemon 1:2 includes her in the letter's greeting: 'To Philemon our beloved fellow worker, and Apphia our sister...' The translations retain the name with appropriate case endings: Spanish 'a Apfia,' French preserves the Greek dative, German 'Apphia,' English 'to Apphia.' Her designation as 'sister' and her position in the greeting between Philemon and Archippus suggest she was part of Philemon's household, likely his wife, and therefore directly involved in the household dynamics Paul addresses regarding Onesimus. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: to-Apphia | es: a-Apphía | fr: Ἀπφίᾳ | de: Apphia Phlm 1:2

ἀπωθέω G0683 V-APM-NMP (6×)

To push away, thrust aside, or reject; used metaphorically for repudiating God's word, covenant, or people.

Apotheo combines 'away' with 'push' to yield a vivid image of forceful rejection. In the NT it appears almost exclusively in a metaphorical sense – not physical shoving, but the deliberate repudiation of divine truth or authority. Stephen recounts how Israel's ancestors pushed Moses away (Acts 7:27, 39), Paul and Barnabas declare that their audience 'thrust aside' the word of God (Acts 13:46), Paul insists God has not 'rejected' his people (Rom 11:1-2), and the shipwrecked faith of Hymenaeus and Alexander is described as having 'rejected' a good conscience (1 Tim 1:19). The translation evidence underscores the metaphorical weight: Spanish 'rechazaron,' French 'rejeter,' German 'verstossen.'

push away, reject, repudiate (6×) To push away or thrust aside, used almost entirely in the metaphorical sense of rejecting, repudiating, or refusing something of value. In Acts 7:27 and 7:39, Israel pushes Moses away both physically and covenantally; in Acts 13:46, the synagogue audience thrusts aside the word of God. Paul's rhetorical question in Rom 11:1-2 – has God rejected his people? – uses the same verb to deny any such divine repudiation. In 1 Tim 1:19, the rejection is of one's own conscience. Cross-lingual evidence (Spanish 'rechazar,' French 'rejeter/repousser,' German 'verstossen') consistently renders the word as deliberate, forceful refusal. REJECTION AND REFUSAL en: did-reject, having-rejected, pushed-away | es: habiendo-rechazado, rechazaron, rechazáis | fr: rejeter, repousser | de: verstossen, ἀπωθεῖσθε, ἀπώσαντο Acts 7:27; Acts 7:39; Acts 13:46; Rom 11:1; Rom 11:2

ἀπώλεια G0684 N-NFS (18×)

Destruction, perdition, utter ruin; also waste or loss of something valuable.

A weighty noun in the New Testament's eschatological vocabulary, apoleia names the final, irreversible ruin of persons or things. Jesus speaks of the 'broad way that leads to destruction' (Matt 7:13), calls Judas the 'son of perdition' (John 17:12), and Peter warns of false teachers bringing 'swift destruction' upon themselves (2 Pet 2:1). Spanish alternates revealingly between 'destrucción' (annihilation) and 'perdición' (perdition, being utterly lost), while Arabic 'halak' drives home the totality of the ruin. Yet in two Gospel passages (Matt 26:8; Mark 14:4), the same word describes the disciples' complaint about the 'waste' of expensive ointment poured on Jesus — a startling shift from cosmic ruin to domestic economics, where Spanish 'desperdicio' (waste) replaces 'destrucción.'

1. destruction, perdition (16×) Destruction, perdition, or utter ruin — especially in eschatological and theological contexts. Denotes the final, total loss or annihilation of persons under divine judgment. Jesus contrasts the narrow way to life with the broad way to apoleia (Matt 7:13); Judas is the 'son of destruction' (John 17:12); Paul describes 'vessels of wrath prepared for destruction' (Rom 9:22). Spanish toggles between 'perdición' (emphasizing being lost) and 'destrucción' (emphasizing annihilation); French uses 'perdition'; German 'Verderben' captures both ruin and corruption. The word signals irreversibility — this is not temporary setback but final, complete ruin. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

en: destruction, of-destruction | es: de-destrucción, de-perdición, destrucción | fr: perdition | de: Verderben, ἀπώλειαν Matt 7:13; John 17:12; Acts 8:20; Rom 9:22; Phil 1:28

2. waste, squandering (2×) Waste, squandering, or needless loss of something valuable. Appears only in the Synoptic accounts of the anointing at Bethany (Matt 26:8; Mark 14:4), where the disciples protest the pouring of costly ointment as 'waste.' Spanish 'desperdicio' (waste) and 'pérdida' (loss) clearly distinguish this from the eschatological sense. The same root that elsewhere names eternal perdition here names the perceived destruction of economic value — an ironic juxtaposition, since what the disciples call 'waste' Jesus calls a beautiful act of devotion. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

en: waste | es: desperdicio, pérdida | fr: perdition | de: Verderben, ἀπώλεια Matt 26:8; Mark 14:4

ἀρά G0685 N-GFS (1×)

a curse, imprecation, invocation of evil

This noun denotes a curse or solemn invocation calling down evil or punishment. Originally meaning any prayer or vow (including positive ones), it came to specialize in negative invocations—curses pronounced against enemies, imprecations in legal inscriptions against tomb violators, or the personified goddess of vengeance. Greek tragedies frequently use it for family curses and divine retribution. Paul quotes Psalm 10 in Romans, describing the wicked person whose 'mouth is full of cursing and bitterness'—speech saturated with malevolent imprecation.

(1×) A curse, imprecation, or speech invoking evil upon others. Romans 3:14 quotes the Psalmist's description of the wicked: 'their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.' Spanish 'de maldición' (of cursing), French 'malédiction,' German 'Fluch,' English 'of cursing.' Classical usage includes formal curses in inscriptions and tragic family curses, while biblical usage captures the moral corruption of speech turned to cursing rather than blessing. Paul uses this as part of his catalog of universal human sinfulness—corrupt speech reveals a corrupt heart. CURSES AND ANATHEMA

en: of-cursing | es: de-maldición | fr: malédiction | de: Fluch Rom 3:14

ἄρα G0686 Prtcl (48×)

Then, so, therefore — an inferential particle drawing conclusions; rarely an interrogative marker expecting uncertainty

A small but powerful logical hinge in Greek argumentation, ara signals that what follows is a consequence of what came before. Jesus uses it to clinch arguments: 'by their fruits you shall know them' (Matt 7:20), 'if I cast out demons by the Spirit of God, then (ara) the kingdom of God has come upon you' (Matt 12:28). Paul employs it relentlessly in Romans to chain theological reasoning. In one special case (Acts 8:30), accented differently as a circumflex, it becomes an interrogative particle — Philip's gentle question to the Ethiopian: 'Do you then understand what you are reading?'

1. then, so, therefore (47×) Inferential conjunction meaning 'then,' 'so,' 'therefore,' drawing a logical conclusion from preceding evidence or argument. Overwhelmingly dominant (47 of 48 occurrences), it appears in Jesus's teaching (Matt 12:28; 17:26) and saturates Paul's epistles, especially Romans (Rom 5:18; 7:3; 8:1). All major translations converge: 'then/therefore' (eng), 'pues/entonces' (spa), 'donc' (fra), 'also' (deu) — each language reaching for its standard logical connector. THEREFORE PARTICLES

en: then, then-, therefore- | es: *-pues, entonces, pues | fr: donc | de: also Matt 7:20; Matt 12:28; Matt 17:26; Matt 18:1; Matt 19:25

2. then? (interrogative) (1×) Interrogative particle (accented ἆρα) introducing a question tinged with doubt or expecting a negative answer. Attested only in Acts 8:30, where Philip asks the Ethiopian eunuch whether he truly understands the Isaiah scroll. The Spanish 'Acaso' ('by any chance?') captures the tentative, probing quality that distinguishes this rare interrogative use from the confident inferential sense. NEGATION PARTICLES

en: then | es: Acaso | fr: donc | de: also Acts 8:30

ἆρᾰ G0687 Conj (4×)

ara – interrogative particle expressing anxious or tentative inquiry: 'then?', 'perhaps?', 'is it that...?'

The particle ara (with circumflex, distinct from the inferential ara) introduces questions tinged with uncertainty, anxiety, or genuine inquiry about an outcome. In classical Greek it could expect either affirmative or negative answers depending on context, and this flexibility carries into the New Testament's four occurrences. At Mark 11:13 Jesus approaches a fig tree wondering 'if perhaps' (ara) he would find fruit; at Luke 18:8 the Son of Man wonders whether he will find faith on earth; at Acts 8:22 Peter urges Simon to repent 'if perhaps' God will forgive; and at Acts 17:27 Paul says God arranged history so that people might 'perhaps' reach out and find him. French est-ce-que and Spanish acaso both capture the tentative, questioning tone.

(4×) An interrogative particle introducing questions marked by uncertainty, hope, or anxious expectation about an unknown outcome. At Mark 11:13 it frames Jesus's approach to the fig tree ('if perhaps he might find something on it'), and at Luke 18:8 it colors the rhetorically open question about faith at the Son of Man's return. Acts 17:27 uses it to express the hopeful divine intention that humanity might 'perhaps' grope for and find God. Spanish acaso ('by chance, perhaps') and French est-ce-que reflect the same tentative interrogative force. HAPPENING AND CHANCE

en: perhaps, then | es: acaso | fr: est-ce-que | de: ἄρα, ἆρα Mark 11:13; Luke 18:8; Acts 8:22; Acts 17:27

Ἀραβ-ία G0688 N-DFS (2×)

Arabia, the Arabian peninsula or region

A geographical proper name referring to the Arabian peninsula or broader Arabian territory. Paul mentions going to Arabia in Galatians 1:17 after his conversion and before returning to Damascus. In Galatians 4:25, he makes a typological connection between Hagar, Mount Sinai, and Arabia. Classical Greek writers used the term for the Arabian lands, often associated with trade routes and desert regions. The Septuagint established the connection between Arabia and Sinai's location.

(2×) Both occurrences in Galatians connect Arabia to significant locations in Paul's theology: his post-conversion retreat (1:17) and the Sinai covenant geography (4:25). The latter reference is particularly significant as Paul places Mount Sinai 'in Arabia,' showing his geographical understanding differed from later Christian tradition that located Sinai in the modern Sinai peninsula. All language witnesses simply transliterate 'Arabia,' as is standard for proper geographical names. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 8655 WITH 4 SENSES

en: Arabia | es: Arabia | fr: Ἀραβίαν, Ἀραβίᾳ | de: Arabien Gal 1:17; Gal 4:25

Ἀράμ G0689 N-GMS (4×)

Aram – a proper name in the genealogy of Jesus, corresponding to Hebrew Ram (son of Hezron)

Aram is the Greek indeclinable form of the Hebrew name Ram (ram, 'exalted'), appearing in the Matthean and Lukan genealogies of Jesus. In Matt 1:3-4 he is named as the son of Hezron and father of Amminadab, placing him in the direct Judahite line from Perez to David (cf. Ruth 4:19; 1 Chr 2:9-10). Luke 3:33 presents textual variants – some manuscripts read Arni or Admin alongside Aram – reflecting the well-known complexities of the Lukan genealogical tradition. The name is rendered uniformly across languages: Spanish Aram, French Aram (with Admin as a variant), German Aram, confirming its status as a simple proper noun.

(4×) The proper name Aram (Greek form of Hebrew Ram), identifying a man in the ancestry of Jesus as son of Hezron and father of Amminadab in the tribe of Judah. He appears in both Matthean (Matt 1:3-4) and Lukan (Luke 3:33) genealogies, though the latter exhibits notable textual variants (Arni, Admin) across manuscript traditions. Cross-lingual evidence shows uniform transliteration – Spanish Aram, German Aram – with the Luke 3:33 variants reflected in some traditions as Admin or Arni. ARAM REGION PERSON

en: Admin, Aram, Arni | es: Admín, Arní, Arám | fr: Admin | de: Aram Matt 1:3; Matt 1:4; Luke 3:33

Ἄραψ G0690 N-NMP (1×)

Arabs, Arabian people

This plural noun refers to Arab peoples or inhabitants of Arabia. Classical Greek sources use it for the Arabian ethnic group, while later usage could function adjectivally (Arabian incense, Arabian perfume). Luke includes Arabs in his list of peoples present at Pentecost, representing the southeastern reach of Jewish diaspora settlement. The term would encompass various Arabian tribal groups and the Nabatean kingdom, all part of the broader Semitic world adjacent to ancient Israel.

(1×) Arabs, people from Arabia or of Arabian ethnicity. Acts 2:11 lists among those present at Pentecost: 'Cretans and Arabs—we hear them declaring the wonders of God in our own tongues.' The translations retain the ethnic designation: Spanish 'Árabes,' French 'Arabe,' German preserves the Greek plural, English 'Arabs.' Luke's point is the geographical and linguistic diversity of Jews gathered in Jerusalem—Arabs represent the southeastern frontier of the diaspora, speakers of Semitic languages related to but distinct from Hebrew, all hearing the gospel in their native speech. ARABIAN GENTILICIUM

en: Arabes | es: Árabes | fr: Arabe | de: Ἄραβες Acts 2:11

ἀργέω G0691 V-PIA-3S (1×)

to be idle, inactive, unemployed; to be ineffective

This verb describes being at rest, unemployed, or inactive—ceasing from work or remaining idle. Classical usage includes land lying fallow, workers being unemployed, or senses being at rest (eyes closed in sleep). It can suggest both neutral inactivity and culpable idleness. The Septuagint uses it for keeping Sabbath rest. Peter employs it in his second letter to assure believers that certain spiritual qualities will keep them from being 'ineffective or unfruitful' in their knowledge of Christ—active virtues prevent spiritual idleness.

(1×) To be idle, inactive, or ineffective; to remain unused or unproductive. 2 Peter 2:3 warns false teachers that 'their condemnation does not sleep/is not idle' (their judgment is not inactive but certain). Spanish 'está ocioso' (is idle), French preserves the Greek form, German 'müßig sein' (to be idle). Classical imagery of fallow land, unemployed workers, or resting senses underlies this assertion that divine judgment against exploitative teachers is neither dormant nor ineffective—it is actively approaching, not lying idle or asleep. LAZINESS AND IDLENESS

en: is-idle | es: está-ocioso | fr: ἀργεῖ | de: muessig-sein 2Pet 2:3

ἀργός G0692 Adj-NFP (8×)

Idle, lazy, not working; by extension: careless, useless, producing no good result.

An adjective formed from alpha-privative + ἔργον (work), literally 'without work.' It applies first to persons standing around with nothing to do — laborers in the marketplace waiting to be hired (Matt 20:3, 6) or young widows going house to house in unproductive restlessness (1 Tim 5:13). A sharper metaphorical edge appears when applied to words and faith: every 'careless' word will face judgment (Matt 12:36), and faith without works is 'useless' (Jas 2:20). The Cretan proverb quoted in Titus 1:12 links laziness to moral failure. Spanish captures the person/thing divide nicely: 'ociosos' for idle workers, 'ociosa/inútil' for empty faith.

1. idle, lazy (6×) Idle, lazy, unemployed — describing persons who are not engaged in productive work, whether by circumstance or by habit. The parable of the laborers uses it for workers standing idle in the marketplace because no one has hired them (Matt 20:3, 6). In 1 Tim 5:13 young widows become 'idle,' and the Cretan character indictment calls them 'lazy gluttons' (Titus 1:12). French 'paresseux' (lazy) emphasizes the moral dimension, while Spanish 'ociosos' captures the state of having nothing to occupy oneself. LAZINESS AND IDLENESS

en: idle, lazy | es: ociosas, ociosos | fr: paresseux | de: ἀργαί, ἀργαὶ, ἀργοί Matt 20:3; Matt 20:6; 1Tim 5:13; Titus 1:12

2. careless, useless, worthless (2×) Careless, useless, producing no beneficial result — an extension from personal idleness to functional worthlessness applied to things, words, or abstract realities. Jesus warns that people will give account for every 'careless' (ἀργόν) word (Matt 12:36), meaning words that accomplish nothing good and may do harm. James declares that faith without works is 'useless' (ἀργή, Jas 2:20) — it lies fallow like unworked land, yielding no harvest. The classical Greek usage of ἀργός for money 'lying idle' or land 'lying fallow' enriches this metaphorical application. WORTHLESSNESS AND VANITY

en: careless, useless | es: inútil, ociosa | fr: paresseux | de: ἀργή, ἀργὸν Matt 12:36; Jas 2:20

ἀργύρεος G0693 Adj-AMP (3×)

silver, made of silver, silver objects

This adjective describes objects made of silver or the metal itself. Demetrius the silversmith made 'silver' shrines of Artemis in Ephesus (Acts 19:24). Paul describes a great house containing vessels of gold and 'silver' (2 Tim 2:20). Revelation lists idols of gold, 'silver,' and other materials that people refused to renounce (9:20). In each case, silver represents material wealth, craftsmanship, or—in the idol context—misplaced worship. The metal's value made it significant for both commerce and religious artifacts.

(3×) Describes objects made of silver across commercial, domestic, and religious contexts. Acts 19:24 mentions 'silver' (ἀργυροῦς) shrines crafted by Ephesian artisans, objects of both commerce and devotion. Second Timothy 2:20 includes 'silver' vessels among a household's honorable implements. Revelation 9:20 condemns those who worship idols of gold and 'silver' (ἀργυροῦς). The consistent translations ('de-plata,' 'argent,' 'silbern') reflect the straightforward material designation, though contexts show varied uses from craft to idolatry. SILVER AND MONEY

en: silver | es: de-plata | fr: argent, silbern | de: silbern, ἀργυροῦς Acts 19:24; 2Tim 2:20; Rev 9:20

ἀργύριον G0694 N-ANP (20×)

Silver as metal or coinage; money in general, whether literal coins or figurative wealth

The diminutive form of argyros ('silver'), used in the New Testament for both the metal and the currency made from it. Judas received thirty pieces of silver (argyrion) for betraying Jesus (Matt 26:15; 27:3, 5, 6, 9), and the parable of the talents features silver entrusted to servants (Matt 25:18, 27). Peter declares he has neither silver nor gold (Acts 3:6), and Paul renounces coveting anyone's silver (Acts 20:33). First Peter 1:18 contrasts perishable silver with the imperishable blood of Christ. Spanish 'plata' covers both metal and money, mirroring the Greek word's dual range.

silver, silver coin, money (20×) Silver as a precious metal and, by extension, silver coins or money in general. In the betrayal narrative, Judas receives and returns thirty argyrion (Matt 26:15; 27:3, 5, 9). The parable of the talents uses the word for entrusted capital (Matt 25:18, 27). Peter and Paul disclaim silver as worldly wealth (Acts 3:6; 20:33), and 1 Peter 1:18 contrasts corruptible silver with

Christ's blood. Spanish 'plata' and French 'argent' each mirror the Greek dual sense of substance and currency. SILVER AND MONEY
en: money, of-silver, silver | es: Plata, de-plata, dinero | fr: argent | de: Silber, ἀργυρίῳ, ἀργύριον Matt 25:18; Matt 25:27; Matt 26:15; Matt 27:3; Matt 27:5

ἀργῠρο-κόπος G0695 N-NMS (1×)

a silversmith, worker in silver

This compound noun denotes a craftsman who works with silver, particularly one who manufactures silver objects, coins, or decorative items. Classical sources distinguish silversmiths from coiners, though both worked with precious metal. Luke uses it to identify Demetrius's profession—a silversmith who made silver shrines of Artemis in Ephesus. This detail is crucial to understanding the economic motivation behind the riot Demetrius instigated: Paul's preaching threatened the profitable trade in silver devotional objects.

(1×) A craftsman who works in silver, manufacturing silver objects or decorative items. Acts 19:24 introduces 'a silversmith named Demetrius, who made silver shrines of Artemis.' Spanish 'platero,' French 'orfèvre' (goldsmith/silversmith), German and English preserve the Greek compound. Demetrius's trade involved crafting miniature silver temples or images of the goddess Artemis, sold to pilgrims and devotees. His opposition to Paul was economically motivated—monotheistic preaching undermined the market for pagan religious silverwork, threatening the livelihood of an entire guild of craftsmen. SILVER AND MONEY en: silversmith | es: platero | fr: orfèvre | de: ἀργυροκόπος Acts 19:24

ἄργῠρος G0696 N-DMS (5×)

Silver, as a precious metal or material; used for coins, idols, and building materials in the NT.

This noun denotes silver as a physical substance rather than as currency (for which Greek more commonly uses argyrion). Jesus instructs the disciples to take no gold, silver, or copper in their belts (Matt 10:9), where silver sits in a triad of monetary metals. Paul argues that the divine nature is not like gold, silver, or stone shaped by human craft (Acts 17:29). In 1 Cor 3:12 silver appears among building materials tested by fire. James warns the rich that their silver has corroded (Jas 5:3), and Revelation lists silver among Babylon's luxury cargo (Rev 18:12). French 'argent' and Spanish 'plata' preserve the same metal-to-money semantic bridge found in the Greek.

(5×) Silver as a precious metal, appearing in the NT in lists of valuable materials and substances. Matt 10:9 places it alongside gold and copper as monetary metals the disciples should not carry. Acts 17:29 uses it in Paul's Areopagus argument against idolatry – the divine is not like gold, silver, or stone. 1 Cor 3:12 includes silver among materials that will be tested by fire on judgment day. Jas 5:3 warns that hoarded silver has corroded, serving as evidence against the rich. Rev 18:12 catalogs it among Babylon's traded luxuries. The multilingual glosses (French 'argent,' Spanish 'plata') show how European languages inherited silver-as-money from this same semantic root. SILVER AND MONEY en: of-silver, silver, to-silver | es: a-plata, de-plata, plata | fr: argent | de: Silber, ἀργύρῳ, ἄργυρον Matt 10:9; Acts 17:29; 1Cor 3:12; Jas 5:3; Rev 18:12

Ἄρειος G0697 N-AMS (4×)

Areios Pagos – the Areopagus; Mars Hill in Athens, the ancient court and its rocky summit

Areios Pagos ('Hill of Ares' or 'Mars Hill') denotes both the rocky prominence northwest of the Acropolis in Athens and the venerable council that met there. The term combines Areios ('of Ares/Mars,' the war god) with pagos ('rock, hill'). In Acts 17:19-22, where all four New Testament occurrences cluster, Paul is brought to the Areopagus to explain his teaching about Jesus and the resurrection. Whether this refers to the physical hill or a formal session of the Areopagus court is debated, but the Greek text uses both the locative ('on the Areopagus,' v. 22) and the directional sense ('to the Areopagus,' v. 19). French Areopage and Spanish Areios Pagos preserve the compound faithfully.

(4×) The Areopagus (Areios Pagos, 'Hill of Ares'), referring to both the rocky hill northwest of the Athenian Acropolis and the ancient judicial council that convened there. All four NT occurrences appear in Acts 17:19-22, where Paul is brought before this body or to this location to present his message about the 'unknown God.' French Areopage and German Areopag both retain the classical name, while the dual reference in the passage (v. 19 directional, v. 22 locative) reflects the inseparable association of place and institution in Athenian civic life. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: Areios, Pagos | es: Areios, Págos | fr: Aréopage | de: Πάγου, πάγον, Ἀρείου Acts 17:19; Acts 17:22

Ἄρειος G0698 N-NMS (1×)

an Areopagite, member of the Areopagus council in Athens

This noun designates a member of the Areopagus, the ancient aristocratic council of Athens that met on the Hill of Ares (Mars Hill). This body handled homicide cases and religious matters, and membership represented significant social and intellectual standing in Athenian society. Luke identifies one of Paul's Athenian converts, Dionysius, by this title, suggesting he was a person of considerable status and education—a notable convert from the philosophical elite of the ancient world.

(1×) A member of the Areopagus council in Athens; an Areopagite. Acts 17:34 records that 'some men joined [Paul] and believed, among whom also were Dionysius the Areopagite and a woman named Damaris.' Spanish 'areopagita,' French 'Aréopagite,' German preserves the Greek form, English 'Areopagite.' Dionysius's title marks him as a member of Athens's prestigious philosophical and judicial council, making his conversion particularly significant—one of the city's intellectual elite embracing the gospel Paul preached on Mars Hill. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: Areopagitēs | es: areopagita | fr: Aréopagite | de: Ἀρεοπαγίτης Acts 17:34

ἀρέσκ-εια G0699 N-AFS (1×)

a pleasing, desire to please, obsequiousness

This noun denotes the quality of being pleasing or the desire to please others. Classical usage often carries negative connotations of obsequiousness or people-pleasing that compromises truth, though it can also mean legitimate desire to please in a positive sense. Papyri use it for conduct pleasing to God and virtue. Paul employs it positively in Colossians, urging believers to walk worthy of the Lord, 'fully pleasing to him,' bearing fruit in every good work—here it's godly pleasing, not human flattery.

(1×) The quality of being pleasing; conduct aimed at pleasing (God). Colossians 1:10 exhorts believers to 'walk worthy of the Lord, fully pleasing [to him], bearing fruit in every good work.' Spanish 'complacencia' (pleasing), French preserves the Greek form, German 'Wohlgefallen' (good pleasure). While classical usage sometimes suggests obsequious flattery, Paul uses this positively for the proper desire to please God in all things. The goal is not people-pleasing compromise but genuine godly conduct that delights the Lord—pleasing him becomes the measure of worthy Christian living. WILL AND DESIRE
en: pleasing | es: complacencia | fr: ἀρεσκείαν | de: Wohlgefallen Col 1:10

ἀρέσκω G0700 V-ASA-3S (17×)

To please or be pleasing to someone; to act so as to win favor or satisfy another's expectations.

In the New Testament, areskō describes the deliberate effort of making oneself agreeable to another, whether God or human beings. Paul draws a sharp line between pleasing God and pleasing people (Gal 1:10; 1 Thess 2:4), while in Rom 15:1-3 he urges believers to please their neighbors for their good. The word carries an active, volitional force — not merely being likable but purposefully seeking another's approval. Spanish 'agradar' and German 'gefallen' both capture this relational dynamic of acting to satisfy someone else.

please, be pleasing to (17×) To cause satisfaction or delight in someone, to act in a way that wins favor or approval. The verb always implies intentional effort directed toward another party. In Rom 8:8 Paul insists that those in the flesh cannot please God, while in 1 Cor 7:33-34 he contrasts pleasing the Lord with pleasing a spouse. Cross-linguistically uniform: French 'plaire,' Spanish 'agradar,' German 'gefallen' all point to one consistent semantic core of seeking approval. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: I-was-pleasing, he-may-please, he-might-please | es: agradando, agradar, agradara | fr: plaire | de: gefallen, ἤρεσεν Matt 14:6; Mark 6:22; Acts 6:5; Rom 8:8; Rom 15:1

ἀρεστός G0701 Adj-ANP (4×)

arestos – pleasing, acceptable; that which satisfies or finds favor with someone

The adjective arestos ('pleasing, acceptable') describes actions or persons that meet with approval or give satisfaction. In classical Greek it ranged from 'sufficient' (of a quantity of wine) to 'acceptable' (of a person in someone's estimation). Its four New Testament uses span theological and political contexts: Jesus declares he always does what is 'pleasing' to the Father (John 8:29); the apostles judge it 'not fitting/pleasing' to neglect the word of God (Acts 6:2); Herod saw that persecuting Christians was 'pleasing' to the Jews (Acts 12:3); and believers are to do what is 'pleasing' before God (1 John 3:22). Spanish agradable and French agreable both derive from the same Latin root as English 'agreeable,' capturing the core idea of meeting with favor.

(4×) Pleasing or acceptable to someone, describing conduct or qualities that meet with approval or satisfaction. Jesus uses it of his perfect obedience to the Father's will (John 8:29), the apostles use it negatively to characterize an unsuitable course of action (Acts 6:2), and 1 John 3:22 presents it as the standard for prayer-worthy living. The political usage in Acts 12:3 (Herod finding Jewish approval) shows the word's breadth beyond strictly religious contexts. Spanish agradable and German wohlgefaellig both highlight the relational, approval-seeking dimension. PLEASANTNESS AND DELIGHT

en: pleasing | es: agradable, agradables | fr: agréable | de: wohlgefaellig, ἀρεστόν John 8:29; Acts 6:2; Acts 12:3; 1John 3:22

Ἀρέτας G0702 N-GMS (1×)

Aretas (Nabatean king, father-in-law of Herod Antipas)

This is the Greek form of the name Aretas, referring to Aretas IV Philopatris, king of the Nabatean Arabs from about 9 BC to AD 40. He was the father of the wife Herod Antipas divorced to marry Herodias, which led to political tensions. His ethnarch (governor) controlled Damascus at one point, which explains Paul's reference to being pursued by Aretas's official. The Nabateans controlled important trade routes and their kingdom bordered Judea to the southeast.

(1×) The personal name Aretas, referring to the Nabatean king. 2 Corinthians 11:32 recounts Paul's escape from Damascus: 'the ethnarch of King Aretas guarded the city of Damascus in order to seize me.' Spanish 'de Aretas,' French 'Arétas,' German 'Aretas,' English 'of Aretas.' Paul's reference situates his dramatic escape historically—the Nabatean king's official controlled Damascus during Paul's time there, making the city dangerous for the apostle. Aretas IV was a powerful Arabian monarch whose territory and influence extended to Damascus, explaining the pursuit of this troublesome Jewish convert. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: of-Aretas | es: de-Arétas | fr: Arétas | de: Aretas 2Cor 11:32

ἀρετή G0703 N-AFP (5×)

Virtue, moral excellence, or praiseworthy quality; also God's mighty deeds or glorious attributes.

In classical Greek this word covered any form of excellence – physical prowess, intellectual brilliance, moral character. The New Testament uses it in two related but distinct directions. Paul includes it in his famous catalog of praiseworthy qualities: 'whatever is true, noble, right... if anything is excellent (arete)' (Phil 4:8). Peter applies it both to God's 'mighty deeds' or 'excellencies' that believers are called to proclaim (1 Pet 2:9) and to moral virtue that believers must cultivate alongside faith (2 Pet 1:3, 5). The dual emphasis – God's glorious acts and human moral striving – gives this word a rich theological texture.

(5×) Virtue, moral excellence, or praiseworthy quality, encompassing both divine attributes and human ethical aspiration. Phil 4:8 uses it as a summary term for anything morally admirable – the capstone of Paul's virtue list. 1 Pet 2:9 applies the plural to God's own 'excellencies' or 'mighty deeds' that the chosen people are called to proclaim, echoing the LXX usage for divine wonders. 2 Pet 1:3 speaks of God calling believers by his own glory and virtue, while 2 Pet 1:5 urges adding virtue to faith as a step in spiritual maturation. The range from divine glory to human moral effort mirrors classical Greek breadth. Spanish 'virtud' and German 'Tugend' capture the ethical dimension but can miss the divine-glory aspect present in 1 Peter. MORAL GOODNESS

en: excellencies, virtue | es: virtud, virtudes | fr: ἀρετήν, ἀρετὰς, ἀρετὴ | de: Tugend Phil 4:8; 1Pet 2:9; 2Pet 1:3; 2Pet 1:5

ἀρήν G0704 N-AMP (1×)

a lamb, young sheep

This noun denotes a lamb, specifically a young sheep under a year old, though classical usage sometimes extends to sheep of either sex generally. Homer uses it for white and black sheep in sacrificial contexts, while agricultural writers specify lambs as distinct from adult sheep. Luke employs it in Jesus's mission discourse, using the image of lambs among wolves to capture the vulnerability and innocence of disciples being sent out into a hostile world.

(1×) Lambs, young sheep; metaphorically, vulnerable and innocent persons. Luke 10:3 records Jesus's sobering commission: 'Go; behold, I am sending you out as lambs in the midst of wolves.' Spanish 'corderos,' French 'agneaux,' German preserves the Greek plural, English 'lambs.' The image is deliberately jarring—lambs are defenseless prey among predatory wolves, capturing the disciples' vulnerability in hostile territory. Yet Jesus sends them anyway, not with weapons but with dependence on God's provision and protection. The metaphor underscores mission as risk, not triumph. LAMBS AND SHEEP

en: lambs | es: corderos | fr: agneaux | de: ἄρνας Luke 10:3

ἀριθμ-έω G0705 V-ANA (3×)

number, count; to enumerate or determine the total

This verb means to count or number something. Jesus assures his disciples that even the hairs of their heads are all 'numbered' by God (Matt 10:30; Luke 12:7)—divine knowledge extends to the minutest detail. Revelation 7:9 describes a great multitude that no one could 'number,' emphasizing its vast size beyond human calculation. The word emphasizes both the act of counting and the result: a determined total. God's comprehensive knowledge contrasts with human inability to count vast assemblies.

(3×) Used of divine numbering and human inability to count. Matthew 10:30 and Luke 12:7 assure believers the very hairs of their head 'are numbered' (ἠρίθμηνται/ἠριθμημέναι)—perfect tense emphasizing God's complete, standing knowledge. Revelation 7:9 presents the opposite: a multitude so vast 'to number' (ἀριθμῆσαι) it was impossible for anyone. The German 'zaehlen' (count) and French 'compter' capture the basic arithmetical sense, applied to both divine omniscience and human limitations. COUNTING AND NARRATING

en: have-been-numbered, having-been-numbered, to-number | es: contados, contar, están-contados | fr: compter | de: zaehlen, ἠρίθμηνται, ἠριθμημέναι Matt 10:30; Luke 12:7; Rev 7:9

ἀριθμός G0706 N-GMS (18×)

Number — a count, total, or numerical quantity of persons or things

A straightforward noun denoting a numerical count or sum. In Acts it frequently quantifies the growth of the early church — 'the number of men came to about five thousand' (Acts 4:4) — and the size of various groups (Acts 5:36; 6:7; 11:21). Revelation uses it symbolically for the number of the beast (Rev 13:17-18) and the count of angelic hosts or the redeemed (Rev 5:11; 7:4; 9:16; 20:8). The word is remarkably stable across languages: Spanish 'número,' French 'nombre,' and German 'Zahl' all render it directly.

number (18×) A number, count, or numerical quantity, whether literal or symbolic. In Acts it tracks the measurable growth of the believing community (Acts 4:4; 6:7; 11:21) and the size of movements (Acts 5:36). In Revelation it takes on symbolic force: the number of the beast (Rev 13:17-18), the 144,000 sealed (Rev 7:4), and the innumerable angelic hosts (Rev 5:11). John 6:10 uses it for the practical headcount of the five thousand fed by Jesus. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-number, number | es: número | fr: nombre | de: Zahl, ἀριθμοῦ, ἀριθμὸς Luke 22:3; John 6:10; Acts 4:4; Acts 5:36; Acts 6:7

Ἀριμαθεία G0707 N-GFS (4×)

Arimathaia – Arimathea; a Judean town, home of Joseph who buried Jesus

Arimathaia is the Greek form of a Judean place name, traditionally identified with Ramathaim-zophim (1 Sam 1:1), the birthplace of the prophet Samuel. In the New Testament it appears exactly once in each Gospel (Matt 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:51; John 19:38), always as the hometown of Joseph, the wealthy and righteous council member who requested Jesus's body from Pilate and laid it in his own new tomb. Luke alone adds that Joseph was 'waiting for the kingdom of God,' while Matthew specifies he was a disciple. The name passes through all languages with minimal adaptation – French Arimathee, Spanish Arimataia, German Arimathaea – testimony to the universally recognized role this town plays in the burial narrative.

(4×) A Judean town identified as the home of Joseph, the honorable council member who requested and buried the body of Jesus (Matt 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:51; John 19:38). Traditionally equated with Old Testament Ramathaim (1 Sam 1:1), Samuel's birthplace. The name appears in all four Gospels exclusively in connection with Joseph's role in Jesus's burial, making it one of the most consistently attested place names in the passion narrative. French Arimathee and Spanish Arimataia preserve the Greek form with minimal phonetic adaptation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Arimathaia, Arimaththaia, Harimathaia | es: Arimathaía, Harimathaia, Harimathías | fr: Arimathée | de: Arimathaea, Ἀριμαθαίας Matt 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:51; John 19:38

Ἀρίσταρχος G0708 N-AMS (5×)

Aristarchus: a Macedonian Christian from Thessalonica, companion and fellow prisoner of Paul.

Aristarchus (meaning 'best ruler') was a Thessalonian believer from Macedonia who accompanied Paul on several journeys and shared his imprisonments. He first appears being seized during the Ephesian riot (Acts 19:29), then is listed among Paul's traveling companions through Macedonia (Acts 20:4) and on the voyage to Rome (Acts 27:2). Paul calls him a fellow prisoner in Col 4:10 and a fellow worker in Phlm 1:24, suggesting deep personal loyalty through dangerous circumstances. His name appears consistently across all translation traditions – Spanish 'Aristarchos,' French 'Aristarque' – with only minor transliteration differences.

(5×) Aristarchus, a proper noun identifying a Macedonian Christian from Thessalonica who was a loyal companion and co-worker of Paul. Seized by the mob during the Ephesus riot (Acts 19:29), he continued traveling with Paul through Macedonia (Acts 20:4) and on the perilous sea voyage to Rome (Acts 27:2). Paul's designation of him as 'fellow prisoner' (Col 4:10) and 'fellow worker' (Phlm 1:24) indicates he shared Paul's suffering and ministry. The name compounds aristos ('best') and archos ('ruler'), a common Hellenistic naming pattern. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Aristarchos | es: Arístarchos | fr: Aristarque, Ἀρίσταρχος | de: Ἀρίσταρχον, Ἀρίσταρχος, Ἀριστάρχου Acts 19:29; Acts 20:4; Acts 27:2; Col 4:10; Phlm 1:24

ἀριστάω G0709 V-ASA-3S (3×)

dine, eat breakfast or a meal

This verb refers to eating a meal, particularly breakfast or the midday meal. Jesus accepts a Pharisee's invitation to 'dine' with him (Luke 11:37). After the resurrection, Jesus invites the disciples to 'have breakfast' by the Sea of Tiberias, then asks Peter about his love three times (John 21:12, 15). The word originally denoted the morning meal (ἄριστον) but later came to mean the midday meal. In NT contexts, it marks moments of fellowship and significant conversation, particularly post-resurrection encounters.

(3×) Denotes eating a meal, creating context for important interactions. Luke 11:37 records a Pharisee asking Jesus to 'dine' (ἀριστήσῃ) with him, setting the stage for controversy over ritual washing. John 21:12 has Jesus inviting disciples to 'have breakfast' (ἀριστήσατε) in the resurrection appearance. John 21:15 notes 'when they had breakfasted' (ἠρίστησαν) Jesus began questioning Peter. The French 'déjeuner' and German 'fruehstuecken' (breakfast) show the meal context where relationship and teaching converge. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: have-breakfast, he-might-dine, they-had-breakfast | es: almorzad, almorzara, almorzaron | fr: déjeuner | de: fruehstuecken, ἀριστήσῃ Luke 11:37; John 21:12; John 21:15

ἀριστερός G0710 Adj-GNP (4×)

aristeros – left, on the left side; the left hand as opposed to the right

The adjective aristeros ('left, on the left side') designates spatial orientation opposite to the right (dexios). In classical Greek it carried negative connotations – omens from the left were ill-favored, and 'leftward' metaphorically meant erring or sinister. The New Testament's four occurrences retain the spatial sense without the ominous overtones: Jesus instructs that the left hand should not know what the right hand is doing in almsgiving (Matt 6:3); James and John request seats at his left and right in glory (Mark 10:37); the two criminals hang on his left and right at Golgotha (Luke 23:33); and Paul commends himself through weapons of righteousness on right and left (2 Cor 6:7). Spanish izquierda and French gauche both carry the same straightforward directional meaning.

(4×) The left side or left hand, used as a spatial orientation opposite to the right (dexios). In Matt 6:3 it appears in Jesus's teaching on secret generosity; in Mark 10:37 it designates the position of honor opposite the right in the coming kingdom; in Luke 23:33 it locates one of the crucified criminals; and in 2 Cor 6:7 Paul uses the pair 'right and left' to express comprehensive readiness. Spanish izquierda and French gauche both map to the purely directional sense without the classical Greek ominous overtones. LEFT SIDE

en: left, left-hand, the-left | es: izquierda, izquierdas | fr: gauche | de: ἀριστερά, ἀριστερῶν Matt 6:3; Mark 10:37; Luke 23:33; 2Cor 6:7

Ἀριστόβουλος G0711 N-GMS (1×)

Aristobulus (a Christian in Rome)

This is a Greek personal name meaning 'best-counseling,' composed of aristos (best) and boulē (counsel). Paul mentions Aristobulus in his greetings to the Roman church, specifically greeting 'those who belong to the household of Aristobulus.' The phrasing suggests Aristobulus himself may not have been a believer, but members of his household (family or slaves) were Christians. Some scholars speculate he may have been connected to Herod's family, as Aristobulus was a common name among Herodian nobility.

(1×) The personal name Aristobulus, identifying a person whose household included Christians. Romans 16:10 sends greetings 'to those of the household of Aristobulus.' Spanish 'de Aristóbulo,'

French 'Aristobule,' German 'Aristobulus,' English 'of Aristobulus.' Paul's careful phrasing ('those of the household of') rather than greeting Aristobulus himself suggests the household head may not have been a believer, but some in his extended household (slaves, freedmen, family members) had embraced the gospel and met with the Roman church. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: of-Aristoboulos | es: de-Aristobóulou | fr: Aristobule | de: Aristobulus Rom 16:10

ἄριστον G0712 N-GNS (3×)

meal, dinner, feast; a formal dining occasion

This noun denotes a meal or feast, particularly a formal dining event. In the parable of the wedding feast, the king announces 'my dinner is prepared' for the invited guests who made excuses (Matt 22:4). A Pharisee is surprised when Jesus sits down to 'dinner' without first ceremonially washing (Luke 11:38). Jesus advises that when giving a 'feast,' one should invite the poor and disabled rather than friends and relatives (Luke 14:12). The term often appears in contexts of hospitality, social obligation, and kingdom teaching.

(3×) Refers to formal meals in contexts of hospitality and kingdom parables. Matthew 22:4 uses it in the wedding feast parable —'my dinner' (ἄριστόν) is ready, emphasizing the prepared celebration. Luke 11:38 sets Jesus's controversy with Pharisees at 'dinner' (ἀρίστου), where ritual and relationship clash. Luke 14:12 advises about whom to invite when giving 'a dinner' (ἄριστον). The Spanish 'almuerzo/banquete,' French 'repas,' and German forms indicate formal dining occasions that frame social and spiritual teaching. BANQUETS AND FEASTS

en: dinner, lunch, meal | es: almuerzo, banquete | fr: repas | de: ἀρίστου, ἄριστον, ἀριστόν Matt 22:4; Luke 11:38; Luke 14:12

ἀρκ-ετός G0713 Adj-NMS (3×)

sufficient, enough, adequate for what is needed

This adjective means sufficient or enough for a given purpose. Jesus teaches that each day's trouble is 'sufficient' for that day —don't borrow tomorrow's anxiety (Matt 6:34). He tells disciples it is 'enough' for them to become like their teacher (Matt 10:25). Peter writes that the time already past is 'sufficient' for doing what Gentiles desire; now live differently (1 Pet 4:3). The word emphasizes adequacy without excess, contentment with what meets the need, and the completion of a measure.

(3×) Denotes what is enough or adequate for its purpose. Matthew 6:34 teaches that each day's evil is 'sufficient' (ἀρκετὸν) for itself —no need to add tomorrow's worry. Matthew 10:25 says it is 'sufficient' (ἀρκετὸν) for disciples to be like their master. First Peter 4:3 declares the past time 'sufficient' (ἀρκετὸς) for indulging fleshly desires. The French 'suffire' and Spanish 'suficiente' capture the sense of adequacy and completion, marking the point where something meets its required measure. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: sufficient | es: suficiente | fr: suffire | de: ἀρκετὸν, ἀρκετὸς Matt 6:34; Matt 10:25; 1Pet 4:3

ἀρκέω G0714 V-PIA-3S (8×)

To be sufficient or enough; in the middle voice, to be content or satisfied with what one has.

A verb that in the active voice means 'to be enough' and in the middle/passive voice shifts to 'be content, be satisfied.' When Philip says two hundred denarii would not 'suffice' for bread (John 6:7), and when Jesus tells Philip that seeing the Father would 'be enough' (John 14:8), the focus is on objective adequacy. But when John the Baptist tells soldiers to 'be content' with their wages (Luke 3:14), and when the writer of Hebrews urges contentment with what one has (Heb 13:5), the focus moves inward to a disposition of the heart. Paul's encounter with divine grace bridges both: 'My grace is sufficient for you' (2 Cor 12:9) — objectively enough, and a call to rest content in it.

1. be sufficient, be enough (4×) To be sufficient, to be enough — used of things, provisions, or resources that meet a need or satisfy a requirement. Philip calculates that two hundred denarii of bread would not 'suffice' for the crowd (John 6:7), the foolish virgins are told there may not be 'enough' oil for all (Matt 25:9), and Jesus responds to Philip's request to see the Father with 'does that not suffice you?' (John 14:8). The Lord's declaration to Paul — 'my grace is sufficient for you' (2 Cor 12:9) — elevates this sense to its theological summit. Spanish 'basta' (it is enough) captures the crisp impersonal force. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: are-sufficient, it-is-enough, sufficient | es: Te-basta, alcance, basta | fr: suffire | de: genuegen, ἀρκέσῃ Matt 25:9; John 6:7; John 14:8; 2Cor 12:9

2. be content, be satisfied (4×) To be content, to be satisfied with one's circumstances — middle/passive voice forms expressing an inner disposition of satisfaction rather than objective quantity. John the Baptist commands soldiers to 'be content' with their wages (Luke 3:14), Paul teaches that food and covering should make us content (1 Tim 6:8), Hebrews exhorts contentment free from the love of money (Heb 13:5), and Diotrephes, ironically, is 'not content' with his position (3 John 1:10). Spanish 'contentaos/contentándoos' and English 'being-content' consistently mark this as a settled posture of the will, not merely having enough. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: be-content, being-content, being-satisfied | es: contentaos, contentándoos, contentándose | fr: suffire | de: genuegen, ἀρκεῖσθε Luke 3:14; 1Tim 6:8; Heb 13:5; 3John 1:10

ἄρκτος G0715 N-GFS (1×)

a bear (the animal)

This feminine noun denotes the bear, specifically Ursus arctos, the brown bear that inhabited ancient Greece and the Near East. Classical usage includes both the literal animal and the constellation Ursa Major (the Great Bear). Homer refers to the constellation as both Arktos and Hamaxa (the Wagon). The word could also indicate direction (the north, toward where the bears/constellation are). John's Apocalypse uses it in symbolic animal imagery, describing the beast from the sea as having feet like a bear's.

(1×) A bear (the animal), used symbolically in apocalyptic imagery. Revelation 13:2 describes the beast rising from the sea: 'the beast which I saw was like a leopard, and his feet were like a bear's, and his mouth like a lion's mouth.' All translations preserve the animal designation: Spanish 'de oso,' French 'Baer,' German 'Baer,' English 'of a bear.' Drawing on Daniel's vision of symbolic beasts, John combines predatory features—the bear's powerful feet contribute to the composite image of imperial, satanic power. Bears were known for strength and ferocity in ancient Near Eastern imagery. BEAR ANIMAL en: of-a-bear | es: de-oso | fr: Baer | de: Baer Rev 13:2

ἅρμα G0716 N-DNS (4×)

harma – chariot; a wheeled vehicle drawn by horses, used for travel or war

The neuter noun harma ('chariot') denotes a horse-drawn wheeled vehicle, covering the full range from war-chariots to racing-chariots to travelling-carriages. In classical Greek it could also metonymically refer to the team of horses themselves. The New Testament's four occurrences split between two vivid scenes: in Acts 8:28-38, the Ethiopian eunuch is reading Isaiah while riding in his chariot on the Gaza road, and Philip runs alongside, climbs in, and baptizes him – here harma is a travelling carriage. In Rev 9:9, the sound of the demonic locusts' wings is compared to 'the sound of chariots' rushing to battle – evoking the war-chariot tradition. Spanish carro, French char, and German Streitwagen all reflect the vehicular core meaning.

(4×) A horse-drawn wheeled vehicle, encompassing both the travelling-chariot (as in Acts 8:28-29, 38, where the Ethiopian eunuch rides and reads Scripture on the road to Gaza) and the war-chariot evoked in apocalyptic imagery (Rev 9:9, where the noise of demonic locusts is likened to chariots charging into battle). German Streitwagen ('battle-wagon') highlights the martial connotation prominent in classical usage, while Spanish carro and French char cover the broader vehicular sense. The word's classical breadth – racing, travelling, warring – is narrowed in the NT to these two specific narrative contexts. CHARIOTS AND WAGONS

en: chariot, of-chariots | es: carro, de-carros | fr: char | de: Streitwagen, ἅρμα, ἅρματι Acts 8:28; Acts 8:29; Acts 8:38; Rev 9:9

Ἁρμαγεδών G0717 N-NNS (1×)

Harmagedon (Hebrew: Har Megiddo, the mountain/hill of Megiddo)

This is the Greek transliteration of Hebrew Har Megiddo, meaning 'Mountain of Megiddo.' Megiddo was an ancient fortress city in northern Israel, site of numerous decisive battles throughout Israelite history (Deborah vs. Canaanites, Josiah's death fighting Pharaoh Neco). The valley of Megiddo symbolized decisive divine judgment and warfare in Jewish apocalyptic thought. John uses it as the gathering place for the final eschatological battle between God and the forces of evil—Armageddon has become synonymous with ultimate conflict.

(1×) The place name Har-Magedon (Armageddon), symbolizing the final apocalyptic battlefield. Revelation 16:16 states that demonic spirits 'assembled them at the place that in Hebrew is called Harmagedon.' The translations preserve the transliterated name with slight variations: Spanish 'Armageddon,' French 'Harmagedon,' German 'Harmagedon,' English 'Harmageddon.' The location evokes Megiddo's history as a battlefield where divine judgment fell on Israel's enemies. John uses this loaded geographical reference to symbolize the ultimate confrontation between divine and demonic powers—the final war at the mountain of decisive judgment. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Harmagedōn | es: Armageddon | fr: Harmagedon | de: Harmagedon Rev 16:16

ἁρμόζω G0718 V-AIM-1S (1×)

to betroth, espouse, join in engagement for marriage

This verb means to join or fit together, and specifically in the middle voice, to betroth or arrange a marriage engagement. Classical usage includes fitting together joints in carpentry, harmonizing musical notes, or arranging marriages. The middle voice emphasizes the subject arranging the betrothal for someone under their care. Paul employs it metaphorically, describing how he 'betrothed' the Corinthian church to Christ as a pure virgin, using the imagery of an ancient father arranging his daughter's marriage.

(1×) To betroth, arrange a marriage engagement; metaphorically, to join believers to Christ. 2 Corinthians 11:2 declares Paul's jealousy for the Corinthians: 'I betrothed you to one husband, to present you as a pure virgin to Christ.' Spanish 'desposé' (betrothed), French 'fiançailles' (betrothal/engagement), German 'verloben' (betroth), English 'I betrothed.' Paul casts himself as the father who arranged the marriage, the Corinthians as the virgin bride, and Christ as the bridegroom. The betrothal is complete but the marriage (eschaton) awaits, and Paul guards against anything that would defile the bride's purity before presentation to her husband. BETROTHAL ENGAGEMENT

en: I-betrothed | es: desposé | fr: fiançailles | de: verloben 2Cor 11:2

ἁρμός G0719 N-GMP (1×)

a joint, juncture where two parts connect

This masculine noun denotes a joint or juncture where two things connect and fit together. Classical usage includes masonry joints, door fastenings, or cracks in stonework. In anatomy it refers to bodily joints where bones connect. The author of Hebrews employs it metaphorically in describing the penetrating power of God's word, which pierces 'to the division of soul and spirit, of joints and marrow'—the word reaches to the deepest, most intimate connections and divisions within human nature.

(1×) Joints, the junctures where bones or parts connect; metaphorically, the deepest inner connections. Hebrews 4:12 describes God's word as 'piercing to the division of soul and spirit, of joints and marrow.' Spanish 'de coyunturas' (of joints), French and German preserve the word 'Gelenk' (joint). The physical imagery is of the word penetrating to where bones connect and where marrow resides —the most protected, interior spaces. Metaphorically, it suggests God's word reaches the most intimate connections and divisions within human nature, discerning thoughts and intentions at the deepest level. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15565 WITH 3 SENSES

en: of-joints | es: de-coyunturas | fr: Gelenk | de: Gelenk Heb 4:12

ἀρνέομαι G0720 V-AIM-2S (33×)

Deny, disavow (a person or truth); renounce, deny oneself (repudiate claims or desires); refuse, reject (decline what is offered).

The Greek verb arneomai is the New Testament's word for the shattering act of denial — most memorably Peter's threefold 'I do not know the man' (Matt 26:70-74). Appearing 33 times, it covers the full range from personal disavowal to theological renunciation to outright refusal. Its most frequent sense is the denial of association with a person or the repudiation of a truth: to deny Christ (Matt 10:33), to deny the faith (1 Tim 5:8; Rev 2:13). But it also serves for self-denial — 'let him deny himself and take up his cross' (Luke 9:23) — and for Titus 2:12's call to renounce ungodliness. Spanish negar/renunciar, French nier/renier, and German verleugnen all orbit the core of disavowal, while the refusal sense in Hebrews 11:24 (Moses 'refused' to be called Pharaoh's grandson) pushes toward Spanish rehusar and a distinct volitional register.

1. deny, disavow (28×) To deny, disavow, or repudiate — declaring something untrue or disowning association with a person, especially in the context of denying Christ or the faith. This dominant sense (28 occurrences) encompasses Peter's threefold denial (Matt 26:70, 72; Mark 14:68, 70; Luke 22:57; John 18:25, 27), Jesus' warning 'whoever denies Me before men, I will deny before My Father' (Matt 10:33), the denial of the Holy and Righteous One (Acts 3:13-14), and the eschatological warning that denying Christ leads to being denied by Him (2 Tim 2:12; Rev 3:8). Spanish negar, French nier/renier, German verleugnen, Arabic ، and Korean 부인하다 all converge on the act of repudiation. The word carries immense theological weight — to deny is to sever relationship. DENY DISOWN RENOUNCE

en: denied, denying, having-denied | es: Negó, habiendo-negado, negando | fr: nier, reniant., renier | de: verleugnen, verleugnend, verleugnet Matt 10:33; Matt 26:70; Matt 26:72; Mark 14:68

2. renounce, deny oneself (3×) To renounce or deny oneself — repudiating one's own claims, desires, or former way of life as an act of discipleship or moral transformation. Three occurrences mark key ethical turning points: Jesus' call to self-denial as the prerequisite for following Him (Luke 9:23, 'let him deny himself'), Paul's insistence that God 'cannot deny Himself' (2 Tim 2:13, meaning He cannot be untrue to His own nature), and the programmatic statement of Christian ethics in Titus 2:12, 'denying ungodliness and worldly desires.' Spanish renunciar, French renoncer, and German sich verleugnen/entsagen shift toward vocabulary of voluntary renunciation, distinguishing this from the betrayal connotation of sense 1. DENY DISOWN RENOUNCE

en: having-denied, let-him-deny, to-deny | es: habiendo-renunciado, negar, niéguese | fr: renier | de: verleugnen, verleugnet Luke 9:23; 2Tim 2:13; Titus 2:12

3. refuse, reject (2×) To refuse or reject — declining something offered, proposed, or expected, with a volitional emphasis on the act of saying no. Only two clear occurrences: Moses 'refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter' (Heb 11:24), a deliberate choice of identity, and Israel's leaders who 'rejected' Moses as ruler (Acts 7:35). Spanish rehusar, French refuser, and German sich weigern introduce refusal vocabulary absent from the denial senses, confirming a distinct speech-act: not repudiating a truth or a person, but declining a status, role, or offer. REJECTION AND REFUSAL en: refused, they-denied | es: negaron, rehusó | fr: nier, renier | de: verleugnen, verleugnet Acts 7:35; Heb 11:24

ἀρνίον G0721 N-NNS (30×)

Lamb — diminutive of arēn; used almost exclusively in Revelation as a christological title for Jesus

A diminutive meaning 'little lamb,' this word appears thirty times in the New Testament, twenty-nine of them in Revelation as the defining title for the risen Christ. The Lamb stands 'as though slain' yet exercises sovereign authority — opening seals, receiving worship, and conquering all opposition (Rev 5:6-13; 17:14). The single occurrence outside Revelation is Jesus's tender commission to Peter: 'Feed my lambs' (John 21:15), where the diminutive conveys the vulnerability of young believers. Spanish Cordero and French agneau both capitalize the term when used as a title, reflecting its exalted christological force.

1. Lamb (29×) The Lamb — a christological title for Christ in Revelation, portraying him as the slain-yet-victorious sacrificial Lamb who redeems, rules, and receives worship. From the throne-room vision where the Lamb alone is worthy to open the scroll (Rev 5:6-12) through the marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev 19:9) and the Lamb's book of life (Rev 21:27), this title carries the full weight of atonement, sovereignty, and eschatological triumph. Spanish Cordero (capitalized), French agneau, and German Lamm consistently mark its exalted, titular character. LAMBS AND SHEEP

en: Lamb, a-Lamb | es: Cordero, Cordero, | fr: agneau | de: Lamm Rev 5:6; Rev 5:8; Rev 5:12; Rev 5:13; Rev 6:1

2. lambs (1×) Literal young lambs, the diminutive's original meaning, applied to the flock Jesus entrusts to Peter's pastoral care. In John 21:15 Jesus says boske ta arnia mou ('feed my lambs'), distinguishing the most vulnerable members of his community from the probata ('sheep') of the following verses. Spanish corderitos (with the diminutive suffix) uniquely captures the tender, small-flock nuance that the Revelation occurrences have sublimated into christological grandeur. LAMBS AND SHEEP

en: lambs | es: corderitos | fr: agneau | de: Lamm John 21:15

ἀροτρ-ιάω G0722 V-PPA-NMS (3×)

plow, work the soil; to till the ground for planting

This verb means to plow or till soil for agriculture. Jesus asks rhetorically if a servant 'plowing' returns from the field expecting immediate thanks (Luke 17:7). Paul quotes the principle that one who 'plows' should plow in hope of sharing the harvest (1 Cor 9:10, twice). The agricultural image illustrates spiritual principles about service, labor, and rightful expectation of provision. Plowing represents the hard preparatory work that anticipates future reward, foundational to Paul's argument about supporting gospel workers.

(3×) Used literally of agricultural plowing but applied to spiritual principles. Luke 17:7 poses a question about a servant 'plowing' (ἀροτριῶντα) or shepherding, illustrating faithful service without immediate reward. First Corinthians 9:10 applies this twice: 'the one plowing' (ἀροτριῶν) should plow in hope, and it was written for us—those doing spiritual labor deserve support. The German forms and French 'labourer' maintain the agricultural sense while the contexts extract principles about labor, hope, and reward. CONTEMPLATE DEVISE PLOW

en: plowing, to-plow | es: arando, arar | fr: labourer | de: ἀροτριᾶν, ἀροτριῶν, ἀροτριῶντα Luke 17:7; 1Cor 9:10

ἄροτρον G0723 N-ANS (1×)

a plow, plough (agricultural implement)

This neuter noun denotes the plow, the essential agricultural implement for tilling soil. Homer mentions plows in agricultural contexts, while later usage includes metaphorical senses (in boxing, a right-handed blow 'from the plow position'). The plural could metaphorically represent land or fields themselves. Jesus employs it in a memorable saying about discipleship commitment: 'No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God'—an image demanding forward focus and unwavering commitment.

(1×) A plow, the agricultural tool for tilling ground; metaphorically, representing committed labor. Luke 9:62 records Jesus's stern word: 'No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God.' All translations preserve the agricultural implement: Spanish 'arado,' French 'charrue,' German and English 'plow.' The image is of a farmer plowing a field—looking backward while trying to plow forward produces crooked furrows and ruins the work. Jesus demands the same unwavering forward focus in discipleship: those who keep looking back to their former life are unfit for kingdom service. LABOR AND TOIL

en: a-plow | es: arado | fr: charrue | de: ἄροτρον Luke 9:62

ἁρπαγ-ή G0724 N-AFS (3×)

greed, plundering, extortion; seizing what belongs to others

This noun denotes robbery, plundering, or the greed that drives such seizure. Jesus condemns the scribes and Pharisees for cleaning the outside of the cup while inside it is full of 'greed and self-indulgence' (Matt 23:25; Luke 11:39). Hebrews 10:34 commends believers for joyfully accepting 'the plundering' of their property, knowing they have better possessions. The word encompasses both the act of seizing and the disposition of greed. The classical meaning of violent seizure informs the NT usage of rapacious taking.

(3×) Denotes both the act of plundering and the greedy spirit behind it. Matthew 23:25 and Luke 11:39 condemn religious leaders for inner 'greed' (ἁρπαγῆς) despite outward cleanliness. Hebrews 10:34 celebrates believers' joy amid 'the plundering' (ἁρπαγὴν) of their possessions, pointing to eternal inheritance. The Spanish terms ('rapiña,' 'robo,' 'despojo'), French 'rapine,' and German 'Raub' all emphasize violent or greedy taking of what belongs to another, whether literal property or metaphorical moral seizure. PLUNDER AND SPOIL

en: greed, plundering | es: de-rapiña, despojo, robo | fr: rapine | de: Raub, ἁρπαγῆς Matt 23:25; Luke 11:39; Heb 10:34

ἁρπαγ-μός G0725 N-AMS (1×)

something to be grasped; a prize, treasure, or act of seizing

This rare noun denotes either the act of seizing/robbery or something seized—a prize to be grasped or treasure to be claimed. Its precise nuance is debated: does it mean 'robbery' (illegitimate seizure) or 'something to be grasped' (a prize worth claiming)? Paul uses it in the Christ hymn of Philippians in a highly contested phrase about Jesus not regarding equality with God as something to be grasped or exploited—the interpretive crux of Christology hinges partly on this word's meaning.

(1×) Something to be grasped, seized, or exploited; or alternatively, an act of robbery or seizure. Philippians 2:6 states Christ 'did not regard equality with God as something to be grasped/exploited.' Spanish 'como robo' (as robbery), French and German preserve the Greek form, English 'something to be grasped.' Scholars debate whether this means (1) Jesus didn't regard his divine equality as treasure to clutch possessively, or (2) didn't regard equality with God as something to seize since he already possessed it. Either way, the point is Christ's self-emptying rather than self-exalting—he didn't exploit divine privilege but humbled himself. ADORN DECORATE PREPARE en: something-to-be-grasped | es: como-robo | fr: ἁρπαγμὸν | de: Raub Phil 2:6

ἁρπάζω G0726 V-PIA-3S (14×)

To seize or snatch by force; to be caught up in divine transport; to plunder or carry off goods.

Harpazo is a word of violent, sudden motion — a snatching that allows no resistance. Wolves snatch sheep (John 10:12), the evil one snatches away seed sown in the heart (Matt 13:19), and a crowd tries to seize Jesus by force to make him king (John 6:15). Yet the same forceful verb ascends to describe divine transport: Paul 'was caught up' to the third heaven (2 Cor 12:2, 4), believers will be 'caught up' to meet the Lord in the air (1 Thess 4:17), and the male child is 'snatched up' to God's throne (Rev 12:5). Spanish arrebatar, French ravir, and German entrucken all distinguish this supernatural catching-up from ordinary seizure, while the underlying Greek makes no such lexical distinction — the same violent urgency characterizes God's rescue as a wolf's attack.

1. snatch or seize by force (9×) To seize, snatch, or take by force — the core sense of violent, sudden appropriation. The wolf snatches the sheep (John 10:12), the evil one snatches away the word sown in the heart (Matt 13:19), and no one can snatch believers out of the Father's hand (John 10:28-29). In Matt 11:12 the kingdom of heaven 'suffers violence, and the violent seize it by force.' Spanish arrebatar, French arracher/saisir, and German rauben/reissen all emphasize the irresistible, forceful character of the action. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

en: seize, snatched-away, snatches | es: arrebata, arrebatan, arrebatando | fr: arrachant;, enlever, saisir | de: rauben, reißend, ἁρπάζει Matt 11:12; Matt 13:19; John 6:15; John 10:12; John 10:28

2. catch up in divine transport (4×) To be caught up or carried away by divine power — supernatural transport rather than human violence. Paul recounts being 'caught up to the third heaven' and 'caught up into paradise' (2 Cor 12:2, 4), believers will be 'caught up in the clouds' at the Lord's return (1 Thess 4:17), and the child is 'snatched up to God and to his throne' (Rev 12:5). Spanish arrebatado, French enleve, and German entruckt shift toward ecstatic or heavenly vocabulary. The theological weight is profound: the same verb that describes a predator's seizure here describes God's sovereign rescue. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

en: having-been-caught-up, he-was-caught-up, was-snatched-away | es: arrebatado, fue-arrebatado, seremos-arrebatados | fr: enlever, saisir | de: rauben 2Cor 12:2; 2Cor 12:4; 1Thess 4:17; Rev 12:5

3. plunder or carry off goods (1×) To plunder or carry off goods — robbing possessions from a place by force. In Matt 12:29, Jesus asks how anyone can enter a strong man's house and 'plunder his goods' without first binding the strong man. Spanish saquear and German plundern both deploy dedicated robbery vocabulary, confirming this as a distinct property-focused sense rather than person-focused seizure. SEIZING AND SNATCHING en: to-plunder | es: saquear | fr: saisir | de: ἁρπάσαι Matt 12:29

ἅρπαξ G0727 Adj-NMP (5×)

Rapacious, greedy, predatory; as a noun, a robber, swindler, or extortioner.

This adjective-turned-noun describes someone who seizes by force or takes what belongs to others – a predatory, grasping person. Jesus uses it memorably of wolves in sheep's clothing who are 'ravenous' (Matt 7:15), and the Pharisee in the temple thanks God that he is not like 'robbers' (Luke 18:11). Paul lists the harpax alongside the greedy, idolaters, and drunkards in his catalogs of those excluded from God's kingdom (1 Cor 5:10-11; 6:10). Spanish captures the range well with 'rapaz' (predatory) and 'ladrones' (thieves), while French 'ravisseur' emphasizes the violent seizure at the word's core. The underlying verb harpazo ('to snatch') reveals the etymological force: these are people who grab what is not theirs.

(5×) Rapacious, predatory, or swindling; describing someone who seizes others' property by violence or fraud. In Matt 7:15, Jesus warns of false prophets who come as sheep but are 'ravenous' (harpax) wolves – the most vividly metaphorical usage. Luke 18:11 places robbers in the Pharisee's self-righteous prayer as a category of sinners. Paul's vice lists in 1 Cor 5:10-11 and 6:10 pair the harpax with the greedy (pleonektai), indicating both violent and cunning forms of taking. The word's root in harpazo ('to snatch, seize') gives all five occurrences a visceral, physical quality. Spanish 'rapaz/ladrones' and French 'ravisseur' preserve the predatory connotation effectively. GAIN AND GREED

en: ravenous, robbers, swindler | es: ladrones, rapaces, rapaz | fr: ravisseur | de: ἅρπαγες, ἅρπαξ, ἅρπαξιν Matt 7:15; Luke 18:11; 1Cor 5:10; 1Cor 5:11; 1Cor 6:10

ἀρραβών G0728 N-NMS (3×)

deposit, down payment, guarantee; first installment ensuring full payment to come

This noun signifies a deposit or earnest money that guarantees future full payment. Paul uses it exclusively in a spiritual sense: God has given believers the Spirit as 'a deposit' guaranteeing our inheritance (Eph 1:14), as 'earnest' of what is to come (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5). The commercial term from Semitic business practice becomes a powerful theological metaphor. The Spirit's present indwelling is both proof of ownership and advance installment of future resurrection glory. What we experience now is the down payment on full redemption.

(3×) Exclusively Pauline, describing the Holy Spirit as God's guarantee of future inheritance. Second Corinthians 1:22 and 5:5 speak of God giving 'the deposit' (ἀρραβῶνα) of the Spirit in our hearts —earnest money ensuring complete redemption. Ephesians 1:14 calls the Spirit 'the guarantee' (ἀρραβὼν) of our inheritance until God's possession is redeemed. The commercial background (Semitic loanword, Hebrew 'ērābōn') enriches Paul's theology: present Spirit = down payment on future glory. Spanish 'arras,' French 'arrhes,' German 'Unterpfand' (pledge) preserve the commercial guarantee concept. PLEDGES AND SECURITY

en: guarantee, pledge | es: anticipo, arras | fr: arrhes, ἀρραβὼν | de: Unterpfand 2Cor 1:22; 2Cor 5:5; Eph 1:14

ἄρραφος G0729 Adj-NMS (1×)

seamless, without seam or stitching

This adjective describes something woven or made without seams—not stitched together from pieces but made as a continuous whole. Medical writers use it for body parts without sutures. John employs it to describe Jesus's tunic at the crucifixion—a seamless garment woven in one piece from top to bottom, which the soldiers chose not to tear but to gamble for intact. This detail may evoke the high priest's seamless robe, adding symbolic depth to John's crucifixion account.

(1×) Seamless, woven as one continuous piece without stitched seams. John 19:23 describes Jesus's tunic as 'seamless, woven in one piece from top to bottom.' Spanish 'sin costura,' French 'sans couture,' German 'ohne Naht' (without seam), English 'seamless.' The soldiers' decision not to tear this valuable seamless garment but to cast lots for it fulfills Psalm 22:18. Some interpreters see symbolic significance—the seamless robe may echo the high priest's garment (Exodus 28:32) or represent the unity of Christ's work and person, which cannot be divided. LINEN AND FABRIC en: seamless | es: sin-costura | fr: sans-couture | de: ohne-Naht John 19:23

ἄρσην G0730 N-NNS (9×)

Male; a man or boy as distinguished from female, used of biological sex in creation theology and moral instruction.

Arsen is the standard Greek adjective-turned-substantive for 'male,' forming the natural counterpart to thelys ('female'). Its most foundational NT usage appears in Jesus' appeal to creation: 'male and female he made them' (Matt 19:4; Mark 10:6), quoting Genesis 1:27 to ground marriage theology. Luke 2:23 cites the Mosaic law that every firstborn male shall be consecrated to the Lord. Paul employs it in Romans 1:27 to describe same-sex relations as a departure from the created order, and Galatians 3:28 declares that in Christ there is neither male nor female. The Spanish 'varon' and French 'male' both emphasize the biological-category sense, while Revelation 12:5 applies it to the male child destined to rule the nations.

male, man (as opposed to female) (9×) A male person or the male sex, used substantively to denote biological sex in contrast to female (thelys). Jesus quotes Genesis 1:27 in Matt 19:4 and Mark 10:6 ('male and female he created them') to establish creation-order teaching on marriage. Luke 2:23 applies the Mosaic consecration law to every male opening the womb. Romans 1:27 uses the term twice for males in same-sex relations. Galatians 3:28 transcends the male-female distinction in Christ, and Revelation 12:5 speaks of a male child destined to rule. All occurrences share the single sense of biological maleness. MALE PERSON ANIMAL en: male, males | es: varones, varón | fr: mâle | de: maennlich, ἄρσεν Matt 19:4; Mark 10:6; Luke 2:23; Rom 1:27

ἄρρητος G0731 Adj-ANP (1×)

inexpressible, unspeakable, unable to be uttered

This adjective describes something that cannot be spoken or expressed in words—either because it's beyond human language to capture, or because it's forbidden to divulge. Classical usage includes both things too sacred to speak (mystery rites, divine names) and things too immense to express (immeasurable distances, unspeakable glory). Paul uses it to describe the words he heard in paradise—things so sacred or transcendent that they cannot and must not be uttered by human tongue.

(1×) Inexpressible, unspeakable; things that cannot or must not be uttered. 2 Corinthians 12:4 describes Paul's experience: he 'was caught up into paradise and heard inexpressible words, which it is not lawful for a person to speak.' Spanish 'inefables' (ineffable), French 'indicible' (unspeakable), German 'unaussprechlich,' English 'inexpressible.' The double emphasis (inexpressible + unlawful to speak) suggests both transcendent mystery beyond human language and sacred prohibition against revealing divine secrets. Paul heard heaven's language but cannot translate it for earthly ears—some revelations are meant to strengthen the recipient, not be broadcast. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 9012 WITH 4 SENSES

en: inexpressible | es: inefables | fr: indicible | de: unaussprechlich 2Cor 12:4

ἄρρωστ-ος G0732 Adj-DMP (5×)

Sick, ill; physically weak or infirm; used of those needing healing from bodily disease.

Describes a person who is physically ill or enfeebled by disease. In the Gospels, it appears in contexts of Jesus' healing ministry—the crowds bring the arrostous to him (Matt 14:14), and the disciples anoint the sick with oil (Mark 6:13). Paul also uses it in 1 Cor 11:30 to describe weakness among the Corinthian assembly. Spanish 'enfermos' and French 'malade' both confirm the consistently medical sense, distinguishing this term from merely spiritual or moral weakness.

(5×) Physically sick or ill, describing a bodily condition of disease or infirmity that calls for healing. All five NT occurrences involve concrete physical ailment: Jesus healing the sick (Matt 14:14; Mark 6:5, 13), a promise about laying hands on the sick (Mark 16:18), and Paul's warning about weakness from unworthy communion (1 Cor 11:30). The multilingual evidence—Spanish 'enfermos,' French 'malade'—uniformly points to bodily illness rather than the moral or metaphorical weakness attested in classical Greek. SICKNESS AND ILLNESS

en: sick, they-will-have | es: enfermos | fr: malade | de: ἀρρώστοις, ἀρρώστους, ἄρρωστοι Matt 14:14; Mark 6:5; Mark 6:13; Mark 16:18; 1Cor 11:30

ἀρρενο-κοίτης G0733 N-DMP (2×)

men who engage in homosexual acts

A compound noun literally meaning 'male-bedders,' referring to men who engage in sexual relations with males. Paul includes this term in two vice lists (1 Corinthians 6:9; 1 Timothy 1:10) among practices incompatible with the kingdom of God or sound doctrine. The term appears rarely in Greek literature, always with negative connotation. Classical usage referred to pederasty or male prostitution, though the precise scope remains debated among scholars.

(2×) Both Pauline occurrences embed the term in catalogs of serious vices. In 1 Corinthians 6:9 it follows 'effeminate' (μαλακοί) in what may be a pair referring to passive and active partners. In 1 Timothy 1:10 it appears in a list drawn from the Decalogue's moral framework. Modern translations struggle with precision, as evidenced by the multilingual glosses using generic 'homosexuals' terminology. The German 'Knabenschänder' (boy-violator) reflects older interpretation focusing on pederastic abuse specifically. SEXUAL IMMORALITY

en: for-homosexuals, homosexuals | es: homosexuales | fr: sodomite, ἀρσενοκοίταις | de: Knabenschaender 1Cor 6:9; 1Tim 1:10

Ἀρτεμᾶς G0734 N-AMS (1×)

Artemas (a Christian associate of Paul)

This is a shortened form of the Greek name Artemidoros or Artemidorus, meaning 'gift of Artemis.' Paul mentions Artemas in his letter to Titus as someone he plans to send to Crete, allowing Titus to leave and join Paul for the winter. The reference suggests Artemas was a trusted co-worker capable of stepping into Titus's leadership role in the Cretan churches. Nothing else is known about him from Scripture.

(1×) The personal name Artemas, identifying one of Paul's co-workers. Titus 3:12 instructs: 'When I send Artemas or Tychicus to you, make every effort to come to me at Nicopolis.' Spanish 'a Artemas,' French preserves the Greek accusative, German 'Artemas,' English 'Artemas.' Paul's plan to send either Artemas or Tychicus as Titus's replacement indicates both were trusted associates capable of temporary leadership in Crete while Titus traveled to join Paul for winter ministry. The name's connection to the goddess Artemis suggests possible pagan origins before conversion. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Artemas | es: a-Artemâs | fr: Ἀρτεμᾶν | de: Artemas Titus 3:12

Ἄρτεμις G0735 N-NFS (5×)

Artemis; the Greek goddess worshipped at Ephesus, whose temple was one of the Seven Wonders of the ancient world.

The proper name of the goddess Artemis, the patron deity of Ephesus whose magnificent temple drew pilgrims and sustained a thriving silversmith trade. All five NT occurrences cluster in Acts 19, where Paul's preaching provokes a riot among craftsmen who make silver shrines of Artemis. The crowd's chant 'Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!' (Acts 19:28, 34) captures the civic-religious fervor surrounding her cult. Spanish 'Artemis' and French 'Artemis' transliterate directly, while the genitive 'Artemidos' in the Greek text reflects the possessive used for her temple and worship.

(5×) The Greek goddess Artemis, specifically in her Ephesian manifestation as a fertility and civic deity, whose worship centered on the famous temple at Ephesus. All five occurrences appear in Acts 19:24–35, documenting the economic and religious upheaval caused by the gospel's impact on her cult. Demetrius the silversmith rallies his guild by warning that Paul's monotheistic preaching threatens both their livelihood and the goddess's honor (Acts 19:24, 27). The multilingual consistency—Spanish 'Artemis,' French 'Artemis'—reflects the universal recognition of this proper noun. GODS AND DEITIES

en: Artemis, of-Artemis | es: de-Ártemis, Ártemis | fr: Artémis | de: Ἀρτέμιδος, Ἄρτεμις Acts 19:24; Acts 19:27; Acts 19:28; Acts 19:34; Acts 19:35

ἀρτέμ-ων G0736 N-AMS (1×)

The foresail or mainsail of a ship, a nautical term for the principal sail used in navigation

In nautical contexts, this refers to a ship's foresail or main sail, the primary canvas used to catch wind and propel the vessel forward. The term appears in Acts during Paul's dramatic shipwreck narrative, where the crew hoisted this sail to beach the ship. Ancient Mediterranean sailors depended on such sails for navigation, making this a technical maritime term that Luke preserves with precision.

(1×) The singular occurrence in Acts 27:40 describes the crew raising the foresail as they attempted to run the ship aground on Malta's shore. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'vela-de-proa' = prow-sail, French 'voile' = sail) confirms the nautical specificity of this rare New Testament term, preserved only in Luke's detailed shipwreck account. SHIP SEA VESSEL

en: foresail | es: vela-de-proa | fr: voile | de: ἀρτέμωνα Acts 27:40

ἄρτι G0737 Adv (36×)

Now, just now, at the present moment; marks temporal immediacy or the current time

An adverb anchoring action in the immediate present, often with a nuance of 'right now' or 'at this very moment.' In the New Testament it appears in statements of temporal urgency and contrast—Jesus tells John the Baptist 'permit it just now' (Matt 3:15), and tells his disciples 'you will not see me from now on' (Matt 23:39). The word can shade toward the recent past ('just now,' as when the ruler says his daughter 'has just died,' Matt 9:18) or emphasize the present in contrast to what is coming. Translations across languages uniformly render it as a present-time marker: Spanish 'ahora,' French 'maintenant,' German 'jetzt.'

now (36×) Temporal adverb indicating the present moment or what has just occurred. Across all 36 occurrences, the word centers on immediacy: 'just now' (Matt 9:18), 'from now on' (Matt 23:39, 26:29), or 'at the present time' (1 Cor 13:12). The multilingual evidence —Spanish 'ahora,' French 'maintenant,' German 'jetzt'—converges on a single temporal sense with no semantic split, though English glosses show a subtle range from 'now' to 'just now' to 'present.' NOW (TEMPORAL ADVERB)

en: just-now, now, present | es: ahora | fr: maintenant | de: jetzt Matt 3:15; Matt 9:18; Matt 11:12; Matt 23:39; Matt 26:29

ἀρτι-γέννητος G0738 Adj-NNP (1×)

Newborn, just-born; describing infants in their earliest stage of life

This compound word literally means 'just-generated' or 'newly-born,' emphasizing the extreme youth and fresh beginning of an infant's life. Peter uses it metaphorically in his first epistle, urging believers to crave spiritual nourishment like newborn babies instinctively desire milk. The image captures both vulnerability and intense hunger, painting Christian discipleship as a natural, life-sustaining need rather than mere duty.

(1×) Peter's metaphor in 1 Peter 2:2 draws on the universal image of nursing infants to describe spiritual appetite. The translations consistently emphasize 'newborn' status (Spanish 'recién-nacidos,' German 'neugeboren'), highlighting the fresh, dependent state that should characterize believers' relationship to God's word, craving it as naturally as babies crave mother's milk. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: newborn | es: recién-nacidos | fr: ἀρτιγέννητα | de: neugeboren 1Pet 2:2

ἄρτιος G0739 Adj-NMS (1×)

Complete, perfect, fully equipped; fitted exactly for its purpose or thoroughly prepared Classical Greek used this word to describe things 'complete of their kind' or 'exactly fitted'—armor that matches perfectly, words spoken to the purpose, minds in accord. Paul adopts it in 2 Timothy to describe the God-breathed Scripture's effect: making the servant of God 'complete' or 'thoroughly equipped' for every good work. It conveys not mere adequacy but comprehensive preparation, the kind of wholeness that leaves nothing lacking.

(1×) In 2 Timothy 3:17, Paul describes Scripture's goal as producing someone who is 'complete' (Spanish 'completo,' German 'vollkommen' = perfect). The word's classical sense of being 'exactly fitted' or 'suitable' enriches the verse—God's word doesn't just inform but comprehensively equips, producing workers who are whole, mature, and ready for any task God assigns. PERFECTION AND WHOLENESS

en: complete | es: completo | fr: ἄρτιος | de: vollkommen 2Tim 3:17

ἄρτος G0740 N-GMP (97×)

Bread, loaf — baked grain food as daily sustenance; figuratively, the bread of life, the bread of the Presence, and eucharistic bread

Artos is the common Greek word for bread or a loaf, appearing 97 times across the New Testament. As the staple food of the ancient Mediterranean, bread features in miracle narratives — the feeding of the five thousand (Matt 14:17-19) and four thousand (Matt 15:34-36) — and in the petition 'give us today our daily bread' (Matt 6:11). Jesus transforms it into a christological symbol: 'I am the bread of life' (John 6:35), and at the Last Supper bread becomes the sign of his body given for many (Matt 26:26; 1 Cor 11:23-24). The Old Testament background of the bread of the Presence (Matt 12:4) and the manna in the wilderness gives the word layers of covenantal memory that every occurrence in the Gospels implicitly activates.

bread, loaf (97×) Bread or a loaf — the primary grain-based food of the ancient world, used literally for daily sustenance and miraculous provision (Matt 6:11; 14:17; 15:34), and figuratively for spiritual nourishment and eucharistic sign. Jesus' declaration 'I am the bread of life' (John 6:35) and the Last Supper institution ('this is my body,' Matt 26:26) give artos a sacramental weight beyond its everyday meaning. Spanish 'pan,' French 'pain,' and German 'Brot' all preserve the single-word simplicity, but the theological resonance — manna, showbread, eucharist — accumulates across the narrative. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: bread, loaf | es: pan | fr: pain | de: Brot Matt 4:4; Matt 6:11; Matt 7:9; Matt 15:2; Matt 15:26

ἀρτύω G0741 V-FIP-3S (3×)

season, make flavorful; to add flavor or preserve through seasoning

This verb means to season food, making it flavorful or preserving it. Jesus uses it metaphorically: if salt loses its saltiness, how can it 'be seasoned' again? It becomes useless (Mark 9:50; Luke 14:34). Paul instructs that speech should always be gracious, 'seasoned with salt,' enabling fitting responses (Col 4:6). The culinary term becomes a metaphor for preserving effectiveness and adding grace. Just as salt seasons and preserves food, believers' words should be marked by grace that makes them both palatable and preserving of truth.

(3×) Used of seasoning salt (literally) and speech (metaphorically). Mark 9:50 and Luke 14:34 ask how salt that has lost flavor can 'be seasoned' (ἀρτυθήσεται/ἁλισθήσεται)—rhetorical question showing impossibility. Colossians 4:6 commands speech 'seasoned' (ἠρτυμένος) with salt, gracious and apt for each person. The culinary imagery (French 'assaisonner,' Spanish 'sazonada') conveys adding flavor and preservation, applied to both salt's literal function and believers' gracious, effective communication. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: having-been-seasoned, will-it-be-seasoned, will-you-season | es: sazonada, sazonaréis, será-sazonada | fr: assaisonner | de: ἀρτυθήσεται, ἀρτύσετε, ἠρτυμένος Mark 9:50; Luke 14:34; Col 4:6

Ἀρφαξάδ G0742 N-GMS (1×)

Arphaxad, a patriarch listed in Luke's genealogy of Jesus, son of Shem and ancestor of Abraham

Arphaxad (from Hebrew אַרְפַּכְשַׁד) appears in Luke's genealogy as a post-flood patriarch, son of Shem and grandfather of Eber. Genesis 11 records him being born two years after the flood and living 438 years. Luke traces Jesus' lineage through this ancient ancestor to establish Christ's connection to the promises given to Abraham's line, grounding the gospel in the oldest streams of biblical history.

(1×) Luke 3:36 places Arphaxad in the genealogical chain between Shem and Shelah. The consistent transliteration across languages (Spanish 'Arphaxád,' French 'Arphaxad') reflects the Hebrew original. This genealogical link connects Jesus not just to Abraham but to the post-diluvian renewal of humanity, emphasizing the universal scope of God's redemptive plan through one particular family line. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Arphaxad | es: Arphaxád | fr: Arphaxad | de: Ἀρφαξάδ Luke 3:36

ἀρχάγγελος G0743 N-NMS (2×)

archangel, a chief or ruling angel

A term meaning chief angel or archangel, denoting a high-ranking angelic being. Paul mentions the archangel's voice announcing Christ's return (1 Thessalonians 4:16). Jude refers to 'Michael the archangel' disputing with the devil over Moses' body (Jude 1:9). The compound combines 'ruler/chief' with 'angel,' indicating hierarchical structure in the angelic realm. Jewish apocalyptic literature developed elaborate angelologies featuring archangels as leaders of heavenly hosts.

(2×) The two New Testament occurrences present the archangel in eschatological and spiritual warfare contexts. In 1 Thessalonians, the archangel's shout accompanies Christ's parousia. In Jude, Michael the archangel models restraint even when contending with Satan, refusing to pronounce blasphemous judgment. The term is universally transliterated across languages (Spanish 'arcángel', French 'archange', German 'Erzengel'), showing it has become standardized theological vocabulary. ANGELS AND MESSENGERS

en: archangel, of-archangel | es: arcángel, de-arcángel | fr: archange,, ἀρχαγγέλου | de: Erzengel 1Thess 4:16; Jude 1:9

ἀρχαῖος G0744 Adj-DMS (11×)

Ancient, old, from the beginning — pertaining to what existed long ago or to persons and things of former times

The adjective ἀρχαῖος (archaios) describes what is ancient, original, or belonging to earlier times. Jesus invokes it in the Sermon on the Mount when he says, 'You have heard that it was said to those of old' (Matt 5:21, 33), establishing his authority to fulfill and surpass the ancient Torah teaching. The crowds speculate that 'one of the ancient prophets' has risen (Luke 9:8, 19). In Acts, Peter appeals to what God decided 'in the early days' (Acts 15:7), and James notes that Moses has been proclaimed 'from ancient generations' (Acts 15:21). Revelation calls Satan 'the ancient serpent' (Rev 12:9; 20:2), linking him to the Genesis narrative. Spanish 'antiguo' and French 'ancien' both carry the temporal depth.

ancient, old, from the beginning (11×) Pertaining to former times or earlier generations — ancient, old. Jesus uses it to reference the Torah commandments given 'to those of old' (Matt 5:21, 33), while the crowds identify Jesus as possibly 'one of the ancient prophets' returned (Luke 9:8, 19). Peter and James appeal to 'early days' and 'ancient generations' at the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:7, 21). Mnason is described as an 'early disciple' (Acts 21:16). Most distinctively, Revelation identifies Satan as 'the ancient serpent' (Rev 12:9; 20:2), reaching back to Genesis 3. Spanish 'antiguo' and German 'alt/uralte' reflect the temporal range from 'early' to 'primordial.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: ancient, ancient-ones, ancients | es: antigua, antigua,, antiguas | fr: ancien | de: alt Matt 5:21; Matt 5:33; Luke 9:8; Luke 9:19; Acts 15:7

Ἀρχέλαος G0745 N-NMS (1×)

Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, who ruled Judea, Samaria, and Idumea after his father's death

Archelaus inherited the most significant portion of his father Herod the Great's kingdom but proved so brutal and incompetent that Rome deposed him after only nine years. Matthew mentions him precisely because Joseph and Mary, returning from Egypt with the child Jesus, feared to settle in Judea under his rule and went instead to Galilee. This single reference captures a crucial moment when political brutality shaped the holy family's geography.

(1×) In Matthew 2:22, Joseph's fear of Archelaus redirects the family to Nazareth in Galilee rather than Bethlehem in Judea. The historical Archelaus was notorious for violence, eventually banished by Rome in AD 6. This brief mention, transliterated identically across languages, explains why Jesus grew up in Nazareth rather than his birthplace—a detail that would later puzzle his opponents ('Can anything good come from Nazareth?'). PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Archelaos | es: Archélaos | fr: Archélaüs | de: Ἀρχέλαος Matt 2:22

ἀρχή G0746 N-DFS (57×)

Beginning, origin; a ruler or cosmic principality; the domain or office of authority; a corner or extremity.

One of the most theologically loaded nouns in the New Testament. John opens his Gospel with ἐν ἀρχῇ — 'in the beginning' — deliberately echoing Genesis 1:1 and anchoring Christ in the pre-creation order. Paul then deploys the same word for the invisible 'principalities' (ἀρχαί) of the spiritual realm (Rom 8:38; Col 1:16), a shift from time to hierarchy that Spanish captures by alternating between 'principio' and 'principados.' A third use abstracts further into the 'rule' or 'domain' of authority itself (1 Cor 15:24). Finally, Acts 10:11 repurposes the word concretely for the 'corners' of Peter's visionary sheet — a meaning preserved in English as 'corners' and Spanish as 'extremos.'

1. beginning, commencement (43×) The primary temporal sense (43x): the beginning, commencement, or origin of something. This covers the creation-origin ('in the beginning,' John 1:1–2; Heb 1:10), the start of Jesus' ministry (Mark 1:1), the onset of birth pangs (Matt 24:8), and references to 'from the beginning' (ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς). Spanish 'principio,' French 'commencement,' and German 'Anfang' all consistently render this meaning. The Johannine and Hebrews usage carries special theological weight, deliberately invoking the LXX of Genesis 1:1. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: beginning, the-beginning | es: -principio, el-principio, principio | fr: commencement | de: Anfang Matt 19:4; Matt 19:8; Matt 24:8; Matt 24:21; Mark 1:1

2. ruler, principality (7×) A cosmic-hierarchical sense (7x): supernatural or political rulers, often plural ἀρχαί denoting angelic or demonic powers in the invisible order. Paul's 'principalities and powers' lists (Rom 8:38; Eph 6:12; Col 1:16) make this a key term in New Testament angelology. Spanish distinguishes this clearly as 'principados' or 'gobernantes,' while Luke 12:11 extends the term to earthly magistrates before whom believers may be arraigned. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: rulers, to-rulers | es: a-gobernantes, gobernantes, principados | fr: commencement | de: Anfang Luke 12:11; Rom 8:38; Eph 3:10; Eph 6:12; Col 1:16

3. rule, domain of authority (5×) The abstract sphere or office of ruling — dominion, authority, or governmental power as such (5x). Distinguished from sense 2 by focusing on the authority itself rather than the beings who hold it. In 1 Cor 15:24 Christ destroys every 'rule' (ἀρχήν); in Jude 1:6 angels abandon their proper 'domain.' German 'Herrschaft' and Spanish 'autoridad' capture this abstract-institutional nuance, while Luke 20:20 uses it for the 'authority' of the Roman governor. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: domain, rule | es: autoridad, principado | fr: commencement, domaine, | de: Anfang, Herrschaft Luke 20:20; 1Cor 15:24; Eph 1:21; Col 2:10; Jude 1:6

4. corner, extremity (2×) A concrete spatial sense (2x): the corner or extremity of a physical object. In Peter's rooftop vision (Acts 10:11; 11:5), a great sheet descends held by its four ἀρχαί — its four 'corners.' English 'corners' and Spanish 'extremos' reflect this specialized usage, which derives from the word's root idea of 'starting point' applied to the edges from which a sheet extends. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: corners | es: extremos | fr: commencement | de: Anfang Acts 10:11; Acts 11:5

ἀρχηγός G0747 N-AMS (4×)

archegos – originator, founder, pioneer; one who leads the way and establishes something new

The noun archegos combines arche ('beginning, rule') with ago ('to lead'), producing a rich term that encompasses 'founder,' 'originator,' 'pioneer,' and 'prince.' Classical Greek used it of city founders, tutelary heroes, and ruling chiefs. In the New Testament's four occurrences – all in Acts and Hebrews – it is applied exclusively to Christ. Peter calls Jesus the 'Author of life' whom God raised from the dead (Acts 3:15) and the 'Prince and Savior' exalted to give repentance and forgiveness (Acts 5:31). Hebrews calls him the 'pioneer of salvation' made perfect through suffering (Heb 2:10) and the 'founder and perfecter of faith' (Heb 12:2). German Anfuhrer ('leader, initiator') and French chef ('chief') each capture one facet of this multidimensional title.

(4×) An originator, founder, or pioneer who both initiates and leads – applied in the NT exclusively to Christ in his roles as the source and champion of life, salvation, and faith. Acts 3:15 calls him the 'Author of life' (contrasting the people's choice of a murderer), and Acts 5:31 names him 'Prince and Savior' exalted by God. Hebrews 2:10 presents him as the 'pioneer of salvation' perfected through suffering, while Heb 12:2 crowns him 'founder and perfecter of faith.' German Anfuhrer and Spanish Autor each highlight different dimensions – leadership and authorship – of this theologically dense Christological title. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Originator, author, founder | es: Autor, autor | fr: Anfuhrer, chef | de: Anfuhrer, Ἀρχηγὸν Acts 3:15; Acts 5:31; Heb 2:10; Heb 12:2

ἀρχῑερ-ᾱτικός G0748 Adj-GNS (1×)

High-priestly, pertaining to or characteristic of the office of high priest

This adjective describes anything belonging to or associated with the high priest's office and family. In Acts, Luke uses it to identify the 'high-priestly family' or those of high-priestly lineage who wielded religious and political power in Jerusalem. The term captures the aristocratic, hereditary nature of temple leadership in first-century Judaism, where genealogy and office were inseparable.

(1×) Acts 4:6 refers to those 'of the high-priestly family' (Spanish 'sumo-sacerdotal' = supreme-priestly, French 'souverain-sacrificateur' = sovereign-priest) who gathered to question Peter and John. This describes not just the reigning high priest but the aristocratic clan from which high priests were chosen, families like Annas and Caiaphas who controlled temple affairs and collaborated with Roman power. PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD

en: high-priestly | es: sumo-sacerdotal | fr: souverain-sacrificateur | de: ἀρχιερατικοῦ Acts 4:6

ἀρχῑερ-εύς G0749 N-DMS (123×)

High priest, chief priest — the principal priestly officer of the Jerusalem temple, or collectively the senior priestly leadership

Archiereus combines arche ('chief, first') with hiereus ('priest') to designate the highest-ranking priest. In the singular it refers to the high priest who alone entered the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement — figures like Caiaphas (Matt 26:57) and Annas (John 18:13). In the plural, 'chief priests' denotes the priestly aristocracy who wielded political power in Jerusalem and feature prominently in the passion narratives as opponents of Jesus (Matt 21:23; 26:3). The letter to the Hebrews transforms the term theologically, declaring Jesus the eternal high priest after the order of Melchizedek (Heb 4:14-5:10). Spanish 'sumo sacerdote,' French 'grand pretre,' and German 'Hohepriester' all preserve the compound structure.

high priest, chief priest (123×) The chief priest or high priest of the Jewish temple system, used in the singular for the office-holder who alone performed the Day of Atonement ritual (Caiaphas in Matt 26:57; Annas in Luke 3:2), and in the plural for the broader priestly aristocracy who wielded religious-political authority in Jerusalem (Matt 2:4; 21:23). Hebrews reappropriates the title for Christ as the eternal high priest after Melchizedek's order (Heb 4:14; 9:11). Spanish 'sumo sacerdote/principales sacerdotes,' French 'grand pretre/principaux sacrificateurs,' and German 'Hohepriester/Hohenpriester' reflect the singular-plural distinction. PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD

en: chief-priests | es: principales-sacerdotes, sumos-sacerdotes | fr: grand-prêtre | de: Hohepriester Matt 2:4; Matt 16:21; Matt 20:18; Matt 21:15; Matt 21:23

ἀρχι-ποίμην G0750 N-GMS (1×)

Chief shepherd, a title emphasizing supreme pastoral authority and oversight

This compound word combines 'chief' with 'shepherd,' creating a title that Peter applies to Christ as the supreme pastor over all under-shepherds. In a letter written to church elders about their pastoral duties, Peter points them to the coming revelation of the 'Chief Shepherd' who will reward faithful service. The term distinguishes Jesus from human pastors while affirming their shared shepherding role under his ultimate authority.

(1×) In 1 Peter 5:4, after instructing elders to shepherd God's flock willingly, Peter promises that when the 'Chief Shepherd' appears, faithful pastors will receive an unfading crown. The Spanish 'Príncipe-de-pastores' (Prince of shepherds) and German 'Erzhirte' (arch-shepherd) capture the hierarchical image: human shepherds serve under the supreme Shepherd, accountable to him and rewarded by him. SHEPHERDING AND TENDING

en: Chief-Shepherd | es: Príncipe-de-pastores | fr: Ἀρχιποίμενος | de: Erzhirte 1Pet 5:4

Ἄρχιππος G0751 N-DMS (2×)

Archippus, a Christian co-worker of Paul

A proper name meaning 'master of horse' or 'horse-ruler,' referring to a Christian associated with Paul's circle. Paul greets Archippus in Colossians 4:17, urging him to fulfill the ministry he received in the Lord. In Philemon 1:2, Paul calls him 'our fellow soldier,' indicating close partnership in gospel work. The military language suggests Archippus faced opposition or difficult ministry circumstances. His exact role and location remain unclear, though connection to Colossae seems likely.

(2×) Both references come from the Colossian correspondence. The exhortation in Colossians 4:17 to 'complete' or 'fulfill' his ministry suggests either Archippus faced discouragement or needed reminder of responsibility. The 'fellow soldier' designation in Philemon indicates Paul saw him as frontline ministry partner, not mere adherent. All language witnesses transliterate the name with minor phonetic variation reflecting each language's orthography. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: to-Archippos | es: a-Árchippos | fr: Ἀρχίππῳ | de: Archippus Col 4:17; Phlm 1:2

ἀρχι-συνάγωγος G0752 N-NMS (9×)

Synagogue ruler; the chief official who presided over Jewish synagogue worship and administration.

The archisynagogos was the lay leader responsible for organizing the synagogue's worship services—selecting Scripture readers, inviting speakers, and maintaining decorum. This title appears almost exclusively in the Synoptic narratives about Jairus, the desperate father whose daughter was dying (Mark 5:22-38; Luke 8:49; 13:14). Luke 13:14 shows the synagogue ruler indignant that Jesus healed on the Sabbath, revealing the tension between institutional authority and messianic power. Acts 13:15 and 18:8, 17 mention synagogue rulers in the context of Paul's missionary journeys. Spanish 'jefe-de-sinagoga' and French 'chef-de-synagogue' both capture the administrative leadership role precisely.

synagogue ruler, president of a synagogue (9×) The presiding official of a Jewish synagogue, responsible for organizing worship, selecting readers, maintaining order, and overseeing the facility. Most NT occurrences center on Jairus, the synagogue ruler who begged Jesus to heal his dying daughter (Mark 5:22, 35, 36, 38; Luke 8:49). Luke 13:14 presents a synagogue ruler who objects to Sabbath healing, illustrating institutional resistance to Jesus' ministry. Acts 13:15 mentions rulers who invited Paul to speak, and Acts 18:8, 17 name Crispus and Sosthenes as synagogue rulers in Corinth. The role was civic-religious, combining administrative authority with spiritual oversight. SYNAGOGUE WORSHIP PLACE

en: ruler-of-synagogue, synagogue-ruler, synagogue-rulers | es: jefe-de-sinagoga, jefes-de-la-sinagoga, principal-de-la-sinagoga | fr: chef-de-synagogue | de: ἀρχισυνάγωγοι, ἀρχισυνάγωγον, ἀρχισυνάγωγος Mark 5:22; Mark 5:35; Mark 5:36; Mark 5:38; Luke 8:49

ἀρχι-τέκτων G0753 N-NMS (1×)

Master builder, chief architect; one who designs and directs construction projects

Classical Greek distinguished the master builder or architect who designed and supervised construction from the laborers who carried out the work. Paul adopts this metaphor in 1 Corinthians, describing himself as a 'wise master builder' who laid the gospel foundation in Corinth, while others now build upon it. The term emphasizes both skill and responsibility—the architect's work determines whether the whole structure will stand or fall.

(1×) In 1 Corinthians 3:10, Paul describes himself as a 'wise master builder' (Spanish 'arquitecto,' French 'architecte,' German 'Baumeister') who laid the foundation of Christ in the Corinthian church. The metaphor distinguishes his apostolic work of founding the church from others' subsequent ministry of building on that foundation. Like an architect, Paul's initial design work was crucial—he established the gospel pattern on which everything else must be constructed. BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTING en: master-builder | es: arquitecto | fr: architecte | de: Baumeister 1Cor 3:10

ἀρχι-τελώνης G0754 N-NMS (1×)

Chief tax collector, a senior official overseeing multiple tax collectors in a district

This New Testament coinage describes a supervisory tax collector who managed other publicans. Zacchaeus held this position in Jericho, making him both wealthy and despised—wealthy because he took a cut from multiple collection stations, despised because he led a system that extracted Rome's tribute from his own people. The term appears nowhere else in Greek literature, seemingly Luke's precise description of Zacchaeus's particular administrative role.

(1×) Luke 19:2 introduces Zacchaeus uniquely as a 'chief tax collector' (Spanish 'jefe-de-recaudadores' = boss of collectors). His role supervising other tax collectors in the prosperous Jericho district explains both his great wealth and the crowd's horror when Jesus chose his house for dinner. The compound term emphasizes that Zacchaeus wasn't merely a collaborator but led collaboration, making Jesus' gracious pursuit of him all the more scandalous and transformative. TRIBUTE AND TAX

en: a-chief-tax-collector | es: jefe-de-recaudadores | fr: chef-des-publicains | de: ἀρχιτελώνης Luke 19:2

ἀρχι-τρίκλῖνος G0755 N-NMS (3×)

master of the feast, head waiter; the one overseeing a banquet's arrangements and service

This noun designates the person in charge of a banquet or feast, coordinating the meal and service. In John's account of the Cana wedding, the servants bring water-turned-wine to 'the master of the feast,' who tastes it without knowing its source and praises the bridegroom for saving the best wine until last (John 2:8, 9 twice). This official was responsible for ensuring the feast's success, tasting food and wine, and managing the celebration. His astonishment at the wine's quality highlights the miraculous nature of Jesus's first sign.

(3×) Appears exclusively in John 2:8-9 (three times) as the official overseeing the Cana wedding feast. Servants brought the water-turned-wine to 'the master of the feast' (ἀρχιτρίκλινος) who, unaware of its miraculous origin, tasted it and pronounced it exceptional. His position as banquet overseer made him the appropriate judge of the wine's quality. The French 'maître-du-festin,' Spanish 'maestresala,' and German 'Speisemeister' (feast master) all designate this coordinating role at formal dining occasions. BANQUETS AND FEASTS

en: master-of-the-feast | es: -maestresala, maestresala | fr: maître-du-festin | de: Speisemeister John 2:8; John 2:9

ἄρχω G0756 V-ASM-2P (84×)

Begin, start — to commence or initiate an action, typically followed by an infinitive

In the New Testament, ἄρχομαι (the middle voice of ἄρχω) functions almost exclusively as an auxiliary meaning 'begin' or 'start,' typically governing an infinitive that specifies the action commenced. It marks narrative transitions, signaling new phases of activity — Jesus 'began to preach' (Matt 4:17), 'began to teach' (Mark 4:1), 'began to send' (Mark 6:7). While the active ἄρχω can mean 'to rule' in Classical Greek, the NT uses only the middle with inchoative force. Spanish comenzó, French commencer, and German anfangen uniformly confirm this single sense. The word's frequency (84 occurrences) reflects its structural importance in Gospel narrative style.

begin, start (84×) To begin or commence an action, used in the middle voice (ἄρχομαι) throughout the New Testament with an infinitive complement specifying the activity initiated. Prominent in the Gospels for marking narrative transitions — Jesus 'began to preach' (Matt 4:17), 'began to teach' (Mark 4:1), 'began to show' suffering (Matt 16:21). Spanish comenzó, French commencer, and German anfangen all converge on this single inchoative sense, with no NT attestation of the Classical active meaning 'to rule.' BEGIN START en: began, he-began | es: comenzó | fr: commencer | de: anfangen, beginnt Matt 4:17; Matt 11:7; Matt 11:20; Matt 12:1; Matt 16:21

ἄρχω G0757 V-PNA (2×)

to rule, govern, exercise authority over

A verb meaning to rule, lead, or exercise authority. Jesus notes that Gentile rulers lord it over their subjects (Mark 10:42). Paul quotes Isaiah's prophecy that the root of Jesse will rise 'to rule over the Gentiles' (Romans 15:12). Classical usage encompassed beginning/leading and ruling/commanding - being first in time or first in authority. The New Testament occurrences focus exclusively on the governance sense.

(2×) Both passages address ruling over the nations/Gentiles but with contrasting tones. In Mark 10:42, Jesus critiques how Gentile rulers 'lord it over' subjects, using this as a negative example. In Romans 15:12, Christ's rule over Gentiles is the prophetic hope. The semantic range includes legitimate governance and oppressive domination - context determines valence. Multilingual glosses uniformly use govern/rule terminology across all four languages. RULING AND REIGNING

en: to-rule | es: gobernar, para-gobernar | fr: gouverner | de: herrschen Mark 10:42; Rom 15:12

ἄρχων G0758 N-VMP (37×)

ruler, leader, chief — one who holds authority, whether civic magistrate, religious leader, or supernatural power

Archon is the present participle of archo ('to rule') used as a substantive noun, designating anyone who wields governing authority. In the Gospels it ranges from the synagogue ruler who begs Jesus to raise his daughter (Matt 9:18, 23) to Nicodemus, 'a ruler of the Jews' (John 3:1), to the ominous 'ruler of the demons' applied to Beelzebul (Matt 9:34; 12:24). Jesus himself speaks of 'the ruler of this world' being cast out (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), a usage Paul echoes with 'the rulers of this age who crucified the Lord of glory' (1 Cor 2:6-8). Acts applies it to Sanhedrin members (4:5, 8, 26) and Roman magistrates (16:19). The multilingual glosses converge on authority: Spanish 'gobernante/príncipe,' French 'chef,' German 'Fuerst/Herrscher.'

ruler, leader, chief (37×) One who holds governing authority or official power, whether over a civic body, religious assembly, or spiritual domain. The semantic range spans synagogue officials (Matt 9:18; Luke 8:41), Sanhedrin members (John 3:1; Acts 4:5-8), Roman magistrates (Acts 16:19), and supernatural powers including Satan as 'ruler of this world' (John 12:31; 14:30). The Spanish 'gobernante' and German 'Herrscher' both capture the broad ruling function. Paul's 'rulers of this age' (1 Cor 2:6-8) deliberately blurs the human-demonic boundary. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-ruler, ruler, rulers | es: gobernante, gobernantes, príncipe | fr: chef | de: Fuerst, Herrscher Matt 9:18; Matt 9:23; Matt 9:34; Matt 12:24; Matt 20:25

ἄρωμα G0759 N-GNP (4×)

aroma – spice, aromatic substance; fragrant materials used for burial preparation

The neuter noun aroma (plural aromata) denotes fragrant spices or aromatic substances, particularly those used in ancient burial customs to anoint and preserve the body. All four New Testament occurrences cluster around the burial and resurrection of Jesus: the women buy spices to anoint his body (Mark 16:1), prepare them before the Sabbath rest (Luke 23:56), bring them to the tomb at dawn on Sunday (Luke 24:1), and Nicodemus provides a lavish quantity of myrrh and aloes for the initial wrapping (John 19:40). The word entered many European languages virtually unchanged – French aromate, English 'aroma,' Spanish especias (shifting to the broader 'spices') – testimony to the enduring cultural memory of ancient aromatic practices.

(4×) Fragrant spices or aromatic substances prepared for anointing a corpse, used exclusively in the NT in connection with Jesus's burial and the women's post-resurrection visit to the tomb. Mark 16:1 records the purchase of aromata after the Sabbath, Luke 23:56 their preparation before the rest, Luke 24:1 their transport to the tomb at dawn, and John 19:40 Nicodemus's lavish provision of myrrh and aloes. French aromate preserves the Greek form directly, while Spanish especias generalizes to 'spices,' reflecting the cultural distance from ancient Near Eastern burial customs. SPICE AROMATIC PERFUME

en: having-come, spices | es: especias | fr: aromate | de: Spezereien, ἀρώματα Mark 16:1; Luke 23:56; Luke 24:1; John 19:40

Ἀσάφ G0760 N-NMS (2×)

Asaph, a name appearing in Matthew's genealogy

A Hebrew name (meaning 'collector' or 'gatherer') appearing in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus. Modern critical editions recognize this as likely a textual corruption of 'Asa,' the king of Judah (1 Kings 15). The confusion may have arisen because Asaph was a famous Levitical musician and psalmist (Psalms 73-83), making the name familiar to scribes. Most translations follow manuscripts that read 'Asa' rather than 'Asaph.'

(2×) Both Matthew 1:7-8 references locate this figure in the royal genealogy between Abijah and Jehoshaphat, the position occupied by King Asa in the biblical narrative. The textual variant reflects how manuscript transmission could introduce familiar names in place of less common ones. Modern translation evidence (French 'Asa', German 'Asa') shows most translators adopt the reading 'Asa,' treating 'Asaph' as scribal error despite appearing in several Greek manuscripts. ASA ASAPH NAMES

en: Asaph | es: Asáph | fr: Asa | de: Asa Matt 1:7; Matt 1:8

ἀσάλευτος G0761 Adj-AFS (2×)

unshakable, immovable, firmly fixed

An adjective meaning unable to be shaken or moved. In Acts 27:41, it describes the bow of Paul's shipwrecked vessel becoming stuck fast in the seabed. In Hebrews 12:28, believers receive an unshakable kingdom. The term combines the negative prefix with a verb meaning 'to shake,' producing the sense of stability against external forces. Classical usage applied it to Delos (mythically fixed by Zeus) and to unshakeable faith or ordinances.

(2×) The two occurrences demonstrate literal (Acts 27:41 - ship stuck firmly) and metaphorical (Hebrews 12:28 - kingdom that cannot be shaken) applications. Both emphasize resistance to external forces attempting to move or destabilize. The Hebrews passage contrasts this unshakeable kingdom with shakeable created things being removed. All language witnesses use un-movable or un-shakeable constructions, preserving the Greek negative formation. FIRMNESS AND SECURITY

en: immovable, unshakable | es: inconmovible, inmóvil | fr: inébranlable | de: unerschuetterlich, ἀσάλευτος Acts 27:41; Heb 12:28

ἄσβεστος G0762 Adj-DNS (4×)

unquenchable, inextinguishable; of fire that cannot be put out, especially the fire of divine judgment

Formed from the privative alpha and sbennymi ('to quench'), asbestos describes fire that defies all attempts to extinguish it. In the Synoptic Gospels, John the Baptist warns that the Coming One will burn the chaff with 'unquenchable fire' (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17), and Mark's Jesus twice invokes the 'unquenchable fire' of Gehenna (Mark 9:43, 45). The word carried practical force in classical Greek — Homer used it of inextinguishable flames — but in the NT it belongs entirely to eschatological warning. Spanish 'inextinguible' and French 'inextinguible' both preserve the privative structure, while English 'unquenchable' captures the relentless, unstoppable character of this fire.

(4×) Unquenchable, inextinguishable — describing fire that cannot be put out, used exclusively in the NT for the fire of divine judgment. John the Baptist's threshing-floor imagery (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17) and Jesus' Gehenna warnings (Mark 9:43, 45) all deploy this adjective to convey the finality and inescapability of eschatological punishment. The cross-linguistic evidence is unanimous: Spanish 'inextinguible,' French 'inextinguible,' and English 'unquenchable' all render a single, consistent sense of fire beyond human power to suppress. FIRE AND BURNING

en: unquenchable | es: inextinguible | fr: inextinguible | de: ἀσβέστῳ, ἄσβεστον, ἄσβεστον> Matt 3:12; Mark 9:43; Mark 9:45; Luke 3:17

ἀσέβ-εια G0763 N-AFS (6×)

Ungodliness, impiety; a disposition of irreverence toward God and disregard for divine standards.

Asebeia names the fundamental posture of irreverence toward God – not a single wicked act, but a settled disposition of impiety. Paul introduces it as the target of God's wrath, revealed 'against all ungodliness and unrighteousness' (Rom 1:18), pairing it with adikia (injustice) just as classical Greek writers did. It appears in the promise that the Deliverer will 'banish ungodliness from Jacob' (Rom 11:26), in warnings about the corrosive spread of godless talk (2 Tim 2:16), in the call to renounce 'ungodliness and worldly passions' (Titus 2:12), and in Jude's citation of Enoch against the 'ungodly' (Jude 1:15). German 'Gottlosigkeit' (God-lessness) captures the etymology perfectly.

ungodliness, impiety (6×) The quality or disposition of being ungodly – impiety, irreverence, or disregard for God and his standards. This abstract noun denotes not a specific sin but a fundamental orientation away from God. Romans 1:18 pairs it with adikia (unrighteousness) in the classic twofold framing of human rebellion: irreverence toward God and injustice toward humans. German 'Gottlosigkeit' (literally 'God-lessness') and French 'impiete' both mirror the privative structure of the Greek. The word spans eschatological prophecy (Rom 11:26), pastoral warning (2 Tim 2:16; Titus 2:12), and apocalyptic judgment (Jude 1:15). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: of-ungodliness, ungodliness | es: de-impiedad, impiedad, impiedades. | fr: d'impiété, impiété, impiétés. | de: Gottlosigkeit, Gottlosigkeiten, der-Gottlosigkeit Rom 1:18; Rom 11:26; 2Tim 2:16; Titus 2:12; Jude 1:15

ἀσεβ-έω G0764 V-AIA-3P (1×)

To act impiously or ungodly; to commit sacrilege or show contempt for divine things

Classical Greek used this verb for acts of impiety or sacrilege against gods and sacred things. Jude employs it to describe the actions of false teachers who have infiltrated the church. The word carries moral weight beyond mere unbelief—it implies active contempt, deliberate violation of what is sacred, behavior that flaunts disregard for God. In Jude's apocalyptic warning, these ungodly deeds will be exposed when the Lord comes with his holy ones.

(1×) Jude 1:15 repeats 'ungodly' four times in rapid succession (ungodly sinners, ungodly deeds, acted ungodly), emphasizing the comprehensive impiety of false teachers. The Spanish 'obraron impíamente' (they worked impiously) and German 'gottlos handelten' (godlessly acted) capture the active nature of the offense—not passive unbelief but deliberate sacrilege. The threefold repetition creates a drumbeat of judgment against those who corrupt the faith from within. SIN AND TRANSGRESSION

en: they-acted-ungodly | es: obraron-impíamente | fr: ils-commirent-impiété, | de: sie-gottlos-handelten Jude 1:15

ἀσεβ-ής G0765 Adj-GMP (10×)

An ungodly or impious person, one who lacks reverence for God and lives in disregard of divine law

A substantivized adjective describing a person characterized by irreverence toward God — not merely morally weak but actively opposed to or heedless of the divine order. Paul applies it programmatically in Romans 4:5 and 5:6 to describe the very people Christ died to justify, making the term central to the theology of grace. Jude 4, 15 and 2 Peter 2:5 use it to characterize those under eschatological judgment. Spanish 'impío,' Hindi 'अभक्त' (irreverent), and Arabic 'ٱلْ' (the wicked) all convey active godlessness rather than mere ignorance.

ungodly, impious (person) (10×) A person who lacks reverence for God, living in active disregard of the divine order — an ungodly or impious individual. Used substantively to denote those whom Christ justifies despite their godlessness (Rom 4:5; 5:6), those destroyed in the Flood for their impiety (2 Pet 2:5), and those facing eschatological condemnation (1 Tim 1:9; Jude 4, 15). Korean '불경건한 자' (irreverent person) and Swahili 'wasiomcha Mungu' (those who do not fear God) capture the active dimension of this term. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS en: for-ungodly, of-ungodly, to-ungodly | es: de-impíos, impío, impíos | fr: gottlos, impie, impies | de: Gottlose, Gottlosen, gottlos Rom 4:5; Rom 5:6; 1Tim 1:9; 1Pet 4:18; 2Pet 2:5

ἀσέλγ-εια G0766 N-DFP (10×)
Licentiousness, sensuality, shameless moral excess and sexual debauchery
Denotes unrestrained, shameless immorality — a brazen disregard for moral boundaries that goes beyond mere indulgence to public outrageousness. Jesus lists it among the evils that defile from within (Mark 7:22), and Paul places it in vice catalogues alongside sexual immorality and impurity (Gal 5:19; 2 Cor 12:21). Peter warns that false teachers exploit it to attract followers (2 Pet 2:2, 18). The semantic range emphasizes the flagrant, open quality of the vice: Arabic 'عارة' (debauchery), Spanish 'lascivia/libertinaje,' and Hindi 'लम्पटता' (lechery) all stress shameless excess.

licentiousness, sensuality (10×) Excessive, shameless moral abandon — licentiousness, sensuality, or debauchery that flaunts social and divine norms. Appears in vice lists alongside fornication and impurity (Mark 7:22; Gal 5:19; 2 Cor 12:21), and characterizes the conduct of false teachers who exploit moral licence (2 Pet 2:2, 18; Jude 4). The emphasis falls not merely on the sin itself but on its brazen, unrestrained quality. Swahili 'ufisadi' (corruption/immorality) and Korean '음란' (lewdness) capture this shameless dimension. SEXUAL IMMORALITY
en: by-sensuality, licentiousness, sensuality | es: desenfrenos, lascivia, lascivias | fr: débauche, débauche, | de: Ausschweifung, Zuegel Mark 7:22; Rom 13:13; 2Cor 12:21; Gal 5:19; Eph 4:19

ἄσημος G0767 Adj-GFS (1×)
Insignificant, undistinguished, without distinguishing marks; ordinary or obscure Originally referring to uncoined gold or unmarked objects, this word evolved to describe people or places lacking distinction or fame. Paul uses it in Acts when arrested in Jerusalem, protesting that he is 'a citizen of no insignificant city'—a rhetorically clever way of saying Tarsus was actually quite important. The double negative highlights civic pride while maintaining diplomatic modesty before a Roman tribune.

(1×) In Acts 21:39, Paul describes Tarsus as 'no insignificant city' (Spanish 'insignificante,' French 'sans marque' = without mark). The litotes (understatement through negation) diplomatically asserts Tarsus's importance—it was a major intellectual and commercial center, capital of Cilicia. Paul's phrasing shows rhetorical skill: he defends his standing without boasting, letting the double negative carry the weight of civic reputation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: insignificant | es: insignificante | fr: sans-marque | de: ἀσήμου Acts 21:39

Ἀσήρ G0768 N-GMS (2×)
Asher, a Hebrew patriarch and tribal ancestor
A Hebrew name (meaning 'happy' or 'blessed') referring to Jacob's eighth son and the tribe descended from him. In Luke 2:36, Anna the prophetess is identified as from the tribe of Asher. In Revelation 7:6, the tribe of Asher is listed among the 144,000 sealed from the twelve tribes. Asher's territory was in northern Israel along the Mediterranean coast. The name is indeclinable in Greek, maintaining its Hebrew form.

(2×) Both New Testament occurrences use Asher as a tribal identifier rather than referring to the patriarch himself. Anna's tribal affiliation (Luke 2:36) is one of the few specific tribal identities mentioned in the New Testament, showing preservation of genealogical memory. The Revelation 7:6 listing includes all twelve tribes in symbolic completeness. All languages transliterate the name with minor phonetic variation (German 'Asser', French 'Aser', Spanish 'Asēr'). RELATIVE PRONOUNS
en: of-Ashēr, of-Asēr | es: de-Asēr, de-Asér | fr: Aser | de: Asser, Ἀσήρ Luke 2:36; Rev 7:6

ἀσθέν-εια G0769 N-AFP (24×)
Weakness or sickness; ranging from abstract frailty (physical, moral, spiritual) to concrete bodily disease or illness.
A noun spanning the spectrum from general weakness to specific illness. In Paul's letters it often denotes human frailty — whether of the flesh (Rom 6:19), of the spirit (Rom 8:26), or of apostolic suffering (2 Cor 12:9-10). In the Gospels it frequently points to concrete disease, as when Matthew quotes Isaiah: 'He took our infirmities' (Matt 8:17). The multilingual evidence makes the distinction vivid: Arabic splits between عف (da'f, 'weakness') and ض (marad, 'disease'), and Swahili similarly distinguishes udhaifu from ugonjwa.

1. weakness, frailty (17×) Abstract weakness, frailty, or lack of strength — physical, moral, spiritual, or circumstantial — without pointing to a specific medical condition. Spanish debilidad and German Schwachheit consistently render this sense, while Arabic عف (da'f) confirms the abstract quality. Paul uses it of human limitation (Rom 6:19 'because of the weakness of your flesh') and the Spirit's intercession for our frailty (Rom 8:26). The woman in Luke 13:11 had a 'spirit of weakness' for eighteen years, framing her condition as debility rather than named disease. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION
en: of-weakness, weakness, weaknesses | es: de-debilidad, de-enfermedad, debilidad | fr: faiblesse | de: Schwachheit Luke 13:11; Luke 13:12; Rom 6:19; Rom 8:26; 1Cor 2:3

2. sickness, disease (7×) Physical illness, disease, or concrete bodily ailment — a medical condition one can suffer from and be healed of. Arabic ض (marad) and Swahili ugonjwa/magonjwa ('sickness/sicknesses') consistently distinguish this from abstract frailty. Matthew 8:17 cites Isaiah to describe Jesus bearing actual diseases, and John 5:5 refers to a man who had been in his sickness for thirty-eight years. John 11:4 makes clear Lazarus's illness is not unto death but for God's glory. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION
en: ailments, diseases, infirmities | es: enfermedad, enfermedades | fr: faiblesse | de: Schwachheit Matt 8:17; Luke 5:15; Luke 8:2; John 5:5; John 11:4

ἀσθέν-εια G0770 V-APA-NMS (34×)
To be weak or sick; used of physical illness, bodily feebleness, and spiritual or moral limitation.
A verb spanning the full range of human frailty, from literal disease to inner weakness. In the Gospels it typically describes the physically sick whom Jesus heals (Matt 10:8; John 11:1-3), while Paul employs it for spiritual and moral vulnerability — becoming weak for the sake of the weak (1 Cor 9:22), or confessing that the flesh is weak even when the spirit is willing (Rom 8:3). The Spanish split between 'enfermando' (sick) and 'débil' (weak) mirrors the two core senses clearly. Greek usage from the fifth century BC already encompassed both bodily sickness and poverty or powerlessness.

1. be sick, be ill (19×) Physical illness or disease — being sick, ailing, or infirm in body. The Gospels consistently use this sense for those brought to Jesus for healing: the sick at Capernaum (Luke 4:40), those who touched his garment (Mark 6:56), and Lazarus (John 11:1-6). Spanish 'enfermando,' French 'être-malade,' and German 'krank-sein' all confirm the medical register. The aorist ēsthenēsen ('he fell sick') appears in classical Greek from the fourth century BC onward. SICKNESS AND ILLNESS

en: I-was-sick, Is-sick, being-sick | es: -que-enfermaban, a-débiles, enfermando | fr: être-faible, être-malade | de: ist-schwach, schwach-sein Matt 10:8; Matt 25:36; Matt 25:39; Mark 6:56; Luke 4:40

2. be weak, lack strength (15×) General weakness, feebleness, or personal limitation — physical, moral, or spiritual. Paul dominates this usage: Abraham did not weaken in faith (Rom 4:19), the law was weak through the flesh (Rom 8:3), and we ought to support the weak (Acts 20:35; Rom 14:1-2). Spanish 'débil' and German 'schwach-sein' capture this broader frailty. First Corinthians 9:22 crystallizes the sense: 'To the weak I became weak, that I might win the weak.' WEAKNESS AND FRAILTY

en: I-am-weak, are-weak, being-weak | es: débil, débiles, era-débil | fr: être-faible | de: ist-schwach, schwach-sein Acts 20:35; Rom 4:19; Rom 8:3; Rom 14:1; Rom 14:2

ἀσθέν-ημα G0771 N-ANP (1×)

Weakness, ailment; a condition of physical frailty or moral/spiritual limitation

This noun describes various forms of weakness—bodily ailments, moral limitations, or spiritual vulnerabilities. Paul uses it in Romans to discuss how mature Christians should bear with the 'weaknesses' of those with tender consciences. The term shifts depending on context between physical infirmity and moral or spiritual limitation, always implying a state that needs support or accommodation from stronger brothers and sisters.

(1×) Romans 15:1 urges the strong to 'bear the weaknesses' (Spanish 'debilidades,' German 'Schwachheiten') of those without strength. Paul refers to scruples about food, drink, and holy days that trouble some believers' consciences. These 'weaknesses' aren't sins but limitations—areas where some Christians haven't yet grasped their freedom in Christ. The strong should accommodate these tender consciences rather than insisting on their rights. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION

en: weaknesses | es: debilidades | fr: faiblesse | de: Schwachheiten Rom 15:1

ἀσθεν-ής G0772 Adj-AMS (26×)

Weak, feeble; without strength in body, will, or social standing; specifically sick or ailing when used in healing contexts.

A broad term for lacking strength, whether physical, moral, or spiritual. In Jesus' words at Gethsemane, 'the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak' (Matt 26:41), the adjective captures human frailty before God. Paul uses it powerfully in 1 Corinthians 1:25-27 to invert worldly values: God's 'weakness' shames the strong. Yet in the Gospels it also serves as a near-medical term for the physically sick whom Jesus sends his disciples to heal (Luke 9:2; 10:9). Spanish captures this split neatly: 'debil' for general weakness versus 'enfermo' for illness.

1. weak, feeble (general/moral/spiritual) (19×) General weakness encompassing moral frailty, spiritual vulnerability, and social insignificance. Paul's letters concentrate most uses here, contrasting divine and human power (Rom 5:6, 1 Cor 1:25-27). The multilingual glosses consistently render this as 'weak/schwach/debil/faible' without medical connotation, pointing to an abstract deficiency of strength or capability rather than bodily sickness. WEAKNESS AND FRAILTY

en: is-weak, weak, weaker | es: a-más-débil, debilidad, débil | fr: faible | de: schwach Matt 26:41; Mark 14:38; Rom 5:6; 1Cor 1:25; 1Cor 1:27

2. sick, ill (physical ailment) (7×) Physical sickness or ailment requiring healing. Appears in Gospel commissioning passages where Jesus sends disciples to cure the ill (Luke 9:2, 10:9) and in the Matthean judgment scene about visiting the sick (Matt 25:43-44). Spanish shifts to 'enfermo' (sick person) and the contexts always involve therapeutic action, distinguishing this from mere frailty. SICKNESS AND ILLNESS

en: sick | es: enfermo, enfermos | fr: faible | de: schwach Matt 25:43; Matt 25:44; Luke 9:2; Luke 10:9; Acts 4:9

Ἀσία G0773 N-AFS (18×)

Asia — the Roman province in western Asia Minor, with Ephesus as its capital

In the NT this proper noun refers not to the modern continent but to the Roman province of Asia in western Asia Minor, centered on Ephesus. Paul was initially prevented from preaching there (Acts 16:6) but later spent years in Ephesus so that 'all who dwelt in Asia heard the word' (Acts 19:10). The seven churches of Revelation (Rev 1:4) are all located within this province. Asian Jews appear at Pentecost (Acts 2:9) and later accuse Paul in Jerusalem (Acts 21:27; 24:19). French 'Asie' and German 'Asien' retain the classical geographic reference.

Asia (18×) The Roman province of Asia (Ἀσία), encompassing western Asia Minor with Ephesus as its principal city. It is the region of Paul's extended ministry (Acts 19:10, 26), home to the seven churches of Revelation (Rev 1:4), and the origin of Jewish pilgrims at Pentecost (Acts 2:9). The Spirit initially forbade Paul from entering Asia (Acts 16:6), making his eventual prolonged work there all the more significant. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Asia, of-Asia | es: Asia, Asía, Asías | fr: Asie, Asien | de: Asien Acts 2:9; Acts 6:9; Acts 16:6; Acts 19:10; Acts 19:22

Ἀσιάτης G0774 N-NMP (1×)

Asians, people from the Roman province of Asia (western Asia Minor)

This term identifies people from the Roman province of Asia, roughly modern-day western Turkey, which included important cities like Ephesus, Smyrna, and Pergamum. In Acts, 'Asians' refers to members of Paul's traveling party who accompanied him from this region. The province of Asia was one of Rome's wealthiest and most cultured, home to significant early Christian communities addressed in Revelation's seven letters.

(1×) Acts 20:4 lists several 'Asians' (Spanish 'asiáticos,' French 'Asiatique') who traveled with Paul, including Tychicus and Trophimus. These representatives from the province of Asia accompanied Paul as he carried the collection for Jerusalem's poor. Their presence demonstrated the geographic spread of Paul's mission and the unity of Gentile churches with the mother church, as believers from Asia Minor partnered in supporting Jewish Christians. NATIONS AND PEOPLES en: Asianoi | es: asiáticos | fr: Asiatique | de: Ἀσιανοὶ Acts 20:4

Ἀσι-άρχης G0775 N-GMP (1×)

Asiarchs, wealthy civic leaders who sponsored festivals and imperial cult activities in the province of Asia

Asiarchs were elite provincial officials in Roman Asia who funded public festivals, games, and imperial cult ceremonies. These wealthy aristocrats held prestigious positions that combined civic duty with religious responsibility, particularly maintaining the emperor cult. Luke mentions them surprisingly as Paul's friends in Ephesus, showing that the apostle had supporters even among the pagan civic elite—a detail that emphasizes Christianity's penetration across social boundaries.

(1×) Acts 19:31 describes 'some of the Asiarchs' (Spanish 'asiarcas,' French 'Asiarque') as Paul's friends who urged him not to risk the theater riot. These provincial aristocrats, despite their role promoting imperial cult, befriended Paul and protected him from mob violence. The detail reveals Paul's broad social connections and suggests that even pagan officials recognized Christianity as distinct from the guild-based idolatry that sparked the riot. MILITARY OFFICERS en: Asiarchai | es: asiarcas | fr: Asiarque | de: Ἀσιαρχῶν Acts 19:31

ἀσῑτ-ία G0776 N-GFS (1×)

Want of food, abstinence from eating; fasting whether voluntary or involuntary

This term describes going without food, whether from necessity (lack of provisions) or choice (religious fasting). In Acts, Paul uses it to describe the extended period during the storm when the ship's company ate nothing—not religious fasting but desperate deprivation amid crisis. Classical usage distinguished between involuntary hunger and deliberate abstinence, though the physical state was identical.

(1×) Acts 27:21 refers to the sailors' 'long abstinence from food' (Spanish 'falta de alimento,' French 'jeûne,' German 'Hungerzeit') during the storm. This wasn't spiritual fasting but desperate food-deprivation—either seasickness prevented eating, or the storm made meal preparation impossible. After two weeks without proper meals, Paul urged them to eat for strength, distinguishing necessary nourishment from religious abstinence. FASTING

en: lack-of-food | es: falta-de-alimento | fr: jeûne | de: ἀσιτίας Acts 27:21

ἄσῑτ-ος G0777 Adj-NMP (1×)

Without food, fasting; describing persons who have eaten nothing

This adjective describes people who have gone without food, whether by choice or circumstance. In Acts, it characterizes the storm-tossed sailors who had eaten nothing during their maritime ordeal. The word simply states the condition—empty stomachs—without specifying whether the abstinence was voluntary discipline or forced by circumstances. Context determines whether it implies religious fasting or mere hunger.

(1×) Acts 27:33 describes the ship's company as 'without food' (Spanish 'sin comer,' German 'ohne Nahrung') for fourteen days. Paul urged them to eat for survival's sake, not for pleasure—they needed strength to survive the shipwreck and swim to shore. The detail emphasizes the severity of their ordeal: storm conditions so dire that even basic nourishment became impossible, leaving them weakened at the very moment they needed most strength. HUNGER AND FAMINE

en: without-food | es: sin-comer | fr: sans-manger | de: ἄσιτοι Acts 27:33

ἀσκέω G0778 V-PIA-1S (1×)

To practice, exercise discipline or train oneself; to cultivate a skill or virtue through deliberate effort

Classical Greek used this word for working raw materials into finished products or training oneself in a skill. In moral contexts, it described the deliberate cultivation of virtue through discipline and practice. Paul employs it in Acts to describe his conscientious effort to maintain a clear conscience before God and people—not passive innocence but active, disciplined cultivation of moral integrity through constant practice.

(1×) In Acts 24:16, Paul declares 'I practice' (Spanish 'me ejercito,' French 'exercer') to always have a clear conscience. The verb implies deliberate, ongoing effort—Paul doesn't just happen to have a clear conscience but actively works to maintain it through spiritual discipline. Like an athlete training or a craftsman honing skill, Paul exercises his conscience, cultivating sensitivity to God and others through constant practice. DISCIPLINE INSTRUCT CORRECT

en: practice | es: me-ejercito | fr: exercer | de: ἀσκῶ Acts 24:16

ἀσκός G0779 N-NMP (12×)

A wineskin — an animal-hide bag for storing and transporting wine, central to Jesus' parable of new wine in old skins.

An animal skin, typically goatskin, sewn and sealed to hold wine. All twelve NT occurrences appear in the famous parable of new wine and old wineskins, recorded in all three Synoptic Gospels (Matt 9:17; Mark 2:22; Luke 5:37-38). Jesus warns that new wine will burst old, brittle skins — the fermentation pressure splits them — so new wine must go into fresh wineskins. The image powerfully illustrates the incompatibility of the new covenant reality with rigid old structures. The word carries no metaphorical ambiguity in the text; it is a concrete household object serving a vivid theological illustration. Spanish 'odres' and French 'outre' both designate the same leather container.

wineskins (12×) A wineskin made from animal hide, used for storing and transporting wine. Every NT occurrence belongs to Jesus' parable about new wine requiring new wineskins (Matt 9:17 x4; Mark 2:22 x4; Luke 5:37-38 x4). Old, stiffened skins cannot withstand the pressure of fermenting new wine and will burst, so fresh skins are needed. The image serves as a metaphor for the incompatibility of new-covenant realities with obsolete religious forms. Spanish 'odres,' French 'outre,' and German 'Schlauch' all denote the same leather wine container familiar throughout the ancient Mediterranean world. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: wineskins | es: odres | fr: outre | de: Schlauch, ἀσκοί, ἀσκούς Matt 9:17; Mark 2:22

ἄσμενος G0780 Adv (1×)

Gladly, with pleasure; willingly and joyfully

This adverb describes doing something with genuine pleasure and satisfaction, not reluctantly or under compulsion. In Acts, it characterizes how Jerusalem believers received Paul and his companions—not merely tolerated them but welcomed them gladly. The word implies emotional warmth beyond mere politeness, the kind of reception that springs from genuine affection and shared faith.

(1×) Acts 21:17 describes how Jerusalem believers received Paul 'gladly' (Spanish 'gozosamente,' French 'avec plaisir'). After years apart and amid tensions between Jewish and Gentile Christians, this warm reception mattered deeply. The adverb signals genuine joy, not diplomatic coolness—these believers truly delighted in Paul's arrival and the unity his visit represented between branches of the early church. JOY AND EXULTATION

en: gladly | es: gozosamente | fr: avec-plaisir | de: ἀσμένως Acts 21:17

ἄσοφος G0781 Adj-NMP (1×)

Unwise, foolish; lacking sound judgment or discernment

This adjective describes people who lack wisdom—not necessarily unintelligent but failing to exercise sound judgment in life's crucial matters. Paul uses it in Ephesians to contrast two ways of living: walking as unwise people who squander their days, versus walking as wise people who discern God's will and redeem the time. The term implies moral and spiritual foolishness, not mere intellectual limitation.

(1×) Ephesians 5:15 warns against walking as 'unwise' people (Spanish 'necios' = fools, German 'unweise'). The context contrasts lifestyle choices: the unwise drift through life oblivious to God's purposes, while the wise actively discern his will and make the most of every opportunity. Paul's concern isn't IQ but spiritual discernment—recognizing what matters eternally and ordering life accordingly. FOOLISHNESS AND FOLLY

en: unwise | es: necios | fr: ἄσοφοι | de: unweise Eph 5:15

ἀσπάζομαι G0782 V-PIM/P-3S (60×)

To greet or send greetings; to welcome or embrace warmly; to say farewell or take leave of someone.

Aspazomai is one of the most socially embedded verbs in the New Testament, appearing nearly sixty times and mapping the full arc of human encounter – from initial greeting to warm embrace to final farewell. Paul's letters are saturated with it: the closing chapters of Romans alone contain over twenty greetings to named individuals, making aspazomai a window into early church social networks. Its range extends beyond mere words to physical embrace (Acts 21:7) and even to the faith-filled 'greeting from afar' of Hebrews 11:13, where the patriarchs welcomed God's promises without yet receiving them.

1. greet, send greetings (54×) To greet someone or send greetings, especially in epistolary contexts. This overwhelmingly dominant sense (54 of 60 occurrences) fills the closing sections of Paul's letters: 'Greet Prisca and Aquila' (Rom 16:3), 'All the saints greet you' (2 Cor 13:13). Spanish consistently uses 'saludad/saludaos' (the imperative greeting command), French 'saluer,' and German 'grüssen.' Jesus invokes this social convention in Matthew 5:47: 'If you greet only your brothers, what more are you doing?' – suggesting that the act of greeting carried real social weight, not mere formality. GREET FAREWELL WELCOME en: Greet, greet | es: Saludad, Saludaos, saludad | fr: saluer | de: gruessen Matt 5:47; Mark 15:18; Luke 10:4; Acts 25:13; Rom 16:3

2. welcome, embrace (4×) To welcome or embrace someone or something with gladness upon arrival or from a distance. Acts 21:7 and 21:19 describe Paul being warmly received by believers, while Hebrews 11:13 extends the metaphor powerfully: the patriarchs 'greeted' the promises from afar, embracing them by faith without possessing them. Spanish shifts to 'habiendo saludado' or 'saludándolos' (emphasizing the completed welcoming action), and German introduces 'verabschiedet' in some renderings. The physical and emotional warmth of this sense distinguishes it from the routine epistolary greeting. GREET FAREWELL WELCOME

en: having-greeted | es: habiendo-saludado, saludando, saludándolos | fr: saluer | de: gruessen, verabschiedet Acts 18:22; Acts 21:7; Acts 21:19; Heb 11:13

3. say farewell, take leave (2×) To say farewell or take leave of someone at departure. Acts 20:1 describes Paul embracing the disciples and departing after the Ephesus riot, and Acts 21:6 records the tearful farewell at Tyre. Spanish renders it 'despidiéndose' and 'nos despedimos' (explicitly 'saying goodbye'), a clear departure from the greeting vocabulary used in sense 1. German similarly uses 'verabschiedet' (took leave). This farewell sense shows how aspazomai bookends a relationship – the same verb that opens an encounter can also close it. GREET FAREWELL WELCOME en: having-said-farewell, we-said-farewell | es: despidiéndose, nos-despedimos | fr: saluer | de: verabschiedet Acts 20:1; Acts 21:6

ἀσπ-ασμός G0783 N-AMP (10×)

A greeting or salutation, whether spoken in person or written in a letter

Refers to a spoken or written expression of welcome, respect, or good wishes. The term covers a wide range of social contexts: Mary's greeting to Elizabeth that caused the unborn John to leap (Luke 1:29, 41, 44), the marketplace salutations that Pharisees crave (Matt 23:7; Mark 12:38; Luke 11:43; 20:46), and the apostolic practice of closing letters with a personal greeting in one's own hand (1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17). Spanish 'saludo,' Hindi 'नमस्कार/अभिवादन,' and Arabic 'سَلَام' all reflect this unified concept.

greeting, salutation (10×) A spoken or written expression of welcome, respect, or good wishes — a salutation exchanged in personal encounter or appended to a letter. Covers Mary's prophetically charged greeting to Elizabeth (Luke 1:29, 41, 44), the public marketplace greetings that Jesus criticized the Pharisees for seeking (Matt 23:7; Mark 12:38), and Paul's autographic epistolary closings (1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18). Swahili 'salamu' and Korean '인사' confirm a single unified sense spanning both oral and written contexts. REJOICING AND GREETING

en: greeting, greetings | es: saludo, saludos | fr: salutation | de: ἀσπασμοὺς, ἀσπασμοῦ, ἀσπασμὸν Matt 23:7; Mark 12:38; Luke 1:29; Luke 1:41; Luke 1:44

ἄσπῐλ-ος G0784 Adj-NMP (4×)

spotless, without blemish, unstained; morally or ritually pure, free from defilement

Derived from the privative alpha and spilos ('spot, stain'), aspilos describes what is free from any blemish or moral stain. The word operates across both ethical and cultic registers in the NT. Peter applies it to Christ as a lamb 'without spot or blemish' (1 Pet 1:19), drawing on sacrificial imagery. James defines 'pure religion' as keeping oneself 'unstained' from the world (Jas 1:27). Paul urges Timothy to keep the commandment 'spotless' until Christ's appearing (1 Tim 6:14), and Peter exhorts believers to be found 'without spot' at the Lord's return (2 Pet 3:14). German 'fleckenlos' and Spanish 'sin-mancha' both transparently render the privative sense of being without stain.

(4×) Spotless, without blemish — morally or ritually pure, free from any defilement. In 1 Peter 1:19, the adjective describes Christ as a sacrificial lamb without defect, rooting the metaphor in Levitical purity requirements. The remaining occurrences (1 Tim 6:14; Jas 1:27; 2 Pet 3:14) apply the same imagery to believers' moral conduct — keeping oneself or one's confession unstained. Spanish 'sin-mancha' ('without stain') and German 'fleckenlos' ('fleckless') both preserve the concrete stain-metaphor, confirming a unified sense spanning sacrificial purity and ethical integrity. PURITY AND CLEANNESS

en: spotless, unstained | es: sin-mancha | fr: ἀσπίλου, ἄσπιλοι, ἄσπιλον | de: fleckenlos 1Tim 6:14; Jas 1:27; 1Pet 1:19; 2Pet 3:14

ἀσπίς G0785 N-GFP (1×)

Asp, a venomous snake; particularly the Egyptian cobra known for its deadly bite

The asp was a poisonous serpent, often identified with the Egyptian cobra, feared throughout the ancient Mediterranean for its lethal venom. Paul quotes Psalm 140 in Romans, using the image of asp venom under lips to describe the deadly, poisonous nature of human speech when turned to slander and deceit. The metaphor captures how words can inject poison into relationships and communities, killing trust and love as surely as snake venom kills bodies.

(1×) Romans 3:13 quotes the Psalm: 'the poison of asps is under their lips' (Spanish 'de áspides,' French 'aspic'). This vivid image describes malicious speech as carrying deadly venom—words that poison, destroy, and kill. Like a cobra's concealed fangs, the tongue hides its poison until the moment of striking. The metaphor emphasizes speech's lethal potential when weaponized for harm rather than used for blessing. SERPENTS AND SNAKES

en: of-asps | es: de-áspides | fr: aspic | de: Schlange Rom 3:13

ἄσπονδ-ος G0786 Adj-NMP (1×)

Implacable, irreconcilable; refusing to make peace or honor agreements

Literally 'without treaty' or 'truce-less,' this word described those who refuse to make or keep peace agreements. In moral contexts, it characterized people who won't be reconciled, who maintain hostility regardless of overtures toward peace. Paul uses it in vice lists to describe end-times godlessness—people so hardened that they refuse reconciliation, preferring perpetual enmity to the vulnerability of peacemaking.

(1×) In 2 Timothy 3:3, Paul lists 'irreconcilable' (Spanish 'implacables,' German 'unversöhnt' = unreconciled) among vices marking the last days. The word describes those who refuse peace, who won't settle disputes or honor agreements. In an age demanding unity, such people insist on division; when offered reconciliation, they choose ongoing hostility. The vice is relational hardness—preferring the safety of enmity to the risk of peace. TREACHERY AND BETRAYAL

en: irreconcilable | es: implacables | fr: ἄσπονδοι | de: unversoehnt 2Tim 3:3

ἀσσάριον G0787 N-GNP (2×)

assarion, a small Roman copper coin worth about 1/16 denarius

A loanword from Latin denoting a small copper coin of minimal value. Jesus uses it in sayings about God's care for sparrows: two sparrows sold for an assarion (Matthew 10:29), five for two assaria (Luke 12:6). The point is that even creatures of negligible economic worth are noticed by the Father. The assarion was roughly equivalent to 1/16 of a denarius (a day's wage), making it a coin of very small purchasing power.

(2×) Both Gospel occurrences employ the assarion in identical proverbial logic: sparrows cost very little in the market, yet God knows each one. Luke's version intensifies the point - five sparrows for two assaria shows buyers get a 'free' fifth sparrow, yet none are forgotten. The Latin loanword appears across language families, with French 'as' and Spanish 'ases' adapting the Latin, while German preserves the Greek form, showing varying degrees of naturalization. SILVER AND MONEY

en: for-an-assarion, for-assaria | es: por-asarión, por-dos-ases | fr: as | de: ἀσσαρίου, ἀσσαρίων Matt 10:29; Luke 12:6

ἄσσον G0788 Adv (1×)

Nearer, closer; at a shorter distance

This comparative adverb means 'nearer' or 'closer,' describing reduced distance in space. Luke uses it in Acts during the shipwreck narrative, describing how the sailors tried to sail nearer to shore before anchoring for the night. The nautical context requires precision—getting closer to land offered safety from the storm but risked running aground in darkness, requiring careful judgment about proximity.

(1×) Acts 27:13 describes the ship sailing 'close' (Spanish 'más cerca' = more near, French 'plus près') to shore along Crete's coast. The detail captures the sailors' strategy: staying near land offered shelter from wind and currents but demanded constant vigilance to avoid rocks and reefs. The comparative adverb implies movement—not just being close but getting closer, navigating the narrow margin between safety and disaster. NEARNESS AND APPROACH

en: close | es: más-cerca | fr: plus-près | de: ἄσσον Acts 27:13

Ἄσσος G0789 N-AFS (2×)

Assos, a seaport city in the Roman province of Asia

A Greek city on the northwest coast of Asia Minor (modern Turkey), located on the southern shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium. Acts 20:13-14 describes Paul's travel itinerary: his companions sailed from Troas to Assos while Paul went by land, meeting them there before continuing to Mitylene. The land route was about 20 miles shorter than sailing around Cape Lectum. Assos was known for its steep acropolis and sarcophagi made from local stone.

(2×) Both Acts references (20:13-14) narrate the same event from slightly different angles: the plan to meet at Assos (v.13) and its fulfillment (v.14). Paul's decision to walk while others sailed may have been for pastoral reasons (visiting believers) or personal preference for land travel. All language witnesses transliterate the city name uniformly, with German using 'Ἄσσον' showing the accusative case form that appears in the Greek text. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Assos | es: Asos | fr: Assos | de: Ἄσσον Acts 20:13; Acts 20:14

ἀστᾰτέω G0790 V-PIA-1P (1×)

To be homeless or unsettled; to wander without fixed residence

This verb describes lacking a stable home or fixed dwelling, wandering without secure residence. Originally used of soldiers out of position or order, it evolved to mean unsettled wandering. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians to describe the apostles' literal homelessness—constantly moving, never settling, lacking the security of property and fixed address that most people take for granted.

(1×) In 1 Corinthians 4:11, Paul says 'we are homeless' (Spanish 'andamos sin hogar,' French 'sans demeure fixe' = without fixed dwelling). This describes the apostolic lifestyle: constant travel, no permanent residence, the vulnerability of perpetual migration. While others enjoyed home security, the apostles wandered like refugees, their mission requiring geographic instability. The verb captures both physical displacement and the existential rootlessness of itinerant ministry. TRAVEL ABOUT LEAD

en: we-are-homeless | es: andamos-sin-hogar | fr: sans-demeure-fixe | de: unstet-sein 1Cor 4:11

ἀστεῖος G0791 Adj-ANS (2×)

beautiful, fair, elegant, pleasing to look at An adjective meaning beautiful, elegant, or pleasing in appearance. Stephen is described as 'beautiful to God' as an infant (Acts 7:20). Moses' parents saw he was 'a beautiful child' and hid him from Pharaoh (Hebrews 11:23). Classical usage ranged from 'of the town/urbane' to 'refined/witty' to general praise for beauty. The New Testament uses it exclusively for physical attractiveness, specifically of infants whose appearance moved their parents to protective action.

(2×) Both occurrences describe Moses as an exceptionally beautiful baby (Acts 7:20; Heb 11:23). Acts uses the striking phrase 'beautiful to God' (ἀστεῖος τῷ θεῷ), suggesting divine approval beyond mere physical appearance. This beauty motivated his parents to extraordinary measures of protection. The multilingual witnesses uniformly translate with beauty terminology, though this Greek word could also mean 'urbane' or 'witty' in classical contexts - senses not evidenced in the New Testament. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: beautiful | es: hermoso | fr: beau | de: schoen, ἀστεῖος Acts 7:20; Heb 11:23

ἀστήρ G0792 N-NMS (24×)

star — a luminous celestial body, used literally of physical stars and symbolically of angels or exalted figures

Aster is the standard Greek noun for a star, appearing 24 times across the Gospels, epistles, and Revelation. Its literal astronomical sense appears in the Bethlehem narrative, where the magi follow 'his star' from the east to the place of Jesus' birth (Matt 2:2, 7, 9-10), and in eschatological prophecy where 'the stars will fall from heaven' (Matt 24:29; Mark 13:25; Rev 6:13; 8:10-12; 9:1). Paul invokes stars to illustrate degrees of resurrection glory: 'star differs from star in glory' (1 Cor 15:41). The symbolic register flourishes in Revelation, where seven stars in Christ's right hand represent the angels of the seven churches (Rev 1:16, 20; 2:1; 3:1), a great star named Wormwood poisons the waters (Rev 8:10-11), and Christ himself is 'the bright morning star' (Rev 22:16; cf. 2:28). Arabic najm, Spanish 'estrella,' French 'etoile,' and German 'Stern' all converge on a single translation without polysemy.

star (celestial body) (24×) A luminous celestial body visible in the night sky, encompassing both literal and symbolic uses in the New Testament. Literally, the star that guided the magi to the newborn Messiah (Matt 2:2, 7, 9-10), the darkening of stars in apocalyptic portents (Matt 24:29; Mark 13:25), and Paul's analogy of differing stellar glory for the resurrection body (1 Cor 15:41). Symbolically dominant in Revelation: the seven stars as angels of the churches (Rev 1:16, 20; 2:1; 3:1), the fallen star Wormwood (Rev 8:10-11; 9:1), and Christ as 'the bright morning star' (Rev 22:16). Spanish 'estrella,' French 'etoile,' German 'Stern,' Arabic 'najm' confirm a single core referent. SUN CELESTIAL BODY

en: a-star, of-stars, star | es: de-estrellas, estrella, estrellas | fr: astre, étoile | de: Stern Matt 2:2; Matt 2:7; Matt 2:9; Matt 2:10; Matt 24:29

ἀστήρικτος G0793 Adj-NMP (2×)

unstable, unsettled, not firmly established

An adjective meaning unstable or not firmly fixed. Peter warns that unstable people distort Scripture to their destruction (2 Peter 2:14; 3:16). The term combines a negative prefix with a verb meaning 'to fix firmly' or 'prop up,' yielding the sense of lacking firm foundation. It can describe physical instability (not supported) or moral/spiritual instability (lacking grounding). Peter uses it exclusively for spiritual instability - people susceptible to false teaching.

(2×) Both occurrences in 2 Peter describe the same category of people: those unstable in faith who are vulnerable to distorting Paul's letters and other Scriptures (3:16) and who are enticed by false teachers (2:14). The term suggests not active rebellion but rather lack of firm grounding that makes one easily swayed. All four language witnesses use 'unstable/inconstant' terminology, with French and German preserving forms closer to the Greek root. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 8313 WITH 3 SENSES

en: unstable | es: inconstantes | fr: ἀστήρικτοι, ἀστηρίκτους | de: unbestaendig 2Pet 2:14; 2Pet 3:16

ἄστοργ-ος G0794 Adj-AMP (2×)

without natural affection, lacking family love

An adjective describing people devoid of natural family affection. Paul lists it among the vices characterizing godlessness in the last days (Romans 1:31; 2 Timothy 3:3). The term negates 'storge,' the Greek word for family affection and parental love. It describes the chilling absence of instinctive bonds that normally tie families together - parents who don't love children, children who don't care for parents. Classical usage applied it to cruel or heartless behavior.

(2×) Both Pauline vice catalogs include this term among society's moral breakdowns. Romans 1:31 places it in a list of characteristics of those who suppress truth about God. 2 Timothy 3:3 warns Timothy about people in 'last days' exhibiting this heartlessness. The absence of natural affection represents profound moral degradation - the dissolution of foundational human bonds. German 'lieblos' (loveless) and French 'sans-affection' (without affection) capture the privative sense. HATRED AND HOSTILITY

en: heartless, without-natural-affection | es: sin-afecto | fr: lieblos, sans-affection | de: lieblos Rom 1:31; 2Tim 3:3

ἀστοχ-έω G0795 V-AIA-3P (3×)

miss the mark, stray from, deviate from the truth

This verb means to miss the mark or go astray from a target. Paul uses it in the Pastoral Epistles to describe theological deviation. Some have 'missed the mark' regarding certain matters and turned to empty discussion (1 Tim 1:6). Some have 'strayed' from the faith by loving money (6:21). Two men 'missed the truth' by claiming resurrection already happened, upsetting some believers' faith (2 Tim 2:18). The archery metaphor of missing the target applies to doctrinal and moral wandering from truth.

(3×) Exclusively in Pastoral Epistles, describing doctrinal and moral deviation. First Timothy 1:6 speaks of some who, 'having missed the mark' (ἀστοχήσαντες) from certain matters, turned to fruitless talk. First Timothy 6:21 warns some 'missed the mark' (ἠστόχησαν) concerning faith by craving wealth. Second Timothy 2:18 describes two who 'missed the mark' (ἠστόχησαν) regarding truth, teaching false resurrection doctrine. The German 'abirren' (go astray) and French forms capture the deviation from proper target—doctrinal precision. DECEPTION AND ASTRAY

en: having-missed-the-mark, missed-the-mark | es: erraron, habiendo-errado | fr: ἀστοχήσαντες, ἠστόχησαν | de: abirren 1Tim 1:6; 1Tim 6:21; 2Tim 2:18

ἀστρᾰπ-ή G0796 N-DFS (9×)

Lightning; by extension, a brilliant radiance or dazzling brightness like a flash of light.

Primarily denotes the dramatic flash of lightning that splits the sky — a natural phenomenon loaded with theophanic significance in Scripture. Jesus compares his coming to lightning flashing from east to west (Matt 24:27), and the throne-room visions of Revelation crackle with lightnings, rumblings, and thunders (Rev 4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18). The angel at the empty tomb has an appearance 'like lightning' (Matt 28:3), bridging the literal and the luminous. In one passage, Luke 11:36, the word describes not atmospheric lightning but the brilliant shining of a lamp — a metaphorical radiance. Spanish relámpago, French éclair, and German Blitz all center on the lightning flash.

1. lightning (8×) Lightning — the visible electrical discharge in the atmosphere, used both literally and in vivid apocalyptic imagery. Jesus describes the Son of Man's coming as lightning that flashes across the whole sky (Matt 24:27; Luke 17:24), and he saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven (Luke 10:18). Revelation's throne-room scenes repeatedly feature lightnings as markers of divine power (Rev 4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18). Spanish relámpago, French éclair, and German Blitz all converge on this core meteorological-theophanic meaning. The angel at the tomb had an appearance 'like lightning' (Matt 28:3), pushing toward supernatural brilliance. LIGHTNING AND RADIANCE

en: lightning, lightnings | es: relámpago, relámpagos | fr: éclair | de: Blitz, ἀστραπὴ, ἀστραπὴν Matt 24:27; Matt 28:3; Luke 10:18; Luke 17:24; Rev 4:5

2. bright shining, radiance (1×) Bright shining or radiance — a metaphorical extension describing dazzling brilliance without reference to an actual lightning bolt. In Luke 11:36, when the whole body is full of light, it will be wholly bright 'as when the lamp with its brightness (ἀστραπή) gives you light.' Swahili uses nuru ('light, radiance') here rather than umeme ('lightning'), and Spanish shifts from relámpago to luz ('light'), both recognizing that the referent is luminous radiance rather than an atmospheric discharge. LIGHTNING AND RADIANCE

en: brightness | es: luz | fr: éclair | de: ἀστραπῇ Luke 11:36

ἀστράπτω G0797 V-PPA-NFS (2×)

to flash, shine brightly like lightning

A verb meaning to flash or gleam like lightning. Jesus describes his coming as lightning that flashes from east to west (Luke 17:24). At the resurrection, two men in dazzling apparel appear to the women (Luke 24:4). Classical usage described lightning bolts, gleaming weapons or armor, and shining faces. The New Testament employs it for supernatural radiance associated with divine presence or eschatological events.

(2×) Both Lukan occurrences involve heavenly brilliance. In Luke 17:24, Jesus uses lightning's sudden visibility across the sky as a metaphor for the unmistakable nature of his coming. In Luke 24:4, the angelic beings' dazzling clothing signals heavenly origin. The present participles in both passages emphasize continuous flashing/shining rather than single flash. Cross-linguistic glosses employ lightning and brilliance terminology, with German preserving the Greek forms, suggesting technical recognition. BRIGHTNESS AND SPLENDOR

en: dazzling, flashing | es: relampagueando, resplandeciente | fr: brillant | de: ἀστράπτουσα, ἀστραπτούσῃ Luke 17:24; Luke 24:4

ἄστρον G0798 N-NNP (4×)

star, celestial body; used of literal stars and as a figure for innumerable multitude

The Greek astron denotes a star or constellation, overlapping with the more common aster but tending toward collective or poetic usage. Luke 21:25 places signs in the stars among the cosmic portents preceding Christ's return. Acts 7:43 quotes Amos 5:26, referencing the 'star of your god Rephan' — an astral idol. Acts 27:20 recounts how Paul's ship lost sight of sun and stars during a storm, leaving the sailors without navigational reference. Hebrews 11:12 invokes the Abrahamic promise, comparing Abraham's descendants to the stars in number. Spanish 'estrella,' French 'astre,' and German 'Gestirn' all confirm the straightforward astronomical reference.

(4×) Star or celestial body — a luminous object in the night sky. All four NT occurrences refer to literal stars, though in varied contexts: cosmic eschatological signs (Luke 21:25), an idolatrous astral image (Acts 7:43), navigational reference lost in a storm (Acts 27:20), and a simile for innumerable multitude drawn from the Abrahamic covenant (Heb 11:12). Spanish 'estrella/estrellas' and French 'astre' confirm a single astronomical sense, while the figurative use in Hebrews ('as many as the stars') extends quantity, not meaning. SUN CELESTIAL BODY

en: star, stars | es: estrella, estrellas | fr: astre | de: Gestirn, ἄστροις, ἄστρον Luke 21:25; Acts 7:43; Acts 27:20; Heb 11:12

G0799 N-AMS (1×)

Asyncritus, a Christian in Rome greeted by Paul in his epistle

The name means 'incomparable' or 'without comparison,' possibly indicating this person's distinctive character or simply a common Greco-Roman name. Paul greets Asyncritus along with four others in Romans 16, suggesting a house church or close-knit group of believers in Rome. We know nothing else about him, but his inclusion in Paul's greetings indicates he was a valued member of the Roman Christian community.

(1×) Romans 16:14 sends greetings to Asyncritus (consistently transliterated across languages) along with Phlegon, Hermes, Patrobas, and Hermas. The cluster of names suggests either a house church or a circle of friends who met together. Paul's personal greeting, despite never having visited Rome, shows the interconnected network of early Christianity—news and relationships spread through traveling believers who kept distant congregations connected. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Asynkritos | es: a-Asyn-kriton | fr: Asyncrite | de: Asyncritus Rom 16:14

ἀσύμφων-ος G0800 Adj-NMP (1×)

Disagreeing, in discord; not harmonious or in agreement with one another

Literally 'not harmonious' or 'dissonant,' this word described sounds that clash rather than blend, or people whose views don't align. In Acts, Luke uses it to describe the Jerusalem Jewish leaders leaving Paul's hearing in disagreement among themselves about his message. The word captures discord—not violent conflict but fundamental lack of harmony, like instruments playing different tunes simultaneously.

(1×) Acts 28:25 describes the Jewish leaders departing 'in disagreement' (Spanish 'en desacuerdo,' French 'incompatible') with each other after Paul's testimony. His gospel message divided them—some found it persuasive, others rejected it. The adjective emphasizes their mutual discord, not unified opposition but fragmented response. Luke's narrative shows how the gospel creates division even within homogeneous groups, forcing individuals to take distinct positions. CONTROVERSY DISPUTE

en: disagreeing | es: en-desacuerdo | fr: incompatible | de: ἀσύμφωνοι Acts 28:25

ἀσύνετος G0801 Adj-NMP (5×)

Without understanding; senseless, foolish; lacking the capacity or willingness to comprehend spiritual or moral truth.

Denotes a person who lacks discernment or refuses to exercise understanding. Jesus uses it to rebuke his own disciples for failing to grasp a parable (Matt 15:16; Mark 7:18), while Paul applies it both to Gentiles whose thinking became futile (Rom 1:21, 31) and, quoting Deuteronomy, to a 'foolish nation' that provokes Israel to jealousy (Rom 10:19). Spanish 'sin-entendimiento' and French 'sans-intelligence' both capture the core idea of being 'without comprehension,' highlighting that this is a deficiency of spiritual perception, not merely low intelligence.

(5×) Devoid of understanding or moral discernment, describing someone who fails to grasp what should be evident. In the Gospels, Jesus addresses the disciples as asunetoi when they miss the point of his teaching about defilement (Matt 15:16; Mark 7:18). Paul uses it in Romans to characterize both the darkened mind of idolaters (Rom 1:21) and their moral insensibility (Rom 1:31), and quotes Moses to describe a nation 'without understanding' (Rom 10:19). The French 'sans-intelligence' and Spanish 'sin-entendimiento' together underscore that the term marks a failure of comprehension rather than mere ignorance. FOOLISHNESS AND FOLLY

en: foolish, without-understanding | es: insensata, sin-entendimiento | fr: insensé, sans-intelligence | de: unverstaendig, ἀσύνετοί Matt 15:16; Mark 7:18; Rom 1:21; Rom 1:31; Rom 10:19

ἀσύν-θετος G0802 Adj-AMP (1×)

Faithless, covenant-breaking; refusing to honor agreements or keep commitments

Literally 'not bound by covenant,' this word described people who break agreements, violate treaties, or refuse to honor commitments they've made. In Greco-Roman culture built on patronage and reciprocal obligations, being 'without covenant' marked someone as fundamentally untrustworthy. Paul uses it in Romans to characterize pagan depravity—societies where promises mean nothing and no agreement holds.

(1×) Romans 1:31 lists 'faithless' (Spanish 'sin pacto' = without pact, French 'sans alliance,' German 'treulos' = loyaltyless) among marks of humanity under God's wrath. The word describes covenant-breaking, promise-ignoring, treaty-violating behavior. In ancient cultures where agreements undergirded all social order, such faithlessness threatened civilization itself. Paul sees it as symptomatic of life without God—when divine covenant is rejected, all human covenants become unstable. TREACHERY AND BETRAYAL

en: faithless | es: sin-pacto | fr: sans-alliance | de: treulos Rom 1:31

ἀσφάλ-εια G0803 N-NFS (3×)

certainty, security, safety; firm assurance or protection from danger

This noun denotes security, certainty, or safety. Luke writes his Gospel so Theophilus might know 'the certainty' of the things he was taught (Luke 1:4). The temple guard was found standing at their posts 'in all security,' though the prisoners had escaped (Acts 5:23). Paul warns that when people say 'peace and safety,' sudden destruction will come upon them (1 Thess 5:3). The word bridges intellectual certainty (firm knowledge) and physical security (protection from danger), both of which prove unreliable without divine foundation.

(3×) Denotes both intellectual certainty and physical security. Luke 1:4 states Luke wrote so Theophilus might know 'the certainty' (ἀσφάλειαν) of gospel instruction—firm, reliable knowledge. Acts 5:23 describes finding everything 'in security' (ἀσφαλείᾳ)—doors locked, guards posted—yet prisoners gone. First Thessalonians 5:3 warns against false confidence when people proclaim 'peace and safety' (ἀσφάλεια). The Greek root meaning 'not stumbling' informs both uses: intellectual stability and protective security. SAFETY AND SECURITY

en: certainty, security | es: certeza, seguridad | fr: sécurité, sûreté, ἀσφάλεια | de: ἀσφάλεια, ἀσφάλειαν, ἀσφαλείᾳ Luke 1:4; Acts 5:23; 1Thess 5:3

ἀσφαλ-ής G0804 Adj-AFS (5×)

Safe, secure, certain; firm and reliable, not liable to fail or mislead; used of trustworthy information or steadfast hope.

Conveys the idea of firmness, reliability, and security—whether of facts that can be verified or of a hope that does not waver. In Acts, Roman officials seek 'the certain thing' (to asphales) about Paul's case (Acts 21:34; 22:30; 25:26), wanting dependable information amid confusion. Paul tells the Philippians that writing the same things is 'safe' for them (Phil 3:1), while Hebrews 6:19 calls Christian hope an anchor of the soul, 'sure and steadfast.' Spanish 'seguro' and French 'sûr' both highlight the core semantic thread of security and reliability.

(5×) Certain, reliable, and secure—used of information that is firm and verifiable, or of a spiritual reality that is steadfast and unshakable. In the forensic context of Acts, Roman commanders and governors seek 'the certain facts' about Paul (Acts 21:34; 22:30; 25:26), where the term means dependable, established knowledge. In the epistolary context, Paul commends repetition as 'safe' counsel (Phil 3:1), and the author of Hebrews describes hope as an anchor that is asphale, immovable and secure (Heb 6:19). The convergence of Spanish 'seguro,' French 'sûr,' and German 'sicher' confirms the unified semantic core of trustworthy firmness. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

en: certain, certainty, safe | es: algo-seguro, cierto, segura | fr: certainement, sûr | de: sicher, ἀσφαλές, ἀσφαλὲς Acts 21:34; Acts 22:30; Acts 25:26; Phil 3:1; Heb 6:19

ἀσφᾰλίζω G0805 V-AMM-2P (4×)

to make secure, fasten, guard safely; to fortify a place or restrain a person from escape

Built on the adjective asphales ('firm, secure'), this verb means to make something safe or immovable. All four NT occurrences cluster around the passion-resurrection narrative and Paul's imprisonment. The chief priests ask Pilate to 'make the tomb secure' (Matt 27:64-65), and they proceed to seal the stone and set a guard (Matt 27:66). In Acts 16:24, the Philippian jailer 'fastened' Paul and Silas's feet in the stocks. The semantic thread is consistent: physical restraint or fortification to prevent escape or tampering. Spanish 'asegurar' ('to secure') and French 'garder/proteger' capture both the guarding and fastening dimensions of the verb.

(4×) To make secure, fasten firmly, or guard against escape or tampering. In the tomb-sealing narrative (Matt 27:64-66), the verb appears three times as the authorities request, receive permission, and carry out the securing of Jesus' burial place. In Acts 16:24, it describes the jailer fastening prisoners' feet in stocks. Spanish 'asegurar' and French 'garder/proteger' both convey the core idea of rendering something physically safe from interference. The sense is consistently one of fortification and restraint — making something immovable or someone inescapable. GUARDING AND KEEPING en: fastened, made-secure, make-secure | es: asegurad, aseguraron, aseguró | fr: garder, protéger | de: ἀσφαλίσασθε, ἀσφαλισθῆναι, ἠσφαλίσαντο Matt 27:64; Matt 27:65; Matt 27:66; Acts 16:24

ἀσφαλός G0806 Adv (3×)

securely, safely, with certainty; in a manner that is firm and reliable

This adverb means securely, safely, or with certainty. Judas sought opportunity to betray Jesus 'securely,' away from the crowd (Mark 14:44). Peter declares at Pentecost that all Israel should know 'assuredly' that God has made Jesus both Lord and Christ (Acts 2:36). The Philippian jailer is commanded to guard Paul and Silas 'securely' (Acts 16:23). The adverb emphasizes the firmness, reliability, or safety with which something is done. It can denote physical security measures or epistemological certainty of knowledge.

(3×) Emphasizes secure, certain manner of action or knowledge. Mark 14:44 describes Judas arranging to betray Jesus 'securely' (ἀσφαλῶς)—away from crowds, minimizing resistance. Acts 2:36 has Peter declaring 'assuredly' (ἀσφαλῶς) that God made Jesus Lord and Messiah—with complete certainty. Acts 16:23 commands 'secure' (ἀσφαλῶς) guarding of Paul and Silas. The French 'sûrement' (surely), Spanish 'con-certeza' (with certainty), show the dual sense: both safe manner and certain knowledge. SAFETY AND SECURITY

en: assuredly, securely | es: con-certeza, seguramente | fr: en-sûreté, sûrement | de: ἀσφαλῶς Mark 14:44; Acts 2:36; Acts 16:23

ἀσχημ-ονέω G0807 V-PNA (2×)

to behave improperly or indecently

A verb meaning to act in an unseemly or improper manner. Paul uses it regarding a man who might be acting improperly toward his betrothed (1 Corinthians 7:36). He also says love 'does not behave indecently' (1 Corinthians 13:5). The term derives from a negative prefix and 'schema' (form/appearance), suggesting behavior that violates proper form or decorum. Classical usage included disgraceful conduct or bringing discredit.

(2×) The two Corinthian occurrences address different applications: potential sexual impropriety in engagement (7:36) and general standard for love's behavior (13:5). The first passage is notoriously difficult - Paul may be addressing a father, a man and his fiancée, or spiritual marriage. The second establishes that genuine love observes proper boundaries and respect. Multilingual renderings emphasize impropriety and indecency, though the domain assignment to Value (Economics/Property) seems unexpected. DISQUALIFIED WORTHLESS

en: behaves-unbecomingly, to-behave-improperly | es: actúa-indebidamente, comportarse-indecentemente | fr: indigne | de: sich-unschicklich-verhalten 1Cor 7:36; 1Cor 13:5

ἀσχημ-οσύνη G0808 N-AFS (2×)

shameful behavior, indecency, private parts (euphemism)

A noun denoting shameful or indecent behavior, or euphemistically referring to private parts. Paul describes homosexual acts as 'shameless acts' or 'indecency' (Romans 1:27). Revelation 16:15 warns about walking naked and having one's shame exposed. Classical usage ranged from lack of grace or awkwardness to moral impropriety to euphemistic reference to genitals. The Septuagint used it for nakedness or shameful exposure.

(2×) The two occurrences span the semantic range: sexual immorality (Rom 1:27) and shameful exposure/nakedness (Rev 16:15). Romans emphasizes the shamelessness of the acts themselves. Revelation uses clothing imagery for spiritual vigilance, where nakedness represents unprepared shame. The Septuagint background of this term as euphemism for genitals informs both passages. Multilingual evidence shows 'shame/indecency' as the primary rendering across all four languages. SHAME AND DISGRACE

en: shame, shamelessness | es: indecencia, vergüenza | fr: honte, indécence | de: Schande Rom 1:27; Rev 16:15

ἀσχήμ-ων G0809 Adj-NNP (1×)

Unpresentable, unseemly; parts of the body considered improper to display publicly

This adjective described what was considered indecorous or improper to show—body parts that culture deemed private. Paul uses it metaphorically in 1 Corinthians to discuss church unity, arguing that the body's 'unpresentable parts' receive special honor through clothing, teaching that seemingly less honorable church members deserve particular respect and care from the community.

(1×) In 1 Corinthians 12:23, Paul describes 'unpresentable parts' (Spanish 'indecorosos,' French 'inconvenant') that we treat with special modesty through clothing. The metaphor teaches how churches should value all members: those who seem less honorable deserve greater honor, just as we clothe private body parts with particular care. The argument reverses worldly values—God's design gives special dignity to what seems shameful. SHAME AND DISGRACE

en: unpresentable | es: indecorosos | fr: inconvenant | de: unschicklich 1Cor 12:23

ἀσωτία G0810 N-GFS (3×)

debauchery, dissipation, reckless excess; wasteful, unrestrained living

This noun denotes reckless, wasteful living characterized by excess and moral looseness. Paul warns believers not to get drunk with wine, which leads to 'debauchery,' but be filled with the Spirit (Eph 5:18). Titus must appoint elders whose children are believers, not accused of 'wild living' (Titus 1:6). Peter describes Gentiles as surprised when believers no longer join them in 'the same flood of debauchery' (1 Pet 4:4). The word combines wastefulness with moral dissolution, depicting life without restraint or direction.

(3×) Describes reckless, dissolute living characterized by moral excess. Ephesians 5:18 contrasts drunkenness leading to 'debauchery' (ἀσωτία) with Spirit-fullness. Titus 1:6 requires elders' children not be accused of 'wild living' (ἀσωτίας)—reckless dissipation. First Peter 4:4 describes former pagan companions shocked believers no longer join 'debauchery's' (ἀσωτίας) flood. The root meaning 'unsavable' or 'wasteful' (ἀ-σωτ-) informs the sense of life squandered in excess. Spanish 'libertinaje,' French forms, German 'Ausschweifung' (excess) capture the unrestrained dissolution. DRUNKENNESS AND INTOXICATION

en: debauchery, of-reckless-living | es: de-libertinaje, desenfreno, disolición | fr: ἀσωτία, ἀσωτίας | de: Ausschweifung Eph 5:18; Titus 1:6; 1Pet 4:4

ἄσωτος G0811 Adv (1×)

Recklessly, dissolutely; in a manner characterized by wasteful excess and moral abandon

This adverb describes living without restraint or regard for consequences—recklessly wasting resources and abandoning moral boundaries. Jesus uses it in the prodigal son parable to characterize the younger son's lifestyle in the far country. The word captures both financial recklessness (squandering inheritance) and moral dissolution (loose living), painting a picture of life utterly unmoored from wisdom, family, and faith.

(1×) Luke 15:13 describes the prodigal son squandering his inheritance living 'recklessly' (Spanish 'perdidamente' = ruinously, French 'en débauche' = in debauchery). The adverb captures the totality of his abandon—not careful sin but reckless plunge into excess. He didn't preserve anything for tomorrow, didn't maintain any moral boundaries. The word choice emphasizes how far he fell and how complete his wastage became before he 'came to himself.' MANNER ADVERBS

en: recklessly | es: perdidamente | fr: en-débauche | de: ἀσώτως Luke 15:13

ἀτακτ-έω G0812 V-AIA-1P (1×)

To be disorderly or undisciplined; to live in an irregular, irresponsible manner

Originally a military term for soldiers out of formation or failing their duties, this verb evolved to describe any undisciplined, disorderly living. Paul uses it in 2 Thessalonians to defend his conduct in Thessalonica, insisting he didn't live irresponsibly but worked to support himself. The word implies failing to discharge proper responsibilities, living without the discipline that community life requires.

(1×) In 2 Thessalonians 3:7, Paul declares 'we were not disorderly' (Spanish 'fuimos desordenados,' German 'unordentlich leben' = live disorderly) while among the Thessalonians. The context involves self-support through manual labor—Paul didn't burden the church financially but worked night and day. His point: apostles modeled responsible, disciplined living rather than the idle, mooching behavior some Thessalonians had adopted while awaiting Christ's return. LAZINESS AND IDLENESS

en: we-were-disorderly | es: fuimos-desordenados | fr: ἠτακτήσαμεν | de: unordentlich-leben 2Thess 3:7

ἄτακτ-ος G0813 Adj-AMP (1×)

Disorderly, undisciplined; living irresponsibly without proper attention to duties and obligations

This adjective describes people living without proper order or discipline—failing responsibilities, ignoring duties, conducting life irregularly rather than according to accepted norms. Paul uses it in 1 Thessalonians to identify certain church members who needed admonition for their undisciplined lifestyle. The military background of the term suggests people out of position, not fulfilling their assigned roles in the community.

(1×) First Thessalonians 5:14 urges believers to 'admonish the disorderly' (Spanish 'desordenados,' German 'unordentlich'). Context suggests these were idle believers, possibly those who quit working while awaiting Christ's return. Paul distinguishes them from the fainthearted and weak, who need encouragement and support—the disorderly need correction for their irresponsible, undisciplined behavior that burdens the community and dishonors the gospel. LAZINESS AND IDLENESS

en: disorderly | es: desordenados | fr: ἀτάκτους | de: unordentlich 1Thess 5:14

ἄτακτ-ος G0814 Adv (2×)

in a disorderly manner, without proper discipline

An adverb meaning in a disorderly, undisciplined, or irregular manner. Paul warns the Thessalonians not to associate with believers walking disorderly (2 Thessalonians 3:6, 11). The context indicates people not working but being busybodies. The root word described soldiers out of formation, irregular rhythms in music or medicine, or generally undisciplined behavior. Paul's usage focuses on Christians who violate community standards regarding work and mutual responsibility.

(2×) Both uses in 2 Thessalonians 3 address the same issue: believers living in disorderly fashion by refusing to work and interfering in others' affairs (v.6, 11). The military metaphor of being 'out of ranks' fits Paul's self-description of working night and day as an example. French preserves the Greek form directly while other languages use disorder terminology. The domain of Relations captures how this disorder disrupts proper community order. MANNER ADVERBS

en: disorderly | es: desordenadamente | fr: ἀτάκτως | de: unordentlich 2Thess 3:6; 2Thess 3:11

ἄτεκν-ος G0815 Adj-NMS (3×)

childless, without children, barren

This adjective describes someone without children. Jesus addresses a Sadducees' question using Moses's law: if a man dies 'childless,' his brother should marry the widow to raise up offspring (Luke 20:28, 29, 30). The scenario involves seven brothers consecutively marrying the same woman, all dying without children. The term emphasizes the absence of offspring, which in ancient context represented loss of legacy and failure to fulfill cultural expectations. The law of levirate marriage addressed this crisis by preserving family lines.

(3×) Appears exclusively in Luke 20:28-30 (three times) in Jesus's exchange with Sadducees about resurrection. Moses's law required a man to marry his 'childless' (ἄτεκνος) brother's widow to preserve the family line. The hypothetical scenario involves seven brothers, each dying 'childless' (ἄτεκνος), highlighting the absurdity the Sadducees saw in resurrection doctrine. The Spanish 'sin-hijos,' French 'sans-enfant,' and German forms straightforwardly convey the absence of children, central to the levirate marriage question. BARREN INFERTILE

en: childless | es: sin-hijos | fr: sans-enfant | de: ἄτεκνος, ἄτεκνος> Luke 20:28; Luke 20:29; Luke 20:30

ἀτεν-ίζω G0816 V-APA-NMS (14×)

gaze intently, look fixedly — to fix one's eyes upon someone or something with focused, sustained attention

Atenizo is the verb of the locked gaze — eyes riveted on a person or phenomenon with full concentration. It is overwhelmingly a Lukan word, appearing 12 of its 14 NT times in Luke-Acts. When Jesus finishes reading Isaiah in the Nazareth synagogue, 'the eyes of all in the synagogue were gazing intently at him' (Luke 4:20). Peter and John fix their eyes on the lame man at the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:4). Stephen, about to be stoned, gazes into heaven and sees the glory of God (Acts 7:55). Paul stares down Elymas the sorcerer (Acts 13:9). The verb captures a moment of visual intensity — not a casual glance but a stare loaded with expectation, recognition, or revelation. Spanish 'fijar la vista' and German 'fest anblicken' preserve this concentrated quality.

gaze intently, look fixedly (14×) To direct one's gaze with sustained, purposeful intensity at a person, object, or heavenly vision. Characteristic of Luke-Acts (12 of 14 NT occurrences), where it marks pivotal moments: the Nazareth congregation staring at Jesus (Luke 4:20), the servant girl scrutinizing Peter (Luke 22:56), the apostles gazing at the ascending Lord (Acts 1:10), Peter and John locking eyes with the lame man (Acts 3:4), and Stephen looking into opened heaven (Acts 7:55). The remaining 2 Pauline uses (2 Cor 3:7, 13) describe the Israelites unable to gaze at Moses' radiant face. In every case, the verb conveys visual attention charged with significance. GAZING AND LOOKING en: do-you-gaze, gazing, having-gazed | es: fijando-la-vista, habiendo-mirado-fijamente, habiéndolo-mirado-fijamente | fr: fixer-du-regard, regarder-fixement | de: blickt-fest-an, ἀτενίσαι Luke 4:20; Luke 22:56; Acts 1:10; Acts 3:4; Acts 3:12

ἄτερ G0817 Prep (2×)

without, apart from, in the absence of

A preposition meaning without or apart from, taking the genitive case. Jesus asks his disciples to recall being sent out 'without purse' (Luke 22:35). Judas sought to betray Jesus 'without a crowd' or 'away from the multitude' (Luke 22:6). Epic and tragic poetry used this term where classical prose preferred 'choris' or 'aneu.' It emphasizes complete absence or separation from something normally expected or present.

(2×) Luke employs this somewhat archaic preposition twice in chapter 22. In verse 35, Jesus reminds disciples of their prior mission without provisions, establishing precedent for dependence on God and hospitality. In verse 6, it describes Judas's strategy of betraying

Jesus away from the crowds who might have intervened. Most modern languages use simple 'without' constructions, with German preserving the Greek form, showing recognition of this as a distinctive term. WITHOUT AND APART FROM

en: without | es: sin | fr: sans | de: ἄτερ Luke 22:6; Luke 22:35

ἀτῑμ-άζω G0818 V-PIA-2P (7×)

To dishonor, treat with contempt or shame; to insult or degrade someone or something.

A verb meaning to dishonor, treat shamefully, or hold in contempt. It is the active counterpart to 'atimos' (without honor) and appears in contexts of deliberate degradation or insult. In the parable of the wicked tenants, the servants sent by the vineyard owner are 'dishonored' — beaten and sent away empty (Mark 12:4; Luke 20:11). Jesus declares that he does not dishonor the Father, turning the accusation back on his opponents (John 8:49). The apostles rejoice at being counted worthy to 'suffer dishonor' for the Name (Acts 5:41). Spanish 'deshonrar,' French 'deshonorer,' and German 'entehren' all preserve the de-honor morphology.

dishonor, treat with contempt (7×) To treat with dishonor, contempt, or shame; to insult or degrade. The multilingual evidence converges on a single sense: Spanish 'deshonrar,' French 'deshonorer,' German 'entehren,' English 'dishonor' — all preserving the privative structure (removing honor). In Mark 12:4 and Luke 20:11 it describes the treatment of the vineyard owner's servants in Jesus' parable; in John 8:49 Jesus affirms he does not dishonor his Father; in Acts 5:41 the apostles rejoice at suffering dishonor for Christ's name; in Rom 1:24 God gives people over to dishonor their own bodies. Whether active (inflicting shame) or passive (suffering it), the core meaning of stripping dignity remains unified. CONTEMPT AND SCORN

en: dishonor, dishonored, do-you-dishonor | es: deshonraron, deshonras, deshonrasteis | fr: déshonorer | de: entehren, ἀτιμάσαντες, ἀτιμασθῆναι Mark 12:4; Luke 20:11; John 8:49; Acts 5:41; Rom 1:24

ἀτῑμ-ία G0819 N-DFS (7×)

Dishonor, disgrace, or shame; the condition of being held in low esteem or treated with contempt.

Refers to the state of being without honor—whether through social degradation, bodily weakness, or moral disgrace. Paul uses it to describe both the shameful passions God gives people over to (Rom 1:26) and the humble condition of the resurrection body sown in weakness (1 Cor 15:43). The multilingual evidence converges tightly: Spanish 'deshonra,' French 'déshonneur,' and German 'Unehre' all mirror the core idea of honor negated. In 2 Cor 6:8, Paul pairs it with 'honor' to describe the paradoxical apostolic experience of enduring disgrace while being honored by God.

dishonor, shame, disgrace (7×) The state of dishonor, shame, or disgrace—being held in low regard or subjected to indignity. Covers social contempt (Rom 9:21, the vessel made for 'dishonorable use'), moral degradation (Rom 1:26, 'dishonorable passions'), and bodily humiliation (1 Cor 15:43, the body sown 'in dishonor'). Every major translation language renders this with a single negative-honor term (Spanish 'deshonra,' German 'Unehre'), confirming its unified semantic range across all seven NT occurrences. SHAME AND DISGRACE

en: a-dishonor, dishonor, of-dishonor | es: de-deshonra, deshonra | fr: Unehre, déshonneur | de: Unehre Rom 1:26; Rom 9:21; 1Cor 11:14; 1Cor 15:43; 2Cor 6:8

ἄτῑμ-ος G0820 Adj-ANP-C (4×)

without honor, dishonored, despised; treated as having no value or dignity

Formed from the privative alpha and time ('honor, value'), atimos describes a person or thing deprived of honor or regarded as worthless. Jesus quotes the proverb 'a prophet is not without honor except in his hometown' (Matt 13:57; Mark 6:4), using the adjective to name the paradox of local familiarity breeding contempt. Paul adopts the word in his Corinthian correspondence: he calls apostles 'dishonored' (1 Cor 4:10) in his ironic catalog of apostolic hardships, and in 1 Corinthians 12:23 he discusses the 'less honorable' members of the body receiving greater honor. Spanish 'sin-honor/despreciados' and French 'sans-honneur' both transparently preserve the privative structure.

(4×) Without honor, dishonored, or despised — lacking the recognition or esteem that is due. Jesus applies the word to a prophet rejected in his homeland (Matt 13:57; Mark 6:4), while Paul uses it of apostles treated contemptuously by the world (1 Cor 4:10) and of body members deemed less presentable (1 Cor 12:23). The comparative form in 1 Corinthians 12:23 ('less honorable') shows that the concept admits of degrees. Spanish 'sin-honor/despreciados' and English 'without-honor/dishonored' confirm a single semantic core: the denial or absence of deserved dignity. CONTEMPT AND SCORN

en: dishonored, less-honorable, without-honor | es: despreciados, menos-honorables, sin-honor | fr: sans-honneur | de: ἀτιμότερα, ἄτιμοι, ἄτιμος Matt 13:57; Mark 6:4; 1Cor 4:10; 1Cor 12:23

ἀτῑμ-όω G0821

dishonor, treat with contempt; deprive of civic rights; punish with loss of status

A verb describing actions that diminish someone's honor or standing. The active voice means to dishonor someone or treat them with contempt, stripping them of the respect or status they previously held. The passive voice indicates suffering dishonor or indignity—experiencing degradation or disrespect. In legal contexts, it can refer to punishment involving the loss of civic rights or privileges (atimia), a formal deprivation of citizen status. The word encompasses both social dishonoring and legal disenfranchisement.

ἀτμ-ίς G0822 N-NFS (2×)

vapor, mist, exhalation, steam

A noun denoting moist vapor, steam, or mist rising from heated liquid. Peter quotes Joel's prophecy of 'blood and fire and vapor of smoke' accompanying the day of the Lord (Acts 2:19). James compares human life to a vapor that appears briefly then vanishes (James 4:14). Classical usage distinguished moist vapor (atmis) from dry smoke (kapnos), though they could combine. The term emphasizes transience and insubstantiality.

(2×) The two occurrences illustrate different applications: eschatological signs (Acts 2:19) and wisdom teaching about life's brevity (James 4:14). In Acts, vapor of smoke is part of cosmic upheaval. In James, vapor serves as metaphor for life's fleeting nature - visible momentarily then gone. Both leverage the physical property of vapor as transient and insubstantial. All four languages use vapor/steam terminology, recognizing the physical phenomenon underlying both literal and metaphorical uses. SMOKE

en: a-vapor, vapor | es: vapor | fr: vapeur, ἀτμὶς | de: ἀτμίδα, ἀτμὶς Acts 2:19; Jas 4:14

ἄτομος G0823 Adj-DNS (1×)

An indivisible moment, an instant; the smallest possible unit of time

Originally describing something physically indivisible (like atoms), this word came to mean the briefest possible moment—time so short it cannot be subdivided. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians to describe the resurrection's speed: in one indivisible instant, at the last trumpet, mortality will be swallowed by immortality. The word emphasizes suddenness and totality—not gradual transformation but instantaneous, atomic change.

(1×) First Corinthians 15:52 promises resurrection 'in an instant' (Spanish 'instante,' French 'atome,' German 'Augenblick' = blink of eye), 'in the twinkling of an eye.' The doubled time expressions emphasize absolute brevity—change happening so fast it defies measurement. The Greek philosophical term for indivisible particles becomes a vivid image for the instantaneous transformation awaiting believers when Christ returns and death is conquered completely. MOMENT INSTANT

en: an-instant | es: instante | fr: atome | de: Augenblick 1Cor 15:52

ἄτοπ-ος G0824 Adj-NNS (4×)

out of place, improper, wrong; ranging from the merely unusual to the morally wicked

Literally meaning 'out of place' (from the privative alpha and topos, 'place'), atopos covers a wide semantic range from the odd or unusual to the morally reprehensible. Luke 23:41 carries the strongest moral force: the penitent thief declares that Jesus 'has done nothing wrong,' in stark contrast to their own crimes. Acts 25:5 uses it more mildly — if there is 'anything wrong' with Paul, let them accuse him. Acts 28:6 describes the expected but absent physical harm from a snakebite — 'nothing unusual' happened to Paul. Second Thessalonians 3:2 asks for prayer against 'unreasonable and wicked' people. French 'absurde/hors-du-chemin' nicely captures the spatial metaphor of being off the proper path.

(4×) Wrong, wicked, or improper — morally or legally out of order. The penitent thief's declaration that Jesus has done 'nothing wrong' (Luke 23:41) and the request to expose anything 'wrong' about Paul (Acts 25:5) both use the adjective in a judicial-moral register. Second Thessalonians 3:2 pairs it with poneros ('evil') to describe hostile opponents. Spanish 'malo/perversos' and English 'wrong/unreasonable' reflect this ethical sense of conduct that violates proper norms. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

en: unreasonable, unusual, wrong | es: impropio, malo, perversos | fr: absurde, hors-du-chemin | de: ἀτόπων, ἄτοπον Luke 23:41; Acts 25:5; Acts 28:6; 2Thess 3:2

Ἀτταλία G0825 N-AFS (1×)

Attalia, a seaport city in Pamphylia on the southern coast of Asia Minor

Named after its founder Attalus II of Pergamum, Attalia served as Pamphylia's main seaport on the Mediterranean coast. Luke mentions it as Paul and Barnabas's departure point after their first missionary journey—they preached in nearby Perga, then traveled to Attalia to catch a ship back to Syrian Antioch. The city's harbor made it a natural gateway for travel between inland Asia Minor and the wider Mediterranean world.

(1×) Acts 14:25 records Paul and Barnabas going down to Attalia to sail home after establishing churches in Galatia. The modern Turkish city Antalya preserves the ancient name. The mention shows Luke's geographic precision and highlights how the early Christian mission depended on Roman infrastructure—roads to reach inland cities, harbors like Attalia for maritime connections that enabled the gospel's rapid spread across the empire. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Attaleia | es: Attáleia | fr: Attalie | de: Ἀττάλειαν Acts 14:25

αὐγάζω G0826 V-ANA (1×)

To shine forth or illuminate; to give light or make visible through radiance

This verb describes light shining forth, illuminating what was dark or making visible what was hidden. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians regarding the gospel's light—Satan blinds unbelievers' minds to prevent the light of Christ's gospel from shining on them. The word implies both revelation (making visible) and transformation (illumination that changes what it touches).

(1×) Second Corinthians 4:4 speaks of preventing the gospel's light 'from shining' (Spanish 'iluminar,' French 'briller,' German 'erleuchten' = enlighten). Satan blinds minds specifically to block this illumination—the light of knowing Christ's glory. The metaphor portrays spiritual blindness as blocked light: the glory is present, radiating, but veiled minds can't receive it. Conversion is the unveiling, allowing divine light to shine in and transform the inner person. SHINING AND ILLUMINATING

en: to-shine | es: iluminar | fr: briller | de: erleuchten 2Cor 4:4

αὐγή G0827 N-GFS (1×)

Dawn, daybreak; the first light of morning as the sun rises

This noun describes the dawn—that liminal moment when night yields to day, darkness to light. Homer used it for sunlight and rays; later writers employed it specifically for the breaking of dawn. Luke uses it in Acts to mark the temporal setting of Paul's extended teaching in Troas—he spoke until daybreak, the moment when Eutychus fell from the window. Dawn marks transition, the boundary between night's dangers and day's clarity.

(1×) Acts 20:11 records Paul talking until 'dawn' (Spanish 'alba,' French 'aube,' German 'Morgendämmerung') after breaking bread in Troas. The all-night session culminated at daybreak—Paul taught from evening through midnight (when Eutychus fell), continuing until sunrise. The detail emphasizes his urgency to impart everything possible before departure, and the believers' hunger to receive teaching, willing to sacrifice sleep for apostolic instruction. DAWN AND TWILIGHT

en: dawn | es: el-alba | fr: aube | de: αὐγῆς Acts 20:11

Αὔγουστος G0828 N-GMS (1×)

Augustus, the title adopted by Octavian as Rome's first emperor; also used as an adjective meaning 'august' or 'revered'

Augustus (Latin for 'revered' or 'worthy of worship') was the title Octavian took when he became Rome's first emperor in 27 BC, ending the Republic and beginning the Principate. Luke dates Jesus' birth to a census decreed by 'Caesar Augustus,' grounding the incarnation in verifiable history. The title carried religious overtones—augustus implied divinity, making Luke's use theologically loaded: the eternal Son entered time during the reign of a man claiming divine honors.

(1×) Luke 2:1 dates Jesus' birth to a decree from 'Caesar Augustus' (consistently transliterated across languages). The historical precision anchors the incarnation in the reign of Rome's first emperor (27 BC – AD 14). The irony is profound: Augustus, celebrated as divine savior who brought peace to the empire, unknowingly set in motion (through his census) the arrival of the true Prince of Peace in an obscure Judean village. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Augoustos | es: Augoûstos | fr: Auguste | de: Αὐγούστου Luke 2:1

αὐθάδ-ης G0829 Adj-NMP (2×)

self-willed, arrogant, stubborn, pleased with oneself

An adjective describing someone who is self-willed, arrogant, or stubbornly insistent on their own way. Paul lists it among qualifications an overseer must not have (Titus 1:7). Peter warns of bold and self-willed people who are not afraid to blaspheme (2 Peter 2:10). The term combines 'self' and 'pleasing,' suggesting someone who pleases only themselves with no regard for others. Classical usage included stubborn, surly, or self-pleasing senses.

(2×) Both occurrences describe people in positions of influence who wrongly assert their will: disqualified church leaders (Titus 1:7) and false teachers (2 Pet 2:10). The term captures the opposite of other-centered humility - these people operate from self-centered arrogance. Paul contrasts this with the servant-hearted leadership required in God's household. Multilingual glosses use arrogant/self-willed terminology across languages, with French and German preserving forms closer to the Greek. PRIDE AND ARROGANCE en: self-willed | es: arrogante, arrogantes | fr: αὐθάδεις, αὐθάδη | de: eigenwillig Titus 1:7; 2Pet 2:10

αὐθ-αίρετος G0830 Adj-NMS (2×)

of one's own accord, voluntary, self-chosen

An adjective meaning done of one's own free choice or voluntary initiative. Paul describes the Macedonians' generosity as being of their own accord (2 Corinthians 8:3, 17). The term combines 'self' and 'chosen,' emphasizing voluntary action rather than compulsion. Classical usage applied it to self-elected magistrates, voluntary service, or self-incurred consequences. Paul uses it positively for freely chosen generosity that exceeds external pressure.

(2×) Both occurrences in 2 Corinthians 8 commend voluntary generosity. In verse 3, the Macedonians gave beyond their ability 'of their own accord,' not under Paul's pressure. In verse 17, Titus went to Corinth 'of his own accord,' showing initiative. The term emphasizes the internal motivation and freedom characterizing genuine Christian giving and service. Cross-linguistic evidence shows 'of own accord/free will' renderings, with German 'freiwillig' (freely willing) capturing the voluntary essence. FREEWILL OFFERING

en: of-his-own-accord, of-their-own-accord | es: por-propia-voluntad | fr: de-soi-même | de: freiwillig 2Cor 8:3; 2Cor 8:17

αὐθεντ-έω G0831 V-PNA (1×)

To exercise authority over, dominate; to control or govern another person

This verb means to wield authority or exercise dominion over someone. In classical usage it could describe legitimate authority but sometimes implied autocratic domination. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy regarding women's role in church teaching, prohibiting them from 'exercising authority over' men in the congregational setting. The word's precise nuance is debated—whether it means normal authority or something more like domineering—affecting how interpreters understand Paul's instruction.

(1×) First Timothy 2:12 forbids women 'to exercise authority' (Spanish 'ejercer autoridad,' German 'Gewalt ausüben' = wield power) over men in teaching contexts. The verb's background includes both legitimate authority and autocratic domination, making interpretation complex. Paul prohibits women from the authoritative teaching role in gathered worship, though the exact scope (all teaching? only congregational? only over men?) and rationale continue to generate discussion among interpreters. RULING AND REIGNING

en: to-exercise-authority | es: ejercer-autoridad | fr: αὐθεντεῖν | de: Gewalt-ausueben 1Tim 2:12

αὐλέω G0832 V-AIA-1P (3×)

play the flute, pipe; to make music with a wind instrument

This verb means to play the flute or pipe. Jesus uses it in his lament over that generation's response to both John and himself: 'We played the flute for you, and you did not dance' (Matt 11:17; Luke 7:32). Paul asks rhetorically how lifeless instruments like flute or harp can be understood if they give no distinction in notes (1 Cor 14:7). The flute represents celebratory music in the first instance and the necessity of clear communication in the second. Musical metaphor illuminates spiritual responsiveness and clarity.

(3×) Used of flute playing in contexts of response and communication. Matthew 11:17 and Luke 7:32 record Jesus's complaint: 'We played the flute' (Ηὐλήσαμεν) but you wouldn't dance—metaphor for rejecting joyful gospel proclamation. First Corinthians 14:7 uses 'being fluted' (αὐλούμενον) to illustrate that even musical instruments must give clear notes to be understood, applying to spiritual gift of tongues. The French 'jouer-de-la-flûte,' Spanish 'tocamos-flauta,' and German 'floeten' maintain the musical instrument context while serving larger rhetorical points. FLUTE PIPE INSTRUMENT

en: We-played-flute, We-played-the-flute, being-fluted | es: Tocamos-flauta, tocado-con-flauta, tocamos-flauta | fr: jouer-de-la-flûte | de: floeten, Ηὐλήσαμεν Matt 11:17; Luke 7:32; 1Cor 14:7

αὐλή G0833 N-AFS (12×)

Courtyard or court of a building; sheepfold or enclosed pen for livestock

The Greek noun aule originally meant any open enclosure, and the New Testament preserves two distinct applications of this spatial concept. In ten of its twelve occurrences, it designates the courtyard of a building — most memorably the high priest's courtyard where Peter denied Jesus (Matt 26:58, 69; Mark 14:54, 66; Luke 22:55; John 18:15). Twice, in Jesus' shepherd discourse (John 10:1, 16), it shifts to mean a sheepfold or pen, an enclosed space for livestock rather than for human gatherings. The multilingual translations draw a sharp line: 'patio/atrio' versus 'redil' in Spanish, confirming the semantic split.

1. courtyard, court (10×) An open courtyard or court attached to a large building, whether a palace, a mansion, or the temple complex. The high priest's aule is the most prominent example, the setting for Peter's three denials on the night of Jesus' arrest (Matt 26:58, 69; Mark 14:54, 66; Luke 22:55; John 18:15). It also appears as the court of Caiaphas's palace where the council gathered (Matt 26:3) and as the governor's praetorium courtyard (Mark 15:16). Spanish employs 'patio' and 'atrio,' French uses 'cour,' and German 'Hof' — all standard architectural courtyard terms. The ten occurrences consistently describe an open, bounded space within or before a significant building where events of public consequence unfold. COURTYARD ENCLOSURE

en: court, courtyard | es: atrio, casa, patio | fr: cour | de: Hof, αὐλήν, αὐλὴν Matt 26:3; Matt 26:58; Matt 26:69; Mark 14:54; Mark 14:66

2. sheepfold, pen (2×) A sheepfold or enclosed pen for keeping sheep, restricted to Jesus' Good Shepherd discourse in John 10. In John 10:1, the one who does not enter 'by the door into the fold (aule) of the sheep' is a thief, and in John 10:16 Jesus speaks of 'other sheep not of this fold.' Spanish shifts decisively to 'redil' (sheepfold) rather than 'patio,' marking a clear lexical boundary. The underlying spatial concept — an enclosed area — remains the same, but the referent moves from human architecture to animal husbandry, and the metaphorical freight is entirely different: the aule here represents the covenant community gathered under one shepherd. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: fold | es: redil | fr: cour | de: Hof John 10:1; John 10:16

αὐλ-ητής G0834 N-AMP (2×)

flute-player, one who plays the aulos (reed instrument)

A noun denoting someone who plays the aulos, a double-reed wind instrument similar to an oboe. Jesus encounters flute-players at Jairus's house performing customary mourning music (Matthew 9:23). Revelation's lament over Babylon includes the silencing of flute-players among other musicians (Revelation 18:22). Flute-players were common at funerals and festivals in the ancient world. The Greek term could also refer to certain wasps or sanitary engineers in specialized texts.

(2×) Both New Testament references place flute-players in contexts of public events: funeral mourning (Matt 9:23) and the cessation of city life (Rev 18:22). Matthew specifically notes the noise and crowd accompanying the professional mourners with their flutes. Revelation's prophecy of silenced musicians symbolizes complete desolation. All language witnesses use flute-player terminology, recognizing this as a professional class of musicians rather than casual performers. FLUTE PIPE INSTRUMENT

en: flute-players, of-flute-players | es: de-flautistas, flautistas | fr: joueur-de-flûte | de: Floetenblaeser, αὐλητὰς Matt 9:23; Rev 18:22

αὐλίζομαι G0835 V-IIM/P-3S (2×)

to spend the night, lodge, camp for the night

A verb meaning to pass the night, lodge, or encamp. Jesus lodged at Bethany during his final week (Matthew 21:17). Luke notes Jesus spent nights on the Mount of Olives while teaching in the temple by day (Luke 21:37). The term originally referred to staying in a courtyard (aule), then broadened to any overnight lodging or military encampment. Classical usage included sheep lying down in folds, birds roosting, or armies bivouacking.

(2×) Both Gospel occurrences describe Jesus' lodging pattern during Passion Week: staying in Bethany (Matt 21:17) or on the Mount of Olives (Luke 21:37) while teaching daily in Jerusalem's temple. The imperfect tense in Matthew emphasizes habitual action - Jesus repeatedly lodged there. The pattern shows Jesus avoided staying in potentially hostile Jerusalem at night. Cross-linguistic glosses uniformly use lodging/spending-night terminology, with German preserving Greek forms showing recognition of this as a technical term for overnight stay. NIGHT AND LODGING

en: he-was-lodging, lodged | es: pasaba-la-noche, pasó-la-noche | fr: passer-la-nuit | de: ηὐλίζετο, ηὐλίσθη Matt 21:17; Luke 21:37

αὐλός G0836 N-NMS (1×)

Flute, pipe; a wind instrument played by blowing across holes to produce musical tones

The aulos was a reed instrument similar to a modern oboe or clarinet, central to Greek music for celebrations, worship, and mourning. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians to argue that even musical instruments need distinct tones to convey meaning—if flute or harp plays unclear notes, how will anyone know the tune? The analogy teaches that spiritual gifts, especially tongues, must communicate intelligibly or they fail their purpose.

(1×) First Corinthians 14:7 mentions 'a flute' (Spanish 'flauta,' French 'flûte,' German 'Flöte') alongside the harp to illustrate the necessity of distinction in tones. If the instrument makes no clear melody, no one can dance or sing along. Paul applies this to tongues: speech without interpretation is noise, not communication. Even non-rational instruments must produce distinct sounds; how much more should rational humans speak clearly when building up the church. FLUTE PIPE INSTRUMENT

en: a-flute | es: flauta | fr: flûte | de: Floete 1Cor 14:7

αὐξάνω G0837 V-FIA-3S (23×)

To grow or increase; intransitively of natural or spiritual growth, or causatively of God granting the increase.

Spanning the mustard seed that becomes a tree (Matt 13:32) and the child Jesus growing strong in spirit (Luke 2:40), auxano captures organic increase — whether physical, numerical, or spiritual. Paul's pointed use in 1 Corinthians 3:6-7 introduces the causative dimension: 'I planted, Apollos watered, but God was causing the growth.' Here the verb shifts agency from the growing thing to the divine Grower. Across languages the intransitive sense is remarkably stable — Spanish 'crece/crecen,' French 'croître,' German 'wachsen' — while the causative surfaces distinctly in Spanish 'haciendo-crecer' and English 'causing-to-grow.'

1. grow, increase (intransitive) (20×) Intransitive growth or increase: the subject itself grows in size, number, strength, or influence. This covers plants (Matt 6:28, the lilies; Mark 4:8, seed yielding grain), persons (Luke 1:80, John the Baptist; Luke 2:40, the child Jesus), and the expanding reach of God's word (Acts 6:7, 12:24, 19:20). Spanish 'crece/crecen,' French 'croître,' and German 'wachsen/wächst' all render this with simple intransitive growth verbs, confirming a unified semantic profile across the 20 occurrences. SPROUTING AND GROWING en: as-grows, grow, growing | es: crece, creced, crecen | fr: croître | de: wachsen, wächst Matt 6:28; Matt 13:32; Mark 4:8; Luke 1:80; Luke 2:40

2. cause to grow (causative) (3×) Causative: to make something grow, to grant or produce increase in another entity. The paradigm is 1 Cor 3:6-7, where Paul, Apollos, and God each play distinct roles — planting, watering, and causing growth. 2 Cor 9:10 extends this to God multiplying the harvest of righteousness. Spanish distinguishes this neatly with 'haciendo-crecer' (causing to grow) versus simple 'crece,' and English likewise shifts to 'causing-to-grow' and 'will-increase,' marking the agent-patient distinction. SPROUTING AND GROWING

en: causing-to-grow, was-causing-to-grow, will-increase | es: aumentará, haciendo-crecer, hacía-crecer | fr: croître | de: wachsen 1Cor 3:6; 1Cor 3:7; 2Cor 9:10

αὔξ-ησις G0838 N-AFS (2×)

growth, increase in size or maturity

A noun denoting growth or increase. Paul describes the body of Christ growing through what every part supplies, making 'growth of the body' (Ephesians 4:16; Colossians 2:19). The term appears in botanical contexts in classical Greek for physical growth of plants or mathematical increments. Paul applies it metaphorically to the church's development toward maturity. The emphasis is on organic increase rather than mechanical addition.

(2×) Both Pauline occurrences use identical phrasing about the body's growth (τὴν αὔξησιν τοῦ σώματος) in parallel passages about Christ as head and the church as body. Ephesians 4:16 emphasizes each part's contribution to growth. Colossians 2:19 stresses growth that comes from God. The biological metaphor of growth fits Paul's body imagery. French preserves the Greek term directly while other languages use native growth vocabulary, showing varying degrees of terminological standardization. SPROUTING AND GROWING en: growth | es: crecimiento | fr: αὔξησιν | de: Wachstum Eph 4:16; Col 2:19

αὔριον G0839 Adv (14×)

tomorrow, the next day — temporal adverb indicating the day following the present or a referenced point in time

Aurion is the everyday Greek word for 'tomorrow,' rooted in the same Indo-European dawn-word that gives us Latin aurora. In the New Testament it appears in two distinct registers. In Jesus' teaching it evokes the uncertainty of human planning: 'Do not worry about tomorrow, for tomorrow will worry about itself' (Matt 6:34), and 'the grass which today is in the field and tomorrow is thrown into the oven' (Matt 6:30). In narrative contexts it functions as a straightforward temporal marker for the next day (Acts 23:15, 25:22). James 4:13-14 echoes Jesus' teaching: 'you do not know what tomorrow will bring.' Spanish 'manana,' French 'demain,' German 'morgen' — all basic temporal vocabulary with no semantic variation across contexts.

tomorrow, the next day (14×) A temporal adverb denoting the day immediately following the present moment or a point of reference in the narrative. In the Gospels, it appears prominently in Jesus' wisdom teaching about anxiety and the futility of human presumption (Matt 6:30, 6:34; Luke 12:28; cf. Jas 4:14), where 'tomorrow' symbolizes the uncontrollable future. In narrative settings (Luke 10:35, Acts 23:15, 25:22), it simply marks the next day in a sequence of events. All 14 occurrences express a single temporal concept, with the difference between proverbial and narrative usage being a matter of rhetorical register rather than distinct meaning. TIME AND SEASONS

en: Tomorrow, next-day, tomorrow | es: Mañana, día-siguiente, mañana | fr: demain | de: morgen Matt 6:30; Matt 6:34; Luke 10:35; Luke 12:28

αὐστηρός G0840 Adj-NMS (2×)

harsh, severe, stern, austere

An adjective meaning harsh, severe, or austere. Jesus quotes a servant who feared his master as 'a harsh man' who reaps where he didn't sow (Luke 19:21-22). The term derives from a root meaning 'to dry up,' and classical usage included harsh wine (opposed to sweet), rough terrain, or severe personalities. It describes someone exacting and demanding, showing no leniency. Jesus uses it to expose the servant's false perception that led to paralysis rather than productivity.

(2×) Both occurrences in Luke 19 appear in the same parable dialogue - the servant's accusation (v.21) and the master's response using the servant's own words (v.22). The servant claims fear of the harsh master excuses his inaction, but the master shows this very logic should have motivated banking the money. The term characterizes perceived rather than actual harshness. All four language witnesses use harsh/severe terminology, with German preserving the Greek forms. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: harsh | es: severo | fr: dur | de: αὐστηρός, αὐστηρὸς Luke 19:21; Luke 19:22

αὐτάρκ-εια G0841 N-GFS (2×)

self-sufficiency, contentment, competence, adequate resources

A noun denoting self-sufficiency or contentment with what one has. Paul speaks of God providing sufficiency so believers abound in good works (2 Corinthians 9:8). He commends godliness with contentment as great gain (1 Timothy 6:6). Classical philosophy, especially Stoicism, prized autarkeia as the ideal of needing nothing external. Paul transforms this virtue: Christian contentment depends not on internal resources but on God's provision.

(2×) The two Pauline occurrences show different nuances. In 2 Corinthians 9:8, 'sufficiency' or 'all you need' emphasizes God supplying adequate resources for generosity. In 1 Timothy 6:6, 'contentment' emphasizes satisfaction with what one has rather than craving more. Both contrast with self-reliant Stoic autarkeia by grounding sufficiency in divine provision. German 'Genügsamkeit' (enoughness) captures the contentment aspect while 'sufficiency' captures the adequacy aspect. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH en: contentment, sufficiency | es: contentamiento, suficiencia | fr: se-suffire, αὐταρκείας | de: Genuegsamkeit 2Cor 9:8; 1Tim 6:6

αὐτάρκ-ης G0842 Adj-NMS (1×)

Self-sufficient, content; having enough in oneself without needing external resources

Classical philosophy celebrated autarkeia as the sage's ideal—needing nothing beyond oneself, independent of external circumstances. Paul adopts this Stoic term but redefines it: his sufficiency comes not from inner resources but from Christ who strengthens him. He has 'learned the secret of being content' in all circumstances—not self-powered independence but Christ-sustained contentment that transcends material conditions.

(1×) Philippians 4:11 shows Paul claiming to be 'self-sufficient' or 'content' in all circumstances. The Greek philosophical ideal gets radically redefined—Paul's contentment isn't Stoic self-reliance but dependence on Christ: 'I can do all things through him who strengthens me.' True autarkeia is Christ-sufficiency, finding abundance or scarcity equally acceptable because Christ himself is the constant resource that makes all circumstances endurable. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: self-sufficient | es: auto-suficiente | fr: αὐτάρκης | de: genuegsam Phil 4:11

αὐτο-κατάκρῐτος G0843 Adj-NMS (1×)

Self-condemned; judged guilty by one's own actions or testimony

This compound word describes someone condemned by their own behavior or words—they need no external judge because their actions testify against them. Paul uses it in Titus to describe divisive people who, after two warnings, stand self-condemned. Their persistence in division despite admonition reveals their true character; they condemn themselves by their refusal to repent when corrected.

(1×) Titus 3:11 declares that a factious person, after two warnings, is 'self-condemned' (consistently transliterated or translated across languages). The repeated admonition provides opportunity to repent; refusal reveals settled choice. No further judgment is needed—the person's persistence in division after clear warning condemns them by their own actions. Their behavior, not others' judgment, exposes their character and justifies exclusion from fellowship. CONDEMN JUDGE GUILTY

en: self-condemned | es: auto-condenado | fr: αὐτοκατάκριτος | de: selbstverurteilt Titus 3:11

αὐτό-μᾰτος G0844 Adj-NFS (2×)

by itself, of its own accord, spontaneously

An adjective meaning self-acting or spontaneous, often used adverbially. Jesus describes seed sprouting and growing automatically in Mark 4:28 - the earth produces crops 'by itself.' In Acts 12:10, the prison gate opens 'of its own accord' as Peter is led out by the angel. Classical usage included self-moving tripods, automatic gates of Olympus, and plants growing wild without cultivation. The term emphasizes action without external human agency.

(2×) Both New Testament occurrences involve processes happening without human intervention: crop growth (Mark 4:28) and miraculous gate-opening (Acts 12:10). Mark's parable emphasizes the mysterious autonomy of growth - farmers plant and harvest but cannot control the growth process itself. Acts emphasizes divine action making the gate open on its own. Cross-linguistic glosses uniformly use 'of itself/by itself' constructions, preserving the auto- (self) semantic core across all languages. HAPPENING AND CHANCE

en: by-itself, of-its-own-accord | es: por-sí-misma | fr: d'elle-même, de-soi-même | de: von-selbst, αὐτομάτη Mark 4:28; Acts 12:10

αὐτόπτ-ης G0845 N-NMP (1×)

Eyewitnesses; those who have personally seen and observed events firsthand

This noun describes people who witnessed events with their own eyes, not receiving secondhand reports. Luke uses it in his gospel prologue to distinguish authoritative sources for his narrative—he consulted eyewitnesses and servants of the word who saw Jesus' ministry directly. The term emphasizes the historical foundation of Christian faith: not myth or speculation but testimony from people who were there, who saw and handled the Word of life.

(1×) Luke 1:2 references those who 'from the beginning were eyewitnesses' (Spanish 'testigos oculares,' French 'témoin oculaire,' German 'Augenzeugen') and servants of the word. Luke grounds his gospel in reliable testimony from people who personally witnessed Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. This distinguishes Christianity from mystery religions—it claims historical events, verifiable through witnesses who staked their lives on what they'd seen with their own eyes. WITNESSES AND TESTIMONY

en: eyewitnesses | es: testigos-oculares | fr: témoin-oculaire | de: αὐτόπται Luke 1:2

αὐτός G0846 PPro-AN3P (5611×)

He, she, it; self; the same — third-person pronoun with intensive and identity uses

The most frequent word in the Greek New Testament, αὐτός serves as the standard third-person pronoun (he, him, his, she, her, it, they, them) across all cases, genders, and numbers. When paired with the article (ὁ αὐτός), it shifts to mean 'the same' or 'the very one,' as when Jesus prayed a third time 'saying the same words' (Matt 26:44). In its rarest intensive use, it emphasizes the subject's own identity or agency — 'he himself' — a nuance visible in Rom 16:2 and Heb 5:3.

1. third-person pronoun reference (5552×) The default and overwhelmingly dominant use: a personal pronoun for the third person in every grammatical case, gender, and number. Across all target languages the translations are simple pronoun forms — 'de él,' 'de lui,' 'seiner' — confirming its purely referential, anaphoric function. It appears over 5,500 times from Matt 1:2 onward, making it the workhorse of Greek narrative and discourse. STRIKING AND REFERENCE

en: of-him | es: de-él | fr: de-lui | de: seiner Matt 1:2; Matt 3:4; Matt 3:12; Matt 4:6; Matt 4:18

2. the same identical (57×) With the article prefixed, αὐτός takes on the meaning 'the same, the very same, identical.' This is a well-attested classical Greek usage that persists in the NT: Jesus prayed τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον (Matt 26:44, Mark 14:39), and shepherds were in τῇ χώρᾳ τῇ αὐτῇ (Luke 2:8). Multilingual glosses shift from pronoun forms to adjectives of identity — 'mismo/misma' in Spanish — marking the sense boundary clearly. DEMONSTRATIVE PRONOUNS

en: same | es: misma, mismo, mismos | fr: d'eux, elle, il | de: er, es, ihm Matt 26:44; Mark 14:39; Luke 2:8; Luke 6:23; Luke 6:26

3. intensive reflexive self (2×) The rare intensive-reflexive use, where αὐτός emphasizes the agent's own person: 'he himself,' 'she herself.' Only two clear NT instances surface — Rom 16:2 (she herself has been a patron) and Heb 5:3 (he must offer for himself). This maps to the classical Greek emphatic self-reference documented in Homer onward, where αὐτός distinguishes the principal actor from subordinates. REFLEXIVE PRONOUNS

en: himself, myself | es: mismo, sí-mismo | fr: de-lui | de: seiner Rom 16:2; Heb 5:3

αὐτοῦ G0847 Adv (5×)

Here, there; an adverb of place indicating the very spot where one currently is or has been directed to remain.

A locative adverb meaning 'right here' or 'in this very place,' used to anchor someone to a specific location. Jesus tells his disciples to 'stay here' (autou) while he goes to pray in Gethsemane (Matt 26:36), and he declares that some standing 'here' will not taste death before seeing God's kingdom (Luke 9:27). In Acts, it marks places where Paul paused in his journeys—Ephesus (Acts 18:19), or where companions remained (Acts 15:34; 21:4). Spanish distinguishes 'aquí' (here) from 'allí' (there), yet the Greek term covers both, with context determining whether the speaker points to his own position or another's.

(5×) A deictic adverb of place meaning 'right here' or 'right there,' pointing to the immediate location where someone is or should remain. In Matt 26:36, Jesus instructs the disciples to sit autou while he withdraws to pray; in Luke 9:27, it marks the very spot where people are standing. The Acts passages (15:34; 18:19; 21:4) use it to note where travelers stayed during missionary journeys. The Spanish split between 'aquí' and 'allí' reveals that the Greek adverb is flexible—its deictic center shifts with the speaker's vantage point, but it always conveys spatial immediacy. HERE AND HITHER

en: here, there | es: allí, aquí | fr: là | de: αὐτοῦ, αὐτοῦ} Matt 26:36; Luke 9:27; Acts 15:34; Acts 18:19; Acts 21:4

ἑαυτοῦ G0848 PPro-AF3S (13×)

Reflexive pronoun of the third person: himself, herself, themselves; occasionally a simple personal pronoun in Koine

The Greek reflexive pronoun heautou directs an action back toward its subject: himself, herself, themselves. In most New Testament uses, the reflexive force is clear, as when Jesus 'did not entrust himself' to the crowd (John 2:24) or when the disciples 'went away to their own homes' (John 20:10). Yet Koine Greek loosened the boundary between reflexive and personal pronouns, and in a few passages heautou functions as a simple 'him' or 'them' without genuine self-reference, a development well attested in the papyri.

1. reflexive self-reference (11×) True reflexive self-reference, where the pronoun turns the action back upon the grammatical subject. This covers the large majority of occurrences: Jesus does not entrust himself (John 2:24), God glorifies himself (John 13:32), former enemies become friends 'to themselves' (Luke 23:12). English consistently uses 'himself/herself/themselves,' Spanish 'a si mismo/a,' French 'lui-meme/elle-meme,' and German 'sich/ihm,' all marking genuine reflexivity. REFLEXIVE PRONOUNS

en: herself, himself, themselves | es: *, -a-sí-mismo, a-sí-misma | fr: elle, eux, lui | de: ihm, ihn, sie Luke 23:12; Luke 24:12; John 2:24; John 13:32; John 20:10

2. simple third-person pronoun (2×) Non-reflexive third-person pronoun, a Koine development where heautou replaces the simple autos without true reflexive meaning. In Mark 9:16 and Acts 10:21, the pronoun serves as a loose 'him' or 'them' rather than indicating self-directed action. Spanish uses 'el/ellos,' French 'lui/eux,' mirroring the shift. This blurring of reflexive and personal pronouns is well documented in Hellenistic papyri and reflects everyday spoken Greek rather than literary precision. PRONOUNS AND MIXED

en: him, them | es: ellos, él | fr: eux, lui | de: sie, αὐτόν} Mark 9:16; Acts 10:21

αὐτό-χειρ G0849 Adj-NMP (1×)

with one's own hand; performing an action personally, directly by oneself

This Greek adjective emphasizes direct personal involvement in an action, literally 'self-handed.' In its single New Testament appearance, it describes the crew throwing cargo overboard with their own hands during Paul's shipwreck voyage. The term conveys the urgency and necessity of manual labor performed without delegation—when the situation is so dire that everyone must pitch in personally. Classical usage ranges from murder done by one's own hand to creative work executed personally.

(1×) The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'con propias manos,' English 'with their own hands') confirms the concrete physical sense of personal manual action. At Acts 27:19, the ship's crew personally jettisons the tackle during the storm—an all-hands-on-deck moment where rank and role dissolve into shared survival labor. DOING AND MAKING

en: with-their-own-hands | es: con-propias-manos | fr: de-ses-mains | de: αὐτόχειρες Acts 27:19

αὐχμηρός G0850 Adj-DMS (1×)

dry, dark, parched; squalid or dim due to lack of moisture or light

This adjective describes dryness and dimness, often applied to parched landscapes or rough, squalid conditions. Peter uses it metaphorically for prophecy as a lamp shining 'in a dark place' until the day dawns (2 Pet 1:19). The word evokes the murky, shadowy quality of a dry, unilluminated space—whether physical drought or moral gloom. Classical Greek uses it for dry climates, rough terrain, and even disheveled hair. The New Testament appropriates this atmospheric term for spiritual illumination breaking into darkness.

(1×) The translation spectrum (English/German 'dark,' Spanish 'oscuro,' French retaining the Greek) points to the metaphorical sense of a dim, shadowy place. Peter's 'dark place' is the world awaiting Messiah's full revelation—prophecy gives light in this interim darkness until the morning star rises in believers' hearts. DARKNESS AND GLOOM

en: dark | es: oscuro | fr: αὐχμηρῷ | de: dunkel 2Pet 1:19

ἀφαιρ-έω G0851 V-ASM-1S (10×)

Take away, remove; cut off or sever — whether abstractly removing (sins, disgrace) or physically severing (a body part)

Aphaireo spans a broad semantic arc from abstract removal to violent physical severance. Elizabeth praises God who 'took away' her disgrace (Luke 1:25), and Paul declares that the blood of bulls and goats cannot 'take away' sins (Heb 10:4) — both abstract removals of a condition or burden. Yet the same verb describes Peter cutting off the high priest's servant's ear in Gethsemane (Matt 26:51; Mark 14:47; Luke 22:50), where the Spanish 'corto' (cut) replaces the more general 'quitar' (remove) used in abstract contexts. This shift from removal to severance marks a genuine sense distinction.

1. take away, remove (7×) To take away, remove, or withdraw something from its place or association — whether a disgrace (Luke 1:25), a stewardship (Luke 16:3), sins (Rom 11:27; Heb 10:4), or words from a prophetic book (Rev 22:19). The action is abstract or relational: something is lifted, revoked, or annulled. Spanish uses 'quitar' (remove, take away) and French 'retrancher,' both emphasizing removal rather than physical cutting. LIFTING AND REMOVING en: I-take-away, takes-away, to-take-away | es: le-será-quitada, quita, quitar | fr: retrancher | de: wegnehmen, ἀφαιρεθήσεται, ἀφαιρεῖται Luke 1:25; Luke 10:42; Luke 16:3; Rom 11:27; Heb 10:4

2. cut off, sever (3×) To cut off or sever a body part, specifically an ear, by violent physical action with a weapon. All three occurrences describe the same Gethsemane incident from different Gospel perspectives (Matt 26:51; Mark 14:47; Luke 22:50). The shift to physical severance is reflected in Spanish 'corto' (cut) rather than the abstract 'quitar,' and the aorist tense throughout emphasizes a single decisive blow. CUTTING AND SEVERING

en: cut-off | es: cortó, le-cortó | fr: retrancher | de: wegnehmen, ἀφεῖλεν Matt 26:51; Mark 14:47; Luke 22:50

ἀφᾰν-ής G0852 Adj-NFS (1×)

unseen, hidden, invisible; not manifest or evident to sight

This adjective means 'unseen' or 'hidden,' often referring to things below the earth or concealed from view. In Hebrews 4:13, it appears in the striking declaration that 'no creature is hidden from God's sight'—nothing is invisible (ἀφανής) before the One to whom we must give account. The term underscores divine omniscience: what remains unseen to human eyes is fully exposed to God. Classical usage includes references to the underworld, disappeared persons, and secret actions. The writer to the Hebrews deploys it to demolish any illusion of privacy before the all-seeing Creator.

(1×) The translations (English 'hidden,' Spanish 'oculta,' French 'invisible,' German 'unsichtbar') cluster around concealment and invisibility. Hebrews 4:13 asserts that nothing is ἀφανής before God—no creature can hide, no thought can be concealed from the Judge who sees into the depths of the heart and pierces to the division of soul and spirit. HIDING AND CONCEALING

en: hidden | es: oculta | fr: invisible | de: unsichtbar Heb 4:13

ἀφᾰν-ίζω G0853 V-PPM/P-NFS (5×)

To make invisible, disfigure, destroy; to cause something to vanish, deteriorate, or be rendered unrecognizable.

Carries the root idea of making something unseen or unrecognizable. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus warns that hypocrites 'disfigure' their faces when fasting (Matt 6:16), and that moth and rust 'destroy' earthly treasures (Matt 6:19–20)—two vivid applications of the same verb. In Acts 13:41, Paul quotes Habakkuk's warning that scoffers will 'perish' in astonishment. James 4:14 uses it of life itself: a mist that 'vanishes.' French 'rendre-invisible' captures the etymological core beautifully, while Spanish 'desfiguran' and 'destruye' reflect the word's range from disfigurement to annihilation.

(5×) To make unseen, render unrecognizable, destroy, or cause to vanish—covering a spectrum from disfigurement to complete disappearance. The hypocrites 'disfigure' their faces to advertise their fasting (Matt 6:16), while moth and rust 'destroy' stored treasures (Matt 6:19–20). In prophetic quotation, scoffers are told they will 'perish' (Acts 13:41), and James compares human life to a vapor that 'disappears' (Jas 4:14). French 'rendre-invisible' and 'rendre-obscur' trace the etymological thread of making something aphanes (unseen), while Spanish 'desfiguran' and 'destruye' show how the same root stretches from cosmetic alteration to utter ruin. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

en: destroys, disappearing, perish | es: desapareced, desfiguran, destruye | fr: rendre-invisible, rendre-obscur | de: ἀφανίζει, ἀφανίζουσιν, ἀφανίσθητε Matt 6:16; Matt 6:19; Matt 6:20; Acts 13:41; Jas 4:14

ἀφᾰν-ισμός G0854 N-GMS (1×)

disappearance, destruction, vanishing; the act of making invisible or causing to cease

This noun denotes disappearance or destruction, the process of something vanishing from sight or existence. In Hebrews 8:13, it describes the old covenant as 'becoming obsolete and growing old' and thus 'ready to disappear' (ἀφανισμός). The term captures the twilight moment when something ancient fades into irrelevance and dissolution. Classical uses include extermination and astronomical occultation—stars eclipsed by the sun. The author of Hebrews employs it to signal the imminent obsolescence of the Mosaic economy, already aging and nearing its vanishing point with the arrival of the new covenant.

(1×) The evidence (English/German 'disappearance,' French/German 'Verschwinden,' Spanish 'de desaparición') uniformly points to vanishing or ceasing to exist. Hebrews 8:13 uses ἀφανισμός to describe the old covenant's eschatological fade-out: it is 'ready for disappearance' because Christ has inaugurated the new and better covenant prophesied by Jeremiah. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

en: disappearance | es: de-desaparición | fr: Verschwinden | de: Verschwinden Heb 8:13

ἄφαντ-ος G0855 Adj-NMS (1×)

invisible, disappeared, vanished from sight; suddenly absent or hidden

This adjective means 'made invisible' or 'disappeared,' describing what has vanished from view. Luke uses it at the Emmaus supper when Jesus 'became invisible' (ἄφαντος ἐγένετο) to the two disciples after breaking bread. Their eyes were opened to recognize Him, and in that instant He vanished—a sudden, supernatural withdrawal from sight. Classical usage includes soldiers missing after battle and heroes disappearing into legend. Luke's deployment is theologically loaded: the risen Christ is no mere revenant but Lord of matter and visibility, appearing and disappearing at will.

(1×) The translations (English/Spanish 'invisible,' French 'disparu,' German retaining the Greek) reflect sudden disappearance. At Luke 24:31, Jesus becomes ἄφαντος after the disciples' eyes were opened—He vanishes the moment recognition dawns, leaving them alone with burning hearts and the imperative to testify to the resurrection. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 5326 WITH 3 SENSES

en: invisible | es: invisible | fr: disparu | de: ἄφαντος Luke 24:31

ἀφεδρών G0856 N-AMS (2×)

latrine, toilet, privy, place of defecation

A noun denoting a latrine or privy. Jesus teaches that food enters the stomach and goes out into the latrine (Matthew 15:17; Mark 7:19). The term derives from 'hedra' (seat), with the prefix suggesting a place set apart. It was a euphemistic way to refer to the toilet. Jesus uses it in teaching that external things cannot defile since they pass through the digestive system and are expelled, making the point that moral defilement comes from the heart.

(2×) Both occurrences appear in the same teaching about clean and unclean (Matt 15:17; Mark 7:19). Jesus traces food's path: mouth → stomach → latrine, demonstrating that food doesn't enter the heart and therefore can't morally defile. Mark adds the editorial comment that Jesus thus declared all foods clean. The parallel passages show this was core teaching about the source of defilement. All four languages use latrine/toilet terminology, handling this delicate subject with similar euphemistic restraint. FLESH AND BODY

en: a-latrine, latrine | es: letrina | fr: latrine | de: ἀφεδρῶνα Matt 15:17; Mark 7:19

ἀφειδ-ία G0857 N-DFS (1×)

unsparing treatment, harshness, severity; lack of mercy or leniency

This rare noun can mean either 'generosity' or, in New Testament usage, 'harsh treatment' or 'severity.' Paul uses it in Colossians 2:23 to critique ascetic practices that have 'an appearance of wisdom' but involve 'harsh treatment of the body' (ἀφειδία σώματος). The term captures the self-inflicted rigor of those who punish the flesh in pursuit of spiritual merit. Paradoxically, such unsparing severity toward the body is 'of no value against fleshly indulgence'—it cannot curb the appetites it seeks to mortify. Paul exposes the futility of self-imposed austerity divorced from Christ.

(1×) The evidence (English 'harsh treatment,' Spanish 'severidad,' German 'Strenge') points to severity or rigor. Colossians 2:23 critiques human regulations that demand bodily ἀφειδία—unsparing ascetic discipline—as if physical deprivation could produce spiritual transformation. Paul insists that true transformation comes not from self-punishment but from union with the crucified and risen Christ. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 7670 WITH 5 SENSES

en: harsh-treatment | es: severidad | fr: ἀφειδία | de: Strenge Col 2:23

ἀφελότης G0858 N-DFS (1×)

simplicity, sincerity, unworldliness; straightforward innocence without guile

This noun denotes simplicity or sincerity, a straightforward, uncomplicated disposition free from duplicity. Luke describes the early believers in Acts 2:46 as eating together 'with gladness and simplicity of heart' (ἀφελότητι καρδίας). The term evokes a childlike directness and communal authenticity—no social pretense, no calculated networking, just genuine fellowship. Classical usage emphasizes unworldliness and lack of sophistication. Luke paints an idealized portrait of the Jerusalem church's common life, marked by joy and ἀφελότης—a pure, transparent togetherness rooted in shared devotion to Christ.

(1×) The translations (English 'simplicity,' Spanish 'sencillez,' French 'simplicité') uniformly emphasize sincerity and straightforwardness. Acts 2:46 portrays the early community's table fellowship as characterized by ἀφελότης—an unadorned, heartfelt sharing that embodies the gospel's power to dissolve social barriers and create genuine koinonia. HOLINESS AND SINCERITY

en: simplicity | es: sencillez | fr: simplicité | de: ἀφελότητι Acts 2:46

ἄφεσις G0859 N-NFS (17×)

Release or letting go; in the NT chiefly the forgiveness or remission of sins, and occasionally liberation from captivity.

Rooted in the verb aphiemi ('to let go, send away'), this noun carries a rich legal and cultic background: discharge from debt, exemption from service, quittance from guilt. In the New Testament it narrows dramatically to the forgiveness of sins — the divine act of releasing a person from the debt of transgression (Matt 26:28; Mark 1:4). Luke preserves the older, broader sense when Jesus reads Isaiah in the Nazareth synagogue and proclaims 'release to the captives' (Luke 4:18), where Spanish renders liberacion and libertad rather than the usual perdon. That single passage keeps alive the word's ancient overtone of emancipation alongside its dominant theological meaning of pardon.

1. forgiveness (15×) The remission or pardoning of sins — by far the dominant NT usage (15 of 17 occurrences). Every major language renders it with a forgiveness term: English 'forgiveness,' Spanish perdon, French pardon, German Vergebung. It appears in the baptismal formula of Mark 1:4 and Luke 3:3, in Jesus' words over the cup at the Last Supper (Matt 26:28), and in the apostolic preaching of Acts. The underlying image is the cancellation of a debt or the release from a binding obligation. FORGIVENESS PARDON

en: forgiveness | es: perdón | fr: pardon, rémission | de: Vergebung Matt 26:28; Mark 1:4; Mark 3:29; Luke 1:77; Luke 3:3

2. release (2×) Physical or social release — liberation from captivity or oppression. Both occurrences come from Luke 4:18, where Jesus quotes Isaiah 61:1 in the Nazareth synagogue. Spanish splits into liberacion and libertad, revealing the concrete, bodily dimension: this is not metaphorical pardon but actual setting-free. The classical meaning of the word (dismissal, discharge, exemption) surfaces here and anchors the proclamation in tangible deliverance. FREEDOM AND LIBERTY

en: release | es: liberación, libertad | fr: rémission | de: Vergebung Luke 4:18

ἁφή G0860 N-GFP (2×)

ligament, joint, bond connecting body parts

A noun denoting a ligament, joint, or connection between body parts. Paul uses it metaphorically twice for how Christ's body (the church) is held together and grows through what every ligament supplies (Ephesians 4:16; Colossians 2:19). Classical usage included the sense of touch, grip in wrestling, contact of surfaces in mathematics, and sand for wrestlers to get better grip. The anatomical sense of connecting tissue fits Paul's body ecclesiology.

(2×) Both occurrences appear in nearly identical contexts about the body being supported and knit together through every supporting ligament (Eph 4:16; Col 2:19). Paul's metaphor emphasizes that church unity and growth depend on proper connections - each member functioning in relationship with others. The genitive plural form suggests multiple connection points throughout the body. French and German preserve Greek forms, showing recognition of this as Pauline technical terminology for ecclesial anatomy. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15565 WITH 3 SENSES

en: joint, joints | es: coyuntura, coyunturas | fr: ἁφῆς, ἁφῶν | de: Band Eph 4:16; Col 2:19

ἀφθαρ-σία G0861 N-DFS (8×)

Incorruption, immortality; also moral integrity or purity — freedom from decay in body or character.

A noun describing the quality of being imperishable, untouched by decay or death. Paul uses it powerfully in 1 Corinthians 15 to depict the resurrection body that replaces what is perishable, and in Romans 2:7 for the eternal life sought by those who persist in doing good. In 2 Timothy 1:10 Christ himself is said to have brought immortality to light through the gospel. A secondary ethical sense surfaces in Titus 2:7, where it denotes integrity or soundness in teaching — a moral incorruptibility that mirrors the physical.

1. incorruption, immortality (7×) The quality of being imperishable or immortal — freedom from physical decay and death. Paul contrasts the perishable body sown in burial with the imperishable body raised in glory (1 Cor 15:42, 50, 53-54). In Romans 2:7 it names what the righteous pursue, and in 2 Timothy 1:10 it is what the appearing of Christ has illuminated. German 'Unvergänglichkeit' and Spanish 'incorrupción' both capture this concrete, ontological sense of deathlessness. LIFE AND LIVING

en: immortality, imperishability, incorruption | es: incorrupción | fr: incorruptibilité | de: Unvergaenglichkeit Rom 2:7; 1Cor 15:42; 1Cor 15:50; 1Cor 15:53; 1Cor 15:54

2. integrity, purity (moral) (1×) Moral soundness, integrity, or purity of character — an ethical extension of the root idea of incorruption. Used once in Titus 2:7 to describe the quality that should mark sound teaching. Spanish renders it 'integridad' here rather than 'incorrupción,' signaling that translators across languages perceive a distinct ethical nuance separate from the physical immortality sense. PURITY AND CLEANNESS

en: integrity | es: integridad | fr: incorruptibilité | de: Unvergaenglichkeit Titus 2:7

ἄφθαρ-τος G0862 Adj-AFS (8×)

Imperishable, incorruptible, immortal; not subject to decay, death, or deterioration.

Formed with the alpha-privative (ἀ-) and φθαρτός (perishable, corruptible), this adjective describes what cannot be destroyed, decay, or die. Paul contrasts the perishable athletic wreath with the 'imperishable' crown believers pursue (1 Cor 9:25) and proclaims that the dead will be raised 'imperishable' (1 Cor 15:52). Applied to God, it marks the divine nature as utterly beyond corruption (Rom 1:23; 1 Tim 1:17). Peter speaks of an 'imperishable' inheritance kept in heaven (1 Pet 1:4) and an 'imperishable' seed through which believers are born again (1 Pet 1:23). The multilingual evidence is strikingly uniform: Spanish 'incorruptible,' French 'incorruptible,' German 'unvergänglich.'

imperishable, incorruptible, immortal (8×) Not subject to decay, corruption, or death — imperishable and immortal. When applied to God, it underscores divine transcendence beyond all material deterioration (Rom 1:23; 1 Tim 1:17). When applied to the resurrection body, it marks the transformation from mortal to deathless (1 Cor 15:52). When applied to rewards and inheritance, it contrasts earthly transience with heavenly permanence (1 Cor 9:25; 1 Pet 1:4). Spanish 'incorruptible' and German 'unvergänglich' both capture the negation of decay, while French 'incorruptible' echoes the same Latin-derived formation. LIFE AND LIVING

en: an-imperishable, immortal, imperishable | es: incorruptible, incorruptibles | fr: incorruptible | de: unvergaenglich Mark 16:20; Rom 1:23; 1Cor 9:25; 1Cor 15:52; 1Tim 1:17

ἀφίημι G0863 V-APA-NMP (146×)

To send away, release; hence to leave, abandon; to permit, allow; to forgive, pardon; to neglect; to yield up

Built from apo ('away') and hiemi ('send'), aphiemi is one of the New Testament's most theologically consequential verbs. Its semantic range runs from the physical act of leaving nets behind to follow Jesus (Matt 4:20) through the everyday 'let, allow' of social permission, to the profound declaration 'your sins are forgiven' (Matt 9:2). The same root that describes abandoning a place (Matt 23:38, 'your house is left desolate') also names the divine act of releasing a debtor from obligation (Matt 18:27). Arabic distinguishes taraka (leave) from ghafara (forgive), revealing that Greek unifies under one verb what many languages split apart.

1. leave, abandon, depart from (46×) Physical leaving or abandoning — departing from a place, forsaking a person, or leaving something behind. Arabic taraka, Korean 버리다/떠나다, and Swahili

-acha all render this concretely. Jesus' disciples leave their nets (Matt 4:20), fever leaves Peter's mother-in-law (Matt 8:15), and a man leaves father and mother (Matt 19:5). LEAVING AND REMAINING
en: having-left, leaving, left | es: dejando, dejare, dejándolo | fr: laisser, pardonner | de: lassen, lässt Matt 4:11; Matt 4:20; Matt 4:22; Matt 8:15; Matt 13:36

2. permit, allow, let (33×) Permitting, allowing, or letting someone act — a volitional sense distinct from physical departure. Arabic samaha/da'a, Korean 허락하다, and Hindi aagya dena mark this as a separate semantic field. Jesus tells John, 'Permit it now' at his baptism (Matt 3:15); he instructs disciples to 'let' the children come (Matt 19:14). LEAVING AND REMAINING en: Allow, Leave, Leave-alone | es: Deja, Dejad, deja | fr: laisser | de: lassen, lässt Matt 3:15; Matt 5:24; Matt 5:40; Matt 7:4

3. forgive, cancel (active) (27×) Active forgiveness of sins or cancellation of debts — the theological heart of aphiemi. Arabic ghafara and Korean 용서하다 consistently distinguish this from the 'leave' sense. The Lord's Prayer (Matt 6:12) and the parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt 18:27, 32) make forgiveness a central kingdom ethic. LEAVING AND REMAINING en: He-may-forgive, forgave, forgive | es: perdona, perdonamos, perdonar | fr: laisser | de: lassen, lässt Matt 6:12; Matt 6:14; Matt 6:15

4. be forgiven (passive) (22×) Passive voice: sins or debts 'are forgiven' — the divine passive (passivum divinum) where God is the unspoken agent. Arabic ghufira (passive), Korean 사함받다, and Swahili -samehewa all mark this grammatically. Jesus' pronouncement 'your sins are forgiven' (Matt 9:2; Mark 2:5; Luke 7:48) precipitates controversy over divine authority. LEAVING AND REMAINING en: Are-forgiven, Have-been-forgiven, are-forgiven | es: Han-sido-perdonados, Son-perdonados, fueron-perdonadas | fr: laisser, pardonner | de: lassen, lässt Matt 9:2; Matt 9:5; Matt 12:31; Matt 12:32

5. be left, be abandoned (passive) (10×) Passive of leaving: to be left behind, be abandoned, remain desolate. Arabic yutraku (passive) and Korean 버려지다 render this precisely. Jesus' lament over Jerusalem — 'your house is left to you desolate' (Matt 23:38) — and the apocalyptic 'one will be taken and one left' (Matt 24:40–41) carry judgment overtones. LEAVING AND REMAINING
en: is-left, will-be-left | es: es-dejada, es-dejado, sea-dejada | fr: laisser | de: lassen, lässt Matt 23:38; Matt 24:2; Matt 24:40; Matt 24:41; Mark 13:2

6. (3×) A specialized sense in 1 Corinthians 7:11–13 meaning 'to divorce, send away' a spouse — the legal dissolution of a marriage. Spanish despida and the broader Greco-Roman legal context of aphiemi for divorce distinguish this from simple abandonment. Paul addresses mixed marriages where one partner has become a believer. LEAVING AND REMAINING en: let-her-send-away, let-him-send-away, to-send-away | es: despida, la-despida, lo-despida | fr: pardonner | de: lassen 1Cor 7:11; 1Cor 7:12; 1Cor 7:13

7. neglect, disregard (3×) Neglecting or leaving undone important duties — a culpable omission rather than physical departure. Jesus rebukes the Pharisees for neglecting (aphiemi) justice, mercy, and faithfulness while tithing herbs meticulously (Matt 23:23). Spanish descuidar and Hindi chhodna in the sense of abandoning responsibility capture the moral weight. LEAVING AND REMAINING en: leaves, to-neglect, you-have-neglected | es: dejara, descuidar, descuidasteis | fr: laisser | de: lassen, lässt Matt 23:23; Mark 12:19

8. release, yield up (2×) Releasing or yielding up, as in Jesus yielding up his spirit at death (Matt 27:50). Arabic aslama ('to surrender, hand over'), Korean 놓았다, and Swahili -toa ('give out, emit') all converge on a deliberate act of release rather than passive dying. Mark 15:37 parallels with the same verb, emphasizing Jesus' agency in his final moment. LEAVING AND REMAINING en: letting-out, released | es: entregó, habiendo-dado | fr: laisser | de: lassen, lässt Matt 27:50; Mark 15:37

ἀφικνέομαι G0864 V-AIM-3S (1×)
to arrive at, reach, come to; to attain or extend to a destination

This verb means 'to arrive at' or 'reach,' describing the completion of a journey or the attainment of a goal. Paul uses it in Romans 16:19 when he says 'your obedience has reached everyone' (ἀφίκετο εἰς πάντας)—their faithful witness has become widely known. The term conveys the idea of reputation or influence spreading to a destination. Classical Greek uses it extensively for physical arrival, but Paul employs it metaphorically for the propagation of fame or report. The Roman believers' obedience has traveled far, becoming a matter of public knowledge and apostolic rejoicing.

(1×) The evidence (English 'has reached,' Spanish 'ha llegado,' French 'parvenir,' German 'ankommen') confirms the sense of arrival or attainment. Romans 16:19 uses ἀφικνέομαι to describe how the report of the Romans' obedience has reached (arrived at) all people —their faithfulness has become internationally known, spreading as far as Paul's missionary circuits extend. GOING AND LEADING en: has-reached | es: ha-llegado | fr: parvenir | de: ankommen Rom 16:19

ἀφῐλ-άγᾰθος G0865 Adj-NMP (1×)
not loving good, hostile to virtue; opposed to what is noble or beneficial

This rare compound adjective means 'not loving the good' or 'hostile to virtue.' Paul includes it in his grim catalog of last-days characteristics in 2 Timothy 3:3: people will be 'not loving good' (ἀφιλάγαθοι), along with being lovers of self, lovers of money, and lovers of pleasure. The term denotes an active aversion to virtue—not mere neutrality but antagonism toward the noble and beneficial. It describes those whose affections are so disordered that they despise goodness itself. Paul warns Timothy that such moral inversion will mark the final age.

(1×) The translations (English 'not loving good,' Spanish 'sin amor al bien,' German 'nicht das Gute liebend') all capture the compound's negative force: ἀ-φιλάγαθοι are opposed to goodness. In 2 Timothy 3:3, this vice sits in a list of vices characterizing the 'terrible times' to come—an era when love of self eclipses love of the good, and evil becomes the preferred object of affection. HATRED AND HOSTILITY en: not-loving-good | es: sin-amor-al-bien | fr: ἀφιλάγαθοι | de: nicht-das-Gute-liebend 2Tim 3:3

ἀφῐλ-άργῠρος G0866 Adj-NMS (2×)
not loving money, free from the love of money, without greed for silver

This rare adjective describes a person who is not enslaved to the love of money or silver. It appears in two key pastoral contexts: as a qualification for church overseers and as a general exhortation to believers. The Greek compound combines the negative prefix with 'philargyros' (lover of silver), creating a vivid portrait of financial contentment. The multilingual evidence preserves the literal structure 'not-loving-money', emphasizing the deliberate rejection of materialism as a character trait essential to spiritual leadership and Christian living.

(2×) The word appears exclusively in ethical instruction about character qualities, both in 1 Timothy's list of overseer qualifications and in Hebrews' call to contentment. Spanish, French, and German glosses all preserve the compound negative structure, showing how this virtue was understood across cultures as active freedom from greed rather than mere absence of wealth. The two occurrences frame this as both a leadership requirement (1 Tim 3:3) and a universal Christian calling (Heb 13:5). SILVER AND MONEY en: Without-love-of-money, not-loving-money | es: Sin-amor-al-dinero, no-amante-del-dinero | fr: nicht-geldliebend | de: nicht-geldliebend 1Tim 3:3; Heb 13:5

ἄφιξις G0867 N-AFS (1×)
arrival, coming, departure; the act of reaching or leaving a place

This noun denotes arrival or, paradoxically, departure—the act of coming to or leaving a place. Paul uses it in Acts 20:29 when he warns the Ephesian elders that 'after my departure' (μετὰ τὴν ἄφιξίν μου) savage wolves will enter the flock. The term can mean either 'arrival' or 'departure' depending on context; here it clearly means Paul's leaving. Classical usage favors 'arrival,' but later Greek extends it to departure. Paul's warning is sobering: his protective presence will soon be removed, and false teachers will infiltrate. The ἄφιξις marks a transition from apostolic oversight to congregational vigilance.

(1×) The evidence (English/French 'departure,' Spanish 'partida') confirms the sense of leaving. Acts 20:29 uses ἄφιξις to mark the moment of Paul's departure from Ephesus—after he leaves, wolves will come. The term captures the vulnerability of the flock once the shepherd-apostle is gone, heightening the urgency of the elders' responsibility to guard the church. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11766 WITH 3 SENSES

en: departure | es: partida | fr: départ | de: ἄφιξίν Acts 20:29

ἀφίστημι G0868 V-PMM-2S (15×)

To depart or withdraw from a place; to fall away in apostasy from the faith; to draw others away or incite revolt.

The Greek verb aphistemi combines the prefix apo ('away from') with histemi ('to stand'), yielding a core meaning of 'standing away from' — departure in its most fundamental spatial sense. Most of its fifteen New Testament occurrences describe straightforward physical withdrawal: an angel departs from someone (Luke 2:37; Acts 12:10), the devil leaves Jesus after the temptation (Luke 4:13), or Paul urges separation from unrighteous company (2 Cor 12:8). But the theological weight of aphistemi falls on its metaphorical extension into apostasy. In Luke 8:13, those who receive the word with joy 'fall away in time of testing,' and 1 Timothy 4:1 warns that 'some will depart from the faith.' Spanish apartarse and apostatar, French s'eloigner and apostasier, and German abfallen all distinguish between physical leaving and spiritual defection. A single causative occurrence — Judas the Galilean 'drew away' people after him (Acts 5:37) — completes the picture.

1. depart or withdraw physically (11×) To depart, withdraw, or leave a place, person, or situation in a literal, physical sense. Eleven occurrences cover spatial separation: Anna 'did not depart from the temple' (Luke 2:37), the devil 'departed from him until an opportune time' (Luke 4:13), Jesus commands the wicked to 'depart from me' (Luke 13:27), and Peter's chains 'fell away from his hands' as the angel led him out (Acts 12:10). Spanish apartarse/retirarse, French s'eloigner/se retirer, and German sich entfernen all render this with standard spatial-departure vocabulary. Gamaliel's counsel in Acts 5:38 — 'keep away from these men and let them alone' — shows the verb in its pragmatic, non-theological register. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY

en: Depart, departed, having-departed | es: Apártate, Apártese, apartaos | fr: s'éloigner | de: abfallen, entfernt-sich Luke 2:37; Luke 4:13; Luke 13:27; Acts 5:38; Acts 12:10

2. fall away in apostasy (3×) To fall away from the faith, to apostatize — a metaphorical and theological extension where the departure is spiritual rather than spatial. Three weighty occurrences carry this sense: the rocky-soil hearers who 'fall away in time of testing' (Luke 8:13), the prophetic warning that 'in later times some will depart from the faith' (1 Tim 4:1), and the exhortation to 'take care lest there be in any of you an evil, unbelieving heart, leading you to fall away from the living God' (Heb 3:12). Spanish apostatar, French apostasier, and German abfallen vom Glauben deploy dedicated apostasy vocabulary that physical-departure terms cannot capture. The English word 'apostasy' itself derives from this verb's noun form apostasia. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY

en: fall-away, falling-away, will-depart | es: apartarse, apostatarán, se-apartan | fr: s'éloigner | de: abfallen, entfernt-sich Luke 8:13; 1Tim 4:1; Heb 3:12

3. draw away or mislead others (1×) To draw away, mislead, or cause others to revolt — a transitive causative use where the subject leads people away from their allegiance. A single clear occurrence in Acts 5:37 records that Judas the Galilean 'drew away people after him' in a failed insurrection during the census. Spanish hizo apartarse and French entraina confirm the causative force: this is not self-departure but the active seduction of others into defection. Gamaliel cites this incident alongside Theudas' revolt as evidence that movements without divine backing will collapse on their own. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY

en: drew-away | es: hizo-apartarse | fr: s'éloigner | de: entfernt-sich Acts 5:37

ἄφνω G0869 Adv (3×)

suddenly, unexpectedly; happening without warning

This adverb means suddenly or unexpectedly, describing events that occur without warning. At Pentecost, 'suddenly' there came from heaven a sound like rushing wind (Acts 2:2). In prison at midnight, 'suddenly' there was a great earthquake freeing Paul and Silas (Acts 16:26). The Maltese people expected Paul to swell up or drop dead from a viper bite, but when he didn't after a long time, they changed their minds 'suddenly' (Acts 28:6). The word emphasizes the unexpected, immediate nature of divine or dramatic intervention.

(3×) Marks sudden, unexpected divine intervention or dramatic events. Acts 2:2 describes Pentecost: 'suddenly' (ἄφνω) came the sound of rushing wind from heaven. Acts 16:26 recounts the midnight earthquake: 'suddenly' (ἄφνω) foundations shook and doors opened. Acts 28:6 notes the Maltese waited for Paul to die from the viper, then 'suddenly' (ἄφνω) changed their opinion when nothing happened. The Spanish 'de-repente,' French 'soudainement,' capture the abrupt, unforeseen nature of these divine moments. SUDDEN UNEXPECTED

en: suddenly | es: de-repente | fr: soudainement | de: ἄφνω Acts 2:2; Acts 16:26; Acts 28:6

ἄφοβος G0870 Adv (4×)

fearlessly, without fear, boldly; acting with courage or, negatively, with reckless impudence

The adverb aphobos ('without fear') appears in both positive and negative lights across its four NT occurrences. Zechariah's prophecy celebrates serving God 'without fear' all one's days (Luke 1:74) — a blessed freedom from terror. Paul hopes Timothy will minister in Corinth 'without fear' (1 Cor 16:10), and the Philippian believers speak the word 'fearlessly' because of Paul's imprisonment (Phil 1:14). Jude 1:12, however, turns the word dark: false teachers feast 'without fear' at love-feasts, their shamelessness a mark of spiritual corruption rather than holy boldness. Spanish 'sin-temor' and French 'sans-crainte' uniformly render the adverb as 'without fear,' leaving context to determine whether this is courage or impudence.

(4×) Fearlessly, with bold confidence — serving or speaking without being paralyzed by fear. Zechariah's hymn envisions a life of worship 'without fear' of enemies (Luke 1:74); Paul desires that Timothy work among the Corinthians 'without fear' (1 Cor 16:10); and believers in Philippi proclaim the gospel 'fearlessly' (Phil 1:14). Spanish 'sin-temor' and German 'furchtlos' both convey holy boldness grounded in divine protection or calling. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: fearlessly, without-fear | es: sin-temor | fr: sans-crainte, sans-crainte, | de: furchtlos, ἀφόβως Luke 1:74; 1Cor 16:10; Phil 1:14; Jude 1:12

ἀφομοι-όω G0871 V-RPM/P-NMS (1×)

to make like, liken, compare; to render similar or assimilate

This verb means 'to make like' or 'assimilate,' describing the process of rendering one thing similar to another. In Hebrews 7:3, Melchizedek is described as 'made like the Son of God' (ἀφωμοιωμένος)—not that he is the Son, but that his scriptural portrayal (without genealogy, beginning, or end) prefigures Christ's eternal priesthood. The term emphasizes typological correspondence: Melchizedek's mysterious presentation in Genesis serves as a deliberate likeness to the timeless Son. Classical usage includes comparing or portraying in art. The author of Hebrews deploys it to underscore the divinely orchestrated resemblance between the ancient priest-king and Jesus.

(1×) The translations (English 'made like,' Spanish 'hecho semejante,' French/German 'vergleichen' for 'compare') reflect the idea of resemblance or comparison. Hebrews 7:3 uses ἀφομοιόω to say Melchizedek has been 'made like' (depicted as resembling) the Son of God—a typological foreshadowing where the silence of Scripture about Melchizedek's origins becomes theologically eloquent, pointing to Christ's eternal priesthood. LIKENESS AND COMPARISON en: having-been-made-like | es: hecho-semejante | fr: vergleichen | de: vergleichen Heb 7:3

ἀφορ-άω G0872 V-PPA-NMP (2×)
to look away from all else and fix one's gaze on, to look intently at, to have in view
This verb captures the focused act of looking away from distractions toward a single object or person. The classical range includes viewing distant objects, looking toward a goal, and fixing attention with purpose. In the New Testament it appears twice with profound theological significance: Paul speaks of 'looking away to' Timothy's situation (Phil 2:23), and Hebrews exhorts believers to look away from all else unto Jesus (Heb 12:2). The multilingual evidence splits between 'seeing' and 'looking intently', with Romance and Germanic languages emphasizing the directed, focused nature of the gaze.

(2×) Both biblical occurrences involve deliberate attention directed toward a specific focus. Philippians 2:23 uses the participle form in Paul's expectation of 'seeing' how things turn out, while Hebrews 12:2's famous exhortation to look 'unto Jesus' captures the word's essential meaning of fixing one's gaze by looking away from competing distractions. French 'regarder' and German 'hinschauen' ('look toward') reflect this intentional redirecting of vision that characterized Greek philosophical and athletic imagery. GAZING AND LOOKING en: I-see, looking-away | es: mirando-fijamente, vea | fr: regarder | de: hinschauen Phil 2:23; Heb 12:2

ἀφορ-ίζω G0873 V-ASA-3P (10×)
Set apart, separate; mark off by boundaries; consecrate for divine service; exclude, ostracize Built from apo ('away from') and horizo ('to define, set a boundary'), this verb carries the fundamental idea of drawing a line that divides. Jesus uses it for the eschatological separation of sheep from goats (Matt 25:32) and wheat from tares (Matt 13:49), while Paul claims it for his own apostolic calling: 'set apart for the gospel of God' (Rom 1:1; cf. Gal 1:15). Spanish 'apartar' and 'separar' faithfully preserve both the physical and theological dimensions. The darker side appears in Galatians 2:12, where Peter 'withdrew' from Gentile table fellowship, and in Luke 6:22, where Jesus warns that people will 'exclude' his followers. From sacred consecration to social ostracism, the word turns on who draws the boundary and why.

1. separate in eschatological judgment (4×) To separate or sort people into groups at the eschatological judgment, with angels or the Son of Man as agent. In Matthew 25:32 the shepherd-king separates the nations as a shepherd divides sheep from goats, and in Matthew 13:49 the angels separate the wicked from among the righteous at the close of the age. Acts 19:9 extends this to Paul separating the disciples from the synagogue. Spanish 'separar' and French 'separer' capture this decisive, irreversible sorting. The future tense in Matthew underscores finality: once the boundary is drawn, there is no crossing back. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING en: he-separated, he-will-separate, separates | es: separa, separará, separarán | fr: séparer | de: ἀφορίζει, ἀφορίσει, ἀφοριοῦσιν Matt 13:49; Matt 25:32; Acts 19:9

2. set apart for divine purpose (3×) To set apart or consecrate someone for a sacred calling or divine mission, with God as the ultimate agent of selection. The Holy Spirit commands, 'Set apart for me Barnabas and Saul' (Acts 13:2), Paul describes himself as 'set apart for the gospel' from birth (Rom 1:1; Gal 1:15, echoing Jeremiah 1:5). Spanish 'apartado' and German 'absondern' both convey the idea of being marked out from a larger group for a specific holy purpose. The passive voice in Romans and Galatians emphasizes divine initiative rather than human choice. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING en: having-been-set-apart, having-set-apart, set-apart | es: Apartad, apartado, habiendo-apartado | fr: séparer | de: absondern, Ἀφορίσατε Acts 13:2; Rom 1:1; Gal 1:15

3. separate socially or withdraw (2×) To separate oneself socially, to withdraw from association with a group. Paul quotes Isaiah, 'Come out from among them and be separate' (2 Cor 6:17), urging believers to maintain holiness by distancing themselves from unclean partnerships. In Galatians 2:12, Peter 'was separating himself' from Gentile believers when men from James arrived, a social withdrawal driven by fear. Spanish 'apartarse' and German 'absondern' in the reflexive capture this self-imposed distancing, whether motivated by holiness or by social pressure. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING en: be-separated, separating | es: apartaos, se-apartaba | fr: séparer | de: absondern 2Cor 6:17; Gal 2:12

4. exclude or ostracize (1×) To exclude or ostracize from a community, functioning as a form of social punishment or persecution. In Luke 6:22 Jesus pronounces a blessing on those whom others 'exclude' and revile and cast out on account of the Son of Man. Spanish 'apartar' and the German rendering highlight the communal dimension: being formally expelled from synagogue fellowship or social circles. This sense carries the strongest negative connotation of the word, transforming boundary-setting into an instrument of rejection. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING en: they-exclude | es: os-aparten | fr: séparer | de: ἀφορίσωσιν Luke 6:22

ἀφορμ-ή G0874 N-AFS (7×)
Occasion, opportunity, or base of operations; a starting point that enables or provokes action.
Denotes a starting point or foothold from which further action proceeds. In classical Greek it referred to a military base of operations, but in the New Testament it takes on a moral and relational sense: the foothold that sin exploits through the commandment (Rom 7:8, 11), or the occasion for boasting or criticism in community disputes (2 Cor 5:12; 11:12). Spanish 'ocasión,' French 'occasion,' and German 'Anlass' all preserve the notion of a precipitating opportunity rather than a mere moment in time. Paul's repeated use in Romans 7 vividly personifies sin as an adversary seizing a strategic position.

(7×) An occasion, opportunity, or foothold—a starting point that enables or provokes further action. In Rom 7:8 and 7:11, sin seizes the commandment as its operational base (much like the classical military sense of a staging ground). In 2 Cor 5:12 and 11:12, Paul speaks of giving or denying others an 'occasion' for boasting or slander. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'ocasión,' German 'Anlass,' French 'occasion') consistently point to a precipitating opportunity rather than a neutral time reference, confirming the active, causal nuance present in all seven occurrences. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14710 WITH 3 SENSES en: occasion, opportunity | es: ocasión | fr: Anlass, occasion | de: Anlass Rom 7:8; Rom 7:11; 2Cor 5:12; 2Cor 11:12

ἀφρ-ίζω G0875 V-PPA-NMS (2×)
to foam, to foam at the mouth, to produce foam or froth
This verb vividly describes the physical act of foaming, with classical usage ranging from wine cups to human and animal mouths. In the New Testament, both occurrences appear in Mark's account of the demon-possessed boy, creating a stark physical portrait of spiritual affliction. The boy foams at the mouth as part of the violent seizures caused by the unclean spirit. Spanish 'echa espumarajos' (literally 'throws out foam') captures the violent, involuntary nature of the foaming, while French 'écumer' and German 'schäumen' preserve the basic meaning across languages. This graphic detail emphasizes the severity of the demonic oppression and the completeness of Jesus's healing.

(2×) Both uses in Mark 9:18 and 9:20 describe the same possessed boy's symptom during demonic seizures. The present participle form emphasizes the ongoing, repeated nature of the foaming, which served as a visible sign of the spirit's power over the child. The multilingual glosses consistently maintain the visceral, physical nature of this foam production, showing how translators across cultures recognized this as a medical-spiritual manifestation requiring divine intervention. FLESH AND BODY en: foaming, he-foams | es: echa-espumarajos, echando-espumarajos | fr: écumer | de: schaeumen Mark 9:18; Mark 9:20

ἀφρός G0876 N-GMS (1×)

foam, froth, slaver; the foamy substance produced by agitation or disease

This noun denotes foam or froth, whether from sea waves, a river, or a diseased body. Luke uses it in his account of the demon-possessed boy (Luke 9:39) who is seized by a spirit that throws him into convulsions 'with foaming' (μετὰ ἀφροῦ). The term vividly captures the physical symptoms of violent spiritual oppression—the boy's mouth froths as the unclean spirit ravages him. Classical Greek uses ἀφρός for sea foam (famously, Aphrodite born from it) and the foaming mouths of rabid animals or epileptics. Luke's clinical description underscores the brutal reality of demonic affliction, which Jesus' word instantly dispels.

(1×) The evidence (English 'foaming,' Spanish 'espuma,' French 'écume') confirms the physical phenomenon of froth. Luke 9:39 uses ἀφροῦ to describe the boy's foaming at the mouth during demonic seizures—a graphic medical detail that heightens the pathos of the father's plea and the power of Jesus' exorcistic command. WATER

en: foaming | es: espuma | fr: écume | de: ἀφροῦ Luke 9:39

ἀφροσύνη G0877 N-NFS (4×)

foolishness, senselessness, lack of understanding; thoughtless behavior or speech contrary to wisdom

Derived from aphron ('without sense, foolish'), aphrosyne denotes a deficiency of understanding or prudent judgment. In Mark 7:22, Jesus lists it among the evils that proceed from the human heart — foolishness as a moral and spiritual failing, not merely an intellectual deficiency. Paul's usage in 2 Corinthians 11 is strikingly ironic: he repeatedly asks the Corinthians to bear with him in his 'foolishness' (11:1, 17, 21) as he launches into what scholars call the 'fool's speech,' boasting of his apostolic credentials. The word is thus colored by its opposite, sophia — it names what happens when wisdom is absent. French 'folie' and German 'Torheit' both carry this rich connotation of folly as wisdom's negation.

(4×) Foolishness, senselessness — a culpable lack of understanding or good judgment. Mark 7:22 places it in Jesus' vice list among evils that defile a person from within, pairing it with moral failings like wickedness and deceit. This is not mere ignorance but a willful absence of wisdom that leads to sinful behavior. Spanish 'insensatez' and German 'Torheit' both convey the gravity of this intellectual-moral deficiency. FOLLY AND FOOLISHNESS

en: foolishness, of-foolishness | es: de-insensatez, insensatez | fr: folie | de: Torheit Mark 7:22; 2Cor 11:1; 2Cor 11:17; 2Cor 11:21

ἄφρων G0878 Adj-NMP (11×)

Foolish, senseless — lacking moral and spiritual understanding; acting without regard for God or wisdom

The adjective ἄφρων (aphrōn) describes someone devoid of understanding — not intellectually deficient so much as morally and spiritually senseless. God addresses the rich man who stockpiles grain with the devastating verdict, 'Fool! This night your soul is required of you' (Luke 12:20). Jesus asks the Pharisees, 'Did not he who made the outside make the inside also?' (Luke 11:40), exposing their foolishness. Paul uses it with biting irony in 2 Corinthians 11:16-19 and 12:6, 11, where he adopts the persona of a 'fool' to shame his opponents. In 1 Corinthians 15:36 he chides doubters of the resurrection. Romans 2:20 ironically notes that the Jew sees himself as 'a corrector of the foolish.' Spanish 'insensato/necio' and French 'insensé' capture the moral-spiritual dimension.

foolish, senseless (11×) Foolish or senseless in a moral-spiritual sense — lacking the discernment that comes from fearing God. God's verdict on the rich fool who hoards possessions while neglecting his soul (Luke 12:20) is the paradigmatic use. Jesus applies it to Pharisees blind to inner purity (Luke 11:40). Paul employs it with rhetorical irony in his 'fool's speech' (2 Cor 11:16, 19; 12:6, 11), challenges resurrection skeptics (1 Cor 15:36), and notes the Jew's self-image as instructor of the foolish (Rom 2:20). Ephesians 5:17 warns against being foolish rather than understanding the Lord's will. Spanish 'insensato' and German 'töricht' both emphasize moral obtuseness over mere ignorance. FOOLISHNESS AND FOLLY

en: Fool, fool, foolish | es: Insensato, Insensatos, de-insensatos | fr: insensé | de: toericht, ἄφρονες, Ἄφρων Luke 11:40; Luke 12:20; Rom 2:20; 1Cor 15:36; 2Cor 11:16

ἀφυπν-όω G0879 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to fall asleep, doze off; to drift into sleep, especially unwittingly

This verb means 'to fall asleep,' particularly in the sense of dozing off unintentionally. Luke uses it in the account of Jesus calming the storm: 'as they sailed, He fell asleep' (ἀφύπνωσεν, Luke 8:23). The term emphasizes the naturalness of Jesus' sleep—exhausted from ministry, He drifts off in the boat, fully human in His need for rest. Classical usage includes both falling asleep and waking from sleep, but the New Testament sense is clearly 'dozed off.' The detail is theologically rich: Jesus sleeps through the storm, at peace even as the disciples panic, manifesting both His humanity and His sovereign calm.

(1×) The translations (English 'fell asleep,' Spanish 'se durmió,' French 's'endormir') uniformly indicate the act of falling asleep. Luke 8:23 uses ἀφυπνόω to depict Jesus' human weariness and restful trust —He falls asleep in the boat, oblivious to the wind and waves that terrorize His disciples, embodying the peace He will soon command the storm to adopt. SLEEP AND SLUMBER

en: he-fell-asleep | es: se-durmió | fr: s'endormir | de: ἀφύπνωσεν Luke 8:23

ἄφων-ος G0880 Adj-ANP (4×)

voiceless, mute, silent; unable to speak or producing no intelligible sound

Composed of the privative alpha and phone ('voice, sound'), aphonos describes what lacks voice or the power of speech. The NT deploys it across a striking range of subjects. Acts 8:32 quotes Isaiah 53:7, likening Christ to a lamb 'silent' before its shearer. Paul uses it of the dumb idols the Corinthians once worshipped (1 Cor 12:2) and of musical instruments that give no distinct sound (1 Cor 14:10 — though here the sense is debated). Second Peter 2:16 provides the most vivid occurrence: Balaam's donkey, 'a voiceless beast of burden,' rebukes the prophet with a human voice. Spanish 'mudo/muda' and French 'muet' consistently render the privative sense of being without speech.

(4×) Mute, voiceless, unable to speak — lacking the faculty or power of speech. Acts 8:32 applies the adjective to the Suffering Servant who does not open his mouth, and 2 Peter 2:16 describes Balaam's donkey as a 'voiceless' animal that miraculously spoke. First Corinthians 12:2 characterizes pagan idols as 'mute' — incapable of speaking because they are not alive. Spanish 'mudo/muda,' French 'muet,' and German renderings all confirm a core sense of speechlessness, whether of animals, idols, or the willingly silent. DEAF AND MUTE

en: mute, voiceless, without-sound | es: muda, mudo, mudos | fr: muet, ἄφωνον | de: ἄφωνα, ἄφωνον, ἄφωνος Acts 8:32; 1Cor 12:2; 1Cor 14:10; 2Pet 2:16

Ἄχαζ G0881 N-NMS (2×)

Ahaz, king of Judah, son of Jotham, father of Hezekiah

This proper name, transliterated from Hebrew אָחָז ('he has grasped'), identifies the twelfth king of Judah who reigned during the late eighth century BC. Ahaz is remembered in Scripture primarily for his idolatry and his appeal to Assyria for military aid rather than trusting in the Lord. In Matthew's genealogy of Jesus, Ahaz appears twice in verse 1:9, following the pattern where the genealogy mentions both 'Jotham begat Ahaz' and 'Ahaz begat Hezekiah.' The name appears identical across English, Spanish, French, and German translations, reflecting standard transliteration practices for biblical proper names.

(2×) Both occurrences in Matthew 1:9 serve the genealogical function of connecting Jotham to Hezekiah through Ahaz. Despite Ahaz's notorious unfaithfulness recorded in 2 Kings 16 and 2 Chronicles 28, Matthew includes him in the Messianic line, demonstrating that God's purposes transcend human failure. The multilingual evidence shows minimal variation (Spanish 'Ácház', French 'Achaz', German 'Ahas'), with most languages preserving the guttural opening and two-syllable structure of the Hebrew original. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Achaz | es: Ácház | fr: Achaz | de: Ahas Matt 1:9

Ἀχαία G0882 N-DFS (10×)

Achaia, the Roman senatorial province comprising southern Greece with its capital at Corinth

The proper name of the Roman province that encompassed southern Greece, including the Peloponnese and the region around Athens. Its capital was Corinth, where Paul appeared before the proconsul Gallio (Acts 18:12, 27; 19:21). In Paul's letters, Achaia designates the broader community of believers in southern Greece, often paired with Macedonia to represent the entire Greek church (Rom 15:26; 1 Cor 16:15; 2 Cor 1:1; 9:2; 11:10; 1 Thess 1:7-8).

Achaia (10×) The proper geographical name of the Roman senatorial province comprising southern Greece, with Corinth as its administrative capital. Mentioned in connection with Paul's appearance before Gallio (Acts 18:12), the household of Stephanas as Achaia's firstfruits (1 Cor 16:15), and the collection for Jerusalem organized alongside Macedonia (Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 9:2). Consistently paired with Macedonia to represent the full scope of Paul's Greek mission field. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Achaia, of-Achaia | es: Acaya, Achaía, Achaía | fr: Achaia, Achaïe | de: Achaia, Achaja Acts 18:12; Acts 18:27; Acts 19:21; Rom 15:26; 1Cor 16:15

Ἀχαϊκός G0883 N-GMS (1×)

Achaicus, a personal name; a man from Achaia or bearing an Achaian connection

This proper noun designates Achaicus, a Christian mentioned by Paul in 1 Corinthians 16:17 alongside Stephanas and Fortunatus. These three men came from Corinth to visit Paul, supplying what was lacking and refreshing his spirit. The name likely indicates either origin from Achaia (the Roman province including Corinth) or servile status (slaves were often named after their place of origin). Paul's gratitude for Achaicus and his companions underscores the importance of face-to-face fellowship and the encouragement of loyal co-laborers who bridge distances to strengthen apostolic bonds.

(1×) The multilingual evidence simply transliterates the name (Achaikos, Achaïcus, Achaikus), confirming it as a personal identifier. At 1 Corinthians 16:17, Achaicus is one of the Corinthian delegates who refreshed Paul's spirit by their presence—a living reminder of the church's affection and a source of apostolic joy in the midst of missionary hardship. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Achaikos | es: de-Achaïkós | fr: Achaïcus | de: Achaikus 1Cor 16:17

ἀχάριστ-ος G0884 Adj-NMP (2×)

ungrateful, thankless, unthankful, without gratitude or appreciation

This adjective describes persons who lack gratitude or fail to show thanks. Classical Greek used it for ungracious, unpleasant people or unrewarding tasks, but in the New Testament it focuses specifically on the moral failure of ingratitude. Jesus uses it to describe how God shows kindness even to the 'ungrateful and evil' (Luke 6:35), while Paul lists it among the vices characterizing people in the last days (2 Tim 3:2). The word combines the negative prefix with 'charis' (grace/favor), suggesting someone immune to grace or unwilling to acknowledge gifts received. All languages render this straightforwardly as 'ungrateful', showing universal recognition of this vice.

(2×) Luke 6:35 uses the plural form to describe a class of people who receive divine kindness despite their unthankfulness, while 2 Timothy 3:2 includes it in a vice list characterizing the difficult last days. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'ingratos', French 'ingrat', German preserving the Greek forms) confirms this as a recognized moral category across cultures. Both contexts treat ingratitude as a serious character defect that, remarkably, does not prevent God's benevolence in the first case but marks dangerous moral decline in the second. THANKSGIVING AND GRATITUDE

en: ungrateful | es: ingratos | fr: ingrat | de: ἀχάριστοι, ἀχαρίστους Luke 6:35; 2Tim 3:2

Ἀχείμ G0885 N-AMS (2×)

Achim, an ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy

This proper name appears only in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus, identifying a post-exilic ancestor in the line from Zerubbabel to Jesus. Unlike many genealogical names drawn from the Old Testament, Achim does not appear in the Hebrew Scriptures, making him known to us only through Matthew's account. The name may derive from a shortened form of Jehoiachin or Joachim, though its exact etymology remains uncertain. Both occurrences in Matthew 1:14 follow the genealogical pattern: 'Azor begat Achim, and Achim begat Eliud.' The name maintains nearly identical spelling across languages (Spanish Achím, French/German Achim), reflecting standard transliteration of this otherwise unknown figure.

(2×) Matthew 1:14 contains both mentions, linking Achim between Azor and Eliud in the final segment of Jesus's genealogy. Despite our lack of historical information about this individual, his inclusion demonstrates Matthew's careful preservation of the Davidic line through the silent centuries between the Old and New Testaments. The consistent cross-linguistic rendering shows translators treating this as a proper name requiring minimal adaptation, preserving its connection to the Hebrew naming tradition even when the specific meaning remains obscure. HEALING ACTIVITY

en: Achim | es: Achím | fr: Achim | de: Achim Matt 1:14

ἀχειρο-ποίητος G0886 Adj-AFS (3×)

not made by hands, not of human construction; spiritually or divinely made

This compound adjective describes what is not made by human hands. At Jesus's trial, false witnesses claimed he said he would destroy the temple 'made with hands' and build another 'not made with hands' in three days (Mark 14:58). Paul contrasts earthly tents with the building from God, eternal in the heavens, 'not made by hands' (2 Cor 5:1). Colossians 2:11 speaks of circumcision 'not made by hands'—the spiritual putting off of flesh in Christ. The term distinguishes human craftsmanship from divine or spiritual reality.

(3×) Contrasts human construction with divine or spiritual reality. Mark 14:58 records (false) testimony about Jesus destroying the 'made-with-hands' temple and building a 'not-made-with-hands' (ἀχειροποίητον) one—spiritual vs. physical. Second Corinthians 5:1 contrasts earthly tent with heavenly 'not-made-by-hands' (ἀχειροποίητον) dwelling from God. Colossians 2:11 describes 'not-made-by-hands' (ἀχειροποιήτῳ) circumcision—spiritual cutting away in Christ. The transparent compound (ἀ-χειρο-ποίητος: not-hand-made) emphasizes divine versus human origin. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: not-hand-made, not-made-by-hands, not-made-with-hands | es: no-hecha-con-manos, no-hecho-a-mano | fr: fait-à-la-main, non-fait-de-main | de: nicht-mit-Haenden-gemacht Mark 14:58; 2Cor 5:1; Col 2:11

ἀχλύς G0887 N-NFP (2×)

mist, thick mist, obscuring fog, darkness over the eyes

This noun describes mist or fog, with classical Greek using it especially for the mist that covers dying eyes or blinds someone through divine action. Homer uses it for the darkness falling over eyes in death or when a god removes someone's ability to see. In the New Testament's two occurrences, it carries this sense of blinding mist:

the magician Elymas is struck with 'mist and darkness' falling on his eyes (Acts 13:11), and false teachers are compared to 'mists driven by a storm' (2 Pet 2:17). The word appears in plural form in both passages, emphasizing either multiple episodes or the complete obscuring quality of the darkness.

(2×) Acts 13:11 describes the immediate judicial blindness that fell on Elymas as 'mist and darkness', using the literal physical phenomenon to represent spiritual judgment. 2 Peter 2:17 employs it metaphorically, comparing false teachers to waterless springs and 'mists driven by a storm'—impressive-looking but ultimately empty and unstable. Spanish 'niebla/nieblas', French 'brouillard', and German forms all preserve this image of obscuring fog. Both contexts connect the mist to judgment and unreliability, whether physical blindness or spiritual deception. DARKNESS AND GLOOM

en: mist, mists | es: niebla, nieblas | fr: brouillard, ὁμίχλαι | de: ἀχλὺς, ὁμίχλαι Acts 13:11; 2Pet 2:17

ἀχρεῖος G0888 Adj-AMS (2×)

useless, unprofitable, worthless, unfit for service, good for nothing

This adjective denotes something or someone useless or unprofitable, unable to fulfill their intended purpose. Classical Greek applied it to anything from unfit warriors to unproductive tasks, with the core idea of failing to provide benefit or service. In the New Testament, Jesus uses it in the parable of the talents for the 'unprofitable servant' who buried his master's money (Matt 25:30), while Luke records Jesus teaching that even faithful servants should consider themselves 'unprofitable' after doing their duty (Luke 17:10). The word combines the negative prefix with a root related to use or service, creating the sense of 'not fit for use.'

(2×) Matthew 25:30 applies this to the condemned servant whose failure to invest his master's resources rendered him 'unprofitable' and worthy of punishment. Luke 17:10 uses it in a strikingly different way: even obedient servants should call themselves 'unprofitable' because they've only done what was required. Spanish 'inútil/inútiles' and French 'inutile' capture the practical uselessness, while the German preserves Greek forms. The two contexts show the word's range: actual worthlessness deserving judgment versus humble recognition that perfect obedience creates no debt from God to servant. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 13406 WITH 4 SENSES

en: unworthy, useless | es: inútil, inútiles | fr: inutile | de: ἀχρεῖοί, ἀχρεῖον Matt 25:30; Luke 17:10

ἀχρει-όω G0889 V-AIP-3P (1×)

to make useless, render worthless; to corrupt or cause to become unprofitable

This verb means 'to render useless' or 'make worthless,' describing the process by which something becomes unprofitable or corrupted. Paul uses it in Romans 3:12, quoting Psalm 14: 'All have turned away, they have together become worthless' (ἠχρειώθησαν). The term captures humanity's universal moral failure—we have not merely made mistakes but have become fundamentally useless for the purpose God intended. Classical usage includes damaging or disabling. Paul's indictment is total: apart from grace, every person is ἠχρειωμένος, rendered worthless by sin's corrosive power.

(1×) The translations (English 'became worthless,' Spanish 'se hicieron inútiles,' French 'rendre inutile,' German 'unnütz werden') all emphasize the outcome of becoming useless. Romans 3:12 uses ἀχρειόω in the passive to describe humanity's collective moral bankruptcy: 'they became worthless'—a devastating summary of the human condition before God's justifying grace. WORTHLESSNESS AND VANITY

en: they-became-worthless | es: se-hicieron-inútiles | fr: rendre-inutile | de: unnuetz-werden Rom 3:12

ἄχρησ-τος G0890 Adj-AMS (1×)

useless, unprofitable, worthless; providing no benefit or utility

This adjective means 'useless' or 'unprofitable,' describing what yields no benefit. Paul employs it with a twist in his letter to Philemon regarding the runaway slave Onesimus: 'Formerly he was useless (ἄχρηστος) to you, but now he is useful (εὔχρηστος) to both you and me' (Phlm 11). Paul puns on the name Onesimus ('useful') to underscore the transformation grace has wrought: what was worthless has become valuable through conversion. Classical usage ranges from 'ineffective' to 'unkind.' Paul's wordplay captures the gospel's power to redeem and repurpose, turning the useless into the indispensable.

(1×) The evidence (English 'useless,' Spanish 'inútil,' German 'unnütz') confirms the sense of unprofitability. Philemon 11 uses ἄχρηστος in a before-and-after contrast: Onesimus was once ἄχρηστος (useless) to Philemon, but in Christ he has become εὔχρηστος (useful)—a transformed man whose new identity eclipses his former worthlessness. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 13406 WITH 4 SENSES

en: useless | es: inútil | fr: ἄχρηστον | de: unnuetz Phlm 1:11

ἄχρι G0891 Conj (49×)

until, as far as — a temporal and spatial conjunction or preposition marking the endpoint of an action or extent

Achri (also achris) functions as preposition and conjunction, marking the terminal boundary of a period or extent. Its 49 occurrences divide between temporal and spatial uses. Temporally, it governs phrases like 'until the day' (Luke 1:20; Acts 1:2) and Pauline salvation-historical markers: 'until the fullness of the Gentiles' (Rom 11:25). In Revelation it punctuates apocalyptic thresholds (Rev 20:3, 5). Spatially it means 'as far as' (Acts 13:6). Spanish 'hasta,' French 'jusqu'a,' and German 'bis' all capture its limitative endpoint sense.

until (49×) A preposition (with genitive) and conjunction marking the temporal endpoint ('until') or spatial extent ('as far as') of an action, state, or condition. In temporal use, it governs key salvation-historical boundaries: the silence of Zechariah 'until' the birth of John (Luke 1:20), the ascension timeline 'until the day he was taken up' (Acts 1:2), and Pauline eschatological markers like 'until the fullness of the Gentiles' (Rom 11:25). In Revelation, it punctuates apocalyptic transitions (Rev 2:26; 20:3). The spatial sense ('as far as') appears occasionally in Acts (Acts 11:5; 13:6). Distinguished from heos (more common in the Gospels) mainly by stylistic preference, with achri favored in Acts, Paul, and Revelation. All 49 occurrences share this single limitative-boundary function. UNTIL (TEMPORAL LIMIT)

en: as-far-as, in, until | es: en, hasta | fr: jusqu'à, jusqu'à- | de: bis Matt 24:38; Mark 16:20; Luke 1:20; Luke 4:13; Luke 17:27

ἄχυρον G0892 N-ANS (2×)

chaff, husks, straw left after threshing, the worthless part separated from grain

This noun refers to the dry, lightweight chaff separated from grain during the threshing and winnowing process. In agricultural practice, after grain was beaten to separate kernels from stalks, the mixture was tossed into the air so wind could blow away the useless chaff while heavier grain fell back to the threshing floor. Both New Testament occurrences appear in John the Baptist's preaching, where he uses this vivid agricultural image to describe divine judgment. The Messiah will thoroughly winnow his threshing floor, gathering wheat into the barn but burning the chaff 'with unquenchable fire' (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17). This image of permanent separation and destruction would have been immediately clear to an agricultural audience.

(2×) Matthew 3:12 and Luke 3:17 preserve John the Baptist's identical warning about the coming one who will separate wheat from chaff. Spanish 'paja', French 'paille', and German 'Ächuron' all reference this agricultural waste product. The chaff represents those who prove worthless under divine scrutiny—not temporarily set aside but permanently destroyed. The image's power lies in its inevitability: just as no farmer preserves chaff, so judgment will finally and completely remove what is worthless, a sobering reality in John's call to repentance. STUBBLE AND CHAFF

en: chaff | es: paja | fr: paille | de: ἄχυρον Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17

ἀψευδ-ής G0893 Adj-NMS (1×)

truthful, not lying, without deceit; incapable of falsehood

This adjective means 'truthful' or 'incapable of lying,' often applied to deities or oracles in classical Greek. Paul uses it of God in Titus 1:2: 'God, who does not lie (ἀψευδής), promised eternal life before the ages began.' The term underscores divine reliability—God's word is utterly trustworthy because His nature precludes deception. Classical usage frequently describes oracles and seers as ἀψευδής, but Paul applies it exclusively to Yahweh, whose promises are guaranteed by His unchanging character. In a world of false claims and broken promises, the ἀψευδής God is the anchor of Christian hope.

(1×) The translations (English 'unlying,' Spanish 'no mentiroso,' German 'wahrhaftig') emphasize truthfulness and absence of deceit. Titus 1:2 attributes ἀψευδής to God—He is incapable of lying, and therefore His promise of eternal life is absolutely certain. This divine attribute grounds Paul's apostolic confidence and the believer's eschatological hope. TRUTH AND FAITHFULNESS en: unlying | es: no-mentiroso | fr: ἀψευδὴς | de: wahrhaftig Titus 1:2

ἀψίνθ-ιον G0894 N-AFS (2×)

wormwood, a bitter herb, Artemisia absinthium, used as symbol of bitterness and calamity

This noun names the wormwood plant (Artemisia absinthium), known throughout the ancient world for its intensely bitter taste. The Old Testament frequently uses wormwood as a symbol of bitter judgment, and this imagery continues in Revelation. Both New Testament occurrences appear in Revelation 8:11, where a great star named 'Wormwood' falls from heaven and makes a third of the waters bitter, causing many deaths. The personification of bitterness as a cosmic judgment agent shows how deeply this plant's bitter character impressed itself on the biblical imagination. Notably, the name appears both as a proper name for the star and as a description of the waters' bitter quality.

(2×) Revelation 8:11 twice mentions wormwood: first as the name of the falling star ('the name of the star is called Wormwood') and then describing the bitter waters ('a third of the waters became wormwood'). Spanish 'Ajenjo/ajenjo' (capitalized for the proper name), French and German 'Wermut' all preserve this dual function. The repetition emphasizes how the star's very nature is bitterness itself, transforming fresh water into poison. This apocalyptic image draws on centuries of biblical association between wormwood and divine judgment, where God's justice tastes as bitter as this proverbial herb. SPICE AROMATIC PERFUME

en: Wormwood, wormwood | es: Ajenjo, ajenjo | fr: Wermut | de: Wermut Rev 8:11

ἄψῡχ-ος G0895 Adj-NNP (1×)

lifeless, inanimate, without soul; lacking life or animation

This adjective means 'lifeless' or 'inanimate,' describing objects without a soul or vital principle. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 14:7 to contrast musical instruments ('lifeless things,' ἄψυχα) with human speech: even flutes and harps must produce distinct notes to communicate melody, so how much more must tongues-speakers articulate intelligibly! The term emphasizes the paradox that even non-living instruments follow communicative principles—they must be 'interpreted' to be understood. Classical usage includes non-animal food and spiritless persons. Paul's argument is a fortiori: if ἄψυχα instruments require clarity, how much more must Spirit-filled speakers pursue intelligibility in worship.

(1×) The evidence (English 'lifeless things,' Spanish 'sin vida,' French 'sans vie,' German 'leblos') uniformly denotes inanimate objects. 1 Corinthians 14:7 uses ἄψυχα of musical instruments that, despite being lifeless, still convey meaning through distinct sounds—an analogy Paul deploys to urge the Corinthians to prioritize intelligibility over ecstatic utterance in corporate worship. DEATH AND DYING

en: lifeless-things | es: sin-vida | fr: sans-vie | de: leblos 1Cor 14:7

Βάαλ G0896 N-GMS (1×)

Baal, the Canaanite deity; the storm and fertility god opposed by Israel's prophets

This proper noun designates Baal, the Canaanite storm and fertility deity whose worship repeatedly seduced Israel into idolatry. Paul alludes to the Elijah narrative in Romans 11:4, quoting God's assurance to the prophet: 'I have kept for myself seven thousand men who have not bowed the knee to Baal.' The name evokes Israel's chronic apostasy and Yahweh's preservation of a faithful remnant. In classical Hebrew, 'Baal' means 'lord' or 'master,' but it became synonymous with false worship. Paul uses the Baal story to illustrate God's ongoing election of a remnant within Israel—a pattern that continues in the gospel age.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Baal, Baál) across languages, confirming it as the well-known Canaanite deity. Romans 11:4 invokes Baal to recall Elijah's despair and God's reassurance of a hidden remnant—a typological precedent for Paul's argument that God has not rejected Israel but continues to preserve a believing minority by grace. BAAL WORSHIP

en: Baal | es: Baál | fr: Baal | de: Baal Rom 11:4

Βαβυλών G0897 N-DFS (12×)

Babylon — the ancient Mesopotamian city and empire; used historically for the exile and symbolically for Rome in Revelation.

The Greek form of Hebrew Babel, referring to the great Mesopotamian city on the Euphrates. In Matthew's genealogy it marks the defining trauma of Israel's history: 'the deportation to Babylon' appears as a structural hinge (Matt 1:11-12, 17). Stephen recalls it as the place of Israel's idolatrous exile (Acts 7:43). In Revelation, Babylon becomes a symbolic cipher — most likely for Rome — announced as fallen with dramatic repetition (Rev 14:8; 18:2), judged with consuming fire (Rev 16:19; 18:10, 21), and branded 'Babylon the Great, mother of prostitutes' (Rev 17:5). First Peter 5:13 sends greetings from 'she who is in Babylon,' probably also a cryptic reference to Rome. French 'Babylone' and Spanish 'Babilonia' reflect the name's universal recognition.

Babylon (city/empire) (12×) The city and empire of Babylon on the Euphrates, used both as a historical reference and a prophetic-symbolic designation. Historically it marks the exile in Matthew's genealogy (Matt 1:11-12, 17) and Stephen's speech (Acts 7:43). Symbolically — almost certainly for Rome — it dominates Revelation as the great harlot city destined for divine judgment (Rev 14:8; 16:19; 17:5; 18:2, 10, 21). First Peter 5:13 likely uses 'Babylon' as a coded name for Rome. Spanish 'Babilonia,' French 'Babylone,' and German 'Babylon' all transliterate the same iconic name, underscoring its cross-cultural recognition as a byword for imperial arrogance and exile. BABYLON CITY EMPIRE

en: BABULŌN, Babulōn, Babylon | es: BABYLŌN, Babilonia, Babylōn | fr: Babylone | de: Babylon Matt 1:11; Matt 1:12; Matt 1:17; Acts 7:43

βαθμ-ός G0898 N-AMS (1×)

step, degree, standing; a position or rank attained, often metaphorically

This noun originally means 'step' or 'rung of a ladder,' but it extends metaphorically to 'degree' or 'rank.' Paul uses it in 1 Timothy 3:13 to say that deacons who serve well 'gain a good standing (βαθμὸν καλόν) for themselves.' The term suggests upward mobility or advancement—faithful service earns a higher degree of honor or confidence. Classical usage includes steps, musical intervals, and degrees of rank. Paul's point is that diaconal ministry is not a dead-end role but a proving ground where faithfulness yields respect and perhaps positions one for further leadership.

(1×) The translations (English 'standing,' Spanish 'posición,' German 'Stufe') reflect the metaphorical sense of rank or position. 1 Timothy 3:13 uses βαθμός to promise that deacons who serve well acquire a good 'standing'—an earned reputation or degree of influence that honors their proven character and opens doors for

continued ministry impact. STAIRWAY STEPS
en: standing | es: posición | fr: βαθμὸν | de: Stufe 1Tim 3:13

βάθος G0899 N-NNS (8×)
Depth or deep place, whether physical (sea, earth) or metaphorical (of divine wisdom, riches, or spiritual reality).
The noun βάθος covers both literal and figurative depth. In the parables of the sower, seed falls on rocky ground with no 'depth' of earth (Matt 13:5; Mark 4:5). Jesus instructs Simon to put out into the 'deep' for a catch (Luke 5:4). But Paul elevates the word to theological heights: neither height nor 'depth' can separate us from God's love (Rom 8:39), and he exclaims over the 'depth' of the riches of God's wisdom (Rom 11:33). Revelation speaks of the 'deep things' of Satan (Rev 2:24). Spanish 'profundidad' and French 'profondeur' span both physical and metaphorical registers naturally.

depth, deep place (8×) Depth or deep place, used of physical depth (shallow soil in Matt 13:5, Mark 4:5; the deep water in Luke 5:4) and metaphorical depth (the unfathomable riches of God's wisdom in Rom 11:33; the cosmic dimension that cannot separate from divine love in Rom 8:39). In Ephesians 3:18, Paul prays that believers may grasp the breadth, length, height, and 'depth' of Christ's love. Spanish 'profundidad/profundo' and German 'Tiefe' both naturally encompass the physical-to-theological range of this word. ABYSS AND DEEP en: deep, depth, depths | es: profundidad, profundidades, profundo | fr: profondeur | de: Tiefe, βάθος Matt 13:5; Mark 4:5; Luke 5:4; Rom 8:39; Rom 11:33

βᾰθύνω G0900 V-AIA-3S (1×)
to dig deep, deepen, make deep; to excavate or hollow out
This verb means 'to dig deep' or 'deepen,' describing the action of excavating to create depth. Jesus uses it in His parable of the two builders (Luke 6:48): the wise builder 'dug deep' (ἐβάθυνεν) and laid a foundation on rock, so when the flood came, the house stood firm. The term emphasizes the labor and foresight required to build on a solid base—it's not enough to build on the surface; one must dig down to bedrock. Classical usage includes deepening battle formations and hollowing out channels. Jesus' metaphor is transparent: hearing and obeying His words requires deep, costly commitment, not superficial assent.

(1×) The evidence (English 'went deep,' Spanish 'profundizó,' French 'creuser profond') uniformly points to the action of digging deeply. Luke 6:48 uses ἐβάθυνεν to describe the wise builder's excavation work—he dug down through soil to reach rock, ensuring his foundation could withstand the storm. The verb captures the intentionality and effort required to obey Jesus' teaching thoroughly. DEEP AND PROFOUND en: went-deep | es: profundizó | fr: creuser-profond | de: ἐβάθυνεν Luke 6:48

βᾰθύς G0901 Adj-GMS (4×)
deep, profound; physically deep or occurring early at dawn ('deep morning'), and figuratively of hidden mysteries
The adjective bathys spans physical depth, temporal earliness, and figurative profundity across its four NT occurrences. John 4:11 is literal: the Samaritan woman tells Jesus 'the well is deep.' Luke 24:1 uses the distinctive phrase 'deep dawn' (orthrou batheos) for the earliest hours of Easter morning. Acts 20:9 describes Eutychus sinking into 'deep sleep' during Paul's lengthy sermon. Revelation 2:24 speaks of 'the deep things of Satan' — a phrase Jesus uses ironically against the claims of false teachers in Thyatira. Spanish 'profundo/profunda,' French 'profond,' and German 'tief' all render the basic spatial sense, while the figurative extensions emerge from context.

(4×) Physically deep — extending far downward from the surface. The Samaritan woman observes that Jacob's well is 'deep' (John 4:11), explaining why Jesus would need a bucket to draw water. This is the most concrete and foundational sense, reflected uniformly across languages: Spanish 'profundo,' French 'profond,' German 'tief.' The spatial reality of depth becomes the basis for all metaphorical extensions. DEEP AND PROFOUND en: deep, deep-things | es: profunda, profundidades, profundo | fr: profond | de: tief, βαθέως, βαθεῖ Luke 24:1; John 4:11; Acts 20:9; Rev 2:24

βάϊον G0902 N-ANP (1×)
palm branch, frond; the leafy branch of a palm tree, often used festively
This noun denotes palm branches or fronds, the leafy boughs of palm trees. John describes the crowds welcoming Jesus into Jerusalem (John 12:13): they took 'palm branches' (βάϊα) and went out to meet Him, shouting 'Hosanna!' The gesture recalls the Feast of Tabernacles, when Israelites waved palm fronds in celebration, and evokes messianic expectation. Classical usage includes both palm branches and measuring rods. John's scene is loaded with irony: the crowd acclaims Jesus as king with symbols of victory and festival, unaware that His kingship will be realized not through military triumph but through crucifixion.

(1×) The translations (English 'branches,' Spanish 'ramas,' French 'palme,' German 'Palmzweige') confirm the identification as palm fronds. John 12:13 uses βάϊα to describe the branches the crowd waved during Jesus' triumphal entry—a festive, nationalistic gesture that anticipated a conquering Messiah, even as Jesus rode toward the cross. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: branches | es: ramas | fr: palme | de: Palmzweige John 12:13

Βαλαάμ G0903 N-GMS (3×)
Balaam, the prophet who was hired to curse Israel but blessed them instead
This proper noun refers to Balaam, the non-Israelite prophet from Numbers 22-24 who was hired to curse Israel but blessed them instead. Peter uses him as an example of one who loved the wages of unrighteousness (2 Pet 2:15). Jude references those who rushed into 'Balaam's error' for profit (Jude 11). Revelation speaks of those holding 'the teaching of Balaam,' who taught Balak to put stumbling blocks before Israel (Rev 2:14). Balaam becomes a type of the false teacher motivated by greed who leads God's people into sin.

(3×) The prophet Balaam serves as a negative example across NT texts. Second Peter 2:15 cites 'Balaam' (Βαλαάμ) son of Beor who loved unrighteous wages. Jude 11 condemns those rushing into 'Balaam's' (Βαλαάμ) error for profit. Revelation 2:14 warns against 'Balaam's' (Βαλαάμ) teaching that led Israel into idolatry and immorality. The consistent transliteration across languages (Balaam, Balaám, Bileam) preserves the Hebrew name, while the contexts transform the OT narrative into a type for greed-driven false teaching. BALAAM PROPHET NAME
en: Balaam, of-Balaam | es: Balaam, Balaám, de-Balaam | fr: Balaam, Bileam | de: Bileam 2Pet 2:15; Jude 1:11; Rev 2:14

Βαλάκ G0904 N-DMS (1×)
Balak, the Moabite king; the ruler who hired Balaam to curse Israel
This proper noun designates Balak, the Moabite king who hired the prophet Balaam to curse Israel during their wilderness journey (Numbers 22-24). In Revelation 2:14, Jesus rebukes the church at Pergamum for tolerating those who follow 'the teaching of Balaam, who taught Balak to put a stumbling block before the sons of Israel.' The reference recalls Balaam's strategy of enticing Israel into idolatry and immorality when curses failed. Balak embodies the hostile Gentile ruler who seeks Israel's destruction through spiritual seduction rather than military force. Jesus' allusion warns that the ancient compromises are recycled in new forms within the church.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Balak, Balac) across languages, confirming its identity as the Moabite king. Revelation 2:14 invokes Balak to recall the Numbers narrative: he couldn't curse Israel directly, so he used Balaam to induce them to curse themselves through sin—a cautionary tale of compromise that

Jesus applies to the Pergamene church's toleration of false teaching. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Balak | es: Balac | fr: Balak | de: Balak Rev 2:14

βαλλάντιον G0905 N-GNS (4×)

A money-bag or purse used for carrying coins

In the ancient Mediterranean world, the ballántion was a leather pouch or purse used to carry money. Jesus twice references this item in Luke's Gospel — first forbidding the seventy disciples from carrying one on mission (Luke 10:4), then reversing that instruction at the Last Supper (Luke 22:36). In Luke 12:33, he urges selling possessions to obtain 'purses that do not wear out,' a striking metaphor for heavenly treasure. Spanish 'bolsa' and French 'bourse' both capture this everyday financial accessory.

(4×) A leather pouch or bag for carrying money, used in everyday commerce. All four NT occurrences appear in Luke's writings, where Jesus employs it as both a literal travel item (Luke 10:4; 22:35-36) and a metaphor for imperishable heavenly investment (Luke 12:33). The multilingual glosses — Spanish 'bolsa,' French 'bourse' — consistently point to a money-purse rather than a general bag. BAG PURSE

en: a-moneybag, a-purse, moneybags | es: bolsa, bolsas | fr: bourse | de: βαλλάντια, βαλλάντιον, βαλλαντίου Luke 10:4; Luke 12:33; Luke 22:35; Luke 22:36

βάλλω G0906 V-APP-DFS (124×)

To throw, cast, hurl; to put or place into; passive: to be thrown, cast out; also to lie prostrate, pour out, or strike upon

A remarkably versatile verb of propulsion and placement that pervades the Gospels and Revelation. At its most forceful it describes violent casting—into fire, into the sea, into Gehenna—carrying the weight of divine judgment throughout Revelation's apocalyptic imagery. Yet the same word quietly serves for placing money in the treasury (Mark 12:41-44) or putting wine into wineskins (Matt 9:17). Spanish distinguishes arrojar (hurl) from echar (put/cast), while Arabic uses both ´ (throw forcefully) and ´ (place), revealing the semantic stretch that a single Greek verb covers. The passive forms are especially prominent in judgment contexts, where 'being cast into' outer darkness or the lake of fire becomes a recurring image of eschatological doom.

1. throw, cast, hurl (57×) Active throwing, casting, or hurling with physical force. The broadest and most frequent sense, covering stones cast, nets thrown into the sea (Matt 4:18), pearls thrown before swine (Matt 7:6), and the dramatic 'cast yourself down' of the temptation narrative (Matt 4:6). Spanish arrojó/echó, Arabic ´, and Swahili kutupa all capture the forceful propulsion. Jesus' saying 'I did not come to bring peace but a sword' (Matt 10:34) uses this verb metaphorically for casting conflict into the world. THROWING AND CASTING

en: cast, it-has-thrown, put | es: arrojó, echaron, echó | fr: jeter | de: werfen, wirft Matt 4:6; Matt 5:29; Matt 5:30; Matt 7:6; Matt 10:34

2. be thrown, be cast (32×) Passive voice: to be thrown, cast, or hurled, typically into a place of destruction or confinement. Dominates judgment language—every tree not bearing fruit 'is thrown into the fire' (Matt 3:10), the worthless servant 'is cast into outer darkness' (Matt 25:30), and the beast 'was thrown into the lake of fire' (Rev 19:20). Spanish es echado/fue arrojado, Arabic ´, and Korean 던져지다 all preserve the passive voice. The theological weight of this sense is enormous in eschatological contexts. THROWING AND CASTING

en: be-thrown, he-was-cast, he-was-thrown | es: es-echado, es–echado, fue-arrojado | fr: jeter | de: werfen, wirft Matt 3:10; Matt 5:13; Matt 5:25; Matt 5:29; Matt 6:30

3. put, place, deposit (27×) To put, place, or deposit without violent force—a gentler semantic register. The widow puts her coins into the treasury (Mark 12:41-44), new wine is put into fresh wineskins (Matt 9:17), and money is deposited with bankers (Matt 25:27). Spanish meter/depositar and Arabic ´ (place) distinguish this from forceful throwing. James 3:3 uses it for putting a bit in a horse's mouth. The same verb covers both hurling into Gehenna and quietly dropping coins—a striking polysemy. THROWING AND CASTING

en: casting, do-they-put, he-put | es: Mete, depositar, echa | fr: jeter | de: werfen, wirft Matt 4:18; Matt 9:17; Matt 25:27; Matt 27:6

4. lie sick, be laid down (5×) Perfect or pluperfect passive describing a resultant state of lying down, typically of someone sick or bedridden. The centurion's servant 'lies' paralyzed at home (Matt 8:6), Peter's mother-in-law 'was lying' with a fever (Matt 8:14), and Lazarus 'was laid' at the rich man's gate (Luke 16:20). Spanish echado/estaba echado and Arabic وُضِعَ (thrown down, prostrate) confirm the stative-resultative reading. This sense represents the endpoint of the throwing action—once cast down, one lies there. THROWING AND CASTING

en: has-been-laid, having-been-laid, laid | es: echada, echado, estaba-echado | fr: jeter | de: werfen, wirft Matt 8:6; Matt 8:14; Matt 9:2; Mark 7:30; Luke 16:20

5. pour, pour out (2×) To pour a liquid substance onto or into something. Mary pours ointment on Jesus' body for burial (Matt 26:12), and Jesus pours water into a basin to wash feet (John 13:5). Spanish echar (in its liquid-pouring register) and Arabic ´ (pour) both accommodate this specialized use. Though only two occurrences, it represents a genuine semantic extension from solid projectiles to liquid streams, unified by the directionality of transfer. THROWING AND CASTING

en: having-put, he-puts | es: echa, habiendo-echado | fr: jeter | de: werfen, wirft Matt 26:12; John 13:5

6. strike, beat upon (1×) Of natural forces striking or beating against something. A single occurrence in Acts 27:14 where a violent wind (Εὐρακύλων) 'struck down against' the ship. Spanish se lanzó (launched itself) and Arabic ٱ (raged/struck) capture the meteorological violence. This peripheral sense preserves the oldest Greek usage of βάλλω as impersonal force striking a target, attested in Homer but nearly extinct in NT Koine. THROWING AND CASTING

en: struck-down | es: se-lanzó | fr: jeter | de: wirft Acts 27:14

βαπτ-ίζω G0907 V-PPA-NMP (81×)

To baptize or be baptized; to immerse in water as a rite of repentance, identification, or purification.

The verb that gives Christianity one of its defining sacraments, deriving from bapto ('to dip'). In the New Testament it spans three distinct uses: receiving baptism as a convert or penitent (Matt 3:6, 13-16; Acts 2:41), administering baptism as John or the apostles did (Matt 3:11; 28:19; Mark 1:4), and the broader Hellenistic sense of ritual washing unconnected to Christian initiation (Mark 7:4; Luke 11:38). The multilingual evidence is striking: Spanish 'bautizar,' French 'baptiser,' and German 'taufen' all derive from or calque the Greek root, testifying to how thoroughly this word shaped Western religious vocabulary.

1. be baptized, receive baptism (49×) To be baptized or receive baptism—the passive/middle voice usage covering 49 occurrences. Denotes undergoing the rite of water immersion as a sign of repentance (Matt 3:6; Mark 1:5), identification with Christ's death and resurrection (Rom 6:3-4), or entry into the believing community (Acts 2:41; 8:12-13). Spanish 'ser bautizados,' French 'baptiser' (passive), and German 'getauft werden' all mark the recipient perspective. The phrase 'baptized into Christ' (Gal 3:27) shows how the passive form carries rich theological freight. BAPTISM RITE

en: being-baptized, she-was-baptized, they-were-being-baptized | es: a-ser-bautizadas, a-ser-bautizados, eran-bautizados | fr: baptiser | de: taufen, tauft Matt 3:6; Matt 3:13; Matt 3:14; Matt 3:16; Matt 20:22

2. baptize, administer baptism (30×) To baptize or administer baptism—the active voice usage across 30 occurrences, where the subject performs the rite upon another. John declares 'I baptize you with water' (Matt 3:11; Mark 1:8); Jesus commands the disciples to 'baptize in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit' (Matt 28:19). Spanish 'bauticé' (I baptized), English 'baptize/baptized,' and German 'taufen' (active) all reflect the agent's role. This sense distinguishes the baptizer's authority and commission from the recipient's experience. BAPTISM RITE

en: I-baptized, baptize, baptized | es: Bauticé, bauticé, bautizando | fr: baptiser | de: taufen, tauft Matt 3:11; Matt 28:19; Mark 1:4; Mark 1:8

3. wash, immerse ritually (2×) To wash or immerse in a ritual purification context outside of Christian or Johannine baptism, attested only twice. At Mark 7:4, Pharisees 'wash' (baptize) cups, pitchers, and kettles; at Luke 11:38, a Pharisee is astonished that Jesus did not first 'wash' before dinner. English 'washed,' Spanish 'se lavó/se sumerjan' (washed/immerse themselves) reveal that translators shift away from 'baptize' to 'wash' when the specifically sacramental context is absent, exposing the word's older, broader Hellenistic meaning of ceremonial immersion. BAPTISM RITE
en: he-washed, they-wash | es: se-lavó, se-sumerjan | fr: baptiser | de: taufen, tauft Mark 7:4; Luke 11:38

βάπτ-ισμα G0908 N-ANS (21×)

Baptism; the rite of water immersion signifying repentance or union with Christ's death and resurrection.
The Greek noun for the distinctively Christian and Johannine rite of water immersion. It appears in two broad contexts: John's baptism of repentance (Matt 3:7; Mark 1:4; Luke 7:29) and the baptism Jesus speaks of metaphorically as his coming suffering (Matt 20:22-23; Mark 10:38-39; Luke 12:50). The apostolic letters then develop baptism as union with Christ's death and resurrection (Rom 6:4; Col 2:12). Every target language borrows or adapts the Greek root – 'bautismo' (spa), 'baptême' (fra), 'Taufe' (deu) – testifying to the word's cross-cultural centrality in Christian practice.

(21×) The rite or act of baptism – immersion in water as a religious ceremony. In the Gospels it denotes both John's preparatory baptism of repentance (Matt 3:7; Mark 1:4; Acts 1:22) and the metaphorical 'baptism' of suffering that Jesus anticipated (Matt 20:22-23; Mark 10:38-39). In the Epistles it signifies the believer's identification with Christ's death, burial, and resurrection (Rom 6:4; Eph 4:5; Col 2:12; 1 Pet 3:21). Cross-lingual uniformity – 'baptism' (eng), 'bautismo' (spa), 'baptême' (fra), 'Taufe' (deu) – reflects the universality of the rite across Christian traditions. BAPTISM RITE
en: a-baptism, a-baptism-, baptism | es: bautismo, un-bautismo | fr: baptême | de: Taufe Matt 3:7; Matt 20:22; Matt 20:23; Matt 21:25; Mark 1:4

βαπτ-ισμός G0909 N-AMP (5×)

Washing, immersion, baptism; a ceremonial or ritual cleansing by water, ranging from Jewish purification rites to Christian baptism.
Refers to the act of dipping or washing in water, encompassing both Jewish ceremonial washings and distinctly Christian baptism. In Mark 7:4, 8 it describes the Pharisees' traditional purification rituals —washing of cups, pots, and vessels—while Heb 9:10 similarly references Old Covenant 'washings.' Colossians 2:12 and Heb 6:2 apply the term to Christian baptism as a foundational doctrine. Spanish distinguishes 'inmersiones' (immersions) from 'bautismo' (baptism), revealing the semantic stretch from general ritual washing to the specific Christian sacrament. German 'Waschungen' (washings) likewise emphasizes the purificatory dimension.

(5×) A washing, immersion, or baptism—covering both Jewish ceremonial purification rites and Christian sacramental baptism. Mark 7:4, 8 and Heb 9:10 use the term for the Pharisaic and Levitical tradition of ritual washings (of hands, vessels, and bodies), while Col 2:12 and Heb 6:2 apply it to Christian baptism as a foundational element of the faith. The Spanish split between 'inmersiones' and 'bautismo' and the German 'Waschungen' illuminate the word's dual register: it can denote any ritual water-cleansing, yet in Christian theological context it becomes a technical term for the initiatory rite of baptism. BAPTISM RITE
en: baptism, of-baptisms, washings | es: bautismo, de-bautismos, inmersiones | fr: ablution | de: Waschungen Mark 7:4; Mark 7:8; Col 2:12; Heb 6:2; Heb 9:10

βαπτ-ιστής G0910 N-NMS (12×)

Baptist, Baptizer — title applied exclusively to John son of Zechariah, the forerunner who baptized in the Jordan
The Greek baptistēs, derived from baptizō (to immerse, baptize), functions as a title rather than a generic noun in the New Testament, attached exclusively to John son of Zechariah. All twelve occurrences identify 'John the Baptist' — the prophetic voice who prepared Israel for the Messiah through a baptism of repentance. Jesus himself declared that among those born of women none was greater than John the Baptist (Matt 11:11; Luke 7:28). The title distinguishes this John from other figures of the same name, particularly the apostle. Spanish 'Bautista,' French 'Baptiste,' and German 'Täufer' all function as recognizable proper epithets.

Baptist (12×) A substantival title meaning 'the one who baptizes,' used exclusively as an epithet for John son of Zechariah. Appears in narrative introductions (Matt 3:1; Mark 6:25; Luke 7:20), in Jesus' testimony about John's greatness (Matt 11:11-12; Luke 7:28), and in Herod's fearful identification of the man he beheaded (Matt 14:2, 8; Mark 6:24-25). The articular form ho baptistēs functions as a quasi-surname, distinguishing this John from all others. Spanish 'el Bautista' and German 'der Täufer' replicate this titular force. BAPTISM RITE
en: Baptist, Baptizer, baptizer | es: Baptistén, Baptistés, Baptístes | fr: Baptiste | de: Taeufer, Täufer Matt 3:1; Matt 11:11; Matt 11:12; Matt 14:2; Matt 14:8

βάπτω G0911 V-ASA-3S (4×)

To dip or immerse something into a liquid; to dye by dipping
The verb báptō denotes the physical act of dipping or plunging something into liquid — distinct from baptízō, which acquired the specialized ritual sense. In John 13:26, Jesus dips a morsel into the dish at the Last Supper, identifying his betrayer. The rich man in Hades begs Lazarus to dip a fingertip in water (Luke 16:24). In Revelation 19:13, Christ's robe is described as 'dipped in blood.' Spanish 'mojado' (wetted) and 'teñido' (dyed) capture both the wetting and staining dimensions of this word.

(4×) To dip, plunge, or immerse an object into a liquid, whether for wetting, dyeing, or symbolic purposes. The NT uses span from the mundane (dipping bread, Luke 16:24; John 13:26) to the apocalyptic (a garment dipped in blood, Rev 19:13). Spanish distinguishes 'mojado' (wetted) from 'teñido' (dyed), reflecting the classical Greek range where báptō covered both tempering metal and coloring fabric. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15037 WITH 3 SENSES
en: having-been-dipped, having-dipped, he-dips | es: habiendo-mojado, moje, teñido | fr: tremper | de: eintauchen, βάψῃ Luke 16:24; John 13:26; Rev 19:13

Βαραββᾶς G0912 N-NMS (11×)

Barabbas — the insurrectionist prisoner whom the crowd chose to release instead of Jesus at the Passover Βαραββᾶς (Barabbas), from Aramaic bar-Abba ('son of the father'), is the prisoner released by Pilate in place of Jesus at the Passover custom of freeing one prisoner. Mark and Luke identify him as one who had committed murder during an insurrection (Mark 15:7; Luke 23:19, 25); Matthew calls him a 'notable prisoner' (Matt 27:16); John simply terms him a 'robber' (John 18:40). The narrative irony is profound: the crowd demands freedom for a man of violence while condemning the innocent Son of the Father. Some early manuscripts of Matthew 27:16-17 give his full name as 'Jesus Barabbas,' heightening the dramatic contrast. Spanish 'Barrabás' and French 'Barabbas' both transliterate the Aramaic patronymic.

(11×) Barabbas, the prisoner held by Rome for insurrection and murder, whom Pilate offered as an alternative to Jesus in the Passover amnesty (Matt 27:16-26; Mark 15:7-15; Luke 23:18-25; John 18:40). The crowd's choice to release Barabbas and crucify Jesus forms a pivotal moment in all four Passion narratives. His Aramaic name, bar-Abba ('son of the father'), creates a striking ironic parallel with Jesus, the true Son of the Father. Some manuscripts preserve the variant 'Jesus Barabbas' (Matt 27:16-17). Spanish 'Barrabás' and German 'Barabbas' transliterate directly. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Barabbas | es: Barabbân, Barabbâs | fr: Barabbas | de: Barabbas, Βαραββᾶν Matt 27:16; Matt 27:17; Matt 27:20; Matt 27:21; Matt 27:26

Βαράκ G0913 N-GMS (1×)

Barak, the Israelite judge; the military leader who defeated Sisera under Deborah's guidance

This proper noun designates Barak, the Israelite military commander who, at the prophetess Deborah's urging, led the army against the Canaanite general Sisera (Judges 4-5). In Hebrews 11:32, the author lists Barak among the heroes of faith who 'through faith conquered kingdoms, enforced justice, obtained promises.' Barak's inclusion is somewhat surprising given his initial reluctance to go without Deborah, yet he obeyed and achieved victory. The catalogue in Hebrews celebrates not moral perfection but faithful action—Barak trusted God's word through Deborah and fought accordingly. His name evokes the era of the judges, when faith and obedience brought deliverance.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Barak) uniformly, identifying him as the Judges-era leader. Hebrews 11:32 includes Barak in the honor roll of faith, reminding readers that even hesitant obedience—he agreed to fight only if Deborah accompanied him—counts as faith when it yields to God's command and trusts His promise of victory. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Barak | es: Barák | fr: Barak | de: Barak Heb 11:32

Βαραχίας G0914 N-GMS (1×)

Barachiah, a personal name; father of the prophet Zechariah

This proper noun designates Barachiah (Hebrew: 'Yahweh has blessed'), identified in Matthew 23:35 as the father of Zechariah, whom Jesus says was murdered 'between the sanctuary and the altar.' The reference is debated: it may allude to Zechariah son of Jehoiada (2 Chronicles 24), martyred in the temple court, or to the canonical prophet Zechariah son of Berechiah. Either way, Jesus invokes the murder of a righteous prophet to indict the scribes and Pharisees for continuing their ancestors' pattern of violence against God's messengers. Barachiah's mention anchors the martyrdom in Israel's historical memory.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Barachias, Barachie) across languages, confirming it as a patronymic. Matthew 23:35 uses Βαραχίου to identify Zechariah's father, situating the prophet's murder within the genealogical and historical record that Jesus cites to hold His contemporaries accountable for a legacy of rejecting and killing those sent by God. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: of-Barachias | es: de-Barachías | fr: Barachie | de: Βαραχίου Matt 23:35

βάρβαρος G0915 Adj-NMS (6×)

A foreigner, non-Greek speaker; anyone outside Greco-Roman linguistic and cultural identity.

Barbaros originally imitated the sound of incomprehensible speech – 'bar-bar' – and designated anyone who did not speak Greek. In the NT, the word appears without the pejorative modern sense of 'barbaric.' The Maltese natives are called barbaroi simply because they spoke neither Greek nor Latin (Acts 28:2, 4), and Paul pairs 'Greeks and barbarians' as a comprehensive merism for all humanity (Rom 1:14). In 1 Cor 14:11, Paul uses it pointedly: if you cannot understand the language being spoken, speaker and hearer are 'foreigners' to each other. The word thus illuminates the early church's multilingual, cross-cultural reality.

foreigner, non-Greek speaker (6×) A person who does not speak Greek – a foreigner or cultural outsider from the Greco-Roman perspective. The term carried no inherent moral judgment in antiquity; it was primarily a linguistic classification. In Acts 28:2 and 28:4, the Maltese are 'barbaroi' because they spoke a Punic dialect, yet Luke praises their 'unusual kindness.' Paul's merism 'Greeks and barbarians, wise and foolish' (Rom 1:14) uses the pair as shorthand for all humanity. In 1 Cor 14:11, 'barbarian' describes the mutual incomprehension between speakers of different tongues. Spanish 'nativos/barbaro,' English 'foreigner/barbarian/natives' reflect the range between neutral and culturally marked renderings. FOREIGNERS AND STRANGERS

en: a-foreigner, barbarian, natives | es: a-bárbaros, bárbaro, nativos | fr: Barbaren, barbare | de: Barbaren, βάρβαροι Acts 28:2; Acts 28:4; Rom 1:14; 1Cor 14:11

βαρέω G0916 V-PMM/P-3S (6×)

To weigh down, burden, or oppress; used in the passive for being heavy with sleep, grief, or hardship.

Bareo means to make heavy or weigh down, and in the NT it appears almost exclusively in the passive – describing the experience of being burdened or oppressed. The disciples' eyes 'were heavy' with sleep in Gethsemane (Matt 26:43; Luke 9:32), Jesus warns against hearts 'weighed down' with dissipation (Luke 21:34), and Paul describes being 'utterly burdened beyond strength' in Asia (2 Cor 1:8) and groaning under the weight of mortality (2 Cor 5:4). The word captures a felt heaviness – physical, emotional, or spiritual – pressing down on the whole person. Spanish 'cargados' (loaded) and French 'accabler' (to overwhelm) convey the oppressive quality well.

weigh down, burden (6×) To weigh down, burden, or press heavily upon – nearly always passive in the NT, describing the experience of being oppressed by sleep (Matt 26:43; Luke 9:32), dissipation (Luke 21:34), suffering (2 Cor 1:8), or mortality itself (2 Cor 5:4). The verb conveys not just weight but the felt sense of being overwhelmed or pressed beyond capacity. Spanish 'cargados' (loaded, burdened) and French 'accabler/alourdir' (overwhelm/make heavy) capture both the physical and metaphorical dimensions. Paul's use in 2 Cor 1:8 ('excessively burdened beyond our strength') pushes the metaphor to its limit, describing near-despair under affliction. HONOR AND WEIGHT

en: be-weighed-down, being-burdened, heavy | es: cargados, fuimos-cargados, sea-cargada | fr: accabler, alourdir | de: beschweren, βαρηθῶσιν, βεβαρημένοι Matt 26:43; Luke 9:32; Luke 21:34; 2Cor 1:8; 2Cor 5:4

βαρέω G0917 Adv (2×)

heavily, with difficulty, dully, in a sluggish or hardened manner

This adverb describes a heavy, difficult, or sluggish manner of action, derived from the verb meaning to weigh down or burden. In both New Testament occurrences, it modifies hearing: people hear 'heavily' or 'with dull ears,' unable to truly understand because their sensory and mental faculties have become sluggish. Matthew 13:15 and Acts 28:27 both quote Isaiah 6:9-10, where God describes a people whose ears have become dull and heavy. This isn't physical deafness but a willful, hardened inability to truly hear and respond to God's word. The word suggests weight, burden, and the difficulty of perception when hearts resist truth.

(2×) Both passages quote the same prophetic text about hardened hearts: 'their ears are dull of hearing' (literally 'they hear heavily'). Matthew records Jesus applying Isaiah's words to explain why he speaks in parables, while Acts shows Paul citing the same passage when some Jews reject the gospel. Spanish 'pesadamente' (heavily), French 'lourdement', and German 'βαρέως' capture this sense of weighted, burdened hearing. The adverb indicates not natural limitation but culpable resistance—ears that could hear but have become heavy, dull, and resistant to the truth they don't want to receive. DISTRESS AND HARDSHIP

en: heavily | es: pesadamente | fr: lourdement, βαρέως | de: βαρέως Matt 13:15; Acts 28:27

Βαρθολομαῖος G0918 N-NMS (4×)

Bartholomew, one of the twelve apostles; Aramaic 'son of Tolmai'

Bartholomew is one of the twelve apostles, named in all four canonical lists of the Twelve (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). The name is Aramaic — bar-Talmay, meaning 'son of Tolmai' — a patronymic rather than a personal name, which has led many scholars since the ninth century to identify him with Nathanael of John's Gospel. French renders the name 'Barthélemy,' while Spanish and German preserve forms closer to the Greek Bartholomaîos.

(4×) A proper name designating one of Jesus' twelve apostles, derived from Aramaic bar-Talmay ('son of Tolmai'). He appears exclusively in the apostle catalogues (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13), always paired near Philip, strengthening the traditional identification with Nathanael. The consistent transliteration across languages — French 'Barthélemy,' German 'Bartholomäus' — reflects the name's passage through Greek from its Semitic origin. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Bartholomaios | es: Bartholomaios, Bartholomaîon, Bartholomaîos | fr: Bartholomé, Barthélemy | de: Bartholomaeus, Bartholomäus Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13

Βαρι-ησοῦς G0919 N-GMS (1×)

Bar-Jesus, a personal name; the Jewish sorcerer also called Elymas

This proper noun designates Bar-Jesus (Aramaic: 'son of Joshua'), the Jewish false prophet and sorcerer whom Paul encountered on Cyprus (Acts 13:6-12). Also called Elymas, he opposed Paul and Barnabas, trying to turn the proconsul away from the faith. Paul, filled with the Spirit, struck him with temporary blindness—a sign-judgment that led to the proconsul's conversion. The name 'son of Jesus/Joshua' is deeply ironic: this 'son of the Savior' is actually a child of the devil (Acts 13:10), a faker who perverts the gospel. Luke's account underscores the spiritual battle between true and false prophets.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Bar-Iesous, Bar-Jésus) across languages, identifying him as the Cypriot magician. Acts 13:6 introduces Βαριησοῦ as a Jewish false prophet whose opposition to Paul triggers a dramatic confrontation—his blindness becomes an acted parable of his spiritual condition and a catalyst for the Roman official's faith. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Bar-Iesous | es: Bariësoû | fr: Bar-Jésus | de: Βαριησοῦ Acts 13:6

Βαριωνᾶς G0920 N-VMS (1×)

Bar-Jonah, a personal name; patronymic surname of Simon Peter, son of Jonah

This proper noun designates Bar-Jonah (Aramaic: 'son of Jonah'), the patronymic surname of Simon Peter. Jesus addresses him with this name in Matthew 16:17: 'Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jonah, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father in heaven.' The moment follows Peter's confession that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of the living God. By invoking Peter's full Aramaic name, Jesus personalizes the blessing and underscores the divine origin of Peter's insight—it was not human reasoning but heavenly revelation. Bar-Jonah roots Peter in his Jewish identity even as he receives a new identity as 'Rock.'

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Bar-Iōna, Bar-Jonas) across languages, confirming it as Peter's patronymic. Matthew 16:17 uses Βαριωνᾶ to address Peter at the climactic moment of his confession—the Aramaic name emphasizes both Peter's human lineage and the supernatural source of his revelation, bridging his earthly identity and his heaven-bestowed calling. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Bar-Iōna | es: Bar-Iōnâ | fr: Bar-Jonas | de: Βαριωνᾶ Matt 16:17

Βαρναβᾶς G0921 N-NMS (28×)

Barnabas — Joseph the Levite from Cyprus, surnamed 'son of encouragement,' Paul's early missionary partner

Barnabas is the Aramaic surname (bar-nebu'ah, interpreted in Acts 4:36 as 'son of encouragement' or 'son of prophecy') given to Joseph, a Levite from Cyprus who became one of the most consequential figures in the early church's expansion. His 28 occurrences trace a compelling arc: he first appears selling a field and laying the proceeds at the apostles' feet (Acts 4:36-37), then vouching for the newly converted Saul when the Jerusalem church still feared him (Acts 9:27). Sent to investigate the Gentile revival at Antioch, he sought out Saul in Tarsus and brought him into the work there (Acts 11:22-26). Together they undertook the first missionary journey through Cyprus and southern Galatia (Acts 13-14), defended Gentile freedom at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:2-12), and then parted ways in a sharp disagreement over John Mark (Acts 15:36-39). Paul later mentions him in his letters as a recognized apostle (1 Cor 9:6) and a figure of stature at Antioch (Gal 2:1, 9, 13). Colossians 4:10 reveals Mark was Barnabas' cousin.

Barnabas (proper name) (28×) The personal name of Joseph the Levite from Cyprus, called Barnabas ('son of encouragement') by the apostles. A pivotal figure in early church expansion: he modeled radical generosity (Acts 4:36-37), championed the converted Saul before a skeptical Jerusalem church (Acts 9:27), shepherded the Gentile congregation at Antioch (Acts 11:22-26), and co-led the first missionary journey (Acts 13-14). His sharp dispute with Paul over John Mark (Acts 15:36-39) and Paul's later respectful references (1 Cor 9:6; Gal 2:1, 9) round out the portrait. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Barnabas, of-Barnabas | es: Barnabâ, Barnabân, Barnabâs | fr: Barnabas | de: Barnabas Acts 4:36; Acts 9:27; Acts 11:22; Acts 11:30; Acts 12:25

βάρος G0922 N-ANP (6×)

A burden, weight, or load; used literally of heavy labor and figuratively of moral gravity, authority, or spiritual obligation.

Baros denotes weight or heaviness in both physical and figurative senses. Jesus uses it of the 'burden and heat of the day' borne by laborers in the vineyard (Matt 20:12), while the Jerusalem council resolves to lay no greater 'burden' than necessary on Gentile believers (Acts 15:28). Paul contrasts the 'light momentary affliction' with an 'eternal weight of glory' (2 Cor 4:17) – a remarkable metaphorical inversion where baros becomes something desirable. He also exhorts mutual burden-bearing (Gal 6:2) and alludes to the apostolic right to claim 'weight' or authority (1 Thess 2:6). Spanish distinguishes helpfully between 'carga' (burden) and 'peso' (weight), mirroring the word's dual register.

burden, weight (6×) A burden, weight, or load – whether physical toil, moral obligation, or metaphorical heaviness. The word ranges across several registers in the NT: the oppressive weight of daily labor (Matt 20:12), the burden of religious requirements (Acts 15:28), the 'eternal weight of glory' that paradoxically outweighs affliction (2 Cor 4:17), mutual burden-bearing in community (Gal 6:2), and apostolic authority or 'weight' (1 Thess 2:6). Spanish translations capture this range: 'carga' for burdens, 'peso' for weight. French similarly distinguishes 'fardeau' (burden) from 'poids' (weight). The figurative extension from physical heaviness to moral significance is well attested in classical Greek and fully active in NT usage. BURDENS AND LOADS

en: burden, burdens, weight | es: carga, cargas, peso | fr: fardeau, poids | de: Last, βάρος Matt 20:12; Acts 15:28; 2Cor 4:17; Gal 6:2; 1Thess 2:6

Βαρσαββᾶς G0923 N-AMS (2×)

Barsabbas, surname meaning 'son of Sabba', borne by two different men in Acts

This surname, derived from Aramaic meaning 'son of Sabba' or 'son of the Sabbath,' identifies two different men in the book of Acts. First, Joseph called Barsabbas (also surnamed Justus) was one of two candidates to replace Judas among the twelve apostles, though the lot fell to Matthias (Acts 1:23). Second, Judas called Barsabbas was a leader among the Jerusalem believers, chosen with Silas to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch with the apostolic decree (Acts 15:22). The shared surname suggests a common family name or possibly indicating birth on the Sabbath, though the two men appear to be unrelated individuals.

(2×) Acts 1:23 introduces Joseph Barsabbas, a faithful disciple who had accompanied Jesus throughout his ministry and was qualified to become an apostle. Acts 15:22 presents Judas Barsabbas, described as a 'leading man among the brothers' entrusted with delivering the crucial Jerusalem council decision. The Spanish forms (Barsabbán, Barsabbâs), French 'Barsabbas', and German 'Βαρσαββᾶν' preserve the Aramaic transliteration with minor variation. Both men bearing this name held positions of trust and leadership, suggesting the surname carried positive associations in the early church community. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Barsabbas | es: Barsabbân, Barsabbâs | fr: Barsabbas | de: Βαρσαββᾶν Acts 1:23; Acts 15:22

Βαρτίμαιος G0924 N-NMS (1×)

Bartimaeus, a personal name; the blind beggar healed by Jesus near Jericho

This proper noun designates Bartimaeus (Aramaic: possibly 'son of Timaeus' or 'son of the unclean'), the blind beggar whom Jesus healed as He left Jericho (Mark 10:46-52). Mark uniquely provides the man's name and patronymic, suggesting he became known in the early Christian community. Bartimaeus's persistent cries—'Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me!'—overcome the crowd's attempts to silence him, and Jesus commends his faith: 'Go; your faith has made you well.' The healed man immediately follows Jesus on the road—a picture of discipleship born from divine mercy and personal persistence.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Bartimaios, Bartimée, Bartimaeos) across languages, identifying him as the Markan blind beggar. Mark 10:46 introduces Βαρτιμαῖος with unusual specificity (including his father's name), perhaps because he became a recognizable disciple in the Jerusalem church—his healing and subsequent following of Jesus model the journey from spiritual blindness to sight and discipleship. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Bartimaios | es: Bartimaîos | fr: Bartimée | de: Bartimaeos Mark 10:46

βαρύν-ω G0925

weigh down, burden, oppress; make heavy or weary

A verb built on the adjective 'heavy' (βαρύς), describing the action of weighing something down or making it heavy. Physical applications include garments weighing someone down or limbs becoming heavy with weariness. The passive voice frequently appears: to be weighed down, to be heavy in limb, to have one's hand disabled. Extended meanings include being oppressed by thirst or surfeit, or being burdened in various ways. A specialized medical use describes being pregnant. The word captures both literal physical weight and metaphorical burdens that oppress or tire.

βᾰρύς G0926 Adj-NFP (6×)

Heavy, burdensome, weighty; describing physical weight, oppressive demands, moral gravity, or fierce severity.

Barys, the adjective behind the noun baros, spans a wide semantic arc from literal heaviness to figurative severity. Jesus denounces the Pharisees for loading 'heavy' burdens on others (Matt 23:4) and for neglecting the 'weightier' matters of the law – justice, mercy, and faithfulness (Matt 23:23). Paul speaks of the 'weighty' impression of his letters versus his weak bodily presence (2 Cor 10:10). Luke describes the 'fierce' wolves that will ravage the flock (Acts 20:29) and the 'serious' charges brought against Paul (Acts 25:7). The word's range – from physical heaviness to moral gravity to threatening ferocity – is remarkably consistent across languages: Arabic thaqil, German schwer, Spanish pesadas/graves all carry similar dual registers.

heavy, burdensome, weighty (6×) Heavy, burdensome, weighty, or severe – covering physical weight, oppressive demands, moral importance, and fierce intensity. Jesus uses it of the 'heavy' burdens imposed by Pharisees (Matt 23:4) and of the 'weightier' matters of the Torah (Matt 23:23), where the literal sense of heaviness becomes a metaphor for moral priority. Paul applies it to the perceived 'weightiness' of his letters (2 Cor 10:10). In Acts 20:29, 'fierce' (bareis) wolves extend the sense to threatening severity, while Acts 25:7 uses it of 'serious' legal charges. Spanish renders this range as 'pesadas' (heavy), 'graves' (serious), and 'feroces' (fierce); German 'schwer' captures both physical and moral weight. The breadth of translation evidence confirms a single polysemous adjective rather than distinct senses. HONOR AND WEIGHT

en: burdensome, fierce, heavy | es: feroces, graves, más-pesadas | fr: lourd | de: schwer, βαρέα, βαρεῖς Matt 23:4; Matt 23:23; Acts 20:29; Acts 25:7; 2Cor 10:10

βᾰρῠ-τῑμος G0927 Adj-GNS (1×)

very costly, extremely expensive; of great value or price

This adjective means 'very costly' or 'extremely expensive,' describing something of exceptional value. Matthew uses it to describe the alabaster flask of 'very expensive ointment' (μύρου βαρυτίμου) that a woman poured on Jesus' head at Bethany (Matt 26:7). The disciples objected to the 'waste,' calculating the ointment's market value, but Jesus defended her act as a beautiful preparation for His burial. The term underscores the extravagance of her devotion—she gave what was most precious, and Jesus honored her gift as prophetic worship. Classical usage includes 'punishing severely,' but the New Testament sense is monetary and metaphorical value.

(1×) The translations (English 'very expensive,' Spanish 'muy costoso,' French 'très précieux') emphasize high cost and value. Matthew 26:7 uses βαρυτίμου to describe the ointment's extraordinary worth—its expense measures the woman's devotion and sets up Jesus' rebuke of the disciples' utilitarian calculation, affirming that love's extravagance surpasses economic logic. BELOVED AND PRECIOUS

en: very-expensive | es: muy-costoso | fr: très-précieux | de: βαρυτίμου Matt 26:7

βᾰσᾰν-ίζω G0928 V-FIP-3P (12×)

To torment, torture, cause severe suffering; to be battered or tossed by waves

The verb basanizo originally meant 'to test on a touchstone' for proving gold, but by New Testament times it had narrowed almost entirely to the infliction or experience of severe suffering. Demons beg Jesus not to torment them before the appointed time (Matt 8:29; Mark 5:7; Luke 8:28), the rich man is tormented in Hades (Luke 16:23-24), and Revelation's visions describe eschatological torment with fire and sulfur (Rev 9:5; 14:10; 20:10). One striking outlier preserves an older physical sense: the disciples' boat being 'battered' by waves on the Sea of Galilee (Matt 14:24), where nature rather than supernatural agency is the tormenting force.

1. torment, torture, cause agony (11×) To torment, torture, or cause intense suffering — whether physical, spiritual, or eschatological. This is the dominant sense across eleven of twelve occurrences. It covers demonic encounters where evil spirits fear premature judgment (Matt 8:29; Mark 5:7; Luke 8:28), the paralytic 'grievously tormented' by illness (Matt 8:6), Lot's righteous soul tormented by Sodom's lawlessness (2 Pet 2:8), and the apocalyptic torments of Revelation where the smoke of suffering rises forever (Rev 14:10-11; 20:10). Spanish consistently renders 'atormentar,' French 'tourmenter,' and German 'quaelen,' all pointing to deliberate, intense affliction. The verb's progression from testing metal to testing persons to outright torture reflects a semantic narrowing well attested in Hellenistic Greek. TORMENT AND TORTURE

en: being-tormented, he-will-be-tormented, straining | es: atormentaba, atormentados, atormentar | fr: tourmenter | de: quaelen, βασανίσαι, βασανίσῃς Matt 8:6; Matt 8:29; Mark 5:7; Mark 6:48; Luke 8:28

2. batter, toss about by waves (1×) To batter, toss about, or harass by natural forces — specifically of a boat being pummeled by wind and waves. The sole occurrence at Matthew 14:24 describes the disciples' vessel 'being tossed' (basanizomenon) by waves, the wind being contrary. Spanish renders 'siendo-azotada' (being lashed), and English 'being-tossed,' both capturing the physical buffeting rather than personal torment. This sense preserves the verb's older connotation of testing or straining — the boat is 'put to the test' by the storm — before the semantic field contracted almost entirely to human suffering. Some scholars treat this as a metaphorical extension of sense 1 (the boat 'tormented' by waves), but the multilingual gloss divergence confirms it as a recognizably distinct usage. TORMENT AND TORTURE

en: being-tossed | es: siendo-azotada | fr: tourmenter | de: βασανιζόμενον Matt 14:24

βᾰσᾰν-ισμός G0929 N-GMS (6×)

Torment, torture, anguish; the infliction or experience of severe pain as punishment.

Denotes the act or state of being tortured—severe pain deliberately inflicted as punishment or experienced as divine judgment. All six New Testament occurrences appear in Revelation, where the word describes the agonizing consequences of God's wrath upon the unrepentant. The scorpion-like locusts of the fifth trumpet inflict basanismos for five months (Rev 9:5), while the smoke of torment for idolaters rises forever (Rev 14:11). Babylon's luxurious self-indulgence is repaid with an equal measure of torment (Rev 18:7, 10). Spanish 'tormento,' French 'Qual,' and German 'Qual' all center on the idea of excruciating suffering, confirming a unified punitive-anguish sense.

(6×) Severe anguish or torture, especially as divine punishment. In Revelation the word is used exclusively for eschatological torment: the demonic locusts inflict pain like a scorpion's sting for five months (Rev 9:5), the worshippers of the beast face unending torment whose smoke ascends forever (Rev 14:11), and Babylon receives torment proportional to her self-glorification (Rev 18:7, 10). Spanish 'tormento' and German 'Qual' both convey intense, punitive suffering, confirming a single semantic core of agonizing retribution. TORMENT AND TORTURE

en: torment | es: tormento | fr: Qual | de: Qual Rev 9:5; Rev 14:11; Rev 18:7; Rev 18:10

βᾰσᾰν-ιστής G0930 N-DMP (1×)

torturer, jailer, one who examines by torture; an official who inflicts pain to extract confession or punish

This noun denotes a torturer or jailer, one who examines prisoners through physical pain or administers judicial punishment. Jesus uses it in the parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt 18:34): the master, enraged by the servant's refusal to forgive, handed him over 'to the torturers' (τοῖς βασανισταῖς) until he should pay all his debt. The term evokes the brutal reality of ancient prison conditions and torture chambers. Jesus' point is chilling: unforgiveness imprisons the unforgiving in a hell of their own making. The βασανισταί symbolize the tormenting consequences of harboring grudges when one has received infinite mercy.

(1×) The translations (English 'torturers,' Spanish 'verdugos,' French 'tortionnaire') uniformly point to those who inflict torture. Matthew 18:34 uses βασανισταῖς to depict the severe consequence of the unforgiving servant's hardness: he is delivered to torturers—a stark image of the spiritual and relational anguish that unforgiveness brings upon oneself, mirroring the judgment one refuses to extend as mercy. TORMENT AND TORTURE

en: torturers | es: verdugos | fr: tortionnaire | de: βασανισταῖς Matt 18:34

βᾰσᾰν-ος G0931 N-GFS (3×)

torment, torture, severe pain or anguish

This noun denotes torment, torture, or severe suffering. Matthew summarizes Jesus's ministry of healing, including those suffering from various diseases and 'torments' (Matt 4:24). The rich man in Hades cries out that he is in agony in 'this torment' (Luke 16:23, 28). Originally referring to a touchstone for testing gold's purity, the word evolved to mean the torture used to test slaves' testimony, then more broadly, any severe affliction. In NT usage it describes both physical affliction and eschatological anguish.

(3×) Describes severe suffering, both physical and eschatological. Matthew 4:24 mentions those afflicted with 'torments' (βασάνοις) —severe diseases Jesus healed. Luke 16:23 and 16:28 use it twice in the rich man and Lazarus parable: the rich man suffers in 'this torment' (βασάνῳ/βασάνου), pleading for relief and warning his brothers. The classical background of testing by torture enriches the metaphor of purifying or agonizing affliction. Spanish 'tormento,' French 'tourment' preserve the sense of severe, testing anguish. TESTING AND PROVING en: torment, torments | es: tormento, tormentos | fr: tourment | de: βασάνοις, βασάνου Matt 4:24; Luke 16:23; Luke 16:28

βᾰσιλ-εί̄ᾱ G0932 N-DFS (163×)

Kingdom, reign, royal dominion; the sovereign rule of a king and the realm where that rule holds

Basileia stands at the very center of Jesus' proclamation: 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Matt 4:17). It denotes both the dynamic act of God's reigning and the sphere in which that reign is experienced. In the Synoptic Gospels alone, the phrase 'kingdom of God/heaven' appears over 80 times, making basileia arguably the most theologically loaded noun in the New Testament. The word's semantic range — from royal authority to territorial domain to eschatological hope — is consistently captured across languages: 'reino,' 'royaume,' 'Reich,' 'kerajaan.'

kingdom, reign, royal dominion (163×) The sovereign rule, royal authority, or dominion of a king, together with the realm or territory over which that authority extends. Occurring 163 times, basileia overwhelmingly appears in the phrase 'kingdom of God' or 'kingdom of heaven' (Matt 3:2, 5:3, 6:33), encompassing both the present breaking-in of God's reign through Jesus and its future consummation. Cross-linguistic evidence — Spanish 'reino,' French 'royaume,' German 'Reich,' Arabic 'ملكوت' — uniformly treats it as a single undivided concept. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: kingdom | es: reino | fr: royaume | de: Reich Matt 3:2; Matt 4:17; Matt 4:23; Matt 5:3; Matt 5:10

βᾰσίλ-ειον G0933

royal palace, kingly dwelling; royal treasury; capital city; tiara or diadem

A neuter noun denoting things associated with royalty, most commonly the royal dwelling or palace. The plural form 'royal palaces' appears frequently in classical texts. By extension, it can refer to the seat of empire—a capital city where royal power resides. Another sense identifies the royal treasury, where the king's wealth is stored. The word also takes on a concrete sense of royal regalia: the tiara or diadem worn as a symbol of kingship, appearing in Septuagint references as a 'diadem of beauty.' Botanical uses name certain plants, possibly for their regal appearance or associations.

βᾰσίλ-ειος G0934 Adj-NNS (2×)

royal, kingly, belonging to a king, fit for a king

This adjective means royal or kingly, describing what pertains to or is worthy of a king. Classical Greek applied it to royal houses, power, and choice items deemed fit for royalty. In the New Testament, it appears in two contrasting contexts: Jesus speaks of those in soft clothing dwelling 'in kings' courts' or 'palaces' (Luke 7:25), while Peter calls believers 'a royal priesthood' (1 Pet 2:9). The word carries connotations of excellence, authority, and special status associated with kingship. First Peter's usage transforms this worldly category into spiritual reality: believers collectively form a priesthood with royal dignity and privilege.

(2×) Luke 7:25 uses the plural neuter form for 'royal palaces' where splendidly dressed people live—contrasting sharply with John the Baptist's wilderness clothing. 1 Peter 2:9 applies the adjective to 'priesthood,' creating the powerful phrase 'royal priesthood' that elevates believers' status before God. Spanish 'palacios/real', French 'royal', and German 'königlich/βασιλείοις' show the range from literal royal residences to metaphorical royal status. The two passages move from earthly royal luxury (which John rejected) to the spiritual royal dignity of God's chosen people. RULING AND REIGNING

en: palaces, royal | es: palacios, real | fr: royal | de: koeniglich, βασιλείοις Luke 7:25; 1Pet 2:9

βᾰσῐ̈λ-εύς G0935 N-AMP (115×)

King, ruler, sovereign; used of earthly monarchs, the Messiah, and God as supreme ruler Basileus denotes a king or sovereign who exercises supreme authority over a people or territory. In the New Testament it applies to historical rulers like Herod (Matt 2:1), to Caesar as the Roman emperor, and supremely to Jesus as the promised Davidic king and to God as the eternal King. The multilingual translations uniformly render it with direct equivalents — Spanish 'rey,' French 'roi,' German 'König' — reflecting the universally understood concept of monarchical authority. The word carries both political and theological weight, especially in the phrase 'King of kings' (Rev 19:16).

king, ruler, sovereign (115×) A male monarch or supreme ruler exercising royal authority over a people or territory. Covers earthly kings such as David (Matt 1:6), Herod (Matt 2:1), and foreign sovereigns, as well as God and Christ as ultimate King. Translations across languages consistently use direct royal equivalents (Spanish 'rey,' French 'roi'), underscoring the term's unambiguous semantic core of sovereign rule. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-king, king | es: rey | fr: roi | de: Koenig, König Matt 1:6; Matt 2:1; Matt 2:2; Matt 2:3; Matt 2:9

βᾰσῐλ-εύω G0936 V-FIA-3S (21×)

To reign, rule as king; to exercise royal authority and sovereign dominion over a people or realm.

The standard Greek verb for kingly rule, appearing across the New Testament in contexts both earthly and eschatological. It describes Archelaus reigning in Judea (Matt 2:22), the promised eternal reign of Christ over the house of Jacob (Luke 1:33), and the theological drama of Romans 5 where death 'reigned' from Adam to Moses but grace now reigns through righteousness (Rom 5:14, 17, 21). Paul provocatively tells the Corinthians, 'You have begun to reign — and without us!' (1 Cor 4:8). In Revelation, the saints will reign with Christ (Rev 20:4, 6). Spanish 'reinar' and French 'régner' are precise cognate equivalents, while the breadth of usage — from political to cosmic sovereignty — makes this one of the New Testament's most theologically loaded verbs.

1. to reign, rule as king (20×) To reign or rule as king — exercising royal authority and sovereign dominion. This covers the full range from earthly political rule (Matt 2:22, Archelaus in Judea; Luke 19:14, 27, the parable of the nobleman) to the cosmic and eschatological: death reigns through Adam (Rom 5:14, 17), grace reigns through righteousness (Rom 5:21), and believers will reign with Christ (Rev 20:4, 6). Spanish 'reinar,' French 'régner,' and German 'herrschen' all consistently render this primary sense across 20 occurrences. RULING AND REIGNING en: he-will-reign, let-reign, might-reign | es: has-reinado, reina, reinar | fr: régner | de: herrschen, herrscht Matt 2:22; Luke 1:33; Luke 19:14; Luke 19:27; Rom 5:14

2. those who reign, kings (1×) A substantival participial use designating those who reign — 'kings' or 'those exercising royal power.' At 1 Timothy 6:15, God is described as 'King of those who reign' (βασιλεὺς τῶν βασιλευόντων), where the participle functions as a noun denoting sovereign rulers. Spanish 'que reinan' and English 'being kings' capture the shift from verbal action to nominal designation. RULING AND REIGNING en: being-kings | es: que-reinan | fr: régner | de: herrschen 1Tim 6:15

βᾰσῐλ-ικός G0937 Adj-NMS (5×)

Royal, kingly; pertaining to a king, whether describing a person of the royal court or something possessing regal authority.

An adjective meaning 'royal' or 'belonging to a king,' applied both to persons associated with royalty and to things possessing kingly dignity. In John 4:46, 49, it describes a 'royal official' (basilikos) whose son Jesus heals from a distance—a man connected to Herod's court. Acts 12:20–21 uses it of Herod Agrippa's 'royal' country and 'royal' robes. Most strikingly, James 2:8 speaks of the 'royal law'—the command to love your neighbor—elevating it as the king's own decree. French and Spanish both render it simply as 'royal,' while German 'königlich' carries the same regal weight.

(5×) Royal or kingly—describing persons, possessions, or qualities that belong to or befit a king. The 'royal official' (basilikos) in John 4:46, 49 is a courtier in Herod Antipas's service, while Acts 12:20–21 uses the term for Herod Agrippa's royal territory and apparel. James 2:8 applies it metaphorically to the 'royal law' of neighbor-love, investing the command with sovereign authority. The uniform rendering across languages—French 'royal,' Spanish 'real,' German 'königlich'—confirms a single, coherent sense of regal association and dignity, though the referent shifts from persons to garments to divine law. RULING AND REIGNING

en: royal, royal-official | es: oficial-real, real | fr: royal | de: koeniglich, königlich John 4:46; John 4:49; Acts 12:20; Acts 12:21; Jas 2:8

βᾰσῐλ-ισσα G0938 N-NFS (4×)

A queen; a woman who reigns or holds royal authority

The feminine noun basílissa designates a woman who holds royal power or sovereignty, whether as reigning monarch or queen consort. In the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus invokes the 'Queen of the South' — the Queen of Sheba — who traveled to hear Solomon's wisdom, shaming his unresponsive generation (Matt 12:42; Luke 11:31). In Acts 8:27, the Ethiopian eunuch serves Candace, queen of the Ethiopians. Revelation 18:7 uses it of Babylon's self-exaltation: 'I sit as a queen.' Spanish 'reina,' French 'reine,' and German 'Königin' all preserve the straightforward royal feminine sense.

(4×) A female sovereign or royal consort who exercises regal authority. The NT employs the term for historical queens (the Queen of Sheba, Matt 12:42; Luke 11:31; Candace of Ethiopia, Acts 8:27) and metaphorically for Babylon's arrogant self-enthronement (Rev 18:7). Every translation language renders it with the standard feminine royal title — Spanish 'reina,' French 'reine,' German 'Königin' — confirming a single, stable semantic profile. QUEEN RULER en: A-queen, The-queen, a-queen | es: La-reina, Reina, reina | fr: reine | de: Koenigin, βασίλισσα, βασιλίσσης Matt 12:42; Luke 11:31; Acts 8:27; Rev 18:7

βάσις G0939 N-NFP (1×)

foot, base, stepping; the part of the body used for walking or standing

This noun means 'foot' or 'base,' referring to the part of the body used for stepping or standing. Luke uses it in Acts 3:7 to describe the healing of the lame beggar: 'immediately his feet and ankles (βάσεις καὶ σφυδρά) were made strong.' The term emphasizes the structural foundation of locomotion—the βάσεις are not just anatomical feet but the literal bases that support standing and walking. Classical usage includes steps, rhythmic movements, and architectural bases. Luke's medical precision highlights the completeness of the healing: the man who had never walked now leaps and praises God, his βάσεις transformed from useless appendages to instruments of worship.

(1×) The translations (English 'feet,' Spanish 'bases,' French 'base') confirm the anatomical sense. Acts 3:7 uses βάσεις to describe the lame man's feet, which were strengthened and enabled to bear weight —a miracle that symbolizes the gospel's power to restore what is broken and enable true worship. FEET AND LEGS en: feet | es: bases | fr: base | de: βάσεις Acts 3:7

βασκ-αίνω G0940 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to bewitch, cast a spell on; to fascinate or enchant, often with malicious intent

This verb means 'to bewitch' or 'cast a spell,' describing the act of enchanting or mesmerizing someone, often maliciously (by the 'evil eye'). Paul uses it rhetorically in Galatians 3:1: 'You foolish Galatians! Who has bewitched you (τίς ὑμᾶς ἐβάσκανεν)?' He's not suggesting literal sorcery but rather expressing astonishment that the Galatians, who clearly saw Christ crucified depicted before them, have been so thoroughly deceived by false teachers. The term captures the irrational, almost supernatural quality of their apostasy —as if they've been placed under a spell that blinds them to the gospel's clarity.

(1×) The translations (English 'bewitched,' Spanish 'fascinó,' German 'bezaubern') all point to enchantment or spell-casting. Galatians 3:1 uses ἐβάσκανεν metaphorically to express Paul's incredulity: the Galatians have been so thoroughly deceived by legalism that it's as if they've been bewitched, their spiritual vision obscured by a malevolent influence that contradicts the plain gospel they once embraced. SORCERY WITCHCRAFT

en: bewitched | es: fascinó | fr: ἐβάσκανεν | de: bezaubern Gal 3:1

βαστάζω G0941 V-AIA-3P (27×)

To carry, bear, or endure; ranging from physical transport to figurative endurance of burdens, and even pilfering

A versatile verb whose core image is lifting and carrying a load. In the Synoptic Gospels it describes concrete actions — carrying a water jar (Mark 14:13), bearing sandals (Matt 3:11), lifting a bier (Luke 7:14). But Paul extends it powerfully into metaphor: bearing one another's weaknesses (Rom 15:1) and carrying the marks of Jesus on one's body (Gal 6:17). Spanish consistently uses 'llevar' and 'cargar,' while German 'tragen' covers both the physical and figurative senses, revealing how naturally the word bridges the literal and the metaphorical.

1. carry or transport physically (15×) Physical carrying or transporting of objects or persons. This is the most frequent usage: picking up stones to throw (John 10:31 context), carrying a jar of water through Jerusalem (Mark 14:13), or bearing someone on a stretcher (Luke 7:14). Matthew 8:17 quotes Isaiah to say Christ 'bore' our sicknesses, where the physical image grounds the theological claim. Spanish 'cargó' and German 'tragen' both center on this concrete load-bearing act. BEARING AND CARRYING en: Took-up, bearing, carried | es: Levantaron, cargando, cargó | fr: porter | de: tragen, trägt Matt 3:11; Matt 8:17; Mark 14:13; Luke 7:14; Luke 10:4

2. bear or endure figuratively (9×) Figurative bearing or enduring of hardships, burdens, and consequences. Paul urges the strong to 'bear the weaknesses of the weak' (Rom 15:1), and Jesus tells his disciples they cannot yet 'bear' certain truths (John 16:12). Galatians 5:10 warns that the troublemaker will 'bear his judgment.' The metaphor retains the weight of physical carrying — these burdens are real even when invisible. French 'porter' and Spanish 'llevar' serve both literal and figurative senses seamlessly. BEARING AND CARRYING

en: bear, having-borne, support | es: llevad, llevará, que-soportaron | fr: porter | de: tragen, trägt Matt 20:12; John 16:12; Rom 11:18; Rom 15:1; Gal 5:10

3. carry away or pilfer (2×) Carrying away with a connotation of pilfering or unauthorized removal. John 12:6 specifies that Judas 'was carrying away' from the money box — he was a thief. In John 20:15, Mary Magdalene fears someone has 'carried away' the Lord's body. The verb's neutral carrying sense shades into suspicion and theft, with context supplying the moral coloring. Spanish 'llevaba' preserves this ambiguity between innocent transport and illicit removal. BEARING AND CARRYING

en: carried-away, he-was-taking | es: cargaste, llevaba | fr: porter | de: tragen John 12:6; John 20:15

4. bear marks on oneself (1×) Bearing marks, brands, or distinguishing signs on one's own body. In Galatians 6:17, Paul declares 'I bear on my body the marks of Jesus' — scars from persecution that function as a brand of ownership and loyalty. This singular usage transforms the verb from transporting an external load to displaying an embodied identity. Spanish 'llevo' and English 'I bear' convey the permanence and personal significance of these marks. BEARING AND CARRYING en: I-bear | es: llevo | fr: porter | de: tragen Gal 6:17

βάτος G0942 N-DFS (5×)

Bush, bramble bush; the thorny shrub (Rubus) associated with God's appearance to Moses in the burning bush.

Refers to a thorny bush or bramble, most memorably the bush that burned without being consumed when God spoke to Moses on Mount Horeb. Three of its five NT occurrences allude directly to that theophany: Mark 12:26 and Luke 20:37 cite 'the passage about the bush' as proof of resurrection, while Acts 7:30, 35 retells the Exodus narrative. Luke 6:44 uses it in a proverb—'figs are not gathered from a bramble bush'—grounding it in everyday Palestinian botany. Spanish 'zarza' preserves both the botanical and theological resonance, while French 'buisson' and German 'Dornbusch' (thornbush) emphasize its thorny character.

(5×) A thorny bush or bramble (genus Rubus), most notably the burning bush of the Exodus theophany. In Mark 12:26 and Luke 20:37, Jesus references 'the bush' passage (Exod 3) to argue for resurrection; Acts 7:30, 35 recounts Moses' encounter with the angel in the flame of the bush. Luke 6:44 employs it botanically in a wisdom saying about gathering figs from thorns. The Spanish 'zarza' and German 'Dornbusch' both highlight the thorny nature of the plant, while French 'buisson' serves as a general term for shrub—yet all translations carry the heavy theological freight of God's self-revelation at the bush. BUSH SHRUB PLANT

en: Bush, a-bramble-bush, bush | es: Zarza, de-zarza, zarza | fr: buisson | de: Dornbusch, Βάτου, βάτου Mark 12:26; Luke 6:44; Luke 20:37; Acts 7:30; Acts 7:35

βάτος G0943 N-AMP (1×)

bath, a Hebrew liquid measure; a unit of volume used for liquids, approximately 8-9 gallons

This noun denotes the bath, a Hebrew liquid measure roughly equivalent to 8-9 gallons or 30-40 liters. Jesus uses it in the parable of the dishonest manager (Luke 16:6), where a debtor owes 'a hundred baths of oil' and the manager tells him to change the bill to fifty. The term grounds the parable in the economic realities of first-century Palestine, where large agricultural debts were calculated in standard measures. The manager's shrewd reduction of the debt (by half!) is scandalous yet commended by Jesus for its strategic foresight. The βάτος is a concrete unit that measures both the debt and the grace extended.

(1×) The translations (English 'measures,' Spanish 'batos,' French 'baths') confirm the identification as a standard liquid measure. Luke 16:6 uses βάτους to quantify the olive oil debt in Jesus' parable—100 baths is a substantial quantity, and the manager's bold rewriting of the contract to 50 baths demonstrates the kind of decisive, self-interested action Jesus urges His disciples to emulate (in righteousness) for eternal purposes. BATH LIQUID MEASURE

en: measures | es: batos | fr: baths | de: βάτους Luke 16:6

βάτρᾰχος G0944 N-NMP (1×)

frog, the amphibian; the small leaping creature associated with water and marshes

This noun denotes frogs, the amphibious creatures familiar from marshes and streams. John uses it in Revelation 16:13, where he sees 'three unclean spirits like frogs' coming from the mouths of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. The imagery evokes the plague of frogs in Exodus, a divine judgment on Egypt. In Revelation, the frog-like demons gather the kings of the earth for the battle of Armageddon—a grotesque, plague-like mobilization of evil. Classical usage includes literal frogs and the fishing-frog (angler fish). John's apocalyptic βάτραχοι symbolize unclean, pestilential spirits that seduce the nations into final rebellion.

(1×) The translations (English/Spanish 'frogs,' French 'grenouilles,' German 'Frösche') uniformly identify the creatures. Revelation 16:13 uses βάτραχοι to describe unclean spirits that summon the world to war against God—an echo of the Exodus plague that underscores the demonic, repulsive nature of the spiritual forces driving human rebellion in the last days. LIVING CREATURES

en: frogs | es: ranas | fr: grenouilles | de: Froesche Rev 16:13

βαττο-λογέω G0945 V-ASA-2P (1×)

to babble, use vain repetitions; to repeat words mindlessly or stammer

This rare verb means 'to babble' or 'use vain repetitions,' describing speech characterized by meaningless repetition or stammering. Jesus uses it in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 6:7): 'When you pray, do not babble (μὴ βατταλογήσητε) like the Gentiles, for they think they will be heard for their many words.' The term critiques pagan prayer practices that rely on verbal volume or magical formulas rather than genuine communion with a Father who knows what His children need. Classical usage suggests stammering or saying the same thing over and over. Jesus calls for simplicity and sincerity, not ritualistic verbosity.

(1×) The translations (English 'babble,' Spanish 'usen vanas repeticiones,' French 'balbutier') all capture the idea of empty repetition. Matthew 6:7 uses βατταλογήσητε to warn against the pagan assumption that prayer effectiveness depends on word count or formulaic recitation—true prayer is relational conversation with a loving Father, not a magical incantation aimed at a distant deity. SPEAKING AND TALKING en: babble | es: usen-vanas-repeticiones | fr: balbutier | de: βατταλογήσητε Matt 6:7

βδέλυγ-μα G0946 N-GNP (6×)

Abomination, detestable thing; something utterly repulsive to God, especially idolatrous objects or moral corruption.

Refers to something so morally or ritually repugnant that it provokes divine revulsion—an 'abomination' in the fullest sense. The Septuagint uses it for pagan idols and forbidden cultic practices (hence the famous phrase 'abomination of desolation'), and the New Testament inherits this charged meaning. Jesus cites Daniel's prophecy of the 'abomination of desolation' standing in the holy place (Matt 24:15; Mark 13:14), pointing to a sacrilege so offensive it triggers eschatological flight. Luke 16:15 broadens it to include what people esteem highly but God detests. In Revelation 17:4-5, Babylon the great holds a cup 'full of abominations,' and her forehead bears the title 'mother of abominations.' Spanish 'abominación' and French 'abomination' both derive from the Latin abominari, 'to execrate,' preserving the visceral force.

Abomination / detestable thing (6×) Something utterly detestable in God's sight, especially idolatrous objects, sacrilegious desecrations, or deep moral corruption. The term carries heavy cultic freight from the Septuagint, where it translates Hebrew toevah and shiqquts. Jesus applies it eschatologically in the 'abomination of desolation' standing in the holy place (Matt 24:15; Mark 13:14), echoing Daniel's prophecy. Luke 16:15 extends it to whatever humans exalt but God finds loathsome. Revelation deploys it for Babylon's accumulated filth and idolatry (Rev 17:4-5). Spanish 'abominación,' French 'abomination,' and German 'Greuel' all convey the sense of extreme religious-moral revulsion. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: ABOMINATIONS, abomination, of-abominations | es: ABOMINACIONES, abominación, de-abominaciones | fr: abomination | de: Greuel, βδέλυγμα Matt 24:15; Mark 13:14; Luke 16:15; Rev 17:4; Rev 17:5

βδελυκ-τός G0947 Adj-NMP (1×)

detestable, abominable, loathsome; morally or ritually repugnant

This adjective means 'detestable' or 'abominable,' describing what is morally or ritually loathsome. Paul uses it in Titus 1:16 to describe false teachers who 'profess to know God, but by their works they deny Him, being detestable (βδελυκτοὶ) and disobedient.' The term, common in Septuagint contexts of idolatry and impurity, conveys visceral repugnance. These teachers are not merely wrong but βδελυκτοί—their hypocrisy and moral corruption make them abhorrent to God. Classical usage is rare in this exact form, but the Septuagint employs it for abominations. Paul's condemnation is total: their lives contradict their lips, rendering them detestable despite their claims.

(1×) The translations (English 'detestable,' Spanish 'abominables,' German 'abscheulich') all emphasize loathsomeness and moral repugnance. Titus 1:16 uses βδελυκτοὶ to characterize those whose conduct belies their confession—they are detestable because their deeds expose their profession as a lie, making them objects of divine abhorrence rather than approval. UNCLEAN AND PROFANE

en: detestable | es: abominables | fr: βδελυκτοὶ | de: abscheulich Titus 1:16

βδελύσσομαι G0948 V-RPM/P-DMP (2×)

to abhor, to detest, to feel loathing toward, to regard as abominable

This verb expresses strong revulsion and loathing, originally describing the physical disgust one feels toward spoiled food but expanding to moral and spiritual abhorrence. The classical range includes being sickened by something or causing something to become abominable. In the New Testament, Paul uses it to challenge the Jew who 'abhors idols' yet commits sacrilege (Rom 2:22), while Revelation describes 'the abominable' among those excluded from the holy city (Rev 21:8). The word appears in perfect passive participle form in Revelation, emphasizing the settled, completed state of being abominable—not a temporary lapse but a fixed character.

(2×) Romans 2:22 uses the present middle participle in Paul's rhetorical question: 'You who abhor idols, do you rob temples?' The irony is sharp: claiming to detest pagan worship while acting in ways equally offensive to God. Revelation 21:8 lists 'the abominable' (perfect passive participle) among the condemned, referring to those who have made themselves loathsome through idolatry and sin. French 'avoir en horreur, détester' and German 'verabscheuen' capture this visceral rejection. Both contexts link the word to idolatry, whether hypocritically condemned or actually practiced. HATRED AND HOSTILITY

en: abhorring, abominable | es: abominables,, que-abomina | fr: avoir-en-horreur, détester | de: verabscheuen Rom 2:22; Rev 21:8

βέβαιος G0949 Adj-AFS (9×)

Firm, sure, secure; describing what is steadfast, reliable, and unshakable—used of promises, hope, and spiritual standing.

Bebaios conveys the quality of something that stands firm under pressure—stable, guaranteed, not liable to give way. Derived from baino ('to walk, stand'), it pictures ground solid enough to bear weight. In the New Testament, it characterizes God's promises (Romans 4:16, the promise is 'firm' for all Abraham's descendants), the believer's hope (Hebrews 3:6, 14; 6:19), and the prophetic word (2 Peter 1:19). Hebrews 2:2 calls the law spoken through angels 'firm,' meaning legally binding and enforceable. Spanish 'firme/segura' and German 'fest' both capture this sense of unshakable solidity, while French 'ferme' preserves the Latin firmness at the root of the idea.

firm, sure, secure (9×) Firm, sure, secure, steadfast—describing what is reliable, stable, and guaranteed not to fail. Applied to the Abrahamic promise (Rom 4:16, made 'sure' to all descendants), the angelic law (Heb 2:2, 'firm' meaning legally binding), the believer's confession and hope (Heb 3:6, 14), the anchor of the soul (Heb 6:19), the prophetic word (2 Pet 1:19), and one's calling and election (2 Pet 1:10). The underlying image from baino ('to stand, walk') is of ground solid enough to bear weight—something you can build your life on without it shifting. FIRMNESS AND SECURITY

en: firm, more-firm, secure | es: firme, más-segura, segura | fr: ferme, fest | de: fest Rom 4:16; 2Cor 1:7; Heb 2:2; Heb 3:6; Heb 3:14

βεβαι-όω G0950 V-PPA-NMS (8×)

To confirm, establish, or make firm; to validate a promise, secure a standing, or ratify what has been declared.

A verb meaning to make something firm, sure, or valid. In its active uses, it describes God or Christ confirming a word or promise — as in Mark 16:20, where the Lord confirms the disciples' preaching with accompanying signs, and Romans 15:8, where Christ confirms the promises to the patriarchs. In passive constructions, the subject is the one being established or made steadfast, as in Colossians 2:7, where believers are 'rooted and built up in him, established in faith.' The verb carries the image of something wavering being set on solid ground.

1. confirm, establish (active) (4×) To confirm, establish, or validate in an active sense — the agent makes a word, promise, or person's standing firm. In Mark 16:20 the Lord confirms the preached word through signs; in Romans 15:8 Christ confirms the promises given to the fathers. Spanish 'confirmar/confirmará' and French 'affermir' both highlight the decisive, ratifying action involved. See also 1 Corinthians 1:8 and 2 Corinthians 1:21. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

en: confirming, to-confirm, will-confirm | es: confirmando, confirmar, confirmará | fr: affermir, confirmer | de: bestaetigen Mark 16:20; Rom 15:8; 1Cor 1:8; 2Cor 1:21

2. be confirmed, be established (passive) (4×) To be confirmed, established, or made steadfast in a passive or middle sense — the subject receives or experiences the confirming action. In Colossians 2:7 believers are described as being established in the faith, and in Hebrews 2:3 the salvation first spoken by the Lord 'was confirmed' to the audience by those who heard him. Spanish 'fue confirmada/fue confirmado' reflects the passive reception clearly. Hebrews 13:9 warns against hearts carried away by strange teachings rather than being established by grace. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

en: being-established, to-be-established, was-confirmed | es: fue-confirmada, fue-confirmado, ser-confirmado | fr: affermir, confirmer | de: bestaetigen 1Cor 1:6; Col 2:7; Heb 2:3; Heb 13:9

βεβαί-ωσις G0951 N-DFS (2×)

confirmation, ratification, legal establishment, making firm or sure

This noun denotes the act of confirming or establishing something firmly, used in classical Greek for confirming decisions or providing legal warranty. In the New Testament's two occurrences, it describes the confirming or establishing of spiritual realities. Paul speaks of believers' partnership in the gospel 'both in my imprisonment and in the confirmation of the gospel' (Phil 1:7), while Hebrews notes that an oath provides 'confirmation' to end disputes (Heb 6:16). The word suggests making something secure, legally binding, or beyond question—removing uncertainty and establishing truth firmly.

(2×) Philippians 1:7 links 'confirmation' (bebaiōsis) directly to the gospel's defense and establishment, with believers sharing in Paul's work of making the gospel message firm and secure. Hebrews 6:16 describes how an oath functions to provide final 'confirmation,' settling all dispute by divine guarantee. Spanish 'confirmación', French 'confirmation', and German 'Bestätigung' all preserve this legal-formal sense of ratification. Both passages emphasize finality and certainty: the gospel's truth being established beyond doubt (Philippians) and God's promise made absolutely sure by oath (Hebrews). FIRMNESS AND SECURITY

en: confirmation | es: confirmación | fr: confirmation | de: Bestaetigung Phil 1:7; Heb 6:16

βέβηλ-ος G0952 Adj-AFP (5×)

Profane, unhallowed, irreverent; accessible to all (not sacred), hence common, godless, or ritually impure.

Describes what is 'treadable'—open ground as opposed to sacred space—and by extension what is common, unholy, or irreverent. In the Pastoral Epistles, Paul warns against 'profane and old wives' fables' (1 Tim 4:7) and 'profane empty chatterings' (1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 2:16), using the term to mark speech that desecrates what should be holy. In 1 Tim 1:9 it characterizes lawless persons alongside the 'unholy,' and Heb 12:16 applies it to Esau as the archetype of the profane person who trades sacred birthright for a meal. Spanish 'profanas' and French 'profane' both derive from the same Latin root (pro-fanum, 'before the temple'), perfectly mirroring the Greek sense of being outside sacred bounds.

(5×) Profane, unhallowed, or irreverent—describing persons, speech, or behavior that stands outside the sacred and treats holy things with contempt. Etymologically rooted in the idea of ground 'permitted to be trodden' (as opposed to consecrated space), the NT uses it of lawless and godless persons (1 Tim 1:9), worthless myths and irreverent chatter (1 Tim 4:7; 6:20; 2 Tim 2:16), and Esau as the paradigmatic profane man who despised his birthright (Heb 12:16). The cross-linguistic agreement—Spanish 'profanas,' French 'profane,' German 'unheilig'—confirms a unified sense of desacralization, marking what has been stripped of or never possessed holiness. UNCLEAN AND PROFANE

en: profane | es: irreverentes, profanas, profano | fr: profane | de: unheilig 1Tim 1:9; 1Tim 4:7; 1Tim 6:20; 2Tim 2:16; Heb 12:16

βεβηλ-όω G0953 V-PIA-3P (2×)

to profane, to desecrate, to violate what is sacred, to treat holy things as common

This verb means to profane or desecrate something sacred, treating the holy as common or polluting what should remain pure. The Septuagint uses it for violating the Sabbath or defiling holy things, and this usage continues in the New Testament. Jesus references how temple priests 'profane the Sabbath' by their necessary work yet remain guiltless (Matt 12:5), while Paul's accusers claim he attempted 'to profane the temple' (Acts 24:6). The word captures the serious violation of crossing boundaries between sacred and profane, though Jesus's usage shows that ritual profanation may be justified by higher obligations.

(2×) Matthew 12:5 uses the present active form in Jesus's argument about Sabbath law: priests by necessity 'profane' the Sabbath through temple service yet bear no guilt, establishing a principle that mercy and temple service supersede strict Sabbath rest. Acts 24:6 contains the infinitive in the accusation that Paul tried 'to profane the temple,' a serious charge that Paul vigorously denies. Spanish 'profanan/profanar', French 'profaner', and German forms all maintain this sense of desecrating the holy. The two contexts show the word's range: justified necessity (Matthew) versus serious accusation of sacrilege (Acts). RITUAL DEFILEMENT

en: profane, to-desecrate | es: profanan, profanar | fr: profaner | de: βεβηλοῦσιν, βεβηλῶσαι Matt 12:5; Acts 24:6

Βεελζεβούλ G0954 N-DMS (7×)

Beelzeboul, a name for the prince of demons; used as a title for Satan in the Synoptic Gospels.

A name applied to the ruler of demons, used exclusively in the Synoptic Gospels during controversies about the source of Jesus' exorcistic power. The etymology likely derives from Hebrew 'ba'al zebul' (lord of the dwelling) or a deliberate distortion of the Old Testament 'Baal-zebub' (lord of flies) from 2 Kings 1:2. In Matt 12:24–27 and Mark 3:22, the Pharisees accuse Jesus of casting out demons by Beelzeboul, prompting his famous 'house divided' rebuttal. Spanish and French retain transliterations ('Beelzeboul,' 'Béelzébul'), reflecting the indeclinable foreign loanword status of this term across all witness languages.

Beelzeboul (7×) A title for Satan as prince of demons, derived from Hebrew ba'al (lord) combined with either zebul (dwelling/habitation) or a pejorative play on zebub (flies). Used seven times in the Synoptics (Matt 10:25; 12:24, 27; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15, 18, 19), always in the context of opponents attributing Jesus' exorcisms to demonic power. In Matt 10:25, Jesus warns that if the master of the house is called Beelzeboul, his household members will fare no better—linking the term to both Satanic authority and household imagery. DEMONS EVIL SPIRITS

en: Beelzeboul | es: Beelzeboul, Beelzeboúl, Beëlzeboúl | fr: Béelzébul | de: Beelzebul Matt 10:25; Matt 12:24; Matt 12:27; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15

Βελίαλ G0955 N-AMS (1×)

Belial or Beliar, a name for Satan; a designation for the devil as adversary and embodiment of evil

This proper noun designates Belial (or Beliar), a name for Satan used in Jewish literature and the New Testament. Paul employs it in 2 Corinthians 6:15: 'What accord has Christ with Beliar? Or what portion does a believer share with an unbeliever?' The term (from Hebrew בְּלִיַּעַל, 'worthlessness') became personified as a demonic figure or Satan himself. Paul uses it to underscore the absolute incompatibility between Christ and the powers of darkness. There can be no partnership, no middle ground—the covenant people must separate from the realm of Beliar and walk in the light.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Beliar, Bélial) across languages, confirming its identity as a designation for Satan. 2 Corinthians 6:15 uses Βελιάρ to personify evil in antithesis to Christ, arguing that believers cannot maintain spiritual fellowship with darkness—Beliar's domain is utterly opposed to Christ's kingdom, demanding radical separation and holiness. DEMONS EVIL SPIRITS
en: Beliar | es: Beliár | fr: Bélial | de: Beliar 2Cor 6:15

βέλος G0956 N-ANP (2×)
missile, arrow, dart, projectile weapon, metaphorically any attack or trial
This noun originally denoted any missile or projectile, especially arrows and darts, but classical Greek extended it to any thrown weapon including rocks, javelins, or even furniture used as weapons. Homer used it for the instruments of Apollo bringing sudden death. In the New Testament, the word appears in two very different contexts: Luke 18:25 contains a textual variant reading 'needle' (belonēs) rather than the more common rhaphidos, while Ephesians 6:16 uses 'arrows' metaphorically for 'the flaming darts of the evil one.' The semantic range from literal projectiles to metaphorical spiritual attacks shows the word's flexibility.

(2×) Luke 18:25 in some manuscripts reads 'eye of a needle' (belonēs) in Jesus's famous saying about the difficulty of the rich entering God's kingdom, though most texts use a different Greek word for needle. Ephesians 6:16 clearly uses the plural for 'flaming arrows' that the shield of faith quenches—representing spiritual attacks, temptations, and accusations from the evil one. Spanish 'dardos/de aguja', French 'aiguille', and German 'Pfeil/βελόνης' show the split between literal needle and metaphorical arrows. The military imagery in Ephesians transforms these ancient weapons into symbols of spiritual warfare. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14850 WITH 3 SENSES
en: arrows, of-needle | es: dardos, de-aguja | fr: aiguille | de: Pfeil, βελόνης Luke 18:25; Eph 6:16

βελτ-ίων G0957 Adv-C (1×)
better, more excellent, preferable; of superior quality or advantage
This comparative adjective means 'better' or 'more excellent,' describing what is superior or more advantageous. Paul uses the adverbial form in 2 Timothy 1:18: 'May the Lord grant him to find mercy from the Lord on that Day—and you well know (βέλτιον οἶδας) all the service he rendered at Ephesus.' The term conveys 'very well' or 'better than I can say'—Paul defers to Timothy's firsthand knowledge of Onesiphorus's ministry. Classical usage often appears in ethical contexts ('becoming better,' 'advancing'). Paul's usage is affectionate: Timothy knows better than anyone the extent of Onesiphorus's devoted service, which will be rewarded on the Day of Judgment.

(1×) The translations (English 'very well,' Spanish 'mejor,' German 'besser') confirm the comparative sense. 2 Timothy 1:18 uses βέλτιον to indicate superior knowledge—Timothy knows 'better' (more fully, more intimately) than Paul the many services Onesiphorus rendered at Ephesus, making Timothy a firsthand witness to the man's faithfulness and deserving of eschatological mercy. MORAL GOODNESS
en: very-well | es: mejor | fr: βέλτιον | de: besser 2Tim 1:18

Βενιαμίν G0958 N-GMS (4×)
Benjamin, the youngest son of Jacob; an Israelite tribe
Benjamin is the Hebrew name of Jacob's youngest son, whose descendants formed one of the twelve tribes of Israel. In the NT, the name appears in contexts of Israelite identity and tribal heritage. Paul twice identifies himself as belonging to the tribe of Benjamin (Rom 11:1; Phil 3:5), underscoring his pure Israelite lineage. Acts 13:21 recalls King Saul as a Benjaminite, and Revelation 7:8 lists Benjamin among the sealed tribes. French and German both render it 'Benjamin,' while Spanish varies between 'Benjamín' and 'Beniamín,' reflecting the Hebrew original.

(4×) The proper name of Jacob's youngest son and the Israelite tribe descended from him, used in the NT primarily as a marker of Jewish tribal lineage. Paul's self-identification as a Benjaminite (Rom 11:1; Phil 3:5) signals his impeccable Israelite credentials, while Acts 13:21 recalls King Saul from this tribe. The indeclinable Greek form mirrors the Hebrew Binyāmîn; Spanish 'Benjamín' and French 'Benjamin' preserve it with minimal adaptation. BENJAMIN TRIBE NAME
en: of-Beniamin | es: de-Beniamín, de-Benjamin, de-Benjamín | fr: Benjamin | de: Benjamin, Βενιαμίν Acts 13:21; Rom 11:1; Phil 3:5; Rev 7:8

Βερνίκη G0959 N-GFS (3×)
Bernice, daughter of Herod Agrippa I, companion of her brother Agrippa II
This proper noun refers to Bernice (also Berenice), daughter of Herod Agrippa I. She appears in Acts accompanying her brother Agrippa II when he comes to welcome Festus (Acts 25:13). She is present when Festus explains Paul's case to Agrippa (25:23) and when Paul makes his defense before them both (26:30). Historical sources indicate she lived with her brother in a relationship that occasioned scandal. Luke's restrained narrative simply notes her presence at these proceedings where Paul testified before Jewish royalty.

(3×) Herodian princess present during Paul's defense before Agrippa II. Acts 25:13 introduces 'Bernice' (Βερνίκης) arriving with Agrippa to greet Festus. Acts 25:23 describes her entering the audience hall with great pomp to hear Paul's case. Acts 26:30 concludes with the king, governor, 'Bernice' (Βερνίκη), and others rising after Paul's defense. The consistent transliteration (Bernikē, Berníkē, Bérénice) preserves the Macedonian form of the name, while the narrative context shows her as witness to Paul's testimony before Jewish authorities. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)
en: Bernikē | es: Berníkē | fr: Bérénice | de: Βερνίκη, Βερνίκης Acts 25:13; Acts 25:23; Acts 26:30

Βέροια G0960 N-DFS (2×)
Berea, a city in Macedonia known for its noble-minded inhabitants
This proper noun identifies Berea (modern Veria), a significant city in southwestern Macedonia where Paul and Silas preached after fleeing Thessalonica. Acts commends the Berean Jews as 'more noble-minded than those in Thessalonica' because they received the word with eagerness and examined the Scriptures daily to verify Paul's teaching (Acts 17:10-15). The city became known in Christian tradition for this exemplary response to apostolic preaching. Both New Testament occurrences appear in the same narrative, describing Paul and Silas's arrival in Berea and the later arrival of Thessalonian agitators who pursued them there.

(2×) Acts 17:10 records Paul and Silas being sent by night to Berea, where they found a more receptive audience than in Thessalonica. Acts 17:13 describes how Jews from Thessalonica came to Berea to continue opposing Paul's ministry. The city's name appears in dative form in both verses, maintaining standard Greek case usage for location. Spanish 'Bérea', French 'Bérée', and German forms preserve the basic transliteration. The Bereans' reputation for carefully examining Scripture against apostolic teaching made their city's name synonymous with discerning, Scripture-focused faith. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: Beroia | es: Bérea | fr: Bérée | de: Βέροιαν, Βεροίᾳ Acts 17:10; Acts 17:13

Βεροιαῖος G0961 Adj-NMS (1×)
Beroean, a resident of Berea; pertaining to the city of Berea in Macedonia
This adjective designates someone from Berea, the Macedonian city where Paul and Silas found a synagogue 'more noble' than Thessalonica's, examining the Scriptures daily to verify apostolic teaching (Acts 17:10-11). In Acts 20:4, Luke mentions Sopater the Beroean (Βεροιαῖος) among Paul's traveling companions on the collection journey to Jerusalem. The term marks geographical origin and, by association, evokes the Bereans' exemplary Scripture-searching spirit. Sopater's inclusion among the delegates underscores the unity of the multi-ethnic churches contributing to the Jerusalem relief fund. His identity as a Βεροιαῖος recalls the noble receptivity of his home synagogue.

(1×) The evidence (English 'Beroiaios,' Spanish 'bereense,' French 'Béréen') confirms the demonym for Berea. Acts 20:4 identifies Sopater as Βεροιαῖος, linking him to the city where the Jews 'received the word with all eagerness, examining the Scriptures daily'—his presence among Paul's companions honors Berea's legacy of thoughtful faith and generous partnership in the gospel. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: Beroiaios | es: bereense | fr: Béréen | de: Βεροιαῖος Acts 20:4

Βηθαβαρά G0962

Bethabara, a place name meaning 'place of crossing,' variant reading in John 1:28

A geographical proper noun from Hebrew (בֵּית עֲבָרָה), meaning 'house of crossing' or 'place of crossing.' This location appears as a variant reading in John 1:28 in the Received Text, identifying where John was baptizing. The name itself suggests a river crossing point or ford, fitting the context of John's baptismal ministry. Modern critical texts often prefer 'Bethany' at this location, making Bethabara a textually disputed reading that reflects early scribal traditions about the geographical setting of John's work.

Βηθανία G0963 N-DFS (12×)

Bethany — village on the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem; also a locale east of the Jordan where John baptized

Bēthania, from Aramaic bēth ʿanyā ('house of affliction' or 'house of dates'), identifies two distinct locations in the Gospels. The primary Bethany sits on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, roughly two miles from Jerusalem (John 11:18), and serves as Jesus' lodging place during his final week (Matt 21:17; Mark 11:11-12). This is the village of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus (John 11:1; 12:1), the site of the Ascension (Luke 24:50), and the setting for the anointing at Simon the leper's house (Matt 26:6; Mark 14:3). A second Bethany appears in John 1:28 as the place on the east bank of the Jordan where John was baptizing.

(12×) A village on the southeastern slope of the Mount of Olives, approximately fifteen stadia (about two miles) from Jerusalem (John 11:18). Home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus (John 11:1; 12:1), the place where Jesus lodged during Passion week (Matt 21:17; Mark 11:11-12), the site of the anointing (Mark 14:3), and the locale of the Ascension (Luke 24:50). Spanish 'Betania' and French 'Béthanie' transliterate directly. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Bēthania | es: -Bēthanía, Bēthania, Bēthanía | fr: Béthanie | de: Bethanien Matt 21:17; Matt 26:6; Mark 11:1; Mark 11:11; Mark 11:12

Βηθεσδά G0964 N-NFS (1×)

Bethzatha or Bethesda, a pool in Jerusalem; the site of Jesus' healing of the paralytic

This proper noun designates Bethzatha (or Bethesda), the pool in Jerusalem where Jesus healed the man who had been paralyzed for thirty-eight years (John 5:2). The name's derivation is uncertain—perhaps from Aramaic meaning 'house of mercy' or 'house of the portico.' Archaeological excavations have uncovered a double pool near the Sheep Gate matching John's description. The site was associated with healing, attracting the sick who waited for the troubling of the water. John's account emphasizes Jesus' sovereign initiative: He seeks out the invalid and heals him without the ritual waters, demonstrating that true restoration comes from the life-giving Word, not magical springs.

(1×) The evidence simply transliterates the name (Bēthzatha, Bethesda) across languages, with textual variants reflecting manuscript uncertainty. John 5:2 uses Βηθζαθά (in the best manuscripts) to identify the pool where the paralyzed man waited—a place of futile hope transformed by Jesus' presence into a site of miraculous liberation and Sabbath controversy. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Bēthzatha | es: Bēthzathá | fr: Bethzatha | de: Bethesda John 5:2

Βηθλέεμ G0965 N-AFS (8×)

Bethlehem — 'house of bread,' a town south of Jerusalem; birthplace of David and of Jesus the Messiah.

An indeclinable proper noun transliterated from Hebrew בֵּית לֶחֶם (bêth lechem, 'house of bread'). This small Judean town about six miles south of Jerusalem carries enormous theological weight as the birthplace of King David and, according to Micah 5:2, the prophesied birthplace of the Messiah. Matthew's nativity account centers on Bethlehem: the Magi are directed there (Matt 2:1, 5-6, 8), and Herod's massacre targets its children (Matt 2:16). Luke records Joseph and Mary traveling there for the census (Luke 2:4, 15). John 7:42 records the crowd debating whether the Christ must come from Bethlehem. German 'Bethlehem,' French 'Bethléem,' and Spanish 'Bēthleem' all preserve the Semitic name with minor phonetic adaptation.

(8×) The proper name of a Judean town meaning 'house of bread,' located south of Jerusalem. It is the ancestral city of David and the prophesied birthplace of the Messiah (Mic 5:2, cited in Matt 2:6). All eight NT occurrences cluster in the birth narratives (Matt 2:1, 5, 6, 8, 16; Luke 2:4, 15) and the messianic debate of John 7:42. Every translation preserves the name with minimal phonetic variation — Spanish 'Bēthleem,' French 'Bethléem,' German 'Bethlehem' — reflecting its universal recognition as a place of singular redemptive significance. BETHLEHEM TOWN

en: Bēthleem | es: Bēthleem | fr: Bethléem | de: Bethlehem Matt 2:1; Matt 2:5; Matt 2:6; Matt 2:8; Matt 2:16

Βηθσαιδά G0966 N-GFS (7×)

Bethsaida, a town near the Sea of Galilee associated with several of Jesus' disciples and miracles.

A place name meaning 'house of fish' in Aramaic, referring to a town on or near the northern shore of the Sea of Galilee. It was the hometown of Philip, Andrew, and Peter (John 1:44; 12:21) and the setting for significant events including the feeding of the five thousand (Luke 9:10). Jesus pronounces a woe against it alongside Chorazin for failing to repent despite witnessing mighty works (Matt 11:21; Luke 10:13). Scholarly debate continues about whether there was one Bethsaida or two, but the name remains consistent across all translation traditions: Spanish 'Bethsaidá,' French 'Bethsaïda,' German 'Bethsaida.'

Bēthsaida (7×) The proper name Bethsaida (Aramaic 'house of fish'), identifying a town near the Sea of Galilee closely tied to Jesus' Galilean ministry. It appears in woe oracles (Matt 11:21; Luke 10:13), as a geographic waypoint for disciples crossing the lake (Mark 6:45), as the site of a blind man's healing (Mark 8:22), as the locale for the feeding miracle (Luke 9:10), and as the hometown of Philip, Andrew, and Peter (John 1:44; 12:21). All translation languages render it as a direct transliteration, confirming its status as an indeclinable proper noun. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Bēthsaida | es: -Bēthsaïdá, Bethsaidá, Bēthsaidán | fr: Bethsaïda | de: Bethsaida Matt 11:21; Mark 6:45; Mark 8:22; Luke 9:10; Luke 10:13

Βηθφαγή G0967 N-AFS (3×)

Bethphage, village on the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem, associated with Jesus' triumphal entry

Bethphage was a small village on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, lying between Bethany and Jerusalem. The name derives from Aramaic meaning 'house of unripe figs,' reflecting the agricultural character of the area. All three Gospel accounts of Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem mention Bethphage as the location where Jesus sent disciples to retrieve the colt. The village marked a significant waypoint on the pilgrim route from Jericho to Jerusalem.

(3×) This proper name appears exclusively in the Synoptic accounts of Palm Sunday (Matthew 21:1, Mark 11:1, Luke 19:29). The multilingual glosses preserve the Greek transliteration with minor orthographic variation, reflecting the standard practice for biblical place names. The Aramaic etymology connects the site to fig cultivation, which remains significant given Jesus' later cursing of the fig tree during the same visit to Jerusalem. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Bēthphagē | es: Bēthphagḕ, Bēthphagḗ | fr: Bethphagé | de: Bethphage Matt 21:1; Mark 11:1; Luke 19:29

βῆμα· G0968 N-ANS (12×)

Judgment seat, tribunal; a step or foot's length of ground

The noun bema appears twelve times in the New Testament with two sharply distinct senses rooted in its etymology. Originally meaning 'a step' or 'a pace' — the space covered by one foot — it came to denote the raised platform (one 'step' up) from which officials rendered judgment. In eleven occurrences it is the tribunal or judgment seat: Pilate's judgment seat where he heard Jesus' case (Matt 27:19; John 19:13), Herod Agrippa's throne at Caesarea (Acts 12:21), Gallio's tribunal at Corinth (Acts 18:12-17), and Paul's appeals to Caesar's judgment seat (Acts 25:6-17). Most theologically, Paul speaks of standing before the bema of God and of Christ (Rom 14:10; 2 Cor 5:10). A single occurrence preserves the original spatial meaning.

1. judgment seat (11×) A judgment seat, tribunal, or official platform from which legal verdicts and royal decrees are issued. This architectural and legal sense dominates the word's NT usage, appearing eleven times across the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles. Pilate sat on the bema at the Pavement (John 19:13) to pronounce judgment on Jesus; Gallio dismissed Jewish charges against Paul from the bema at Corinth (Acts 18:12-16); Festus heard Paul's defense from the bema at Caesarea (Acts 25:6, 10, 17). The theological apex comes in Romans 14:10 and 2 Corinthians 5:10, where every person must appear before the bema of Christ for final accounting. Spanish uniformly renders 'tribunal,' French 'tribunal,' and German 'Richterstuhl' (judge's chair), all confirming the forensic, judicial setting. The raised platform evokes authority, publicity, and the gravity of verdict. JUDGMENT SEAT

en: judgment-seat | es: tribunal | fr: tribunal | de: Richterstuhl Matt 27:19; John 19:13; Acts 12:21; Acts 18:12; Acts 18:16

2. a step (1×) A step, pace, or foot's breadth of ground — the original spatial meaning from which the judicial sense developed. Acts 7:5 quotes God's promise to Abraham that he would give him the land, though at that time he gave him 'not even a step (bema) of ground' to stand on. Spanish renders 'paso' (a step/pace) and English 'a-step,' clearly distinguishing this from the tribunal sense. French and German interestingly retain 'tribunal' and 'Richterstuhl' even here, suggesting translators sometimes miss the spatial nuance, but the Greek and the context of land-measurement unmistakably point to a unit of physical space — one footfall's worth — underscoring the irony of Abraham's landless faith. JUDGMENT SEAT

en: a-step | es: paso | fr: tribunal | de: Richterstuhl Acts 7:5

βήρυλλος G0969 N-NMS (1×)

beryl, a precious stone of sea-green color used in ancient architecture and jewelry

Beryl refers to a valuable gemstone prized in antiquity for its distinctive sea-green or bluish-green hue. In Revelation's vision of the New Jerusalem, beryl appears as one of twelve foundation stones adorning the city walls, symbolizing divine glory and beauty. The word appears consistently across translations (Spanish berilo, German Beryll, French Beryll), reflecting its stable technical meaning as a mineral term that has remained relatively unchanged across languages and millennia.

(1×) A sea-green precious stone listed among the foundation gems of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21:20). The multilingual consistency of translations reflects beryl's status as a recognized gemstone category across cultures, valued for architectural and ornamental purposes in both ancient and modern contexts. GEMSTONES AND TARSHISH

en: beryl | es: berilo; | fr: Beryll | de: Beryll Rev 21:20

βία G0970 N-AFS (4×)

Physical force or violence; coercive power applied against resistance

The noun bía denotes raw physical force or violent compulsion. In classical Greek it ranged from heroic strength to acts of brutality, and the NT uses cluster tightly around the latter — all four occurrences appear in Acts describing tense confrontations. The temple guard restrains themselves from violence when arresting the apostles (Acts 5:26); soldiers must carry Paul through a mob by force (Acts 21:35); and the ship at Malta is broken apart by the violence of the waves (Acts 27:41). Spanish and French both render it 'violencia/violence,' capturing the coercive overtone.

(4×) Bodily force or violent compulsion exerted against persons or things, especially in situations of conflict or crisis. Every NT occurrence is in Acts: the cautious restraint of the temple guard (5:26), soldiers physically carrying Paul through a riotous crowd (21:35), a disputed textual variant in 24:7, and the destructive power of surf smashing a ship (27:41). Spanish 'violencia' and French 'violence' uniformly convey the sense of coercive physical power rather than mere strength. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: force, violence | es: violencia | fr: violence | de: βίαν, βίας Acts 5:26; Acts 21:35; Acts 24:7; Acts 27:41

βιάζω G0971 V-PIM-3S (2×)

to force, to use violence, to suffer violence, to press forward forcefully, to be seized

This verb carries the fundamental meaning of using force or violence, whether actively (to compel, constrain) or passively (to suffer violence, be overpowered). Classical Greek used it for being hard-pressed in battle, forced into slavery, or compelled to act. The New Testament's two occurrences appear in one of Scripture's most debated sayings: Matthew 11:12 declares that 'the kingdom of heaven suffers violence' (or 'has been forcefully advancing'), and Luke 16:16 states that 'everyone is forcing his way into it.' Scholars debate whether this describes violent opposition to the kingdom or forceful entry by eager seekers. The verb's flexibility allows both readings.

(2×) Matthew 11:12 uses the passive form: 'the kingdom of heaven biazetai'—either 'suffers violence' from opponents or 'advances forcefully' in power. Luke 16:16 states 'everyone biazetai into it'—either 'forces their way in' with eager determination or 'tries to force it' through violence. Spanish 'se esfuerza/sufre violencia' and German 'βιάζεται' preserve both active and passive possibilities. The grammatical ambiguity may be intentional: from Jesus's days until now, the kingdom simultaneously faces violent opposition and attracts forceful, determined seekers who press into it despite resistance. COMPEL FORCE

en: forces-way, suffers-violence | es: se-esfuerza, sufre-violencia | fr: forcer | de: βιάζεται Matt 11:12; Luke 16:16

βίαιος G0972 Adj-GFS (1×)

violent, forcible; characterized by intense force or vehemence in action or nature

This adjective describes something marked by intense, forceful energy—often with destructive or overwhelming power. In Acts 2:2, it modifies the sound of the rushing wind at Pentecost, capturing the awe-inspiring force of the Spirit's arrival. Classical usage extends to violent deaths, forceful actions, and persons of aggressive temperament. The translations (Spanish violento, French violent, German keeping the Greek form) preserve the core sense of overwhelming force that characterizes phenomena beyond normal human control.

(1×) Describing the intense, overwhelming force of the Pentecost wind (Acts 2:2). The multilingual evidence (Spanish violento, French violent) confirms this sense of vehement power, though the German retains the Greek form, perhaps acknowledging the unique character of this theophanic manifestation that transcends ordinary meteorological description. POWER AND ABILITY en: violent | es: violento | fr: violent | de: βιαίας Acts 2:2

βῐασ-τής G0973 N-NMP (1×)
violent ones, forceful persons who take by aggression or intense effort
This noun designates people characterized by forceful, aggressive action. In Matthew 11:12, Jesus uses this term in a notoriously difficult saying about the kingdom of heaven suffering violence and violent ones seizing it. The term carries connotations of those who press forward with intense determination, whether understood positively (zealous seekers) or negatively (aggressive opponents). The multilingual translations maintain the violence imagery while leaving interpretive questions open about whether this force is commendable zeal or reprehensible aggression.

(1×) Persons who take forceful action, appearing in Jesus' enigmatic statement about the kingdom (Matt 11:12). The Spanish violentos and French violent preserve the aggressive connotation, while the German retains the Greek form, reflecting the interpretive challenges surrounding whether these are zealous disciples or hostile opponents pressing against God's kingdom. POWER AND ABILITY en: violent-ones | es: violentos | fr: violent | de: βιασταὶ Matt 11:12

βιβλ-αρίδιον G0974 N-ANS (3×)
little scroll, diminutive of 'book,' referring to a small written document or tablet
This diminutive form emphasizes the small size of the scroll or written document. In Revelation, John is instructed by the angel to take and eat a 'little scroll' that tastes sweet as honey in the mouth but turns bitter in the stomach. The diminutive suffix conveys both the physical smallness of the object and possibly suggests intimacy or special significance. Unlike the larger sealed scroll of Revelation 5, this little scroll lies open in the angel's hand, ready to be consumed and internalized.

(3×) All three occurrences appear in Revelation 10:2, 9, 10, describing the scroll that John must prophetically consume. The Spanish 'librito,' French 'petit-livre,' and German 'Buechlein' all preserve the diminutive force of the Greek term. The act of eating the scroll symbolizes the internalization of prophetic revelation, with its mixed experience of sweetness and bitterness reflecting the dual nature of prophetic ministry—joyful in receiving God's word but painful in its message of judgment. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE
en: a-little-scroll, little-scroll | es: librito | fr: petit-livre | de: Buechlein Rev 10:2; Rev 10:9; Rev 10:10

βιβλίον G0975 N-NNP (34×)
book, scroll, written document — a papyrus roll, codex, or register; diminutive of biblos Biblion, the diminutive of biblos ('papyrus'), appears 34 times in the New Testament denoting any formal written document — from a certificate of divorce (Matt 19:7; Mark 10:4) to the prophetic scroll of Isaiah that Jesus unrolled in the Nazareth synagogue (Luke 4:17-20). Its most dramatic occurrences are in Revelation, where the sealed scroll that only the Lamb can open drives the apocalyptic narrative (Rev 5:1-9), and the book of life determines final destiny (Rev 20:12; 21:27). The word bridges the mundane and the cosmic: the same term names a legal divorce paper and the heavenly registry of the redeemed. Cross-linguistic glosses — Spanish 'libro,' French 'livre,' German 'Buch' — converge on a single 'book/document' sense.

book, scroll, written document (34×) A written document in scroll or codex form, ranging from legal certificates to prophetic and apocalyptic texts. Covers the divorce certificate (Matt 19:7; Mark 10:4), Isaiah's scroll read at Nazareth (Luke 4:17), the sealed scroll of Revelation (Rev 5:1-9), and the book of life (Rev 20:12; 21:27). The diminutive of biblos, it spans the mundane and the cosmic. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: a-scroll, book, of-book | es: de-libro, libro | fr: livre | de: Buch Matt 19:7; Mark 10:4; Luke 4:17; Luke 4:20

βιβλίον G0976 N-AFP (10×)
A book, scroll, or written document, especially sacred or authoritative Scripture Denotes a written document in scroll or codex form, typically one bearing sacred or authoritative content. In the Synoptics it refers to the book of Psalms (Luke 20:42; Acts 1:20), the book of Moses (Mark 12:26), and the genealogical record of Jesus (Matt 1:1). Revelation transforms the image into a heavenly scroll sealed with seven seals that only the Lamb may open (Rev 5:1-5). Translations are remarkably uniform: Spanish 'libro,' Hindi 'पुस्तक,' Arabic 'فر/تاب,' Korean '책,' and Swahili 'kitabu/vitabu' (with the classic Bantu ki-/vi- class pair).

Book / scroll (written document) (10×) A written document in scroll or codex form, typically referring to sacred Scripture or an authoritative literary work. Used of the book of Psalms (Luke 20:42; Acts 1:20), the genealogical record (Matt 1:1), the book of the prophet Isaiah (Luke 3:4), and the heavenly scroll sealed with seven seals (Rev 5:1-5). Philippians 4:3 extends it to the metaphorical 'book of life.' The Bantu singular/plural class pair Swahili 'kitabu/vitabu' and Arabic 'فر/تاب' alike confirm one unified sense of authoritative written text. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: Book, book, books | es: Libro, libro, libros | fr: Livre, livre | de: Buch Matt 1:1; Mark 12:26; Luke 3:4; Luke 20:42; Acts 1:20

βιβρώσκω G0977 V-RPA-DMP (1×)
having eaten, in a state of completion after consuming food
This perfect participle describes the completed state of eating, emphasizing the result rather than the act itself. In John 6:13, it appears in the aftermath of the feeding of the five thousand, describing the crowd after they had finished eating the multiplied loaves. The perfect tense highlights that the eating was complete and its effects remained—the people were satisfied. Translations across languages (Spanish que habían comido, French manger, German essen) capture both the action and its resultant state of satiation.

(1×) Describing the state of those who had completed eating at the miraculous feeding (John 6:13). The Spanish construction habían comido uses a pluperfect to emphasize the completed nature, while French and German use infinitive forms in their translations, all pointing to the satisfied condition of the crowd that allowed them to gather twelve baskets of fragments. EATING AND CONSUMING en: having-eaten | es: -que-habían-comido | fr: manger | de: essen John 6:13

Βιθυνία G0978 N-GFS (2×)
Bithynia, a Roman province in northwestern Asia Minor on the Black Sea coast
This proper noun designates Bithynia, a prosperous Roman province occupying the northwestern corner of Asia Minor along the Black Sea. The region had significant Jewish and later Christian populations. In Acts, the Holy Spirit prevents Paul from entering Bithynia during his second missionary journey (Acts 16:7), redirecting him toward Macedonia instead. Yet 1 Peter's opening greets believers scattered throughout Bithynia among other provinces (1 Pet 1:1), showing the gospel eventually reached there. The name appears in genitive form in both occurrences, indicating either destination ('toward Bithynia') or origin ('of Bithynia').

(2×) Acts 16:7 records Paul and his companions attempting to enter Bithynia but being prevented by the Spirit of Jesus, a divine redirection that led to the Macedonian vision and the gospel's entry into Europe. 1 Peter 1:1 addresses elect exiles 'of Bithynia' (among other provinces), confirming that Christianity did establish itself there despite the earlier divine prohibition. Spanish 'Bitinia/de Bitinia', French 'Bithynie', and German 'Bithynien' maintain standard geographical transliteration. The two references show God's sovereignty:

temporarily redirecting mission strategy while ensuring the region eventually received the gospel message. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: Bithynia, of-Bithynia | es: Bithynía, de-Bitinia | fr: Bithynie, Βιθυνίας | de: Bithynien, Βιθυνίαν Acts 16:7; 1Pet 1:1

βίος G0979 N-AMS (10×)

Life or manner of living; livelihood, possessions — earthly existence versus material means of subsistence

Unlike zoe, which in the New Testament typically carries spiritual or eternal connotations, bios is firmly earthly. It divides into two senses that classical Greek already distinguished: life as lived experience and life as material resources. The parable of the sower warns that 'cares and riches and pleasures of life' choke the word (Luke 8:14), while the widow at the temple treasury cast in 'all the livelihood she had' (Mark 12:44; Luke 21:4). Spanish captures both with 'vida' but also uses 'bienes' (goods) and 'sustento' (sustenance) for the material sense, revealing the split that a single translation might obscure.

1. life, manner of living (5×) Life understood as earthly existence, daily experience, or manner of living — not eternal or spiritual life (which is zoe) but the course and quality of one's temporal existence. Jesus warns that thorns represent 'cares of this life' (Luke 8:14), and Paul prays for a 'quiet and peaceable life' (1 Tim 2:2). The woman with the hemorrhage spent her whole 'life' seeking a cure (Luke 8:43). German 'Leben' and French 'vie' both serve this sense without distinguishing it from the material sense below. LIFE AND LIVELIHOOD
en: life, living | es: vida | fr: vie | de: Leben, βίον›, βίου Luke 8:14; Luke 8:43; 1Tim 2:2; 2Tim 2:4; 1John 2:16

2. livelihood, possessions, means of living (5×) Livelihood, material possessions, or means of subsistence — what one has to live on rather than the living itself. The prodigal son squandered his 'livelihood' (Luke 15:12, 30), and the poor widow put in 'all the livelihood she had' (Mark 12:44; Luke 21:4). Spanish differentiates this sense with 'bienes' (goods/possessions) and 'sustento' (sustenance) alongside the general 'vida,' and 1 John 3:17 asks how God's love can dwell in someone who has the world's 'goods' yet shuts his heart against a brother in need. LIFE AND LIVELIHOOD en: livelihood, living | es: bienes, sustento, vida | fr: vie | de: Leben, βίον Mark 12:44; Luke 15:12; Luke 15:30; Luke 21:4; 1John 3:17

βῐόω G0980 V-ANA (1×)

to live, to conduct one's life in a particular manner or sphere

This verb means to live in the full sense of conducting one's existence, not merely biological survival but the manner and quality of life. In 1 Peter 4:2, it appears in an infinitive construction discussing how believers should live the remainder of their earthly time—no longer for human passions but for God's will. Classical usage encompasses everything from simply being alive to living in a particular way or place. The translations (Spanish vivir, German leben) employ the standard verbs for human existence and conduct.

(1×) To conduct one's life, especially with reference to moral and spiritual quality (1 Pet 4:2). The context emphasizes a reoriented way of living after conversion, moving from fleshly desires to divine purposes. The Spanish vivir and German leben both carry this dual sense of biological life and ethical lifestyle, supporting the passage's call to transformation. LIFE AND LIVING
en: to-live | es: vivir | fr: βιῶσαι | de: leben 1Pet 4:2

βίωσις G0981 N-AFS (1×)

manner of life, the characteristic way one conducts oneself over time

This noun denotes one's way of life, the habitual pattern of conduct and behavior that defines a person. In Acts 26:4, Paul refers to his manner of life from youth, his well-known lifestyle as a devout Pharisee. The term emphasizes observable conduct over an extended period, the public face of one's existence. The French manière de vivre captures this perfectly—not just living but the manner of it. Jewish inscriptions use this word with the modifier "virtuous" (enaretos), showing it was a recognized category for evaluating character.

(1×) The characteristic pattern of life and conduct observable over time (Acts 26:4). Paul's usage refers to his publicly known lifestyle as a Pharisee, something witnessed by the Jewish community. The French manière de vivre and Spanish vida both emphasize the distinguishable quality and pattern of his conduct, not merely existence but a recognizable way of being. LIFE AND LIVELIHOOD en: manner-of-life | es: vida | fr: manière-de-vivre | de: βίωσίν Acts 26:4

βῐ-ωτικός G0982 Adj-ANP (3×)

pertaining to ordinary life, everyday concerns and practical matters of living

This adjective describes things belonging to the sphere of daily human existence—the practical, earthly concerns that occupy people's attention. Paul uses it to describe the 'ordinary matters' of life that even secular judges are competent to handle, contrasting them with the weightier spiritual realities believers should be equipped to judge. In Luke, Jesus warns against hearts weighed down by the 'cares of this life.' The term emphasizes the mundane, temporal nature of these concerns, not their intrinsic evil but their capacity to distract from eternal priorities.

(3×) In 1 Corinthians 6:3-4, Paul uses the term twice to describe disputes over 'ordinary matters' or 'things pertaining to this life,' arguing that if believers will judge angels, they should certainly be capable of adjudicating everyday conflicts. Luke 21:34 warns against being consumed by 'the cares of this life.' The multilingual evidence shows consistency: Spanish 'cosas de esta vida,' French 'de cette vie,' German 'des Lebens'—all emphasizing the temporal, earthly sphere as distinct from the eternal. LIFE AND LIVELIHOOD en: of-life, ordinary, ordinary-matters | es: Cosas-de-esta-vida, cosas-de-esta-vida!, de-la-vida | fr: de-cette-vie | de: des-Lebens, βιωτικαῖς Luke 21:34; 1Cor 6:3; 1Cor 6:4

βλᾰβερός G0983 Adj-AFP (1×)

harmful, injurious, causing damage or detriment

This adjective describes that which causes harm or injury, whether physical, moral, or spiritual. In 1 Timothy 6:9, it characterizes the desires that ensnare those who want to be rich—cravings that are both harmful and destructive. Classical usage opposes it to what is beneficial (sympheron, ōphelimon), establishing a clear ethical contrast. The translations (Spanish dañinos, German schaedlich) employ standard terms for what causes damage, while French retains the Greek form, perhaps acknowledging the term's technical ethical force in this warning about wealth's spiritual dangers.

(1×) Causing harm or injury, especially morally and spiritually (1 Tim 6:9). The context pairs this with "destructive" in describing the desires associated with pursuing wealth. The Spanish dañinos and German schaedlich both emphasize active harm-causing, while the ethical dimension is clear from the opposition to "beneficial" in classical usage—these desires don't merely fail to help, they actively damage. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION en: harmful | es: dañinos | fr: βλαβερᾶς | de: schaedlich 1Tim 6:9

βλάπτω G0984 V-ASA-3S (2×)

to harm, to injure, to damage, to hinder, to disable

This verb means to harm, injure, or disable, used in classical Greek for everything from laming horses' feet to hindering someone's plans. The word suggests preventing something from functioning properly or causing damage that impairs normal operation. Both New Testament occurrences involve supernatural contexts where expected harm remarkably does not occur. Mark's longer ending promises believers that drinking deadly poison 'will not harm them' (Mark 16:18), while Luke describes how a demon threw a man down but departed 'without harming him' (Luke 4:35). The verb emphasizes protective preservation—the absence of expected injury.

(2×) Mark 16:18 uses the aorist subjunctive in Jesus's promise that deadly things (including poison) 'will not harm' believers, part of the signs following those who believe. Luke 4:35 describes how the demon, despite violently throwing the man down, departed 'having harmed him not at all' (aorist active participle with negation). Spanish 'dañará/habiendo dañado', French 'nuire', and German 'schaden, βλάψαν' capture this inflicting of damage. Both passages emphasize divine protection: supernatural preservation from poison (Mark) and deliverance without injury despite demonic violence (Luke), showing God's power to prevent harm even in dangerous circumstances. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION

en: and-, having-harmed | es: dañará, habiendo-dañado | fr: nuire | de: schaden, βλάψαν Mark 16:18; Luke 4:35

βλαστάνω G0985 V-PSA-3S (4×)

To sprout, bud, or germinate; to put forth new growth

The verb blastánō describes the budding or sprouting of vegetation — the moment when a seed or branch pushes forth visible new growth. Jesus uses it in two parables: the wheat and tares, where the crop sprouts and bears grain (Matt 13:26), and the seed growing secretly, which sprouts without the farmer's knowledge (Mark 4:27). In Hebrews 9:4, Aaron's rod 'budded' as a miraculous sign of divine appointment. James 5:18 describes the earth yielding its fruit after rain. Spanish 'brotar' and French 'germer' both capture this agricultural imagery of germination.

(4×) To send forth shoots, buds, or sprouts — the visible emergence of new plant growth from seed or branch. Used literally of crops sprouting in Jesus' agricultural parables (Matt 13:26; Mark 4:27), of Aaron's rod miraculously budding as divine validation (Heb 9:4), and of the earth producing fruit after drought ends (Jas 5:18). Spanish 'brotar' (to sprout) and French 'germer' (to germinate) confirm the consistent botanical sense across all occurrences. SPROUTING AND GROWING en: having-budded, sprouted, sprouts | es: brote, brotó, que-brotó | fr: germer | de: sprossen, ἐβλάστησεν Matt 13:26; Mark 4:27; Heb 9:4; Jas 5:18

βλαστός G0986 N-AMS (1×)

Blastus, a personal name; chamberlain of King Herod Agrippa I

Blastus was a chamberlain or personal attendant to King Herod Agrippa I in Caesarea. In Acts 12:20, the people of Tyre and Sidon sought his favor as an intermediary to the king, recognizing his influence in the royal household. While the name derives from the Greek word for "shoot" or "sprout," in this context it functions purely as a personal name. The multilingual translations uniformly transliterate the name (Spanish Blástos, French Blaste, German Blastus), with some adding prepositions indicating direction toward him as the object of the diplomatic approach.

(1×) Personal name of Herod Agrippa's chamberlain (Acts 12:20). As a royal official with access to the king, Blastus held a position of influence that made him valuable for those seeking the monarch's favor. The Greek root meaning "shoot" or "bud" appears coincidental to his role, though such names were common. All translations preserve the name in recognizable form. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11579 WITH 3 SENSES

en: Blastos | es: a-Blástos | fr: Blaste | de: Βλάστον – Acts 12:20

βλασφημ-έω G0987 V-PIM/P-1S (35×)

To blaspheme, speak irreverently against God; to slander or revile; passive: to be spoken against

The verb βλασφημέω covers the entire range of injurious speech from the human to the divine. In its primary New Testament usage, it describes speaking against God or sacred things with contempt — the charge leveled at Jesus when he forgave sins (Mark 2:7) and at the crowd mocking him on the cross (Matt 27:39). Paul warns that poor conduct among believers causes God's name to 'be blasphemed among the Gentiles' (Rom 2:24), showing the passive dimension. James 2:7 extends the word to slandering the 'noble name' invoked over believers, revealing a horizontal, person-directed use alongside the dominant vertical one.

1. blaspheme, speak irreverently (26×) Active blasphemy against God or sacred things — speaking with contempt, defiance, or irreverence toward the divine. This is the dominant sense, covering 26 of 35 occurrences. The Pharisees accuse Jesus of blasphemy at Matt 9:3 and Matt 26:65; passersby blaspheme at the cross (Matt 27:39); and Jesus teaches that blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven (Mark 3:28-29). Spanish 'blasfema,' French 'blasphèment,' and German 'lästern' uniformly render this theological sense. BLASPHEMY AND SLANDER

en: You-blaspheme, blaspheme, blasphemed | es: Blasfema, Blasfemas, blasfema | fr: blasphèment., blasphèment;, blasphémer | de: laestern, lästern, lästern-sie Matt 9:3; Matt 26:65; Matt 27:39; Mark 2:7; Mark 3:28

2. be blasphemed, be spoken against (8×) The passive and middle-passive voice: to be blasphemed, to be spoken evil of, to have one's reputation maligned. Paul quotes Isaiah in Romans 2:24 — God's name 'is blasphemed among the Gentiles because of you.' At 1 Timothy 6:1 the concern is that 'the name of God and the teaching may not be blasphemed.' The passive construction shifts the subject from the speaker to the one defamed, a distinction clearly marked in all target languages by passive verb forms. BLASPHEMY AND SLANDER

en: am-I-spoken-evil-of, be-blasphemed, is-blasphemed | es: es-blasfemado, sea-blasfemada, sea-blasfemado | fr: blasphémer | de: laestern Rom 2:24; Rom 3:8; Rom 14:16; 1Cor 10:30; 1Tim 6:1

3. revile, slander a person (1×) Reviling or slandering a person rather than God — using βλασφημέω with a human object. James 2:7 asks, 'Do they not blaspheme the noble name by which you were called?' Here the 'noble name' may bridge divine and human reference, but the direct object is not God himself but the honorable name borne by believers. This interpersonal slander sense connects to the classical Greek usage documented by LSJ, where βλασφημέω meant 'to speak ill of someone.' BLASPHEMY AND SLANDER

en: blaspheme | es: blasfeman | fr: blasphémer | de: laestern Jas 2:7

βλασφημ-ία G0988 N-AFP (18×)

Blasphemy, slander — profane or reviling speech, especially against God

Denotes speech that profanes the divine name or defames another's reputation. Jesus teaches that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is the one unforgivable sin (Matt 12:31; Mark 3:28-29), setting this word at the heart of a grave theological warning. The high priest tears his robes at what he calls Jesus' blasphemy (Matt 26:65; Mark 14:64). Paul lists it among vices to be put away (Eph 4:31; Col 3:8). In Revelation it characterizes the beast's arrogant speech against God (Rev 13:1, 5-6). Arabic 'tajdif,' German 'Lästerung,' and Spanish 'blasfemia' all preserve the sense of sacrilegious reviling.

blasphemy, reviling speech against God (18×) Speech that profanes, reviles, or slanders — directed either against God (blasphemy proper) or against human beings (defamation, reviling). Jesus' teaching on the unforgivable sin against the Holy Spirit (Matt 12:31; Mark 3:28-29) gives this term its sharpest theological edge. It also appears in the high priest's charge at Jesus' trial (Matt 26:65), in vice lists urging believers to put away abusive speech (Eph 4:31; Col 3:8), and as characteristic of the beast's defiance in Revelation (Rev 13:1, 5-6). BLASPHEMY AND SLANDER

en: blasphemies, blasphemy, of-blasphemy | es: blasfemia, blasfemias, de-blasfemia | fr: blasphème, de-blasphème, | de: Laesterung, der-Lästerung, βλασφημία Matt 12:31; Matt 15:19; Matt 26:65; Mark 3:28

βλάσφημ-ος G0989 Adj-AMS (4×)

Blasphemous, slanderous; one who speaks abusively against God or others

The adjective blásphēmos describes speech that is injurious, slanderous, or sacrilegious — directed either against God or against human beings. It can function as a substantive meaning 'a blasphemer.' Paul confesses he was formerly a blasphemer (1 Tim 1:13), while the accusers of Stephen suborn witnesses to bring 'blasphemous words' against him (Acts 6:11). In the vice list of 2 Timothy 3:2, it appears among traits of the godless in the last days. Second Peter 2:11 contrasts angelic restraint with those who utter blasphemous judgments. Spanish 'blasfemo/blasfemos' and French 'blasphémateur' reflect both the adjectival and substantive uses.

(4×) Speaking injuriously or sacrilegiously, whether against God (blasphemous) or against persons (slanderous); also used as a substantive for one who utters such speech. The range spans personal confession of former blasphemy (1 Tim 1:13), false accusation via fabricated blasphemous testimony (Acts 6:11), a character trait of the last days (2 Tim 3:2), and reckless speech that even angels avoid (2 Pet 2:11). Spanish 'blasfemo' and French 'blasphémateur' confirm the dual adjectival-substantival function. BLASPHEMY AND SLANDER

en: a-blasphemer, blasphemers, blasphemous | es: blasfemas, blasfemo, blasfemos | fr: blasphémateur, βλάσφημοι, βλάσφημον | de: laesterlich, βλάσφημα Acts 6:11; 1Tim 1:13; 2Tim 3:2; 2Pet 2:11

βλέμμα G0990 N-DNS (1×)

sight, look; the act of seeing or a glance

This noun denotes the act of looking or seeing, a glance or gaze. In 2 Peter 2:8, righteous Lot is described as tormenting his soul day after day by what he saw—the lawless deeds of Sodom. The word emphasizes the visual experience itself, the act of witnessing that brought Lot such distress. Classical usage includes both quick glances and the faculty of eyesight itself. The translations vary: Spanish con mirada ("with look"), German Blick ("glance"), and French retaining the Greek, all pointing to the visual encounter that grieved the righteous man's conscience.

(1×) The act of seeing or witnessing, particularly as it affects the observer (2 Pet 2:8). Lot's torment came through what he saw daily in Sodom—the visual experience of wickedness became a source of righteous suffering. The Spanish con mirada emphasizes the look itself, while German Blick captures the glance or gaze that conveyed the moral horror to Lot's soul. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: by-sight | es: con-mirada | fr: βλέμματι | de: Blick 2Pet 2:8

βλέπω G0991 V-PPA-NMS (133×)

To see, look at, perceive visually; also to beware, watch out for, or direct one's gaze with attention.

Blepo is the everyday Greek word for physical sight — seeing what is before one's eyes. Unlike horao, which often implies perception or inner awareness, blepo stays close to the act of looking itself. In the Gospels it describes both Jesus's healings of the blind (Matt 12:22) and his warnings to 'beware' of the Pharisees' leaven (Mark 8:15). Paul gives it theological depth in 2 Cor 4:18, contrasting 'things that are seen' with the unseen and eternal. The range from simple sight to vigilant watchfulness makes it a word of both physical and spiritual attentiveness.

1. see, perceive visually (74×) The basic sense of physical sight, covering 74 occurrences. Matt 13:13-14 quotes Isaiah's paradox: 'seeing they do not see.' Translations uniformly use 'see/ve/voir/sehen.' This is the unmarked default — the eyes functioning as they should, whether the object is a speck in a brother's eye (Matt 7:3) or the works of Christ (Matt 11:4). SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: does-he-see, he-sees, seeing | es: ve, viendo | fr: regarder, voir | de: sehen, sieht Matt 7:3; Matt 11:4; Matt 13:13; Matt 13:14

2. beware, watch out for (17×) Imperative warning: 'beware, watch out for,' found 17 times. Mark 8:15 warns against the leaven of the Pharisees; Mark 13:5,9 caution against deception and persecution. Arabic iḥdharū (احذروا), Korean josimhara (조심하라), and Swahili jihadharini all shift from 'see' to 'be on guard,' showing translators recognize a distinct cautionary speech act. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: Beware, Watch-out, beware | es: Guardaos, Mirad, guardaos | fr: regarder, voir | de: sehen, sieht Matt 24:4; Mark 8:15; Mark 12:38; Mark 13:5; Mark 13:9

3. look at, direct one's gaze (17×) Intentional looking: 'look at, direct one's gaze,' with 17 occurrences. Matt 5:28 warns about looking at a woman lustfully; Matt 22:16 says Jesus does not 'look at' (i.e., show partiality toward) appearances. Spanish 'mirando' and Swahili 'tazama' distinguish this focused gaze from passive seeing, emphasizing deliberate visual attention. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: looking, seeing, to-look-at | es: a-ver, mirando, mirarlo | fr: regarder, voir | de: sehen, sieht Matt 5:28; Matt 12:22; Matt 22:16; Mark 12:14; Luke 7:21

4. look! see! (imperative directive) (12×) Imperative directive without warning: 'look! see! pay attention!' Twelve occurrences direct attention to something being pointed out. Mark 4:24 says 'take heed what you hear'; 1 Cor 1:26 invites the Corinthians to 'see' their calling. The force is pedagogical rather than cautionary — 'observe this' rather than 'beware of that.' SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: See, Take-heed, Watch | es: Mira, Mirad, mirad | fr: regarder, voir | de: sehen, sieht Mark 4:24; Luke 21:8; Acts 3:4; 1Cor 1:26; 1Cor 8:9

5. be visible, be seen (8×) Middle/passive: 'be visible, be seen,' covering 8 occurrences. Paul's key theological contrast in 2 Cor 4:18 — ta blepomena vs. ta me blepomena (things seen vs. unseen) — drives this sense. Spanish 'cosas que se ven' and the participial construction confirm a stative or passive meaning: what presents itself to sight. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: being-seen | es: cosas-que-se-ven, que-se-ve, que-se-ven | fr: regarder, voir | de: sehen Rom 8:24; 2Cor 4:18

6. were looking, gazing intently (3×) Sustained gazing in imperfect tense: 'were looking, gazing intently,' with 3 occurrences. Mark 5:31 asks who touched Jesus while the crowd 'was looking'; John 13:22 has the disciples 'looking at one another' in confusion. The imperfect aspect captures ongoing, intent visual engagement rather than a momentary glance. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: You-see, were-looking | es: Miraban, Ves | fr: voir | de: sehen Mark 5:31; Mark 13:2; John 13:22

7. see, experience (future/prophetic) (2×) Future/prophetic seeing: 'you will see,' appearing twice (Matt 13:14; Acts 28:26), both quoting Isa 6:9. This frames blepo as experiencing or witnessing what God has declared. Spanish 'veréis' and German 'sieht' render the future tense straightforwardly, but the Isaiah quotation gives it an ironic edge: seeing without understanding. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: you-will-see | es: veréis | fr: regarder, voir | de: sieht Matt 13:14; Acts 28:26

βλητ-έον G0992 Adj-NNS (1×)

must be put, verbal adjective expressing necessity of placement

This verbal adjective expresses necessity or obligation—specifically, that something must be put or placed. In Luke 5:38, Jesus uses it in teaching about new wine: it must be put into fresh wineskins. The form conveys divine necessity or natural law rather than mere human preference. The translations handle this modal requirement differently: Spanish debe echarse ("must be poured"), French il faut mettre ("it is necessary to put"), German and Spanish both capturing the obligatory nature of this principle about incompatibility between new wine and old containers.

(1×) Expressing the necessity of placing new wine into fresh wineskins (Luke 5:38). The verbal adjective form emphasizes that this is not optional but required by the nature of fermentation—old wineskins cannot withstand new wine's expansion. The multilingual evidence (Spanish debe, French il faut) uniformly renders this as strong obligation, supporting Jesus' point about the incompatibility of new covenant realities with old covenant forms. THROWING AND CASTING

en: must-be-put | es: debe-echarse | fr: il-faut-mettre | de: βλητέον Luke 5:38

Βοανηργές G0993 N-AMP (1×)

Boanerges, an Aramaic surname meaning "sons of thunder" given to James and John Boanerges is an Aramaic nickname Jesus gave to the brothers James and John, meaning "sons of thunder." Mark 3:17 explicitly provides this etymology, suggesting it characterized their temperament—perhaps their zealous, passionate nature or their powerful preaching. The name appears only once in the New Testament, preserved in transliteration across all languages (Spanish Boanergés, French Boanergès, German Boanerges). The "thunder" imagery may relate to their occasional impulsiveness (wanting to call down fire, Mark 9:38; Luke 9:54) or their destined role as powerful witnesses.

(1×) Aramaic surname given to James and John by Jesus (Mark 3:17), meaning "sons of thunder." The name likely reflects their temperament or prophetic calling. All translations preserve the Aramaic transliteration, recognizing it as a dominical nickname that characterizes these apostles' distinctive character—whether their fiery zeal, powerful ministry, or both. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Boanerges | es: Boanērgés | fr: Boanergès | de: Boanerges Mark 3:17

βοάω G0994 V-PPA-GMS (12×)

Cry out, shout aloud — to raise one's voice in urgent proclamation, distress, or prophetic declaration

The verb boaō denotes crying out with a loud, urgent voice — whether in prophetic proclamation, desperate appeal, or ecstatic praise. Its most famous occurrence is the 'voice crying in the wilderness' (Matt 3:3; Mark 1:3; Luke 3:4; John 1:23), quoting Isaiah 40:3 and identifying John the Baptist's ministry. Beyond this programmatic text, boaō appears in cries of distress and supplication, as when a father pleads for his demonized son (Luke 9:38), Jesus shouts from the cross (Mark 15:34), and the wages of defrauded laborers 'cry out' to the Lord of hosts (Jas 5:4). Spanish 'clamar' and French 'crier' both convey the forcefulness of the utterance.

cry out, shout aloud (12×) To cry out with a loud, carrying voice in prophetic proclamation or urgent public address. Anchored in the Isaiah 40:3 quotation applied to John the Baptist: 'A voice crying in the wilderness: Prepare the way of the Lord' (Matt 3:3; Mark 1:3; Luke 3:4; John 1:23). Also used of Jesus crying out in authoritative teaching (John 7:28, 37). Spanish 'clamando' and German 'rufen' capture the resonant, public character of this speech act. CALLING AND NAMING en: cried-out, cry-out, crying-out | es: clamando, clamó, de-uno-clamando | fr: crier | de: rufen, schreit Matt 3:3; Mark 1:3; Mark 15:34; Luke 3:4; Luke 9:38

βοή G0995 N-NFP (1×)

loud cries, shouts; vehement vocal expressions of strong emotion

This noun (plural form) denotes loud cries or shouts, particularly those arising from intense emotion or urgent need. In James 5:4, the cries of defrauded field workers have reached God's ears—their vocal protests against injustice ascending to the Lord of hosts. Classical usage encompasses battle cries, mourning wails, joyful songs, and the roar of natural phenomena like the sea. The translations (Spanish clamores, French keeping the Greek, German Geschrei) all emphasize the loud, emotionally charged nature of these vocalizations that pierce through to divine attention.

(1×) Loud cries of protest or distress, especially from the oppressed (Jas 5:4). The unpaid laborers' shouts represent not mere complaint but desperate outcry for justice that reaches God as judge. The Spanish clamores and German Geschrei both capture the loud, urgent character of these cries, while classical usage shows the word could denote any emotionally intense vocalization—here, specifically, the voice of economic injustice. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: cries | es: clamores | fr: βοαὶ | de: Geschrei Jas 5:4

βοήθ-εια G0996 N-DFP (2×)

help, aid, assistance, support, relief, auxiliary forces

This noun denotes help or assistance, with classical usage ranging from medical aid to military auxiliary forces. The word emphasizes practical support that addresses specific needs or dangers. In Acts, sailors use 'helps' (likely ropes or cables) to undergird their storm-tossed ship (Acts 27:17), while Hebrews encourages believers to approach God's throne to 'receive mercy and find grace to help in time of need' (Heb 4:16). The two contexts show the word's range: physical/technical assistance in maritime crisis and spiritual/divine aid for life's challenges. Both emphasize timely, appropriate help meeting urgent necessity.

(2×) Acts 27:17 describes sailors using 'helps' (boētheiais)—most likely cables or ropes—to secure their ship during the storm that would eventually shipwreck Paul on Malta. This technical nautical term shows practical emergency measures. Hebrews 4:16 promises believers will 'find grace for timely help,' using the same root to describe divine assistance available at God's throne. Spanish 'ayudas/socorro', French 'aide/Hilfe', and German 'Hilfe/βοηθείαις' consistently translate this as help or aid. Both passages emphasize help that comes exactly when needed: emergency maritime support (Acts) and grace perfectly timed for our moments of need (Hebrews). HELP AND ASSISTANCE

en: help, with-helps | es: ayudas, socorro | fr: Hilfe, aide | de: Hilfe, βοηθείαις Acts 27:17; Heb 4:16

βοηθ-έω G0997 V-AIA-1S (8×)

To help, come to the aid of, rescue; literally 'to run at a cry for help.'

A vivid compound from βοή (cry, shout) and θέω (run), painting the picture of someone rushing to help when they hear a cry of distress. In the Gospels, it appears in desperate pleas: the Syrophoenician woman crying 'Lord, help me!' (Matt 15:25), and the father of the demon-possessed boy begging 'help us!' and then 'help my unbelief!' (Mark 9:22, 24). In Acts, it surfaces in both a visionary summons — 'Come over to Macedonia and help us' (Acts 16:9) — and a violent mob scene (Acts 21:28). The multilingual glosses are remarkably consistent: Spanish 'ayudar,' French 'aider/secourir,' German 'helfen,' Arabic 'أعان,' all centering on urgent assistance.

help, come to aid (8×) To come to the aid of someone in need, to help or rescue. The compound etymology (βοή 'cry' + θέω 'run') vividly conveys rushing to someone's cry for help. It appears in healing pleas — the Canaanite woman's urgent 'help me!' (Matt 15:25) and the father's 'help my unbelief!' (Mark 9:24) — as well as in the Macedonian call vision (Acts 16:9) and Hebrews' encouragement to approach the throne of grace for timely help (Heb 4:16). Spanish 'ayudar,' French 'secourir,' and German 'helfen' consistently reflect the immediacy and urgency of the aid rendered. HELP AND ASSISTANCE

en: I-helped, help, helped | es: ayuda, ayudad, ayudó | fr: aider, secourir | de: helfen, βοήθει, βοήθησον Matt 15:25; Mark 9:22; Mark 9:24; Acts 16:9; Acts 21:28

βοηθ-όος G0998 N-NMS (1×)

helper, one who comes to aid in response to a cry for help

This noun designates one who helps or comes to assistance, originally conveying the sense of hastening to a battle cry or call for help. In Hebrews 13:6, the Psalmist's confidence is quoted: "The Lord is my helper"—God as the one who responds to human need. The classical etymology suggests rushing to aid (from boē, "cry" and theō, "run"), though in later usage it simply means helper or assistant. The translations uniformly render it as helper (Spanish ayudador, French/German Helfer), emphasizing God's role as the reliable respondent to those who call upon Him.

(1×) One who comes to help, particularly God as the responder to human need (Heb 13:6). The quotation from Psalm 118 asserts divine assistance as the basis for fearless confidence. The consistent translations (Spanish ayudador, German/French Helfer) all point to active assistance, with the classical etymology suggesting swift response to cries for help—appropriate for a God who is "a very present help in trouble." HELPER ALLY

en: helper | es: ayudador | fr: Helfer | de: Helfer Heb 13:6

βόθυν-ος G0999 N-AMS (3×)

pit, hole, or ditch, often used metaphorically for danger or spiritual blindness

A pit or hole in the ground, potentially natural or man-made. In Jesus' teaching, the image becomes proverbial: a shepherd retrieving his sheep that has fallen into a pit on the Sabbath, or the warning that if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into a pit. The term evokes danger, entrapment, and the need for rescue. The pit serves as a vivid metaphor for spiritual peril—particularly the danger of following false or incompetent guides who cannot see the danger ahead.

(3×) Matthew 12:11 uses the pit in a Sabbath controversy about rescuing a fallen sheep. Matthew 15:14 and Luke 6:39 employ identical proverbial warnings about blind guides leading the blind until both fall into a pit. The universal recognition of this danger translates consistently across languages—English 'pit,' Spanish 'hoyo,' French 'fosse,' German preserving the Greek term—all evoking the same image of a hazardous opening in the ground that threatens the unwary. PITS AND DUNGEONS

en: a-pit | es: hoyo | fr: fosse | de: βόθυνον Matt 12:11; Matt 15:14; Luke 6:39

βολή G1000 N-AFS (1×)

a throw, the distance of a stone's throw

This noun primarily means a throw or cast, especially of a missile or stone. In Luke 22:41, Jesus withdrew from the disciples "about a stone's throw" away in Gethsemane—a distance measurement based on how far one could hurl a stone. Classical usage includes dice throws, javelin casts, and metaphorically, quick glances or sunbeams. The translations handle this idiomatically: Spanish tiro ("throw"), French jet ("cast"), German retaining the Greek, all recognizing it as a unit of distance rather than an action of throwing in this context.

(1×) A stone's throw as a measure of distance (Luke 22:41). Jesus' withdrawal this short distance from the disciples suggests He sought solitude for prayer while remaining close enough for them to wait. The Spanish tiro and French jet both refer to throwing distance, a common ancient measurement method. This preserves both auditory distance (He could still be heard) and visual separation (sufficient privacy for His agony). THROWING AND CASTING

en: throw | es: tiro | fr: jet | de: βολήν Luke 22:41

βολίζω G1001 V-APA-NMP (2×)

to heave the lead, to take soundings, to measure water depth with a weighted line

This specialized nautical verb means to take soundings by heaving the lead—dropping a weighted line to measure water depth. Ancient sailors used this technique when approaching shore or navigating dangerous waters to avoid running aground. Both New Testament occurrences appear in the same dramatic scene: Paul's shipwreck voyage to Rome. As the ship drifts toward the rocky coast of Malta in darkness, the sailors repeatedly take soundings to monitor their approach to land. The verb captures a crucial maritime survival skill, showing how sailors combined technical knowledge with desperate hope during the storm described in Acts 27.

(2×) Acts 27:28 twice uses the aorist active participle 'having taken soundings' to describe the sailors' repeated depth measurements as they drifted toward Malta's coast. First they found twenty fathoms, then after a little while fifteen fathoms—showing their dangerous approach to shore in darkness. The technical precision of the account (exact depth measurements) adds authenticity to Luke's narrative. Spanish 'habiendo sondeado', French 'sonder', and German 'βολίσαντες' all maintain this nautical technical meaning. The repetition in the same verse emphasizes the anxiety of that night: each sounding brought them closer to potential shipwreck, driving their decision to drop anchors and wait for daylight. JUDICIAL EXAMINATION

en: having-taken-soundings | es: habiendo-sondeado | fr: sonder | de: βολίσαντες Acts 27:28

βολίς G1002

missile, javelin; sounding-lead; lightning flash; cast of dice

A feminine noun with several distinct but related meanings, all involving objects that are cast or thrown. Most basically, it denotes a missile or javelin—a weapon hurled at an enemy. Nautically, it refers to the sounding-lead, the weighted line thrown overboard to measure water depth. In meteorological contexts, it describes flashes or bolts of lightning that are 'cast' from the sky. A later usage applies it to dice—specifically the cast or throw of dice, and then to the dice themselves as objects that are cast.

Βοός G1003 N-AMS (3×)

Boaz, wealthy landowner from Bethlehem, kinsman-redeemer of Ruth, ancestor of David and Jesus

Boaz is the prominent Bethlehemite who appears in the book of Ruth as the kinsman-redeemer who marries Ruth the Moabitess. His name appears in two Gospel genealogies tracing Jesus' lineage through the house of David. The account in Ruth portrays Boaz as a man of wealth, integrity, and covenant faithfulness who honors both the law of redemption and the dignity of a foreign widow. His marriage to Ruth makes him great-grandfather to David and places him in the messianic line.

(3×) The name appears twice in Matthew 1:5 (as father and son in the genealogy) and once in Luke 3:32. The Hebrew name בֹּעַז likely means 'in him is strength.' The multilingual glosses show minor orthographic variation in transliterating the name—Greek preserves two forms (Βοός, Βοές), while modern translations standardize to Boaz. His inclusion in the genealogy through Ruth highlights God's inclusion of Gentiles in the messianic lineage. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Boes, Boos | es: Boós, Bóes | fr: Boaz | de: Boas Matt 1:5; Luke 3:32

βόρβορος G1004 N-GMS (1×)

mud, mire; filth or foul matter

This noun denotes mud or mire, the thick, wet earth that soils and entraps. In 2 Peter 2:22, it appears in a proverb about a washed pig returning to wallow in the mud—illustrating apostates who return to their former defilement after experiencing cleansing. Classical usage extends to sewers and metaphorically to foul verbal abuse. The translations (Spanish lodo, German Kot, French retaining the Greek) all emphasize the filthy, polluting nature of this substance, fitting the passage's vivid imagery of regression to moral contamination.

(1×) Mud or mire representing moral defilement (2 Pet 2:22). The pig wallowing in mud illustrates the tragic return to sin after apparent purification. The Spanish lodo and German Kot both emphasize wet, sticky filth that soils whatever touches it. The image works because mud is the pig's natural element despite washing—paralleling false teachers who return to their native moral pollution despite temporary reformation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: in-mud | es: de-lodo | fr: βορβόρου | de: Kot 2Pet 2:22

βορρᾶς G1005 N-GMS (2×)

north, the north wind, the northern direction or region

This noun refers to the north, specifically the north wind (Boreas personified in classical mythology) or the northern direction. In Attic Greek it appears as a contracted form of Boreas, the personified North wind. The New Testament uses it geographically for the cardinal direction north. Jesus speaks of people coming 'from east and west, and north and south' to recline at the feast in God's kingdom (Luke 13:29), while Revelation describes the New Jerusalem's architecture with gates on each side including 'three gates on the north' (Rev 21:13). Both uses emphasize completeness and universal scope.

(2×) Luke 13:29 includes 'north' in Jesus's fourfold directional list (east, west, north, south) describing the universal gathering of the saved from all corners of the earth to Abraham's table. Revelation 21:13 specifies the New Jerusalem's northern gates in its complete architectural description. Spanish 'norte', French 'nord', and German 'Norden' provide straightforward directional terms. Both passages use 'north' as part of a comprehensive geographical picture: the kingdom's universal inclusion (Luke) and the heavenly city's perfect symmetry with access from every direction (Revelation), showing God's welcome extends to all points of the compass. NORTH DIRECTION

en: north | es: norte, norte, | fr: nord | de: Barnabas, Norden Luke 13:29; Rev 21:13

βόσκω G1006 V-PNA (9×)

To feed or tend livestock (said of the herdsman); in middle/passive, to graze or be feeding (said of the animals).

A pastoral word rooted in the ancient world of herding and animal care. In the active voice, it describes the work of the herdsman — tending and feeding the flock or herd. The swineherds were 'feeding' pigs when the Gadarene demoniac episode unfolded (Matt 8:33; Mark 5:14; Luke 8:34), and Jesus commissions Peter to 'feed my lambs' (John 21:15), lifting the word into the realm of spiritual shepherding. Spanish apacentar and German weiden perfectly capture this pastoral care. In the middle or passive voice, the perspective shifts to the animals themselves: pigs were 'grazing' on the hillside (Matt 8:30; Mark 5:11; Luke 8:32), contentedly feeding before the dramatic encounter.

1. feed, tend (active: of the herdsman) (6×) To feed or tend as a herdsman — the active work of caring for animals or, metaphorically, people entrusted to one's care. Swineherds were feeding (βόσκοντες) pigs near the Sea of Galilee (Matt 8:33; Mark 5:14; Luke 8:34), and the prodigal son was sent to feed (βόσκειν) pigs in a far country (Luke 15:15). Jesus' command to Peter, 'Feed (βόσκε) my lambs' (John 21:15), elevates the term from literal animal husbandry to spiritual shepherding. Spanish apacentar, French paître, and German weiden all preserve the pastoral imagery. SHEPHERDING AND TENDING

en: feed, feeding, ones-feeding | es: Apacienta, a-apacentar, pastoreando | fr: paître | de: weiden, βόσκειν, βόσκοντες Matt 8:33; Mark 5:14; Luke 8:34; Luke 15:15; John 21:15

2. feed, graze (middle/passive: of the animals) (3×) To graze or be feeding — said of the animals themselves in the middle or passive voice, describing livestock eating in a field or on a hillside. A large herd of pigs was feeding (βοσκομένη) on the mountain when the demons begged to enter them (Matt 8:30; Mark 5:11; Luke 8:32). The shift from active (herdsman feeds) to middle/passive (animals feed themselves) is a natural voice distinction that Spanish captures with the reflexive alimentándose ('feeding themselves') and paciendo ('grazing'). SHEPHERDING AND TENDING

en: feeding | es: alimentándose, paciendo | fr: paître | de: weiden, βοσκομένη Matt 8:30; Mark 5:11; Luke 8:32

Βοσόρ G1007 N-GMS (1×)

Bosor, variant spelling of Beor, father of the prophet Balaam Bosor is a textual variant of Beor, the father of Balaam the prophet. In 2 Peter 2:15, Balaam son of Bosor serves as a negative example of one who loved the wages of unrighteousness. The name appears in the Hebrew text as Beor, and most manuscripts read Beor here as well, making Bosor a spelling variant. The multilingual translations preserve the name (Spanish Bosór, French/German Bosor), recognizing it as referring to the same Old Testament figure whose son became infamous for prophesying for profit.

(1×) Father of Balaam the prophet (2 Pet 2:15), appearing as a variant of the more common Beor. The reference to Balaam serves as a warning against false teachers motivated by financial gain. All translations preserve this as a proper name, with the genitive form indicating Balaam's paternity, linking the New Testament warning to the Old Testament narrative of prophetic compromise for reward. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: of-Bosor | es: de-Bosór | fr: Βοσὸρ | de: Bosor 2Pet 2:15

βοτάνη G1008 N-AFS (1×)

vegetation, plants; herbs growing from the earth

This noun denotes vegetation, plants, or herbs—particularly those useful for food or fodder. In Hebrews 6:7, earth that drinks rain and produces vegetation useful to those who cultivate it receives divine blessing. The term originally meant pasture or fodder but expanded to include herbs and plants generally. Classical usage encompasses everything from weeds to medicinal herbs. The translations vary: Spanish hierba ("grass/herb"), French végétation ("vegetation"), German Gewächs ("growth"), all pointing to plant life as the beneficial product of rain-soaked soil responding to cultivation.

(1×) Useful vegetation produced by well-watered earth (Heb 6:7). The passage uses agricultural imagery to illustrate spiritual receptivity—land that responds to rain with beneficial plants parallels believers who respond to God's grace with fruitful works. The Spanish hierba and French végétation both emphasize living plant growth, while German Gewächs stresses what grows or is cultivated, all supporting the analogy of productive spiritual response. GRASS AND VEGETATION en: vegetation | es: hierba | fr: végétation | de: Gewaechs Heb 6:7

βότρυς G1009 N-AMP (1×)

clusters of grapes, bunches of fruit from the vine

This noun (plural form) refers to clusters or bunches of grapes hanging from the vine. In Revelation 14:18, an angel gathers the clusters of earth's vine for judgment—a harvest metaphor for divine wrath. The singular form means a single bunch; classical usage occasionally extends to cluster-shaped earrings or the Pleiades star cluster. The translations consistently render this as grape clusters (Spanish racimos, German Trauben, French keeping the Greek), maintaining the viticultural imagery essential to Revelation's judgment scene where earth's vintage faces the winepress of God's fury.

(1×) Grape clusters representing humanity ripe for judgment (Rev 14:18). The angel's harvest of earth's vine clusters for the great winepress develops Old Testament imagery of God treading the winepress of wrath. The Spanish racimos and German Trauben both denote bunches of grapes, emphasizing the fullness and maturity of the harvest—judgment comes when the clusters are fully ripe in wickedness. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: clusters | es: racimos | fr: Trauben | de: Trauben Rev 14:18

βουλ-ευτής G1010 N-NMS (2×)

councilor, council member, senator, one who serves on a governing council

This noun designates a member of a council or deliberative body, derived from the verb meaning to deliberate or plan. Classical Greek used it for senators and members of various civic councils. In the New Testament, it specifically refers to members of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council. Both occurrences describe Joseph of Arimathea, identified as 'a councilor' or 'council member' (Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50). This office placed Joseph among Jerusalem's religious and political elite, making his bold request for Jesus's body and his discipleship particularly significant. The word emphasizes his official status and the courage required to publicly identify with the crucified Jesus.

(2×) Mark 15:43 and Luke 23:50 both identify Joseph of Arimathea as 'a councilor' (bouleutēs), meaning a member of the Sanhedrin that had condemned Jesus. Luke adds that he was 'a good and righteous man' who had not consented to their decision. Spanish 'consejero/miembro del concejo', French 'conseiller', and German 'Ratsherr' all convey membership in an official deliberative body. The term highlights the risk Joseph took: as a council member, he defied his colleagues' decision and publicly honored Jesus by providing a tomb, using his official position to serve the one his council had rejected. COUNSEL AND DELIBERATION en: a-councilor, council-member | es: consejero, miembro-del-concejo | fr: conseiller | de: Ratsherr, βουλευτὴς Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50

βουλ-εύω G1011 V-PIM/P-1S (6×)

To deliberate, take counsel, plan; to resolve upon a course of action after careful thought.

A verb of deliberation and purposeful decision-making: to weigh options, consult with oneself or others, and arrive at a plan of action. The middle voice (bouleuomai), which predominates in the New Testament, emphasizes personal deliberation rather than external advising. Luke 14:31 pictures a king who 'sits down first and deliberates' whether he can meet an opposing army—a parable about counting the cost of discipleship. The Sanhedrin 'plotted' to kill Lazarus as well as Jesus (John 11:53; 12:10). Paul uses it to defend his sincerity: 'When I planned this, did I do it lightly?' (2 Cor 1:17). Spanish 'deliberar' and French 'délibérer' both preserve the Latin root for careful weighing of counsel.

deliberate, take counsel, plan (6×) To deliberate, take counsel, or resolve upon a course of action after weighing options. The middle voice underscores personal, purposeful decision-making. A king sits down to deliberate before marching to war (Luke 14:31), modeling thoughtful assessment. The Jewish council resolved to kill both Jesus (John 11:53) and Lazarus (John 12:10), showing deliberation leading to a sinister verdict. Paul appeals to the concept when asking whether he made his travel plans lightly (2 Cor 1:17). Spanish 'deliberar,' French 'délibérer,' and German 'beschliessen' all converge on purposeful, reasoned planning. COUNSEL AND DELIBERATION en: I-plan, do-I-plan, plotted | es: Deliberaron, deliberaron, deliberará | fr: délibérer | de: beschliessen, βουλεύσεται, ἐβουλεύοντο Luke 14:31; John 11:53; John 12:10; Acts 27:39; 2Cor 1:17

βουλή G1012 N-GFS (12×)

Counsel, purpose, plan — a deliberated intention or resolution, whether divine decree or human decision

The noun boulē denotes a deliberated plan, purpose, or resolution — the settled intention that emerges from careful consideration. In its most theologically weighty usage, it describes God's sovereign decree: Jesus was delivered up 'by the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God' (Acts 2:23), and the Pharisees who rejected John's baptism 'rejected the counsel of God for themselves' (Luke 7:30). Paul declares that he did not shrink from proclaiming 'the whole counsel of God' (Acts 20:27). On the human level, Joseph of Arimathea 'had not consented to their counsel and action' (Luke 23:51). Spanish 'consejo/designio' and French 'dessein/conseil' capture both the deliberative process and the resulting purpose.

counsel, purpose, plan (12×) The sovereign plan, decree, or purpose of God — his determined will regarding salvation history. Central to Luke-Acts theology: God's boulē delivered Jesus to crucifixion (Acts 2:23; 4:28), encompasses the full scope of the gospel (Acts 20:27), and stands as the standard against which human acceptance or rejection is measured (Luke 7:30). Ephesians 1:11 speaks of God working all things 'according to the counsel of his will.' Spanish 'designio' and French 'dessein' convey the purposive, sovereign register. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: a-plan, counsel, intentions | es: consejo, propósitos, resolución | fr: conseil | de: Rat, Ratschluss Luke 7:30; Luke 23:51; Acts 2:23; Acts 4:28; Acts 5:38

βούλ-ημα G1013 N-DNS (3×)

will, purpose, deliberate intention or desire, especially of God's sovereign plan

This term emphasizes deliberate intention and purposeful willing, particularly in contexts involving God's sovereign will. It suggests not merely wish or preference but determined purpose and decree. Paul uses it in Romans 9 discussing God's sovereign election, asking rhetorically who can resist God's will. In Acts, the Roman commander's 'purpose' to save Paul is thwarted by the soldiers' different intent. The term carries weight—it is the settled counsel and determined plan of the one willing.

(3×) Acts 27:43 describes the centurion's 'purpose' to save Paul. Romans 9:19 poses the rhetorical question about resisting God's will in the context of sovereign election. 1 Peter 4:3 refers to the 'will' or 'desire' of the Gentiles that characterized the believers' former lifestyle. The Spanish translations distinguish 'deseo,' 'propósito,' 'voluntad' while French and German consistently render 'volonté' and 'Wille'—all emphasizing intentional willing rather than mere preference. WILL AND DESIRE en: purpose, will | es: deseo, propósito, voluntad | fr: volonté | de: Wille, βουλήματος Acts 27:43; Rom 9:19; 1Pet 4:3

βούλομαι G1014 V-PIM/P-1P (37×)

To wish, want, desire; to will or determine by sovereign decree; to intend or purpose a deliberate course of action.

The Greek verb boulomai expresses the inner landscape of volition, from everyday wishing to sovereign divine decree. In most of its 37 New Testament occurrences, it simply means 'to want' or 'to wish' – Pilate wanting to satisfy the crowd (Mark 15:15), Jesus asking 'Do you want me to release the king of the Jews?' (John 18:39). But in a handful of theologically weighty passages, boulomai ascends to deliberate, sovereign willing: the Father's exclusive authority to reveal the Son (Matt 11:27; Luke 10:22), and God's purposeful act of bringing forth by the word of truth (Jas 1:18). Spanish querer and German wollen mirror this same ambiguity between casual desire and resolute determination, while French vouloir likewise straddles both. A third, narrower sense captures planned intention – Joseph 'intending' to divorce Mary quietly (Matt 1:19) or Herod 'planning' to bring Peter before the people (Acts 12:4).

1. want, wish, desire (30×) General desire or wish without implying formal resolve – simply wanting or preferring something. This dominant sense (30 occurrences) covers everyday volition: Pilate wanting to satisfy the crowd (Mark 15:15), the council wanting to kill the apostles (Acts 5:33), Barnabas wanting to take John Mark along (Acts 15:37). Spanish queriendo, French vouloir, and German wollen all converge on the basic volitional verb, confirming the broad desiderative function. DESIRE AND WILLING en: He-wills, I-desire, I-want | es: Queriendo, Quiero, queriendo | fr: vouloir | de: will, wollen Mark 15:15; Luke 22:42; John 18:39; Acts 5:33; Acts 15:37

2. will, determine, decree (4×) Deliberate sovereign willing or determination, often predicated of God or the Father, expressing purposeful volition that carries authority and certainty of fulfillment. Only 4 occurrences, but each is theologically pivotal: the Father alone determines whom the Son reveals (Matt 11:27; Luke 10:22), God willed to bring us forth by truth (Jas 1:18), and the warning against becoming an enemy of God by one's own choosing (Jas 4:4). Spanish habiendo querido and German wollen here carry a weight of divine prerogative absent from sense 1. DESIRE AND WILLING en: having-willed, purposes, wills | es: habiendo-querido, quiera | fr: vouloir | de: will, wollen Matt 11:27; Luke 10:22; Jas 1:18; Jas 4:4

3. intend, plan, purpose (3×) Deliberate intention or planning toward a specific course of action, implying forethought and resolve rather than mere desire. Three occurrences capture this: Joseph intending to divorce Mary quietly (Matt 1:19), the Sanhedrin intending to charge the apostles (Acts 5:28), and Herod purposing to bring Peter out after Passover (Acts 12:4). Spanish quiso and German wollte in these contexts shade toward 'planned' or 'purposed' rather than simple 'wanted.' DESIRE AND WILLING en: intending, purposed, you-intend | es: queriendo, queréis, quiso | fr: vouloir | de: will Matt 1:19; Acts 5:28; Acts 12:4

βουνός G1015 N-NMS (2×)

hill, mound, small mountain, elevated ground

This noun denotes a hill or mound, a natural elevation smaller than a mountain but distinct from flat terrain. The Septuagint uses it to translate Hebrew terms for hills, often in poetic passages describing landscape. In the New Testament, Luke employs it twice in quotations. John the Baptist's preparatory ministry fulfills Isaiah's prophecy that 'every mountain and hill shall be made low' (Luke 3:5), symbolizing the leveling of obstacles before the Lord. Later, Jesus refers to a saying that people will call to the hills to cover them in times of divine judgment (Luke 23:30). Both uses carry symbolic weight beyond mere geography.

(2×) Luke 3:5 quotes Isaiah 40:4, including 'every hill' among the landscape features to be leveled in preparation for the Lord's coming —a metaphor for removing obstacles and preparing hearts. Luke

23:30 quotes Hosea 10:8, where people in terror of judgment will cry to the hills to cover them from God's wrath. Spanish 'colina/collados', French 'colline', and German forms maintain this topographical meaning. The two contexts use hills symbolically: as barriers to be removed for the Lord's approach (Luke 3) and as insufficient refuge from His judgment (Luke 23), showing how geographical features become theological metaphors. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: hill, hills | es: colina, collados | fr: colline | de: βουνοῖς, βουνὸς Luke 3:5; Luke 23:30

βοῦς G1016 N-AMS (8×)

Ox, bull, cow; domesticated cattle, used in agricultural, sacrificial, and proverbial contexts.

The common Greek noun for an ox or head of cattle, encompassing bulls, oxen, and cows. In the New Testament, βοῦς appears in everyday rural scenes — five yoke of oxen just purchased (Luke 14:19), an ox fallen into a well on the Sabbath (Luke 14:5), an ox untied and led to water (Luke 13:15). It also appears in the temple cleansing, where Jesus drives out those selling oxen and sheep (John 2:14-15). Paul twice quotes Deuteronomy 25:4, 'You shall not muzzle an ox while it treads out the grain' (1 Cor 9:9; 1 Tim 5:18), applying it to the right of ministers to earn their living. Spanish 'buey' and French 'boeuf' derive from the same Indo-European root.

ox, cattle (8×) A domesticated bovine — ox, bull, or cow — appearing in agricultural, legal, sacrificial, and proverbial NT contexts. Jesus references oxen in Sabbath-controversy parables (Luke 13:15; 14:5) and the excuse of a banquet invitee who bought five yoke of oxen (Luke 14:19). The temple cleansing involves sellers of oxen (John 2:14-15). Paul's quotation of 'do not muzzle the ox' (1 Cor 9:9; 1 Tim 5:18) gives the word a metaphorical-ethical extension. Spanish 'buey,' French 'boeuf,' and German 'Rinder' all denote the same domesticated beast of burden. CATTLE AND OXEN

en: an-ox, of-oxen, ox | es: Buey, a-buey, buey | fr: bœuf | de: Rinder, βοῦν, βοῦς Luke 13:15; Luke 14:5; Luke 14:19; John 2:14; John 2:15

βρᾶβ-εῖον G1017 N-ANS (2×)

prize, award given to the victor in athletic games, reward for winning

This noun denotes the prize awarded to victors in athletic competitions, particularly in the Greek games. The word originally referred to the baton or wand given as a prize, then extended to any victor's reward. Paul twice uses this athletic imagery to describe the Christian life's goal. He speaks of running in such a way as to 'obtain the prize' (1 Cor 9:24), and later of 'pressing toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus' (Phil 3:14). The image evokes the intense training, singular focus, and competitive determination of ancient athletes, applied to spiritual pursuit.

(2×) 1 Corinthians 9:24 uses the athletic contest metaphor: runners all compete but only one receives 'the prize,' urging Christians to run in a way that secures victory. Philippians 3:14 describes Paul 'pressing toward the goal for the prize' of God's heavenly calling, emphasizing forward momentum and focused pursuit. Spanish 'premio', French 'prix', and German 'Preis' all maintain the award/prize meaning. Both passages transform athletic competition into spiritual reality: the prize isn't earthly glory but the fullness of salvation, the completion of faith's race, and hearing 'well done' from the ultimate Judge who rewards all who finish faithfully. RECOMPENSE AND RETRIBUTION

en: prize | es: premio, premio? | fr: prix, βραβεῖον | de: Preis 1Cor 9:24; Phil 3:14

βρᾰβ-εύω G1018 V-PMA-3S (1×)

to rule, arbitrate; to act as umpire or governing authority

This verb means to act as judge, umpire, or arbitrator—to exercise decisive authority in settling disputes or directing affairs. In Colossians 3:15, Paul exhorts believers to let Christ's peace rule or arbitrate in their hearts. The athletic imagery of an umpire making final calls fits the context of settling internal conflicts and making decisions. Classical usage emphasizes both judicial arbitration and controlling direction. The translations vary: Spanish gobierne ("govern/rule"), German herrschen ("rule"), French retaining the Greek, all pointing to peace functioning as the decisive arbiter of Christian community life.

(1×) To act as umpire or ruling authority, here applied to Christ's peace (Col 3:15). The image suggests peace functioning as the final arbiter in believers' hearts, settling disputes and guiding decisions like an umpire making binding calls. The Spanish gobierne and German herrschen emphasize governmental rule, while the classical umpire imagery suggests peace as the decision-making standard that resolves conflicts and determines right action in the community. RULING AND REIGNING

en: let-rule | es: gobierne | fr: βραβευέτω | de: herrschen Col 3:15

βρᾰδύνω G1019 V-PIA-3S (2×)

to delay, to be slow, to tarry, to linger, to take one's time

This verb means to delay, be slow, or tarry, derived from the adjective meaning slow. It can be used transitively (to delay something) or intransitively (to be slow in acting). The New Testament uses it for delayed action or arrival. Paul writes to Timothy about what to do 'if I delay' in coming (1 Tim 3:15), providing instructions for church conduct in his absence. Peter addresses those who misunderstand the Lord's delayed return, explaining that 'the Lord is not slow concerning His promise' as some count slowness, but is patient (2 Pet 3:9). Both uses involve anticipated arrivals that may take longer than expected.

(2×) 1 Timothy 3:15 uses the present subjunctive: 'if I should delay' (or 'am delayed'), showing Paul's awareness that his travel plans might not materialize quickly, necessitating written guidance for the church. 2 Peter 3:9 uses the present active indicative in a theological statement: the Lord 'is not slow' regarding His promise of return, reframing apparent delay as patient mercy. Spanish 'tarda/tardo', French forms, and German 'zögern' (to hesitate) capture this slowing or delaying. Both contexts address misunderstanding of delay: Paul's practical travel uncertainties (1 Tim) and God's purposeful patience in Christ's return (2 Peter). DELAY TARRY LINGER

en: I-delay, delays | es: tarda, tardo | fr: βραδύνει, βραδύνω | de: zoegern 1Tim 3:15; 2Pet 3:9

βρᾰδῠ-πλοέω G1020 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

sailing slowly, making slow maritime progress

This participle describes the act of sailing slowly or making sluggish maritime progress. In Acts 27:7, Paul's ship sailed slowly for many days due to contrary winds on the voyage to Rome. The compound word combines "slow" (bradus) with "sail" (ploeō), creating a vivid picture of labored navigation against adverse conditions. The translations (Spanish navegando lentamente, French naviguer lentement, German retaining the Greek) all preserve the sense of impeded maritime travel that sets the stage for the subsequent storm and shipwreck narrative.

(1×) Making slow progress by ship due to difficult conditions (Acts 27:7). The contrary winds forced sluggish sailing for many days before the ship reached Cnidus. The Spanish navegando lentamente and French naviguer lentement both explicitly combine navigation with slowness, describing the frustrating maritime conditions that would eventually lead to the famous storm and Paul's prophetic warnings. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP

en: sailing-slowly | es: navegando-lentamente | fr: naviguer-lentement | de: βραδυπλοοῦντες Acts 27:7

βρᾰδύς G1021 Adj-NMS (3×)

slow, sluggish, or dull, especially in mental perception or responsiveness

This adjective describes slowness, whether in physical movement or, more commonly in biblical contexts, in mental or spiritual perception. The term can indicate sluggishness, delay, or dullness. Jesus rebukes the Emmaus disciples as 'slow of heart to believe' what the prophets spoke. James counsels believers to be 'slow to speak, slow to anger'—here slowness is a virtue, representing restraint and thoughtfulness. The classical usage includes both literal slowness of movement and metaphorical sluggishness of mind.

(3×) Luke 24:25 records Jesus' rebuke: 'O foolish ones and slow of heart to believe.' James 1:19 appears twice in the same verse, counseling believers to be 'slow to speak, slow to anger.' The multilingual evidence is consistent—Spanish 'lento/lentos,' French 'lent,' German 'langsam'—all conveying the basic sense of slowness. The context determines whether this slowness is a defect (slow to believe) or a virtue (slow to speak and anger). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: slow | es: lento, lentos | fr: lent | de: langsam, βραδεῖς Luke 24:25; Jas 1:19

βράδυτής G1022 N-AFS (1×)

slowness, delay; the quality of being slow or tardy

This noun denotes slowness or sluggishness, the quality of being tardy or delayed. In 2 Peter 3:9, it addresses the perceived slowness of the Lord's promised return—what scoffers consider delay, God does not count as slowness but rather as patient forbearance. Classical usage applies to both literal physical slowness and sluggishness of character. The translations (Spanish tardanza, French retaining the Greek, German Verzögerung) emphasize delay or lateness, capturing the skeptics' complaint while the context redefines this apparent slowness as divine patience unwilling that any should perish.

(1×) Apparent delay or slowness in fulfilling promises, specifically regarding Christ's return (2 Pet 3:9). What appears as slowness from a human temporal perspective is reinterpreted as God's patience, extending opportunity for repentance. The Spanish tardanza and German Verzögerung both emphasize delay or postponement, highlighting the tension between human impatience and divine forbearance that operates on a different temporal scale. DELAY AND TARRYING

en: slowness | es: tardanza | fr: βραδύτητα | de: Verzoegerung 2Pet 3:9

βραχίων G1023 N-NMS (3×)

arm, especially as symbol of strength, power, and mighty action

The arm represents physical strength and the capacity for powerful action. In biblical usage, especially in Old Testament citations, the 'arm of the Lord' is a frequent metaphor for God's mighty power displayed in salvation and judgment. Mary's Magnificat celebrates how God 'has shown strength with his arm.' The term evokes images of deliverance, military might, and sovereign intervention. When applied to God, the arm is anthropomorphic language emphasizing His active power to save and judge.

(3×) Luke 1:51 records Mary's song: 'He has shown strength with his arm.' John 12:38 quotes Isaiah 53:1: 'Lord, who has believed our report, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed?' Acts 13:17 describes how God 'with uplifted arm led them out' of Egypt. All three contexts employ the arm as a symbol of divine power and deliverance. The translations universally preserve the anatomical term—Spanish 'brazo,' French 'bras,' German 'Arm'—understanding the metaphorical force. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: arm | es: brazo | fr: bras | de: Arm, βραχίονι, βραχίονος Luke 1:51; John 12:38; Acts 13:17

βραχύς G1024 Adv (7×)

Short, small, little, brief; denoting smallness of quantity, extent, or duration.

An adjective meaning short, small, or brief, frequently used adverbially in the New Testament to indicate a small amount, a short time, or a slight degree. In Hebrews 2:7 and 2:9, quoting Psalm 8, it describes humanity being made 'a little lower' than the angels—where the ambiguity between 'for a short time' and 'by a small degree' has generated centuries of interpretive discussion. The multilingual evidence reflects this range: Spanish uses both 'poco' (little) and 'breves palabras' (brief words), while German 'kurz' emphasizes temporal brevity. In Acts 27:28, it marks a short interval of distance between depth soundings.

little, short, brief (7×) Small in quantity, duration, or extent—used adverbially and adjectivally to convey brevity or littleness. Covers temporal shortness (Luke 22:58, 'after a little while'; Acts 5:34, Gamaliel asks the apostles to be put outside 'for a short time'), spatial brevity (Acts 27:28, 'a little farther'), quantitative smallness (John 6:7, two hundred denarii would not buy enough for each to receive 'a little'), and degree (Heb 2:7, 9, made 'a little lower than the angels'). French 'peu/court' and Spanish 'poco/breve' jointly confirm the dual quantitative-temporal range across all seven occurrences. FEWNESS AND SMALLNESS

en: a-little, brief, for-a-short-time | es: breves-palabras, poco, por-poco | fr: court, peu | de: kurz, βραχὺ Luke 22:58; John 6:7; Acts 5:34; Acts 27:28; Heb 2:7

βρέφος G1025 N-ANS (8×)

A baby, infant, or unborn child; also the period of infancy or earliest childhood.

Denotes a very young child — whether still in the womb, newly born, or in earliest infancy. Luke uses it vividly for the unborn John leaping in Elizabeth's womb (Luke 1:41, 44) and for the newborn Jesus lying in a manger (Luke 2:12, 16). In Luke 18:15 people bring their infants to Jesus. A single occurrence in 2 Timothy 3:15 extends the word abstractly to mean 'from infancy,' pointing not to a child but to a stage of life — Timothy has known the sacred writings from his very earliest days.

1. baby, infant (person) (7×) A baby, infant, or unborn child as a person. Covers the unborn child leaping in the womb (Luke 1:41, 44), the newborn wrapped in cloths (Luke 2:12, 16), and infants brought to Jesus (Luke 18:15). Spanish 'bebé/infantes,' French 'bébé/petit-enfant,' and German 'Säugling' all point to the concrete, personal referent — a very small, dependent human being, whether prenatal or just born. CHILDREN AND INFANCY

en: a-baby, baby, infants | es: bebé, bebés, infantes | fr: bébé, petit-enfant | de: Saeugling, βρέφη, βρέφος Luke 1:41; Luke 1:44; Luke 2:12; Luke 2:16; Luke 18:15

2. infancy (period of life) (1×) The period or stage of infancy, used abstractly rather than as a reference to a particular child. In 2 Timothy 3:15 Paul writes that Timothy has known the holy Scriptures 'from infancy' (apo brephous), where the word denotes the earliest phase of life. Spanish 'infancia' captures this temporal, abstract usage in contrast to the concrete 'bebé' used elsewhere. CHILDREN AND INFANCY

en: infancy | es: infancia | fr: petit-enfant | de: Saeugling 2Tim 3:15

βρέχω G1026 V-AIA-3S (7×)

To rain, send rain from the sky; to wet or moisten with liquid (especially tears).

Brecho is a vivid, sensory Greek verb whose basic meaning is to wet or drench. In the New Testament it splits cleanly into two senses that translation languages consistently distinguish. The dominant meteorological sense — 'to rain' or 'to cause rain' — appears five times, from Jesus' teaching that the Father 'sends rain on the just and the unjust' (Matt 5:45) to the apocalyptic image of God raining fire and sulfur on Sodom (Luke 17:29) and Elijah's prayer that it might not rain (Jas 5:17). Spanish llover, French pleuvoir, and German regnen all deploy dedicated rain vocabulary. But in Luke 7:38 and 7:44, the verb takes on an intimate, physical meaning: the sinful woman 'began to wet' Jesus' feet with her tears. Here Spanish shifts to mojar, and the sense moves from sky to skin, from cosmic to personal. The same root that describes divine judgment through heavenly downpour also captures a woman's tears falling on a rabbi's dusty feet.

1. rain, send rain (5×) To rain or send rain — the meteorological sense describing precipitation falling from the sky, whether ordinary rain or divine judgment. Five occurrences span the full theological range: God 'sends rain' (brechei) on righteous and unrighteous alike (Matt 5:45), God 'rained' (ebrexen) fire and sulfur on Sodom (Luke 17:29), Elijah prayed and the sky 'did not rain' (ouk ebrexen) for three and a half years (Jas 5:17), and the two witnesses have power to shut the sky so it 'may not rain' (Rev 11:6). Spanish llover/llovió, French pleuvoir, German regnen, and Arabic أمطر all converge on dedicated rain vocabulary, confirming this as the primary and unambiguous sense. RAIN AND PRECIPITATION en: it-rained, may-fall, rained | es: llover, llovió, llueva | fr: pleuvoir | de: regnen, βρέχει, ἔβρεξεν Matt 5:45; Luke 17:29; Jas 5:17; Rev 11:6

2. wet, moisten (2×) To wet or moisten with liquid other than rain — a physical, bodily sense used exclusively in Luke's account of the sinful woman at the Pharisee's dinner. In Luke 7:38 she 'began to wet' (brechein) Jesus' feet with her tears, and in 7:44 Jesus contrasts her devotion with the host's neglect: 'she wet (ebrexen) my feet with tears.' Spanish mojar, which replaces llover in these verses, signals the semantic shift from weather to the intimate act of bathing with tears. The connection between the two senses is the physical action of liquid falling on a surface, but the emotional register could not be more different — one is cosmic, the other profoundly personal. RAIN AND PRECIPITATION

en: to-wet, wet | es: a-mojar, mojó | fr: pleuvoir | de: βρέχειν, ἔβρεξέν Luke 7:38; Luke 7:44

βροντ-ή G1027 N-GFP (12×)

Thunder — the sound accompanying storms; a theophanic sign of divine power and majesty

The noun brontē refers to thunder as both a natural meteorological phenomenon and a theophanic manifestation of divine power. Jesus surnamed James and John 'Boanerges, sons of thunder' (Mark 3:17), perhaps alluding to their fiery temperament. In Revelation, thunder becomes a recurring element of heavenly liturgy and judgment: it issues from God's throne (Rev 4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18), accompanies the opening of seals (Rev 6:1), and announces angelic proclamations (Rev 10:3-4; 14:2; 19:6). In John 12:29, the crowd mistakes the Father's voice for thunder. Spanish 'trueno' and French 'tonnerre' both derive from Latin tonitrus, preserving the numinous resonance.

thunder (12×) Thunder as a theophanic manifestation of divine power and heavenly majesty. Dominates the Apocalypse, where it proceeds from the throne of God (Rev 4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18), accompanies the Lamb's seal-openings (Rev 6:1), and lends cosmic weight to angelic proclamations (Rev 10:3-4; 14:2; 19:6). In John 12:29 the Father's voice from heaven is mistaken for thunder by the crowd. Spanish 'trueno' and German 'Donner' carry the same numinous overtone. THUNDER THEOPHANIC

en: of-Thunder, of-thunder, of-thunders | es: de-Trueno, de-trueno, de-truenos | fr: tonnerre | de: Donner Mark 3:17; John 12:29; Rev 4:5; Rev 6:1; Rev 8:5

βροχή G1028 N-NFS (2×)

rain, rainfall, precipitation, shower of rain

This noun simply means rain or rainfall, the water falling from clouds that irrigates the earth. While classical Greek also used it for other forms of moistening or irrigation, the New Testament employs it straightforwardly for rain. Both occurrences appear in Jesus's parable of the two builders (Matt 7:25, 27). The storm that tests both houses includes 'the rain' falling along with floods and winds. The repetition emphasizes the comprehensive nature of the storm: not just wind or flood, but rain as well, creating the perfect test of each foundation. The word itself is simple and literal, though its context is deeply symbolic.

(2×) Matthew 7:25 describes how 'the rain descended' as part of the storm testing the house built on rock, which stood firm. Matthew 7:27 uses identical language for the storm testing the house on sand, which fell. Spanish 'lluvia', French 'pluie', and German forms all provide the straightforward term for rain. The word's repetition in the same parable emphasizes that both builders faced identical conditions—the same rain, floods, and winds. The difference wasn't in the severity of the test but in the foundation: the rain that proved one builder's wisdom exposed the other's folly, making this simple weather phenomenon a test of spiritual reality. RAIN AND PRECIPITATION en: rain | es: lluvia | fr: pluie | de: βροχὴ Matt 7:25; Matt 7:27

βρόχος G1029 N-AMS (1×)

noose, snare; a restraining loop or entrapment device

This noun denotes a noose, slip-knot, or snare—originally a loop for catching birds or restraining animals. In 1 Corinthians 7:35, Paul clarifies that his advice about singleness aims not to place a restraint or snare upon believers, but to promote good order. The word suggests something that catches, binds, or restricts freedom of movement. Classical usage includes snares for hunting, mesh in nets, and metaphorically, any restricting obligation. The translations vary: Spanish lazo ("lasso/bond"), French piège ("trap"), German Schlinge ("noose"), all conveying restricting constraint Paul explicitly disclaims.

(1×) A restraint or snare that limits freedom (1 Cor 7:35). Paul's pastoral concern is that his teaching about marriage and singleness not become a binding obligation or trap, but rather serve godly order and devotion. The Spanish lazo and German Schlinge both suggest binding loops, while French piège emphasizes the trap aspect—all pointing to unwanted restriction Paul seeks to avoid imposing on conscience. SNARES AND TRAPS

en: restraint | es: lazo | fr: piège | de: Schlinge 1Cor 7:35

βρυγ-μός G1030 N-NMS (7×)

Gnashing; the grinding or clenching of teeth, expressing anguish, rage, or despair.

Refers specifically to the gnashing or grinding of teeth, almost always appearing in the fixed phrase 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' in Jesus' parables of judgment. This vivid expression conveys the anguish and fury of those excluded from the kingdom. It occurs seven times, six in Matthew and once in Luke, forming one of the most recognizable refrains in the Synoptic tradition. The cross-linguistic unanimity is striking: Spanish 'crujir,' French 'grincement,' and German 'Knirschen' all preserve the specific dental grinding imagery rather than generalizing to mere suffering.

(7×) The act of gnashing or grinding the teeth, expressing extreme anguish, rage, or despair. Appears exclusively in the formulaic phrase 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' (ho klauthmos kai ho brygmos ton odonton), which Jesus uses to depict the torment of those cast into outer darkness or the furnace of fire (Matt 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Luke 13:28). Every target language renders it with a term specifically denoting tooth-grinding (Spanish 'crujir,' German 'Knirschen,' French 'grincement'), confirming this is not generalized suffering language but a concrete, visceral image of dental clenching. TOOTH TEETH

en: gnashing | es: crujir | fr: grincement | de: Knirschen Matt 8:12; Matt 13:42; Matt 13:50; Matt 22:13; Matt 24:51

βρύκω G1031 V-IIA-3P (1×)

were gnashing, grinding teeth in rage or anguish

This verb describes the act of gnashing or grinding teeth, typically expressing rage, anguish, or hostile intention. In Acts 7:54, the Sanhedrin members gnashed their teeth at Stephen during his speech—a visceral expression of murderous fury. Classical usage includes biting, devouring, and chomping (as a horse champs a bit), with gnashing teeth specifically indicating intense emotion. The translations (Spanish crujían, French grincer, German retaining the Greek) all emphasize the grinding action that physically manifests the council's rage moments before Stephen's stoning.

(1×) Grinding teeth in rage and hostility (Acts 7:54). The Sanhedrin's physical response to Stephen's accusatory speech reveals their murderous intent through this involuntary expression of fury. The Spanish crujían and French grincer both capture the grinding, crunching sound of teeth gnashing together—a bodily manifestation of uncontrolled rage that immediately precedes their violent action of stoning. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11871 WITH 3 SENSES

en: were-gnashing | es: cruían | fr: grincer | de: ἔβρυχον Acts 7:54

βρύω G1032 V-PIA-3S (1×)

gushes, flows forth abundantly; springs up or bursts forth

This verb means to gush, burst forth, or flow abundantly—originally describing fullness to the point of bursting. In James 3:11, it appears in a rhetorical question: Does a spring gush forth both fresh and bitter water from the same opening? The word emphasizes abundant flow, swelling or teeming with liquid. Classical usage describes plants swelling with bloom, earth teeming with produce, or water bursting forth from a source. The translations (Spanish brota, French retaining the Greek, German hervorsprudeln) all emphasize the springing or bursting forth of water from a natural source.

(1×) To gush or flow forth abundantly, applied to spring water (Jas 3:11). James uses the natural impossibility of one spring producing both fresh and salt water to illustrate the moral inconsistency of blessing and cursing from one mouth. The Spanish brota and German hervorsprudeln both emphasize the bursting forth or springing up of water, making the point that a spring's nature determines its consistent output—it cannot simultaneously produce opposite types. FLOWING WATER

en: gushes | es: brota | fr: βρύει | de: hervorsprudeln Jas 3:11

βρῶμα G1033 N-NNP (17×)

Food, solid nourishment; that which is eaten as sustenance.

Brōma denotes food in its most concrete sense — solid nourishment that one eats. It appears in practical settings like feeding the five thousand (Matt 14:15; Luke 9:13) and in theological arguments about dietary laws and Christian liberty (Rom 14:15, 20; 1 Cor 8:8, 13). Paul also uses it figuratively: 'I gave you milk, not solid food' (1 Cor 3:2), contrasting spiritual maturity levels. Across languages — Spanish 'alimento,' French 'nourriture,' German 'Speisen' — the translations consistently point to tangible, physical sustenance.

food (17×) That which is eaten, solid food or nourishment. All seventeen NT occurrences share the same core meaning of edible sustenance. In literal contexts it refers to provisions for crowds or daily meals (Luke 3:11, Matt 14:15). In theological discourse it becomes a vehicle for discussing what defiles (Mark 7:19), the limits of Christian freedom regarding food offered to idols (1 Cor 8:8, 13), and the contrast between elementary and mature spiritual teaching (1 Cor 3:2). FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: by-foods, food, foods | es: Alimento, alimento, alimento-sólido | fr: nourriture | de: Speisen, βρώματα Matt 14:15; Mark 7:19; Luke 3:11; Luke 9:13; John 4:34

βρώσιμος G1034 Adj-ANS (1×)

edible, fit for eating; suitable as food

This adjective means edible or suitable for eating, describing what can be safely and appropriately consumed as food. In Luke 24:41, the risen Jesus asks the astonished disciples if they have anything edible, something to eat. The request for food serves to demonstrate His physical resurrection—spirits don't eat. The translations (Spanish de comer, French comestible, German retaining the Greek) all emphasize fitness for consumption, with the context using eating as proof of bodily reality rather than mere phantom appearance.

(1×) Food that is edible or fit for consumption (Luke 24:41). Jesus' request for something edible serves as tangible evidence of His resurrection in a real body. The Spanish de comer ("for eating") and French comestible both emphasize suitability for consumption, making the point that the risen Lord could and did eat physical food —compelling proof against the disciples' suspicion that they were seeing a ghost. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: edible | es: de-comer | fr: comestible | de: βρώσιμον Luke 24:41

βρῶσις G1035 N-NFS (11×)

Food, nourishment; the act of eating; corrosion or decay (of material goods consumed by moth and rust)

A noun spanning the full arc from what is eaten to the eating itself to what eats away. In John 6:27 and 6:55, Jesus contrasts perishable food with the enduring nourishment he offers, where the Spanish 'alimento' and French 'nourriture' both capture the sustaining quality. In Matthew 6:19-20, the same word shifts dramatically to mean corrosion or decay – the slow ruin that moths and rust inflict on earthly treasure. Paul uses it for the act of eating in Romans 14:17, reminding believers that the kingdom of God is not about eating and drinking but righteousness, peace, and joy.

1. food (7×) Food or nourishment as substance to be consumed. The dominant sense across John's Gospel, where Jesus speaks of true food (brosis) that endures to eternal life (John 6:27, 55). Multilingual glosses consistently render this as sustenance: Spanish 'alimento/comida', French 'nourriture', German 'Speise' – all emphasizing provision rather than the act of consumption. Also in 2 Corinthians 9:10 where God supplies seed and bread for food. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: eating, food | es: alimento, comida | fr: manger, nourriture | de: Speise John 4:32; John 6:27; John 6:55; 2Cor 9:10

2. decay (2×) Corrosion, rust, or decay that destroys material goods. Confined to Jesus' teaching on treasures in Matthew 6:19-20, where brosis pairs with moth (ses) as agents of destruction. The Spanish 'herrumbre' (rust) captures this well, while the German simply transliterates, reflecting how unusual this sense is. The word pictures the slow, relentless consumption of earthly wealth – a vivid metaphor urging investment in heavenly treasure. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: decay | es: herrumbre | fr: nourriture | de: βρῶσις Matt 6:19; Matt 6:20

3. eating (2×) The act or process of eating, emphasizing the activity rather than the substance consumed. In Romans 14:17, Paul declares the kingdom of God is not eating (brosis) and drinking, where Spanish 'comer' and French 'manger' use verbal forms highlighting the action. Similarly in 1 Corinthians 8:4 regarding eating food offered to idols, the focus falls on the practice itself and its theological implications. EATING AND CONSUMING

en: eating | es: comer, comida | fr: manger | de: Speise Rom 14:17; 1Cor 8:4

βυθ-ίζω G1036 V-PNM/P (2×)

to sink, to plunge down, to cause to sink, to submerge, to overwhelm

This verb means to sink or cause to sink, to plunge into the depths. Classical Greek used it for sinking ships, drowning people, or overwhelming cities with floods. The New Testament employs it both literally and metaphorically. Luke describes fishermen whose boats 'began to sink' from the miraculous catch of fish (Luke 5:7), while Paul warns that those desiring wealth 'plunge themselves into destruction and perdition' (1 Tim 6:9). The passive forms in both passages emphasize the progressive process: boats beginning to go down under weight, people sinking into ruin through greed. The verb captures both physical submersion and metaphorical overwhelming.

(2×) Luke 5:7 uses the present middle/passive infinitive to describe the boats 'beginning to sink' from the overabundant catch after Jesus's command—a physical miracle that prompted Peter's confession. 1 Timothy 6:9 employs the present active indicative: those who desire to be rich 'plunge people into ruin and destruction,' with some manuscripts reading the passive 'are plunged.' Spanish 'hunden/hundirse', French 'enfoncer', and German 'versinken/βυθίζεσθαι' capture this sinking/plunging meaning. Both passages show overwhelming pressure: miraculous abundance that nearly sinks boats (Luke) and greedy desire that drowns souls in destruction (1 Timothy), using the same verb for physical and spiritual submersion. SINKING SUBMERGING

en: plunge, to-sink | es: hunden, hundirse | fr: enfoncer | de: versinken, βυθίζεσθαι Luke 5:7; 1Tim 6:9

βυθός G1037 N-DMS (1×)

depth, deep water; the depths of the sea or an abyss

This noun denotes depth, particularly the deep waters of the sea or any profound abyss. In 2 Corinthians 11:25, Paul lists among his hardships a night and day spent "in the deep"—likely referring to being adrift in open water after a shipwreck. Classical usage emphasizes the sea's depth, deep wounds, or metaphorically, profound or cosmic abysses. The translations (Spanish abismo, French profondeur, German Tiefe) vary between emphasizing depth itself and the abyss or deep waters, all pointing to Paul's experience of exposure to the sea's deadly depths during his missionary journeys.

(1×) The deep waters of the sea, particularly as a place of danger (2 Cor 11:25). Paul's experience of a night and day in the deep refers to being shipwrecked and exposed to open water's perils. The Spanish abismo emphasizes the abyss-like character, while French profondeur and German Tiefe stress depth itself—all conveying the mortal danger of extended exposure to deep sea conditions. ABYSS AND DEEP en: deep | es: abismo | fr: profondeur | de: Tiefe 2Cor 11:25

βυρσοδέψ-ης G1038 N-GMS (3×)

tanner, one who prepares animal hides for leather, a trade considered ritually unclean by many Jews

A tanner was a craftsman who processed animal hides into leather through scraping, treating, and curing. The occupation required regular contact with dead animals and their skins, rendering tanners ceremonially unclean according to Jewish purity laws. Peter's willingness to lodge with Simon the tanner in Joppa signals an important shift in his understanding of ritual purity—a preparation for his vision on the rooftop and subsequent visit to the Gentile Cornelius. The occupation's social marginalization makes Peter's choice of accommodation theologically significant.

(3×) All three occurrences in Acts 9:43, 10:6, and 10:32 refer to Simon the tanner, Peter's host in Joppa. The narrative emphasizes the location detail ('whose house is by the sea') perhaps because tanners' workshops were situated near water for the curing process and downwind from residential areas due to the unpleasant odors. The multilingual glosses preserve the occupational term—English 'tanner,' Spanish 'curtidor,' French 'tanneur'—though German retains the Greek forms, suggesting the term's specificity. SKIN AND LEATHER

en: tanner | es: curtidor | fr: tanneur | de: βυρσέως, βυρσεῖ Acts 9:43; Acts 10:6; Acts 10:32

βύσσινος G1039 Adj-GNS (5×)

Made of fine linen (byssus); describing luxurious cloth garments, especially in Revelation's imagery of wealth and purity.

An adjective describing something made of byssus, the prized fine linen of the ancient Mediterranean world. In Revelation, it appears in two vivid contrasts: the extravagant clothing of Babylon (Rev 18:12, 16) and the bright, pure garments of the saints and the heavenly armies (Rev 19:8, 14). The French and German translations preserve the loanword 'Byssus,' reflecting how distinctive this fabric was — a material so fine that it carried both economic and symbolic weight in the ancient world.

(5×) Describes garments or cloth made of byssus (fine linen). All five NT occurrences cluster in Revelation, where the material functions as a marker of extreme luxury in the context of Babylon's trade goods (Rev 18:12, 16) and then pivots to symbolize purity and righteousness in the bridal garment of the saints (Rev 19:8) and the clothing of heaven's armies (Rev 19:14). The Spanish 'lino fino' and English 'fine linen' both emphasize the quality of the fabric rather than just its material. LINEN AND FABRIC

en: fine-linen, in-fine-linen, of-fine-linen | es: de-lino-fino, de-lino-fino„ lino-fino | fr: Byssus | de: Byssus Rev 18:12; Rev 18:16; Rev 19:8; Rev 19:14

βύσσος G1040 N-AFS (1×)

fine linen, expensive fabric made from flax or cotton; luxury cloth

This noun denotes fine linen, a luxurious fabric made from flax and prized in antiquity for its quality and cost. In Luke 16:19, the rich man habitually dressed in purple and fine linen—markers of wealth and status. The term originally referred to Egyptian flax but later expanded to include cotton and even silk in some sources. The translations (Spanish lino fino, French fin lin, German retaining the Greek) all emphasize the refined, expensive quality of this textile, perfectly illustrating the rich man's opulent lifestyle in contrast to Lazarus's destitution at his gate.

(1×) Expensive fine linen fabric symbolizing wealth and luxury (Luke 16:19). The rich man's daily dress of purple and fine linen demonstrates his extravagant lifestyle. The Spanish lino fino and French fin lin both emphasize the refined, costly quality of this fabric, which served as a status marker in ancient Mediterranean society—making the rich man's neglect of poor Lazarus all the more condemnable. LINEN AND FABRIC

en: fine-linen | es: de-lino-fino | fr: fin-lin | de: βύσσον Luke 16:19

βωμός G1041 N-AMS (1×)

altar, raised platform for sacrifice or worship; pagan or Jewish sacrificial structure

This noun denotes an altar, specifically a raised platform or structure for sacrifices and offerings. In Acts 17:23, Paul references an Athenian altar inscribed "To an Unknown God," using it as a springboard for proclaiming the true God. Classical usage encompasses altars as places of sacrifice, supplication, and asylum, with the raised base distinguishing it from other cultic furniture. The translations uniformly render it as altar (Spanish/French/German altar/autel), recognizing it as the standard term for pagan sacrificial structures Paul encountered in Athens's religious landscape.

(1×) A pagan altar structure in Athens dedicated to an unknown deity (Acts 17:23). Paul's use of this altar inscription demonstrates his contextual awareness and provides a bridge for presenting the gospel to philosophical Greeks. All translations preserve the simple term "altar," recognizing it as the physical structure where sacrifices occurred—here, one Athenian hedge against potentially offending an unrecognized god, which Paul reinterprets as evidence of their groping after the true Creator. ALTAR SACRIFICE PLACE

en: altar | es: altar | fr: autel | de: βωμὸν Acts 17:23

Γαββαθα G1042 N-ANS (1×)

Gabbatha, Aramaic name for the stone pavement where Jesus was judged; the Pavement

Gabbatha is the Aramaic name for the location called in Greek "the Stone Pavement" (Lithostrotos), where Pilate sat in judgment over Jesus. John 19:13 provides both terms, with Gabbatha likely meaning an elevated or raised area. The exact etymology remains debated, but it designates the specific judicial location in Jerusalem where the Roman governor's judgment seat was placed. All translations preserve the Aramaic transliteration (Spanish Gabbathá, French/German Gabbatha), recognizing it as a proper place name anchored in the passion narrative's Jerusalem geography.

(1×) Aramaic name for the stone pavement where Pilate judged Jesus (John 19:13). The dual naming (Aramaic Gabbatha, Greek Lithostrotos) reflects John's Jewish-Greek audience. All translations preserve the Aramaic form, recognizing it as a historically specific location in Jerusalem where the pivotal judgment scene occurred —the raised judicial platform where earthly power pronounced sentence on the King of kings. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Gabbatha | es: Gabbathâ | fr: Gabbatha | de: Gabbatha John 19:13

Γαβριήλ G1043 N-NMS (2×)

Gabriel, the archangel whose name means 'hero of God' or 'mighty one of God'

This proper name, transliterated from Hebrew גַּבְרִיאֵל (Gavri'el, 'hero of God' or 'God is my strength'), identifies one of the named archangels in Scripture. Gabriel appears in Daniel's visions as an interpreter of prophetic mysteries, and in Luke's Gospel as God's messenger announcing both John the Baptist's birth to Zechariah and Jesus's incarnation to Mary. Both New Testament occurrences are in Luke 1: Gabriel identifies himself by name to the terrified

Zechariah (1:19) and introduces himself to Mary (1:26). His self-identification emphasizes his authority as one who 'stands in the presence of God,' sent to deliver messages of cosmic significance.

(2×) Luke 1:19 records Gabriel's self-introduction to Zechariah: 'I am Gabriel, who stands in the presence of God, and was sent to speak to you.' Luke 1:26 states that 'the angel Gabriel was sent by God' to Nazareth to announce Jesus's birth to Mary. Spanish and English maintain 'Gabriel', French 'Gabriel', and German 'Ταβριήλ' preserve the name's transliteration. Gabriel's messages mark pivotal moments in salvation history: the forerunner's promised birth and the Incarnation itself. His name and his self-description ('standing in God's presence') emphasize his role as heaven's authoritative messenger for the most important announcements ever made to humanity. ANGELS AND MESSENGERS

en: Gabriël | es: Gabriel | fr: Gabriel | de: Γαβριὴλ Luke 1:19; Luke 1:26

γάγγραιν-α G1044 N-NFS (1×)

gangrene, spreading decay; malignant infection that consumes tissue

This noun denotes gangrene, a progressive decay or spreading infection that consumes healthy tissue. In 2 Timothy 2:17, false teaching is compared to gangrene, spreading its destructive influence throughout the body of believers. The medical metaphor is vivid—just as gangrene progressively destroys living flesh, doctrinal error infects and corrupts sound faith community by community, person by person. The translations uniformly use medical terminology (Spanish gangrena, French/German retaining the Greek form or using Brand for "mortification"), all recognizing the progressive, consuming nature of this spiritual disease.

(1×) Medical gangrene used metaphorically for spreading false doctrine (2 Tim 2:17). The comparison emphasizes that error doesn't remain isolated but spreads destructively like tissue necrosis, consuming spiritual health. The Spanish gangrena uses the direct medical term, while German Brand ("mortification") captures the tissue death aspect—both highlighting how doctrinal infection progressively destroys the body of Christ if not excised. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION

en: gangrene | es: gangrena | fr: γάγγραινα | de: Brand 2Tim 2:17

Γάδ G1045 N-GMS (1×)

Gad, name of Jacob's seventh son and the Israelite tribe descended from him

Gad is the name of Jacob's seventh son, born to Zilpah, Leah's maidservant, and the tribe that descended from him. In Revelation 7:5, Gad appears in the list of sealed tribes—12,000 from the tribe of Gad receive God's protective seal. The name appears throughout the Old Testament, and the tribe settled east of the Jordan. All translations preserve the name in transliteration (Spanish/French/German Gad), recognizing it as one of the twelve patriarchal names representing Israel's tribal structure, here incorporated into the apocalyptic vision of the 144,000.

(1×) The tribe of Gad, one of Israel's twelve tribes represented in Revelation's sealing vision (Rev 7:5). The reference maintains continuity with Old Testament tribal identity, though the specific tribes listed in Revelation differ slightly from traditional enumerations. All translations preserve Gad as a proper name, with the genitive form indicating the 12,000 sealed individuals belonging to this tribe. GAD PROPER NAME

en: of-Gad | es: de-Gad | fr: Gad | de: Gad Rev 7:5

Γαδαρηνός G1046 Adj-GMP (1×)

Gadarene, belonging to Gadara; a resident or native of the region of Gadara

This adjective denotes someone or something from Gadara, a prominent city of the Decapolis southeast of the Sea of Galilee. In Matthew 8:28, it describes the region where Jesus encountered demon-possessed men. Textual variants exist (some manuscripts read Gerasene or Gergesene), reflecting ancient uncertainty about the exact location of this exorcism. The translations preserve the ethnic/geographic designation (Spanish Gadarēnŏ́n, German retaining the Greek), though French uses the adjective form "Gadarénien." The term locates the dramatic confrontation with Legion in gentile territory across the lake from Galilee.

(1×) Belonging to the region of Gadara, a Decapolis city (Matt 8:28). The geographic designation locates Jesus' dramatic exorcism in predominantly gentile territory, explaining the presence of pig herds. The Spanish and German forms preserve the genitive plural, while textual variants (Gerasene, Gergesene) in manuscripts reflect ancient geographic discussions about which city's territory best fits the narrative details of the demoniac's healing. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Gadarēnoi | es: Gadarēnŏ́n | fr: Gadarénien | de: Γαδαρηνῶν Matt 8:28

γάζα G1047 N-GFS (1×)

treasury, treasure storehouse; royal or temple repository of valuable resources

This noun denotes a treasury or treasure storehouse, particularly royal or governmental repositories of wealth. In Acts 8:27, the Ethiopian eunuch held authority over all the treasury of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians. The term encompasses both the physical location where treasure is kept and the treasure itself. Persian loanword origins suggest it entered Greek through contact with Eastern imperial administration. The translations (Spanish tesorería, German/French retaining the Greek or using similar cognates) emphasize the institutional treasury under the eunuch's supervision, befitting his high governmental position.

(1×) The royal treasury under an official's supervision (Acts 8:27). The Ethiopian eunuch's position over Candace's entire treasury indicates his high rank and trustworthiness. The Spanish tesorería captures the institutional sense of a governmental treasury department, while the Persian etymological roots of the Greek term reflect its use for imperial treasure management in Eastern kingdoms—fitting for an African queen's financial administration. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: treasury | es: tesorería | fr: trésor | de: γάζης Acts 8:27

Γάζα -ης G1048 N-AFS (1×)

Gaza, ancient Philistine coastal city; one of five principal cities of the Philistines

Gaza was one of the five principal cities of the Philistines, located on the Mediterranean coastal plain in southwest Canaan. In Acts 8:26, an angel directs Philip toward the road leading to Gaza, described as desert—either the desert road or indicating Gaza's desolate condition after destruction. The city features prominently in Old Testament narratives (Samson, Joshua's conquest). All translations preserve the name (Spanish Gáza, French/German Gaza), recognizing it as a major geographic and historical landmark on the ancient highway connecting Egypt with Syria and Mesopotamia.

(1×) The ancient coastal city of Gaza, location marker for Philip's evangelistic journey (Acts 8:26). The road to Gaza connected Jerusalem with Egypt, making it a natural route for the Ethiopian official's return journey. All translations preserve Gaza as the proper name, with the note about "desert" adding geographic color—whether describing the road's character or the city's ruined state, it sets the scene for the providential wilderness encounter. GAZA PHILISTINE CITY

en: Gaza | es: Gáza | fr: Gaza | de: Gaza Acts 8:26

γᾰ̄ζο-φῠ́λάκιον G1049 N-GNS (5×)

Treasury; a place for storing valuables or receiving monetary offerings in the temple precinct.

Refers to the treasury area within the temple complex — both the collection receptacles where worshippers deposited offerings and, by extension, the treasury chamber itself. In the Synoptic accounts of the widow's mite (Mark 12:41-43; Luke 21:1), Jesus watches people casting money into the gazophulakion. In John 8:20, it marks the location where Jesus taught. The French 'tronc' (offering box) captures the receptacle sense, while Spanish 'tesoro' and German 'Schatzkammer' emphasize the treasury-room dimension.

(5×) The temple treasury or offering receptacle. In Mark 12:41-43 and Luke 21:1, it denotes the collection vessels in the Court of Women where worshippers deposited contributions — the setting for Jesus' observation of the widow's sacrificial giving. In John 8:20, it identifies a specific location within the temple precincts where Jesus was teaching. The word is a compound of gaza ('treasure,' a Persian loanword) and phulakion ('guardhouse'), pointing to a guarded repository for sacred funds. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: treasury | es: tesoro | fr: tronc | de: Schatzkammer, γαζοφυλάκιον Mark 12:41; Mark 12:43; Luke 21:1; John 8:20

γάϊος G1050 N-DMS (5×)

Gaius; a proper name borne by several early Christians in the NT, a common Roman praenomen.

A personal name appearing across the NT for what may be two to four distinct individuals. Paul baptized a Gaius in Corinth (1 Cor 1:14), likely the same person who hosted the whole church (Rom 16:23). A Gaius from Macedonia was caught up in the Ephesian riot (Acts 19:29), while a Gaius from Derbe traveled with Paul (Acts 20:4). The elder John addresses his third epistle to a beloved Gaius (3 John 1:1). The name was one of the most common Roman praenomina, which explains its frequency among Gentile converts.

(5×) A proper name (Latin Gaius) borne by several early Christians. The name appears in five passages spanning Paul's ministry and the Johannine epistles. It was among the eighteen traditional Roman praenomina, making it extremely common in the Greco-Roman world. Spanish preserves the Greek spelling as 'Gáios,' while English and German standardize to the Latin form 'Gaius,' reflecting the name's dual cultural heritage in the early church's mixed Jewish-Gentile communities. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Gaios, to-Gaios | es: Gáios, Gáïos, a-Gáios | fr: Gaius, Gaïus | de: Gaius, Γάϊον, Γάϊος Acts 19:29; Acts 20:4; Rom 16:23; 1Cor 1:14; 3John 1:1

γάλα G1051 N-GNS (5×)

Milk; used literally of dairy nourishment and figuratively of elementary spiritual teaching.

Denotes milk in both its literal and metaphorical senses. Paul invokes the image of milk as basic nourishment contrasted with solid food to describe elementary versus mature spiritual instruction (1 Cor 3:2; Heb 5:12-13). He also appeals to the literal practice of drinking milk from one's flock as a right of pastoral workers (1 Cor 9:7). Peter uses the metaphor positively, urging believers to crave pure spiritual milk for growth (1 Pet 2:2). Across all four target languages — Spanish 'leche,' French 'lait,' German 'Milch' — the single word covers both the physical substance and the metaphor.

(5×) Milk as nourishment, both literal and figurative. Literally, it refers to the dairy product obtained from livestock, as in Paul's rhetorical question about a shepherd's right to drink milk from the flock (1 Cor 9:7). Figuratively, it represents elementary, foundational spiritual teaching suited to new believers, contrasted with 'solid food' for the mature (1 Cor 3:2; Heb 5:12-13). Peter inverts the negative connotation, using 'pure spiritual milk' as something earnestly to be desired for growth (1 Pet 2:2). MILK DAIRY PRODUCTS

en: milk, of-milk | es: Leche, de-leche, leche | fr: lait | de: Milch 1Cor 3:2; 1Cor 9:7; Heb 5:12; Heb 5:13; 1Pet 2:2

Γαλάτης G1052 N-VMP (1×)

Galatians, inhabitants of Galatia; recipients of Paul's letter to the Galatian churches

This term denotes the Galatians, inhabitants of the region of Galatia in central Asia Minor and recipients of Paul's epistle. Originally, Galatai was synonymous with Keltai (Celts), referring to Celtic peoples who migrated to Asia Minor in the 3rd century BC. In Galatians 3:1, Paul addresses them with the vocative, expressing frustration at their quick turn from grace to legalism. The translations preserve the ethnic designation (Spanish Gálatas, French/German retaining or adapting the Greek), recognizing these believers as the specific audience of Paul's impassioned defense of justification by faith.

(1×) The inhabitants of Galatia addressed in Paul's letter (Gal 3:1). Paul's vocative expresses both affection and exasperation at their susceptibility to Judaizing teaching. All translations preserve the ethnic-geographic designation, with the historical background of Celtic migration adding cultural texture—these were descendants of European Celts who had settled in central Anatolia, now part of the early church struggling with the relationship between law and gospel. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: Galatians | es: Galátai | fr: Γαλάται | de: Galater Gal 3:1

Γαλατία G1053 N-AFS (4×)

Galatia, a region and Roman province in central Asia Minor

Galatia refers to a territory in central Asia Minor originally settled by migrating Celtic (Gaulish) tribes in the third century BC, later incorporated into a larger Roman province. Paul founded churches there, addressing them in his Epistle to the Galatians (Gal 1:2) and organizing a collection among them (1 Cor 16:1). First Peter 1:1 includes Galatia among the provinces of the letter's recipients. In 2 Timothy 4:10, Crescens departs for Galatia (some manuscripts read 'Gallia,' i.e., France). French 'Galatie' and German 'Galatien' preserve the geographical name with minimal variation.

(4×) The proper geographical name for a region in central Asia Minor, originally the homeland of settled Celtic tribes and later a Roman province encompassing a broader territory. Paul established congregations there (Gal 1:2), directed charitable collections among them (1 Cor 16:1), and a co-worker later traveled there (2 Tim 4:10). First Peter 1:1 addresses believers scattered across this province. French 'Galatie' and German 'Galatien' reflect the Greek Galatía with standard phonological adaptation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Galatia, of-Galatia | es: Galatía, de-Galatía | fr: Galatie, Γαλατίαν, Γαλατίας | de: Galatien 1Cor 16:1; Gal 1:2; 2Tim 4:10; 1Pet 1:1

Γαλατικός G1054 Adj-AFS (2×)

Galatian, belonging to Galatia, pertaining to the region of Galatia

This adjective means Galatian or belonging to Galatia, a region in central Asia Minor (modern Turkey). The area was inhabited by Celtic tribes who migrated there in the third century BC, giving the region its distinctive character. In Acts, Luke twice describes Paul's missionary journeys through 'the Galatian region' or 'the Galatian country' (Acts 16:6; 18:23). These references indicate Paul's evangelistic work in the interior of Asia Minor, establishing the churches he would later address in his letter to the Galatians. The adjective functions geographically to specify which region Paul traversed during his second and third missionary journeys.

(2×) Acts 16:6 describes Paul and his companions passing through 'the Phrygian and Galatian region' after being prevented from preaching in Asia, marking Paul's first evangelization of Galatia. Acts 18:23 records Paul during his third journey 'going through the Galatian region and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.' Spanish 'gálata/la Gálata', French 'Galate', and German forms maintain the regional adjective. Both passages use the feminine accusative singular modifying 'region' (χώραν), indicating Paul's geographical movement through this territory where he founded churches that faced the Judaizing crisis addressed in Galatians. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Galatian | es: gálata, la-Gálata | fr: Galate | de: Γαλατικὴν Acts 16:6; Acts 18:23

γᾰλήν-η G1055 N-NFS (3×)

calm, stillness of the sea, complete absence of wind and waves

This term describes the profound stillness of the sea when wind and waves completely cease. Classical usage distinguishes calm at sea from calm in the air. In the Gospel accounts, after Jesus rebukes the wind and sea, there comes 'a great calm'—an immediate and complete cessation of the violent storm. The term can also metaphorically describe calmness or serenity of mind, but in the New Testament it appears only in the literal sense of meteorological calm. The sudden transition from fierce storm to perfect stillness amplifies the miracle's dramatic impact.

(3×) All three occurrences (Matthew 8:26, Mark 4:39, Luke 8:24) appear in the Synoptic accounts of Jesus calming the storm. The narrative structure is identical: fierce storm, disciples' fear, Jesus' rebuke of wind and waves, immediate 'great calm.' The multilingual glosses are uniform—English 'calm,' Spanish 'calma,' French 'calme,' German 'Stille'—all emphasizing the complete stillness that follows the storm. The disciples' amazement focuses not just on the storm's cessation but on the unnatural completeness of the resulting calm. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 8275 WITH 8 SENSES

en: a-calm, calm | es: calma | fr: calme | de: Stille, γαλήνη Matt 8:26; Mark 4:39; Luke 8:24

Γαλιλαία G1056 N-GFS (61×)

Galilaia – Galilee, the northern region of Palestine central to Jesus's earthly ministry

Galilaia (from Hebrew ha-galil, 'the circle' or 'the district') denotes the northern region of Palestine where Jesus grew up, called his first disciples, and performed the majority of his public ministry. Isaiah's ancient designation 'Galilee of the Gentiles' (Matt 4:15, quoting Isa 9:1) hints at the region's mixed ethnic character, which made it theologically significant as the place where light first dawned. With 61 occurrences across the Gospels and Acts, it is one of the most frequently named regions in the New Testament. Every target language preserves the toponym with minimal phonetic adaptation: Spanish Galilea, French Galilee, German Galiläa.

Galilee (region in northern Israel) (61×) The proper geographical name for the northern region of Israel/Palestine, encompassing the area around the Sea of Galilee where Jesus was raised in Nazareth and conducted the bulk of his teaching and miracle ministry. Cross-lingual evidence shows uniform transliteration – Spanish Galilea, French Galilee, German Galiläa – confirming a single toponymic identity across all 61 occurrences regardless of grammatical case (nominative, genitive, accusative). GALILEE REGION NAME

en: Galilaia, Galilee, there | es: Galilaia, Galilaía, Galilaían | fr: Galilée | de: Galilaea, Galiläa Matt 2:22; Matt 3:13; Matt 4:12; Matt 4:15; Matt 4:18

Γαλιλαῖος G1057 N-VMP (11×)

Galilean — a native or inhabitant of the region of Galilee in northern Israel; a demonym

The adjective Γαλιλαῖος (Galilaios) identifies a person from Galilee, the northern region of Israel around the Sea of Galilee. All eleven NT occurrences function as a proper gentilic marking ethnic-geographic origin. Peter is recognized as a Galilean by his accent during Jesus' trial (Matt 26:69; Mark 14:70). The angels call the apostles 'men of Galilee' at the Ascension (Acts 1:11), and Pentecost hearers marvel that these speakers are Galileans (Acts 2:7). Spanish 'galileo,' French 'Galiléen,' and Arabic 'jalili' all transliterate directly.

Galilean (11×) A person from the region of Galilee in northern Israel, used as a proper demonym. Applied to Jesus and his disciples (Matt 26:69; Mark 14:70; Luke 22:59, 23:6), the apostles at Pentecost (Acts 1:11; 2:7), Judas the insurrectionist (Acts 5:37), and worshippers killed by Pilate (Luke 13:1-2). Spanish 'galileo,' German 'Galiläer,' and Hindi 'galili' confirm uniform transliteration across languages. GALILEE REGION NAME

en: Galilaians, Galilaioi, Galilaios | es: Galilaios, Galilaíous, Galilaíōn | fr: Galiléen | de: Galilaeer, Galiläa Matt 26:69; Mark 14:70; Luke 13:1; Luke 13:2

Γαλλίων G1058 N-NMS (3×)

Gallio, Roman proconsul of Achaia who dismissed charges against Paul in Corinth

Gallio was the Roman proconsul of Achaia during Paul's ministry in Corinth around AD 51-52. Brother of the philosopher Seneca, Gallio is known from extrabiblical sources as a cultured and affable administrator. When Jewish leaders brought Paul before his judgment seat, Gallio refused to adjudicate what he considered an internal religious dispute, effectively providing legal precedent that Christianity was not illegal under Roman law. His dismissive attitude toward the beating of Sosthenes suggests either indifference to Jewish-Christian conflicts or deliberate protection of Paul's mission.

(3×) All three references occur in Acts 18:12, 14, 17, narrating the failed attempt by Corinthian Jews to prosecute Paul before the proconsul. Gallio's ruling that the dispute involved 'questions about words and names and your own law' established an important legal precedent for early Christian mission. The multilingual glosses preserve the Latin name with Greek spelling variations. Historical records (the Delphi inscription) confirm Gallio's proconsulship, making this one of the New Testament's most precisely datable events. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Galliōn | es: Galliōn | fr: Gamaliel | de: Gethsemane Acts 18:12; Acts 18:14; Acts 18:17

Γαμαλιήλ G1059 N-GMS (2×)

Gamaliel, a respected Pharisee and doctor of the Law, teacher of Saul of Tarsus

This proper name, from Hebrew גַּמְלִיאֵל (Gamli'el, possibly 'reward of God' or 'God is my reward'), identifies Gamaliel the Elder, one of the most honored rabbis in Jewish history. A grandson of the famous Hillel, Gamaliel held the title Rabban ('our master') and sat on the Sanhedrin. Acts presents him as a voice of wisdom and moderation. He advised the council not to fight against the apostles, lest they find themselves fighting against God (Acts 5:34). Later, Paul identifies himself as having been educated 'at the feet of Gamaliel' (Acts 22:3), highlighting his impeccable Jewish credentials. Gamaliel represents the best of Pharisaic learning and prudence.

(2×) Acts 5:34 introduces Gamaliel as 'a Pharisee named Gamaliel, a teacher of the law held in honor by all the people,' who then delivers his famous counsel urging patience with the apostles. Acts 22:3 has Paul declaring he was 'brought up in this city, educated at the feet of Gamaliel according to the strict manner of the law of our fathers.' Spanish 'Gamaliél/de Gamaliél', French forms, and German 'Γαμαλιήλ' preserve the Hebrew name. Both passages establish Gamaliel's authority: as a respected leader whose wisdom prevented persecution (Acts 5) and as the distinguished teacher whose student was Saul/Paul (Acts 22). PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Gamaliēl, of-Gamaliēl | es: Gamaliél, de-Gamaliél | fr: mariage | de: Γαμαλιήλ Acts 5:34; Acts 22:3

γᾰμέω G1060 V-PNA (29×)

To marry, take a spouse; as a participle, one who is married.

The standard Greek verb for entering into marriage, γαμέω appears across the Gospels and Pauline epistles in discussions of marriage, divorce, and celibacy. Jesus uses it in his teaching on divorce (Matt 5:32; 19:9) and in the Sadducees' question about resurrection (Matt 22:25-30). Paul employs it extensively in 1 Corinthians 7 when counseling believers about marriage. Spanish consistently renders it "casarse" (to marry oneself), while the participial forms in Paul ("casada/casado") show the word functioning as a status designation for married persons.

1. marry, take a spouse (25×) The active verbal sense (25x): to enter into marriage, to take a wife or husband. Translations across languages — Spanish "casarse," French "épouser," German "heiraten" — all confirm this as a straightforward marriage verb. Key passages include Jesus' teaching that remarriage after divorce constitutes adultery (Matt 19:9), the eschatological teaching that in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage (Matt 22:30), and Paul's practical counsel that it is better to marry than to burn (1 Cor 7:9). MARRIAGE AND MASTERY en: do-they-marry, having-married, let-them-marry | es: casarse, casándose, cásense | fr: épouser | de: heiraten, heiratet Matt 5:32; Matt 19:9; Matt 19:10; Matt 22:25; Matt 22:30

2. married person, one who has married (4×) A participial or stative sense (4x) designating someone in the condition of being married. Spanish distinguishes this clearly with gendered adjectives "casado/casada" (married man/woman). Paul addresses these individuals specifically in 1 Cor 7:10 ("to the married I give this charge") and describes the divided concerns of the married man (1 Cor 7:33) and married woman (1 Cor 7:34), where the participle functions as a substantive class designation. MARRIAGE AND MASTERY en: having-married | es: casada, casado, casados | fr: épouser | de: heiraten, heiratet Matt 19:9; 1Cor 7:10; 1Cor 7:33; 1Cor 7:34

γαμ-ίσκω G1061 V-PPA-NMP (8×)

To give in marriage; to arrange or bestow someone (especially a daughter) in marriage.

A variant form of γαμίζω, this verb describes the act of giving someone in marriage — typically a parent or guardian arranging a marriage rather than the person marrying. Jesus uses it in eschatological discourse: in the days of Noah, people were 'marrying and being given in marriage' right up until the flood (Matt 24:38; Luke 17:27). He also teaches that in the resurrection, people neither marry nor are given in marriage but are like angels (Matt 22:30; Mark 12:25; Luke 20:35). The passive voice 'being given in marriage' reflects the ancient social reality where marriages were arranged. Spanish 'dar en matrimonio' and French 'donner en mariage' precisely mirror this causative meaning.

give in marriage (8×) To give in marriage, to arrange a marriage for someone — the causative counterpart to γαμέω (to marry). The active voice implies the role of a parent or guardian bestowing a child in marriage, while the passive means 'to be given in marriage.' Jesus employs it in two contexts: describing pre-flood normalcy where people were 'marrying and being given in marriage' (Matt 24:38; Luke 17:27), and teaching that in the resurrection this institution ceases (Matt 22:30; Mark 12:25; Luke 20:35). Spanish 'dar en matrimonio' and French 'donner en mariage' preserve the causative sense precisely. MARRIAGE AND MASTERY en: are-given-in-marriage, giving-in-marriage, they-were-being-married | es: dando-en-matrimonio, dándose-en-matrimonio, se-daban-en-matrimonio | fr: donner-en-mariage | de: verheiraten, γαμίζονται, γαμίζοντες Matt 22:30; Matt 24:38; Mark 12:25; Luke 17:27; Luke 20:34

γάμος G1062 N-AMP (16×)

wedding, marriage feast — a nuptial celebration or the institution of marriage itself

Gamos denotes both the wedding celebration and the broader institution of marriage. In Jesus' parables, the 'wedding feast' (gamos) becomes a powerful image of the kingdom of God — the king who prepares a banquet for his son (Matt 22:2-14) and the wise and foolish virgins awaiting the bridegroom (Matt 25:10). At Cana, Jesus performs his first sign at a gamos (John 2:1-2). In the Epistles, the writer of Hebrews declares that 'marriage should be honored by all' (Heb 13:4), while Revelation culminates in the 'marriage supper of the Lamb' (Rev 19:7-9). Spanish 'boda/bodas,' French 'noces,' and German 'Hochzeit' consistently capture both the festive event and the covenantal bond.

wedding / marriage feast (16×) A wedding celebration or marriage feast, encompassing both the joyful banquet itself (Matt 22:2-14; John 2:1-2; Rev 19:7-9) and the marital institution (Heb 13:4). In parabolic usage, the wedding feast becomes an eschatological image of the kingdom — invitation, readiness, and the final consummation at the marriage supper of the Lamb. All 16 NT occurrences, whether singular or plural, nominative or accusative, refer to nuptial celebration or the state of wedlock without semantic subdivision. MARRIAGE AND MASTERY en: marriage, of-wedding, wedding | es: banquete, boda, bodas | fr: noces | de: Hochzeit Matt 22:2; Matt 22:3; Matt 22:4; Matt 22:8; Matt 22:9

γάρ G1063 Conj (1047×)

gar – causal conjunction 'for,' introducing reason, explanation, or ground for a preceding claim

The conjunction gar ('for') is the primary causal and explanatory connective in New Testament Greek, introducing the reason, ground, or further explanation for what has just been stated. It stands behind some of Scripture's most consequential explanations: 'for God so loved the world' (John 3:16), 'for all have sinned' (Rom 3:23), 'for the wages of sin is death' (Rom 6:23). Appearing 1,047 times, it is one of the most frequent function words in the Greek New Testament. Spanish porque, French car, and German denn each capture its explanatory force cleanly, and the cross-lingual uniformity confirms a single coherent sense.

(1047×) A causal conjunction introducing the reason or explanatory ground for a preceding assertion. In Matt 1:20 the angel explains 'for (gar) that which is conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit,' and in Matt 2:6 a prophetic quotation is introduced with explanatory force. Spanish porque, French car, and German denn all converge on the same explanatory-causal function, with no evidence of polysemy across 1,047 occurrences. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST en: for- | es: *-porque, porque | fr: car | de: denn Matt 1:20; Matt 2:2; Matt 2:6; Matt 2:20; Matt 3:3

γαστήρ G1064 N-DFS (9×)

Womb or belly; the internal body cavity associated with pregnancy and conception, or the stomach as seat of appetite.

Gaster encompasses the internal abdominal cavity, covering two closely related but distinct uses: the womb in pregnancy contexts and the belly as the organ of appetite. Most NT occurrences involve conception and pregnancy—'having in the womb' (en gastri echousa) is the standard Greek idiom for being pregnant, appearing in the annunciation to Mary (Luke 1:31), the Isaianic prophecy (Matt 1:23), and warnings about end-times hardship for expectant mothers (Matt 24:19; Mark 13:17; Luke 21:23). In contrast, Titus 1:12 quotes the Cretan poet Epimenides: 'Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, lazy bellies,' where gaster means the stomach as a symbol of gluttony. Spanish 'vientre' and German 'Leib/Mutterleib' reflect this same dual range of belly and womb.

Womb / belly (internal body cavity) (9×) The womb or belly as an internal body cavity—primarily the womb in contexts of conception and pregnancy, and secondarily the stomach as the seat of appetite and gluttony. The pregnancy idiom 'en gastri echousa' (having in the womb) appears in Matt 1:18, 23; 24:19; Mark 13:17; Luke 1:31; 21:23, spanning the annunciation, the Isaianic prophecy, and eschatological warnings for pregnant women. Titus 1:12 uses the plural 'gasteres' (bellies) pejoratively in the Epimenides quotation about Cretan gluttony. The two uses are united by the same anatomical referent—the abdominal cavity—with context determining whether womb or stomach is in view. WOMB AND BELLY en: bellies, the-womb, womb | es: vientre, vientres | fr: ventre | de: Leib, Mutterleib Matt 1:18; Matt 1:23; Matt 24:19; Mark 13:17; Luke 1:31

γε G1065 Prtcl (16×)

Emphatic enclitic particle: indeed, certainly; at least, at any rate; even (intensifying scalar force).

The tiny Greek particle ge is easy to overlook but hard to translate — an enclitic that clings to the word before it and says 'pay attention here.' Unlike full adverbs, ge modifies emphasis rather than content, which is why translations scatter across 'indeed,' 'certainly,' 'at least,' and sometimes no word at all. Spanish captures its concessive shade with al menos and ciertamente, while French du moins and German doch reach for different pragmatic strategies. Paul exploits its versatile force in 1 Corinthians 9:2, insisting that whatever others may think, 'at least to you I am an apostle,' and again in Philippians 3:8 where ge intensifies his radical claim that he counts all things loss.

1. indeed, certainly, truly (12×) An emphatic affirmative particle reinforcing the truth or certainty of the statement it attaches to — 'indeed, certainly, truly.' With 12 occurrences, this is ge's default function: confirming what might otherwise seem doubtful. In Acts 17:27, Paul declares God is 'not far from each one of us' with ge underscoring the certainty. Luke 24:21 uses it in the disciples' wistful 'we were hoping that he was the one.' Spanish ciertamente, French certes, and German ja-doch all deploy affirmative markers here. AFFIRMATION PARTICLES

en: indeed, indeed- | es: *, -, ciertamente | fr: certes, certes-, du-moins | de: doch, ja- Luke 24:21; Acts 2:18; Acts 8:30; Acts 17:27

2. at least, at any rate (3×) A restrictive or concessive particle meaning 'at least, at any rate,' setting a minimum threshold even when the broader claim may be contested. Three occurrences carry this shade: the persistent widow who will get justice 'at least' because of her boldness (Luke 18:5), the neighbor who will help 'at least' because of shameless persistence (Luke 11:8), and Paul's appeal that 'at least to you I am an apostle' (1 Cor 9:2). Spanish al menos and French du moins make the concessive logic explicit where English often smooths it away. AFFIRMATION PARTICLES

en: indeed- | es: *, al-menos, ciertamente | fr: certes-, du-moins | de: doch, ja- Luke 11:8; Luke 18:5; 1Cor 9:2

3. even, intensifying emphasis (1×) An intensive scalar particle that heightens or escalates a word's force to mean 'even,' pushing emphasis beyond what context alone would supply. The single clear NT instance is Philippians 3:8, where Paul writes 'I count all things to be loss in view of the surpassing value of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I suffered the loss of all things and count them as rubbish.' Spanish aun ('even'), French certes, and German ja capture the scalar escalation. This intensifying use echoes classical Greek's deployment of ge with superlatives and universals. AFFIRMATION PARTICLES

en: even- | es: aun | fr: certes | de: ja- Phil 3:8

Γεδεών G1066 N-GMS (1×)

Gideon, Old Testament judge who delivered Israel from Midian; a hero of faith

Gideon was an Israelite judge who delivered Israel from Midianite oppression through divine empowerment despite personal weakness and national apostasy (Judges 6-8). In Hebrews 11:32, he appears in the catalog of faith heroes who through trust in God conquered kingdoms and enforced justice. His story emphasizes God's choice of unlikely instruments and the power of faith over superior military force. All translations preserve the name in transliteration (Spanish Gedeōn, French Gideon, German Gideon), recognizing him as one of Scripture's exemplary figures of faith-enabled deliverance.

(1×) The Old Testament judge listed among heroes of faith (Heb 11:32). Gideon's inclusion celebrates his faith-enabled victory over Midian despite initial reluctance and limited resources. All translations preserve the Hebrew name, with readers expected to recall the narrative of divine empowerment through fleeces, trumpet-breaking, and the reduction of his army to 300—demonstrating that faith, not numbers, wins God's battles. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Gedeōn | es: Gedeōn | fr: Gideon | de: Gideon Heb 11:32

γέεννα G1067 N-AFS (12×)

Gehenna — the Valley of Hinnom as a symbol of eschatological punishment; hell, place of final destruction

Geenna, a Greek transliteration of Hebrew gē-hinnom (Valley of Hinnom), transforms a specific Jerusalem toponym into the New Testament's primary image of eschatological punishment. The valley south of Jerusalem had become infamous as the site of child sacrifice to Molech (2 Kgs 23:10; Jer 7:31-32), and by the intertestamental period it symbolized the place of divine judgment on the wicked. Jesus uses the term exclusively in the Synoptics, warning that the whole body may be cast into Gehenna (Matt 5:29-30), that God can destroy both soul and body there (Matt 10:28), and that its fire is unquenchable (Mark 9:43-48). James 3:6 extends the image to the tongue 'set on fire by Gehenna.' Spanish 'Gehenna,' French 'géhenne,' and German 'Hölle/Gehenna' all attempt to render this loaded term.

Gehenna (12×) The eschatological place of punishment and destruction for the wicked, depicted as a realm of unquenchable fire. All twelve NT occurrences carry this meaning. Jesus warns of 'the Gehenna of fire' (Matt 5:22; 18:9), the destruction of body and soul (Matt 10:28; Luke 12:5), and eternal fire prepared for condemnation (Mark 9:43, 45, 47). It stands in contrast to entry into life or the kingdom. James 3:6 uses it metaphorically for the destructive power of the tongue. Spanish 'Gehenna' and German 'Hölle' both convey the finality and severity of this judgment. DEATH AND DYING

en: Gehenna, of-Gehenna | es: Gehenna, de-Gehenna, gehena | fr: géhenne | de: Gehenna, Hoelle Matt 5:22; Matt 5:29; Matt 5:30; Matt 10:28; Matt 18:9

Γεθσημασεί G1068 N-ANS (2×)

Gethsemane, a garden on the Mount of Olives where Jesus prayed before His arrest

This place name, from Hebrew/Aramaic meaning 'oil press' or 'olive press,' identifies the garden on the Mount of Olives where Jesus retreated to pray the night before His crucifixion. The site likely contained an olive press, giving it its name. Though John 18:1 calls it a 'garden' without naming it, Matthew and Mark specifically name it Gethsemane (Matt 26:36; Mark 14:32). This place became the scene of Jesus's agonized prayer, His acceptance of the cup of suffering, and His arrest. The name evokes one of Scripture's most profound moments: the Son of God submitting to the Father's will while His disciples slept nearby.

(2×) Matthew 26:36 records Jesus coming 'to a place called Gethsemane' and telling His disciples to sit while He prays. Mark 14:32 uses nearly identical language: 'they came to a place which was named Gethsemane.' Spanish 'Getsemaní/Getsemaní', French 'Gethsémané', and German 'Gethsemane/Γεθσημανί' show slight spelling variation in transliterating the Aramaic. Both Gospel accounts name this specific location where Jesus's passion narrative intensifies from anticipation to reality. The garden's name, meaning oil press, carries symbolic resonance: as olives were crushed to produce oil, so the Messiah was 'pressed' under the weight of humanity's sin in this very place. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Gethsēmani | es: Gethsemaní, Gethsēmaní | fr: Gethsémané | de: Gethsemane, Γεθσημανὶ Matt 26:36; Mark 14:32

γείτων G1069 N-NMP (4×)

A neighbor; one who lives nearby in the same community

The noun geítōn designates a neighbor — someone who lives in close physical proximity. All four NT occurrences appear in Luke-John, carrying a warm communal connotation. In Jesus' parable instructions, a host is told not to invite neighbors to a banquet expecting reciprocity (Luke 14:12). The shepherd who finds his lost sheep and the woman who finds her lost coin both call together friends and neighbors to share their joy (Luke 15:6, 9). In John 9:8, neighbors of the man born blind debate his identity after his healing. Spanish 'vecinos,' French 'voisin,' and German 'Nachbarn' all denote this same concept of residential proximity.

(4×) A person who lives nearby, a residential neighbor, often implying a network of communal relationships and mutual familiarity. Luke uses the term in contexts of shared celebration (Luke 15:6, 9 — neighbors rejoicing over what was lost and found) and social obligation (Luke 14:12 — not inviting neighbors merely for reciprocal gain). John 9:8 shows neighbors as those who recognize someone by daily proximity. Spanish 'vecinos,' French 'voisin,' and German 'Nachbarn' all consistently denote residential proximity rather than the broader 'neighbor' of moral teaching (for which Greek uses plēsíon). NEIGHBOR FELLOW

en: neighbors | es: a-vecinos, vecinas, vecinos | fr: voisin | de: Nachbarn, γείτονας Luke 14:12; Luke 15:6; Luke 15:9; John 9:8

γελάω G1070 V-PPA-VMP (2×)

to laugh, to express joy or amusement through laughter

This verb means to laugh, expressing joy, amusement, or sometimes scorn through laughter. Classical Greek used it across a range from genuine mirth to mocking derision. In the New Testament, Jesus uses it in two parallel beatitudes and woes in Luke's Sermon on the Plain. He pronounces blessing on those who weep now, promising 'you shall laugh' (Luke 6:21), and pronounces woe on those who laugh now, warning 'you shall mourn and weep' (Luke 6:25). The stark contrast creates a reversal theme: present sorrow will turn to joy, present laughter to mourning. Both uses are future indicative, promising certain coming reversals.

(2×) Luke 6:21 concludes a beatitude: 'Blessed are you who weep now, for you shall laugh' (future middle indicative γελάσετε), promising that present grief will transform into joy. Luke 6:25 begins a woe: 'Woe to you who laugh now, for you shall mourn and weep,' warning that present joy will reverse into sorrow. Spanish 'reiréis/que ríen', French 'rire', and German 'γελάσετε/γελῶντες' capture both the future verb and present participle. The two passages form a deliberate antithesis in Jesus's teaching about eschatological reversal: those who weep in solidarity with the suffering will find joy in God's kingdom, while those who laugh carelessly now will face judgment's grief. LAUGHING AND PLAYING

en: laughing, you-will-laugh | es: que-ríen, reiréis | fr: rire | de: γελάσετε, γελῶντες Luke 6:21; Luke 6:25

γέλως G1071 N-NMS (1×)

laughter, the act or sound of laughing; mirth or derision expressed audibly

This noun denotes laughter, the physical expression of mirth, joy, or sometimes mockery. In James 4:9, it appears in a call to repentance: "Let your laughter be turned to mourning"—a reversal from frivolous joy to serious grief over sin. Classical usage encompasses both genuine merriment and derisive mockery, with emphasis on the audible, physical manifestation. The translations (Spanish risa, French/German retaining the Greek or using Lachen) all point to the outward expression of levity that must give way to appropriate sorrow for sin in James's call to humble repentance.

(1×) Laughter as an expression of levity that must turn to mourning (Jas 4:9). James calls for the reversal of inappropriate mirth to godly sorrow—laughter giving way to mourning as pride yields to humility. The Spanish risa and German Lachen both capture the audible, physical expression of joy or amusement that, in the context of addressing sin and division, represents misplaced frivolity needing replacement with serious repentance. LAUGHTER AND DERISION

en: laughter | es: risa | fr: γέλως | de: Lachen Jas 4:9

γεμ-ίζω G1072 V-ASP-3S (9×)

To fill a container, vessel, or space completely with a substance; to load or stuff full.

A concrete, physical verb meaning to fill something to capacity. In the Gospels it appears in vivid narrative moments: servants filling stone jars with water at Cana (John 2:7), disciples gathering twelve baskets full of fragments (John 6:13), and waves swamping a boat on the Sea of Galilee (Mark 4:37). The Spanish 'llenad' and French 'remplir' both preserve the straightforward, active sense of loading or charging a vessel. Whether the object is a jar, a basket, a boat, or a sponge (Mark 15:36), the word consistently pictures something being packed to the brim.

fill, be filled (9×) To fill a container or space completely with a substance, whether liquid, solid fragments, or even waves. The nine NT occurrences all involve literal, physical filling: water into jars at Cana (John 2:7), leftover fragments into baskets (John 6:13), waves swamping a boat (Mark 4:37), vinegar soaked into a sponge (Mark 15:36), and a house filled with guests in the great banquet parable (Luke 14:23). Every major translation language renders it with a basic 'fill' verb — Spanish 'llenad,' French 'remplir,' German 'fuellen' — confirming the uniformly concrete, physical semantic range in the NT. FILLING AND FULLNESS

en: Fill, filled, filling | es: Llenad, fue-llenado, habiendo-llenado | fr: remplir | de: fuellen, γεμίσαι, γεμισθῇ Mark 4:37; Mark 15:36; Luke 14:23; Luke 15:16; John 2:7

γέμω G1073 V-PPA-GNP (11×)

To be full, filled with — brimming or laden with physical contents or moral qualities

The verb γέμω (gemo) means to be full or brimming with something, used of containers, places, or persons laden with physical or moral contents. Jesus denounces Pharisees whose cups are 'full of' greed inside (Matt 23:25) and who resemble tombs 'full of' bones (Matt 23:27). Paul quotes the psalm about mouths 'full of' cursing (Rom 3:14). In Revelation, living creatures are 'full of' eyes (Rev 4:6), bowls 'full of' incense (Rev 5:8), and vials 'full of' plagues (Rev 15:7). Spanish 'lleno/llena' and German 'voll' capture the meaning consistently.

to be full / filled with (11×) To be full, brimming, or laden with something physical or moral. Denunciatory: cups 'full of' greed (Matt 23:25; Luke 11:39), tombs 'full of' bones (Matt 23:27), mouths 'full of' cursing (Rom 3:14). Apocalyptic: creatures 'full of' eyes (Rev 4:6, 8), bowls 'full of' incense-prayers (Rev 5:8) and divine wrath (Rev 15:7; 17:3-4). Spanish 'lleno,' Arabic 'mamlu'a,' and Swahili 'imejaa' all confirm a single unified sense. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: are-full, being-full, full | es: está-llena, está-lleno, están-llenos | fr: être-plein | de: voll, γέμει, γέμουσιν Matt 23:25; Matt 23:27; Luke 11:39; Rom 3:14; Rev 4:6

γενεά G1074 N-NFS (43×)

generation — the people living in a given era, or the time-span of one generational succession

Genea derives from the root gen- ('to be born') and carries a double resonance throughout the New Testament: it names both the people alive during a particular period and the period itself. Jesus uses it most memorably in rebukes — 'this wicked and adulterous generation' (Matt 12:39) — where it takes on a moral coloring, characterizing an entire age by its spiritual disposition. In the Matthean genealogy (Matt 1:17), it marks the measured intervals of salvation history: fourteen generations from Abraham to David. The translation traditions consistently render it with a single term — Spanish 'generacion,' French 'generation,' German 'Geschlecht' — confirming a unified semantic profile.

Generation (people of an era / lineage period) (43×) The people living in a shared epoch, or the time-span of one genealogical link. Jesus frequently charges 'this generation' with moral appraisal (Matt 11:16; 12:39), while Matthew 1:17 uses it to measure salvation-historical intervals. Spanish 'generacion,' French 'generation,' German 'Geschlecht' confirm a unified temporal-collective sense. GENERATION AND LINEAGE

en: a-generation, generation | es: generación | fr: génération | de: Geschlecht Matt 1:17; Matt 11:16

γενεᾱλογ-έω G1075 V-PPM/P-NMS (1×)

tracing descent, reckoning genealogy; establishing lineage from an ancestor

This participle means tracing or reckoning genealogical descent, establishing one's lineage from a particular ancestor. In Hebrews 7:6, it describes Melchizedek's relationship (or lack thereof) to the Levitical genealogies—he blessed Abraham without being genealogically derived from him. The verb encompasses drawing up pedigrees and establishing ancestral connections. The translations vary: Spanish uses a complex passive construction ("siendo contado"), French abstammen ("descend from"), German likewise, all pointing to the establishment of genealogical connection that proves significant for the argument about Melchizedek's superiority.

(1×) Establishing genealogical descent or connection (Heb 7:6). The passage argues that Melchizedek blessed Abraham without tracing his own descent from Abraham—establishing his superiority since the greater blesses the lesser. The Spanish construction siendo contado en genealogía and German abstammen both emphasize the formal reckoning of lineage, which proves crucial for the author's argument about priesthood superiority based on genealogical independence. GENEALOGY ENROLLMENT

en: tracing-descent | es: siendo-contado-en-genealogía | fr: abstammen | de: abstammen Heb 7:6

γενεᾱλογ-ία G1076 N-AFP (2×)

genealogy, family lineage, record of descent, tracing of pedigree

This noun denotes a genealogy or record of family descent, the tracing of one's pedigree through ancestral lines. Classical Greek used it for the study or recording of lineages. In the New Testament, Paul uses it negatively in his pastoral epistles, warning against endless speculation about genealogies. He tells Timothy to command certain people not to teach different doctrines or 'give heed to fables and endless genealogies which cause disputes' (1 Tim 1:4), and later tells Titus to 'avoid foolish disputes, genealogies, contentions, and strivings about the law' (Titus 3:9). The concern isn't with legitimate genealogical records (like those in Matthew and Luke) but with speculative, divisive teaching that generated controversy without spiritual profit.

(2×) 1 Timothy 1:4 warns against 'fables and endless genealogies' (γενεαλογίαις ἀπεράντοις) that promote speculations rather than God's stewardship of faith. Titus 3:9 lists 'genealogies' alongside foolish disputes and arguments about the law as things to avoid. Spanish 'genealogías', French forms, and German 'Geschlechtsregister' all reference ancestry records. Both passages treat genealogies as potentially problematic when they become ends in themselves, generating controversy rather than building faith. The problem wasn't genealogy per se but the speculative, endless exploration of lineages that distracted from the gospel and created division rather than promoting godliness. GENEALOGY ENROLLMENT

en: genealogies | es: genealogías | fr: γενεαλογίαις, γενεαλογίας | de: Geschlechtsregister 1Tim 1:4; Titus 3:9

γενέσι-ος G1077 N-DNP (2×)

birthday celebration, birthday feast, anniversary of one's birth

This neuter plural noun denotes a birthday celebration or feast commemorating someone's birth. Classical Greek distinguished genesia (memorial feasts for the dead) from genethlia (birthday celebrations for the living), though the words could overlap. In the New Testament, both occurrences describe the same event: Herod Antipas's birthday feast where Herodias's daughter danced and John the Baptist was beheaded. Matthew records 'Herod's birthday' being celebrated (Matt 14:6), while Mark specifies 'his birthday' when Herod made a feast (Mark 6:21). This notorious celebration became infamous as the occasion when a rash oath led to the martyrdom of Jesus's forerunner.

(2×) Matthew 14:6 states that 'when Herod's birthday (genesiois) was being celebrated,' Herodias's daughter danced before him, leading to John's execution. Mark 6:21 describes 'an opportune day' coming 'when Herod on his birthday (genesiois) made a supper' for his officials. Spanish 'cumpleaños', French 'anniversaire', and German 'Geburtstag/γενεσίοις' all reference birthday celebrations. Both accounts use the dative plural, probably indicating 'on his birthday' (dative of time). The shared narrative makes this birthday feast one of Scripture's most tragic celebrations: a festive occasion turned into the judicial murder of a prophet through Herod's foolish oath and moral weakness. BANQUETS AND FEASTS

en: birthday | es: cumpleaños | fr: anniversaire | de: Geburtstag, γενεσίοις Matt 14:6; Mark 6:21

γένεσις G1078 N-DFS (5×)

Origin, birth, coming into being; used of genealogical lineage, the event of birth, and the course of existence.

Carries a semantic range spanning origin, birth, and the process of coming into being. Matthew opens his Gospel with the 'book of the genesis' of Jesus Christ (Matt 1:1), evoking both genealogical record and new creation. The same word describes the circumstances of Jesus' birth (Matt 1:18). Luke uses it for the joy surrounding John the Baptist's birth (Luke 1:14). James employs it twice in striking phrases: the 'face of one's genesis' — one's natural appearance (Jas 1:23) — and 'the wheel of genesis,' the cycle of existence set ablaze by the tongue (Jas 3:6). Spanish captures this breadth with 'génesis,' 'generación,' and 'existencia.'

(5×) Origin, birth, or coming into being. The word encompasses genealogical origin (Matt 1:1, where 'biblos geneseōs' echoes Genesis and signals a new chapter in redemptive history), the physical event of birth (Matt 1:18; Luke 1:14), and the broader course or cycle of natural existence (Jas 1:23, the 'face of one's origin' meaning one's natural face; Jas 3:6, 'the wheel of genesis' denoting the entire round of life). The German 'Geschlecht' (lineage) alongside 'Geburt' (birth) reflects the dual genealogical and natal senses. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: birth, of-origin | es: de-generación, existencia, génesis | fr: naissance | de: Geburt, Geschlecht Matt 1:1; Matt 1:18; Luke 1:14; Jas 1:23; Jas 3:6

γενετ-ή G1079 N-GFS (1×)

birth, the moment or circumstance of being born; nativity

This noun denotes birth, specifically the moment or circumstance of nativity. In John 9:1, Jesus sees a man blind "from birth"—a condition existing since the hour of his birth. The term emphasizes the precise moment of origin, birth as a temporal marker. Classical usage phrases like "from birth" (ek genetēs) mark conditions or characteristics present from life's beginning. The translations (Spanish nacimiento, French naissance, German Geburt) all use standard birth terminology, establishing that the man's blindness was congenital, not acquired—setting up Jesus' statement that this was for God's glory, not anyone's sin.

(1×) The moment of birth as a temporal marker for a lifelong condition (John 9:1). The man's blindness from birth establishes its congenital nature, eliminating acquired causes and setting up the disciples' question about sin and suffering. The Spanish nacimiento, French naissance, and German Geburt all emphasize the nativity moment, with the prepositional phrase "from birth" indicating the blindness originated at life's beginning—making the healing all the more remarkable. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: birth | es: nacimiento | fr: naissance | de: Geburt John 9:1

γενν-άω G1080 V-RIP-1P (97×)

To beget (of a father), be born (passive), or give birth to (of a mother); encompasses physical lineage, spiritual rebirth, and divine generation.

A verb at the heart of biblical genealogy and theology alike. In Matthew's opening chapter alone it appears dozens of times tracing the lineage from Abraham to Christ — 'Abraham begot Isaac.' Yet the same word describes being 'born of the Spirit' in John 3 and being 'born of God' in 1 John, stretching physical begetting into the realm of spiritual rebirth. The LSJ entry notes metaphorical usage as early as the fifth century BC, but the New Testament writers press this metaphor further than any classical author. Spanish 'engendró' (begot) and 'ha nacido' (has been born) neatly mirror the active-passive distinction.

1. beget, father a child (49×) To beget or father a child, with the male parent as agent. This is the genealogical workhorse of Matt 1:2-16, where the formula 'A begot B' chains forty-two generations. It also describes God's unique generation of the Son (Heb 1:5, quoting Ps 2:7). Spanish 'engendró' and French 'engendrer' both preserve the active paternal force. The 49 occurrences cluster heavily in genealogies and christological declarations. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: fathered | es: engendró | fr: engendrer | de: zeugt Matt 1:2; Matt 1:3

2. be born, come into existence (44×) To be born or come into existence (passive/middle), with the one born as subject. Physical birth appears in Matt 2:1 ('Jesus, having been born in Bethlehem'), while spiritual rebirth dominates in John 3 and 1 John ('born of God,' 'born of the Spirit'). German distinguishes this with 'geborenwerden,' and Spanish shifts to 'ha nacido.' The 44 occurrences span the full range from literal delivery to metaphorical regeneration. BIRTH BEING BORN

en: has-been-born, having-been-born, he-has-been-born | es: engendrado, fueengendrado, ha-nacido | fr: engendrer | de: geboren-werden, zeugt Matt 1:16; Matt 1:20; Matt 2:1; Matt 2:4; Matt 19:12

3. give birth to, bear (4×) To give birth to or bear a child, with the mother as agent. Luke 1:13 ('Elizabeth will bear you a son') and John 16:21 ('a woman giving birth') foreground the maternal role. Spanish 'dará-a-luz' and 'dio-a-luz' (literally 'will give to light / gave to light') beautifully capture the imagery of bringing a child into the light of day. Only four occurrences carry this specifically maternal sense. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: giving-birth, she-bears, she-bore | es: dará-a-luz, dio-a-luz, engendrando | fr: engendrer | de: geboren-werden, zeugt Luke 1:13; Luke 1:57; John 16:21; Gal 4:24

γέννημα G1081 N-GNS (8×)

Fruit, produce, or yield of the earth; also offspring or brood, used as a metaphorical term of reproach.

A noun with two quite different applications. In its agricultural sense, it refers to the fruit or produce of the land, most memorably in the phrase 'fruit of the vine' spoken by Jesus at the Last Supper (Matt 26:29; Mark 14:25; Luke 22:18). In 2 Corinthians 9:10 Paul uses it of the harvest God multiplies for generous givers. The other sense is sharply metaphorical: 'offspring of vipers' — a stinging epithet hurled by John the Baptist and Jesus at the religious elite (Matt 3:7; 12:34; 23:33; Luke 3:7). Hindi translations use 'संतान' (offspring) for this second sense, underscoring the biological metaphor of descent from poisonous stock.

1. fruit / produce (4×) Agricultural fruit, produce, or yield — what the earth or a vine brings forth. Jesus uses the phrase 'fruit of the vine' at the Last Supper to refer to wine (Matt 26:29; Mark 14:25; Luke 22:18), and Paul speaks of God increasing the 'fruits' of the Corinthians' righteousness (2 Cor 9:10). Spanish 'fruto/frutos' and German 'Ertrag' both emphasize the concrete, harvested product. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: fruit, fruits | es: fruto, frutos | fr: fruit, γενήματα | de: Ertrag, γενήματος Matt 26:29; Mark 14:25; Luke 22:18; 2Cor 9:10

2. offspring / brood (4×) Offspring or brood, used metaphorically in the biting phrase 'offspring of vipers' (gennemata echidnon). John the Baptist (Matt 3:7; Luke 3:7) and Jesus (Matt 12:34; 23:33) apply this epithet to those whose character reveals corrupt parentage. Spanish splits between 'crías' (young of an animal) and 'engendros' (something engendered), and Hindi uses 'संतानों' (descendants), all highlighting the biological lineage metaphor at work — these people are what their spiritual ancestry has produced. SEED AND OFFSPRING

en: Offspring, offspring | es: Crías, engendros, generación | fr: fruit | de: Γεννήματα, γεννήματα Matt 3:7; Matt 12:34; Matt 23:33; Luke 3:7

Γεννησαρέτ G1082 N-AFS (3×)

Gennesaret, fertile plain on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee

Gennesaret was both a fertile plain and, by extension, a name for the lake itself (otherwise called the Sea of Galilee or Lake of Tiberias). The region was renowned in antiquity for its productivity and pleasant climate. The plain on the northwestern shore provided rich agricultural land. When the Gospels mention Jesus and the disciples landing 'at Gennesaret,' they refer to this distinctive coastal area. The name derives from Hebrew Kinnereth, itself possibly meaning 'harp-shaped' from the lake's contours.

(3×) Matthew 14:34 and Mark 6:53 describe the landing at 'the land of Gennesaret' after the miraculous feeding and Jesus walking on water. Luke 5:1 refers to 'the lake of Gennesaret' during the miraculous catch of fish. The multilingual glosses preserve the name with minor orthographic variation—Spanish 'Gennēsarét,' French 'Génésareth,' German 'Gennesaret.' The region's fertility and accessibility made it a natural center for Jesus' Galilean ministry, with multiple villages clustered around this productive plain. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Gennēsaret, of-Gennēsaret | es: Gennēsarét | fr: Génésareth | de: Gennesaret, Γεννησαρέτ Matt 14:34; Mark 6:53; Luke 5:1

γέννησις G1083

birth, engendering, begetting; production or bringing forth

A feminine noun denoting the process of bringing something into existence. Its primary reference is to biological birth—the act of engendering or being born. This encompasses both the begetting action (from the parent's perspective) and the birth event itself (from the offspring's perspective). The word extends metaphorically to the production of good things or other abstractions, maintaining the core sense of something being brought forth or generated. New Testament usage focuses on the birth meaning, while classical texts employ it more broadly for any kind of production or generation.

γεννητός G1084 Adj-DMP (2×)

born, begotten, brought into existence through birth, born of (woman)

This verbal adjective means born or begotten, describing someone brought into existence through natural birth. Classical Greek used it to distinguish those naturally begotten from those adopted, and to describe mortals (born ones) in contrast to immortal gods. In the New Testament, Jesus uses it in parallel sayings about human dignity and John the Baptist's greatness. He declares that among 'those born of women' there has not risen anyone greater than John the Baptist (Matt 11:11), with Luke recording the identical phrase (Luke 7:28). The expression 'born of women' is a Hebrew idiom meaning all humanity—every person who has ever lived entered the world through human birth.

(2×) Matthew 11:11 and Luke 7:28 contain Jesus's identical assessment: 'Among those born (gennētois) of women there has not arisen anyone greater than John the Baptist; yet he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he.' Spanish 'nacidos', French 'né', and German forms maintain this birth-related meaning. The dative plural modifies 'women,' creating the phrase 'born-ones of women.' Jesus uses this universal category (all humanity) to establish John's unsurpassed greatness among all who have ever lived, while simultaneously showing that kingdom participation transcends even the greatest natural human achievement—a stunning statement about grace and the new creation. BIRTH BEING BORN

en: ones-born, those-born | es: nacidos | fr: né | de: γεννητοῖς Matt 11:11; Luke 7:28

γένος G1085 N-GNS (21×)

Race, family lineage, offspring; kind or type of thing; an ethnic nation or people group sharing common descent.

The Greek noun genos carries the fundamental idea of shared origin — what people, things, or categories have in common by birth or nature. In the New Testament, its most frequent use (11 occurrences) traces family lineage and descent: Barnabas is a Levite 'by birth' (Acts 4:36), Joseph's 'family' becomes known to Pharaoh (Acts 7:13), and Paul addresses 'men of the family of Abraham' (Acts 13:26). Spanish linaje, French race, and German Geschlecht all gravitate toward the genealogical register. A second sense classifies types or categories — 'every kind of fish' (Matt 13:47), 'kinds of tongues' (1 Cor 12:10) — where Spanish shifts to genero and English to 'kind.' The third sense marks ethnic or national identity: Paul is 'of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin' (Phil 3:5), and he suffers 'danger from my own countrymen' (2 Cor 11:26). These three senses share the root idea of genos as a group defined by common origin, whether biological, categorical, or ethnic.

1. family, lineage, offspring (11×) Family lineage, descent, or offspring — the group of people related by birth, parentage, or ancestral line. With 11 occurrences, this is the dominant NT sense, covering Barnabas as 'a Levite, a native of Cyprus' (Acts 4:36), Joseph's family being revealed (Acts 7:13), Pharaoh's command against the Israelite race (Acts 7:19), and Paul's appeal to 'sons of the family of Abraham' (Acts 13:26). Spanish linaje and de origen, French race, and German Geschlecht all center on genealogical descent. The high priest's household is identified as 'of the high-priestly family' (Acts 4:6), showing genos as a marker of institutional as well as biological kinship. GENERATION AND LINEAGE

en: birth, family, of-race | es: Linaje, de-linaje, de-origen | fr: race | de: Geschlecht Acts 4:6; Acts 4:36; Acts 7:13; Acts 7:19; Acts 13:26

2. kind, type, class (6×) A kind, type, or class of things — a categorical grouping based on shared characteristics rather than biological descent. Found in 6 occurrences, this sense classifies varieties: 'every kind (genos) of fish' gathered in the dragnet parable (Matt 13:47), 'kinds of tongues' among spiritual gifts (1 Cor 12:10, 28), and 'this kind (of demon) does not go out except by prayer' (Matt 17:21; Mark 9:29). Spanish genero/generos and the shift away from lineage vocabulary confirm that translators recognize a genuinely taxonomic sense here, distinct from familial descent. GENERATION AND LINEAGE

en: kind, kinds | es: género, géneros | fr: race | de: Geschlecht Matt 13:47; Matt 17:21; Mark 9:29; 1Cor 12:10; 1Cor 12:28

3. race, nation, people (4×) A race, nation, or people group sharing common ethnic descent or national identity. With 4 occurrences, this sense identifies one's people or countrymen as a collective: the Syrophoenician woman is 'Greek, Syrophoenician by race' (Mark 7:26), Paul lists 'danger from my own countrymen (genous)' (2 Cor 11:26), his zeal surpassed others 'in my race (genei)' (Gal 1:14), and his pedigree is 'of the race (genous) of Israel' (Phil 3:5). Spanish raza, French race, and German Geschlecht here take on a distinctly national-ethnic coloring, distinguishing this sense from individual family descent (sense 1) by its collective, people-group scope. GENERATION AND LINEAGE

en: countrymen, nation, race | es: de-raza, linaje, mi-raza | fr: race | de: Geschlecht Mark 7:26; 2Cor 11:26; Gal 1:14; Phil 3:5

Γεργασηνός G1086 N-GMP (3×)

Gerasenes, inhabitants of Gerasa/Gergesa, region on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee

The Gerasenes were inhabitants of the region around Gerasa or Gergesa, located on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee. Textual variants in Gospel manuscripts reflect uncertainty about the precise location—some read 'Gadarenes,' others 'Gergesenes,' others 'Gerasenes.' The most likely site is Gergesa (modern Kursi), directly on the lake's eastern shore with steep slopes descending to the water, matching the narrative's topographical details about pigs rushing down the bank. This was predominantly Gentile territory, explaining the presence of swine herds.

(3×) All three occurrences (Mark 5:1, Luke 8:26, 37) refer to the inhabitants of the region where Jesus healed the demoniac living among the tombs. The narrative's geographical markers—crossing the sea, steep bank, pig herd—fit the eastern shore location. The multilingual glosses show the textual complexity—Spanish offers variant forms 'Gerasēnón/Gerasēnôn,' French 'Gadarénien' (reflecting manuscript variants), German 'Gerasener.' The townsfolk's request that Jesus leave their region reveals their prioritization of economic security (lost pigs) over spiritual liberation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Gerasenes, Gerasēnoi | es: Gerasēnón, Gerasēnôn | fr: Gadarénien | de: Gerasener, Γερασηνῶν Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26; Luke 8:37

γερουσί-α G1087 N-AFS (1×)

senate, council of elders; governing assembly of senior leaders

This noun denotes a council of elders or senate, a governing body of senior leaders. In Acts 5:21, it refers to the Jewish Sanhedrin or council of elders summoned to judge the apostles. The term was used for Greek city-state senates, the Roman Senate, and the Carthaginian council, generally designating formal assemblies of elder statesmen. The translations (Spanish senado, French sénat, German retaining the Greek) employ governmental terminology for senior legislative or judicial bodies, fitting the Sanhedrin's role as Judaism's supreme council.

(1×) The Jewish council of elders or Sanhedrin (Acts 5:21). The term emphasizes the assembly's character as an elder council with judicial and religious authority. The Spanish senado and French sénat both use standard political terminology for senior governing bodies, while the parallel with Greek and Roman governmental structures highlights the Sanhedrin's institutional role as Judaism's supreme court and legislative assembly in Jerusalem. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: senate | es: senado | fr: sénat | de: γερουσίαν Acts 5:21

γέρων G1088 N-NMS (1×)

Old man, elderly person

An aged male, someone advanced in years. The term appears in Nicodemus's puzzled question about rebirth in John 3:4, where he asks whether someone can enter their mother's womb when they are old. The Greek term carries the weight of advanced age and the physical limitations that come with it, making Nicodemus's rhetorical question especially vivid.

(1×) Designates a male person of advanced age. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'viejo', French 'vieillard', German 'alt') all point to the core sense of elderliness. In John 3:4, Nicodemus uses this word to emphasize the impossibility of physical rebirth for someone who has already lived many years, contrasting the natural aging process with Jesus's spiritual teaching about being born again. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: old | es: viejo | fr: vieillard | de: alt John 3:4

γεύω G1089 V-ASM-3P (15×)

To taste; literally of eating or drinking, figuratively of experiencing something firsthand, especially death or divine grace.

At its root γεύομαι means simply to taste food or drink, but in the NT it is far more often used figuratively — to experience or come to know something by personal encounter. The expression 'taste death' (Matt 16:28; John 8:52; Heb 2:9) became a vivid idiom for undergoing death, preserved across languages from Spanish 'gustar' to German 'schmecken.' The literal sense appears at key narrative moments: Jesus tasting soured wine on the cross (Matt 27:34) and the master of the feast tasting water turned to wine at Cana (John 2:9). Both senses share the core image of direct, firsthand contact.

1. experience, come to know (10×) The figurative sense: to experience or partake of something personally and directly, especially used in the idiom 'taste death' (Matt 16:28; Mark 9:1; Heb 2:9), meaning to undergo death. Also applied to tasting 'the heavenly gift' and 'the goodness of the Lord' (Heb 6:4-5; 1 Pet 2:3). Spanish 'gustar' and French 'goûter' preserve the same metaphorical extension from physical taste to experiential knowledge. The figurative usage accounts for two-thirds of NT occurrences. TASTE EXPERIENCE

en: having-tasted, he-might-taste, he-will-taste | es: gustara, gustarán, gustasteis | fr: goûter | de: kostet, schmecken Matt 16:28; Mark 9:1; Luke 9:27; Luke 14:24; John 8:52

2. taste physically, eat (5×) The literal, physical sense of tasting or eating food and drink. At Matt 27:34 Jesus tastes the soured wine but refuses to drink; at John 2:9 the master of the feast tastes the water-become-wine. Acts 10:10 and 20:11 use it for taking a meal, and Col 2:21 quotes ascetic prohibitions: 'do not handle, do not taste, do not touch.' The multilingual glosses here — Spanish 'gustes,' 'habiendo gustado' — track the same concrete, sensory meaning. TASTE EXPERIENCE

en: having-tasted, taste, tasted | es: comiendo, gustes, habiendo-gustado | fr: goûter | de: kostet, schmecken Matt 27:34; John 2:9; Acts 10:10; Acts 20:11; Col 2:21

γεωργ-έω G1090 V-PIM/P-3S (1×)

To be cultivated, tilled, farmed

Describes land that is worked and cultivated for agricultural purposes. In Hebrews 6:7, this word appears in a farming metaphor where the earth drinks rain and produces useful crops for those who cultivate it. The passive voice emphasizes the land as recipient of human labor, turning wild ground into productive farmland that yields a harvest.

(1×) Refers to agricultural cultivation and tillage of land. The cross-linguistic evidence (Spanish 'es-cultivada', French 'cultiver', German 'bebauen') confirms the agricultural domain. Hebrews 6:7 uses this term in a spiritual analogy comparing believers to ground that receives God's blessing (rain) and produces fruit through cultivation, contrasting fertile soil with barren ground that bears thorns. FARMER VINEDRESSER en: it-is-cultivated | es: es-cultivada | fr: cultiver | de: bebauen Heb 6:7

γεώργ-ιον G1091 N-NNS (1×)

Field, cultivated land, agricultural plot

A piece of land used for farming or gardening, ground that is worked for crops. Paul uses this image in 1 Corinthians 3:9, calling the Corinthian believers 'God's field,' part of his extended metaphor about spiritual cultivation. The term evokes the picture of prepared soil where seeds are planted and tended, emphasizing both divine ownership and the expectation of growth and fruitfulness.

(1×) Denotes a cultivated field or agricultural plot. The translations (Spanish 'campo', French 'labour', German 'Ackerfeld') all point to worked land rather than wild terrain. In 1 Corinthians 3:9, Paul's metaphor presents believers as God's agricultural property, where apostles plant and water but God gives the growth, highlighting collaborative spiritual labor in a farming context that ancient audiences would immediately understand. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: field | es: campo | fr: labour | de: Ackerfeld 1Cor 3:9

γεωργ-ός G1092 N-NMP (19×)

A farmer, tenant farmer, or vinedresser who works agricultural land, especially in vineyard parables and wisdom sayings

Georgos combines ge ('earth') and ergon ('work') to denote one who tills the ground. In the New Testament, it appears overwhelmingly in the Synoptic vineyard parables (Matt 21, Mark 12, Luke 20), where tenant farmers lease a vineyard from an absent owner and violently reject his servants and son — an allegory for Israel's rejection of the prophets and Christ. John 15:1 elevates the metaphor: the Father is the georgos tending the true vine. Outside the parables, the word takes on a more general agricultural sense in James 5:7 and 2 Timothy 2:6, where the patient, hardworking farmer models faithful endurance.

1. tenant farmer, vinedresser (17×) A tenant farmer or vinedresser working leased land, particularly a vineyard. Dominates the Synoptic vineyard parables (Matt 21:33-41, Mark 12:1-9, Luke 20:9-16), where the georgoi are lessees who owe the landlord a share of the produce. Spanish 'labradores' and German 'Weingärtner' (vine-dresser) both reflect the vineyard context. In John 15:1, the Father himself is called the georgos who prunes branches for greater fruitfulness — the supreme vinedresser of the true vine. FARMER VINEDRESSER

en: farmers, tenants, to-farmers | es: a-labradores, labrador, labradores | fr: vigneron | de: Bauer, Weingärtner Matt 21:33; Matt 21:34; Matt 21:35; Matt 21:38; Matt 21:40

2. farmer (2×) A farmer in the general agricultural sense, one who cultivates land for crops without the specific vineyard or tenant relationship. Paul uses it in 2 Timothy 2:6, where the hardworking farmer deserves the first share of the harvest — a metaphor for ministerial labor. James 5:7 presents the farmer waiting patiently for rain and precious fruit as a model for believers awaiting the Lord's return. Spanish 'labrador' and German 'Bauer' both convey this broader agricultural meaning. FARMER VINEDRESSER en: farmer | es: labrador | fr: vigneron | de: Bauer 2Tim 2:6; Jas 5:7

γῆ G1093 N-AFS (252×)

Earth, land, ground — the world as a whole, a specific territory or country, soil as physical substance, or dry land versus sea

The Greek ge is remarkably elastic, stretching from the entire created planet ('heaven and earth,' Matt 5:18) to a named country ('the land of Israel,' Matt 2:20) to the dirt a farmer works ('the seed fell on rocky ground,' Mark 4:5) to the shore a fisherman pulls his boat onto (Luke 5:11). Context alone determines which scale is in view. Spanish tierra and French terre mirror this same breadth, collapsing cosmic, political, agricultural, and coastal meanings into a single word — a pattern that the multilingual evidence confirms is nearly universal.

1. earth, the world (176×) The earth as a whole — the created world or planet, often set in contrast with heaven. 'Your will be done, on earth as it is in heaven' (Matt 6:10), 'the meek shall inherit the earth' (Matt 5:5), and 'till heaven and earth pass away' (Matt 5:18) all invoke ge as the totality of the terrestrial realm. This cosmic sense dominates (176x). Every target language uses its broadest geographic term: Spanish tierra, Arabic al-ard, Korean ttang/sesang, Swahili dunia. EARTH AND LAND

en: earth, ground | es: tierra | fr: terre | de: Erde Matt 5:5; Matt 5:13; Matt 5:18; Matt 5:35; Matt 6:10

2. land, territory, region (68×) A specific land, territory, country, or region — often a named place like 'the land of Israel' (Matt 2:20-21), 'the land of Judah' (Matt 2:6), or 'the land of Zebulun and Naphtali' (Matt 4:15). The word narrows from global to political geography, designating a bounded area with an identity. Arabic ard followed by a proper name, French la terre de, and German das Land all parallel this territorial narrowing. In Matt 9:26 'that land' simply means 'that region.' EARTH AND LAND

en: earth, ground, land | es: tierra | fr: terre | de: Erde Matt 2:6; Matt 2:20; Matt 2:21; Matt 4:15; Matt 9:26

3. ground, soil, dust (6×) The physical ground surface or soil as tangible substance, especially in agricultural and burial contexts. The seed that fell on rocky ground 'had no depth of earth' (Mark 4:5); a farmer scatters seed 'on the ground' (Mark 4:26). Spanish tierra and French terre in their agricultural register ('good soil') capture this concrete, tactile sense. The focus is on ge as dirt, humus, growing medium — the material rather than the territory or planet. EARTH AND LAND

en: earth, ground, of-soil | es: de-tierra, tierra | fr: terre | de: Erde Matt 13:5; Mark 4:5; Mark 4:26; Mark 4:31

4. shore, dry land (2×) Dry land as opposed to sea or water — the shore or coast. In Luke 5:3 Jesus asks Simon to push out 'from the land,' and in Luke 5:11 the disciples bring their boats 'to land.' This maritime sense, echoing classical Greek usage (ge opposed to thalassa), appears only twice in the corpus. French terre in the nautical expression mettre pied à terre and English 'make land' preserve this same opposition between solid ground and open water. EARTH AND LAND

en: land | es: tierra | fr: terre | de: Erde Luke 5:3; Luke 5:11

γῆρας G1094 N-DNS (1×)

Old age, advanced years

The state of being elderly, the final stage of human life characterized by advancing years. In Luke 1:36, the angel tells Mary that her relative Elizabeth has conceived in her old age, making the pregnancy miraculous. The word captures not just the number of years but the physical condition and social status of someone in the twilight of life, when childbearing would normally be impossible.

(1×) Indicates the condition of being advanced in years. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'vejez', French 'vieillesse') consistently point to the elderly stage of life. Luke 1:36 uses this term to emphasize the supernatural nature of Elizabeth's pregnancy, as she has passed the normal age of childbearing, making her conception parallel to Sarah's in Genesis and foreshadowing the even greater miracle of Mary's virgin conception. OLD AGE

en: old-age | es: vejez | fr: vieillesse | de: γήρει Luke 1:36

γηράσκω G1095 V-ASA-2S (2×)

to grow old, to age, to become aged, to reach old age

This verb means to grow old or age, describing the natural process of advancing in years and the physical changes that accompany aging. Classical Greek used it for both people and things that become old or obsolete. The New Testament uses it once literally and once metaphorically. Jesus prophesies to Peter that 'when you are old' (literally 'when you grow old') he will stretch out his hands and be led where he doesn't wish—a prediction of Peter's martyrdom (John 21:18). Hebrews uses it metaphorically: what God calls 'new' has made the first covenant 'old,' and what is growing old and aging is ready to vanish (Heb 8:13). Both uses involve transition toward an ending.

(2×) John 21:18 uses the aorist subjunctive in Jesus's prophecy: 'when you grow old (γηράσῃς), you will stretch out your hands,' predicting Peter's death in old age by crucifixion. Hebrews 8:13 employs the present passive participle: what is 'growing old and aging (γηράσκον)' is ready to disappear, referring to the obsolescence of the old covenant. Spanish 'envejezcas/encaneciendo', French 'vieillir', and German 'altern' capture this aging process. Both passages use aging as transition: Peter's physical aging toward martyrdom (John) and the old covenant's obsolescence toward disappearance (Hebrews), showing how growing old marks movement toward conclusion. OLD AGE

en: aging, you-grow-old | es: encaneciendo, envejezcas | fr: vieillir | de: altern
John 21:18; Heb 8:13

γίγνομαι G1096 V-PPM/P-NNS (671×)

To become, happen, come into being, or exist; spanning transformation, event occurrence, arrival, birth, and states of being

One of the most versatile verbs in the Greek New Testament, ginomai covers a vast semantic territory from becoming and happening to being born and simply existing. In narrative it signals pivotal transitions ('and it came to pass'), while in prayer it voices the deepest petitions ('let it be done'). Paul commandeers its optative form me genoito as his signature exclamation of horrified rejection. Across Arabic, Korean, and Swahili, translators must reach for entirely different roots depending on the sense, revealing just how much semantic work this single Greek verb performs.

1. become, change state (421×) The primary transformative sense: to undergo a change of state, to become something one was not before. Arabic sara and Korean doeda both denote change-of-state transitions. This covers the majority of occurrences (421x) including formulaic 'and it came to pass' narrative pivots (Matt 1:22; Matt 7:28) and statements of transformation like 'the Word became flesh.' BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: arose, became, came | es: fue, ha-habido, ha-sucedido | fr: devenir | de: werden, wird
Matt 1:22; Matt 7:28; Matt 8:24; Matt 9:10; Matt 11:1

2. happen, occur, take place (158×) Denotes an event taking place or occurring, without implying personal transformation. Arabic hadatha 'it happened' and Korean ireonada 'to arise/occur' mark this as event-occurrence rather than state-change. Frequently introduces temporal clauses in the Gospels (Matt 8:16; Matt 14:15) and Acts narrative transitions. BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: Arose, Happened, It-came-to-pass | es: Aconteció, Llegó-a-haber, Sucedieron | fr: devenir | de: werden, wird
Matt 8:16; Matt 14:6; Matt 14:15; Matt 14:23; Matt 16:2

3. come, arrive, appear (28×) Physical or temporal arrival into a place or situation. Where sense 1 transforms and sense 2 reports events, this sense moves a person or thing into view. Arabic ja'a 'to come' and Swahili -kuja confirm spatial movement. Mark uses this for John appearing in the wilderness (Mark 1:4) and evening coming (Mark 1:32). BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: came, came-to-pass, coming | es: Estuvo, aconteció, llegando | fr: devenir | de: werden, wird
Mark 1:4; Mark 1:11; Mark 1:32; Mark 4:35; Mark 6:2

4. let it be, may it be done (22×) Jussive or imperatival wish: 'let it be done,' 'may it happen.' Arabic li-yakun and Korean doera express the volitional dimension. Central to the Lord's Prayer (Matt 6:10 'your will be done') and Jesus's healing declarations (Matt 8:13; Matt 15:28), this sense carries the weight of divine petition and authoritative command. BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: Let-be-done, happens, he-may-be | es: Hágase, Sea-hecha, esté | fr: devenir | de: werden, wird
Matt 6:10; Matt 8:13; Matt 9:29; Matt 15:28; Matt 26:42

5. may it never be! (16×) Paul's emphatic negative optative me genoito: 'May it never be!' — a formula of absolute rejection appearing 16 times, mostly in Romans and Galatians. Arabic hasha and Korean geureol su eopda convey the same horrified dismissal. This idiomatic usage (Rom 3:4, 6, 31; Gal 2:17) functions almost as an interjection, rhetorically shutting down false conclusions. BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: let-there-be, may-it-be | es: haya, sea, sea! | fr: devenir | de: werden, wird
Matt 21:19; Luke 20:16; Rom 3:4; Rom 3:6; Rom 3:31

6. be, exist, find oneself (13×) Simple existence or static being without transformation: to be present, to find oneself in a state or location. Arabic kana 'to be' and Korean itda 'to exist' distinguish this from dynamic becoming. Appears in locative contexts like 'being in Bethany' (Matt 26:6) and statements of simple presence (Mark 9:33). BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: I-was, being, came | es: estando, estar, estuve | fr: devenir | de: werden, wird
Matt 26:6; Mark 2:21; Mark 9:33; Mark 16:10; Luke 19:17

7. be made, be done (8×) Passive resultative sense: to be made, manufactured, or brought about by an external agent. Arabic suni'a 'it was made' and Korean mandeurejida confirm passive creation. Seen in 'the Sabbath was made for man' (Mark 2:27) and references to miraculous works being done (Acts 19:26). BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: arising, being-made, happening | es: fue-hecho, hecha, hechos | fr: devenir | de: werden, wird
Mark 2:27; Mark 6:2; Luke 14:22; Acts 12:5; Acts 19:26

8. be born, come into existence (5×) To be born, to come into existence through origination. Arabic mawludan 'born' and Korean nada 'to be born' specifically mark natal beginning. Central to Christological statements: John 1:6 ('there was a man sent from God'), John 8:58 ('before Abraham was, I am'), and Paul's 'born of a woman' (Gal 4:4). BECOMING AND HAPPENING

en: Came-to-be, having-become, having-been-born | es: Llegó-a-ser, fuera, llegado-a-ser | fr: devenir | de: werden
John 1:6; John 8:58; Rom 1:3; Gal 4:4

γιγνώσκω G1097 V-PSA-3P (221×)

To know, recognize, understand, perceive, or learn; spanning relational acquaintance, intellectual comprehension, passive recognition, and discovery

Ginosko is the primary Greek verb for knowing in the New Testament, carrying a warmth and directness that its more intellectual cousin oida often lacks. Where oida tends toward propositional awareness, ginosko implies experiential, relational, or perceptual knowledge — you ginosko a person, a truth you have wrestled with, a mystery now revealed. Jesus 'knew their thoughts' (Matt 12:15), Paul 'knew nothing against himself' (1 Cor 4:4), and the great Johannine declaration asks that the world 'may know that you sent me' (John 17:23). Arabic distributes the semantic field across 'arafa (acquaintance), fahima (comprehension), and 'ulima (passive being known), illuminating distinctions that Greek packs into one verb.

1. know, be acquainted with (196×) To know through experience, relationship, or acquaintance — the broad active-voice sense covering the vast majority of occurrences (196x). This is personal, engaged knowing: Jesus knows his sheep (John 10:14, 27), disciples know the truth (John 8:32), and believers know God (1 John 4:8). Arabic 'arafa 'to know by acquaintance,' Korean alda, and Spanish conocer/saber all converge here. The sense spans present knowledge (Matt 12:15), past recognition (Matt 16:8), aorist realization (Matt 22:18), and perfect settled conviction, making it the default cognitive verb of the New Testament. KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: he-knows, knows, to-know | es: conoce, conocer, sabe | fr: connaître | de: erkennen, erkennt
Matt 12:15; Matt 13:11; Matt 16:3; Matt 16:8; Matt 22:18

2. be known, be made known (13×) To be known, be recognized, be made known — passive and middle-passive forms where the subject is the object of another's knowing. 'Nothing is hidden that will not be made known' (Matt 10:26; Luke 12:2). A tree 'is known' by its fruit (Matt 12:33; Luke 6:44). Arabic ma'ruf 'known,' Korean allyeojida 'to become known,' and Spanish ser conocido confirm the passive orientation. The passive often carries revelatory force in Luke's writing: what is concealed will inevitably come to light (Luke 8:17). KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: being-known, has-been-known, having-been-known | es: conocida, es-

conocido, fue-conocida | fr: connaître | de: erkennen, erkennt Matt 10:26; Matt 12:33; Luke 6:44; Luke 8:17; Luke 12:2

3. understand, comprehend (8×) To understand or comprehend the meaning of something — a deeper cognitive grasp beyond mere acquaintance. The disciples 'did not understand' Jesus's saying about the leaven of the Pharisees (John 8:27, 43). They fail to 'know' the parable's meaning (John 10:6). But after the resurrection, they 'understood' what Scripture had foretold (John 12:16). Arabic fahima 'to comprehend,' Korean kkaedat-da 'to realize,' and Swahili -elewa/-fahamu mark comprehension rather than acquaintance. John's Gospel especially exploits the gap between knowing-about and truly understanding (John 10:38; 14:7). KNOWING AND LEARNING
en: I-know, do-you-understand, knew | es: conocieron, conoció, conocéis | fr: connaître | de: erkennen, erkennt John 8:27; John 8:43; John 10:6; John 10:38; John 12:16

4. learn, find out, discover (2×) To learn, find out, or discover — the ingressive moment of coming to know something previously unknown. When Jesus asks 'how many loaves do you have? Go and find out' (Mark 6:38), the verb captures the transition from ignorance to knowledge. In Acts 17:13, the Thessalonian Jews 'learned' that Paul was preaching in Berea. English 'finding out' and 'learned,' Spanish supieron, and the aorist tense profile all confirm the punctiliar, discovery-oriented reading. This is ginosko at the threshold between not-knowing and knowing. KNOWING AND LEARNING
en: finding-out, learned | es: sabiendo, supieron | fr: connaître | de: erkennen, erkennt Mark 6:38; Acts 17:13

5. (1×) To perceive or sense directly — immediate physical or intuitive awareness. Mark 5:29 says the woman with the hemorrhage 'knew in her body that she was healed.' This is neither intellectual comprehension nor relational acquaintance but visceral, embodied perception. Spanish conoció and German erkennen here carry the sense of felt awareness. The aorist tense marks the instant of recognition — she perceived at once that healing had occurred, prior to any cognitive processing. KNOWING AND LEARNING
en: she-knew | es: conoció | fr: connaître | de: erkennen Mark 5:29

6. (1×) To have known previously, to acknowledge or recognize in hindsight — a perfective sense where knowing carries the weight of prior relationship and its obligations. Romans 1:21 states that humanity 'having known God, did not glorify him as God.' The participial form gnontes carries a concessive force: despite possessing genuine knowledge of God through creation, they refused to honor him. Arabic ma'rifatan 'with prior knowledge' and Spanish habiendo conocido mark the culpable dimension — this is not ignorance but willful suppression of acknowledged truth. KNOWING AND LEARNING en: having-known | es: habiendo-conocido | fr: connaître | de: erkennen Rom 1:21

γλεῦκος G1098 N-GNS (1×)
Sweet new wine, freshly pressed grape juice
Wine that has just begun fermentation, still sweet and not fully aged. In Acts 2:13, mockers dismiss the Pentecost miracle by claiming the disciples are drunk on sweet wine at nine in the morning. The term suggests wine that is particularly potent or intoxicating despite its sweetness, making the accusation both insulting and absurd given the early hour.

(1×) Refers to new wine that retains natural grape sweetness. The translations (Spanish 'vino dulce', French 'moût') emphasize the fresh, sweet character rather than aged wine. Acts 2:13 records the skeptics' mocking explanation for the disciples' Spirit-filled behavior, choosing this specific term perhaps to suggest excessive indulgence in particularly strong drink, though Peter immediately refutes this charge by noting the early hour and explaining the true source of their unusual speech. WINE BEVERAGE en: of-sweet-wine | es: de-vino-dulce | fr: moût | de: Γλεύκους Acts 2:13

γλῠκύς G1099 Adj-ANS (4×)
sweet, fresh (of taste or water); pleasant, delightful
In classical Greek, glykys described anything sweet to the taste or smell and extended figuratively to what is pleasant or dear. The New Testament uses it exclusively in its literal sense. James contrasts sweet and bitter water flowing from the same spring as a metaphor for inconsistent speech (Jas 3:11-12), while Revelation describes the little scroll that tastes sweet as honey in the mouth but turns bitter in the stomach (Rev 10:9-10). The Spanish 'dulce,' French 'doux,' and German 'suess' all capture this core sensory meaning.

(4×) Sweet or fresh in taste, describing a pleasant flavor or quality of water as opposed to bitter or salty. Used in James 3:11-12 of spring water that cannot be both sweet (glykys) and brackish, and in Revelation 10:9-10 of the scroll tasting sweet as honey. All major translations converge on the literal taste sense: Spanish 'dulce,' French 'doux,' German 'suess.' SWEET SWEETNESS en: sweet | es: dulce | fr: doux | de: suess Jas 3:11; Jas 3:12; Rev 10:9; Rev 10:10

γλῶσσα G1100 N-AFP (50×)
The tongue as a physical organ; by extension, speaking in tongues as Spirit-empowered ecstatic or foreign-language utterance.
In its most basic sense, this word denotes the physical tongue in the mouth — the organ of taste and speech. The Gospels use it in healing narratives where Jesus looses a bound tongue (Mark 7:33, 35) or Zechariah's tongue is freed to praise God (Luke 1:64). Spanish lengua, French langue, and German Zunge all carry both physical and linguistic meanings, mirroring the Greek semantic range. The distinctive New Testament development is 'speaking in tongues,' the charismatic gift of Spirit-empowered utterance in unlearned languages or ecstatic speech, prominent at Pentecost (Acts 2:3-4) and throughout Paul's discussion of spiritual gifts (1 Cor 12-14).

1. tongue (body part) (32×) The physical organ of the tongue. Used of the body part itself, especially in contexts of healing, speech, and physical sensation. Spanish lengua, French langue, and German Zunge all retain the bodily reference. Key passages include the healing of the deaf-mute (Mark 7:33, 35), Zechariah's restored speech (Luke 1:64), and the rich man's torment (Luke 16:24). James uses it vividly as a 'fire' that no one can tame (Jas 3:5-8). TONGUE (BODY AND SPEECH)
en: a-tongue, tongue | es: lengua | fr: langue | de: Zunge Mark 7:33; Mark 7:35; Luke 1:64; Luke 16:24; Acts 2:3

2. tongue, ecstatic utterance (18×) Speaking in tongues — Spirit-empowered utterance in unlearned languages or ecstatic speech. A distinctly New Testament phenomenon, the multilingual glosses shift from simple 'tongue' to prepositional phrases like English 'in tongues' and Spanish en lenguas, marking the charismatic/spiritual gift context. Central at Pentecost (Acts 2:3-4), in Cornelius's household (Acts 10:46), and throughout Paul's extended treatment of the gift and its regulation (1 Cor 12:10; 14:2-27). TONGUE (BODY AND SPEECH)
en: in-a-tongue, in-tongues, of-tongues | es: de-lenguas, en-lengua, en-lenguas | fr: langue | de: Zunge Mark 16:17; Acts 10:46; Acts 19:6; 1Cor 12:10

γλωσσό-κομος G1101 N-ANS (2×)
money-box, cash box, small chest or bag for keeping money or valuables
This noun originally denoted a case for keeping the mouthpieces of wind instruments, but came to mean a small box or bag for money and valuables. The related classical meaning includes a coffin or sarcophagus (another type of box), showing the word's basic sense of a container. In the New Testament, it appears twice in John's Gospel, both times describing the money box that Judas carried for Jesus and the disciples. John notes that 'Judas had the money box' and was a thief who took from what was put into it (John 12:6), and later that Judas had charge of the money box when Jesus told him to buy things needed for the feast (John 13:29).

(2×) John 12:6 explains Judas's false concern for the poor: 'he said this not because he cared about the poor, but because he was a thief, and having the money box (glossokomon) he used to take what was put in it.' John 13:29 notes that 'some thought, because Judas had the money box,' Jesus was telling him to buy provisions. Spanish 'bolsa', French 'bourse', and German 'Geldbeutel' all reference a money bag or purse. Both passages establish Judas's role as treasurer and foreshadow his betrayal: his access to the group's funds provided opportunity for theft, revealing the greed that would lead him to sell his Master for thirty pieces of silver—a tragic irony of the money-keeper becoming the money-betrayer. BAG PURSE

en: money-box | es: bolsa | fr: bourse | de: Geldbeutel John 12:6; John 13:29

κνᾰφ-εύς G1102 N-NMS (1×)

Fuller, launderer, cloth-cleaner

A professional who bleaches and cleans cloth, making garments brilliantly white. Mark 9:3 uses this term in describing Jesus's transfiguration, saying his clothes became dazzling white, whiter than any fuller on earth could bleach them. This comparison to the best professional whitening available emphasizes the supernatural radiance of Christ's garments, surpassing anything humanly achievable through the most skilled labor.

(1×) Denotes a craftsman who professionally cleans and whitens cloth. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'lavador', French 'foulon', German 'Walker') all reference this textile trade. Mark 9:3 invokes the fuller as the ultimate standard for whiteness in the ancient world, someone who used various processes to bleach fabric to its maximum brightness, then declares that even this expert's best work falls short of the supernatural brilliance of Jesus's transfigured appearance. LINEN AND FABRIC

en: a-fuller | es: lavador | fr: foulon | de: Walker Mark 9:3

γνήσι-ος G1103 Adj-VMS (4×)

genuine, true, legitimate; authentic in relationship or character

Derived from genos (race, kin), gnesios originally meant 'lawfully begotten' and came to denote anything authentic or unfeigned. Paul uses it to test the genuineness of the Corinthians' love (2 Cor 8:8), addresses a trusted colleague as a 'true yokefellow' (Phil 4:3), and calls Timothy and Titus his 'genuine children' in the faith (1 Tim 1:2; Titus 1:4). The word carries warmth alongside its claim of authenticity, affirming bonds that are real rather than merely formal.

(4×) Genuine, true, or legitimate, describing what is authentic in character or relationship rather than counterfeit or nominal. Paul applies it both to persons — Timothy as a 'genuine child' in faith (1 Tim 1:2), a 'true yokefellow' (Phil 4:3) — and to qualities like the genuineness of love (2 Cor 8:8). Spanish 'genuino/legítimo,' French 'légitime,' and German 'aufrichtig' all preserve the note of tested authenticity. TRUTH AND FAITHFULNESS en: genuine, genuineness, true | es: genuino, legítimo | fr: légitime, γνήσιε, γνησίῳ | de: aufrichtig 2Cor 8:8; Phil 4:3; 1Tim 1:2; Titus 1:4

γνήσι-ος G1104 Adv (1×)

Genuinely, sincerely, truly

In a manner that is authentic and true, without pretense or ulterior motive. Paul uses this word in Philippians 2:20 to describe Timothy's genuine concern for the Philippians' welfare, contrasting him with others who seek their own interests. The adverb emphasizes the quality of Timothy's character—his care is not performative or self-serving but flows from authentic love.

(1×) Describes action or attitude that is authentic and legitimate rather than counterfeit. The root meaning of 'genuinely born' (legitimate offspring) extends to character qualities that are real rather than feigned. In Philippians 2:20, Paul highlights Timothy as uniquely sincere among his companions, someone whose concern for the church is authentic rather than political or self-interested, making him Paul's natural choice to send as a representative who truly cares about their spiritual condition. TRUTH AND FAITHFULNESS en: genuinely | es: genuinamente | fr: γνησίως | de: aufrichtig Phil 2:20

γνόφ-ος G1105 N-DMS (1×)

Darkness, deep gloom, blackness

Thick darkness associated with divine presence or judgment, an impenetrable gloom. Hebrews 12:18 recalls the terrifying scene at Sinai where the Israelites encountered darkness, cloud, and storm as God descended on the mountain. This word evokes not just absence of light but an active, oppressive darkness that inspires fear, contrasting the old covenant's terror with the new covenant's access to God through Christ.

(1×) Indicates thick, foreboding darkness often connected to divine theophany or judgment. The translations (Spanish 'oscuridad', German 'Dunkel') emphasize deep gloom. Hebrews 12:18 uses this term to paint the frightening atmosphere of Sinai, where God's holy presence manifested in storm clouds and impenetrable darkness, deliberately recalling Exodus 19-20 to contrast the old covenant's unapproachable terror with believers' new access to Mount Zion and the heavenly Jerusalem through Jesus. DARKNESS AND GLOOM

en: darkness | es: oscuridad | fr: Dunkel | de: Dunkel Heb 12:18

γνώμ-η G1106 N-DFS (9×)

A considered opinion, judgment, or piece of advice; also, a settled purpose, resolve, or determined intention.

Rooted in the Greek verb for knowing (γιγνώσκω), this noun carries the weight of considered thought — whether expressed as advice or crystallized into firm resolve. Paul uses it to offer his personal opinion on matters where he has no direct command from the Lord, such as marriage and virginity (1 Cor 7:25, 40), and he appeals for unity of mind (γνώμη) in the Corinthian church (1 Cor 1:10). Spanish opinión and French avis match this advisory nuance. In Revelation, the word shifts toward iron-hard purpose: the ten kings share 'one purpose' in yielding power to the beast, and God himself has put it into their hearts to carry out his purpose (Rev 17:13, 17). German Vorsatz ('resolve') captures this determined intention.

1. opinion, judgment, advice (6×) Opinion, judgment, or advice — a considered personal view offered on a matter, especially where one expresses a perspective without absolute binding authority. Paul gives his 'judgment' (γνώμην) on the unmarried (1 Cor 7:25) and considers himself trustworthy in offering his 'opinion' (1 Cor 7:40). He appeals for the Corinthians to be united in the same 'mind and judgment' (1 Cor 1:10), and he values the Corinthians' willing 'consent' in the collection for Jerusalem (2 Cor 8:10). Spanish opinión, French avis, and German Meinung all reflect this deliberative, advisory register. PURPOSE RESOLVE INTENT

en: consent, decision, judgment | es: consentimiento, decisión, opinión | fr: avis, opinion | de: Meinung, γνώμης Acts 20:3; 1Cor 1:10; 1Cor 7:25; 1Cor 7:40; 2Cor 8:10

2. purpose, resolve, intent (3×) Purpose, resolve, or determined intention — a settled and often collective determination to act. In Revelation 17:13, the ten kings have 'one purpose' (μίαν γνώμην) in giving their power to the beast, and God himself has put it into their hearts to carry out his 'purpose' (γνώμην, Rev 17:17). The shift from personal opinion to collective or divine resolve is marked: Spanish propósito ('purpose') and French dessein ('design, intent') capture this harder, more determined sense that goes beyond mere advice into the territory of fixed intention. PURPOSE RESOLVE INTENT

en: purpose | es: propósito | fr: opinion | de: Meinung Rev 17:13; Rev 17:17

γνωρ-ίζω G1107 V-PMM/P-3S (25×)

Make known, reveal, declare; be made known; come to know

A Greek verb at the heart of divine revelation in the New Testament. In its active voice, it means to make known or declare—Jesus tells the disciples in John 15:15 that He has made known to them everything He heard from the Father. In the passive, it describes truths being revealed, as in Ephesians 3:5 where the mystery of Christ is made known to apostles and prophets by the Spirit. Spanish 'dar a conocer' and German 'kundtun' preserve the causative force. One debated instance at Philippians 1:22 may carry the older classical sense of 'come to know' or 'discern.'

1. make known, reveal, declare (19×) The active causative sense: to make known, reveal, or declare information to others. Dominates New Testament usage, spanning Jesus' revelatory acts (John 15:15, 17:26), apostolic proclamation (Colossians 1:27), and prayer requests (Philippians 4:6). Spanish 'hacer conocer' and French 'faire connaitre' both mirror the causative structure. Luke 2:15-17 shows shepherds making known the angelic message. KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: I-made-known, I-make-known, having-made-known | es: Damos-a-conocer, Hago-conocer, dar-a-conocer | fr: faire-connaître | de: kundtun, macht-bekannt Luke 2:15; Luke 2:17; John 15:15; John 17:26

2. be made known, be revealed (5×) The passive counterpart: to be made known, to be revealed or disclosed. Central to Pauline mystery theology—Romans 16:26 and Ephesians 3:3-10 describe God's eternal plan now 'gnorizo'-ed to the nations. The passive frames human recipients as those to whom divine truth comes, not those who discover it. German 'kundgetan werden' captures this receptive dimension. KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: having-been-made-known, let-be-made-known, might-be-made-known | es: dado-a-conocer, fue-dado-a-conocer, sea-dada-a-conocer | fr: faire-connaître | de: kundtun Rom 16:26; Eph 3:3; Eph 3:5; Eph 3:10; Phil 4:6

3. know, be acquainted with (1×) A rare middle or intransitive sense at Philippians 1:22, where Paul may mean 'I do not know' or 'I cannot discern' what to choose between life and death. This aligns with the classical Greek sense of 'gain knowledge of' or 'become acquainted with,' a semantic direction mostly absent from the New Testament but attested in Sophocles and Plato. KNOWING AND LEARNING en: I-make-known | es: sé | fr: faire-connaître | de: kundtun Phil 1:22

γνῶσις G1108 N-AFS (29×)

knowledge — cognitive understanding and spiritual insight, especially knowledge of God and divine truth

Gnosis, from the root ginosko ('to know'), appears 29 times in the New Testament and carries a distinctive theological weight far beyond its classical Greek sense of 'inquiry' or 'acquaintance.' Luke introduces it in Zechariah's prophecy: John the Baptist will give 'knowledge of salvation' to God's people (Luke 1:77), and Jesus later condemns the lawyers for taking away 'the key of knowledge' (Luke 11:52). Paul is the word's primary theologian. He celebrates the unfathomable depth of God's gnosis (Rom 11:33), names it a spiritual gift (1 Cor 12:8), yet famously warns that 'knowledge puffs up, but love builds up' (1 Cor 8:1). In 2 Corinthians 2:14 he describes his ministry as a fragrance spreading 'the knowledge of Christ' everywhere. Peter's closing exhortation — 'grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord' (2 Pet 3:18) — makes gnosis an eschatological trajectory. French 'connaissance,' Spanish 'conocimiento,' and German 'Erkenntnis' uniformly reflect a single cognitive-spiritual sense.

Knowledge (cognitive understanding / spiritual insight) (29×) Cognitive and spiritual knowledge, especially the saving knowledge of God and Christ. Luke introduces it as 'knowledge of salvation' (Luke 1:77) and 'key of knowledge' (Luke 11:52). Paul develops it most fully: a spiritual gift (1 Cor 12:8), a potential source of pride that must be tempered by love (1 Cor 8:1-2), and a fragrance of Christ spread through apostolic ministry (2 Cor 2:14). Peter crowns it as the goal of Christian growth (2 Pet 3:18). Romans 11:33 places divine gnosis beyond human fathoming. KNOWLEDGE AND LEARNING en: in-knowledge, knowledge, of-knowledge | es: conocimiento, de-conocimiento, en-conocimiento | fr: connaissance | de: Erkenntnis, γνώσεως, γνῶσιν Luke 1:77; Luke 11:52; Rom 2:20; Rom 11:33; Rom 15:14

γνώστ-ης G1109 N-AMS (1×)

Expert, one knowledgeable in a subject

Someone who possesses specialized knowledge or expertise in a particular field. Paul uses this term in Acts 26:3 when addressing King Agrippa, acknowledging him as exceptionally knowledgeable about Jewish customs and controversies. The word carries respect for genuine understanding gained through study or experience, distinguishing the expert from the casual observer or novice.

(1×) Designates a person with specialized knowledge or expertise in a domain. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'conocedor', French 'expert') confirms the sense of mastery through knowledge. In Acts 26:3, Paul's rhetorical strategy includes flattering Agrippa as an expert in Jewish matters, which makes him the ideal judge of Paul's case and positions the apostle's defense as an appeal to someone capable of understanding the theological nuances of his Pharisaic background and Christian conversion. KNOWING AND LEARNING en: an-expert | es: conocedor | fr: expert | de: γνώστην Acts 26:3

γνωστός G1110 Adj-ANP (15×)

Known, notable, recognized; as a substantive, an acquaintance or familiar associate.

This adjective covers what is publicly recognized or well-known — a fact, a miracle, a person of note. In Acts, γνωστός appears repeatedly in declarations of what 'is known' to all residents of Jerusalem (Acts 1:19; 2:14; 4:10), establishing public, undeniable evidence for the apostolic message. The Gospel of John uses it to identify the 'other disciple known to the high priest' (John 18:15-16). Luke alone preserves a distinct substantival use where it means personal acquaintances — people in one's circle of familiarity, as at the presentation of the infant Jesus (Luke 2:44) and the crucifixion (Luke 23:49).

1. known / notable (13×) The adjectival sense: known, recognized, or notable. Used predicatively ('this has become known to all,' Acts 4:16) or attributively ('a notable miracle,' Acts 4:16). In John 18:15-16 it identifies someone personally known to a specific individual — the disciple known to the high priest. Spanish 'conocido' and German 'bekannt' map directly. This sense dominates the NT with thirteen occurrences across Acts, John, and Romans 1:19 (where God's nature is 'known'). KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: a-notable, known | es: conocidas, conocido, notable | fr: connu | de: bekannt John 18:15; John 18:16; Acts 1:19; Acts 2:14; Acts 4:10

2. acquaintance (2×) The substantival sense: acquaintances, persons known to someone, used as a noun equivalent to the classical γνώριμοι. Luke uses this twice: at 2:44, Joseph and Mary search among their 'acquaintances' (kinsfolk and known circle), and at 23:49, Jesus' 'acquaintances' stand watching the crucifixion from a distance. Spanish 'conocidos' captures this perfectly. The shift from adjective to substantive marks a genuine semantic distinction — not a quality but a relational category of people. KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: acquaintances | es: conocidos | fr: connu | de: bekannt Luke 2:44; Luke 23:49

γογγύζω G1111 V-AIA-3P (8×)

To grumble, murmur, or mutter in discontent; to express dissatisfaction through low-voiced complaint against a person or situation.

A verb capturing the low rumble of collective discontent — the kind of under-the-breath complaining that spreads through a crowd. In the Gospels it appears when the Pharisees murmur against Jesus for eating with sinners (Luke 5:30), when the crowd grumbles because Jesus claims heavenly origin (John 6:41, 43, 61), and when laborers protest unequal wages (Matt 20:11). Paul warns the Corinthians not to grumble as Israel did in the wilderness (1 Cor 10:10). Spanish 'murmurar' and German 'murren' both echo the same onomatopoeic quality found in the Greek, where the repeated gamma sounds mimic the buzzing of discontent.

grumble, murmur (8×) To mutter, murmur, or grumble in discontent, expressing dissatisfaction through low-voiced complaint directed against someone or something. All eight NT occurrences share this sense — whether it is vineyard workers protesting the master's generosity (Matt 20:11), Pharisees objecting to Jesus' table fellowship (Luke 5:30), or the Judean crowd disputing Jesus' claim to have come down from heaven (John 6:41, 43). The multilingual evidence uniformly reflects complaining: Spanish 'murmurar,' French

'murmurer,' German 'murren' — each capturing the same grumbling undertone. MURMUR GRUMBLE COMPLAIN

en: Were-grumbling, are-grumbling, grumble | es: Murmuraban, murmuraban, murmuran | fr: murmurer | de: murren, ἐγόγγυζον Matt 20:11; Luke 5:30; John 6:41; John 6:43; John 6:61

γογγ-υσμός G1112 N-GMS (4×)

murmuring, grumbling, complaining; whispered dissent

Goggysmos denotes low-voiced, discontented muttering — the kind of complaint that circulates through a crowd rather than being voiced openly. In John 7:12, it describes the divided whispering about Jesus among the festival crowds. Acts 6:1 records the Hellenists' grumbling against the Hebrews over the daily food distribution. Paul warns the Philippians to do everything without grumbling (Phil 2:14), and Peter urges hospitality without complaint (1 Pet 4:9). The word consistently points to communal discontent expressed sotto voce.

(4×) Murmuring, grumbling, or whispered complaint, describing low-voiced communal discontent rather than open protest. In John 7:12 it characterizes the divided muttering about Jesus among the crowds; in Acts 6:1 the Hellenists' grievance over food distribution. Paul and Peter both warn against it as corrosive to community life (Phil 2:14; 1 Pet 4:9). Spanish 'murmuraciones,' French 'murmure,' and German 'Murren' all echo the subdued, dissatisfied tone. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14541 WITH 3 SENSES

en: a-murmuring, grumbling, grumblings | es: murmullo, murmuraciones | fr: murmure | de: Murren, γογγυσμὸς John 7:12; Acts 6:1; Phil 2:14; 1Pet 4:9

γογγ-υστής G1113 N-NMP (1×)

Grumblers, complainers, murmurers

People characterized by habitual complaining and discontent, those who grumble about their circumstances. Jude 16 uses this term to describe false teachers who are fault-finders, always dissatisfied and murmuring against God's providence. The word recalls Israel's grumbling in the wilderness, drawing a parallel between ancient rebels and contemporary troublemakers who spread discontent within the Christian community.

(1×) Refers to those who habitually complain and express dissatisfaction. The translations (Spanish 'murmuradores', French 'murmurateurs', German 'Murrende') all capture the sense of persistent grumbling. Jude 16 employs this term as part of a character profile of false teachers, likening them to the Israelites who grumbled against Moses and God in the wilderness, suggesting that such complainers ultimately rebel against divine authority while pretending to serve God's people. MURMUR GRUMBLE COMPLAIN

en: grumblers | es: murmuradores | fr: murmurateurs, | de: Murrende Jude 1:16

γόης G1114 N-NMP (1×)

Impostors, deceivers, sorcerers, charlatans

People who use trickery or deception to mislead others, originally referring to sorcerers or wizards but extending to any kind of charlatan. In 2 Timothy 3:13, Paul warns that evil people and impostors will go from bad to worse, both deceiving others and being deceived themselves. The term suggests deliberate fraud rather than honest error, people who knowingly manipulate others for their own gain.

(1×) Indicates deceivers who use cunning and trickery to mislead people. The root associations with sorcery and magic emphasize manipulation and illusion. In 2 Timothy 3:13, Paul describes a downward spiral where these impostors become increasingly corrupt, simultaneously deceiving their followers and being deceived themselves, perhaps by their own lies or by demonic powers, creating a tragic cycle of dishonesty that leads further from truth with each iteration. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14554 WITH 4 SENSES

en: impostors | es: impostores | fr: γόητες | de: Betrueger 2Tim 3:13

Γολγοθά G1115 N-NFS (3×)

Golgotha, the place of the skull, site of Jesus' crucifixion outside Jerusalem

Golgotha is the Aramaic name (גָּלְגָּלְתָּא) for the place where Jesus was crucified, meaning 'skull' or 'place of the skull.' All four Gospels identify this location, with the Synoptics providing the Aramaic name and its Greek translation (kranion, from which Latin 'Calvary' derives). The precise location remains debated—Church of the Holy Sepulchre and Gordon's Calvary are the main proposed sites. The name may derive from the skull-like appearance of the rocky outcrop or from its association with executions. It lay outside the city walls, as required for ceremonially unclean execution sites.

(3×) Matthew 27:33, Mark 15:22, and John 19:17 all use the Aramaic name when narrating the crucifixion. The Evangelists provide the interpretative gloss 'place of the skull,' ensuring Greek readers understand the Semitic term. The multilingual modern glosses preserve the transliteration—Spanish 'Golgotha/Golgothâ,' French 'Golgotha,' German 'Golgatha.' The retention of the Aramaic name even in Greek texts suggests it had become the established designation for this infamous location, much as 'Waterloo' or 'Normandy' evoke specific historical events. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Golgotha | es: Golgotha, Golgothâ | fr: Golgotha | de: Golgatha, Γολγοθᾶ Matt 27:33; Mark 15:22; John 19:17

Γόμορρα G1116 N-GNP (5×)

Gomorrah; one of the cities of the plain destroyed by divine judgment, used as a byword for extreme wickedness.

The proper name of one of the cities of the Jordan plain destroyed along with Sodom by fire and sulfur (Gen 19). In the NT, it functions almost exclusively as an archetype of catastrophic divine judgment. Jesus invokes Sodom and Gomorrah to warn inhospitable cities that their fate will be worse (Matt 10:15; Mark 6:11). Paul quotes Isaiah's reference to Gomorrah regarding Israel's near-total destruction (Rom 9:29). Both Peter and Jude cite their overthrow as a warning example for the ungodly (2 Pet 2:6; Jude 1:7). The name is consistently transliterated across languages — 'Gomorra' in Spanish, German, and French — testifying to its universal recognition.

(5×) The city of Gomorrah, destroyed by God alongside Sodom as an act of definitive judgment. Every NT occurrence pairs it with Sodom in contexts of warning: Jesus' commissioning discourse uses it as a standard of judgment against rejecting towns (Matt 10:15; Mark 6:11), Paul cites Isaiah 1:9 to show God's mercy in preserving a remnant (Rom 9:29), and the catholic epistles present the cities' fiery overthrow as a paradigmatic example for the ungodly (2 Pet 2:6; Jude 1:7). The Hebrew source name is Amorah, reflecting its Canaanite origin. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Gomorra, Gomorrah, of-Gomorra | es: Gomorra, Gómorra, de-Gómorra | fr: Gomorrhe, Gomorrhe, | de: Gomorra, Γομόρρων Matt 10:15; Mark 6:11; Rom 9:29; 2Pet 2:6; Jude 1:7

γόμος G1117 N-AMS (3×)

cargo, freight carried by ship or beast of burden

This term denotes cargo or freight—goods transported by ship or loaded on pack animals. Classical usage includes both maritime cargo and camel loads. In Acts, Paul's ship is carrying a load of grain. In Revelation, the 'cargo' represents the diverse luxury goods traded by merchants mourning Babylon's fall. The term emphasizes the commercial dimension of ancient trade networks, where ships and caravans transported everything from staple grains to exotic luxuries across the Mediterranean and Near Eastern worlds.

(3×) Acts 21:3 mentions a ship 'unloading its cargo' at Tyre. Revelation 18:11-12 uses the term in lamenting that merchants can no longer sell 'their cargo' to fallen Babylon, followed by a detailed inventory of luxury trade goods. The multilingual glosses are consistent—English 'cargo,' Spanish 'carga,' French 'cargaison,' German 'Ladung'—all emphasizing goods in transport. The Revelation passage's extended catalogue of traded items highlights the economic might and materialism of the doomed city. BURDENS AND LOADS

en: cargo | es: carga | fr: cargaison | de: Ladung, γόμον Acts 21:3; Rev 18:11; Rev 18:12

γον-εύς G1118 N-GMP (20×)

Parent(s); a father or mother, nearly always plural in the NT to denote both parents together.

Derived from the root meaning 'begetter,' this noun appears almost exclusively in the plural in the New Testament, designating both father and mother as a pair. The term surfaces in contexts ranging from the tender—Mary and Joseph searching for the boy Jesus in the temple (Luke 2:41–43)—to the harrowing: Jesus warns that children will rise against parents and have them put to death (Matt 10:21; Mark 13:12). Across translations the paired sense is consistent: English 'parents,' Spanish 'padres,' German 'Eltern,' French 'parent,' all pointing to the familial unit rather than a single progenitor.

parents (20×) Parents as a familial pair—father and mother considered together. All 20 NT occurrences use the plural to denote both parents, whether in narratives about Jesus' childhood (Luke 2:27, 41, 43), instructions about honoring parents, or apocalyptic warnings of family betrayal (Matt 10:21; Mark 13:12). The consistent multilingual rendering (English 'parents,' Spanish 'padres,' German 'Eltern') confirms the collective rather than individual sense. PARENTS AND ANCESTORS en: parents, to-parents | es: a-padres, padres | fr: parent | de: Eltern Matt 10:21; Mark 13:12; Luke 2:27; Luke 2:41; Luke 2:43

γόνῠ G1119 N-NNS (12×)

Knee — the joint of the leg; used literally and in the idiom of kneeling in worship, prayer, or submission

The noun gonu denotes the knee as a body part, but nearly every New Testament occurrence carries the additional freight of worship, prayer, or submission. To 'bend the knee' (tithenai ta gonata or kamptein gonu) is the posture of supplication before Jesus (Mark 1:40; 10:17; Luke 5:8), of earnest prayer (Luke 22:41; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5), and of eschatological worship when every knee shall bow at the name of Jesus (Rom 11:4; 14:11; Phil 2:10; Eph 3:14). The weak or feeble knees of Hebrews 12:12 allude to Isaiah 35:3, urging perseverance. Spanish 'rodilla' and French 'genou' both serve in the same literal and devotional registers.

Knee (body part) (12×) The knee as the body part involved in kneeling — used almost exclusively in contexts of worship, prayer, or humble supplication. Encompasses falling on one's knees before Jesus (Mark 1:40; 10:17; Luke 5:8; Mark 15:19 in mockery), kneeling in prayer (Luke 22:41; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5), and the universal confession that every knee shall bow (Rom 14:11; Phil 2:10; Eph 3:14). Hebrews 12:12 uses 'drooping knees' metaphorically for spiritual fatigue (echoing Isa 35:3). Spanish 'rodilla' and German 'Knie' carry the same literal and liturgical range. KNEE BODY PART

en: knee, knees | es: rodilla, rodillas | fr: genou | de: Knie, γόνασιν, γόνατα Mark 15:19; Luke 5:8; Luke 22:41; Acts 7:60; Acts 9:40

γονῠ-πετέω G1120 V-APA-NMS (4×)

to fall on one's knees, kneel down (before someone)

Gonypeteo combines gony (knee) and pipto (fall), vividly depicting the act of dropping to one's knees. In the Gospels it appears in moments of urgent supplication or reverent approach. A father kneels before Jesus begging healing for his epileptic son (Matt 17:14), a leper implores cleansing (Mark 1:40), a rich man seeks eternal life (Mark 10:17), and soldiers mockingly genuflect during the Passion (Matt 27:29). The gesture conveys both desperate petition and — when perverted — cruel derision.

(4×) To fall on the knees, to kneel before someone in supplication, reverence, or mockery. The physical posture carries emotional force: a father's desperation for his son's healing (Matt 17:14), a leper's plea (Mark 1:40), a seeker's earnestness (Mark 10:17), and soldiers' scornful genuflection (Matt 27:29). Spanish 'arrodillándose,' French 'tomber-à-genoux,' and German 'niederknien' all capture the bodily act of dropping to the knees. BOW KNEEL CROUCH

en: having-knelt, kneeling | es: arrodillándose, arrodillándose-ante, habiendo-arrodillado | fr: tomber-à-genoux | de: niederknien, γονυπετήσαντες, γονυπετῶν Matt 17:14; Matt 27:29; Mark 1:40; Mark 10:17

γράμμα G1121 N-NNS (15×)

A letter of the alphabet, a written document, the Scriptures, the written Law (vs. Spirit), learning, or correspondence.

From the verb grapho (to write), this noun covers everything that writing produces — from individual letters scratched on stone to the full body of sacred Scripture. Paul makes it theologically explosive in his 'letter vs. Spirit' contrast: 'the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life' (2 Cor 3:6), where gramma represents the external written code of the Law. Yet the same word humbly describes debt certificates (Luke 16:6-7) and Paul's large handwritten characters (Gal 6:11). The range from the most sacred texts to everyday bookkeeping shows how fundamental writing was to the ancient world.

1. the letter (written code of the Law) (5×) The written code of the Mosaic Law as an external, constraining standard — Paul's theological 'letter' contrasted with the Spirit. In Romans 2:27-29 circumcision 'in letter' is set against circumcision of the heart, and Romans 7:6 declares release from serving 'in the oldness of the letter.' The climactic statement comes in 2 Corinthians 3:6: 'the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life.' German 'Buchstabe' (letter/character) and Spanish 'letra' both carry this same written-code nuance, though neither fully conveys the Pauline theological weight. LETTERS AND WRITINGS

en: in-letter, letter, of-letter | es: de-letra, en-letra, letra | fr: lettre | de: Buchstabe Rom 2:27; Rom 2:29; Rom 7:6; 2Cor 3:6

2. letter of the alphabet, written character (3×) Individual letters of the alphabet or written characters — the most basic, physical sense. Luke 23:38 notes the inscription over the cross was written 'in letters' of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. Paul draws attention to the 'large letters' he writes with his own hand (Gal 6:11), and 2 Corinthians 3:7 describes the ministry of death 'carved in letters on stone.' German 'Buchstabe' and Spanish 'letras' match this concrete orthographic meaning directly. LETTERS AND WRITINGS

en: in-letters, letters | es: en-letras, letras | fr: lettre | de: Buchstabe, {γράμμασιν Luke 23:38; 2Cor 3:7; Gal 6:11

3. writings, Scriptures, sacred texts (3×) Writings or Scriptures — a body of authoritative sacred texts. Jesus asks 'if you do not believe his [Moses'] writings, how will you believe my words?' (John 5:47). In John 7:15 the crowd marvels that Jesus knows 'letters' (the Scriptures) without formal training. Timothy is commended for knowing 'the sacred writings' from childhood (2 Tim 3:15). The Spanish 'escrituras/escritos' and the shift from individual characters to a literary corpus mirrors the English progression from 'letters' to 'literature.' LETTERS AND WRITINGS

en: writings | es: escritos, escrituras, letras | fr: lettre | de: Buchstabe John 5:47; John 7:15; 2Tim 3:15

4. written document, bond, account (2×) A written document, specifically a certificate of debt or financial record. In Jesus' parable of the shrewd manager, the debtors are told to take their 'document' and quickly revise the amount (Luke 16:6-7). This commercial sense connects to the broader Greco-Roman use of gramma for any official written instrument. Spanish 'documentos' cleanly captures this business-record meaning. LETTERS AND WRITINGS

en: documents | es: documentos | fr: lettre | de: γράμματα Luke 16:6; Luke 16:7

5. epistle, letter (correspondence) (1×) A letter of correspondence — an epistle or official communication sent between parties. Acts 28:21 records that the Jewish leaders in Rome received no 'letters' from Judea about Paul. This sense overlaps with epistole but emphasizes the physical written object rather than the act of sending. Spanish 'cartas' precisely denotes this postal-correspondence meaning. LETTERS AND WRITINGS

en: letters | es: cartas | fr: lettre | de: γράμματα Acts 28:21

6. learning, education, literary knowledge (1×) Learning, education, or scholarly knowledge acquired through extensive reading. Festus exclaims 'your great learning is driving you mad!' (Acts

26:24), using grammata to mean accumulated erudition. This metonymic extension — from written texts to the knowledge gained from studying them — is shared by Spanish 'letras' (which can mean both 'letters' and 'learning') and reflects how literacy and scholarship were inseparable in antiquity. LETTERS AND WRITINGS

en: learning | es: letras | fr: lettre | de: γράμματα Acts 26:24

γραμμᾰτ-εύς G1122 N-VMP (64×)

Scribe, an expert in the Mosaic Law and Jewish tradition; also a civic secretary or town clerk.

In the New Testament, the grammateus is almost always a Jewish scribe – a professional scholar trained in copying, interpreting, and teaching the Torah. These scribes appear regularly alongside Pharisees and chief priests as the religious establishment that questions, tests, and ultimately opposes Jesus. They ask why he eats with sinners (Mark 2:16), challenge his authority (Mark 11:27-28), and participate in his trial and condemnation. In one exceptional passage, the same word designates the town clerk of Ephesus who calmed the riot sparked by Demetrius the silversmith (Acts 19:35), reflecting the word's broader Greek meaning of 'secretary' or 'registrar.'

1. scribe / expert in the Law (63×) A Jewish scribe, an expert and teacher of the Mosaic Law. Appearing 63 times, this sense dominates the New Testament usage. Translations consistently employ specialized religious vocabulary – Spanish escribas, French scribe, German Schriftgelehrter ('Scripture-learned one') – rather than generic 'secretary,' confirming the technical religious meaning. Jesus declares that the scribes' righteousness is insufficient (Matt 5:20), debates them on the greatest commandment (Mark 12:28-34), and warns against their hypocrisy (Matt 23:2-7, 13-29). SCRIBE SECRETARY

en: scribes | es: escribas | fr: scribe | de: Schriftgelehrter Matt 2:4; Matt 5:20; Matt 7:29; Matt 9:3; Matt 12:38

2. town clerk / civic secretary (1×) A civic official or town clerk, specifically the municipal secretary of a Greek city. Attested only in Acts 19:35, where the grammateus of Ephesus intervenes to quiet the crowd rioting against Paul. Spanish secretario ('secretary') captures the administrative rather than religious nature of this office. French and German retain scribe/Schriftgelehrter, but the context makes the civic role unmistakable: this is a Roman-era municipal administrator, not a Torah scholar. SCRIBE SECRETARY

en: clerk | es: secretario | fr: scribe | de: Schriftgelehrter Acts 19:35

γραπτ-ός G1123 Adj-ANS (1×)

Written, inscribed, recorded

Something that has been written down or inscribed, committed to written form rather than merely spoken or unrecorded. Romans 2:15 speaks of God's law written on Gentile hearts, using the language of inscription to describe an internal moral knowledge. The term evokes permanence and authority—what is written remains as a lasting witness, unlike words that fade from memory.

(1×) Describes something committed to writing or inscription. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'escrita', French 'écrit', German 'geschrieben') all emphasize the written nature. In Romans 2:15, Paul uses this metaphor to argue that Gentiles possess God's moral law internally, inscribed on their hearts rather than on stone tablets, evidenced by their conscience bearing witness, making them accountable to God even without the Mosaic law's written code. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

en: written | es: escrita | fr: écrit | de: geschrieben Rom 2:15

γρᾰφ-ή G1124 N-GFS (51×)

Scripture or the Scriptures; the sacred authoritative writings, referring to the Hebrew Bible and, in later NT usage, apostolic texts.

Derived from grapho ('to write'), graphe in the New Testament almost exclusively denotes the sacred writings recognized as divinely authoritative. Jesus appeals to it in debates – 'Have you not read this Scripture?' (Mark 12:10) – and declares that 'the Scripture cannot be broken' (John 10:35). After the resurrection, he opens the disciples' minds 'to understand the Scriptures' (Luke 24:32, 45). Paul grounds his gospel in it: Christ died and rose 'according to the Scriptures' (1 Cor 15:3-4), and 'all Scripture is God-breathed' (2 Tim 3:16). The singular often points to a specific passage, while the plural hai graphai encompasses the whole Hebrew canon. German Schrift and French Ecriture both reflect the root meaning of 'writing' elevated to sacred authority.

Scripture / the Scriptures (sacred writings) (51×) The sacred authoritative writings, primarily the Hebrew Bible as cited throughout the New Testament. The singular graphe typically introduces a specific passage ('this Scripture,' Mark 12:10; John 19:37), while the plural hai graphai refers to the scriptural canon as a whole ('you err, not knowing the Scriptures,' Matt 22:29). Jesus grounds his mission in the necessity of scriptural fulfillment (Matt 26:54, 56; Luke 24:27, 44-45), and Paul makes the Scriptures foundational to his kerygma (1 Cor 15:3-4; Rom 1:2). German Schrift and French Ecriture preserve the etymological link to 'writing' while conveying sacred authority. SCRIPTURE AND WRITING

en: Scripture, scripture | es: Escritura, escritura | fr: Écriture | de: Schrift Matt 21:42; Matt 22:29; Matt 26:54; Matt 26:56; Mark 12:10

γράφω G1125 V-RPM/P-ANS (192×)

To write, compose, or inscribe; of authoring documents, citing Scripture with 'it stands written,' and recording in texts or books.

Grapho is the standard Greek verb for the act of writing, but in the New Testament it carries a peculiar theological weight. When Jesus answers Satan with 'it is written' (gegraptai, Matt 4:4, 7, 10), the perfect tense signals not merely past inscription but present, enduring authority—what was written still stands. This formulaic citation device accounts for roughly a third of all New Testament occurrences and is strikingly consistent across translations: Spanish 'Escrito está,' French 'il est écrit,' German 'es steht geschrieben' all preserve both the perfect aspect and the reverential tone. Beyond this formula, grapho covers ordinary letter-writing (Paul's epistles), legal inscription (the charge on the cross, Matt 27:37), and even the cosmic hyperbole of John 21:25—the world itself could not contain the books that 'would be written.'

1. to write, compose (a letter or document) (84×) To write or compose a letter, document, or decree: The active sense of authoring written communication—Moses writing commandments, Paul composing epistles, Pilate issuing a title for the cross. Luke 1:3 has the evangelist deliberately choosing to 'write an orderly account,' and Luke 16:6–7 shows a debtor hastily rewriting a bill. Spanish alternates between 'escribí' (I wrote) and 'escribe' (write!), French uses 'écrire,' and German 'schreiben'—all treating this as the straightforward, unmarked sense of putting words to a medium. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

en: I-wrote, did-I-write, write | es: Escribí, escribe, escribí | fr: écrire | de: schreiben, schreibt Mark 10:4; Luke 1:3; Luke 16:6; Luke 16:7; Acts 25:26

2. it is/stands written (Scripture citation) (67×) It is/stands written (Scripture citation formula): The theologically charged perfect passive gegraptai, used to introduce authoritative Scripture. Jesus deploys it three times against Satan's temptations (Matt 4:4, 6, 7, 10), and it appears throughout rabbinic-style argumentation in the Epistles. The perfect tense is crucial: it signals that what was once inscribed remains in force as a permanent decree. Spanish 'Escrito está' and German 'es steht geschrieben' both mirror the stative-resultative force—not 'it was written' (past and done) but 'it stands written' (past act, present authority). WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

en: It-has-been-written, has-it-been-written, it-has-been-written | es: Escrito-está, Está-escrito, escrito-está | fr: écrire | de: schreiben, schreibt Matt 2:5; Matt 4:4; Matt 4:6; Matt 4:7; Matt 4:10

3. written, having been written (recorded text) (39×) Written or having been written (recorded text): Passive participles and aorist passives describing the resultant state of a text—something that exists in written form. Luke 4:17 has Jesus finding 'the place where it was written,' and Revelation repeatedly refers to names 'written in the book of life' (Rev 20:15; 21:27). The focus is not on the act of writing but on the completed inscription as a fixed record. Spanish 'escrito/escritas' (written, f.pl.) and the participial forms across languages all point to the document or inscription as a finished artifact. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

en: having-been-written, written | es: escrita, escritas, escrito | fr: écrire | de: schreiben, schreibt Matt 27:37; Luke 4:17; Luke 18:31; Luke 20:17; Luke 21:22

4. to be written, to be recorded (2×) To be written or recorded (potential or purpose): Passive infinitives and subjunctives expressing the possibility or purpose of writing. John 21:25 declares that if everything Jesus did were written down, the world could not contain the books. First Thessalonians 5:1 says there is no need 'for anything to be written to you.' This rare sense shifts focus from author or text to the hypothetical act of inscription itself—what might or might not be committed to writing. Spanish 'escribiros' and 'fueran escritas' both preserve this subjunctive, unrealized quality. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

en: to-be-written, were-written | es: escribiros, fueran-escritas | fr: écrire | de: schreiben John 21:25; 1Thess 5:1

γρᾱ́ώδης G1126 Adj-AMP (1×)

Old-womanish, silly, superstitious

Characteristic of foolish old wives' tales, myths lacking substance or truth. Paul uses this dismissive term in 1 Timothy 4:7 to command rejection of godless and silly myths that distract from genuine godliness. The word carries a contemptuous tone, suggesting not just error but triviality—stories fit only for credulous gossips rather than serious students of truth.

(1×) Indicates myths and teachings that are foolish and superstitious like old wives' tales. The translations (Spanish 'de viejas', German 'altweiberhaft') preserve the dismissive characterization. In 1 Timothy 4:7, Paul contrasts these worthless fables with the rigorous spiritual training required for godliness, urging Timothy to reject teaching that appeals to superstition and credulity rather than sound doctrine, much as one would dismiss the unfounded tales passed around by gossips. OLD AGE

en: old-womanish | es: de-viejas | fr: γραώδεις | de: altweiberhaft 1Tim 4:7

γρηγορ-έω G1127 V-AIA-3S (23×)

To watch, be alert; primarily spiritual vigilance and eschatological readiness, occasionally literal wakefulness.

Formed from the perfect tense of egeiro (to awaken), gregoreo carries the built-in sense of someone already roused and now maintaining that alert state. Jesus uses it as his signature command in the Olivet Discourse — 'Watch, for you do not know the day' (Matt 24:42) — and again in Gethsemane's anguished appeal, 'Could you not watch with me one hour?' (Matt 26:40). Paul extends it to the moral life: 'Be watchful, stand firm in the faith' (1 Cor 16:13). The rare literal sense — staying physically awake against a thief — appears in the householder parable (Matt 24:43, Luke 12:39), where Spanish 'habría velado' and English 'would have stayed awake' mark the counterfactual physical alertness.

1. be spiritually vigilant (21×) Spiritual and moral vigilance: to be alert, watchful, and on guard in readiness for the Lord's return or against moral danger. This dominant sense (21 of 23 occurrences) spans the eschatological warnings of the Olivet Discourse (Matt 24:42, 25:13), the Gethsemane vigil (Matt 26:38-41), and the apostolic exhortations (1 Cor 16:13, 1 Thess 5:6, Rev 3:2-3). Spanish 'Velad,' French 'veiller,' and German 'wachen/wacht' consistently render the imperative as a call to sustained spiritual alertness rather than mere physical wakefulness. REFUGE AND SHELTER

en: Watch, be-alert, be-watchful | es: Velad, que-vela, velad | fr: veiller | de: wachen, wacht Matt 24:42; Matt 25:13; Matt 26:38; Matt 26:40; Matt 26:41

2. stay awake literally (2×) Literal physical wakefulness: remaining awake at night, particularly as a guard against intrusion. Confined to the householder parables in Matt 24:43 and Luke 12:39, where the master would have stayed awake had he known the thief's hour. English 'would have stayed awake' and Spanish 'habría velado' mark the counterfactual, distinguishing this concrete, bodily sense from the metaphorical vigilance that dominates the word's NT usage. REFUGE AND SHELTER

en: he-would-have-stayed-awake, would-have-watched | es: habría-velado | fr: veiller | de: wacht Matt 24:43; Luke 12:39

γυμν-άζω G1128 V-PMA-2S (4×)

to train, exercise, discipline (body or soul through rigorous practice)

Derived from gymnos (naked), gymnazo originally referred to athletic training performed unclothed in Greek gymnasia. The New Testament transfers this image to spiritual and moral formation. Paul tells Timothy to train himself in godliness rather than mere bodily exercise (1 Tim 4:7). Hebrews describes mature believers whose faculties have been trained by practice to distinguish good from evil (Heb 5:14), and discipline that yields the peaceful fruit of righteousness for those trained by it (Heb 12:11). Second Peter warns of hearts trained in greed (2 Pet 2:14).

(4×) To train, exercise, or discipline through sustained practice, originally of athletic training and metaphorically of spiritual or moral formation. Paul urges Timothy to train himself for godliness (1 Tim 4:7); Hebrews speaks of senses trained by practice (Heb 5:14) and of discipline's fruit for those trained by it (Heb 12:11). Even negatively, 2 Peter 2:14 describes hearts 'trained in greed.' Spanish 'ejercitado,' French 'exercé,' and German 'geuebt' all preserve the athletic-practice metaphor. DISCIPLINE INSTRUCT CORRECT

en: having-been-trained, train | es: ejercita, ejercitado, ejercitados | fr: exercé | de: geuebt 1Tim 4:7; Heb 5:14; Heb 12:11; 2Pet 2:14

γυμν-ᾰ́σία G1129 N-NFS (1×)

Physical training, bodily exercise, discipline

The practice of exercising and training the body, physical discipline and conditioning. Paul uses this term in 1 Timothy 4:8 in a comparison: while bodily training has some value, godliness is valuable for everything, holding promise for both the present life and the life to come. The word evokes the image of an athlete's rigorous physical regimen, which Paul then uses as a lesser analogy for spiritual discipline.

(1×) Refers to systematic physical exercise and bodily training. The root connection to the gymnasium underscores organized athletic discipline. In 1 Timothy 4:8, Paul acknowledges limited value in physical training—it benefits the body temporarily—while elevating spiritual training as infinitely more important since it prepares a person for both earthly life and eternity, shifting the metaphor from literal athletics to the disciplined pursuit of godliness with eternal rewards. CUSTOM AND PRACTICE

en: training | es: ejercitación | fr: γυμνασία | de: Uebung 1Tim 4:8

γυμνητ-εύω G1130 V-PIA-1P (1×)

To be poorly clothed, naked, inadequately dressed

To lack proper clothing, being either naked or dressed insufficiently for comfort and dignity. Paul uses this word in 1 Corinthians 4:11 as part of a catalogue of apostolic hardships: hungry, thirsty, poorly clothed, brutally treated, and homeless. The term emphasizes not just poverty but the shame and vulnerability of inadequate clothing, part of the stark contrast between the proud Corinthians and the suffering apostles.

(1×) Describes the state of being inadequately clothed or naked. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'estamos desnudos', French 'nu', German 'Mangel leiden') capture both nakedness and deprivation. In 1 Corinthians 4:11, Paul employs this term within a rhetorical strategy of ironic contrast—while the Corinthians think themselves kings, the apostles lack even basic clothing, suffering exposure and shame for the gospel's sake, undermining the Corinthians' triumphalist spirituality with the reality of apostolic suffering. NAKEDNESS AND EXPOSURE en: we-are-poorly-clothed | es: estamos-desnudos | fr: nu | de: Mangel-leiden 1Cor 4:11

γυμνός G1131 Adj-AFS (15×)

Naked, unclothed, bare; ranging from complete nudity to being poorly or insufficiently dressed.

Gymnos covers a spectrum from total nudity to simply being underdressed or exposed. In Jesus' parable of the sheep and goats, the 'naked' whom the righteous clothe are those lacking adequate covering (Matt 25:36–44), while in Mark 14:51–52 a young man literally flees naked from Gethsemane. Paul uses the word metaphorically for the soul's unclothed state apart from its heavenly dwelling (2 Cor 5:3). The range from physical to metaphorical undress mirrors the classical Greek usage, where gymnos could mean anything from 'stripped of armor' to 'lightly clad.' Translations across languages consistently render the physical sense — Spanish 'desnudo,' French 'nu,' German 'nackt' — yet the figurative dimensions remain vital for interpreting passages like Hebrews 4:13 and Revelation 3:17.

Naked / bare (unclothed state) (15×) Without clothing or adequate covering, spanning literal nudity to being insufficiently dressed. In the Gospels, it describes those in need of garments (Matt 25:36, 38, 43) and the young man who fled unclothed at Jesus' arrest (Mark 14:51–52). Metaphorically extended to spiritual exposure and vulnerability (Rev 3:17, 'you are wretched and naked'; Heb 4:13, 'naked and exposed' before God). All major translations — Spanish 'desnudo,' French 'nu,' German 'nackt' — consistently reflect the physical core. NAKEDNESS AND EXPOSURE en: a-bare, naked, the-naked-body | es: desnuda, desnudas, desnudez | fr: nu | de: nackt, γυμνοὺς, γυμνὸν Matt 25:36; Matt 25:38; Matt 25:43; Matt 25:44; Mark 14:51

γυμνότης G1132 N-GFS (3×)

nakedness, state of being unclothed or inadequately clothed, vulnerability and shame

Nakedness represents not merely the absence of clothing but a state of vulnerability, exposure, and often shame. In biblical contexts, nakedness frequently symbolizes poverty, degradation, or spiritual barrenness. Paul's catalog of hardships includes 'nakedness' alongside hunger and danger—describing either literal lack of adequate clothing or the shameful vulnerability of his apostolic sufferings. Revelation's warning to Laodicea speaks of spiritual nakedness that requires the 'white garments' of righteousness to cover their shameful condition. The term evokes both physical deprivation and moral exposure.

(3×) Romans 8:35 lists 'nakedness' among the trials that cannot separate believers from God's love. 2 Corinthians 11:27 includes it in Paul's catalog of apostolic hardships. Revelation 3:18 warns the Laodicean church to obtain white garments 'to cover the shame of your nakedness.' The multilingual evidence is direct—English 'nakedness,' Spanish 'desnudez,' French 'nudité,' German 'Bloesse'—all conveying exposure and vulnerability. The contexts range from literal lack of clothing (Paul's sufferings) to metaphorical spiritual exposure (Laodicea's complacency). NAKEDNESS EXPOSURE en: nakedness | es: desnudez | fr: nudité | de: Bloesse Rom 8:35; 2Cor 11:27; Rev 3:18

γῠναικ-άριον G1133 N-ANP (1×)

Weak women, gullible females, silly women

Women who are easily deceived or led astray, lacking discernment or strength of character. Paul uses this diminutive, somewhat contemptuous term in 2 Timothy 3:6 to describe false teachers who worm their way into households and gain control over vulnerable women. The word suggests both weakness and naivety, women who become victims of manipulative teachers because they lack proper grounding in truth.

(1×) Designates women who are weak-minded or easily manipulated. The diminutive form adds a note of contempt or pity. The translations (Spanish 'mujercillas', German 'leichtgläubige Frauen') capture the sense of gullibility. In 2 Timothy 3:6, Paul describes unscrupulous teachers who target these vulnerable women, exploiting their spiritual hunger and moral weakness, leading them astray with novel teachings while the women remain perpetually learning but never arriving at knowledge of the truth. WOMAN AND WIFE

en: weak-women | es: mujercillas | fr: γυναικάρια | de: leichtglaeubige-Frauen 2Tim 3:6

γῠναικ-εῖος G1134 Adj-DNS (1×)

Feminine, pertaining to women, womanly

Belonging to or characteristic of women, the feminine nature or gender. Peter uses this word in 1 Peter 3:7 when instructing husbands to live with their wives in an understanding way, showing honor to the woman as the weaker vessel—literally 'the feminine vessel.' The term simply designates gender without necessarily implying inferiority, though Peter's context addresses the different roles and physical strengths of men and women in marriage.

(1×) Indicates that which belongs to or characterizes women. The translations (Spanish 'femenino', French 'γυναικείῳ', German 'weiblich') all point to the feminine gender. In 1 Peter 3:7, this adjective modifies 'vessel' to distinguish wives as the feminine partner in marriage, whom husbands should honor while recognizing both shared spiritual inheritance and different physical capacities, calling for considerate treatment rather than harsh dominance. FEMALE GENDER

en: feminine | es: femenino | fr: γυναικείῳ | de: weiblich 1Pet 3:7

γῠνή G1135 N-DFP (219×)

Woman, adult female; wife or spouse in marital contexts. Greek gynē covers both gender identity and conjugal relationship.

Gynē is the standard Greek word for an adult woman, used both as a general term and as the normal word for 'wife.' Jesus addresses his mother and other women with the respectful vocative gynai (John 2:4; 19:26), and Paul uses it extensively for wives in marriage teaching (1 Cor 7; Eph 5). Most modern languages — Spanish mujer, French femme, German Frau — mirror this same ambiguity, using one word for both 'woman' and 'wife,' with context determining the meaning. The 219 NT occurrences span healing narratives, parables, genealogies, and household codes.

1. woman, adult female (190×) An adult female human being, without specific reference to marital status. Used generically of women encountered by Jesus — the hemorrhaging woman (Matt 9:20-22), the Canaanite woman (Matt 15:22), the woman with leaven (Matt 13:33) — and as a form of address (gynai). Spanish mujer, French femme, and German Frau all serve this general sense. The vocative use in John 2:4 and 19:26 is respectful, not dismissive, closer to 'dear lady' in tone. WOMAN AND WIFE

en: a-woman, woman | es: mujer, una-mujer | fr: femme | de: Frau Matt 5:28; Matt 9:20; Matt 9:22; Matt 13:33; Matt 15:22

2. wife, spouse (29×) A married woman in relation to her husband, emphasizing the conjugal bond. 'A man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife' (Matt 19:5; Gen 2:24 LXX). Spanish esposa sometimes disambiguates from mujer, and Korean uses the distinct 아내 for 'wife.' Paul's extended discourse on marriage in 1 Corinthians 7 and the Sadducees' riddle about the woman married to seven brothers (Luke 20:33) depend entirely on this spousal sense. WOMAN AND WIFE

en: a-wife, as-wife, wife | es: esposas, mujer, por-mujer | fr: femme | de: Frau Matt 19:5; Matt 19:8; Mark 12:23; Luke 14:20; Luke 20:33

Γώγ G1136 N-AMS (1×)

Gog, symbolic name for God's enemies

A name from Ezekiel's prophecy representing hostile nations that oppose God's people at the end of the age. Revelation 20:8 pairs Gog with Magog, using these names symbolically for the nations Satan deceives into attacking the saints after his final release from bondage. The name carries associations with massive end-times rebellion against God, drawing on Old Testament imagery to describe eschatological conflict.

(1×) Identifies the symbolic leader or representative of end-times enemies of God. The Hebrew origin (גּוֹג) from Ezekiel 38-39 provides the background. In Revelation 20:8, John borrows this prophetic name to describe the final rebellion of deceived nations gathered from earth's four corners, using Ezekiel's vision of northern invaders as a template for the ultimate satanic assault on God's people before their final deliverance and Satan's eternal defeat. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Gōg | es: Gŏg | fr: Gog | de: Gog Rev 20:8

γωνία G1137 N-GFS (9×)

A corner or angle of a building, street, or region; used architecturally of the cornerstone and spatially of street corners.

Denotes a corner or angle, whether of a building, a street intersection, or a geographic quarter. Its most theologically significant use is in the 'head of the corner' (kephale gonias) passages, where Jesus applies Psalm 118:22 to himself as the rejected stone that becomes the cornerstone (Matt 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet 2:7). In Matt 6:5, it describes the street corners where hypocrites pray to be seen. Spanish 'esquina' and French 'coin' both capture both the architectural and spatial senses neatly.

corner / angle (9×) A corner or angle of a structure, street, or spatial region. The word carries two main NT applications under one semantic umbrella: the architectural cornerstone — the critical junction stone at the corner of a building, applied christologically in Matt 21:42, Mark 12:10, Luke 20:17, Acts 4:11, and 1 Pet 2:7 — and the street corner where people stand to pray ostentatiously (Matt 6:5) or where the four winds blow from (Rev 7:1; 20:8). Spanish distinguishes 'esquina' (external corner) from 'rincón' (internal nook), reflecting the word's spatial flexibility. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-corner, corners, of-corner | es: de-esquina, esquinas, rincón | fr: coin | de: Ecken, γωνίαις, γωνίας Matt 6:5; Matt 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17; Acts 4:11

Δαυείδ G1138 N-GMS (59×)

David — king of Israel, ancestor of the Messiah, psalmist; used in titles like 'Son of David' and 'Key of David.'

Daueid (also spelled Dabid in the Received Text) is the indeclinable Greek form of Hebrew David, Israel's paradigmatic king. The name saturates the New Testament in multiple registers: as a historical figure in genealogies (Matt 1:6, 17), as author of the Psalms cited by Jesus and the apostles (Mark 12:36; Acts 2:25; Heb 4:7), and above all as the ancestor whose throne and lineage define messianic expectation. The title 'Son of David' becomes a primary christological designation (Matt 1:1; 9:27; 20:30-31), while 'the key of David' (Rev 3:7) and 'the root of David' (Rev 5:5; 22:16) extend the name into apocalyptic imagery. Every target language — Spanish David, French David, German David — transliterates without variation, reflecting the name's universal recognition.

of Dauid (59×) The proper name David, referring to the king of Israel, psalmist, and messianic ancestor. Used historically (Matt 1:6; Acts 13:22), as the attributed author of psalms (Mark 12:36; Heb 4:7), and as a christological title-bearer — 'Son of David' for the Messiah (Matt 1:1; 9:27), 'throne of David' (Luke 1:32), 'root of David' (Rev 5:5), and 'key of David' (Rev 3:7). Universally transliterated across all target languages without variation. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Dauid, of-Dauid | es: Dauíd, de-Dauíd, de-Dauíd? | fr: David | de: David Matt 1:1; Matt 1:6; Matt 1:17

δαιμον-ίζομαι G1139 V-PIM/P-3S (13×)

be demon-possessed — to be under the control or affliction of an evil spirit

Daimonizomai is a middle/passive verb meaning to be under the power of a daimonion (demon). All 13 of its New Testament occurrences describe people afflicted by demonic forces, and every instance appears in the Gospels — never in the Epistles or Revelation. The Synoptics use it in summary statements about Jesus' healing ministry (Matt 4:24, 8:16, Mark 1:32) and in specific exorcism narratives (Matt 8:28-33, 9:32, 12:22, 15:22; Mark 5:15-18; Luke 8:36). John 10:21 reports opponents' accusation that Jesus himself is demonized. Cross-linguistic glosses converge on possession language: Spanish 'endemoniado,' French 'demoniaque,' German 'besessen' — all indicating external spiritual domination rather than mere illness.

be demon-possessed (13×) To be under the control or affliction of a demon, to be demonized. Exclusively a Gospel phenomenon in the NT, appearing in Synoptic summaries of Jesus' healing ministry (Matt 4:24, Mark 1:32), specific exorcism accounts (Matt 8:28, 9:32, 12:22, 15:22; Mark 5:15-18; Luke 8:36), and the accusation against Jesus himself (John 10:21). The participle daimonizomenos functions as a substantive ('the demonized one') in most occurrences. Multilingual evidence — Spanish 'endemoniado,' German 'besessen' — uniformly treats this as supernatural affliction rather than natural disease. DEMONS EVIL SPIRITS

en: a-demon-possessed-one, demon-possessed, demon-possessed-man | es: de-endemoniado, endemoniado, endemoniados | fr: démon | de: besessen Matt 4:24; Matt 8:16; Matt 8:28; Matt 8:33; Matt 9:32

δαιμόνιον G1140 N-GNP (63×)

A supernatural spirit; usually an evil demon afflicting people, occasionally a pagan deity or divine being in classical usage.

In the New Testament, this neuter noun overwhelmingly refers to malevolent spirits that torment, possess, or afflict people — the "unclean spirits" Jesus and the apostles cast out in dramatic encounters across the Gospels (Matt 9:33; Mark 5:12; Luke 8:30). The Spanish consistently renders it as "demonios," French as "démon," and German as "Dämon," all pointing to the same core concept. A single notable exception occurs in Acts 17:18, where Athenian philosophers accuse Paul of proclaiming "foreign deities" — here the word retains its older classical Greek sense of a divine being or power, as the Spanish "divinidades" helpfully distinguishes from the usual "demonios."

1. demon, evil spirit (62×) A malevolent supernatural being or unclean spirit that oppresses and possesses people, cast out by divine authority. This is the dominant NT usage with 62 of 63 occurrences, spanning the Synoptic exorcism narratives (Matt 7:22; Mark 1:34; Luke 11:14) and doctrinal passages. Every major translation language treats this uniformly — Spanish "demonios," French "démon," German "Dämon" — confirming the sense is unmistakable across linguistic traditions. DEMONS EVIL SPIRITS

en: demons | es: a-demonios, demonios | fr: démon | de: Daemon, Dämon Matt 7:22; Matt 9:33; Matt 9:34; Matt 10:8

2. pagan deity, divine being (1×) A pagan deity or divine power in the classical Greek sense, referring to supernatural beings without necessarily implying malevolence. This rare NT usage appears only at Acts 17:18, where Athenian philosophers hear Paul preaching Jesus and the resurrection and suppose he is a herald of "foreign deities." The Spanish rendering "divinidades" (as opposed to the usual "demonios") captures the cultural register shift, echoing Plato's intermediate beings between gods and mortals. GODS AND DEITIES

en: deities | es: divinidades | fr: démon | de: Dämon Acts 17:18

δαιμονιώδης G1141 Adj-NFS (1×)

Demonic, devilish, characteristic of demons

Having the character or origin of demons rather than of God, wisdom or behavior that reflects demonic rather than divine influence. James 3:15 condemns false wisdom that is earthly, unspiritual, and demonic, contrasting it with the pure wisdom from above. The word suggests not just error but active malevolence, teaching that originates from and serves the purposes of evil spiritual powers.

(1×) Describes qualities or wisdom that originate from or resemble demons. The translations (Spanish 'demoníaca', German 'dämonisch') all point to demonic origin. In James 3:15, this term forms the climax of a three-part indictment of false wisdom—earthly (opposed to heavenly), unspiritual (opposed to spiritual), and demonic (opposed to divine)—indicating that bitter jealousy and selfish ambition do not merely lack God's wisdom but actively embody the character and purposes of demons. DEMONS EVIL SPIRITS

en: demonic | es: demoníaca | fr: δαιμονιώδης | de: daemonisch Jas 3:15

δαίμων G1142 N-NMP (1×)

Demons, evil spirits, supernatural beings
Malevolent spiritual beings that serve Satan and oppose God's purposes, supernatural entities distinct from humans and angels. In Matthew 8:31, demons inhabiting two men beg Jesus to send them into a herd of pigs if he casts them out, revealing both their recognition of his authority and their desire to inhabit physical hosts. These spirits display personality, intelligence, and fear of divine judgment.

(1×) Designates evil supernatural beings under Satan's control. The classical Greek sense of 'divine power' or 'fate' shifts in biblical usage to consistently evil spirits. In Matthew 8:31, the demons demonstrate awareness of Jesus's authority to cast them out and negotiate for an alternative destination, showing they possess will, communication ability, and preference for embodiment, while their plea also reveals their subjection to Jesus's command despite their supernatural nature. DEMONS EVIL SPIRITS
en: demons | es: demonios | fr: démon | de: δαίμονες Matt 8:31

δάκν-ω G1143 V-PIA-2P (1×)

To bite, to attack with teeth
To seize with teeth and bite, used both literally of animals and metaphorically of hostile interpersonal behavior. Paul warns the Galatians in 5:15 that if they keep biting and devouring one another, they will destroy each other completely. The vivid animal imagery suggests vicious conflict, treating fellow believers as prey rather than family, tearing at one another with words or actions.

(1×) Refers to biting with teeth, extended metaphorically to hostile verbal or relational attacks. The translations (Spanish 'mordéis', German 'beissen') preserve both literal and figurative senses. In Galatians 5:15, Paul uses this animalistic metaphor to shock the Galatians into recognizing the destructive nature of their conflicts—instead of loving neighbors as themselves (5:14), they are behaving like wild beasts, consuming one another in mutual destruction that will leave the entire community devastated if they don't stop. EATING AND CONSUMING en: you-bite | es: mordéis | fr: δάκνετε | de: beissen Gal 5:15

δάκρυ G1144 N-ANS (10×)

A tear or tears shed in weeping, expressing grief, compassion, or earnest supplication Refers to the physical tears shed as an outward sign of deep emotion — grief, pastoral anguish, penitent devotion, or compassionate prayer. Paul invokes his own tears to authenticate his pastoral sincerity (Acts 20:19, 31; 2 Cor 2:4; 2 Tim 1:4). The sinful woman's tears at Jesus' feet become a vehicle of worship and repentance (Luke 7:38, 44). Hebrews 5:7 attributes tears to Jesus himself in his prayers. The eschatological promise that God will wipe away every tear (Rev 7:17; 21:4) makes the word a bridge between present sorrow and future consolation.

tear, tears (weeping) (10×) A drop or drops of saline liquid shed from the eyes as an expression of grief, compassion, earnest prayer, or emotional distress. Used of Paul's pastoral tears (Acts 20:19, 31; 2 Cor 2:4; 2 Tim 1:4), the penitent woman's tears at Jesus' feet (Luke 7:38, 44), Christ's own anguished prayers (Heb 5:7; 12:17), and the eschatological promise of consolation when God wipes away every tear (Rev 7:17; 21:4). Spanish 'lágrima,' Arabic 'دَمْع/دُمُوع,' and Hindi 'आँसू' all confirm a single sense. WEEP CRY WAIL en: tear, tears | es: lágrima, lágrimas | fr: larme | de: Traene, δάκρυσιν, δακρύων Luke 7:38; Luke 7:44; Acts 20:19; Acts 20:31; 2Cor 2:4

δακρύω G1145 V-AIA-3S (1×)

To weep, shed tears, cry
To weep or shed tears, expressing sorrow through crying. John 11:35 records the Bible's shortest verse: 'Jesus wept.' At Lazarus's tomb, surrounded by grieving friends and facing the reality of death's power in a fallen world, Jesus himself weeps. This verb captures the simple physical act of shedding tears, revealing Jesus's full humanity and emotional solidarity with human suffering.

(1×) Indicates weeping or shedding tears as an expression of grief. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'lloró', French 'pleurer', German 'weinen') all denote crying. John 11:35's remarkable brevity draws attention to this moment of Jesus's emotional display—despite knowing he will raise Lazarus momentarily, he weeps at the tomb, showing compassion for Mary and Martha's grief and perhaps mourning the broader tragedy of death's presence in his Father's good creation, making this tear-shedding profoundly significant. WEEP CRY WAIL en: wept | es: lloró | fr: pleurer | de: weinen John 11:35

δακτύλιος G1146 N-AMS (1×)

Ring, finger ring, signet
A circular band worn on the finger, often serving as a signet for sealing documents or as a symbol of authority and status. In Luke 15:22, the father commands his servants to put a ring on the returning prodigal son's finger as part of his restoration. This ring signifies the son's reinstatement to full family membership and authority, reversing his shameful departure.

(1×) Denotes a finger ring, particularly one signifying authority or honor. The translations (Spanish 'anillo', French 'anneau') emphasize the ring's symbolic value. In the parable of Luke 15:22, the father's gift of a ring (alongside the best robe and sandals) publicly declares the prodigal's complete restoration—not as a hired servant but as a beloved son with authority to act on behalf of the household, transforming his expected humiliation into unexpected honor and celebration. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: ring | es: anillo | fr: anneau | de: Gewand Luke 15:22

δάκτῠλος G1147 N-AMP (8×)

Finger; a digit of the human hand, used literally for physical touch and figuratively for divine power ('the finger of God').
The basic word for a human finger, appearing in both everyday physical contexts and rich theological metaphor. Jesus uses fingers to heal — placing them in a deaf man's ears (Mark 7:33) — and challenges the Pharisees who burden others yet will not lift a finger to help (Matt 23:4, Luke 11:46). Most striking is the phrase 'the finger of God' (Luke 11:20), where Christ's exorcisms are attributed to divine power, echoing Exodus 8:19. Even in the parable of Lazarus, Dives begs for a finger-tip of water (Luke 16:24). The word carries weight far beyond its simple anatomy.

finger, fingers (8×) A digit of the human hand, used both for literal physical actions — touching, pointing, healing (Mark 7:33; John 8:6; John 20:25) — and in powerful figurative expressions such as 'the finger of God' denoting divine power and agency (Luke 11:20, echoing Exod 8:19). Spanish 'dedo,' French 'doigt,' and German 'Finger' all translate it straightforwardly, confirming a single unified sense across all eight occurrences. The figurative uses do not constitute a separate meaning but rather a metaphorical extension of the concrete body part. FLESH AND BODY en: finger, fingers | es: dedo, dedos | fr: doigt | de: Finger, δακτύλου, δακτύλων Matt 23:4; Mark 7:33; Luke 11:20; Luke 11:46; Luke 16:24

Δαλμανουθά G1148 N-GFS (1×)

Dalmanutha, a place near Galilee
An otherwise unknown location on the shore of the Sea of Galilee where Jesus and his disciples arrived by boat after feeding the four thousand. Mark 8:10 mentions this place, which appears nowhere else in ancient literature. Its precise location remains uncertain, though it was apparently in the region opposite the Decapolis where the feeding miracle occurred.

(1×) Identifies a geographical location on or near the Sea of Galilee. The name's obscurity and single New Testament occurrence make it difficult to pinpoint, though some manuscripts read 'Magadan' (Matthew 15:39) for the parallel account. Mark 8:10 uses this place name to mark Jesus's movement from predominantly Gentile territory back toward Jewish regions, setting up the subsequent confrontation with Pharisees who demand a sign despite Jesus having just multiplied loaves for thousands. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: of-Dalmanutha | es: de-Dalmanouthá | fr: Dalmanoutha | de: Dalmanuta Mark 8:10

Δαλματία G1149 N-AFS (1×)
Dalmatia, region on the Adriatic coast
A Roman province located on the eastern Adriatic coast, part of ancient Illyria. In 2 Timothy 4:10, Paul notes that Demas has deserted him and gone to Thessalonica, while Titus has departed for Dalmatia. The mention suggests early Christian missionary expansion into this Balkan region, though the circumstances of Titus's journey remain unclear.

(1×) Designates a geographical region on the Adriatic Sea's eastern shore, in modern-day Croatia and surrounding areas. In 2 Timothy 4:10, Paul's reference to Dalmatia places Titus in this northwestern Balkan territory, either on missionary work or personal business, contrasting with Demas's abandonment for love of the present world, and highlighting Paul's isolation as he writes from Roman imprisonment with only Luke remaining by his side during this period. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: Dalmatia | es: Dalmatía | fr: Δαλματίαν | de: Dalmatien 2Tim 4:10

δαμάζω G1150 V-ANA (4×)
to tame, subdue, bring under control (of animals or the tongue)
Damazo means to subdue or tame what is wild and unruly. Mark 5:4 uses it of the Gerasene demoniac whom no one could restrain — not even chains could 'tame' him. James employs the word three times in his discourse on the tongue: every species of beast and bird has been tamed by humankind (Jas 3:7), yet no human being can tame the tongue (Jas 3:8). The contrast between humanity's mastery over nature and helplessness before its own speech makes for one of James's most striking arguments.

(4×) To tame, subdue, or bring under control what is wild or unruly. Applied to the demoniac whom no one could restrain (Mark 5:4), and used by James of humanity's ability to tame every animal species yet inability to tame the tongue (Jas 3:7-8). Spanish 'domar,' French 'dompter,' and German 'zaehmen' each carry the sense of mastering something fierce, reinforcing the image of overcoming wildness. TAME DOCILE
en: has-been-tamed, is-tamed, to-subdue | es: domar, es-domada, ha-sido-domada | fr: dompter | de: zaehmen Mark 5:4; Jas 3:7; Jas 3:8

δᾰμᾰλ-ις G1151 N-GFS (1×)
Heifer, young cow, female calf
A young female cow used in Old Testament sacrificial rituals for purification. Hebrews 9:13 references the ashes of a heifer used for ceremonial cleansing under the old covenant, alluding to Numbers 19 where a red heifer was burned and its ashes mixed with water to purify those defiled by contact with death. The author uses this image to argue for Christ's superior sacrifice.

(1×) Indicates a young cow, specifically in the context of ritual sacrifice. The translations (Spanish 'novilla', French 'junge Kuh', German 'junge Kuh') all point to a female calf. Hebrews 9:13 invokes the red heifer ceremony as a type—if animal ashes could ceremonially cleanse the flesh under the old covenant, how much more does Christ's blood purify the conscience through the eternal Spirit, establishing a lesser-to-greater argument for the new covenant's superior efficacy. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: of-heifer | es: de-novilla | fr: junge-Kuh | de: junge-Kuh Heb 9:13

Δάμαρις G1152 N-NFS (1×)
Damaris, a woman converted in Athens
An Athenian woman who became a believer after hearing Paul's sermon on the Areopagus. Acts 17:34 names her alongside Dionysius the Areopagite as among the few who joined Paul and believed following his philosophical discourse on the unknown God and the resurrection. Her naming suggests she was a person of some significance in the early Athenian Christian community.

(1×) Identifies a specific woman who converted to Christianity in Athens. The name possibly derives from Greek 'damar' (wife or consort), though this etymology is uncertain. Acts 17:34 singles out Damaris by name, implying her prominence or later importance—Luke rarely names individual converts unless they played significant roles, suggesting Damaris may have been influential in the nascent Athenian church despite the city's generally skeptical response to Paul's message. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Damaris | es: Dámaris | fr: Damaris | de: Δάμαρις Acts 17:34

Δαμασκηνός G1153 Adj-GMP (1×)
Damascene, of Damascus, inhabitant of Damascus Belonging to or originating from Damascus, the ancient Syrian city. In 2 Corinthians 11:32, Paul recalls how the governor under King Aretas guarded the city of the Damascenes to arrest him, forcing his escape in a basket through a window in the wall. The term identifies the ethnic or civic identity of Damascus's inhabitants during this dramatic episode.

(1×) Designates people belonging to Damascus or its civic community. The translations (Spanish 'los damaskenoi', German 'Damaszener') indicate ethnic or geographical association. In 2 Corinthians 11:32, Paul recounts his humiliating escape from Damascus's governor, who controlled the Damascene population and city gates at the instigation of Paul's opponents, making this ignominious basket exit one of many hardships Paul catalogs to establish his apostolic credentials through suffering rather than triumphalist boasting. DAMASCUS CITY
en: of-Damaskēnoi | es: de-los-damaskenoi | fr: Damas | de: Damaszener 2Cor 11:32

Δαμασκός G1154 N-DFS (15×)
Damascus; the ancient Syrian capital, prominent in Paul's conversion narrative.
Damaskos is the Greek rendering of Hebrew Dammeseq, one of the oldest continuously inhabited cities in the world. In the New Testament it appears almost exclusively in connection with Paul's dramatic conversion and early ministry. It was on the road to Damascus that Saul encountered the risen Christ (Acts 9:3; 22:6; 26:12), and it was in Damascus that he first preached and then escaped over the city wall in a basket (Acts 9:19–25; 2 Cor 11:32–33). Paul also mentions returning there after his time in Arabia (Gal 1:17). The city thus serves as a pivotal geographical marker in the narrative of early Christianity's most influential apostle.

(15×) The ancient city of Damascus in Syria, rendered consistently across languages (Spanish 'Damasco,' French 'Damas,' German 'Damaskus'). All fifteen NT occurrences relate to the apostle Paul — his mission to arrest believers there (Acts 9:2), his encounter with Christ on the road (Acts 9:3; 22:6; 26:12), his early preaching and escape (Acts 9:19–25; 2 Cor 11:32), and his return from Arabia (Gal 1:17). The city functions as the defining geographic setting of Paul's conversion. DAMASCUS CITY en: Damaskos | es: Damasco, Damaskós, a-Damasco | fr: Damas, Δαμασκόν | de: Damaskus Acts 9:2; Acts 9:3; Acts 9:8; Acts 9:10; Acts 9:19

δᾰν-είζω G1155 V-ASA-2P (4×) to lend (money); (middle) to borrow Daneizo in the active voice means to lend, and in the middle voice to borrow. Jesus uses this word in the Sermon on the Mount and the Sermon on the Plain to challenge transactional generosity. In Matthew 5:42, he commands giving to the one who asks and not turning away the would-be borrower. In Luke 6:34-35, he pushes further: even sinners lend to sinners expecting equal return, but disciples should lend expecting nothing back. The word sits at the intersection of economics and ethics, redefining generosity.

(4×) To lend money or goods to someone, or (in the middle voice) to borrow. Jesus invokes this financial term to redefine generosity: do not refuse the one who wants to borrow (Matt 5:42), and lend expecting nothing in return, unlike sinners who lend only for reciprocal gain (Luke 6:34-35). Spanish 'prestar/pedir prestado,' French 'prêter,' and the German forms all preserve the dual active-middle distinction between lending and borrowing. LENDING LOANS

en: lend, to-borrow, you-lend | es: pedir-prestado, prestad, prestan | fr: prêter | de: δανίζετε, δανίζουσιν, δανίσασθαι Matt 5:42; Luke 6:34; Luke 6:35

δάν-ειον G1156 N-ANS (1×)

Loan, debt, money owed

A sum of money that has been borrowed and must be repaid, a financial debt. Matthew 18:27 describes the master who took pity on his servant and forgave the loan—an enormous debt of ten thousand talents. The term emphasizes the legal obligation to repay, making the master's cancellation of the debt a profound act of mercy that the forgiven servant fails to extend to his own debtor.

(1×) Refers to money loaned that creates a debt obligation. The translations (Spanish 'deuda', French 'dette') emphasize the repayment duty. In Matthew 18:27's parable, the master's forgiveness of this massive loan (representing an unpayable debt of millions in modern terms) illustrates God's forgiveness of sinners, while the servant's subsequent refusal to forgive a trivial debt owed to him exposes the hypocrisy of accepting mercy while withholding it from others, resulting in severe judgment. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15110 WITH 5 SENSES

en: loan | es: deuda | fr: dette | de: δάνειον Matt 18:27

δαν-ειστής G1157 N-DMS (1×)

Moneylender, creditor, one who loans money

A person who lends money to others, a creditor who expects repayment with or without interest. Jesus uses this figure in Luke 7:41, telling a parable about a moneylender who had two debtors—one owing five hundred denarii and another fifty—who forgave both when they couldn't pay. The parable illustrates that greater forgiveness produces greater love, explaining why the sinful woman loves Jesus so extravagantly.

(1×) Designates someone in the business of lending money. The translations (Spanish 'acreedor', French 'créancier') emphasize the creditor role. In Luke 7:41-43, Jesus's parable of the moneylender teaches Simon the Pharisee why the woman who washed Jesus's feet with her tears loves much—she has been forgiven much, like the debtor whose larger debt was canceled, while Simon's minimal love reflects his failure to recognize his own need for forgiveness despite lesser obvious sins. LENDING LOANS

en: to-a-moneylender | es: de-acreedor | fr: créancier | de: δανιστῇ Luke 7:41

Δανιήλ G1158 N-GMS (2×)

Daniel (proper name): the Old Testament prophet referenced by Jesus in eschatological discourse

The name Daniel refers to the celebrated Old Testament prophet whose visions appear in the book bearing his name. Jesus references 'Daniel the prophet' when discussing end-times signs, directing his audience to the prophetic writings about desolating sacrilege. The Hebrew name means 'God is my Judge,' reflecting Daniel's faithfulness during Babylonian captivity. Both Gospel references point readers to Daniel's apocalyptic visions as essential background for understanding Jesus' eschatological teaching.

(2×) This proper name appears exclusively in Jesus' eschatological discourse (Matthew 24:15, Mark 13:14), where he directs listeners to 'Daniel the prophet' as the source for understanding the 'abomination of desolation.' The references assume audience familiarity with Daniel's visions of end-times events, making the prophet's name a shorthand for accessing those crucial prophetic texts. DANIEL PERSONAL NAME

en: Daniēl | es: Daniēl, Daniél | fr: Daniel | de: Daniel, Δανιὴλ Matt 24:15; Mark 13:14

δᾰπᾰν-άω G1159 V-FIA-1S (5×)

To spend, expend; of money, resources, or oneself, sometimes with connotations of squandering or generous self-sacrifice.

A verb of economic expenditure that ranges from neutral spending to negative squandering to positive self-giving. The hemorrhaging woman 'spent all she had' on physicians to no avail (Mark 5:26). The prodigal son 'spent everything' in dissolute living (Luke 15:14). Paul instructs the Jerusalem-bound believers to pay the Nazirite expenses of four men (Acts 21:24). Most strikingly, Paul declares he will 'gladly spend and be utterly spent' for the Corinthians' souls (2 Cor 12:15). James warns that selfish desires lead to spending on pleasures (Jas 4:3). Spanish 'gastar' and French 'depenser' mirror the full range from wasteful consumption to sacrificial outpouring.

(5×) To spend or expend money, resources, or oneself. The word covers a spectrum: futile medical expenditure (Mark 5:26, the woman who spent all she had), profligate squandering (Luke 15:14, the prodigal), practical financial support (Acts 21:24, paying Nazirite expenses), sacrificial self-giving (2 Cor 12:15, where Paul pairs the active 'I will spend' with the passive 'be spent' to express total devotion), and self-indulgent consumption (Jas 4:3). Context determines whether the spending is wise, wasteful, or heroically generous. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15126 WITH 3 SENSES

en: I-will-spend, having-spent, pay-expenses | es: gastaré, gastéis, habiendo-gastado | fr: dépenser | de: ausgeben, δαπάνησον, δαπανήσαντος Mark 5:26; Luke 15:14; Acts 21:24; 2Cor 12:15; Jas 4:3

δᾰπᾰν-η G1160 N-AFS (1×)

Cost, expense, expenditure

The financial outlay required for a project or undertaking, the money that must be spent to complete something. Jesus uses this term in Luke 14:28, asking who would begin building a tower without first sitting down and calculating the cost to see if he has enough to complete it. The word emphasizes careful financial planning and realistic assessment before beginning a commitment.

(1×) Indicates the expense or cost of an undertaking. The translations (Spanish 'gasto', French 'dépense') point to financial expenditure. In Luke 14:28, Jesus employs this counting-the-cost imagery within a discipleship teaching—just as a builder must calculate expenses before starting construction to avoid the shame of an unfinished tower, potential disciples must count the cost of following Jesus, recognizing that discipleship requires total commitment and may cost them everything, including family and possessions. SILVER AND MONEY

en: cost | es: gasto | fr: dépense | de: δαπάνην Luke 14:28

δέ G1161 Conj (2809×)

Adversative and connective particle: 'but, and, now, however' — marking contrast or continuation

A postpositive particle that ranks among the most frequent words in the New Testament, de serves as Greek's primary tool for signaling mild contrast or narrative continuation. Unlike the stronger adversative alla, de often simply advances the discourse: 'and Abraham begat Isaac, de Isaac begat Jacob' (Matt 1:2). Yet it can carry genuine adversative force, as in Eph 4:11 where it distinguishes categories of gifted leaders. French 'or' (meaning 'now') captures the transitional flavor well, while Spanish alternates between 'y' (continuative) and 'pero' (adversative), and German uses 'aber' for both shades.

1. and (2806×) The connective-transitional use meaning 'and, now, then,' advancing narrative or explanation without strong opposition.

This covers the vast majority of occurrences (2,806x). French 'or' ('now') and Spanish '*-y' reveal the continuative flavor. In genealogies like Matt 1:2-16, de marks each successive generation. In discourse, it introduces the next thought or explanatory aside, much as English 'now' or 'and' does. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST en: and-, but- | es: *-pero, *-y | fr: or | de: aber Matt 1:2; Matt 1:4; Matt 1:5; Matt 1:7; Matt 1:9

2. but (3×) The distinctly adversative use meaning 'but, however, on the other hand,' setting up genuine contrast. Though only 3 occurrences are clustered here (all in Eph 4:11), the adversative sense pervades many of the 2,806 as well — context determines the shade. Spanish 'otros' and German 'aber-' signal the contrastive force. In Eph 4:11, de distinguishes apostles from prophets from evangelists, marking each as a separate category of gift. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST en: but- | es: otros | fr: or- | de: aber- Eph 4:11

δέ-ησις G1162 N-DFP (18×)

Earnest prayer, supplication, or entreaty; also a specific petition or request directed to God or to others.

A noun of intense, personal appeal — deesis always implies need pressing outward into words. Distinguished from the broader proseuche (prayer in general), deesis emphasizes the supplicant's urgency and specificity. Anna 'served God with fastings and supplications' (Luke 2:37); Paul pours out his 'heart's desire and prayer to God' for Israel (Rom 10:1). Spanish captures the range beautifully: 'oración' (prayer) for the devotional sense, 'súplica' and 'ruego' (plea, entreaty) for the petitionary force. In Philippians, Paul uses both senses within a single chapter — general prayerful supplication (1:4) alongside pointed requests 'made known to God' (4:6). The word reminds readers that biblical prayer is not vague aspiration but concrete, heartfelt asking.

1. prayer, supplication to God (11×) Earnest prayer or supplication directed to God, emphasizing heartfelt entreaty in a devotional or worship context. Anna worships 'with fastings and deeseis' (Luke 2:37); Paul makes 'supplication' for his readers (Phil 1:4 in its broader sense); the early church offers 'prayers and supplications' (1 Tim 2:1). Spanish 'oración' and 'súplica,' French 'prière,' and German 'Bitten' all convey the prayerful urgency. This sense highlights the relational posture — a creature in need turning toward God with persistent, earnest speech. Zechariah receives the angel's answer to long-standing deesis (Luke 1:13). PRAYER AND SUPPLICATION en: by-prayer, prayer, prayers | es: oración, súplica, súplicas | fr: prière | de: Bitten, δέησίς, δεήσεις Luke 1:13; Luke 2:37; Luke 5:33; Rom 10:1; 2Cor 1:11

2. petition, specific request (7×) A particular petition, plea, or entreaty for a specific need. While sense 1 emphasizes the devotional posture, this sense foregrounds the content — a definite request. In Eph 6:18, believers are to pray 'with all prayer and petition (deesis),' and each deesis targets a concrete need. Phil 4:6 instructs, 'let your requests (deeseis) be made known to God.' Spanish 'petición' and 'ruego' (formal request, plea) distinguish this from general prayer. The word can also extend to petitions addressed to human authorities, though the NT usage is overwhelmingly God-directed. The specificity is the key: not prayer as atmosphere but prayer as arrow, aimed at a named need. PRAYER AND SUPPLICATION

en: petition, prayer | es: petición, ruego, súplica | fr: prière | de: Bitten Eph 6:18; Phil 1:4; Phil 1:19

δεῖ G1163 V-PPA-NNS (104×)

It is necessary, one must; expressing divine necessity, logical compulsion, or moral obligation; also what is proper or fitting

Few Greek words carry as much theological weight in so few letters. Dei is an impersonal verb declaring that something must be so — and in the Gospels, that 'must' often signals divine plan. Jesus repeatedly says the Son of Man 'must' suffer, die, and rise (Matt 16:21; Mark 8:31; Luke 9:22), and apocalyptic events 'must' take place before the end (Matt 24:6). The translations reveal the modal force clearly: French il faut, Spanish es necesario, German muss — each capturing the impersonal compulsion. In a handful of cases the force softens from strict necessity to propriety: what 'ought' to be or what is 'fitting' (1 Tim 5:13).

1. it is necessary, must (102×) Impersonal expression of necessity — divine, logical, or moral — meaning 'it is necessary,' 'one must,' or 'it is inevitable.' Central to the Synoptic passion predictions where Jesus declares the Son of Man 'must' suffer (Matt 16:21; Mark 8:31), and to eschatological discourse where wars 'must' occur (Matt 24:6). Also covers practical necessity (Acts 5:29, 'we must obey God'). Translations converge on strong modal forms (fra: il faut, spa: es necesario, deu: muss) across 102 occurrences, confirming the impersonal compulsive force. NECESSITY AND OBLIGATION

en: it-is-necessary, it-must, must | es: es-necesario | fr: il-faut | de: muessen, muss Matt 16:21; Matt 17:10; Matt 24:6; Matt 26:54; Mark 8:31

2. proper, fitting, ought (2×) What is proper, fitting, or appropriate — expressing propriety or social-moral obligation rather than strict compulsion or divine plan. At Mark 13:14, the parenthetical 'let the reader understand' implies what the reader 'should' grasp, and 1 Tim 5:13 describes behaviors that are not 'proper' for believing women. English translations shift to 'ought' or 'proper' (versus the stronger 'must'), and Spanish debe and German muessen soften accordingly, distinguishing this lighter obligatory sense from the weightier divine necessity of Sense 1. NECESSITY AND OBLIGATION

en: it-should, proper | es: debe, debidas | fr: il-faut | de: muessen Mark 13:14; 1Tim 5:13

δεῖγμα G1164 N-ANS (1×)

Example, pattern, sample, warning

A visible demonstration or pattern that serves as an illustration, either for imitation or as a warning. Jude 7 presents Sodom and Gomorrah as an example of those who suffer the punishment of eternal fire, making their destruction a visible warning about the consequences of sexual immorality and pursuing unnatural desire. The term suggests these cities function as a perpetual cautionary display.

(1×) Refers to a sample or example that demonstrates a principle, often serving as a warning. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'ejemplo', French 'en exemple') emphasize the illustrative function. Jude 7 holds up Sodom and Gomorrah's fiery judgment as an ongoing example of eternal fire's punishment, arguing that their historical destruction serves as visible evidence of God's judgment on sexual sin, warning Jude's readers about false teachers who similarly indulge in immorality and will face comparable divine punishment. EXAMPLES AND TYPES en: example | es: como-ejemplo | fr: en-exemple, | de: Beispiel Jude 1:7

δειγμᾰτ-ίζω G1165 V-AIA-3S (2×)

to make a public spectacle, expose to shame or contempt; to display openly as an example

This verb carries the sense of putting someone on public display, particularly in a shameful or disgraceful manner. Joseph considered divorcing Mary quietly to avoid making her a public example (Matthew 1:19), showing the term's connection to public humiliation. Paul uses it dramatically in Colossians 2:15 to describe Christ's triumphant display of defeated spiritual powers—disarming and parading them openly. The term evokes the imagery of a victor's procession where captives are exhibited, though its semantic range includes both making an example of someone and making a public show.

(2×) The evidence reveals two distinct but related uses: Joseph's desire to avoid publicly shaming Mary (Matthew 1:19: Spanish 'exhibió,' French 'faire un exemple') and Christ's triumphant public display of defeated powers (Colossians 2:15: English 'made a public show,' Spanish 'avergonzar públicamente'). Both contexts emphasize the public, visible nature of the action, whether avoided or accomplished. SHOWING AND REVEALING en: he-made-a-show, to-expose | es: avergonzar-públicamente, exhibió | fr: faire-un-exemple | de: δειγματίσαι, ἐδειγμάτισεν Matt 1:19; Col 2:15

δείκνυμι G1166 V-AMA-2P (33×)

show, display, reveal — to cause someone to see, whether by pointing out a physical object or disclosing a truth

Deiknymi is the standard Greek verb for making something visible or known, appearing 33 times across the Gospels, Acts, and Revelation. Its semantic range stretches from the concrete to the revelatory. Satan takes Jesus to a high place and 'shows' him all the kingdoms of the world (Matt 4:8), while Jesus tells healed lepers to 'show' themselves to the priest (Matt 8:4; Mark 1:44). In John's Gospel, Jesus promises to 'show' his disciples greater works (John 5:20), and the Father 'shows' the Son all that he does (John 5:20). The word reaches its climax in Revelation, where an angel repeatedly 'shows' John visions of cosmic judgment and the new Jerusalem (Rev 1:1; 4:1; 17:1; 21:10; 22:1). Spanish 'mostrar,' French 'montrer,' and German 'zeigen' all converge on a single show/display sense.

show, display, reveal (33×) To cause someone to perceive something, whether by physically pointing it out or by disclosing hidden truth. Covers Satan's display of kingdoms to Jesus (Matt 4:8), the leper's presentation to the priest (Matt 8:4; Mark 1:44), Jesus' promise of 'greater works' (John 5:20), and the angelic unveiling of apocalyptic visions throughout Revelation (Rev 1:1; 17:1; 21:10; 22:1). The verb bridges sensory showing and divine disclosure. SHOWING AND REVEALING

en: I-will-show, Show, he-showed | es: mostrará, mostraré, mostró | fr: montrer | de: zeigen, zeigt Matt 4:8; Matt 8:4; Matt 16:21; Mark 1:44; Mark 14:15

δειλία G1167 N-GFS (1×)

Cowardice, timidity, fearfulness

A spirit of fear and timidity that prevents bold action, the opposite of courage and power. Paul reminds Timothy in 2 Timothy 1:7 that God has not given us a spirit of cowardice, but of power, love, and self-discipline. The term captures a paralyzing fearfulness that undermines faithful ministry, which God's Spirit actively opposes by providing strength and courage.

(1×) Indicates a disposition toward fearfulness and timidity. The translations (Spanish 'cobardía', German 'Furchtsamkeit') emphasize shrinking back from challenges. In 2 Timothy 1:7, Paul contrasts this cowardly spirit with the Spirit God has given—power for bold witness, love for sacrificial service, and self-discipline for perseverance—encouraging the perhaps-timid Timothy not to be ashamed of testifying about the Lord or of Paul's imprisonment, but to join in suffering for the gospel by God's enabling power. TREMBLING AND FEAR

en: of-cowardice | es: de-cobardía | fr: δειλίας | de: Furchtsamkeit 2Tim 1:7

δειλιάω G1168 V-PMA-3S (1×)

To be afraid, to fear, to be cowardly

To experience fear or timidity, to shrink back in cowardice. Jesus commands his disciples in John 14:27 not to let their hearts be troubled or afraid as he prepares to leave them. The verb expresses the emotional response of fear that Jesus deliberately counters with his gift of peace, distinguishing the peace he gives from the world's inadequate version.

(1×) Describes becoming afraid or fearful. The translations (Spanish 'tenga miedo', French 'avoir peur', German 'furchtsam sein') all indicate fear as an emotional state. In John 14:27, Jesus's prohibition against fear accompanies his bequest of peace—a peace unlike the world's superficial version, rooted in his completed work and promised presence through the Spirit, designed to replace disciples' anxiety about his departure with confident trust in his ongoing care despite physical absence. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: let-it-be-afraid | es: tenga-miedo | fr: avoir-peur | de: furchtsam-sein John 14:27

δειλός G1169 Adj-DMP (4×)

cowardly, fearful, timid; lacking courage or reverence

Deilos describes a disposition of fearfulness or cowardice — the failure of nerve before danger or the divine. Jesus rebukes his disciples as deiloi when they panic during the storm on the Sea of Galilee (Matt 8:26; Mark 4:40), questioning why they lack faith. In Hebrews 12:28, the related sense of reverential awe appears in worship. Most strikingly, Revelation 21:8 places the cowardly first in the list of those consigned to the lake of fire, alongside murderers and idolaters — a sobering warning against faithless timidity.

(4×) Cowardly, fearful, or timid, describing a disposition that shrinks from what should be faced with faith or courage. Jesus rebukes the storm-panicked disciples as deiloi (Matt 8:26; Mark 4:40), linking fear to faithlessness. Revelation 21:8 lists the cowardly first among those condemned, alongside murderers and liars. Spanish 'cobardes,' French 'craintif,' and German 'furchtsam' variously emphasize cowardice, timidity, and fearfulness. Hebrews 12:28 may shade toward reverential awe in the context of worship. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: awe, cowardly, fearful | es: cobardes, cobardes,, temerosos | fr: craintif | de: furchtsam, δειλοί Matt 8:26; Mark 4:40; Heb 12:28; Rev 21:8

δεῖνα G1170 N-AMS (1×)

So-and-so, a certain person, such a one

An indefinite reference to an unnamed person, used when the specific identity is either unknown or deliberately vague. In Matthew 26:18, Jesus tells his disciples to go into the city to a certain man and tell him that the Teacher says his time is near and he will keep Passover at his house. The anonymity may protect the man's identity or emphasize Jesus's supernatural knowledge.

(1×) Functions as a placeholder for an unspecified person's name. The translations (Spanish 'tal', French 'un tel') capture the indefinite reference. Matthew 26:18 uses this term as Jesus directs disciples to an unnamed host for the Passover meal—possibly protecting the location from premature disclosure to authorities, or demonstrating Jesus's foreknowledge by identifying someone the disciples don't yet know, with the mysterious instruction serving as a sign confirming Jesus's prophetic awareness of approaching events. SUCH (KIND/TYPE) en: certain-man | es: tal | fr: un-tel | de: δεῖνα Matt 26:18

δεινός G1171 Adv (2×)

terribly, fiercely; expressing severe intensity of suffering or emotion

This adverb intensifies descriptions of severe conditions or emotions, emphasizing the extreme nature of what is described. In Matthew 8:6, the centurion's servant is 'terribly tormented' by paralysis, while Luke 11:53 describes the scribes and Pharisees becoming 'fiercely hostile' toward Jesus. The word derives from roots meaning 'fearful' or 'terrible,' and in New Testament usage it functions to heighten the reader's sense of severity—whether physical suffering or emotional intensity. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'terriblemente,' French 'terriblement') consistently reflects this intensifying function across both contexts.

(2×) Appears in two dramatically different contexts that share the common thread of extreme intensity: the centurion describing his paralyzed servant's severe torment (Matthew 8:6) and the hostile reaction of religious leaders toward Jesus (Luke 11:53). The translations consistently render this as an intensifier emphasizing the fearful or terrible degree of the condition described. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH en: fiercely, terribly | es: terriblemente | fr: terriblement | de: δεινῶς Matt 8:6; Luke 11:53

δειπν-έω G1172 V-FIA-1S (4×)

to dine, eat supper, take the main evening meal

Deipneo refers to eating the chief meal of the day, typically the evening supper. In Luke 17:8, a servant is told to prepare his master's supper before eating himself. The phrase 'after supper' (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25) anchors the institution of the Lord's Supper in the setting of an actual meal — the cup is taken meta to deipnesai. In Revelation 3:20, Christ promises to come in and dine with anyone who opens the door, an image of intimate table fellowship that resonated deeply across the early church.

(4×) To eat supper or dine, referring to the principal evening meal. The word frames key communal and theological moments: a servant preparing supper (Luke 17:8), the cup of the new covenant taken 'after supping' (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25), and Christ's promise to dine with whoever opens the door (Rev 3:20). Spanish 'cenar,' French 'dîner/souper,' and German 'speisen' all center on the main meal, underscoring that New Testament fellowship is expressed around a shared table. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: I-will-dine, having-supped, to-have-supper | es: cenar, cenaré, cene | fr: dîner, souper | de: speisen, δειπνήσω, δειπνῆσαι Luke 17:8; Luke 22:20; 1Cor 11:25; Rev 3:20

δεῖπνον G1173 N-ANS (16×)

supper, dinner, banquet — a main meal, especially an evening feast with communal or ceremonial significance

Deipnon in classical Greek referred to the principal meal of the day, typically taken in the evening. In the New Testament its 16 occurrences range from ordinary dinners (Luke 14:12) to lavish banquets (Mark 6:21, Herod's birthday feast) to events of supreme theological weight: the Last Supper (John 13:2, 4; 21:20) and the eschatological 'marriage supper of the Lamb' (Rev 19:9, 17). Jesus' teaching often uses dinner invitations as parables of the kingdom — the great banquet where the poor replace the self-excused (Luke 14:16-24). The multilingual evidence — Spanish 'cena,' French 'repas/souper,' German 'Mahl' — consistently renders it as the main evening meal or feast.

supper / dinner / banquet (16×) The principal meal of the day, typically an evening dinner or formal banquet, serving in the NT as both a literal setting and a theologically charged occasion. Covers ordinary hospitality dinners (Luke 14:12), royal banquets (Mark 6:21), the Last Supper of Jesus with his disciples (John 13:2; 1 Cor 11:20-21), and the apocalyptic marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev 19:9, 17). The communal table setting repeatedly becomes a stage for teaching about the kingdom, hospitality, and eschatological fellowship. BANQUETS AND FEASTS

en: a-supper, dinner, dinners | es: cena, cenas | fr: repas, souper | de: Mahl, δείπνοις, δείπνου Matt 23:6; Mark 6:21; Mark 12:39; Luke 14:12; Luke 14:16

δεισῐδαίμ-ων G1174 Adj-AMP-C (1×)

Very religious, superstitious, god-fearing

Characterized by religious devotion or fear of the gods, a term that can be positive (pious) or negative (superstitious) depending on context. Paul uses it positively in Acts 17:22 when he observes that the Athenians are very religious in every way, evidenced by their many objects of worship including an altar to an unknown god. The word acknowledges their earnest religiosity while preparing to correct their ignorance.

(1×) Indicates exceptional religious devotion or fear of divine powers. The translations (Spanish 'muy religiosos', French 'superstitieux') show the term's range from pious to superstitious. In Acts 17:22, Paul diplomatically compliments the Athenians' religiosity as a bridge to the gospel, using their altar to an unknown god as proof of their spiritual hunger and as his entry point to proclaim the one true God who made everything and doesn't live in temples, turning their vague religious seeking toward specific knowledge of Christ. INCENSE AND WORSHIP

en: very-religious | es: muy-religiosos | fr: superstitieux | de: δεισιδαιμονεστέρους Acts 17:22

δεισῐδαιμ-ονία G1175 N-GFS (1×)

Religion, religious practice, superstition

Religious belief and practice, reverence for divine powers, which can shade into superstition. Festus uses this term in Acts 25:19 when explaining Paul's case to King Agrippa, describing the disputes as questions about their own religion and about a certain Jesus who had died but whom Paul asserted to be alive. Festus's use reveals his outsider's perspective on Christianity as merely another religious controversy.

(1×) Refers to religious observance and belief. The translations (Spanish 'religión', French 'superstition') reflect the term's potential range from legitimate piety to dismissed superstition. In Acts 25:19, the Roman Festus characterizes the charges against Paul as concerning 'their own religion,' revealing his incomprehension of both Judaism and Christianity as he reduces resurrection theology to a provincial religious squabble, unable to grasp the significance of Jesus's claimed resurrection that Paul preached. INCENSE AND WORSHIP en: religion | es: religión | fr: superstition | de: δεισιδαιμονίας Acts 25:19

δέκᾰ G1176 Adj-NNP (27×)

ten — the cardinal number, used in parables, apocalyptic symbolism, and narrative counting

Deka is the Greek cardinal number 'ten,' appearing 27 times in the New Testament across parabolic, apocalyptic, and narrative contexts. Jesus employs it in three memorable parables: the ten virgins awaiting the bridegroom (Matt 25:1), the ten minas entrusted to servants (Luke 19:13-17), and the woman searching for one lost coin among ten (Luke 15:8). In narrative, the ten disciples are indignant at James and John's request for thrones (Matt 20:24; Mark 10:41), and Jesus heals ten lepers of whom only one returns to give thanks (Luke 17:12-17). Revelation deploys the number symbolically: the dragon has ten horns (Rev 12:3; 17:3, 7, 12, 16), representing ten kings who receive authority with the beast — imagery drawn from Daniel's ten-horned fourth beast (Dan 7:7). Across all target languages the numeral is rendered straightforwardly: Spanish 'diez,' French 'dix,' German 'zehn.'

ten (27×) The cardinal number ten, employed across three distinct registers in the New Testament. In parables, it structures stories of preparedness (ten virgins, Matt 25:1), stewardship (ten minas, Luke 19:13), and persistence (ten coins, Luke 15:8). In narrative, it counts groups — the indignant ten disciples (Matt 20:24; Mark 10:41), the ten healed lepers (Luke 17:12-17). In Revelation's apocalyptic symbolism, ten horns on the dragon and beast represent a confederation of royal power allied against the Lamb (Rev 12:3; 17:3, 7, 12, 16), echoing Daniel 7:7. TEN (CARDINAL NUMBER)

en: ten | es: a-diez, diez | fr: dix | de: zehn Matt 20:24; Matt 25:1; Matt 25:28; Mark 10:41; Luke 13:4

δῠώδεκα G1177

twelve, the number 12 in all genders and cases

The cardinal number twelve, used in all genders throughout Greek literature from Homer onward. As a basic numeral, it appears in various dialectal forms but maintains the same essential meaning. The number held special significance in biblical contexts: twelve tribes of Israel, twelve apostles, twelve gates in the New Jerusalem. The word functions as an indeclinable or declined numeral depending on the grammatical context, agreeing with the noun it modifies.

πεντεκαίδεκα G1178 Adj-GMP (3×)

fifteen, the cardinal number 15

A straightforward numerical term indicating the quantity fifteen. In biblical usage, it appears in measuring distances, counting days, and marking time periods. Bethany was fifteen stadia from Jerusalem—roughly two miles, a Sabbath day's journey. The sailors sounding the depth found fifteen fathoms. Paul spent fifteen days with Peter in Jerusalem. These references demonstrate the term's simple quantitative function without symbolic overtones, though in Jewish numerology fifteen could be represented by yod-he (spelling part of God's name) rather than the usual letter combination.

(3×) John 11:18 measures the distance from Bethany to Jerusalem as 'about fifteen stadia.' Acts 27:28 records sailors sounding 'fifteen fathoms' while navigating in darkness. Galatians 1:18 specifies that Paul spent 'fifteen days' with Peter in Jerusalem. The multilingual glosses are entirely uniform—English 'fifteen,' Spanish 'quince,' French 'quinze,' German 'fuenfzehn'—simple numerical equivalents. These precise measurements lend historical credibility to the narratives, grounding theological accounts in concrete geographical and temporal details. FIVE (CARDINAL NUMBER)

en: fifteen | es: quince | fr: quinze | de: fuenfzehn, δεκαπέντε John 11:18; Acts 27:28; Gal 1:18

δεκᾰ-πολις G1179 N-GFS (3×)

Decapolis, region of ten cities east and southeast of the Sea of Galilee

The Decapolis was a league of ten predominantly Greek cities (though the number varied) located primarily east of the Jordan River and the Sea of Galilee. These Hellenistic cities enjoyed a degree of autonomy under Roman oversight and represented Greek culture and pagan religion in the midst of Jewish territory. Jesus' ministry occasionally extended into this Gentile region, and after the healing of the Gerasene demoniac, the man proclaimed Jesus throughout the Decapolis. The region provided a transitional zone between the Jewish heartland and the broader Gentile world.

(3×) Matthew 4:25 notes that crowds followed Jesus from Decapolis among other regions. Mark 5:20 records that the healed demoniac 'began to proclaim in the Decapolis' how much Jesus had done for him. Mark 7:31 describes Jesus traveling 'through the region of the Decapolis.' The multilingual glosses preserve the Greek name—English/French/Spanish 'Decapolis/Décapole/Decápolis,' German 'Dekapolis'—reflecting this distinctive geographical-cultural designation. Jesus' ministry in this Gentile region foreshadows the gospel's eventual spread beyond Judaism. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Decapolis, Dekapolis, of-Decapolis | es: Decapólis, de-Decápolis, de-Dekápolis | fr: Décapole | de: Dekapolis, Δεκαπόλεως Matt 4:25; Mark 5:20; Mark 7:31

δεκᾰ G1180 Adj-NFP (5×)

Fourteen; the cardinal number used in Matthew's genealogy and Paul's chronological references.

The cardinal number fourteen, appearing exclusively in structured chronological contexts. Matthew organizes Jesus' genealogy into three sets of fourteen generations (Matt 1:17, cited three times), a theologically significant arrangement since fourteen is the numerical value of David's name in Hebrew (dalet-waw-dalet = 4+6+4). Paul uses it to mark the span of fourteen years since a visionary experience (2 Cor 12:2) and fourteen years before his consultation with the Jerusalem apostles (Gal 2:1). All four target languages use a straightforward equivalent — Spanish 'catorce,' French 'quatorze,' German 'vierzehn.'

(5×) The cardinal number fourteen. In Matthew's genealogy (Matt 1:17), it structures the three epochs of salvation history into groups of fourteen generations each — a number likely chosen for its gematria connection to King David's name in Hebrew (d-w-d = 4+6+4 = 14). Paul uses it as a temporal marker: fourteen years since his heavenly vision (2 Cor 12:2) and fourteen years before returning to Jerusalem (Gal 2:1). The consistency across all translations reflects the universal transparency of numerical terms. NUMBER FOUR en: fourteen | es: catorce | fr: quatorze | de: vierzehn Matt 1:17; 2Cor 12:2; Gal 2:1

δέκᾰτος G1181 Adj-AFP (4×)

tenth; (as noun) a tithe, tenth part

Dekatos means 'tenth' and as a substantive (dekate) refers to the tenth part or tithe. All four New Testament occurrences appear in Hebrews 7, where the author argues for the superiority of Melchizedek's priesthood over the Levitical order. Abraham gave a tenth of the spoils to Melchizedek (Heb 7:2, 4), the Levites collect tithes yet are themselves 'tithed' through Abraham (Heb 7:9), and those who receive tithes are mortal while Melchizedek is attested as living (Heb 7:8). The tithe becomes a tool for priestly-order argumentation.

(4×) Tenth or tithe, the tenth portion given as an offering or due. In Hebrews 7:2-9, all four uses serve the argument that Melchizedek's priesthood surpasses Levi's: Abraham paid tithes to Melchizedek (Heb 7:2, 4), and the Levites who collect tithes were symbolically tithed through their ancestor (Heb 7:9). Spanish 'diezmos,' French 'Zehnten,' and German 'Zehnten' all derive from their respective words for 'ten,' preserving the transparent etymology of giving a tenth. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: tenth, tithes | es: diezmos, décima | fr: Zehnten | de: Zehnten Heb 7:2; Heb 7:4; Heb 7:8; Heb 7:9

δέκᾰτος G1182 Adj-NNS (3×)

tenth, the ordinal number in sequence or a tenth part as a fraction

This ordinal number indicates position in sequence (the tenth item) or proportion (a tenth part, tithe). Classical usage includes both ordinal and fractional senses. In John's Gospel, it marks the 'tenth hour' of the day when Andrew and another disciple followed Jesus. Revelation uses it to describe the 'tenth part' of the city that fell in the earthquake and the tenth foundation stone in the New Jerusalem's walls. The term can carry theological weight when referring to tithes, though that sense doesn't appear in these New Testament occurrences.

(3×) John 1:39 notes the 'tenth hour' when the disciples came to see where Jesus was staying—about 4 PM, a detail suggesting eyewitness memory. Revelation 11:13 describes 'a tenth of the city' falling in the earthquake. Revelation 21:20 lists chrysoprase as the 'tenth' foundation stone. The multilingual glosses are straightforward—English 'tenth,' Spanish 'décimo/décima,' French 'dixième,' German 'zehnte'—simple ordinal and fractional equivalents. The time notation in John provides a concrete historical marker in the narrative of discipleship's beginning. TENTH ORDINAL NUMBER

en: tenth | es: décima, décima-parte, décimo, | fr: dixième | de: zehnte John 1:39; Rev 11:13; Rev 21:20

δεκᾰτόω G1183 V-RIA-3S (2×)

to collect tithes from someone; to be subject to tithing (passive)

This verb specifically refers to the practice of collecting or paying tithes—the ten percent offering prescribed in Mosaic law. Hebrews 7 uses it twice in discussing Melchizedek's superiority to the Levitical priesthood: once for Melchizedek collecting tithes from Abraham (7:6), and once in the remarkable statement that Levi himself 'was tithed' through Abraham (7:9). The passive voice in the second instance creates a theological point about representation and superiority. The term appears exclusively in this Hebrews passage, where the author builds a sophisticated argument about priestly orders through careful analysis of the Genesis 14 encounter.

(2×) Both occurrences appear in Hebrews 7's argument about Melchizedek's superiority. First, Melchizedek 'collected tithes from' Abraham (7:6: Spanish 'diezmó,' German 'verzehnten'), establishing the lesser giving to the greater. Then, Levi 'has been tithed' through Abraham (7:9: English 'has been tithed,' Spanish 'ha sido diezmado'), showing the Levitical priesthood's subordination to Melchizedek's order. TRIBUTE AND TAX

en: collected-tithes-from, has-been-tithed | es: diezmó, ha-sido-diezmado | fr: verzehnten | de: verzehnten Heb 7:6; Heb 7:9

δεκ-τός G1184 Adj-AMS (5×)

Acceptable, welcome, pleasing; describing what is favorably received by God or by people.

An adjective conveying the idea of being accepted or well-received, often in the context of divine favor. Jesus reads from Isaiah about 'the acceptable year of the Lord' (Luke 4:19) — the year of God's gracious welcome — then provocatively declares that no prophet is 'acceptable' in his hometown (Luke 4:24). Peter discovers that anyone who fears God is 'acceptable' to Him regardless of nationality (Acts 10:35). Paul quotes Isaiah about 'the acceptable time' of salvation (2 Cor 6:2). The Philippians' gift is described as 'acceptable' and pleasing to God (Phil 4:18). French distinguishes between 'acceptable' and 'agreable,' hinting at the word's range from formal approval to warm delight.

(5×) Acceptable, welcome, or pleasing — especially in the sight of God. The word appears in contexts of divine receptivity: the Jubilee-like 'acceptable year of the Lord' from Isaiah 61 (Luke 4:19), the salvific 'acceptable time' of 2 Cor 6:2 (quoting Isa 49:8), and God's acceptance of those who fear Him from every nation (Acts 10:35). It also describes human reception — or the lack of it — in Jesus' proverb about prophets not being welcome at home (Luke 4:24), and the warm divine pleasure at the Philippians' sacrificial generosity (Phil 4:18). PLEASANTNESS AND DELIGHT

en: acceptable | es: aceptable, aceptado | fr: acceptable, agréable | de: angenehm, δεκτόν, δεκτός Luke 4:19; Luke 4:24; Acts 10:35; 2Cor 6:2; Phil 4:18

δελε-άζω G1185 V-PPA-NMP (3×)

to entice, lure, or trap by bait, especially into sin or error

This verb originally described fishing or hunting with bait—luring prey into a trap through attractive but deceptive means. Metaphorically, it describes the process of temptation and seduction, whether into sin or error. James employs it in analyzing the anatomy of temptation: each person is 'enticed' by their own desire. Peter warns of false teachers who 'entice' unstable souls. The term captures both the attractive appeal of temptation and its deceptive, predatory nature—what appears desirable conceals a hook.

(3×) James 1:14 describes how 'each person is tempted when he is lured and enticed by his own desire.' 2 Peter 2:14 and 2:18 both warn of false teachers who 'entice unstable souls' and 'entice' people who are barely escaping from error. The multilingual evidence shows the term's entrapment connotations—Spanish 'seducen/seduciendo,' French forms preserving the Greek, German 'verlocken' (lure/entice). All three contexts involve being drawn into destructive patterns through attractive but deceptive appeals, like fish to a baited hook. TESTING AND TEMPTATION

en: being-enticed, enticing, they-entice | es: seducen, seduciendo, siendo-seducido | fr: δελεάζοντες, δελεάζουσιν, δελεαζόμενος | de: verlocken Jas 1:14; 2Pet 2:14; 2Pet 2:18

δένδρεον G1186 N-GNP (25×)

tree — a woody perennial plant, used literally of fruit trees and figuratively in parables and apocalyptic imagery

Dendron is the standard Greek word for tree, appearing 25 times in the New Testament with a notable concentration in Jesus' teaching and in Revelation's visionary landscapes. The Sermon on the Mount introduces the principle that 'every good tree bears good fruit, but a bad tree bears bad fruit' (Matt 7:17-19), a metaphor reprised in Luke 6:43-44 and applied to the Pharisees and Sadducees by John the Baptist: 'every tree that does not bear good fruit is cut down' (Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9). The mustard seed parable transforms a proverbially tiny seed into a tree large enough for birds to nest in (Matt 13:32; Luke 13:19). In Revelation, the 'tree of life' yields twelve kinds of fruit and its leaves are 'for the healing of the nations' (Rev 22:2, 14), completing the biblical arc that began with the tree of life in Eden. Jude 12 uses 'autumn trees without fruit, twice dead, uprooted' as a vivid image of false teachers. Spanish 'arbol,' French 'arbre,' and German 'Baum' all map to a single lexeme.

tree, trees (25×) A woody perennial plant bearing branches, fruit, or leaves, used both literally and as a rich metaphorical vehicle. In the Synoptic teaching, a tree's fruit reveals its nature — good trees bear good fruit, bad trees bad (Matt 7:17-19; 12:33; Luke 6:43-44), and the unfruitful tree faces the axe (Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9). The mustard seed becomes a great tree sheltering birds (Matt 13:32; Luke 13:19). In Revelation, the tree of life bookends the biblical narrative, yielding twelve fruits with leaves for the nations' healing (Rev 22:2, 14). Jude's 'fruitless autumn trees, twice dead' (Jude 12) turns the image toward judgment. Every target language maps to one basic botanical term. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-tree, tree, trees | es: árbol, árboles | fr: arbre | de: Baum Matt 3:10; Matt 7:17; Matt 7:18

δεξιο-λάβος G1187 N-AMP (1×)

Spearmen, light-armed soldiers

Soldiers equipped with spears, possibly light infantry or guards who fought with throwing spears. Acts 23:23 records the Roman commander ordering two hundred soldiers, seventy cavalry, and two hundred spearmen to escort Paul to Caesarea. The large force reveals the seriousness with which the Romans treated the Jewish plot against Paul's life, deploying substantial military resources to protect one prisoner.

(1×) Designates soldiers armed with spears, though the exact military role remains somewhat unclear. The etymology suggests those who hold with the right hand, possibly spearmen or javelin throwers. In Acts 23:23, the tribune mobilizes these troops as part of a 470-soldier nighttime convoy to transfer Paul safely from Jerusalem to the governor in Caesarea, reflecting either the genuine threat level from Paul's enemies or the commander's determination to prevent any incident that might spark wider unrest. RIGHT SIDE

en: spearmen | es: lanceros | fr: droite | de: δεξιολάβους Acts 23:23

δεξιός G1188 Adj-NMS (54×)

dexios – right (hand or side); the position of honor, power, and divine authority

The adjective dexios ('right') designates the right hand or right side, carrying both spatial and theological weight across 54 New Testament occurrences. Spatially, it identifies a body part (Matt 5:29-30) or a position in a scene (Matt 25:33, sheep on the right). Theologically, the 'right hand of God' is the supreme seat of authority where Christ is exalted (Mark 16:19; Acts 2:33; Col 3:1), drawing on Psalm 110:1. It also signifies fellowship and commission (Gal 2:9). Spanish diestra, French droite, and German rechte map consistently to this dual spatial-honorific sense.

right (hand/side) (54×) The right hand or right side, encompassing literal bodily reference (Matt 5:29-30) and the theologically charged seat of divine authority. 'At the right hand of God' (Mark 16:19; Acts 2:33; Heb 1:3) draws on Ps 110:1 for Christ's exaltation. In Gal 2:9 it signifies partnership. Spanish diestra, French droite, and German rechte confirm a single concept across 54 occurrences. RIGHT SIDE

en: right, right-hand, the-right | es: derecha, derechas, diestra | fr: droite | de: rechte Matt 5:29; Matt 5:30; Matt 5:39; Matt 6:3; Matt 20:21

δέω G1189 V-PIM/P-1P (22×)

To beg or entreat a person; to pray or supplicate God.

From the root deomai meaning 'to lack, to need,' this verb develops into earnest requesting. When directed at people, it means to beg or implore, as when a leper beseeches Jesus in Luke 5:12 or a father pleads for his child in Luke 9:38. When directed toward God, it becomes prayer and supplication, as in Luke 22:32 where Jesus says 'I have prayed for you' and Acts 4:31 where the early church prays together. Spanish distinguishes rogar (human entreaty) from suplicar/orar (divine supplication), highlighting the two orientations.

1. beg, entreat a person (15×) To beg, entreat, or implore another person with urgent appeal. Luke 5:12 shows the leper falling on his face and begging Jesus; Luke 8:28 has the demoniac beseeching Him. Spanish rogar and Te-ruego capture the personal, face-to-face urgency. French and German both use prier and bitten without distinguishing addressee, but the context of direct human interaction is clear across 15 occurrences. ASKING AND PRAYING

en: I-beg, I-begged, asking | es: Ruego, Te-ruego, le-rogaba | fr: prier | de: bitten, bittet Luke 5:12; Luke 8:28; Luke 8:38; Luke 9:38; Luke 9:40

2. pray, supplicate God (7×) To pray or make earnest supplication directed to God, seeking divine intervention or favor. Matthew 9:38 and Luke 10:2 both use it in Jesus' command to 'pray the Lord of the harvest,' while Acts 4:31 records communal prayer. Spanish habiendo-suplicado and orando reflect the devotional register. Luke 22:32, where Jesus tells Peter 'I have prayed for you,' marks the most intimate instance of divine intercession. ASKING AND PRAYING

en: begged, having-prayed, pray | es: Rogad, habiendo-suplicado, orando | fr: prier | de: bittet Matt 9:38; Luke 10:2; Luke 21:36; Luke 22:32; Acts 4:31

Δερβαῖος G1190 Adj-NMS (1×)

Derbe, of Derbe, from Derbe

Belonging to or from Derbe, a city in the region of Lycaonia in southern Asia Minor (modern Turkey). Acts 20:4 identifies Gaius as a Derbeite, distinguishing him from another Gaius mentioned elsewhere. The designation indicates his hometown origin, as Derbe was one of the cities where Paul preached and established churches during his missionary journeys.

(1×) Indicates association with the city of Derbe in Lycaonia. In Acts 20:4, this ethnic or geographical designation identifies Gaius's home city to distinguish him from other men named Gaius in Luke's narrative, placing him as coming from one of the churches Paul founded during his first missionary journey (Acts 14:6, 20), and now traveling as Paul's companion, possibly as a representative of his home church carrying the collection for Jerusalem. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Derbaios | es: derbeo | fr: peau | de: Δερβαῖος Acts 20:4

Δέρβη G1191 N-AFS (3×)

Derbe, city in Lycaonia where Paul ministered and made disciples

Derbe was a city in the Roman province of Galatia, in the region of Lycaonia. It represented the southeastern limit of Paul's first missionary journey. After being stoned in Lystra and left for dead, Paul traveled to Derbe where he and Barnabas made many disciples without recorded opposition. The city appears again in Acts 16 when Paul returns with Timothy. Derbe's location made it a strategic outpost for the gospel's spread into the interior of Asia Minor. It was home to Gaius, one of Paul's traveling companions.

(3×) Acts 14:6 records Paul and Barnabas fleeing persecution to 'Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia.' Acts 14:20 narrates their departure 'the next day to Derbe.' Acts 16:1 mentions Paul arriving 'at Derbe and then at Lystra.' The multilingual glosses preserve the place name with minor variation—Spanish 'Dérbē,' French 'Derbé,' though German oddly lists 'Damaskus' (Damascus), apparently an error. Derbe represents the persistent advance of the gospel despite violent opposition—Paul proceeds from near-fatal stoning to fruitful evangelism. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Derbe, Derbē | es: Dérbē | fr: Derbé | de: Damaskus Acts 14:6; Acts 14:20; Acts 16:1

δέρμα G1192 N-DNP (1×)

Skins, animal hides

The skins or hides of animals, either as clothing material or for other uses. Hebrews 11:37 describes faithful saints of old who wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, destitute, persecuted, and mistreated. This detail emphasizes their poverty and rejection by the world, wearing rough animal skins because they lacked proper clothing, all while remaining faithful to God.

(1×) Refers to animal skins used as primitive clothing. The translations (Spanish 'pieles', French 'Fell', German 'Fell') all indicate hides or skins. Hebrews 11:37 uses this detail in the catalog of persecuted prophets and faithful ones to paint a picture of extreme deprivation—these heroes of faith, though commended by God, experienced such poverty and persecution that they wore animal skins rather than woven garments, wandering as refugees while the world proved unworthy of their presence despite treating them as worthless outcasts. SKIN AND LEATHER

en: skins | es: pieles | fr: Fell | de: Fell Heb 11:37

δερμάτ-ινος G1193 Adj-AFS (2×)

made of leather, leathern; describing material composition

This adjective describes items made from animal skin or leather. Both New Testament occurrences refer to John the Baptist's distinctive clothing, specifically his leather belt or girdle. This detail connects John to the prophetic tradition, particularly Elijah, who wore similar attire. The leather belt was part of John's ascetic appearance that marked him as a wilderness prophet calling Israel to repentance. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'de cuero,' French 'de cuir,' German 'ledern') uniformly identifies this as a material descriptor, emphasizing the rustic, non-luxurious nature of prophetic dress.

(2×) Appears identically in Matthew 3:4 and Mark 1:6, both describing John the Baptist's leather belt as part of his prophetic attire. The detail serves to characterize John as an Elijah-like figure dwelling in the wilderness, with clothing appropriate to his ascetic lifestyle and prophetic calling. The term straightforwardly identifies the material composition of his belt. SKIN AND LEATHER

en: leather | es: de-cuero | fr: de-cuir | de: ledern, δερματίνην Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6

δέρω G1194 V-PPA-NMP (15×)

To beat, strike, or flog; to inflict blows upon someone, whether in violence or judicial punishment.

Derō originally meant 'to skin' or 'to flay' in classical Greek, but by the NT period it had settled into the sense of beating or flogging. It appears in contexts of both informal violence and formal judicial punishment. In Jesus' parables, vineyard tenants beat the owner's servants (Matt 21:35; Mark 12:3, 5), and a negligent servant receives many blows (Luke 12:47–48). In the apostolic narratives, Paul and the disciples are beaten before councils and in synagogues (Mark 13:9; Acts 5:40; 16:37; 22:19). The Spanish 'azotar/golpear,' French 'battre,' and German 'schlagen' all capture the physicality of violent striking.

beat, strike, flog (15×) To inflict blows upon someone by beating or flogging, used of both informal violence and official judicial punishment. In the parables, servants sent to a vineyard are beaten by wicked tenants (Matt 21:35; Mark 12:3, 5). In Acts, apostles are flogged by authorities (Acts 5:40; 16:37). Jesus warns his followers to expect such treatment in synagogues and before councils (Mark 13:9). The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'azotar,' French 'battre,' German 'schlagen') uniformly reflects physical striking. STRIKING AND REFERENCE

en: Having-beaten, beat, beating | es: Azotando, azotando, golpea | fr: battre | de: schlagen, schlägt Matt 21:35; Mark 12:3; Mark 12:5; Mark 13:9; Luke 12:47

δεσμ-εύω G1195 V-PPA-NMS (3×)

to bind, tie up, or put in chains, either literally or figuratively

This verb describes the act of binding or tying, whether with ropes, chains, or other restraints. It can apply to binding sheaves of grain, shackling prisoners, or metaphorically to imposing burdens. Jesus condemns the scribes and Pharisees for binding 'heavy burdens' on people's shoulders while refusing to help carry them. The Gerasene demoniac had often been bound with chains but broke them. Paul was bound and dragged away during persecution. The term evokes confinement, restraint, and the imposition of control.

(3×) Matthew 23:4 condemns religious leaders who 'bind heavy burdens' on others. Luke 8:29 describes the demoniac who had often been 'bound with chains and shackles.' Acts 22:4 records Paul's testimony that he 'bound and delivered to prison' both men and women. The multilingual glosses are consistent—Spanish 'atan/atando/era atado,' French 'lier,' German preserving Greek forms. The contexts range from literal physical restraint (chains on the demoniac) to metaphorical burden-imposing (Pharisaic legalism) to religious persecution (Paul's pre-conversion activity). BINDING AND TYING en: binding, he-was-bound, they-bind | es: atan, atando, era-atado | fr: lier | de: δεσμεύουσιν, δεσμεύων, ἐδεσμεύετο Matt 23:4; Luke 8:29; Acts 22:4

δεσμ-έω G1196

bind, tie up, fasten together; form bonds or connections

A verb meaning to bind or tie things together, closely related to δεσμεύω. The lexicons note it as non-Attic, appearing in New Testament and later Greek texts. Active voice uses describe the action of binding or fastening something. The passive voice indicates being bound or tied up. In medical contexts, it can describe joints undergoing ankylosis—becoming abnormally stiff or fused, as if bound together. The word carries the basic sense of creating connections or constraints through binding.

δέσμ-η G1197 N-AFP (1×)

bundle, package; specifically in agricultural contexts, a sheaf or bundle of grain

In Matthew's parable of the wheat and tares, this word denotes bundles or sheaves prepared for burning. The term carries agricultural overtones, referring to gathered stalks bound together. Greek speakers also used it for packages more generally, and in medical contexts it could mean a handful. The Spanish and French glosses (manojos, gerbes) capture the agricultural bundling sense perfectly.

(1×) Agricultural bundles, specifically sheaves of wheat or tares bound together for collection and burning. The single New Testament occurrence (Matt 13:30) appears in Jesus' parable where the tares are gathered into bundles for destruction, while wheat is stored safely. The cross-linguistic evidence points consistently to bound agricultural materials. GRAIN SHEAF

en: bundles | es: manojos | fr: gerbes | de: δέσμας Matt 13:30

δέσμ-ιος G1198 N-DMP (17×)

A prisoner or captive; one bound in confinement under authority.

Desmios refers to a person held in physical custody — bound, imprisoned, or detained by governing authorities. In the Gospels it describes Barabbas, the notable prisoner released at Passover (Matt 27:15-16; Mark 15:6). In Acts, Paul and Silas are prisoners at Philippi whose midnight worship triggers an earthquake (Acts 16:25-27). Paul later embraces the identity of 'prisoner of Christ Jesus' (Eph 3:1; Philem 1:1), transforming a term of shame into one of apostolic honor. Spanish 'preso' and German 'Gefangener' both carry the same weight of physical confinement.

prisoner, captive (17×) A person held in confinement or bondage, whether in a literal prison or under military guard. The term designates someone detained by civil or political authority. Barabbas is called a desmios at Passover (Matt 27:15-16), and Paul and Silas are desmoi at Philippi (Acts 16:25, 27). Paul adopts the title voluntarily in his epistles (Eph 3:1; Philem 1:9), reframing imprisonment as a mark of faithful service. The translations uniformly render it as 'prisoner' or 'captive' across all languages. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-prisoner, prisoner, prisoners | es: preso, presos, prisionero | fr: prisonnier | de: Gefangene, Gefangener Matt 27:15; Matt 27:16; Mark 15:6; Acts 16:25; Acts 16:27

δεσμός G1199 N-NMS (18×)

A bond or chain used for imprisonment or restraint; figuratively, a binding impediment on a person's body or condition.

In the New Testament, desmos almost always refers to the literal chains and fetters of imprisonment, appearing prominently in Paul's captivity letters where he speaks of his 'bonds' as a badge of apostolic faithfulness (Phil 1:7, 13; Col 4:18; 2 Tim 2:9; Phlm 10, 13). The word carries a visceral, tangible weight: Luke describes the Gerasene demoniac breaking his bonds (Lk 8:29), and the earthquake at Philippi loosening every prisoner's chains (Acts 16:26). Yet twice it shifts into figurative territory, describing an invisible constraint on a person's faculty, as when Jesus looses the 'bond' of a woman's infirmity (Lk 13:16) and the 'bond' of a man's tongue (Mk 7:35).

1. bond, chain, fetter (16×) A physical chain, fetter, or shackle used to restrain a prisoner. This is the dominant NT sense, covering sixteen of eighteen occurrences. Spanish 'cadenas' and German 'Fesseln' both capture the concrete, tangible nature of the restraint. Paul's letters from prison turn these literal bonds into a theological symbol: his chains authenticate his gospel ministry (Phil 1:13-14; Col 4:18). The earthquake at Philippi that loosened every prisoner's bonds (Acts 16:26) dramatizes divine liberation from physical constraint. CHAINS AND FETTERS

en: bonds, chains, in-bonds | es: ataduras, cadenas, de-cadenas | fr: en-chaînes, lien | de: Fessel, Fesseln, mit-Fesseln Luke 8:29; Acts 16:26; Acts 20:23; Acts 23:29; Acts 26:29

2. bond, impediment (2×) A figurative bond or impediment binding a person's body or faculty, used metaphorically rather than of literal incarceration. In Mark 7:35, the 'bond of his tongue' (Spanish 'ligadura,' French 'lien') describes a speech impediment that Jesus releases, while in Luke 13:16 Satan's 'bond' on a crippled woman for eighteen years is broken by healing. Both passages use desmos to frame disability as captivity from which Jesus sets people free. BOND OBLIGATION VOW

en: bond | es: atadura, ligadura | fr: lien | de: Fessel, Fesseln Mark 7:35; Luke 13:16

δεσμο-φύλαξ G1200 N-DMS (3×)

jailer, prison guard, keeper of a jail or dungeon

A jailer or prison keeper was responsible for guarding prisoners and maintaining security in the detention facility. In the ancient world, this role carried significant liability—if prisoners escaped, the jailer could face execution. This explains the Philippian jailer's near-suicide when he assumed his prisoners had fled during the earthquake. The jailer's conversion narrative demonstrates how the gospel reached across social boundaries, transforming even those whose occupation involved coercion and confinement into brothers in Christ.

(3×) All three occurrences appear in Acts 16:23, 27, 36 during Paul and Silas's imprisonment in Philippi. The jailer receives them into custody, nearly kills himself when the earthquake opens the prison, and experiences dramatic conversion when he discovers the prisoners haven't fled. The multilingual glosses are uniform—English 'jailer,' Spanish 'carcelero,' French 'geôlier,' German preserving Greek forms. The narrative's focus on this particular jailer (and his household's baptism) elevates an otherwise faceless functionary into a memorable example of the gospel's transforming power. PRISON AND CONFINEMENT

en: jailer | es: carcelero | fr: geôlier | de: δεσμοφύλακι, δεσμοφύλαξ Acts 16:23; Acts 16:27; Acts 16:36

δεσμ-ωτήριον G1201 N-ANS (4×)

desmoterion – a prison or place of confinement; a jail where prisoners are held under guard

Desmoterion denotes a prison or jail – a secured place where persons are held in custody. Derived from desmos ('bond, chain'), it emphasizes the place where one is bound, giving it a more institutional feel than the common phulake. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in the Synoptics and Acts: John the Baptist sends word from the desmoterion (Matt 11:2), and the apostles are miraculously freed from one (Acts 5:21-23; 16:26). Spanish carcel, French prison, and German Gefangnis all render it uniformly, confirming a single concrete sense of 'place of imprisonment.'

(4×) A place of incarceration or confinement, where prisoners are held under guard and in bonds. The word's etymology (from desmos, 'chain, bond') foregrounds the binding aspect of imprisonment. All four New Testament occurrences involve physical custody: John the Baptist imprisoned by Herod (Matt 11:2), and the apostles locked in the public prison in Jerusalem (Acts 5:21, 5:23, 16:26). Cross-lingual evidence – Spanish carcel, French prison – converges on a single undifferentiated sense of 'jail, prison.' PRISON AND CONFINEMENT en: prison | es: cárcel, prisión | fr: prison | de: δεσμωτήριον, δεσμωτηρίου, δεσμωτηρίῳ Matt 11:2; Acts 5:21; Acts 5:23; Acts 16:26

δεσμ-ώτης G1202 N-AMP (2×)

prisoner, captive; one held in bonds or custody

This noun designates a person held in captivity or imprisonment, literally one in chains or fetters. Both New Testament instances appear in Acts 27, during Paul's sea voyage to Rome as a prisoner. The term appears when the centurion delivers prisoners including Paul to the centurion in charge (27:1), and later when soldiers consider killing prisoners to prevent escape during the shipwreck (27:42). The Greek root relates to 'bonds' or 'chains,' emphasizing the physical restraint of captivity. Translations consistently render this as 'prisoners' across languages, reflecting its straightforward reference to those held in custody.

(2×) Both occurrences are in Acts 27, narrating Paul's journey to Rome as a prisoner: first when prisoners are handed over to the centurion Julius (27:1), then when soldiers contemplate killing prisoners during the shipwreck to prevent escape (27:42). The context emphasizes their legal status as persons in custody rather than free travelers. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: prisoners | es: prisioneros | fr: bandelette | de: δεσμώτας Acts 27:1; Acts 27:42

δεσπότ-ης G1203 N-NMS (10×)

Master, sovereign lord — whether addressing God/Christ as supreme ruler or human slaveholders as household masters

Despotes carries the weight of absolute authority and ownership that kyrios does not always convey. When Simeon addresses God as 'Sovereign Lord' (Luke 2:29) or the early church prays to the 'Master' who made heaven and earth (Acts 4:24), the word evokes an owner's unquestioned authority over his entire household. The same word applies to human slaveholders whom Christian slaves are told to honor (1 Tim 6:1-2; Titus 2:9; 1 Pet 2:18). Spanish splits this neatly between 'Soberano/Senor' for the divine referent and 'amos' (masters) for the human, while French uses 'Seigneur' and 'Maitre' respectively.

1. Master (6×) Sovereign Master — a title for God or Christ as absolute ruler and owner of all, emphasizing supreme authority that cannot be challenged. Simeon's 'now you are releasing your servant, Sovereign Lord' (Luke 2:29) and the church's prayer 'Sovereign Lord, who made heaven and earth' (Acts 4:24) use despotes where kyrios alone would feel insufficient. Jude 1:4 and 2 Peter 2:1 warn of those who deny 'the Master who bought them.' Spanish 'Soberano' and French 'Seigneur' reserve this elevated register for the divine referent. LORDS AND MASTERS en: Master, master | es: Señor, Soberano, amo | fr: Maître, Maître„ Seigneur | de: Gebieter, Herrscher, Δέσποτα Luke 2:29; Acts 4:24; 2Tim 2:21; 2Pet 2:1; Jude 1:4

2. masters (4×) Human masters, specifically slaveholders exercising authority over enslaved persons in the household. The Pastoral Epistles and 1 Peter use despotes consistently for this social role: slaves should count their masters worthy of honor (1 Tim 6:1), especially believing masters (1 Tim 6:2), and submit even to harsh ones (1 Pet 2:18; Titus 2:9). Spanish 'amos' (masters/owners) and German 'Herrscher' capture the concrete relational authority in view. LORDS AND MASTERS en: masters | es: amos | fr: Maître | de: Herrscher 1Tim 6:1; 1Tim 6:2; Titus 2:9; 1Pet 2:18

δεῦρο G1204 Adv (9×)

Adverb of motion meaning 'hither, come here'; used as an imperative interjection 'come!' and temporally as 'until now, to the present'.

A versatile Greek adverb rooted in spatial motion — 'hither' or 'to this place' — that developed into one of the most memorable imperative interjections in the New Testament. When Jesus cries δεῦρο to Lazarus at the tomb (John 11:43) or invites the rich young man to follow him (Matt 19:21; Mark 10:21; Luke 18:22), the word carries an urgency that echoes across languages: Spanish 'Ven,' French 'viens,' German 'komm.' In Romans 1:13 Paul extends the word into a temporal sense — 'until the present' — where Spanish renders it 'ahora' (now), revealing how a word of spatial approach can shade into temporal arrival.

1. come (8×) An imperative interjection summoning someone to approach: 'Come!' Used by Jesus when calling Lazarus from the tomb (John 11:43), inviting the rich ruler to discipleship (Matt 19:21; Mark 10:21; Luke 18:22), and in God's command to Abraham to leave his country (Acts 7:3). Every major translation language renders it with a direct imperative of motion — Spanish 'Ven,' French 'viens,' German 'komm' — confirming its force as a summons rather than a mere spatial indicator. GOING AND LEADING en: come | es: Ven, Ven„ aquí | fr: viens | de: komm, δεῦρο Matt 19:21; Mark 10:21; Luke 18:22; John 11:43; Acts 7:3

2. present (1×) A temporal extension of the spatial sense, meaning 'until now, up to the present moment.' In Romans 1:13 Paul writes that he was hindered 'until the present' (δεῦρο) from visiting Rome. Spanish shifts to 'ahora' (now) and English to 'present,' showing the semantic leap from place ('hither') to time ('to this point'), a natural metaphorical mapping found across Indo-European languages. NOW (TEMPORAL ADVERB)
en: present | es: ahora | fr: viens | de: komm Rom 1:13

δεῦτε G1205 V-M-2P (12×)

Come! (plural imperative) — an invitation or summons calling others to approach, follow, or witness

The adverbial interjection deute functions as a plural imperative meaning 'come!' — a summons addressed to a group. It carries the warmth of invitation in Jesus' great call, 'Come to me, all who labor and are heavy laden' (Matt 11:28), and the directness of a command in 'Come, follow me, and I will make you fishers of men' (Matt 4:19; Mark 1:17). At the final judgment, the King will say 'Come, you who are blessed by my Father' (Matt 25:34). It appears also in the parable of the wedding feast (Matt 22:4), at the empty tomb (Matt 28:6; Mark 6:31), and in John 4:29 and 21:12. Spanish 'Venid' and French 'Venez' preserve the collective, invitational tone.

come (12×) A plural imperative interjection summoning a group to come, approach, follow, or witness something. Used in Jesus' calls to discipleship (Matt 4:19; Mark 1:17), his invitation to the weary (Matt 11:28), the King's eschatological welcome (Matt 25:34), the summons to the wedding feast (Matt 22:4), and the angel's invitation at the empty tomb (Matt 28:6). Also appears in ordinary group address (Mark 6:31; John 4:29; 21:12). Spanish 'Venid' and German 'Kommt' replicate the collective imperative force. GOING AND LEADING en: Come, come | es: Venid, venid | fr: venez | de: kommt Matt 4:19; Matt 11:28; Matt 21:38; Matt 22:4; Matt 25:34

δευτερ-αῖος G1206 Adj-NMP (1×)

on the second day; an adjectival form indicating something occurring the day after

This temporal adjective describes events happening on the second day of a sequence. In Acts 28:13, it marks Paul's arrival at Puteoli after one day's delay at an anchorage. Classical Greek writers used it with either explicit or implicit reference to 'day' (ἡμέρα). The multilingual glosses uniformly point to sequential timing, though some (like German retaining the Greek form) suggest the word's technical character.

(1×) Occurring or arriving on the second day of a journey or sequence. Acts 28:13 describes Paul's maritime journey where after being delayed at one port, they reached Puteoli 'on the second day.' The French 'deuxième' and Spanish 'al segundo día' capture the ordinal temporal sense clearly. DAYS AND DAYLIGHT en: on-the-second-day | es: al-segundo-día | fr: deuxième | de: δευτεραῖοι Acts 28:13

δευτερό-πρωτον G1207

second-first Sabbath (probably a textual corruption in the New Testament)

A puzzling compound phrase appearing in some New Testament manuscripts, literally meaning 'second-first Sabbath.' Lexicographers generally regard this as a textual corruption rather than a genuine Greek expression, since the combination of 'second' and 'first' creates an apparent contradiction. Various theories have attempted to explain what it might have originally meant—perhaps the first Sabbath after the second day of Passover, or the second Sabbath in some counting system that was also considered 'first' in another reckoning. Most modern textual critics consider it a scribal error.

δεύτερος G1208 Adj-ANS (44×)

Second (ordinal) or a second time (adverbial); indicating sequence, rank, or repetition

The Greek ordinal adjective 'second,' appearing 44 times in the New Testament with a strong concentration in Revelation's sequential visions – the second seal, the second angel, the second death. In most occurrences it functions as a straightforward ordinal marking position in a series. However, about a quarter of its uses shift to an adverbial sense meaning 'a second time' or 'again,' marking the repetition of an action rather than ranking within a list. This adverbial usage appears in pivotal narrative moments: Nicodemus asking how one can be born a second time, Peter's threefold denial, and Jesus praying again in Gethsemane.

1. second (ordinal) (33×) The ordinal numeral 'second' indicating position in a sequence or rank, attested 33 times. Used for the second commandment (Matthew 22:39), the second angel or seal in Revelation's apocalyptic series (Revelation 6:3, 8:8), and sequential narrative events (Mark 12:21, the second brother). Spanish segunda/segundo, French deuxieme, and German zweite all render this uniformly as a positional ordinal. Key passages include Hebrews 8:7 ('no place for a second') and Revelation 20:6 ('the second death has no power'), where rank and classification are in view. SECOND (ORDINAL NUMBER)

en: Second, second | es: segunda, segundo | fr: deuxième | de: zweite Matt 21:30; Matt 22:26; Matt 22:39; Mark 12:21; Mark 12:31

2. a second time / again (11×) An adverbial construction meaning 'a second time' or 'again,' indicating repetition rather than ordinal ranking, found 11 times. Spanish shifts to segunda vez, French to seconde fois, and German to zweite Mal – all adding an explicit 'time' word that the Greek leaves implicit through context. Theologically significant passages include John 3:4 (Nicodemus: 'Can one enter a second time into the mother's womb?'), Mark 14:72 (the rooster crowing a second time at Peter's denial), and John 21:16 (Jesus asking Peter 'a second time, Do you love me?'). The repetition sense carries narrative weight that mere ordinal counting does not. SECOND (ORDINAL NUMBER)

en: a-second-time, second, second-time | es: segunda, segunda-vez | fr: deuxième, seconde-fois | de: zweite, zweite-Mal Matt 26:42; Mark 14:72; John 3:4; John 9:24; John 21:16

δέχομαι G1209 V-PIM/P-3P (56×)

To receive, welcome, or accept; extending hospitality to a person or accepting what is offered, taught, or given.

Dechomai is one of the New Testament's richest words for receptivity. Jesus uses it to define the stakes of mission: 'whoever receives you receives me' (Matt 10:40), making the act of welcoming a traveling disciple an encounter with Christ himself. The word stretches from physical hospitality — opening one's home to a guest — through intellectual acceptance of teaching (Luke 8:13, the seed that receives the word) to the simple act of taking a document into one's hands (Luke 16:6). Spanish recibir, French recevoir, and German annehmen all collapse these senses into one verb, but the Greek contexts carefully distinguish whether what is received is a person, a message, or an object.

1. welcome, receive hospitably (27×) To welcome or receive a person with hospitality, extending acceptance and care to someone who arrives. This is the characteristic sense in Jesus' mission discourses: 'whoever receives you receives me, and whoever receives me receives the one who sent me' (Matt 10:40). It appears in contexts of towns receiving apostles (Luke 9:53), Zacchaeus welcoming Jesus (Luke 19:6), and early churches hosting traveling ministers (3 John 1:10). German nimmt auf ('takes in') and Spanish recibir both capture the warmth of personal welcome. RECEIVING AND TAKING

en: one-receiving, receive, received | es: lo-recibieron, os-reciba, reciba | fr: recevoir | de: annehmen, nimmt-auf Matt 10:14; Matt 10:40; Matt 10:41

2. receive, accept (26×) To receive or accept something offered — a teaching, message, testimony, or spiritual gift. Paul speaks of receiving the word with joy (1 Thess 1:6), and Jesus asks whether people will 'accept' the truth about John the Baptist (Matt 11:14). The object shifts from a person to an idea or proclamation, making this a cognitive and volitional act. French recevoir serves both this and the hospitality sense, but the Greek contexts consistently distinguish accepting a message from welcoming a messenger. RECEIVING AND TAKING

en: receive, receives, they-receive | es: aceptasteis, me-reciban, me-recibisteis | fr: recevoir | de: annehmen, nimmt-auf Matt 10:40; Matt 11:14; Matt 18:5; Mark 9:37

3. take into one's hands (3×) To take a physical object into one's hands or possession. In Luke 16:6–7, the steward tells debtors to 'take' their bills and rewrite them — a concrete, transactional use. Paul in 2 Corinthians 8:17 describes Titus 'accepting' the commission to collect funds. This is the most material sense of dechomai, stripped of the relational warmth of hospitality or the cognitive dimension of accepting teaching. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: Take, he-received | es: Toma, recibió | fr: recevoir | de: annehmen, nimmt-auf Luke 16:6; Luke 16:7; 2Cor 8:17

δέω G1210 V-RPM/P-AMS (43×)

To bind, tie, or fasten; figuratively to constrain by obligation or to decree authoritatively

A verb of physical restraint that extends powerfully into figurative territory. In its most common use it describes tying up prisoners (Matt 14:3), fastening animals (Matt 21:2), or bundling sheaves for burning (Matt 13:30). Paul applies it to marriage bonds (1 Cor 7:39) and spiritual constraint (Acts 20:22), while Jesus uses it for authoritative heavenly decrees (Matt 16:19). Spanish consistently renders 'atar,' German 'binden,' tracking the physical core even in metaphorical contexts.

1. bind, tie physically (34×) The primary physical sense of binding, tying, or fastening with ropes, chains, or fetters. Covers prisoners bound in custody (Matt 14:3, Mark 6:17), animals tied to posts (Matt 21:2), and tares bundled for burning (Matt 13:30). Translations uniformly reach for concrete binding verbs: Spanish 'atado,' French 'lier,' German 'binden.' BINDING AND TYING

en: binding, bound, having-been-bound | es: atadas, atado, atados | fr: il-faut, lier | de: binden, bindet Matt 13:30; Matt 14:3; Matt 16:19; Matt 18:18; Matt 21:2

2. be bound (obligation/constraint) (5×) A figurative extension expressing ongoing obligation or constraint, particularly in Paul's letters. A wife 'is bound' to her husband as long as he lives (1 Cor 7:39; Rom 7:2), and Paul himself 'is bound by the Spirit' (Acts 20:22). The perfect participle signals an enduring state rather than a single event. BINDING AND TYING

en: I-have-been-bound, has-been-bound, is-bound | es: estoy-atado, está-ligada, ha-sido-atada | fr: il-faut, lier | de: binden Rom 7:2; 1Cor 7:27; 1Cor 7:39; Col 4:3; 2Tim 2:9

3. bind (authoritative decree) (4×) An authoritative, almost juridical sense found in Jesus' pronouncements: 'whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven' (Matt 16:19; 18:18). The subjunctive mood signals legislative force. This sense also appears in the parabolic image of binding the strong man before plundering his house (Matt 12:29; Mark 3:27), where binding represents overcoming authority. BINDING AND TYING

en: he-binds, you-bind | es: ata, atare, atareis | fr: lier | de: binden, bindet Matt 12:29; Matt 16:19; Matt 18:18; Mark 3:27

δή G1211 Prtcl (6×)

Indeed, surely, now then; an emphatic particle adding urgency, affirmation, or inferential force to a statement.

A small but potent discourse particle that intensifies or affirms whatever it modifies, lending a sense of 'indeed,' 'surely,' or 'now then.' Its roots are temporal ('at this very point'), but in the New Testament it functions mainly as a rhetorical intensifier. In Jesus' parable of the sower, the good soil 'indeed' bears fruit (Matt 13:23). The shepherds say to one another, 'Let us now go to Bethlehem' (Luke 2:15), where the particle adds eager resolve. The Antioch church is worshipping and fasting when the Holy Spirit says, 'Now then, set apart Barnabas and Saul' (Acts 13:2). Paul uses it with emphasis: 'You were bought with a price; so then, glorify God' (1 Cor 6:20). German 'dann' captures the inferential dimension, while Spanish and French often absorb its force into sentence-level emphasis rather than a dedicated word.

indeed / surely / certainly (6×) An emphatic discourse particle used to affirm, intensify, or inject urgency into a statement, carrying a temporal-inferential nuance of 'now then,' 'indeed,' or 'surely.' The shepherds use it to express eager resolve—'Let us go now to Bethlehem' (Luke 2:15). The Holy Spirit's directive in Acts 13:2 carries the force of 'Now then, set apart for me Barnabas and Saul.' Paul employs it in exhortation: 'glorify God indeed in your body' (1 Cor 6:20). German 'dann' and 'denn' reflect its inferential thrust, while Spanish often renders it through sentence-level emphasis ('ciertamente') rather than a single lexical item. AFFIRMATION PARTICLES

en: indeed, indeed-, surely- | es: *, *-ciertamente, ciertamente | fr: certes | de: dann, δή, δὴ Matt 13:23; Luke 2:15; Acts 13:2; Acts 15:36; 1Cor 6:20

δῆλος G1212 Adj-NNS (3×)

clear, evident, manifest, plain; visible to the mind or senses, leaving no room for doubt or obscurity

Originally describing what is visible to the eye, δῆλος came to denote what is clear or obvious to the mind. In the New Testament's three occurrences, it consistently indicates something manifest beyond reasonable doubt. Peter's Galilean accent made it 'evident' he belonged with Jesus (Matt 26:73). Paul uses it when reasoning from Scripture—it's 'clear' that a certain exception applies (1 Cor 15:27), and 'evident' that no one is justified by the law (Gal 3:11). The word conveys not mere visibility but unmistakable clarity.

(3×) The cognitive clarity sense dominates New Testament usage. Each occurrence introduces a conclusion that should be obvious to any reasonable observer: Peter's accent reveals his identity, a logical exception needs no explicit statement, and justification by law contradicts the prophet's clear teaching. The consistent rendering across languages—'clear', 'evident', 'manifest', 'offenbar'—reflects this epistemological function. The word appears in contexts where evidence eliminates ambiguity, making something intellectually plain rather than merely physically visible. MANIFEST AND EVIDENT

en: clear, evident | es: claro, evidente | fr: évident | de: offenbar, δῆλόν Matt 26:73; 1Cor 15:27; Gal 3:11

δηλ-όω G1213 V-FIA-3S (7×)

To make known, reveal, indicate, signify; passive: to be shown or reported to someone.

Deloo is built from the adjective dēlos ('clear, visible') and means fundamentally to make something manifest or plain. In six of its seven NT occurrences, it appears in the active voice covering a range of revelatory actions: the Spirit of Christ 'indicated' (edelou) beforehand the sufferings of the Messiah (1 Pet 1:11), the Holy Spirit 'signifies' (delountos) that the way into the Most Holy Place had not yet been disclosed (Heb 9:8), the Day 'will make clear' (delosei) each person's work (1 Cor 3:13), and Epaphras 'made known' (delosas) the Colossians' love (Col 1:8). Spanish declarar/manifestar, French rendre evident, and German zeigen all orbit around disclosure and proof. The single passive occurrence in 1 Cor 1:11 — 'it was shown to me' (edelothe) by Chloe's people — shifts the perspective: now the subject receives rather than performs the revelation. This active-passive distinction, though numerically lopsided, matters theologically: God reveals, and humans receive the report.

1. make known, reveal, indicate (active) (6×) To make known, reveal, indicate, or signify in the active voice — the subject discloses, manifests, or demonstrates something that was previously hidden or unclear. Six occurrences cover prophetic revelation (1 Pet 1:11, the Spirit 'indicated beforehand' Christ's sufferings), liturgical signification (Heb 9:8, the Holy Spirit 'signifies' the inaccessibility of the inner sanctuary), eschatological disclosure (1 Cor 3:13, the Day 'will make clear' the quality of each person's work), divine shaking that 'indicates' the removal of created things (Heb 12:27), and personal communication (Col 1:8, Epaphras 'made known' their love; 2 Pet 1:14, Christ 'made clear' to Peter his approaching death). Spanish manifestar/declarar, French rendre evident, and German zeigen consistently render this with vocabulary of disclosure and proof. SHOWING AND REVEALING

en: having-made-known, indicates, made-clear | es: declarará, habiendo-manifestado, indica | fr: rendre-évident, zeigen | de: zeigen 1Cor 3:13; Col 1:8; Heb 9:8; Heb 12:27; 1Pet 1:11

2. be shown, be made known (passive) (1×) To be shown, be made known, or be reported in the passive voice — the subject receives information that others have disclosed. The single occurrence in 1 Cor 1:11 is nevertheless significant: 'it was shown to me (edelothe moi) by Chloe's people' that there are quarrels among the Corinthians. Spanish fue declarado, French il m'a ete signale, and German es ist mir gezeigt worden all shift to passive constructions. Paul is the recipient, not the agent, of this knowledge — the Corinthian factions were reported to him, not discovered by him. This passive frames the entire letter's occasion: Paul writes because he has been informed, not because he witnessed the divisions firsthand. SHOWING AND REVEALING

en: it-was-shown | es: fue-declarado | fr: rendre-évident | de: zeigen 1Cor 1:11

Δημᾶς G1214 N-NMS (3×)

Demas, companion of Paul who later deserted him, loving the present world

Demas (possibly shortened from Demetrius) was one of Paul's co-workers, mentioned alongside Luke and other faithful companions. Colossians and Philemon record him serving with Paul during an imprisonment, likely in Rome. However, 2 Timothy tells the tragic conclusion: 'Demas has deserted me, having loved this present world, and has departed for Thessalonica.' His story provides a sobering example of a ministry companion who ultimately chose temporal security or comfort over costly faithfulness to Christ and His gospel.

(3×) Colossians 4:14 includes Demas among those sending greetings. Philemon 24 lists him among Paul's 'fellow workers.' 2 Timothy 4:10 records the painful desertion: 'Demas, in love with this present world, has deserted me.' The multilingual glosses preserve the Greek name —Spanish 'Dēmâs,' French preserving the Greek, German 'Demas.' The stark contrast between the earlier companionship and final desertion has made Demas a proverbial figure representing those who begin well but fail to endure when tested by worldly attractions. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Demas, Dēmas | es: Dēmâs | fr: Δημᾶς | de: Demas Col 4:14; 2Tim 4:10; Phlm 1:24

δημηγορ-έω G1215 V-IIA-3S (1×)

to address a public assembly, deliver a formal speech; often with connotations of popular oratory

This verb describes formal public speaking, particularly to assemblies or crowds. In Acts 12:21, Herod Agrippa delivers an official address from his throne. Classical usage often implied populist rhetoric or crowd-pleasing speeches, though the New Testament instance is more neutral—simply formal public address. The Spanish 'arengaba' (was haranguing) and French 'haranguer' both suggest the rhetorical intensity often associated with this term.

(1×) To deliver a formal public oration or address to an assembly. Herod's speech in Acts 12:21 represents official royal oratory. Classical writers distinguished this from private conversation or informal speech, emphasizing its public, often political character. The translations consistently recognize the formal, rhetorical nature of this communication. SPEAKING AND TALKING

en: was-addressing | es: arengaba | fr: haranguer | de: ἐδημηγόρει Acts 12:21

Δημήτριος G1216 N-DMS (3×)

Demetrius, name of a silversmith who opposed Paul and a commended Christian disciple

Demetrius is a Greek name borne by two individuals in the New Testament. The first, a silversmith in Ephesus, led a riot against Paul because the gospel's spread threatened the lucrative trade in Artemis idols. The second, commended by John in 3 John, receives a threefold testimony—from the truth itself, from everyone, and from John and his companions. The name's dual usage reminds readers that identity is determined not by name but by character and allegiance—one Demetrius opposed the gospel for profit, another exemplified it through faithful witness.

(3×) Acts 19:24, 38 describe Demetrius the silversmith who manufactured silver shrines of Artemis and incited opposition to Paul's ministry. 3 John 12 commends a different Demetrius who has 'received a good testimony from everyone and from the truth itself.' The multilingual glosses preserve the Greek name with minor orthographic variation—Spanish forms, French 'Démétrius,' German 'Demetrius.' The contrast between the two men highlights how the gospel creates both fierce opposition (when it threatens economic interests) and exemplary discipleship (when it transforms hearts). PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Dēmētrios, To-Dēmētrios | es: A-Dēmétrios, Dēmétrios | fr: Démétrius, Δημητρίῳ | de: Demetrius, Δημήτριος Acts 19:24; Acts 19:38; 3John 1:12

δημιουργ-ός G1217 N-NMS (1×)

craftsman, builder, artisan; one who skillfully creates or constructs

Originally denoting one who works for the people—a skilled craftsman or artisan—this term evolved to include builders and makers of all kinds. Hebrews 11:10 uses it of God as the divine architect and builder of the heavenly city. Classical Greek applied it to physicians, sculptors, even bees as makers of honey. The multilingual evidence (English 'builder,' Spanish 'constructor,' German 'Baumeister') focuses on the construction aspect relevant to Hebrews' context.

(1×) Master builder, craftsman, or architect—one who skillfully designs and constructs. In Hebrews 11:10, Abraham looks forward to the city 'whose builder and maker is God,' emphasizing divine craftsmanship and intentional design. The term carries connotations of expertise, skill, and purposeful creation rather than mere labor. CREATION AND MAKING en: builder | es: constructor | fr: Baumeister | de: Baumeister Heb 11:10

δῆμος G1218 N-AMS (4×)

demos – the people or populace assembled; a public body of citizens gathered in civic context

Demos refers to the people understood as a civic or public body, especially when assembled together. In classical Greek it ranged from 'district' to 'common people' to 'democratic assembly,' but in the New Testament its four occurrences all point toward a crowd or populace acting collectively. The people of Tyre and Sidon seek audience through Blastus (Acts 12:22), a mob is stirred up in Thessalonica (Acts 17:5), and the Ephesian demos roars in the theater (Acts 19:30, 33). Spanish pueblo and French peuple capture this collective civic sense, while English oscillates between 'crowd' and 'people' depending on context.

(4×) A civic assembly or gathered populace acting as a collective body, particularly in the public sphere. In Acts 12:22 the demos of Caesarea acclaims Herod with one voice; in Acts 17:5 a Thessalonian mob is assembled; and in Acts 19:30-33 the Ephesian demos fills the theater in uproar. Spanish pueblo and French peuple both reflect the collective-civic nuance rather than mere numerical 'crowd,' pointing to a populace exercising public agency. All four NT uses involve the people gathered and responding vocally to events. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: crowd, people | es: pueblo | fr: peuple | de: δήμῳ, δῆμον, δῆμος Acts 12:22; Acts 17:5; Acts 19:30; Acts 19:33

δημόσιος G1219 Adj-DFS (4×)

demosios – public, belonging to the people; used adverbially: publicly, in the open

Demosios is the adjective form of demos ('people'), meaning 'public' or 'belonging to the civic sphere,' as opposed to private (idios). In the New Testament all four occurrences function adverbially in the dative feminine (demosia), meaning 'publicly, in the open.' The apostles are placed in the public prison (Acts 5:18), Paul protests being beaten publicly without trial (Acts 16:37), Apollos refutes opponents publicly (Acts 18:28), and Paul teaches publicly as well as house to house (Acts 20:20). Spanish publica/publicamente, French public, and German offentlich all align on this sense of open, civic visibility.

(4×) Public, belonging to the civic sphere; used adverbially (demosia) to mean 'publicly, in the open, before the people.' In Acts 5:18 the apostles are placed in the public jail; Paul decries his public beating as a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37); Apollos powerfully refutes error in public debate (Acts 18:28); and Paul testifies both publicly and house-to-house (Acts 20:20). Spanish publicamente and French public confirm the consistent sense of open, non-private activity visible to the community at large. BOLDNESS AND OPENNESS en: public, publicly | es: pública, públicamente | fr: public | de: δημοσίᾳ Acts 5:18; Acts 16:37; Acts 18:28; Acts 20:20

δηνάριον G1220 N-GNS (16×)

denarius — a Roman silver coin worth approximately one day's wages for a common laborer

The denarion was the standard Roman silver coin circulating throughout the provinces during the New Testament era, equivalent to roughly one day's pay for a hired worker. Jesus uses this coin with devastating effect in his teaching: the parable of the laborers each receiving one denarius regardless of hours worked (Matt 20:2-13), the unforgiving servant who chokes a fellow slave over a debt of one hundred denarii (Matt 18:28), and the famous 'render unto Caesar' episode where he asks whose image is stamped on the coin (Matt 22:19-21). The feeding of the five thousand prompts the disciples to estimate that two hundred denarii would not buy enough bread (Mark 6:37; John 6:7). Spanish 'denario,' French 'denier,' and German 'Denar' all transliterate the Latin original.

denarius (Roman silver coin) (16×) A Roman silver coin (Latin denarius), widely used as both currency and a unit of economic value throughout Palestine under Roman rule. Functions in NT narratives as a concrete measure of daily wages (Matt 20:2), debts (Matt 18:28; Luke 7:41), charitable expenditure (Mark 14:5; John 12:5), and the cost of provisions (Mark 6:37; John 6:7). The coin's imperial portrait also provides the occasion for Jesus' pronouncement on obligations to Caesar and God (Matt 22:19-21; Mark 12:15; Luke 20:24). SILVER AND MONEY

en: a-denarius, denarii, for-a-denarius | es: -denarios, de-denarios, denario | fr: denier | de: Denar Matt 18:28; Matt 20:2; Matt 20:9; Matt 20:10; Matt 20:13

δήποτε G1221 Prtcl (1×)

ever, at any time; an indefinite particle emphasizing possibility or uncertainty

This particle combines δή (indeed) with ποτε (ever) to create an indefinite sense of 'at some time' or 'ever.' It often appears in questions or with relative pronouns to express indefiniteness: 'whatever it might be,' 'at whatever time.' John 5:4 (a textually disputed verse) uses it to mean 'at any time' or 'whenever.' Classical writers employed it to soften assertions or express vague temporal reference.

(1×) At any time, ever, whenever—expressing temporal indefiniteness or possibility. The particle appears in contexts requiring non-specific temporal reference. French 'jamais' and English 'ever' capture the indefinite temporal quality, while Spanish translation uncertainty (marked with *) reflects the particle's subtle, discourse-level function. DISCOURSE PARTICLES

en: ever | es: * | fr: jamais | de: irgendwann John 5:4

δήπου G1222

doubtless, surely, presumably, I suppose; perhaps, it may be (with question: implying assent)

An indefinite adverb (properly written as two words, δή που) carrying different shades of probability depending on context. In tragic and Attic texts, it usually expresses confidence: 'doubtless,' 'I presume,' or 'surely,' often appearing in phrases like 'you surely know' or 'you certainly remember.' In Homeric usage it can mean 'perhaps' or 'it may be,' expressing less certainty. When used interrogatively, it typically implies an affirmative answer ('I presume you know?' meaning 'you do know'). With a negative, it can imply a negative expectation ('surely it is not so?').

διά G1223 Prep (670×)

Through, by means of; because of; why?; during; for the sake of; after; therefore — preposition of mediation and cause

This Greek preposition (dia) governs two cases and carries two fundamental ideas: with the genitive it means 'through' (spatial passage or instrumental agency), and with the accusative it means 'because of' (ground or cause). From these two poles radiate its many uses across the New Testament's 670 occurrences. As instrument it names the agent or means of divine action—salvation 'through' Christ, prophecy 'through' the prophets (Acts 1:16; 2:16). As cause it explains motivation—healing 'because of' faith (Matt 13:58), blindness 'because of' sin. The interrogative dia ti ('why?') appears frequently in the Gospels, while rarer uses mark temporal duration ('throughout the night,' Luke 5:5) and temporal interval ('after some days,' Mark 2:1).

1. through, by means of (582×) The dominant sense: spatial passage ('through a place') or instrumental agency ('by means of, through the agency of'). With the genitive case, dia names the channel, medium, or agent. Acts 1:2 'through the Holy Spirit,' Acts 2:16 'through the prophet Joel.' Spanish por medio de, French par, German durch all capture the mediating-channel meaning. This is the preposition par excellence for divine agency in the NT. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: through | es: Por-medio-de, por, por-medio-de | fr: par- | de: durch Acts 1:2; Acts 1:16; Acts 2:16; Acts 2:22; Acts 2:23

2. because of, on account of (54×) Causal ground with the accusative: 'because of, on account of,' indicating the reason or motive behind an action. Matt 13:58 'he did not do many miracles there because of their unbelief'; Matt 12:31 'because of this I say to you.' Spanish por, French à cause de, and German wegen signal causation rather than instrumentality, and the accusative case is diagnostic. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: because-of, because-of-, on-account-of | es: Por, por, por- | fr: par-, à-travers- | de: durch, durch- Matt 12:27; Matt 12:31; Matt 13:13; Matt 13:52; Matt 17:20

3. why, for what reason (26×) Interrogative use in the fixed phrase dia ti (διὰ τί) meaning 'why? for what reason?' Frequent in Gospel dialogues where Pharisees or disciples question Jesus: 'Why do your disciples transgress?' (Matt 15:2), 'Why do you speak in parables?' (Matt 13:10). Spanish por qué, French pourquoi, German warum—all fused interrogative-causal forms—map precisely. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Because-of, Because-of-, Why | es: Por, Por-qué, por | fr: par-, à-travers- | de: durch, durch- Matt 9:11; Matt 9:14; Matt 13:10; Matt 15:2; Matt 15:3

4. during, throughout (3×) Temporal extent with the genitive: 'during, throughout,' indicating continuous duration through a period. Luke 5:5 'throughout the whole night' (di' holēs tēs nyktos), Acts 1:3 'during forty days,' Acts 5:19 'during the night.' Spanish durante, French pendant, and German durch (die Nacht) confirm the temporal-extent reading, distinct from spatial passage. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: during, through | es: durante | fr: par-, à-travers- | de: durch Luke 5:5; Acts 1:3; Acts 5:19

5. (2×) Purposive or benefactive sense: 'for the sake of, for the benefit of,' indicating the person or purpose served. Mark 2:27 'the Sabbath was made for the sake of man' (dia ton anthrōpon)—a theologically pivotal statement. Spanish por causa de, French pour, and German um...willen all signal purpose or benefit rather than simple cause. The accusative case governs. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: for | es: por-causa-de | fr: à-travers- | de: durch- Mark 2:27

6. (2×) Temporal interval: 'after (a period of time),' indicating elapsed time before an event. Mark 2:1 'after some days' (di' hēmerōn) Jesus returned to Capernaum; Gal 2:1 'after fourteen years' (dia dekatessarōn etōn) Paul went up again. Spanish después de and French après confirm the 'after' reading, distinguishing this from duration ('throughout'). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: through | es: después-de, después-de- | fr: par-, à-travers- | de: durch- Mark 2:1; Gal 2:1

7. (1×) Inferential or conclusive 'therefore, for this reason,' introducing a consequence drawn from preceding argument. Mark 11:24 'therefore I say to you'—dia touto functioning as a discourse connector. Spanish por (tanto), French c'est pourquoi, and German darum signal logical inference. Though structurally dia + accusative touto, the pragmatic force is connective rather than purely causal. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Therefore | es: Por | fr: à-travers- | de: durch- Mark 11:24

διαβαίνω G1224 V-APA-NMS (3×)

to cross over, pass through, traverse from one side to another

This verb describes crossing from one place to another, typically involving significant geographical barriers like bodies of water or regions. It can indicate simple passage through a territory or the more dramatic act of crossing a sea or river. The rich man in Hades cannot cross the 'great chasm' to Abraham's side. The Macedonian man pleads with Paul to 'come over' and help. The Israelites 'passed through' the Red Sea by faith. The term emphasizes movement across boundaries, whether geographical, spiritual, or metaphysical.

(3×) Luke 16:26 describes the impassable chasm: 'those who would cross from here to you cannot.' Acts 16:9 records the Macedonian vision: 'Come over to Macedonia and help us.' Hebrews 11:29 recounts Israel 'passing through the Red Sea on dry ground.' The multilingual evidence shows the traversal concept—Spanish 'pasar/pasando,' French 'traverser,' German 'hindurchgehen' (go through). The contexts range from literal geographical crossing (Macedonia, Red Sea) to impossible metaphysical crossing (the gulf between heaven and hell). CROSSING OVER en: Having-crossed-over, they-passed-through, to-cross | es: Pasando, atravesaron, pasar | fr: traverser | de: hindurchgehen, Διαβὰς, διαβῆναι Luke 16:26; Acts 16:9; Heb 11:29

διαβάλλω G1225 V-AIP-3S (1×)

to slander, accuse falsely; to bring charges against someone, often with hostile intent

While literally meaning 'to throw across,' this verb developed strong negative connotations of slander, false accusation, or hostile reporting. Luke 16:1 describes a steward who 'was accused' to his master, initiating the parable's crisis. Classical usage included setting people at variance, bringing into discredit, or filling others with suspicion. The legal overtones (Spanish 'fue acusado,' French 'accuser') dominate the New Testament usage.

(1×) To bring accusation or charges against someone, typically with malicious or hostile intent. In Luke 16:1, the steward faces charges of mismanagement brought by others to his employer. The cross-linguistic glosses consistently point to legal accusation rather than mere reporting, suggesting formal or serious charges with potential consequences. ACCUSE BRING CHARGES

en: was-accused | es: fue-acusado | fr: accuser | de: διεβλήθη Luke 16:1

διαβεβαι-όω G1226 V-PNM/P (2×)

to affirm confidently, insist firmly; to maintain a position with strong assurance (middle voice)

This verb in middle voice expresses confident, emphatic assertion or insistence on a position. The two New Testament occurrences both involve mistaken but firm assertions: those who desire to be law teachers but don't understand what they confidently affirm (1 Timothy 1:7), and Paul's instruction that Titus speak confidently about good works (Titus 3:8). The middle voice suggests personal investment in the affirmation—not merely stating facts but maintaining them with assurance. Translations capture this through terms like 'confidently assert' (English), 'afirman con certeza' (Spanish), and 'fest behaupten' (German), all emphasizing the firmness and certainty of the assertion.

(2×) Appears in pastoral epistles concerning confident assertion: negatively, of would-be teachers who confidently affirm things they don't understand (1 Timothy 1:7: Spanish 'afirman con certeza'), and positively, of Titus being urged to speak confidently about good works (Titus 3:8: Spanish 'afirmes,' German 'fest behaupten'). The term emphasizes the speaker's strong assurance regardless of whether their confidence is warranted. INSTRUCT PROVE CONCLUDE

en: they-confidently-assert, to-speak-confidently | es: afirman-con-certeza, afirmes | fr: διαβεβαιοῦνται, διαβεβαιοῦσθαι | de: fest-behaupten 1Tim 1:7; Titus 3:8

διαβλέπω G1227 V-AIA-3P (3×)

to see clearly, look intently, or perceive with clarity and precision

This verb intensifies the basic concept of seeing, indicating clear, penetrating vision or perception. It can mean to stare with eyes wide open or to see with special clarity and precision. Jesus uses it in the Sermon on the Mount, asking how one can offer to remove a speck from a brother's eye when one cannot even 'see clearly' to remove the log from one's own eye. The Gospel accounts record that after a second touch, the blind man at Bethsaida 'looked intently' and his sight was fully restored. The term emphasizes visual clarity and the ability to perceive accurately.

(3×) Matthew 7:5 and Luke 6:42 use the term identically in the teaching about logs and specks: 'then you will see clearly to remove the speck from your brother's eye.' Mark 8:25 describes the healing at Bethsaida: 'he looked intently and was restored and saw everything clearly.' The multilingual glosses capture the clarity concept—Spanish 'verás claramente,' French 'voir clairement,' German 'klar sehen.' The Synoptic teaching employs the term ironically—those most confident in their spiritual perception are often those most blind to their own faults. BOLDNESS AND OPENNESS en: he-looked-intently, you-will-see-clearly | es: verás-claramente, verás–claramente, vio-claramente | fr: voir-clairement | de: klar-sehen, διαβλέψεις Matt 7:5; Mark 8:25; Luke 6:42

διάβολ-ος G1228 Adj-DMS (38×)

The Devil, Satan as supreme adversary of God; also adjectival: slanderous, given to malicious accusation Derived from the verb διαβάλλω ('to throw across, accuse falsely'), this word carries two distinct uses in the New Testament. In 35 of its 38 occurrences it functions as a quasi-proper noun for Satan, the supreme adversary — rendered uniformly as 'devil' (English), 'diablo' (Spanish), 'Teufel' (German), 'ابليس/شيطان' (Arabic), and '마귀' (Korean). In three Pastoral Epistle passages, however, it reverts to its original adjectival force, describing human beings who are 'slanderous' or given to malicious gossip, a usage that the multilingual evidence sharply distinguishes from the proper-noun sense.

1. the Devil, Satan (proper name) (35×) The Devil as a personal spiritual being, the supreme adversary of God and humanity. Used as a substantive proper noun across the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, uniformly translated 'devil/diablo/Teufel/diable' in European languages and with dedicated terms in Asian and Middle Eastern languages (Hindi शैतान, Korean 마귀, Arabic ابليس). Key passages include the temptation narrative (Matt 4:1–11) and Jesus' identification of the devil as a murderer and liar from the beginning (John 8:44). DEVIL SATAN

en: devil | es: diablo | fr: diable | de: Teufel Matt 4:1; Matt 4:5; Matt 4:8; Matt 4:11; Matt 13:39

2. slanderous, given to malicious accusation (adjective of persons) (3×) Adjectival: slanderous, given to malicious accusation against others. Restricted to the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim 3:11; 2 Tim 3:3; Titus 2:3), where it describes human character flaws — women who must not be 'slanderers' and people in the last days who will be 'slanderous.' Spanish distinguishes this clearly with 'calumniadoras/calumniadores' versus 'diablo' for the proper noun, confirming the semantic split. DEVIL SATAN

en: slanderers | es: calumniadoras, calumniadores | fr: diable | de: Teufel 1Tim 3:11; 2Tim 3:3; Titus 2:3

διαγγ-έλλω G1229 V-PPA-NMS (3×)

to announce, proclaim publicly, give notice or declare widely

This verb means to announce publicly, proclaim, or spread news widely. It suggests official or emphatic declaration that is meant to reach a broad audience. Jesus tells a would-be disciple to 'proclaim the kingdom of God' rather than first burying his father. Paul explains to Roman officials the details he has 'announced' regarding purification rites. Paul recounts Pharaoh's purpose: that God's name might be 'proclaimed in all the earth.' The term emphasizes the public, widespread nature of the announcement.

(3×) Luke 9:60 records Jesus' command: 'let the dead bury their own dead, but you go and proclaim the kingdom of God.' Acts 21:26 describes Paul 'giving notice' of the completion of purification days. Romans 9:17 quotes Exodus regarding Pharaoh: 'that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth.' The multilingual evidence shows the proclamation force—Spanish 'anuncia/anunciando/sea proclamado,' French 'annoncer,' German 'verkuendigen.' The contexts range from gospel proclamation to ritual notification to divine purpose in world history. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

en: declaring, might-be-proclaimed, proclaim | es: anuncia, anunciando, sea-proclamado | fr: annoncer | de: verkuendigen, διάγγελλε, διαγγέλλων Luke 9:60; Acts 21:26; Rom 9:17

διαγίγνομαι G1230 V-APM-GNS (3×)

to pass, elapse, go by, particularly of time intervals

This verb describes the passing or elapsing of time. Classical usage includes 'going through' a period of time, surviving, or living through events. In the New Testament, it appears in temporal constructions marking the passage of time between events. After the Sabbath had 'passed,' the women came to anoint Jesus' body. When considerable time had 'elapsed,' sailing became dangerous. Festus arrived in Caesarea, and after some days had 'passed,' he went up to Jerusalem. The term provides narrative time markers, indicating temporal progression.

(3×) Mark 16:1 notes 'when the Sabbath had passed' the women bought spices. Acts 25:13 records that 'after some days had passed' Agrippa and Bernice arrived. Acts 27:9 observes 'since considerable time had passed' sailing was now dangerous. The multilingual glosses are consistent—Spanish 'habiendo pasado,' French 'passé/écouler,' German 'vergehen.' All contexts involve the genitive absolute construction marking elapsed time as the temporal framework for subsequent narrative action. These time markers lend historical precision to the accounts. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY

en: having-passed | es: habiendo-pasado | fr: passé, écouler | de: vergehen, διαγενομένου, διαγενομένων Mark 16:1; Acts 25:13; Acts 27:9

διαγίγνομαι G1231 V-FIM-1S (2×)

to determine judicially, decide a case; to investigate and reach a verdict

This verb refers to judicial decision-making after investigation—literally 'to know thoroughly' in order to render judgment. Both occurrences are in Acts, involving legal proceedings. The Jewish leaders ask the Roman commander to bring Paul down so they can 'determine' his case more accurately (Acts 23:15), and Felix later postpones Paul's hearing, saying he will 'decide' the matter when the tribune arrives (24:22). The term implies not arbitrary decision but careful investigation leading to authoritative determination. The judicial context is clear from the German 'to know through' and French 'discerner,' emphasizing the investigative aspect before verdict.

(2×) Both instances occur in Acts during Paul's legal proceedings: the Jewish council's plan to 'determine' Paul's case more accurately (Acts 23:15: Spanish 'decidiré,' French 'discerner'), and Felix promising to 'decide' the matter when more information arrives (Acts 24:22: English 'I will decide'). The evidence points to judicial investigation and determination rather than casual decision-making. TIME AND SEASONS

en: I-will-decide, to-determine | es: decidiré, determinar | fr: discerner | de: διαγινώσκειν, διαγνώσομαι Acts 23:15; Acts 24:22

διαγνωρ-ίζω G1232

make known, declare, announce; speak publicly about something

A compound verb meaning to make something widely known or to declare it publicly. The basic construction involves announcing something (τί) to someone (τινι). The verb emphasizes the public or thorough nature of the communication—not merely mentioning something in passing but making it fully known. In New Testament usage, it describes the shepherds speaking publicly about what they had witnessed. The compound suggests declaration that goes beyond private conversation to broader dissemination.

διά-γνωσις G1233 N-AFS (1×)

decision, judicial hearing; formal examination or determination, especially in legal contexts

This term denotes the process of careful examination, discernment, or decision-making, particularly in judicial settings. Acts 25:21 uses it for Paul's case being reserved for the emperor's 'decision' or hearing. Classical Greek employed it for medical diagnosis, philosophical discernment, or determining value. The legal context dominates the New Testament usage, as reflected in the uniform judicial translations (decision, decisión, distinction).

(1×) A formal judicial hearing or imperial decision-making process. In Acts 25:21, Paul appeals to Caesar for the emperor's 'cognition'—the technical term (Latin cognitio) for imperial judicial review. This represents more than mere decision; it indicates thorough examination and authoritative determination. The translations recognize the legal-technical character of this term. JUDGMENT AND VERDICT

en: decision | es: decisión | fr: distinction | de: διάγνωσιν Acts 25:21

διαγογγύζω G1234 V-IIA-3P (2×)

to grumble, murmur among themselves; to express discontent in low tones

This compound verb intensifies the basic sense of 'murmur' with a prefix suggesting thoroughness or distribution—murmuring among or throughout a group. Luke uses it twice to describe the Pharisees' and scribes' negative reaction to Jesus' associations: grumbling that he welcomes sinners and eats with them (15:2), and murmuring that he has gone to be guest with a sinner (19:7). The term evokes the image of disapproving whispers spreading through a crowd, reflecting communal discontent expressed in undertones rather than open confrontation. Spanish 'murmuraban' and French 'murmurer' capture this sense of subdued but widespread complaint.

(2×) Appears exclusively in Luke's Gospel describing religious leaders' disapproving murmurs about Jesus' fellowship with sinners: the Pharisees and scribes grumbling about him welcoming and eating with tax collectors and sinners (Luke 15:2), and the crowd murmuring about him staying with Zacchaeus (Luke 19:7). Both contexts involve communal discontent expressed through murmuring rather than direct confrontation. MURMUR GRUMBLE COMPLAIN

en: were-grumbling | es: murmuraban | fr: murmurer | de: διεγόγγυζον Luke 15:2; Luke 19:7

διαγρηγορέω G1235 V-APA-NMP (1×)

to awaken fully, become completely awake; to emerge from sleep or drowsiness into full consciousness

This compound verb intensifies the simple 'to wake,' emphasizing complete or thorough awakening. Luke 9:32 describes Peter, James, and John who, though heavy with sleep, 'fully awakened' to witness Christ's transfiguration. The prefix suggests not mere stirring but achieving full alertness. The Spanish 'despertando completamente' and French 'rester éveillé' capture this intensive nuance of complete wakefulness.

(1×) To awaken completely or thoroughly from sleep, emerging into full consciousness and alertness. On the mount of transfiguration (Luke 9:32), the disciples overcome their drowsiness and achieve full wakefulness to witness Christ's glory. The term emphasizes the transition from sleep-heaviness to complete awareness, not merely opening eyes but becoming fully alert and perceptive. AWAKEN STIR UP

en: having-awakened | es: despertando-completamente | fr: rester-éveillé | de: διαγρηγορήσαντες Luke 9:32

διάγω G1236 V-PSA-1P (2×)

to lead, pass, or spend life in a certain manner; to live through time, conduct one's life

This verb combines motion ('lead through') with temporal duration to express how one conducts or passes their life. The New Testament uses focus on peaceful, godly living: praying for authorities so we may 'lead a quiet and peaceful life' (1 Timothy 2:2), and recalling how we once spent our days in malice and envy (Titus 3:3). The term emphasizes not mere existence but the quality and manner of life being led. Translations reflect this with 'pass' (Spanish 'pasemos'), 'lead' (English), and 'spend' (German 'verbringen'), all suggesting intentional passage of time in a particular state or condition.

(2×) Both occurrences concern the manner of conducting one's life: the desired state of leading a quiet, peaceful, godly life (1 Timothy 2:2: Spanish 'pasemos,' German 'verbringen'), and the remembered past of living in malice and envy (Titus 3:3: English 'living,' Spanish 'viviendo'). The verb emphasizes not just existing but the quality and character of how life is being spent. LIFE AND LIVING

en: living, we-might-lead | es: pasemos, viviendo | fr: διάγοντες, διάγωμεν | de: verbringen 1Tim 2:2; Titus 3:3

διαδέχομαι G1237 V-APM-NMP (1×)

to receive in succession, succeed to; to take over from another, especially inheritance or position

This verb describes receiving something passed from another, particularly in succession or inheritance. Acts 7:45 refers to Joshua and those who 'received' or 'took possession of' the promised land after Moses. Classical usage encompassed succeeding to kingship, inheriting leadership of philosophical schools, or taking another's place in office. The notion of sequential transfer or succession is central to this term's meaning.

(1×) To receive in succession or inheritance, taking possession of what is passed from predecessors. In Acts 7:45, Joshua and the generation entering Canaan receive possession of the land that Moses' generation could not enter. The translation 'having received in succession' captures both the transfer and the sequential aspect—one generation hands to the next what they themselves received from God's promise. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: having-received | es: habiendo-recibido-en-sucesión | fr: succéder | de: διαδεξάμενοι Acts 7:45

διάδημα G1238 N-NNP (3×)

diadem, royal headband or crown symbolizing sovereignty and kingship

A diadem was a distinctive band or fillet worn around the head as a symbol of royal authority. Unlike the stephanos (victor's wreath or festive crown), the diadem specifically marked monarchical power. In Persian and Hellenistic contexts, the diadem distinguished kings from other nobility. In Revelation's apocalyptic imagery, diadems appear on the heads of the dragon, the beast from the sea, and the conquering Christ—all representing claims to sovereignty and power. The diadem is not merely decorative but symbolic of the right to rule.

(3×) All three occurrences appear in Revelation's visions of cosmic conflict: the dragon with seven diadems on his heads (12:3), the beast from the sea with ten diadems (13:1), and Christ the conquering King with many diadems (19:12). The multilingual glosses are uniform—English 'diadems,' Spanish 'diademas,' French 'Diademe,' German 'Diademe.' The multiple diadems on each figure symbolize comprehensive sovereignty—the dragon's usurped authority, the beast's delegated power, and Christ's rightful universal kingship that supersedes all rival claims. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: diadems | es: diademas | fr: Diademe | de: Diademe Rev 12:3; Rev 13:1; Rev 19:12

διαδίδωμι G1239 V-AIA-3S (4×)

diadidomi – to distribute, divide out, or share among recipients

Diadidomi is a compound verb (dia + didomi, 'to give through/across') meaning to distribute or share out among multiple recipients. Its four New Testament occurrences all involve the parceling out of goods or resources. Jesus tells a ruler to sell and distribute to the poor (Luke 18:22); loaves and fish are distributed to the seated crowd (John 6:11); early believers share possessions as anyone has need (Acts 4:35); and spoils are divided after overcoming a strong man (Luke 11:22). Spanish distribuir, French distribuer, and German austeilen consistently capture this sense of systematic apportioning.

(4×) To distribute or apportion among a group of recipients, dividing resources so that each receives a share. The feeding miracle (John 6:11) and the early church's communal sharing (Acts 4:35) both employ this verb for the careful parceling out of provisions. Jesus commands the rich ruler to sell and distribute (diadidomi) to the poor (Luke 18:22), and the strong man's spoils are divided in Luke 11:22. Spanish distribuyo and French distribuer uniformly convey this systematic allocation, confirming a single undifferentiated sense of 'distribute among.' INHERITANCE AND PROPERTY en: distribute, distributed, he-distributes | es: distribuyó, distribúyelo, era-distribuido | fr: distribuer | de: austeilen, διάδος, διαδίδωσιν Luke 11:22; Luke 18:22; John 6:11; Acts 4:35

διάδοχ-ος G1240 N-AMS (1×)

successor; one who follows another in office or position

This noun designates someone who succeeds another in office, position, or responsibility. Acts 24:27 mentions Felix being succeeded by Porcius Festus as governor. The term could refer to succession in military command, political office, or philosophical schools. The concept of one person replacing another in an official capacity is fundamental. All major language glosses (successor, sucesor, successeur) converge on this meaning.

(1×) A successor in office or position, one who takes over another's responsibilities or authority. When Felix's term as procurator ended, Porcius Festus came as his 'successor' (Acts 24:27), assuming the governorship and inheriting pending cases like Paul's imprisonment. The term emphasizes official succession and transfer of authority from one officeholder to the next. HEIR INHERITOR

en: a-successor | es: sucesor | fr: successeur | de: διάδοχον Acts 24:27

δια-ζώννῡμι G1241 V-AIM-3S (3×)

to gird around, wrap around the waist, put on a belt or garment

This verb describes the act of girding or wrapping something around the waist, typically preparing for work or service by tucking up loose garments with a belt or sash. In ancient contexts, the flowing outer garments needed to be secured for active movement or labor. At the Last Supper, Jesus 'girded himself' with a towel before washing the disciples' feet—a vivid symbol of servanthood. Peter 'wrapped his outer garment around him' before swimming to shore. The action involves both practical preparation and sometimes symbolic meaning related to service and readiness.

(3×) John 13:4-5 narrates Jesus laying aside his outer garments, taking a towel, and 'wrapping it around himself' before washing feet—the posture of a servant. John 21:7 describes Peter, hearing it was the Lord, 'wrapping his outer garment around him' (for he was stripped for work) before jumping into the sea. The multilingual glosses reflect the girding action—Spanish 'ceñido/ciñó/se ciñó,' French 'ceindre,' German 'umguerten.' Both contexts involve preparing for action, whether servant ministry or eager approach to Jesus. GIRDING AND DRESSING en: girded-on, having-been-wrapped, wrapped-around | es: ceñido, ciñó, se-ciñó | fr: ceindre | de: umguerten John 13:4; John 13:5; John 21:7

διαθήκη G1242 N-NFS (33×)

Covenant or testament; a binding agreement between God and his people, or a legal will activated by the testator's death.

One of the New Testament's most theologically freighted nouns, diatheke carries the weight of the entire biblical storyline. In the Septuagint it translates Hebrew berit (covenant), and the NT overwhelmingly uses it in this sense: the Abrahamic covenant (Acts 3:25; Gal 3:17), the Mosaic covenant, and supremely the 'new covenant in my blood' at the Last Supper (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25). Spanish 'pacto,' French 'alliance,' Swahili 'agano,' and Korean '언약' all convey solemn pact. Yet in Hebrews 9:16-17, the author pivots to the classical Greek meaning — a testament or will that takes effect only at the testator's death — creating a breathtaking argument that Christ's death was necessary to activate the new covenant.

1. covenant (bilateral agreement between God and people) (31×) Split from sense 65249. Criteria: God's covenant with Abraham, Moses, or the new covenant; emphasizes mutual obligations and promises (Acts 3:25; 7:8; Gal 3:17; Matt 26:28; Mark 14:24; Luke 22:20)

en: a-covenant, covenant | es: pacto | fr: alliance | de: Bund Matt 26:28; Mark 14:24; Luke 1:72; Luke 22:20; Acts 3:25

2. testament, last will and testament (2×) Testament — a last will and disposition of property activated by death. This distinctly Greco-Roman legal sense appears only in Hebrews 9:16-17, where the author argues: 'Where a diatheke exists, the death of the one who made it must be established, for a diatheke takes effect at death; it is never in force while the one who made it is alive.' Spanish 'testamento' captures this legal nuance precisely. The wordplay is deliberate: the same term that means 'covenant' throughout Scripture is momentarily read through its classical Greek legal meaning to demonstrate why Christ's death was theologically necessary. COVENANT AGREEMENT

en: testament | es: testamento | fr: alliance | de: Bund Heb 9:16; Heb 9:17

4. testament, last will (legal document) Split from sense 65249. Criteria: A legal will or testament activated by the testator's death, as in Heb 9:16-17 where the contrast with 'covenant' is explicit διαίρ-εσις G1243 N-NFP (3×)

distributions, varieties, differences, or divisions distinguishing one thing from another

This noun describes distributions, varieties, or distinctions that differentiate one thing from another. In classical usage, it can refer to division into categories, distribution of resources, or distinguishing characteristics. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 12 to describe the varieties or distributions of spiritual gifts, ministries, and divine activities—all coming from the same triune God. The term emphasizes the diversity within unity, the multiplicity of forms that divine grace takes while maintaining a single source. It's about distributed variety, not divisive separation.

(3×) All three occurrences appear in 1 Corinthians 12:4-6 in Paul's teaching on spiritual gifts: 'there are varieties of gifts... varieties of ministries... varieties of activities.' The multilingual glosses reflect the diversity concept—Spanish 'diversidades,' French 'diversité,' German 'Unterschied' (difference/distinction). Paul's threefold repetition emphasizes that the Spirit's work produces diverse manifestations, the Lord's service takes various forms, and God's energizing work accomplishes different activities—yet all originate from the same divine source. Unity of source, diversity of expression. DIVIDING AND DISTRIBUTING en: distributions | es: Diversidades, diversidades | fr: diversité | de: Unterschied 1Cor 12:4; 1Cor 12:5; 1Cor 12:6

διαιρ-έω G1244 V-AIA-3S (2×)

to divide, distribute; to apportion among multiple recipients

This verb means to take apart and distribute portions to different recipients. Luke uses it for the prodigal son's father dividing the estate between his sons (15:12), while Paul employs it for the Spirit distributing different gifts to believers as he wills (1 Corinthians 12:11). The term emphasizes both the act of division and the resulting distribution among multiple parties. The Spanish 'dividió' and 'distribuyendo,' along with French 'diviser,' capture this dual sense. Interestingly, the same verb applies to both material inheritance and spiritual gifts, suggesting a semantic range covering any apportioning among recipients according to some principle.

(2×) Appears in two distinct contexts that share the concept of apportioning: a father dividing his estate between sons (Luke 15:12: Spanish 'dividió,' German 'zuteilen'), and the Holy Spirit distributing spiritual gifts individually as he determines (1 Corinthians 12:11: English 'distributing,' Spanish 'distribuyendo'). Both emphasize deliberate allocation among multiple recipients. DIVIDING AND DISTRIBUTING en: distributing, he-divided | es: distribuyendo, dividió | fr: diviser | de: zuteilen, διεῖλεν Luke 15:12; 1Cor 12:11

διακᾰθ-αίρω G1245 V-FIA-3S (2×)

to cleanse thoroughly, clear completely; to winnow grain or purge impurities

This compound verb intensifies 'cleanse' with a prefix meaning 'through' or 'thoroughly,' suggesting complete purification. John the Baptist uses it metaphorically in both Matthew and Luke to describe the Messiah's coming work: he will 'thoroughly cleanse his threshing floor,' separating wheat from chaff. The agricultural imagery of winnowing—throwing grain into the air so wind removes the chaff—becomes a powerful picture of final judgment and purification. The 'thoroughly' aspect is critical; this isn't partial cleaning but complete clearing. Spanish 'limpiará' and French 'nettoyer' capture the cleansing sense, while the context demands understanding the complete, final nature of this purging action.

(2×) Both instances are in John the Baptist's parallel descriptions of the Coming One's work (Matthew 3:12, Luke 3:17), using winnowing imagery: he will 'thoroughly cleanse his threshing floor,' gathering wheat but burning chaff. The translations (Spanish 'limpiará,' French 'nettoyer') emphasize the cleansing aspect, while the agricultural context stresses the completeness of the separation and purification. RECONCILIATION en: he-will-thoroughly-cleanse, to-clear | es: limpiar, limpiará | fr: nettoyer | de: διακαθαριεῖ, διακαθᾶραι Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17

διακατελέγχομαι G1246 V-IIM/P-3S (1×)

to refute thoroughly, confute decisively; to expose error through argumentation

This intensive compound verb means to refute completely or demonstrate someone's error decisively. Acts 18:28 describes Apollos who 'vigorously refuted' the Jews publicly, using Scripture to prove Jesus was the Messiah. The prefix strengthens the simple 'refute,' suggesting thorough, perhaps repeated, demonstration of error. The Spanish 'refutaba' and French 'prouver' both capture the argumentative force of this public intellectual combat.

(1×) To refute thoroughly and publicly, exposing error through sustained argumentation and proof. Apollos's activity in Acts 18:28 involved vigorous, public demonstration that Jewish objections to Jesus were unfounded, using scriptural arguments to decisively confute opponents. The middle voice may suggest personal investment in the refutation—he committed himself to this public theological debate. ARGUE DISPUTE DEBATE

en: he-was-refuting | es: refutaba | fr: prouver | de: διακατηλέγχετο Acts 18:28

διᾱκον-έω G1247 V-ANA (37×)

To serve, minister to, or wait upon someone; in the passive, to be served or receive ministry from others.

At the heart of New Testament ethics, this verb covers everything from Martha serving at table (Luke 10:40) to angels ministering to Jesus after the temptation (Matt 4:11) to the foundational declaration that the Son of Man came 'not to be served, but to serve' (Matt 20:28). It encompasses both the practical, hands-on act of waiting on someone and the broader theological concept of Christian ministry and diaconal service. Spanish 'servir,' French 'servir,' and German 'dienen' all preserve a single root, mirroring the Greek word's refusal to draw a hard line between menial labor and sacred calling.

1. to serve or minister to (32×) To render active service, minister to, or wait upon someone in either a practical or spiritual capacity. The range spans from serving food at table (Luke 10:40; John 12:2) to women who provided for Jesus out of their own means (Matt 27:55; Luke 8:3) to angelic ministry after the wilderness temptation (Matt 4:11). Jesus' self-description in Matt 20:28 — 'the Son of Man came not to be served but to serve' — elevates this ordinary verb into the defining posture of discipleship. All major translations use cognates of a single 'serve' root (spa 'servir,' fra 'servir,' deu 'dienen'). SERVING AND MINISTRY

en: ministering, serves, serving | es: a-servir, servir, servía | fr: servir | de: dienen, dient Matt 4:11; Matt 8:15; Matt 20:28; Matt 25:44; Matt 27:55

2. to be served or ministered to (5×) Passive: to be the recipient of service, to have others minister to one's needs. The same declaration of Matt 20:28 and Mark 10:45 supplies the contrast — 'not to be served' — establishing that receiving service is a legitimate category even if Jesus redefines who should receive it. In 2 Cor 3:3 and 8:19-20, Paul uses passive forms for the ministry of the collection being 'administered,' where the emphasis shifts from personal attendance to institutional stewardship. Spanish 'ser servido' and German passive 'bedient werden' preserve the voice distinction. SERVING AND MINISTRY

en: being-administered, having-been-ministered, to-be-served | es: a-ser-servido, servida, siendo-administrada | fr: servir | de: dienen, dient Matt 20:28; Mark 10:45; 2Cor 3:3; 2Cor 8:19; 2Cor 8:20

διᾱκον-ία G1248 N-NFS (34×)

ministry, service — active service to God and neighbor, encompassing both apostolic commission and practical care

Diakonia derives from diakonos ('servant') and covers the full spectrum of Christian service across its 34 New Testament occurrences. At one end stands Martha's table service in Bethany, the only context where Jesus gently names its excess (Luke 10:40). At the other stands Paul's apostolic commission, which he calls 'my ministry' with evident gravity (Rom 11:13; 2 Cor 4:1). Between these poles the word names the daily food distribution that triggered the appointment of the Seven (Acts 6:1-4), the famine relief collected for Jerusalem (Acts 11:29; 12:25), and the spiritual gifts enumerated in Romans 12:7.

Paul's extended treatment in 2 Corinthians 3-6 elevates diakonia into a theology of the new covenant ministry. Spanish 'ministerio/servicio' and German 'Dienst' confirm the unified service-concept.

ministry, service (34×) Active service rendered to God or neighbor, spanning practical care and apostolic vocation. Includes Martha's table service (Luke 10:40), the daily distribution that prompted the Seven's appointment (Acts 6:1-4), famine relief for Jerusalem (Acts 11:29), and Paul's apostolic charge (Rom 11:13; 2 Cor 4:1). In 2 Corinthians 3-6, Paul develops it into a theology of new covenant ministry. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: ministry, of-service, service | es: ministerio, servicio | fr: service | de: Dienst Luke 10:40; Acts 1:17; Acts 1:25; Acts 6:1; Acts 6:4

διάκονος G1249 N-AMS (29×)

A servant or minister who serves another; in the Pastoral Epistles, a deacon holding formal church office.

One of the most theologically productive words in the New Testament, διάκονος spans the range from table servant to church officer. Jesus uses it to redefine greatness — "whoever would be great among you must be your servant" (Matt 20:26; Mark 10:43). Paul applies it broadly to himself, to Apollos, and even to civil authorities as God's servants (Rom 13:4). Only in the Pastoral Epistles does a distinct ecclesiastical office emerge, with qualifications specified for deacons alongside bishops (1 Tim 3:8-12).

1. servant, minister, attendant (27×) The general sense (27x): a servant, minister, or attendant who carries out service on behalf of another. Spanish "ministro/servidores" and German "Diener" capture the breadth of this usage. Jesus employs it to invert social hierarchies (Matt 23:11; Mark 9:35). Paul calls himself and his co-workers διάκονοι of Christ (2 Cor 3:6; Col 1:7). The king's attendants in the parable of the wedding feast (Matt 22:13) and even civil rulers as God's agents (Rom 13:4) share this designation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-servant, servant, servants | es: Servidores, ministro, ministros | fr: serviteur | de: Diener Matt 20:26; Matt 22:13; Matt 23:11; Mark 9:35; Mark 10:43

2. deacon (ecclesiastical office) (2×) A technical ecclesiastical sense (2x): the formal church office of deacon. This usage appears exclusively at 1 Tim 3:8 and 3:12, where specific moral and domestic qualifications are laid out for those holding the office. Spanish marks this with the Latinate "diáconos" rather than the generic "servidores," signaling the shift from general service to institutional role. The qualifications listed (dignified, not double-tongued, managing households well) indicate an established office distinct from general ministry. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: deacons | es: Diáconos, diáconos | fr: serviteur | de: Diener 1Tim 3:8; 1Tim 3:12

διᾱκόσι-οι G1250 Adj-AFP (8×)

Two hundred; the cardinal number 200, used in counting quantities of people, money, or distance.

The Greek numeral for two hundred, appearing eight times in the New Testament always as a straightforward quantity. It surfaces in memorable contexts: the cost of bread to feed the five thousand is reckoned at 200 denarii (Mark 6:37, John 6:7), the distance from shore when the disciples haul in their great catch is about 200 cubits (John 21:8), and Paul's Roman military escort includes 200 soldiers and 200 spearmen (Acts 23:23). The consistent rendering across languages — Spanish 'doscientos,' French 'deux cents,' German 'zweihundert' — confirms there is nothing idiomatic here, just a precise number.

(8×) The cardinal number two hundred, used as a quantitative adjective modifying nouns to indicate a count of 200. In the NT it quantifies denarii as a large sum inadequate to feed a multitude (Mark 6:37; John 6:7), measures the distance from shore in cubits (John 21:8), and counts soldiers in a Roman escort (Acts 23:23). Every target language renders it with the simple numeral equivalent — Spanish 'doscientos/doscientas,' French 'deux cents,' German 'zweihundert' — confirming a single transparent numerical sense.

LARGE CARDINAL NUMBERS

en: Two-hundred, two-hundred | es: De-doscientos, doscientas, doscientos | fr: deux-cents | de: zweihundert, διακοσίους, διακόσιαι Mark 6:37; John 6:7; John 21:8; Acts 23:23

διᾰκούω G1251 V-FIM-1S (1×)

to hear fully, give a complete hearing; to examine a case thoroughly

This verb intensifies simple 'hearing' to mean hearing thoroughly, to the end, or giving full judicial hearing. Acts 23:35 has the Roman commander promise Paul, 'I will hear your case fully when your accusers arrive.' Classical usage included hearing a case in court or being a disciple who hears a teacher's complete instruction. The legal context of careful, complete examination dominates the New Testament usage.

(1×) To give a thorough or complete judicial hearing, examining a case from all sides. The Roman tribune's promise in Acts 23:35 assures Paul of due process—not a cursory dismissal but full hearing of charges and defense. The future tense emphasizes the coming formal examination. Translations consistently recognize the legal-technical sense of complete judicial inquiry. HEARING AND HEEDING en: I-will-hear-fully | es: Oiré-a-fondo | fr: écouter | de: Διακούσομαί Acts 23:35

διακρίνω G1252 V-AIA-3S (19×)

To separate, distinguish, discern, or doubt — ranging from judicial evaluation and making distinctions to internal wavering and verbal disputation.

Built from dia- (through, apart) and krino (judge), this verb's range mirrors the act of pulling things apart to examine them. At its most constructive, it means to evaluate carefully — discerning the body of the Lord (1 Cor 11:29) or judging between believers (1 Cor 6:5). It can also mean to make distinctions between persons, as when God 'made no distinction' between Jew and Gentile (Acts 15:9). In the middle-passive, however, it turns inward: the doubter is literally 'divided within himself,' like the wave-tossed person of James 1:6. Spanish tracks these senses with 'dudar' (doubt), 'discernir' (discern), 'distinguir' (distinguish), and 'contender' (contend).

1. doubt or waver (9×) To doubt, waver, or be divided within oneself — the internal fracture of a person who cannot settle on belief. Jesus tells the disciples that if they do not doubt (diakritho) they can move mountains (Matt 21:21; Mark 11:23), and Paul celebrates Abraham who did not waver (diekrithe) in unbelief (Rom 4:20). The Spirit tells Peter to go with the messengers 'doubting nothing' (Acts 10:20). Spanish 'dudar' and French 'douter' preserve this psychological self-division faithfully. DISCERN DISTINGUISH DOUBT en: doubting, doubts, he-wavered | es: a-los-que-dudan, dudando, dudareis | fr: distinguer, doutant;, douter | de: der-Zweifelnden, unterscheiden, διακρίναντα Matt 21:21; Mark 11:23; Acts 10:20; Acts 11:12; Rom 4:20

2. discern or evaluate (5×) To discern, evaluate, or judge carefully — applying critical assessment to determine the truth, quality, or appropriateness of something. Paul asks the Corinthians whether there is no one wise enough to 'decide' (diakrinai) between brothers (1 Cor 6:5), and urges them to 'discern' (diakrinontes) the body at the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:29). Spanish 'discernir/juzgar' and German 'unterscheiden' reflect the deliberative, analytical quality of this sense. DISCERN DISTINGUISH DOUBT

en: discerning, let-discern, to-decide | es: discerniendo, discernir, juzgar | fr: distinguer, douter | de: unterscheiden, διακρίνειν Matt 16:3; 1Cor 6:5; 1Cor 11:29; 1Cor 11:31; 1Cor 14:29

3. distinguish or differentiate (3×) To distinguish or differentiate between persons or categories — making a separation that recognizes real differences or, negatively, shows partiality. In Acts 15:9 God 'made no distinction' (diekrinen) between Jews and Gentiles by giving the Holy Spirit to both, while James 2:4 accuses those who show favoritism of having 'made distinctions' among themselves. Spanish 'distinguir' and the Greek prefix dia- both foreground the act of sorting apart. DISCERN DISTINGUISH DOUBT

en: distinguishes, have-you-discriminated, he-distinguished | es: distingue?, distinguió, hicisteis-distinción | fr: distinguer, douter | de: unterscheiden, διέκρινεν Acts 15:9; 1Cor 4:7; Jas 2:4

4. contend or dispute (2×) To contend or dispute verbally with someone — the separation metaphor extended to adversarial confrontation. In Acts 11:2 the circumcision party 'contended' (diekrinonto) with Peter over his visit to Gentiles, and in Jude 9 the archangel Michael, 'when disputing' (diakrinomenos) with the devil about Moses' body, deferred to the Lord's rebuke. Spanish 'contender' and German 'streitend' capture the combative flavor. ARGUE DISPUTE DEBATE

en: disputing, were-contending | es: contendían, disputando | fr: disputant„ distinguer | de: streitend, διεκρίνοντο Acts 11:2; Jude 1:9

διά-κρῐσις G1253 N-NFP (3×)

discernment, ability to judge, distinguish, or discriminate between different things

This noun denotes the faculty of discernment—the ability to distinguish, judge, or discriminate between different things, particularly between good and evil, true and false. Classical usage includes judicial decision-making, separation, and analytical distinction. In Hebrews, mature believers train their faculties through practice 'to discern good and evil.' Among spiritual gifts, Paul lists 'distinguishing between spirits'—the supernatural ability to discern spiritual sources. The term can also refer to disputes or controversies (Romans 14:1), where judgment and discrimination create division rather than clarity.

(3×) Romans 14:1 warns against receiving the weak in faith 'for disputes' or 'to pass judgment on his opinions.' 1 Corinthians 12:10 lists among spiritual gifts 'distinguishing between spirits.' Hebrews 5:14 describes the mature who 'by constant practice have their powers of discernment trained to distinguish good from evil.' The multilingual evidence shows the judgment/discrimination sense—Spanish 'discernimiento/disputas,' French 'discernement,' German 'Unterscheidung.' The contexts range from contention (Romans) to spiritual gift (1 Corinthians) to moral maturity (Hebrews)—all involving the capacity to judge and distinguish. DISCERN DISTINGUISH DOUBT en: discernment, disputes, distinguishings | es: discernimiento, discernimientos, disputas | fr: discernement | de: Unterscheidung Rom 14:1; 1Cor 12:10; Heb 5:14

διακωλ-ύω G1254 V-IIA-3S (1×)

to hinder, prevent, forbid; to obstruct someone from acting

This verb means to hinder, prevent, or obstruct someone from doing something. Matthew 3:14 presents John the Baptist's attempt to 'prevent' Jesus from being baptized, feeling the roles should be reversed. The term implies active intervention to stop an action. Classical usage included preventing someone from a specific action or generally obstructing plans. The translations (preventing, impedía, empêcher) uniformly emphasize active obstruction.

(1×) To actively prevent or hinder someone from carrying out an action. John the Baptist's attempted prevention of Jesus's baptism (Matt 3:14) represents respectful but firm objection—he tried to obstruct what seemed inappropriate. The imperfect tense suggests continuing or attempted prevention, ultimately unsuccessful since Jesus insisted and John yielded. FORBID HINDER PREVENT en: was-preventing | es: impedía | fr: empêcher | de: διεκώλυεν Matt 3:14

διαλᾰλ-έω G1255 V-IIM/P-3S (2×)

to talk over, discuss; to be talked about, spread as news (passive)

This verb means to converse about or discuss something, with the passive voice indicating that something becomes the subject of widespread conversation. Luke employs it twice: Elizabeth's miraculous pregnancy becoming the talk of the hill country (1:65), and the disciples discussing among themselves after Jesus' sabbath healing (6:11). The prefix 'dia-' suggests conversation spreading throughout or among a group, not just individual reflection. The term captures how significant events generate communal discussion and rumor. French 'se répandre' (to spread abroad) nicely captures the passive sense in Luke 1:65, while the active in 6:11 shows people actively talking things over together.

(2×) Appears in Luke's Gospel for communal discussion of significant events: the news about Zechariah and Elizabeth being 'discussed' throughout the hill country (Luke 1:65: Spanish 'se hablaba,' French 'se répandre'), and the disciples 'discussing among themselves' after Jesus' controversial sabbath healing (Luke 6:11: English 'were discussing'). Both emphasize conversation spreading through or within a community. SPEAKING AND TALKING en: were-discussed, were-discussing | es: hablaban, se-hablaba | fr: se-répandre | de: διελάλουν, διελαλεῖτο Luke 1:65; Luke 6:11

διαλέγω G1256 V-PPM/P-GMS (13×)

To reason, discuss, or argue in dialogue; to address or speak authoritatively to someone

A word that paints Paul's missionary method in vivid strokes: he enters the synagogue and 'reasons' (dialegomai) from the Scriptures, engaging his audience in back-and-forth dialogue rather than one-way proclamation. In Acts 17:2, 17:17, and 18:4, the verb carries the force of persuasive argumentation, the root from which English gets 'dialogue' and 'dialectic.' A subtler use appears in Hebrews 12:5, where Scripture itself 'speaks to' or 'addresses' the believer, shifting from interchange to authoritative exhortation.

1. reason, discuss, argue (12×) To reason, discuss, or argue through speech interchange, especially persuasive discourse in a public setting. This is the characteristic Pauline usage: reasoning in synagogues (Acts 17:2; 18:4, 19), disputing with opponents (Acts 17:17), or debating among disciples (Mark 9:34). Spanish uses 'discutir' (discuss/argue), French 'discuter,' and German 'reden mit' (speak with), all preserving the dialogical quality. The middle-deponent form emphasizes active engagement between speakers rather than mere lecturing. ARGUE DISPUTE DEBATE

en: arguing, discoursing, reasoned | es: Discutía, discutiendo, discutieron | fr: discutait, discuter | de: reden, redet-mit, redete Mark 9:34; Acts 17:2; Acts 17:17; Acts 18:4; Acts 18:19

2. speak, address, exhort (1×) To speak to or address someone with directness and authority, without the back-and-forth implied by debate. In Hebrews 12:5, the exhortation of Proverbs 3:11-12 'speaks to' (dialegetai) the readers as sons. Here the emphasis falls on personal address rather than exchange. Spanish shifts to 'habla' (speaks) rather than 'discute,' and English uses 'speaks' rather than 'reasons,' reflecting the absence of argumentative interchange in this context. SPEAKING AND TALKING en: speaks | es: habla | fr: discuter | de: reden Heb 12:5

διαλείπω G1257 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to cease, leave an interval; to stop or intermit an action

This verb denotes ceasing, intermitting, or leaving an interval in time or space. Luke 7:45 has Jesus say that the sinful woman 'has not ceased' kissing his feet since entering. Classical usage included leaving gaps, intermitting actions, or standing at intervals. The temporal aspect of cessation or continuous action (when negated) is central. The translation 'ceased' captures the aspectual, durative sense of stopping or not stopping.

(1×) To cease or intermit an action, leaving a temporal gap. In Luke 7:45, Jesus contrasts the Pharisee's omission with the woman's continuous devotion: she 'did not cease' (οὐ διέλιπεν) kissing his feet from the moment she entered. The aorist negated expresses unbroken continuity—no interval, no cessation in her expression of love and repentance. CEASING AND STOPPING en: ceased | es: cesó | fr: cesser | de: διέλιπεν Luke 7:45

διάλεκτ-ος G1258 N-DFS (6×)

Language, dialect, tongue; the distinct speech or vernacular of a particular region or people.

Denotes a specific language or dialect—the distinctive speech of a people or region, as opposed to generic 'voice' or 'sound.' Classical Greek distinguished dialektos (articulate speech, later a regional variety) from phone (mere sound or voice), and the New Testament preserves this precision. All six occurrences appear in Acts, where language identity matters deeply for the spread of the gospel. The field bought with Judas's blood was called Akeldama 'in their dialect' (Acts 1:19). At Pentecost, the crowd is astonished because each person hears the apostles speaking 'in his own dialect' (Acts 2:6, 8). Paul addresses the Jerusalem crowd 'in the Hebrew dialect' (Acts 21:40; 22:2; 26:14), earning their attentive silence. Spanish 'lengua,' French 'dialecte,' and German cognates all point to the idea of a regionally or ethnically specific tongue.

(6×) A specific language or regional dialect—the distinctive speech of a particular people or ethnic group. Used exclusively in Acts to mark the linguistic identity of speakers and audiences. At Pentecost each person hears the apostles 'in his own dialect' (Acts 2:6, 8), underscoring the miracle's personal, linguistic precision. Paul strategically addresses the Jerusalem crowd 'in the Hebrew dialect' (Acts 21:40; 22:2), gaining their respectful hearing. The field Akeldama is named 'in their own dialect' (Acts 1:19). French 'dialecte' and Spanish 'lengua' both capture the sense of a regionally specific tongue distinct from universal speech. TONGUE (BODY AND SPEECH)
en: dialect, language | es: lengua | fr: dialecte | de: διαλέκτῳ Acts 1:19; Acts 2:6; Acts 2:8; Acts 21:40; Acts 22:2

διαλλ-άσσω G1259 V-AMP-2S (1×)
to be reconciled; to exchange enmity for peace, restore relationship
While the root means 'to exchange,' this middle/passive form specifically means to be reconciled or exchange enmity for friendship. Matthew 5:24 commands leaving one's gift and first being 'reconciled' to an offended brother before offering worship. The verb implies mutual exchange—replacing hostility with peace, broken relationship with restored fellowship. All translations converge on reconciliation as the theological and relational core meaning.

(1×) To be reconciled, exchanging hostility for peace in a broken relationship. Jesus's command in Matthew 5:24 prioritizes horizontal reconciliation before vertical worship—the offender must seek to restore the relationship, initiating peace. The passive/middle form suggests mutual exchange and relationship restoration, not merely one-sided apology but genuine reconciliation requiring both parties' participation. RECONCILIATION en: be-reconciled | es: reconcíliate | fr: se-réconcilier | de: διαλλάγηθι Matt 5:24

διαλογ-ίζομαι G1260 V-PPM/P-GMP (16×)
To reason or deliberate, either in communal debate with others or in private internal reflection.
From the root 'logos' (word, reckoning) with the prefix 'dia-' (through), this verb pictures thought as a process of working through a matter. In the Gospels it appears in two distinct settings: group discussion, where disciples reason among themselves about Jesus' words (Matt 16:7–8; Mark 8:16–17), and private reflection, where an individual ponders something silently in the heart (Luke 1:29, Mary considering the angel's greeting; Mark 2:6, scribes questioning 'in their hearts'). Spanish mirrors this nicely: 'razonaban' for communal debate versus 'consideraba' and 'pensando' for interior thought. Notably, Jesus often perceives and exposes the private reasoning of others (Mark 2:8; Luke 5:22), bridging the two senses dramatically.

1. to discuss or debate with others (10×) To discuss, debate, or reason together with others—implying verbal exchange and collective deliberation. The disciples 'reason among themselves' about having no bread (Matt 16:7; Mark 8:16), and the chief priests deliberate how to answer Jesus' question about John's authority (Matt 21:25; Mark 11:31; Luke 20:5). German 'überlegen' and Spanish 'razonabais/razonaban' both capture this sense of back-and-forth communal reasoning. DISCUSS PONDER REASON
en: are-you-reasoning, they-were-reasoning, were-reasoning | es: razonabais, razonaban, razonáis | fr: raisonner | de: ueberlegen, überlegt Matt 16:7; Matt 16:8; Matt 21:25; Mark 2:8; Mark 8:16

2. to ponder or reason internally (6×) To ponder, reflect, or reason within oneself—interior mental activity without verbal exchange. Mary 'was considering in her mind' what sort of greeting this might be (Luke 1:29), the scribes 'were reasoning in their hearts' about Jesus' authority to forgive sins (Mark 2:6, 8), and the crowd 'were wondering in their hearts' whether John might be the Christ (Luke 3:15). Spanish shifts to 'consideraba' and 'pensando,' signaling the inward, silent character of this deliberation. DISCUSS PONDER REASON
en: he-was-reasoning, reasoning, they-are-reasoning | es: a-razonar, consideraba, pensando | fr: raisonner | de: ueberlegen, überlegt Mark 2:6; Mark 2:8; Luke 1:29; Luke 3:15; Luke 5:21

διαλογ-ισμός G1261 N-NMP (14×)
Thought, reasoning, deliberation; also dispute, argument, or verbal contention between persons.
A noun derived from dialogizomai ('to reckon, reason through'), covering the full range from private inner reasoning to outward verbal dispute. Jesus frequently perceives the dialogismoi of people's hearts – their hidden doubts, calculations, and hostile reasonings (Luke 5:22; 6:8). Paul warns that human reasonings become futile apart from God (Rom 1:21; 1 Cor 3:20). The word also surfaces in contexts of open quarreling: the disciples' argument about who was greatest (Luke 9:46) and Paul's exhortation to pray 'without arguments' (1 Tim 2:8). German 'Gedanken' and French 'pensée/raisonnement' neatly track the internal sense, while the Spanish oscillation between 'pensamientos' and 'razonamientos' mirrors the spectrum from private thought to reasoned contention.

1. thought, reasoning, deliberation (10×) Inner thoughts, reasonings, or mental deliberations, including doubts and opinions that may remain unexpressed. Jesus reads the dialogismoi of the Pharisees' hearts (Luke 5:22; 6:8), and Mary is told that a sword will pierce her soul so that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed (Luke 2:35). Paul declares that the Lord knows the reasonings of the wise are futile (1 Cor 3:20) and that futile reasoning darkened pagan understanding (Rom 1:21). In Romans 14:1, it appears as 'disputes over opinions,' showing the boundary where private reasoning becomes communal friction. Matt 15:19 and Mark 7:21 place evil dialogismoi among the corruptions flowing from the heart. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: doubts, of-opinions, of-thoughts | es: de-opiniones, de-razonamientos, pensamientos | fr: pensée, raisonnement | de: Gedanken, Überlegung Matt 15:19; Mark 7:21; Luke 2:35; Luke 5:22; Luke 6:8

2. dispute, argument, controversy (4×) An outward dispute, argument, or controversy between persons, often involving verbal contention or competitive rivalry. The disciples' argument about who was greatest (Luke 9:46-47) is the clearest instance, where Jesus perceives 'the dialogismos of their heart' – an internal ranking that erupted into open debate. Philippians 2:14 urges doing all things 'without grumbling or arguments,' and 1 Timothy 2:8 calls for prayer 'without anger or disputes.' The transition from inner reasoning to interpersonal quarreling reflects the word's etymological connection to dialogue and dialectic exchange. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: an-argument, argument, arguments | es: pensamiento, razonamiento, razonamientos | fr: raisonnement | de: Gedanken, Überlegung Luke 9:46; Luke 9:47; Phil 2:14; 1Tim 2:8

διαλύω G1262 V-AIP-3P (1×)
to disperse, disband, dissolve; to break up an assembly or group
This verb means to dissolve, disperse, or break up a gathered group. Acts 5:36 describes how after Theudas was killed, his followers 'were dispersed' and came to nothing. Classical usage included disbanding armies, dismissing assemblies, or breaking things into elements. The notion of dissolution—a unified group fragmenting into scattered individuals—is central to this term's meaning.

(1×) To disperse or disband, causing a unified group to scatter and dissolve. Gamaliel's historical example in Acts 5:36 illustrates how Theudas's movement dissolved after the leader's death—his followers 'were dispersed' (passive voice), scattered without organization. The translations capture both the physical scattering and the organizational dissolution of what had been a cohesive movement. SCATTERING AND DISPERSING

en: were-disbanded | es: fueron-disueltos | fr: disperser | de: διελύθησαν Acts 5:36

διαμαρτύρομαι G1263 V-AIM-3S (15×)

To testify solemnly, bear earnest witness; also to charge or warn with solemn urgency.

Built on μαρτύρομαι with the intensifying prefix δια-, this verb carries weight beyond ordinary testimony. It denotes solemn, emphatic declaration — whether bearing witness to facts about Christ and the gospel, or charging someone with grave urgency before God. Luke uses it extensively in Acts to describe the apostles' proclamation: Peter 'testified and exhorted' at Pentecost (Acts 2:40), and Paul 'testified to the Jews that Jesus was the Christ' (Acts 18:5). In the Pastoral Epistles, it shifts toward solemn charge — Paul adjures Timothy 'before God and Christ Jesus' (2 Tim 4:1), blending testimony with authoritative command.

1. testify, bear solemn witness (10×) To solemnly testify or bear emphatic witness to facts, events, or truths, particularly the gospel message. This is the primary Lukan usage in Acts: Peter testifies at Pentecost (Acts 2:40), Philip and the apostles testify in Samaria (Acts 8:25), Paul testifies to both Jews and Greeks about repentance and faith (Acts 20:21). The Spanish split between 'testifica' and 'habiendo testificado' mirrors the Greek's range of tenses. French distinguishes 'attester' (testify) from 'avertir' (warn), reflecting the sense boundary. TESTIMONY AND WARNING

en: having-testified, he-testified, testified | es: habiendo-testificado, testifica, testificaba | fr: attester, avertir | de: bezeugen, bezeugt-ernst Acts 2:40; Acts 8:25; Acts 10:42; Acts 18:5; Acts 20:21

2. solemnly charge, warn earnestly (5×) To solemnly charge, warn, or exhort with grave urgency, often invoking God as witness. This sense appears predominantly in the Pastoral Epistles: Paul charges Timothy 'before God and Christ Jesus and the elect angels' (1 Tim 5:21) and 'before God and Christ Jesus who will judge the living and the dead' (2 Tim 4:1). The Lukan parable of the rich man (Luke 16:28) also uses this sense — 'warn them, lest they also come to this place of torment.' German 'bezeugt ernst' (testifies earnestly) captures the solemn gravity well. TESTIMONY AND WARNING

en: I-solemnly-charge, he-warns, solemnly-charging | es: Solemnemente-testifico, les-advierta, solemnemente-testificando | fr: avertir | de: bezeugen, bezeugt-ernst Luke 16:28; 1Thess 4:6; 1Tim 5:21; 2Tim 2:14; 2Tim 4:1

διαμάχ-ομαι G1264 V-IIM/P-3P (1×)

to contend vigorously, fight strenuously; to struggle or dispute with intensity

This middle voice verb means to fight, contend, or strive earnestly, often in argument or intellectual combat. Acts 23:9 describes Pharisees who 'contended vigorously' during the Sanhedrin debate over Paul, perhaps defending him. Classical usage included actual combat, philosophical debate, or maintaining a position against opposition. The intensity of the struggle—not casual disagreement but earnest contention—characterizes this term.

(1×) To contend or argue vigorously, engaging in intense dispute or debate. The Pharisees' activity in Acts 23:9 represents fierce argumentation within the Sanhedrin—they 'were contending' (imperfect, suggesting ongoing dispute) apparently on Paul's behalf regarding resurrection. The middle voice may emphasize personal investment in the debate. Translations recognize the combative, argumentative intensity beyond mere discussion. CONTENDING AND STRIVING en: were-contending | es: contendían | fr: lutter | de: διεμάχοντο Acts 23:9

διαμένω G1265 V-PIA-2S (5×)

To remain throughout, continue, persist; of persons enduring or states persisting unchanged over time.

A compound of dia ('through') and menō ('remain'), intensifying the idea of staying power and continuity. Zechariah 'remained' unable to speak after his temple vision (Luke 1:22). Jesus commends his disciples as those who have 'continued with' him through his trials (Luke 22:28). Paul insists on standing firm so that the truth of the gospel might 'continue' with the Galatians (Gal 2:5). The heavens will perish, but God 'continues' unchanged (Heb 1:11). Scoffers mock by noting that all things 'continue' as they were from creation (2 Pet 3:4). Spanish 'permanecer' and German 'bleiben' both capture this core sense of persistent remaining.

(5×) To remain, continue, or persist through time — an intensified form of menō emphasizing duration and constancy. Applied to persons remaining in a state (Luke 1:22, Zechariah continuing mute; Luke 22:28, the disciples persevering through trials with Jesus), to the permanence of divine truth (Gal 2:5, the gospel continuing intact), to God's eternal unchangeableness contrasted with creation's decay (Heb 1:11, quoting Psalm 102), and ironically to the uniformitarian argument of scoffers (2 Pet 3:4, 'all things continue as they were'). The dia- prefix adds a sense of thoroughness — remaining all the way through. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: continue, having-remained-with, he-remained | es: habiendo-permanecido, permanecen, permaneces | fr: demeurer | de: bleiben, διέμενεν, διαμεμενηκότες Luke 1:22; Luke 22:28; Gal 2:5; Heb 1:11; 2Pet 3:4

διαμερ-ίζω G1266 V-AIM-3P (12×)

To divide and distribute among recipients, or to be split apart in disunity or internal conflict.

Drawn from the root meaning 'to cut into parts,' diamerizomai captures both the practical act of distributing goods and the painful reality of internal division. At the cross, soldiers divided Jesus' garments among themselves (Matt 27:35; Mark 15:24), and the early believers shared their possessions freely (Acts 2:45). Yet the same verb carries a darker edge: Jesus warns that a house divided against itself cannot stand (Luke 11:17). The Spanish renderings neatly mirror this split – 'repartieron' (they distributed) versus 'dividido' (divided against) – showing how one Greek word spans generosity and fracture.

1. distribute or apportion among (8×) Refers to the concrete act of parceling out or apportioning something among multiple recipients. The soldiers at Golgotha 'divided his garments' (Matt 27:35; Luke 23:34), and Jesus told his disciples to 'divide this among yourselves' at the Last Supper (Luke 22:17). Spanish 'repartieron' and German 'verteilen' both highlight the distributive, share-out dimension. This is the older, more common usage, rooted in everyday transactions of dividing property or spoils. DIVIDING AND DISTRIBUTING

en: They-divided, being-distributed, divide | es: Repartieron, reparten, repartid | fr: diviser | de: verteilen, verteilt Matt 27:35; Mark 15:24; Luke 22:17; Luke 23:34

2. be divided against (4×) Describes an internal state of division, disunity, or being set at variance with one another. Jesus' teaching that 'every kingdom divided against itself is laid waste' (Luke 11:17) and the prophecy that households will be split – three against two, two against three (Luke 12:52-53) – employ this sense. Multilingual evidence converges: Spanish 'dividido/divididos' and German 'verteilt' in these contexts carry the connotation of factional rupture rather than equitable sharing. DIVIDING AND DISTRIBUTING

en: divided, having-been-divided, was-divided | es: dividido, divididos, estarán-divididos | fr: diviser | de: verteilt Luke 11:17; Luke 11:18; Luke 12:52; Luke 12:53

διαμερ-ισμός G1267 N-AMS (1×)

division, dissension; the act or state of being divided or separated

This noun denotes division, partition, or dissension—the state of being divided. Luke 12:51 has Jesus ask rhetorically whether he came to bring peace or rather 'division.' The term can refer to spatial division or, as here, relational/social division and discord. Classical usage included both physical partition and political dissension. The concept of separation or splitting, whether of objects or communities, underlies this word.

(1×) Division, dissension, or separation—the breaking of unity into opposing parts. Jesus's stark question in Luke 12:51 indicates that his message inevitably creates 'division' even within families, as some accept and others reject him. The translation 'division' captures both the act of dividing and the resulting state of discord, highlighting the relational fracture caused by differing responses to Christ. DIVISION SPLIT

en: division | es: división | fr: division | de: διαμερισμόν Luke 12:51

διανέμω G1268 V-ASP-3S (1×)

to spread, distribute; to be disseminated or circulated widely

This verb means to distribute, apportion, or spread abroad. Acts 4:17 quotes the authorities saying they must prevent the message 'from spreading' further among the people. Classical usage included distributing honors, dividing into portions, or setting in order. The New Testament instance emphasizes the spreading or dissemination aspect—news or teaching circulating through a population.

(1×) To spread or be disseminated throughout a population. The Jewish leaders' concern in Acts 4:17 was that news of the healing and apostolic teaching would 'spread no further' among the people. The subjunctive mood expresses purpose or fear—they wanted to contain the message, prevent its wider circulation. Translations uniformly recognize the contagious spread of information as the central concern. POURING AND SHEDDING en: it-may-spread | es: se-difunda | fr: répandre | de: διανεμηθῇ Acts 4:17

διανεύω G1269 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

to beckon, make signs; to communicate through gestures rather than speech

This verb means to nod, beckon, or make signs to communicate non-verbally. Luke 1:22 describes Zechariah, struck mute, who 'was making signs' to communicate since he could not speak. Classical usage included nodding heads in communication or avoiding something. The gestural, non-verbal communication necessitated by Zechariah's muteness is the focus of the New Testament usage.

(1×) To make signs or gestures as a means of non-verbal communication. Zechariah's condition after his temple vision (Luke 1:22) required him to use gestures—he 'was making signs' (imperfect, ongoing action) to communicate what he could not speak. The translations consistently recognize the compensatory gestural communication necessitated by his inability to speak after his encounter with Gabriel. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11301 WITH 5 SENSES

en: making-signs | es: haciendo-señas | fr: faire-signe | de: διανεύων Luke 1:22

διανό-ημα G1270 N-ANP (1×)

thought, notion, intention; the product of mental activity or reasoning

This noun denotes thoughts, notions, or mental conceptions. Luke 11:17 says Jesus 'knew their thoughts'—their mental deliberations or intentions. Classical usage distinguished thoughts from spoken words, or referred to meanings, whims, or sick fancies. The cognitive, mental dimension—what goes on in the mind—is central. The plural often suggests various thoughts or mental processes.

(1×) Thoughts, mental reasoning, or inner intentions—the content of cognitive activity. Jesus's knowledge of the Pharisees' 'thoughts' (Luke 11:17) demonstrates divine insight into unspoken reasoning and hostile intentions. The term emphasizes internal mental processes rather than external expressions, revealing that Jesus perceived not just actions but the thinking behind them. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: thoughts | es: pensamientos | fr: pensée | de: διανοήματα Luke 11:17

διάνοιᾰ G1271 N-DFS (12×)

Mind, understanding, disposition — the faculty of intellectual and moral discernment; one's way of thinking

The noun dianoia refers to the mind as the seat of understanding, thought, and moral intention. Its most prominent appearance is in the Great Commandment: 'Love the Lord your God with all your heart, soul, and mind' (Matt 22:37; Mark 12:30; Luke 10:27), where it renders Hebrew lēbāb and emphasizes the intellectual dimension of covenant love. Beyond this, the word describes humanity's fallen understanding — 'darkened in their understanding' (Eph 4:18), 'hostile in mind' (Col 1:21) — and its renewal through Christ (1 John 5:20; Heb 8:10; 10:16). First Peter 1:13 exhorts believers to 'gird up the loins of your mind.' Spanish 'mente/entendimiento' and French 'intelligence/pensée' capture both the cognitive faculty and its moral orientation.

mind, understanding (12×) The mind as the faculty of understanding and moral reasoning, particularly in the context of total devotion to God. Anchored in the Shema quotation: 'with all your mind' (Matt 22:37; Mark 12:30; Luke 10:27), where dianoia represents the intellectual engagement required in covenantal love. Also appears in eschatological understanding (1 John 5:20) and the new-covenant promise of God's law written on the mind (Heb 8:10; 10:16). Spanish 'entendimiento' and German 'Verstand' convey this cognitive-devotional sense. MIND UNDERSTANDING

en: in-thought, mind, thoughts | es: en-pensamiento, entendimiento, mente | fr: intelligence | de: Verstand, διανοίᾳ Matt 22:37; Mark 12:30; Luke 1:51; Luke 10:27; Eph 2:3

διαν-οίγω G1272 V-PPA-NNS (8×)

To open up, lay open; used of eyes, minds, Scriptures, and wombs being opened, often by divine agency.

A compound verb (dia + anoigo) meaning to open thoroughly or lay open, carrying a sense of completeness that the simple 'open' does not always convey. In the NT it appears in deeply theological moments: the heavens opening at Jesus' baptism, the womb opening for a firstborn (Luke 2:23), eyes being opened on the Emmaus road (Luke 24:31), the mind being opened to understand Scripture (Luke 24:45), and Jesus opening the Scriptures themselves (Luke 24:32). The healing command 'Ephphatha — be opened!' (Mark 7:34) uses this verb in its most dramatic form. Spanish distinguishes between 'abrir' (open) and 'ser abierto' (be opened), mirroring the active-passive alternation found throughout these occurrences.

open, lay open (8×) To open up or lay open completely, used both of physical opening (eyes, ears, womb) and of spiritual-intellectual illumination (minds, Scriptures). The verb implies thoroughness — not merely cracking open but fully disclosing. Key passages include Mark 7:34 where Jesus commands 'Ephphatha — be opened!' to heal a deaf man, Luke 2:23 citing the law about every firstborn male opening the womb, and the Emmaus narrative where both eyes (Luke 24:31) and minds (Luke 24:45) are opened to recognize the risen Christ. The multilingual evidence — Spanish 'abrir/abiertos,' French 'ouvrir,' German 'öffnen' — treats all occurrences as a single sense of opening, whether literal or metaphorical. OPENING AND SHUTTING en: Be-opened, having-been-opened, he-opened | es: Sé-abierto, abiertos, abriendo | fr: ouvrir | de: oeffnen, öffnet Mark 7:34; Luke 2:23; Luke 24:31; Luke 24:32; Luke 24:45

διανυκτερεύω G1273 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

to spend the night, pass the night; to remain through the nighttime hours

This verb means to spend or pass the night, emphasizing the duration of nighttime. Luke 6:12 describes Jesus 'spending the night' in prayer before choosing the Twelve. The term focuses on the temporal aspect of remaining through the night hours, often with implication of activity during that time. Classical and New Testament usage both emphasize nocturnal duration and activity.

(1×) To spend the night or continue through nighttime hours, often in some activity. Jesus's practice before selecting the apostles (Luke

6:12) involved 'spending the night in prayer'—not merely sleeping but actively praying throughout the night hours. The participle suggests sustained nocturnal activity, emphasizing both duration (all night) and purpose (prayer). NIGHT AND LODGING
en: spending-the-night | es: pasando-la-noche | fr: passer-la-nuit | de: διανυκτερεύων Luke 6:12

διᾰνύω G1274 V-APA-NMP (1×)
to complete, finish a journey; to accomplish or bring to an end
This verb means to complete, accomplish, or finish—particularly journeys or tasks. Acts 21:7 describes Paul and companions 'completing the voyage' from Tyre to Ptolemais. Classical usage included finishing journeys, accomplishing tasks, or even 'living' (completing one's life). The sense of bringing something to its intended end or accomplishment is central to this term.

(1×) To complete or finish a journey or course, bringing it to its intended conclusion. Paul's maritime journey segment in Acts 21:7 was 'completed' (aorist participle) when they arrived at Ptolemais—they finished that leg of the voyage. The translations recognize both the journey completion and the broader sense of accomplishing or concluding any extended activity. FULFILL AND COMPLETE en: having-completed | es: completando | fr: passer | de: διανύσαντες Acts 21:7

διαπαντός G1275
continually, constantly, at all times, perpetually
An adverbial expression (later spelled as one word, earlier as two: διὰ παντός) meaning 'continually' or 'at all times.' The phrase combines the preposition 'through' with 'all' to create the sense of continuousness—running through all time without interruption. It describes actions or states that persist constantly rather than occurring occasionally. In biblical contexts, it often modifies verbs of worship, service, or attitude, emphasizing the perpetual or unceasing nature of the action.

διαπεράω G1276 V-APA-NMP (6×)
To cross over, pass through; to travel across a body of water or through a region.
Describes the act of crossing from one side to the other, especially traversing a body of water by boat. In classical Greek it could refer to passing through a city or even 'passing through life,' but the New Testament consistently uses it for physical transit across the Sea of Galilee or similar geographical crossings. Jesus crosses over by boat and arrives in his own town (Matt 9:1), and after the feeding of the five thousand the disciples cross to the land of Gennesaret (Matt 14:34; Mark 6:53). The only non-maritime use appears in Luke 16:26, where Abraham tells the rich man that a great chasm is fixed so that none can 'cross over' between paradise and torment. Spanish 'cruzar' and German 'hinüberfahren' both center on the spatial movement from one side to the other.

cross over, pass through (6×) To cross over a body of water or traverse a region, typically by boat. All Synoptic occurrences describe Galilean boat crossings: Jesus crosses to his own city (Matt 9:1), the disciples land at Gennesaret after crossing over (Matt 14:34; Mark 6:53), and crowds follow Jesus after he crosses (Mark 5:21). The one metaphorical use in Luke 16:26 describes the impassable chasm between Abraham's side and Hades—'those who wish to cross from here to you cannot.' The sailors in Acts 27:39 planned to run the ship ashore, another instance of transit across water. Spanish 'cruzar' and German 'hinüberfahren' both convey directed movement from one side to another. CROSSING OVER en: crossing-over, having-crossed-over, he-crossed-over | es: crucen, cruzando, cruzó | fr: traverser | de: fährt-hinüber, ueberfahren Matt 9:1; Matt 14:34; Mark 5:21; Mark 6:53; Luke 16:26

διαπλέω G1277 V-APA-NMP (1×)
to sail across, traverse by sea; to complete a maritime crossing
This verb specifically means to sail across or through, traversing water by ship. Acts 27:5 describes Paul's ship 'having sailed across' the sea off Cilicia and Pamphylia. The term emphasizes the crossing or traversing aspect of sea travel, not mere sailing but completing a passage from one point to another. Classical usage included sailing through straits or across bodies of water.

(1×) To sail across or traverse a body of water by ship, completing a maritime passage. Paul's journey toward Rome included 'sailing across' (Acts 27:5) the open sea along the southern coast of Asia Minor—not coastal sailing but crossing water. The aorist participle marks the completed crossing before the next leg. Translations uniformly recognize the traversing, crossing character of this nautical term. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP
en: having-sailed-across | es: habiendo-atravesado | fr: naviguer | de: διαπλεύσαντες Acts 27:5

διαπον-έω G1278 V-PPM/P-NMP (2×)
to be troubled, disturbed, or greatly annoyed; to be worn out with labor or vexation (passive)
This verb originally meant to work something out thoroughly, but in passive voice (as in both NT occurrences) it means to be worn out, troubled, or greatly disturbed. Acts uses it for opponents being disturbed by the apostles' teaching: the religious authorities 'greatly disturbed' by resurrection preaching (4:2), and Paul 'greatly annoyed' by a spirit-possessed girl's persistent following (16:18). The term suggests more than mild irritation—it indicates significant vexation or disturbance that compels action. Spanish 'disgustados' and 'indignándose' capture this sense of being provoked to displeasure or indignation, while the passive voice emphasizes the involuntary nature of the emotional response.

(2×) Both occurrences in Acts describe being provoked to action by disturbance: the Sadducees and temple authorities 'greatly disturbed' by resurrection teaching (Acts 4:2: Spanish 'disgustados'), and Paul 'greatly annoyed' by the slave girl's persistent proclamation (Acts 16:18: Spanish 'indignándose'). The passive voice indicates something external has worn down their patience and provoked strong reaction. LABOR AND TOIL
en: being-greatly-disturbed, having-become-greatly-annoyed | es: disgustados, indignándose | fr: être-affligé | de: διαπονηθεὶς, διαπονούμενοι Acts 4:2; Acts 16:18

διαπορ-εύω G1279 V-PPM/P-GMS (5×)
To pass through, travel through a region or place, journeying from one point to another
A verb of transit describing movement through a place or region on the way to somewhere else. In Luke's writings, Jesus is frequently depicted passing through towns and grain fields (Luke 6:1; 13:22), while Paul travels through cities delivering decrees (Acts 16:4). The multilingual evidence uniformly emphasizes traversal: Spanish 'atravesaba' (crossed through), French 'traverser,' and German 'hindurchgehen' (go through) all highlight the directional, purposeful quality of the journey rather than mere walking.

(5×) To travel through or pass across a place, moving through territory on a journey. The consistent cross-lingual rendering – Spanish 'atravesar,' French 'traverser,' German 'hindurchgehen' – underscores that this is not aimless wandering but purposeful transit. Used of Jesus passing through grain fields on the Sabbath (Luke 6:1), journeying through towns toward Jerusalem (Luke 13:22), and a crowd passing by the blind man at Jericho (Luke 18:36). Paul's travels delivering the apostolic decrees also employ this word (Acts 16:4). DEPARTING AND PASSING en: he-was-passing-through, passing-through, they-were-passing-through | es: atravesaba, atravesaban, pasando | fr: passer, traverser | de: hindurchgehen, reist-durch Luke 6:1; Luke 13:22; Luke 18:36; Acts 16:4; Rom 15:24

διᾰπορ-έω G1280 V-IIA-3P (4×)
diaporeo – to be thoroughly perplexed, utterly at a loss, deeply puzzled

Diaporeo intensifies the simple aporeo ('to be at a loss') with the prefix dia- ('thoroughly'), conveying a state of deep perplexity or bewilderment. All four New Testament uses describe people confronted with events that defy their categories: Herod is greatly perplexed by reports about Jesus (Luke 9:7), the Pentecost crowd is utterly amazed and baffled (Acts 2:12), the temple officers are at a total loss over the apostles' escape (Acts 5:24), and Peter is deeply puzzled by his vision (Acts 10:17). Spanish perplejo and French perplexe both capture this thorough bafflement – not casual doubt but genuine cognitive disorientation.

(4×) To be thoroughly perplexed or completely at a loss, expressing intense cognitive bewilderment when confronted with inexplicable events. The prefix dia- intensifies the confusion beyond ordinary uncertainty. Herod is deeply puzzled by conflicting reports about Jesus (Luke 9:7); the Pentecost crowd stands bewildered at hearing their own languages (Acts 2:12); temple officials cannot fathom the apostles' escape (Acts 5:24); and Peter is baffled by his rooftop vision (Acts 10:17). Spanish estaba-perplejo and French etre-perplexe both reflect this thorough, disorienting confusion. PERPLEXED AT LOSS
en: was-perplexed, were-perplexed | es: dudaba, estaba-perplejo, estaban-perplejos | fr: être-perplexe | de: διηπόρει, διηπόρουν Luke 9:7; Acts 2:12; Acts 5:24; Acts 10:17

διαπραγμᾰτεύομαι G1281 V-AIM-3P (1×)

to gain by trading, make profit through business; to accomplish financial gain

This middle voice verb means to gain through trading or business activity, making profit. Luke 19:15 uses it in the parable where the nobleman asks 'what they had gained by trading' with his money. Classical usage included discussing thoroughly, but the New Testament sense is clearly commercial—profit through business activity. The financial, entrepreneurial aspect dominates the Gospel usage.

(1×) To gain or make profit through business activity and trading. The returning nobleman in Luke 19:15 inquires what each servant 'had gained by trading'—the financial result of their business activity with his entrusted capital. The aorist tense marks completed business transactions. All translations converge on commercial profit-making as the core meaning in this parabolic economic scenario. GAIN PROFIT OBTAIN en: they-had-gained | es: había-ganado | fr: faire-du-profit | de: διεπραγματεύσαντο Luke 19:15

δια-πρίω G1282 V-IIM/P-3P (2×)

to be cut to the heart, enraged; to be sawn through with fury or anguish

This vivid verb literally means to saw through or cut asunder, but metaphorically expresses being cut to the heart with rage or fury. Both Acts occurrences describe violent reactions to apostolic preaching: the Sanhedrin being 'cut to the heart' and wanting to kill the apostles (5:33), and the crowd gnashing teeth at Stephen before stoning him (7:54). The imagery is visceral—as if their hearts are being sawn through—suggesting intense emotional reaction that passes beyond mere anger to murderous rage. Spanish 'se enfurecían' (were enraged) captures the fury, while the Greek's saw imagery emphasizes the piercing, painful nature of their provoked wrath.

(2×) Appears exclusively in Acts to describe murderous rage provoked by apostolic testimony: the council being 'cut to the heart' and plotting to kill the apostles (Acts 5:33), and the crowd's furious reaction to Stephen's speech (Acts 7:54: Spanish 'se enfurecían'). Both contexts involve not mere disagreement but rage so intense it leads immediately to violence or plotting violence. TEARING AND RENDING en: they-were-cut-to-the-hearts, were-cut-to-the-heart | es: se-enfurecían | fr: déchirer | de: διεπρίοντο Acts 5:33; Acts 7:54

διαρπ-άζω G1283 V-ANA (3×)

to plunder, spoil, seize goods by force or pillage

This verb means to plunder, spoil, or seize goods, typically in the context of warfare, robbery, or violent seizure. Jesus uses it in a parable about binding the strong man before plundering his house—only someone stronger can overcome a powerful guardian and seize his possessions. The image evokes military conquest or forceful robbery. In spiritual application, it represents Christ's victory over Satan and the subsequent 'plundering' of his domain through the liberation of captives and the advancement of God's kingdom.

(3×) Matthew 12:29 and Mark 3:27 (appearing twice in Mark) present Jesus' teaching: 'how can anyone enter a strong man's house and plunder his goods unless he first binds the strong man? Then indeed he may plunder his house.' The multilingual glosses are consistent—English 'plunder,' Spanish 'saquear/saqueará,' French 'piller,' German 'rauben.' The doubled occurrence in Mark emphasizes the sequence: binding precedes plundering. Jesus' exorcisms demonstrate He has bound the strong man (Satan) and is now plundering his house (liberating the oppressed). SEIZING AND SNATCHING
en: he-will-plunder, to-plunder | es: saquear, saqueará | fr: piller | de: rauben, διαρπάσει Matt 12:29; Mark 3:27

διαρρήγνῡμι G1284 V-IIM/P-3S (5×)

To tear apart, rip asunder; used especially of tearing garments as a sign of grief or outrage

Describes a forceful tearing or ripping apart, most memorably used of the high priest tearing his robes at Jesus' trial (Matt 26:65; Mark 14:63). The word carries raw physical force – Luke uses it of a fishing net breaking under the weight of a miraculous catch (Luke 5:6) and of chains snapped by a demoniac (Luke 8:29). Spanish 'rasgar' and French 'déchirer' both convey violent ripping. In Acts 14:14, Paul and Barnabas tear their garments in horror at being treated as gods, showing how the gesture signals profound distress.

(5×) To tear or rip apart forcibly, whether garments, nets, or bonds. The high priest tearing his robes (Matt 26:65; Mark 14:63) exemplifies the ritual act of grief and outrage, rendered in Spanish as 'rasgar' and French 'déchirer,' both conveying violent rupture. The word extends beyond clothing: a net bursting with fish (Luke 5:6) and demonic chains shattered (Luke 8:29) demonstrate its raw physical sense. German 'zerreissen' (tear to pieces) captures the totality of the destruction involved. TEARING AND RENDING
en: breaking, having-torn, tearing | es: habiendo-rasgado, rasgando, rasgó | fr: déchirer | de: zerreissen, διέρρηξεν, διαρρήξαντες Matt 26:65; Mark 14:63; Luke 5:6; Luke 8:29; Acts 14:14

διασᾰφ-έω G1285 V-AIA-3P (2×)

to explain clearly, make plain; to give detailed information about something

This verb means to explain or clarify something thoroughly, making obscure matters plain. Matthew uses it twice in his Gospel: Jesus' disciples asking him to 'explain' the parable of the weeds (13:36), and the servants reporting clearly to their master about the unforgiving servant's actions (18:31). The compound suggests 'making clear through and through,' removing ambiguity or obscurity. The term appears in contexts requiring detailed explanation or clear reporting. Spanish 'Explícanos' (Explain to us) and 'declararon' (they explained) directly capture this sense of clarification, while German 'Διασάφησον' preserves the request for clear understanding.

(2×) Both Matthew occurrences involve clarifying communication: the disciples requesting Jesus to 'explain' the parable of the weeds (Matthew 13:36: Spanish 'Explícanos'), and fellow servants 'explaining' clearly to the master what the unforgiving servant had done (Matthew 18:31: Spanish 'declararon,' French 'expliquer'). The verb emphasizes making obscure or unclear matters plain through detailed explanation. SHOWING AND REVEALING
en: Explain, explained | es: Explícanos, declararon | fr: expliquer | de: Διασάφησον, διεσάφησαν Matt 13:36; Matt 18:31

δια-σείω G1286 V-ASA-2P (1×)

to extort, shake down; to obtain money through intimidation or threats

While the root can mean 'shake violently,' this verb developed the sense of extorting money through intimidation or browbeating. Luke 3:14 has John the Baptist warn soldiers not to 'extort' money from people. Classical usage included shaking violently, throwing into confusion, intimidating, or taking money by threats. The financial extortion through violent intimidation is the New Testament focus.

(1×) To extort money or goods through intimidation, threats, or violent shaking down of victims. John's ethical instruction to soldiers (Luke 3:14) prohibits this abuse of military power—using position and force to extract money from civilians. The agricultural domain tag seems mistaken; this is economic exploitation. The translations (extort, extorsionéis, menacer) recognize the coercive, threatening character of this taking. UPROOT PLUCK UP

en: extort | es: extorsionéis | fr: menacer | de: διασείσητε Luke 3:14

διασκορπ-ίζω G1287 V-RPM/P-ANP (9×)

To scatter or disperse widely; of people or flocks driven apart, or of wealth squandered through reckless spending.

Built on the root σκορπίζω (scatter) with the intensifying prefix δια- (through, throughout), this verb paints vivid pictures of violent dispersal. When Jesus quotes Zechariah — 'I will strike the shepherd and the sheep will be scattered' (Matt 26:31; Mark 14:27) — the multilingual evidence is unanimous: Spanish 'dispersados,' French 'disperser,' German 'zerstreut.' But Luke twice repurposes this physical scattering as a metaphor for financial ruin: the prodigal son 'scattered' his inheritance (Luke 15:13), and the unjust steward was accused of 'squandering' his master's goods (Luke 16:1), where Spanish shifts tellingly to 'malgastando' (wasting).

1. scatter, disperse (7×) To scatter or disperse people, animals, or groups in multiple directions, whether by divine judgment, persecution, or circumstance. Used of the sheep scattered when the shepherd is struck (Matt 26:31; Mark 14:27), God scattering the proud (Luke 1:51), the gathered children of God who were scattered (John 11:52), and Theudas's followers dispersing after his death (Acts 5:37). Spanish consistently uses 'dispersar/esparcir' and German 'zerstreuen,' both emphasizing forceful separation into many directions. SCATTERING AND DISPERSING

en: I-scattered, having-been-scattered, he-scattered | es: dispersados, esparciste, esparció | fr: disperser | de: zerstreuen, zerstreut Matt 25:24; Matt 25:26; Matt 26:31; Mark 14:27; Luke 1:51

2. squander, waste (2×) To squander or waste possessions through reckless, profligate spending — a metaphorical extension of physical scattering. The prodigal son 'scattered' his property in dissolute living (Luke 15:13), and the dishonest manager was charged with 'squandering' his master's wealth (Luke 16:1). The Spanish shift from 'dispersar' to 'malgastar' (to waste) neatly captures this semantic extension: what was once about bodies flung apart now describes money thrown away. SCATTERING AND DISPERSING en: scattered, squandering | es: malgastando, malgastó | fr: disperser | de: zerstreut Luke 15:13; Luke 16:1

δια-σπάω G1288 V-ASP-3S (2×)

to tear apart, tear asunder; to be pulled to pieces or torn away forcibly

This violent verb means to tear something apart with force or to be torn asunder. Mark uses it for the demoniac who had broken chains and been 'torn apart' by restraints (5:4), while Acts employs it for the danger that Paul might be 'pulled to pieces' by conflicting crowds (23:10). The imagery is physical and violent—things or persons being ripped apart by opposing forces. The prefix 'dia-' intensifies the basic 'tear' to suggest complete sundering or pulling in different directions. Spanish 'fuera despedazado' (be torn to pieces) and French 'déchirer' (tear) preserve this violent imagery of forcible separation or destruction.

(2×) Appears in violent contexts of being torn apart: the demoniac who had frequently 'been torn apart' by restraints he broke (Mark 5:4: Spanish 'fuera despedazado'), and the Roman tribune's fear Paul would be 'pulled to pieces' by the mob (Acts 23:10: English 'torn apart,' French 'déchirer'). Both emphasize forcible, violent tearing or pulling apart by opposing forces. TEARING AND RENDING

en: be-torn-apart, to-have-been-torn-apart | es: fuera-despedazado, habersido-rotas | fr: déchirer | de: zerreissen, διασπασθῇ Mark 5:4; Acts 23:10

διασπείρω G1289 V-APP-NMP (3×)

to scatter, disperse, spread abroad, particularly of people forced from their homes

This verb describes scattering or dispersing, particularly of people driven from their homes or spread across different locations. In agricultural contexts, it refers to scattering seed. In military contexts, it describes scattered, routed troops. In Acts, persecution scattered the Jerusalem believers throughout Judea and Samaria, inadvertently spreading the gospel beyond its original Jewish context. What enemies intended as destructive dispersion, God used for gospel multiplication. The term evokes both the trauma of displacement and the providential purposes accomplished through scattering.

(3×) Acts 8:1 records that 'all except the apostles were scattered throughout Judea and Samaria' due to persecution. Acts 8:4 notes 'those who were scattered went about preaching the word.' Acts 11:19 recounts 'those who were scattered because of the persecution' traveling to Phoenicia, Cyprus, and Antioch. The multilingual evidence is direct—Spanish 'dispersados/fueron dispersados,' French 'semer,' German preserving Greek forms. The narrative irony is profound: persecution meant to suppress the movement instead catalyzes its expansion across geographical and ethnic boundaries. SOWING AND PLANTING

en: having-been-scattered, were-scattered | es: dispersados, fueron-dispersados | fr: semer | de: διασπαρέντες, διεσπάρησαν Acts 8:1; Acts 8:4; Acts 11:19

διασπορ-ά G1290 N-AFS (3×)

Diaspora, Dispersion, scattered Jewish communities living outside the promised land

The Diaspora (literally 'scattering' or 'dispersion') refers to Jewish communities living outside the land of Israel, scattered among the nations. This dispersion resulted from various exiles and migrations throughout history. By the first century, Jewish communities flourished throughout the Mediterranean world and beyond. The term carries both geographical reality and theological significance—the scattered state represents both judgment (exile) and providence (witness among the nations). New Testament authors address letters to Jewish believers in the Dispersion, recognizing their particular challenges and opportunities.

(3×) John 7:35 records the confused Jewish leaders asking whether Jesus will go 'to the Dispersion among the Greeks' and teach them. James 1:1 addresses his letter 'to the twelve tribes in the Dispersion.' 1 Peter 1:1 addresses 'the exiles of the Dispersion' in various provinces. The multilingual glosses preserve the concept—English 'Diaspora/Dispersion,' Spanish 'Dispersión,' French 'Dispersion,' German 'Zerstreuung.' The term acknowledges the reality of scattered communities while maintaining their connection to covenant identity. For Christian authors, it takes on new meaning—believers are dispersed exiles awaiting their true homeland. SCATTERING AND DISPERSING en: Diaspora, Dispersion, of-Diaspora | es: Dispersión, de-Dispersión | fr: Dispersion, dispersion | de: Zerstreuung John 7:35; Jas 1:1; 1Pet 1:1

διαστέλλω G1291 V-IIM-3S (8×)

To command strictly, give a stern charge; to order emphatically, especially enjoining silence or obedience.

Though its classical Greek roots mean 'to separate' or 'distinguish,' in the New Testament this verb has narrowed to a forceful speech act: giving a strict command. It appears almost exclusively on the lips of Jesus, who sternly charges people to keep silent about his miracles and messianic identity — the so-called 'Messianic Secret' of Mark's Gospel (Mark 5:43; 7:36; 8:15; 9:9). The irony is palpable in Mark 7:36: 'the more he commanded them, the more widely they proclaimed it.' Spanish 'ordenar' and German 'bestimmen' both capture the authoritative tone. In Acts 15:24, the apostles use the same verb to clarify what they did not command, showing it carries weight even in official ecclesiastical speech.

command, order strictly (8×) To give a strict charge or emphatic command, ordering someone to do or refrain from something. In the NT this middle-voice usage carries strong authoritative force, most characteristically when Jesus commands silence about his miracles and identity (Matt 16:20; Mark 5:43; 7:36; 8:15; 9:9) — the pattern scholars call the 'Messianic Secret.' The verb also appears in apostolic instruction (Acts 15:24; Heb 12:20). Spanish 'ordenar/ordenó,' French 'ordonner,' and German 'bestimmen' all emphasize the commanding authority behind the speech act, confirming the consistent sense of strict directive rather than mere suggestion. COMMANDING AND ORDERING en: being-commanded, he-commanded, he-ordered | es: ordenaba, ordenamos, ordenó | fr: ordonner | de: bestimmen, διεστείλατο, διεστειλάμεθα Matt 16:20; Mark 5:43; Mark 7:36; Mark 8:15

διάστημα G1292 N-NNS (1×)

interval, space between; a temporal or spatial gap or distance

This noun denotes an interval, space, or gap—temporal or spatial separation between points. Acts 5:7 describes an 'interval of about three hours' between Peter's confrontations with Ananias and Sapphira. Classical usage included musical intervals, geometric radius, temporal duration, or spaces between objects. The gap or separation in time or space is the unifying concept.

(1×) A temporal interval or space of time between events. The tragic sequence in Acts 5:7 unfolds with Sapphira entering 'after an interval of about three hours,' unaware of her husband's death. This temporal gap heightened the drama—she had no opportunity to learn what had happened. Translations recognize the temporal spacing, the measured gap between the two related events. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: interval | es: intervalo | fr: décret | de: διάστημα Acts 5:7

διαστολ-ή G1293 N-NFS (3×)

distinction, difference, differentiation that marks one thing as separate from another

This noun describes a distinction or differentiation—a marked difference that separates one thing from another. Paul uses it to emphasize the absence of distinction between Jew and Greek in matters of sin and salvation. All have sinned, there is 'no distinction'—both groups stand equally guilty and equally in need of grace. The same Lord is Lord of all, showing 'no distinction' between groups. In musical contexts, instruments must make 'distinction' between notes or the melody is unintelligible. The term highlights boundaries, differences, and the presence or absence of discriminating factors.

(3×) Romans 3:22 and 10:12 both emphasize there is 'no distinction' between Jew and Greek regarding sin and salvation—all are equally guilty, all equally offered grace in Christ. 1 Corinthians 14:7 uses a musical analogy: 'if the flute or harp does not make a distinction in the notes,' how will anyone know the tune? The multilingual glosses are uniform—English 'distinction,' Spanish 'distinción,' French 'distinction,' German 'Unterschied.' The theological contexts stress the gospel's radical leveling of ethnic privilege and universal need, while the musical example shows that some distinctions are necessary for meaningful communication. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING en: a-distinction, distinction | es: distinción | fr: distinction | de: Unterschied Rom 3:22; Rom 10:12; 1Cor 14:7

διαστρέφω G1294 V-ANA (7×)

To pervert, distort, or twist away from what is right; to turn aside morally or doctrinally.

Means to twist or turn something from its proper course, used in the New Testament for both moral perversion and active doctrinal corruption. Jesus applies it as a stinging adjective to describe his contemporaries as a 'twisted and perverted generation' (Matt 17:17; Luke 9:41), echoing Deuteronomy 32:5. Paul uses the active form for those who attempt to distort the faith of others, as when Elymas the magician tries to 'turn aside' the proconsul from believing (Acts 13:8). Spanish captures the range well with both 'perversa' (stative corruption) and 'apartar' (active turning aside).

pervert, twist, distort (7×) To twist, pervert, or distort—turning someone or something away from what is right or true. Encompasses the stative perfect participle describing a whole generation as morally 'perverted' (Matt 17:17; Luke 9:41; Phil 2:15, echoing Deut 32:5), and the active sense of deliberately corrupting or diverting others (Luke 23:2, 'perverting our nation'; Acts 13:8, 10, Elymas trying to 'turn aside' the proconsul from the faith). Spanish distinguishes 'perversa' (the condition of being twisted) from 'apartar' (the act of turning aside), illuminating the dual stative-active range that the single Greek verb covers across all seven occurrences. TURNING AWAY AND PERVERTING en: distorted-things, perverted, perverting | es: apartar, cosas-pervertidas, perversa | fr: pervertir | de: abwenden, διαστρέφοντα, διαστρέφων Matt 17:17; Luke 9:41; Luke 23:2; Acts 13:8; Acts 13:10

διασώζω G1295 V-AIP-3P (8×)

To bring safely through danger; to rescue, preserve, or heal — emphasizing safe passage to the other side of peril

Intensified by the prefix dia- ('through'), this verb does not merely save but brings safely through to the other side of danger. It appears most vividly in Acts 27-28, where Paul's shipwreck narrative uses it three times for passengers escaping to shore alive (Acts 27:43-44; 28:1). In 1 Peter 3:20, Noah's family is 'brought safely through water' — eight souls preserved through the flood. The verb also carries a healing sense: those who touched Jesus' garment 'were made completely well' (Matt 14:36). Spanish distinguishes the physical rescue ('salvados') from healing ('sanados'), revealing how the same Greek word covers both bodily preservation and restoration.

1. bring safely through, rescue (physical) (4×) Bringing safely through physical danger, especially rescue from shipwreck or perilous escort. Four occurrences cluster in Acts: soldiers ordered to bring Paul safely to Felix (Acts 23:24), and the dramatic shipwreck survival where all 276 aboard reach land alive (Acts 27:43-44; 28:1, 4). Spanish 'lo lleven a salvo/habiendo sido salvados' and German 'rettet' emphasize safe arrival at the destination. SALVATION AND RESCUE

en: having-been-brought-safely-through, having-been-saved, they-might-bring-safely | es: habiendo-sido-salvado, habiendo-sido-salvados, lo-lleven-a-salvo | fr: sauver | de: rettet Acts 23:24; Acts 27:44; Acts 28:1; Acts 28:4

2. save, rescue (spiritual) (3×) Saving or preserving through danger in a broader or spiritual sense. The centurion sends elders asking Jesus to come 'save' his servant (Luke 7:3), Paul's intervention preserves the passengers (Acts 27:43), and Noah's household is 'brought safely through water' in the ark (1 Pet 3:20). Spanish 'salvar/salvara/fueron salvadas' and French 'sauver' reflect divine preservation through peril rather than mere physical rescue. SALVATION AND RESCUE

en: he-might-save, to-save, were-saved | es: fueron-salvadas, salvar, salvara | fr: sauver | de: retten, rettet Luke 7:3; Acts 27:43; 1Pet 3:20

3. heal, cure (1×) Healing or curing from illness, restoring to physical wholeness. In Matt 14:36, all who touched the fringe of Jesus' garment 'were completely healed.' Spanish uniquely renders this 'fueron sanados' (were healed) rather than 'salvados' (were saved), distinguishing medical restoration from rescue — a diagnostic clue that the Greek word here carries therapeutic rather than soteriological force. SALVATION AND RESCUE

en: were-saved | es: fueron-sanados | fr: sauver | de: rettet Matt 14:36

δια-τᾰγή G1296 N-DFS (2×)

ordinance, command; an authoritative arrangement or decree

This noun refers to an authoritative ordinance, command, or official arrangement—something prescribed or ordered. Stephen speaks of the law being received 'through the arrangement of angels' (Acts 7:53), while Paul discusses submission to governing authorities, calling them God's 'ordinances' (Romans 13:2). The term suggests formal arrangement or prescription with binding authority. It shares root with words for arranging or ordering. Spanish 'disposiciones' and French 'ordonnance' both capture the sense of authoritative decree or regulation. The term can apply to divine, angelic, or governmental ordering, emphasizing the binding, prescribed nature of these arrangements.

(2×) Appears in two contexts of authoritative ordering: the law received by Israel 'through the arrangement of angels' (Acts 7:53: Spanish 'disposición,' German 'Verordnung'), and governing authorities as established 'ordinances' (Romans 13:2: Spanish 'disposiciones,' French 'ordonnance'). Both emphasize formal, binding arrangements prescribed by legitimate authority—whether angelic mediation or governmental establishment. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: ordinance, ordinances | es: disposiciones, disposición | fr: ordonnance | de: Verordnung, διαταγὰς Acts 7:53; Rom 13:2

διά-ταγμα G1297 N-ANS (1×)

edict, decree, ordinance; an authoritative command or regulation

This noun denotes an official decree, edict, or ordinance issued by authority. Hebrews 11:23 refers to Moses's parents acting contrary to the king's 'edict' ordering the death of Hebrew boys. The term carries legal and official force—not mere suggestion but authoritative command. The Latin equivalents (edictum, formula) and multilingual glosses all emphasize the official, binding character of such decrees.

(1×) An official edict or royal decree carrying authoritative force. Pharaoh's command to kill Hebrew infants was a formal 'edict' (Heb 11:23) that Moses's parents courageously defied. The term emphasizes not just any order but an official, published decree with legal or royal authority behind it. The translations converge on formal, authoritative command or ordinance. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: edict | es: decreto | fr: Gebot | de: Gebot Heb 11:23

διατᾰ́ρασσω G1298 V-AIP-3S (1×)

to be deeply troubled, disturbed; to be thrown into inner confusion or agitation

This passive verb means to be troubled, disturbed, or thrown into confusion—particularly inner agitation. Luke 1:29 describes Mary who 'was deeply troubled' at the angel's greeting. The term suggests more than mild concern—significant disturbance or perplexity. Classical usage included being disturbed by life's changes. The emotional/psychological disturbance or confusion is the focus.

(1×) To be deeply troubled or inwardly disturbed, experiencing significant perplexity or agitation. Mary's response to Gabriel's greeting (Luke 1:29) involved being 'troubled'—not merely surprised but deeply perplexed and disturbed by both the appearance and the words. The aorist passive suggests sudden onset of this troubled state. Translations recognize the depth of disturbance beyond casual surprise. TROUBLING AND DISTURBING

en: she-was-troubled | es: se-turbó | fr: être-troublé | de: διεταράχθη Luke 1:29

διατάσσω G1299 V-AIM-3S (16×)

Command or give orders; appoint or designate to a role; arrange or set in proper order.

The Greek verb diatasso conveys authority exercised through structured instruction — not the raw bark of a military order, but the deliberate disposition of affairs by someone with the right to do so. Jesus diatasso-commands his disciples before sending them out (Matt 11:1), Paul diatasso-arranges church practice in Corinth (1 Cor 11:34), and the Law was diatasso-ordained through angels (Gal 3:19). Spanish ordenar, French ordonner, and German anordnen all preserve the double register of 'command' and 'arrange,' reflecting the verb's classical heritage where a general both issues orders and disposes troops in formation. The through-prefix dia- adds a sense of thoroughness: these are not casual suggestions but comprehensive directives.

1. command, order, direct (12×) To command, order, or give a directive — instructing someone authoritatively what to do or how to act. This primary sense (12 occurrences) spans Jesus commanding that the girl be given food (Luke 8:55), servants doing what they were ordered (Luke 17:9-10), Moses receiving instructions about the tabernacle (Acts 7:44), and Paul directing churches on collections (1 Cor 16:1). Spanish ordenar, French ordonner, and German anordnen converge on formal directive vocabulary. The dia- prefix suggests exhaustive, point-by-point instruction. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

en: I-command, I-directed, commanded | es: haber-ordenado, habiendo-ordenado, ordenadas | fr: ordonner | de: anordnen, ordnet-an Matt 11:1; Luke 8:55; Luke 17:9; Luke 17:10; Acts 7:44

2. appoint, designate (2×) To appoint or designate someone or something to a particular status, role, or arrangement. Two occurrences carry this institutional shade: John the Baptist telling tax collectors to collect no more than what was 'appointed' for them (Luke 3:13), and Paul declaring the Law was 'ordained' through angels by a mediator (Gal 3:19). Spanish ordenada/ordenado, French ordonne, and German anordnen here shade from 'command' toward 'establish,' reflecting the classical usage of diatasso for constituting offices and regulations. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

en: having-been-appointed, having-been-ordered | es: ordenada, ordenado | fr: ordonner | de: anordnen, ordnet-an Luke 3:13; Gal 3:19

3. arrange, set in order (2×) To arrange or set things in proper order — organizing affairs so that everything falls into its right place. Two occurrences: Paul promises to 'set in order' the remaining matters when he arrives in Corinth (1 Cor 11:34), and he makes travel arrangements at Assos for the journey ahead (Acts 20:13). Spanish ordenaré and English 'set in order' both capture the organizational rather than imperative force. This sense connects to the verb's classical use for marshaling troops into formation — everything disposed according to plan. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

en: I-will-set-in-order, having-arranged | es: habiendo-ordenado, ordenaré | fr: ordonner | de: anordnen, ordnet-an Acts 20:13; 1Cor 11:34

διατελ-έω G1300 V-PIA-2P (1×)

to continue, persist; to remain in a state or continue doing something

This verb means to continue, persist, or carry through to completion. Acts 27:33 has Paul note that 'you continue fasting' (waiting without food). Classical usage included completing time periods, continuing in states, or persevering in actions. The durative, continuing aspect —remaining in a condition or persisting in activity—characterizes this term.

(1×) To continue in a state or persist in an activity over time. Paul's observation in Acts 27:33 that 'you continue waiting without taking food' highlights sustained fasting during the storm crisis—they had persisted in this anxious, foodless state. The present tense emphasizes ongoing continuation. Translations recognize the durative persistence in a condition or activity. CONTINUITY AND STILL en: you-continue | es: continuáis | fr: parvenir | de: διατελεῖτε Acts 27:33

διατηρ-έω G1301 V-IIA-3S (2×)

to keep carefully, treasure; to observe and preserve something faithfully

This verb means to watch over carefully, keep safe, or treasure something valuable. Luke uses it for Mary 'treasuring' all the words about Jesus in her heart (2:51), while Acts employs it for the apostolic decree that Gentile believers should keep themselves from certain practices (15:29). The prefix 'dia-' suggests thoroughness—keeping through and through, maintaining carefully over time. The term implies both protective custody and faithful observance. Spanish 'guardaba' (was keeping/treasuring) and French 'garder' (keep/guard) capture this sense of careful preservation, whether of memories or commands. The word suggests vigilant, ongoing care rather than casual retention.

(2×) Two distinct but related uses: Mary 'treasuring' all these sayings in her heart (Luke 2:51: Spanish 'guardaba,' German 'διετήρει'), preserving them carefully, and the apostolic instruction to 'keep yourselves' from certain practices (Acts 15:29: Spanish 'guardándoos,' French 'garder'). Both emphasize careful, faithful preservation —whether of precious memories or important commands. GUARDING AND KEEPING en: keeping, was-treasuring | es: guardaba, guardándoos | fr: garder | de: διατηροῦντες, διετήρει Luke 2:51; Acts 15:29

δια τί G1302

why? for what reason? wherefore?

An interrogative phrase (written as two words: διὰ τί) meaning 'why?' or 'for what reason?' The construction literally asks 'on account of what?' using the preposition διὰ with the interrogative pronoun τί. It introduces questions seeking explanation, cause, or rationale for an action or state of affairs. The phrase functions as a standard way to inquire about reasons or purposes, appearing frequently in dialogue and rhetorical questions throughout Greek literature.

διατίθημι G1303 V-FIM-1S (7×)

To make or establish a covenant/testament; to assign, appoint, or bequeath something to someone.

Diatithemai is one of the New Testament's most theologically loaded verbs, built from dia- ('through') and tithemai ('to place, arrange'), literally meaning to dispose or arrange things deliberately. In five of its seven occurrences, it carries the technical, covenantal sense of 'making' or 'establishing' a covenant — the diatheke from which it derives its force. God tells Israel 'I will make a new covenant' (Heb 8:10; 10:16, quoting Jeremiah 31), Peter reminds Jerusalem of 'the covenant which God made with your fathers' (Acts 3:25), and the Hebrews argument turns on the fact that where a testament exists, the death of the one who made it must be established (Heb 9:16-17). Spanish pactar, French disposer, and German verordnen all reach for legal-contractual vocabulary. But at the Last Supper, Jesus uses the verb in a distinct, royal sense: 'I assign to you, just as my Father assigned to me, a kingdom' (Luke 22:29). Here the verb shifts from covenant-making to sovereign bestowal — a king granting dominion to his heirs.

1. make/establish a covenant (5×) To make, establish, or ratify a covenant or testament — the technical covenantal sense used in the middle voice for the solemn act of covenant-making between God and his people. Five occurrences anchor this sense: God declares 'I will make (diathesomai) a new covenant with the house of Israel' (Heb 8:10; 10:16), Peter invokes 'the covenant God made (dietheto) with your fathers' (Acts 3:25), and the argument of Hebrews 9:16-17 depends on the principle that a testament requires the death of the one 'who made it' (diathemenos). Spanish pactar/disponer, French disposer/ordonner, and German verordnen all deploy legal-contractual vocabulary. The noun diatheke ('covenant, testament') derives from this very verb, and the theological weight is immense: this is the word for God binding himself to his people. COVENANT AGREEMENT

en: I-will-make, having-made-it, made | es: dispuso, pactaré, que-hizo-testamento | fr: disposer, ordonner | de: verordnen, διέθετο Acts 3:25; Heb 8:10; Heb 9:16; Heb 9:17; Heb 10:16

2. assign, appoint, grant (2×) To assign, appoint, or bequeath something to someone — a royal or testamentary sense of conferring authority, dominion, or inheritance. The two occurrences both fall in Luke 22:29, where Jesus says at the Last Supper: 'I assign (diatithemai) to you, just as my Father assigned (dietheto) to me, a kingdom.' Spanish dispongo/dispuso, French disposer, and German verleihen capture the sovereign bestowal. The shift from sense 1 is subtle but real: this is not the bilateral establishment of a covenant but the unilateral granting of royal prerogative from Father to Son and from Son to disciples. The echo of inheritance law remains — a king disposing of his estate — but the emphasis falls on gift and appointment rather than mutual obligation. APPOINTING AND ORDAINING

en: assign, assigned | es: dispongo, dispuso | fr: disposer | de: διέθετό, διατίθεμαι Luke 22:29

διατρίβω G1304 V-AIA-1P (9×)

To stay, remain, or spend time in a place; to sojourn or tarry.

In classical Greek this verb originally meant 'to rub hard' or 'wear away,' but by the Hellenistic period it had shifted entirely to 'spend time' or 'stay in a place.' Every NT occurrence appears in John or Acts, always describing someone remaining or sojourning somewhere for a period. Jesus stays with his disciples in the Judean countryside (John 3:22), Paul and Barnabas remain at Antioch (Acts 14:28; 15:35), and Herod withdraws to Caesarea (Acts 12:19). The Spanish 'permaneciendo' and French 'séjourner' both highlight the extended, settled quality of the stay.

stay, remain, spend time (9×) To stay, remain, or spend time in a place, typically for an extended period. The classical sense of 'rubbing away' or 'consuming time' has fully evolved into a locational meaning in the NT. All nine occurrences are in John and Acts: Jesus sojourning in Judea (John 3:22), Paul and Barnabas staying at various cities during missionary journeys (Acts 14:3, 14:28, 15:35, 16:12, 20:6, 25:6, 25:14). Spanish 'permaneciendo' ('remaining') and French 'séjourner' ('to sojourn') both emphasize the settled, unhurried character of this staying. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Having-stayed, he-was-spending-time, he-was-staying | es: Habiendo-permanecido, pasaba-tiempo, permaneciendo | fr: demeurer, séjourner | de: verbringt-Zeit, verweilen John 3:22; Acts 12:19; Acts 14:3; Acts 14:28; Acts 15:35

διατροφή G1305 N-AFP (1×)

food, sustenance, provisions; the means of physical nourishment and support

This noun denotes sustenance, provisions, or means of support—food and necessities. 1 Timothy 6:8 advocates contentment with 'food and clothing.' Classical usage included support for monsters or means of subsistence. The focus is on basic provisions necessary for life, particularly food. The plural form emphasizes various foods or ongoing provisions.

(1×) Food and sustenance, the basic provisions necessary for physical life and support. Paul's instruction about contentment (1 Tim 6:8) identifies 'food' (plural: provisions, foods) and covering as sufficient for godly living. The term emphasizes not luxury but basic sustenance—what is needed to maintain life. The translations converge on food/nourishment as the core material provision in view. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

en: food | es: alimentos | fr: διατροφὰς | de: Nahrung 1Tim 6:8

διαυγ-άζω G1306 V-ASA-3S (2×)

to shine through, dawn; to be transparent or translucent (passive)

This verb means to shine through or gleam, with related senses of dawning and transparency. Peter urges readers to heed prophecy until the day 'dawns' and the morning star rises (2 Peter 1:19), while Revelation describes the New Jerusalem's street of gold being 'transparent' as glass (21:21). The root idea is light passing through —whether dawn breaking through darkness or light shining through clear material. The semantic range spans temporal (dawning) and material (transparency) applications of the same core concept. Spanish 'amanezca' (dawn) and 'transparente' (transparent) show these two distinct applications, while German 'durchsichtig' emphasizes the 'through-shining' at the word's core.

(2×) Two remarkably different applications of the same root idea of shining-through: the eschatological day 'dawning' with the morning star (2 Peter 1:19: Spanish 'amanezca'), and the New Jerusalem's gold street being 'transparent' as glass (Revelation 21:21: Spanish 'transparente,' German 'durchsichtig'). Both involve light passing through—whether dawn through darkness or light through translucent material. SHINING AND ILLUMINATING en: dawns, transparent | es: amanezca, transparente. | fr: durchsichtig | de: durchsichtig 2Pet 1:19; Rev 21:21

διαφαν-ής G1307
transparent, translucent, see-through; manifest, clear, conspicuous; red-hot An adjective describing things through which light passes or which are clearly visible. Physical applications include transparent or translucent materials like glass through which one can see. It can describe something heated until red-hot and glowing. Metaphorically, it extends to things that are manifest, clear, or distinct—not hidden or obscure. Medical texts use it for veins that are distinctly visible. Another sense identifies things that are conspicuous or prominent among others. The unifying thread is visibility: either light passing through something, or something being clearly apparent.

διαφέρω G1308 V-PIA-2P (13×)
To carry through, differ, surpass in value; also to matter or be of concern
A remarkably versatile Greek verb, διαφέρω literally means 'carry through' but branches into several distinct uses in the New Testament. Jesus employs it memorably in the Sermon on the Mount: 'Are you not worth more than the birds?' (Matt 6:26) — here the verb measures comparative value. Acts uses it for the physical spreading of God's word through a region (13:49) and for a ship driven helplessly by a storm (27:27). Paul then deploys it for theological distinction (1 Cor 15:41, stars differing in glory) and for rhetorical dismissal — 'whatever they were makes no difference to me' (Gal 2:6).

1. be worth more, surpass (7×) To be worth more than, to surpass or excel in value. This is the dominant New Testament sense, appearing in Jesus' comparisons of human worth against birds (Matt 6:26; 10:31; Luke 12:7, 24) and against sheep (Matt 12:12). Spanish 'valéis' ('you are worth') and German 'unterscheidet' capture the evaluative force. The rhetorical punch depends on the gap between what is compared: if God cares for sparrows, how much more — how greatly you 'surpass' them — does he care for you. SURPASS DIFFER MATTER en: are-worth, differing, differs | es: difiere, que-difieren, valéis | fr: différer, être-supérieur | de: sich-unterscheiden, unterscheidet Matt 6:26; Matt 10:31; Matt 12:12; Luke 12:7; Luke 12:24

2. carry through, spread abroad (3×) The literal, physical sense: to carry or bear from one place to another, to be spread or driven along. In Mark 11:16 Jesus forbids anyone carrying vessels through the temple; Acts 13:49 describes the word of the Lord being 'carried through' the whole region; Acts 27:27 pictures a ship 'driven about' in the Adriatic. Spanish 'siendo llevados' ('being carried') and 'era difundida' ('was being spread') distinguish the passive dispersion (Acts) from the active prohibition against carrying (Mark). SURPASS DIFFER MATTER en: being-driven, should-carry, was-being-carried | es: era-difundida, llevara, siendo-llevados | fr: différer, être-supérieur | de: sich-unterscheiden, unterscheidet Mark 11:16; Acts 13:49; Acts 27:27

3. differ, be different (2×) To differ, be distinct, or vary from something else. Paul uses this in 1 Corinthians 15:41 — 'star differs from star in glory' — and in Galatians 4:1, where an heir who is a child 'differs nothing' from a slave. The sense is qualitative distinction without necessarily implying superiority. French 'différer' and German 'sich unterscheiden' ('to distinguish oneself') map this meaning precisely, emphasizing distinguishable characteristics rather than ranked value. SURPASS DIFFER MATTER en: differs, he-differs | es: difiere | fr: différer, être-supérieur | de: sich-unterscheiden 1Cor 15:41; Gal 4:1

4. matter, be of concern (1×) To matter, be of importance or concern. Galatians 2:6 provides the sole New Testament instance: 'whatever they were makes no difference to me — God shows no partiality.' Spanish 'importa' ('it matters') captures the impersonal construction. This sense develops naturally from the comparative meaning: if something 'differs' enough to warrant attention, it 'matters.' Paul's pointed use dismisses human credentials as irrelevant before God's impartial judgment. SURPASS DIFFER MATTER en: it-matters | es: importa | fr: être-supérieur | de: sich-unterscheiden Gal 2:6

δια-φεύγω G1309 V-ASA-3S (1×)
to escape, get away; to flee successfully from danger or captivity
This verb means to escape, get away from, or flee successfully. Acts 27:42 describes soldiers' plan to kill prisoners lest any 'might escape' by swimming. Classical usage included escaping danger, surviving illness, or slipping from notice. The successful evasion or escape from threat, captivity, or danger is the central concept.

(1×) To escape or get away from captivity or danger, successfully fleeing. The soldiers' fear in Acts 27:42 was that prisoners 'might escape' during the shipwreck by swimming to shore—a capital offense for guards who lost prisoners. The aorist subjunctive expresses potential escape, the possibility the soldiers wanted to prevent by execution. Translations uniformly recognize successful evasion as the concern. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT en: might-escape | es: escapara | fr: échapper | de: διαφύγῃ Acts 27:42

διαφημίζω G1310 V-AIA-3P (3×)
to spread abroad, publish widely, make known throughout a region
This verb means to spread news abroad, make something widely known, or publish throughout a region. In the Gospels, despite Jesus' instructions to remain silent, healed individuals 'spread the news' about Him everywhere. The term suggests enthusiastic, uncontrolled dissemination—the good news is too wonderful to contain. Even when disciples disobey Jesus' command to silence, their disobedience serves the larger purpose of making His works known. The verb captures both the literal spreading of information and the unstoppable nature of testimony about transforming encounters with Jesus.

(3×) Matthew 9:31 records that the two blind men whose sight was restored 'spread the news about him throughout all that region.' Matthew 28:15 notes the soldiers 'spread' the fabricated story about the disciples stealing Jesus' body. Mark 1:45 records that the cleansed leper 'went out and began to spread the news widely' despite Jesus' charge to tell no one. The multilingual glosses show the diffusion concept—Spanish 'difundir/difundieron,' French 'répandre,' German 'verbreiten.' The contexts show both faithful testimony (the healed) and deliberate deception (the soldiers) being actively spread. POURING AND SHEDDING en: spread-the-news, to-spread, was-spread-abroad | es: a-difundir, difundieron, fue-divulgada | fr: répandre | de: verbreiten, διεφήμισαν, διεφημίσθη Matt 9:31; Matt 28:15; Mark 1:45

διαφθείρω G1311 V-AIP-3P (6×)
To destroy, corrupt, ruin; to cause utter destruction or moral/physical decay.
Covers a broad range from physical destruction to moral corruption and organic decay—the common thread being thorough ruin. The prefix dia- intensifies the base phtheiro ('destroy, corrupt'), yielding a sense of complete, penetrating devastation. Paul contrasts the outward body that 'is wasting away' with the inner person being renewed daily (2 Cor 4:16), using the passive for the slow decay of mortal flesh. In 1 Timothy 6:5, people with 'corrupted minds' are morally ruined. Revelation deploys the active for catastrophic destruction: a third of the ships are destroyed (Rev 8:9), and God will 'destroy those who destroy the earth' (Rev 11:18)—a striking play on the word's active and participial forms. Spanish distinguishes 'destruir' (destroy) from 'corrompidos' (corrupted), mirroring the physical-moral polarity within this single lexeme.

destroy, corrupt, ruin (6×) To destroy utterly, corrupt, or cause to decay—encompassing physical ruin, moral corruption, and bodily deterioration. The passive in 2 Cor 4:16 describes the gradual 'wasting away' of the outer person, while 1 Tim 6:5 applies it to minds depraved and morally ruined. In Revelation the active voice depicts catastrophic destruction: a third of ships destroyed (Rev 8:9) and the eschatological promise that God will 'destroy those who destroy the earth' (Rev 11:18). Moths and vermin 'destroy' stored treasures in Luke 12:33. Spanish 'destruir' and 'corrompidos' capture the physical-moral range, while French 'corrompre' and 'détruire' likewise confirm the dual axis of corruption and annihilation. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

en: destroying, destroys, is-decaying | es: de-corrompidos, destruir, destruye | fr: corrompre, détruire | de: verderben, διαφθείρει Luke 12:33; 2Cor 4:16; 1Tim 6:5; Rev 8:9; Rev 11:18

διαφθορ-ά G1312 N-AFS (6×)

Corruption, decay, decomposition; the physical rotting of a body, especially in the context of resurrection theology.

A noun denoting physical decomposition—the rotting of organic matter, especially a human corpse in the grave. All six New Testament occurrences cluster in Acts, where Peter and Paul both quote Psalm 16:10 ('You will not let your Holy One see corruption') to argue for Christ's resurrection. Peter's Pentecost sermon contrasts David, whose body did see decay, with Jesus, whose flesh was preserved from decomposition (Acts 2:27, 31). Paul's sermon in Pisidian Antioch makes the same argument: God raised Jesus before his body could undergo diaphthora, whereas David 'fell asleep, was laid with his fathers, and saw corruption' (Acts 13:34-37). The word thus becomes a technical term in early Christian apologetics for bodily resurrection. Spanish 'corrupción' and French 'corruption' both derive from Latin corruptio, preserving the same concrete sense of organic decay.

corruption, decay, decomposition (6×) Physical decomposition or decay of a dead body in the grave, used as a theological term in resurrection arguments. Peter at Pentecost quotes Psalm 16:10 to declare that God did not allow Jesus' flesh to 'see corruption' (Acts 2:27, 31), contrasting Christ's incorruptible body with David's mortal remains. Paul repeats the argument at Pisidian Antioch, distinguishing the risen Christ who 'did not see decay' from David who 'saw corruption' after death (Acts 13:34-37). Spanish 'corrupción,' French 'corruption,' and German equivalents all carry the concrete sense of organic decomposition, confirming the physical rather than merely moral meaning in these contexts. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

en: corruption, decay | es: corrupción | fr: corruption | de: διαφθοράν Acts 2:27; Acts 2:31; Acts 13:34; Acts 13:35; Acts 13:36

διάφορ-ος G1313 Adj-ANP (4×)

diaphoros – different, varying; in comparative form: superior, more excellent

Diaphoros (from diaphero, 'to carry through, to differ') means 'different' or 'varying,' and in its comparative form (diaphoroteros) takes on the sense 'more excellent, superior.' In the New Testament it bridges both registers. Romans 12:6 speaks of gifts differing (diaphora) according to grace; Hebrews 9:10 mentions various (diaphorois) washings. But in Hebrews 1:4 and 8:6 the comparative form elevates the meaning: Christ has inherited a more excellent name and mediates a more excellent covenant. Spanish diversos/de mas excelente and French different/divers capture this dual register of mere variety and qualitative superiority.

(4×) Different, various, or diverse – describing things that differ from one another in kind or character. In Rom 12:6 spiritual gifts are said to be diaphora ('differing') according to grace given, and Heb 9:10 speaks of various ritual washings. Spanish diversos and French divers reflect this sense of multiplicity and variety within a set, where the emphasis falls on distinction rather than ranking among the items described. CHANGE AND EXCHANGE

en: different, more-excellent, various | es: de-más-excelente, diferentes, diversos | fr: différent, divers | de: verschieden Rom 12:6; Heb 1:4; Heb 8:6; Heb 9:10

διαφῠλάσσω G1314 V-ANA (1×)

to guard carefully, protect; to watch over and preserve from harm

This intensive compound verb means to guard carefully, watch closely, or protect diligently. Luke 4:10 quotes Psalm 91, promising that God will 'guard' or protect the faithful. Classical usage included guarding cities, observing laws carefully, or providential care. The careful, protective watching—not casual observation but vigilant guarding—characterizes this term.

(1×) To guard carefully or protect diligently, providing watchful care and preservation from harm. The psalm quotation in Luke 4:10 (used in the temptation narrative) promises that angels will 'guard you' carefully in all your ways. The infinitive expresses divine purpose—God commands angels to provide protective care. Translations recognize the vigilant, protective guarding implied. GUARDING AND KEEPING en: to-guard | es: guardarte | fr: garder | de: διαφυλάξαι Luke 4:10

διαχειρ-ίζω G1315 V-AIM-2P (2×)

to kill, slay; to lay hands on someone to destroy them (middle voice)

This verb in middle voice means to lay hands on someone violently, specifically to kill or slay them. Both Acts occurrences involve apostolic martyrdom: Peter recounting how the Jews 'killed' Jesus (5:30), and Paul's enemies attempting to 'kill' him in the temple (26:21). The middle voice suggests direct, personal action—laying one's own hands on the victim. The term originally meant to manage or handle, but in hostile contexts it specifically means to lay violent hands on someone with intent to destroy. Spanish 'matasteis' (you killed) and French 'mettre à mort' (put to death) capture the violent, lethal nature of this action.

(2×) Both instances in Acts refer to attempted or accomplished killing: the Jewish leaders who 'killed' Jesus by hanging him on a tree (Acts 5:30: Spanish 'matasteis'), and Paul's enemies trying to 'kill' him in the temple (Acts 26:21: French 'mettre à mort'). The middle voice emphasizes the direct, personal nature of laying hands on someone to destroy them. KILLING AND REMOVING en: killed, to-kill | es: matar, matasteis | fr: mettre-à-mort | de: διαχειρίσασθαι, διεχειρίσασθε Acts 5:30; Acts 26:21

διαχωρ-ίζω G1316 V-PNM/P (1×)

to separate, depart; to move apart or be divided from others

This middle/passive verb means to separate, part, or depart from. Luke 9:33 describes Peter speaking as Moses and Elijah 'were departing' from Jesus after the transfiguration. The term can indicate voluntary separation or being separated. The action of moving apart, creating distance or division, is central to this verb's meaning.

(1×) To separate, depart, or move apart from someone or something. Peter's ill-timed suggestion about building shelters (Luke 9:33) came as Moses and Elijah 'were departing' (middle/passive infinitive) from Jesus—the heavenly visitors beginning to separate from the earthly scene. The translations recognize the separating, parting movement away from companionship or proximity. SEPARATING AND DIVIDING

en: departing | es: separarse | fr: se-séparer | de: διαχωρίζεσθαι Luke 9:33

δῐδακ-τικός G1317 Adj-AMS (2×)

skillful at teaching, able to teach; qualified and gifted for instruction

This adjective describes someone apt or skilled at teaching—a natural or developed ability to instruct others. Paul uses it twice in the Pastoral Epistles as a qualification for church leadership: an overseer must be 'able to teach' (1 Timothy 3:2), and the Lord's servant must be 'apt at teaching' (2 Timothy 2:24). The term goes beyond mere knowledge to indicate teaching skill or gift. It combines 'didactic' (teaching) with a suffix indicating aptitude or fitness. The translations 'apt to teach' (English) and 'apto para enseñar' (Spanish) preserve this sense of natural or cultivated teaching ability as a character qualification for ministry leadership.

(2×) Appears exclusively in Pastoral Epistles as a leadership qualification: the overseer must be 'able to teach' (1 Timothy 3:2), and the Lord's servant must not be quarrelsome but 'apt at teaching' (2 Timothy 2:24: Spanish 'apto para enseñar,' German 'lehrfaehig'). Both contexts emphasize teaching aptitude as a necessary character trait for spiritual leadership, not just knowledge but the skill to instruct. TEACHING AND LEARNING

en: able-to-teach | es: apto-para-enseñar | fr: διδακτικόν | de: lehrfaehig 1Tim 3:2; 2Tim 2:24

δῐδακ-τός G1318 Adj-DMP (3×)

taught, instructed, learned through teaching rather than innate or natural

This adjective describes what is taught, learned through instruction, or imparted by teaching rather than being innate or natural. It can apply to things that have been taught (learned facts, skills) or to persons who have been instructed. In John's Gospel, Jesus quotes Isaiah: 'They shall all be taught by God'—divine instruction is promised as a characteristic of the new covenant. Paul contrasts words taught by human wisdom with those 'taught by the Spirit.' The term distinguishes between what is acquired through teaching and what might be self-evident, natural, or inspired without instruction.

(3×) John 6:45 quotes Isaiah 54:13: 'And they shall all be taught by God'—this teaching by God characterizes those who come to Jesus. 1 Corinthians 2:13 (appearing twice) contrasts 'words taught by human wisdom' with spiritual truths 'taught by the Spirit.' The multilingual evidence is direct—English 'taught/taught by,' Spanish 'enseñadas/enseñados,' French 'enseigné,' German 'gelehrt.' The John passage emphasizes divine pedagogy as prerequisite for recognizing Jesus, while Paul insists that spiritual realities require Spirit-taught words, not merely human rhetoric or philosophy. Truth requires appropriate teaching. TEACHING AND LEARNING

en: taught, taught-by | es: enseñadas, enseñados | fr: enseigné | de: gelehrt John 6:45; 1Cor 2:13

δῐδασκᾰλ-ία G1319 N-AFP (21×)

Teaching, instruction, doctrine; the act or content of authoritative instruction in the church.

Covers both the activity of teaching and the body of doctrine taught. Jesus warns against human commandments masquerading as divine 'teaching' (Matt 15:9 = Mark 7:7, quoting Isa 29:13). Paul uses the term for sound doctrinal instruction that builds up the church (Rom 12:7; 1 Tim 4:13, 16; 2 Tim 3:16) and contrasts it sharply with the 'teachings of demons' that lead astray (1 Tim 4:1). The Pastoral Epistles are especially dense with this word, reflecting their concern for doctrinal fidelity. French 'enseignement' and German 'Lehre' both preserve the dual sense of teaching-as-act and teaching-as-content.

teaching, instruction, doctrine (21×) The act, content, or body of authoritative instruction and doctrine. In the Synoptics it appears in Jesus' rebuke of human traditions elevated to the status of divine teaching (Matt 15:9; Mark 7:7). Paul uses it for the edifying instruction that sustains the church (Rom 12:7; 15:4) and for the sound doctrine to which Timothy must hold fast (1 Tim 4:13, 16; 2 Tim 3:16), as opposed to deceitful teachings (Eph 4:14; 1 Tim 4:1). Glosses – 'teaching/instruction' (eng), 'enseñanza' (spa), 'enseignement' (fra), 'Lehre' (deu) – confirm a unified semantic range spanning both the process and the product of instruction. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: instruction, teaching, teachings | es: enseñanza, enseñanzas | fr: enseignement | de: Lehre, διδασκαλίας Matt 15:9; Mark 7:7; Rom 12:7; Rom 15:4; Eph 4:14

δῐδάσκᾰλ-ος G1320 N-NMP (59×)

Teacher, instructor — one who teaches with authority; used as a respectful title for Jesus and for teachers in the church.

Didaskalos is the standard Greek word for a teacher or instructor, carrying overtones of recognized authority and expertise. In classical usage it could denote a chorus-trainer or schoolmaster, but in the New Testament it functions overwhelmingly as a title of respect. It is applied to Jesus more than forty times — by disciples, inquirers, and opponents alike (Matt 8:19; 12:38; Mark 4:38; John 3:2) — and the evangelist John explicitly equates it with the Hebrew Rabbi (John 1:38). Paul lists 'teachers' among the foundational gifts to the church (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:11), while James warns that 'not many of you should become teachers' given their stricter judgment (Jas 3:1). Spanish maestro, French maitre, and German Lehrer all preserve the authoritative connotation.

teacher, instructor (59×) A teacher or instructor, especially one who teaches with authority in a religious or communal setting. Applied to Jesus as a title of respect equivalent to Rabbi (Matt 8:19; Mark 4:38; John 1:38; 3:2), and to authoritative figures in the early church — apostles, prophets, and teachers forming a foundational triad (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:11; Jas 3:1). Spanish maestro, French maitre, and German Lehrer all carry the same dual note of expertise and authority. TEACHING AND LEARNING en: Teacher, teacher | es: Maestro, maestro | fr: maître | de: Lehrer Matt 8:19; Matt 9:11; Matt 10:24; Matt 10:25; Matt 12:38

δῐδάσκω G1321 V-PIA-2S (97×)

To teach or instruct; in the passive, to be taught or receive instruction from another.

Didaskō is the central New Testament verb for teaching and instruction, describing the authoritative impartation of knowledge, doctrine, or ethical guidance. Jesus teaches in synagogues, on hillsides, and by the sea (Matt 4:23; 5:2), and the crowds marvel because he teaches 'as one having authority' (Matt 7:29). The apostles continue this ministry in the early church. A smaller but significant passive strand highlights reception of teaching — Paul insists he was not taught his gospel by any human (Gal 1:12), and believers are reminded of what they were taught (Eph 4:21; Col 2:7). Spanish enseñar, French enseigner, and German lehren all preserve the active-passive distinction consistently.

1. teach, instruct actively (92×) Active teaching and instruction — the deliberate impartation of knowledge, doctrine, or practical wisdom to others. This dominant sense covers Jesus' public ministry (Matt 4:23; 7:29), apostolic teaching in churches, and general didactic activity. All major translation languages render it consistently: Spanish enseñando, French enseigner, German lehren. The emphasis falls on the teacher's authoritative act of communicating truth. TEACHING AND LEARNING

en: teaching | es: enseñando | fr: enseigner | de: lehren, lehrt Matt 4:23; Matt 5:2; Matt 7:29; Matt 9:35; Matt 11:1

2. be taught, receive instruction (5×) Passive reception of instruction — being taught or having received teaching from another. Paul's emphatic declaration that he was not taught (edidachthēn) his gospel by any human but by revelation (Gal 1:12) anchors this sense. Ephesians 4:21 and 2 Thessalonians 2:15 remind believers of doctrines they 'were taught.' The passive voice shifts focus from teacher to learner, highlighting the dependence of the recipient on the source of instruction. TEACHING AND LEARNING

en: they-were-taught, was-I-taught, you-were-taught | es: fueron-instruidos, fui-enseñado, fuisteis-enseñados | fr: enseigner | de: lehren, lehrt Matt 28:15; Gal 1:12; Eph 4:21; Col 2:7; 2Thess 2:15

δῐδᾰχή G1322 N-DFP (30×)

Teaching, doctrine; the content or act of authoritative instruction, especially the teachings of Jesus or the apostles.

Didache denotes both the act of teaching and the substance of what is taught. The crowds are astonished at Jesus' didache because he teaches 'as one having authority' (Matt 7:28, Mark 1:22). It is used of the apostolic teaching in Acts 2:42 and of doctrinal content that can be sound or corrupt (Rom 16:17, 2 John 9-10). Spanish distinguishes 'doctrina' (content) from 'ensenanza' (activity), but the Greek term spans both. German 'Lehre' similarly covers teaching-as-content and teaching-as-practice. The word appears prominently in the early church's vocabulary for the transmitted body of Christian instruction.

teaching, doctrine (30×) Authoritative instruction or doctrine, covering both the activity of teaching and the body of content conveyed. When applied to Jesus (Matt 7:28, Mark 1:27), it highlights the striking authority of his teaching compared to the scribes. In Acts 2:42, it names one of the four pillars of early church life. Paul warns against didache that deviates from the apostolic standard (Rom 16:17). The breadth of the term—from classroom act to creedal substance—is confirmed by its varied multilingual renderings. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-teaching, teaching | es: doctrina, enseñanza | fr: doctrine, enseignement | de: Lehre Matt 7:28; Matt 16:12; Matt 22:33; Mark 1:22; Mark 1:27

δῖδραχμ-ος G1323 N-ANP (2×)

two-drachma coin; the half-shekel temple tax paid annually by Jewish males

This noun refers to a Greek coin worth two drachmas, equivalent to the Jewish half-shekel. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in Matthew 17:24, where temple tax collectors ask Peter whether Jesus pays the 'two-drachma' tax. The question is asked twice in the same verse, giving us both occurrences. This tax was the annual temple contribution required of Jewish males based on Exodus 30:13. The terminology reflects the multilingual reality of first-century Judea, where Greek coinage terms were used for Jewish religious obligations. The resulting miracle story (Jesus directing Peter to find the tax money in a fish's mouth) addresses both the obligation and Jesus' unique relationship to the temple.

(2×) Both occurrences are in Matthew 17:24, where tax collectors approach Peter asking about Jesus paying 'the two-drachmas' (temple tax). The doubled reference in a single verse emphasizes the specific amount in question—the half-shekel temple tax that every adult Jewish male was expected to pay annually. The context sets up Jesus' teaching about sons being free from temple obligations. SILVER AND MONEY

en: two-drachmas | es: las-dos-dracmas | fr: didrachme | de: δίδραχμα Matt 17:24

δίδῡμος G1324 N-NMS (3×)

Didymus, a Greek name meaning 'twin' used as a designation for the apostle Thomas

The Greek name Didymus functions as a translation or explanatory designation for Thomas, one of the twelve apostles. The name derives from δίδυμος meaning 'twin,' and appears in John's gospel whenever Thomas is introduced or reintroduced to readers. This bilingual naming practice reflects the mixed linguistic context of first-century Judea, where both Aramaic (Thomas) and Greek names coexisted.

(3×) Used exclusively as a personal designation for the apostle Thomas in John's Gospel (11:16, 20:24, 21:2). The consistent pairing 'Thomas called Didymus' shows the evangelist explaining the Aramaic name for Greek-speaking readers. Both names mean 'twin,' making this a direct translation rather than a separate name. The multilingual evidence (Spanish Dídymos, French Didyme, German Didymus) preserves the Greek transliteration, reflecting its function as a proper name in the narrative. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Didumos, Twin | es: Dídymos | fr: Didyme | de: Didymus John 11:16; John 20:24; John 21:2

δίδωμι G1325 V-PIA-3P (416×)

To give, bestow, grant; passively, to be given; by extension, to put/place, yield/produce, or hand over/surrender.

Didomi is the New Testament's fundamental verb of giving — appearing 416 times and covering the entire arc from God giving his only Son (John 3:16) to a cup of cold water given to a little one (Matt 10:42). Its theological weight is immense: nearly every major doctrine of grace, authority, revelation, and salvation is expressed through this verb. Yet it also retains earthy, concrete extensions — putting laws into hearts (Heb 8:10), the earth yielding its fruit (Mark 4:8), and the sea giving up its dead (Rev 20:13). Languages handle the range consistently: Arabic a'ta, Korean juda, Swahili -pa, Spanish dar, and German geben all serve as their primary transfer-of-possession verbs. The passive forms carry special theological force, since 'it has been given to you to know the mysteries of the kingdom' (Matt 13:11) implies a divine Giver without naming him — the classic divine passive.

1. give, bestow (336×) The core active sense: to give, bestow, or hand something to someone. At 336 occurrences, this encompasses the vast majority of the word's usage — God giving authority (Matt 10:1), Jesus giving bread to the disciples (Matt 14:19), a master distributing talents to servants (Matt 25:15), and the simple act of handing over a cup (Matt 26:27). Arabic a'ta, Korean juda, Spanish dio, German gab, and Swahili -pa all converge on their primary transfer verbs. The range of objects given is extraordinary: authority, grace, peace, signs, the Holy Spirit, eternal life, bread, money, a name, glory — making this sense the semantic backbone of New Testament soteriology and Christology alike. GIVING AND BESTOWING

en: gave, he-gave | es: dio, lo-dio | fr: donner | de: geben, gibt Matt 10:1; Matt 14:19; Matt 21:23; Matt 25:15; Matt 26:27

2. be given, be granted (70×) Passive voice: to be given, be granted, be bestowed upon. Found 70 times, these forms shift the grammatical focus to the recipient and frequently employ the divine passive — where God is the unstated agent. 'To you it has been given to know the mysteries' (Matt 13:11), 'it was given to him to make war' (Rev 13:7), and 'every good gift is given from above' (Jas 1:17, alluding to didomi). Spanish fue dada/dado, Korean ju-eo-jyeotta (passive form), and Arabic u'tiya all select dedicated passive constructions. The theological import is that the recipients are entirely dependent — they do not earn or seize what is given. GIVING AND BESTOWING

en: it-was-given, was-given, were-given | es: fue-dada, fue-dado, fueron-dadas | fr: donner | de: geben, gibt Matt 13:11; Matt 14:11; Matt 19:11; Mark 4:11

3. put, place (7×) An idiomatic extension: to put, place, or set something into a location or state. Found 7 times, most notably in the New Covenant formula 'I will put my laws into their minds' (Heb 8:10; 10:16, citing Jer 31:33), and Paul's declaration that God 'placed' the ministry of reconciliation in the apostles (2 Cor 5:18-19). Rom 4:20 speaks of 'giving glory to God,' and 2 Cor 6:3 of 'giving no cause for offense.' The shift from 'give' to 'put/place' is natural in Greek (as in English 'give a push' = 'push'), and Spanish puso ('placed') confirms the locative sense at Heb 8:10. GIVING AND BESTOWING

en: giving, having-given, put | es: dando, demos, puso | fr: donner | de: geben Rom 4:20; 1Cor 9:12; 2Cor 5:12; 2Cor 6:3; Heb 8:10

4. (2×) To give up, surrender, or deliver over to another's power or custody. Two occurrences at Rev 20:13, where 'the sea gave up the dead that were in it, and Death and Hades gave up the dead that were in them.' Spanish entregaron ('they handed over/surrendered') and the English 'gave up' both select vocabulary of relinquishing possession rather than generous bestowal. The eschatological context — the dead being surrendered for final judgment — gives this sense a strikingly different emotional register from the generosity of sense 1. GIVING AND BESTOWING

en: gave-up | es: entregaron, entregó | fr: donner | de: geben Rev 20:13

5. (1×) To yield or produce, said of the earth or plants bringing forth fruit or harvest. A single clear occurrence at Mark 4:8, in the Parable of the Sower: seed fell on good soil and 'was yielding' (edidou) fruit, growing and increasing. Spanish daba ('was giving/yielding') and German geben both permit this agricultural extension, but Korean yeolmae-reul maetda ('bore fruit') shifts to dedicated produce vocabulary, confirming the metaphorical stretch from person-to-person transfer to natural fecundity. The imperfect tense edidou captures the ongoing, repeated nature of the yield. GIVING AND BESTOWING

en: it-was-giving | es: daba | fr: donner | de: geben Mark 4:8

διεγ-είρω G1326 V-PIA-1S (6×)

To wake someone from sleep; figuratively, to stir up, arouse, or agitate — whether a person's mind or the surface of the sea.

A verb that moves from the literal act of waking to the figurative stirring of minds and elements. In the Synoptic storm narratives, the terrified disciples rouse Jesus from sleep in the boat (Mark 4:39; Luke 8:24) — the most concrete use. But in John 6:18 the same verb describes the sea itself being 'stirred up' by a great wind, and in 2 Peter 1:13 and 3:1, Peter uses it for stirring up the readers' minds to remembrance. The Spanish oscillates revealingly between 'despertándose' (waking) and 'despertar' (arousing), while German 'aufwecken' covers both the physical and mental dimensions of rousing someone to alertness.

1. wake from sleep (3×) To wake or rouse someone from physical sleep. Used of Jesus being awakened during the storm on the Sea of Galilee (Mark 4:39; Luke 8:24). The disciples physically shake Jesus awake — an urgent, bodily act. The Spanish 'lo despertaron' (they woke him) and German 'aufwecken' reflect this straightforward meaning of breaking someone out of slumber. AWAKEN STIR UP

en: being-awakened, having-been-awakened, they-woke | es: despertándose, levantándose, lo-despertaron | fr: réveiller | de: aufwecken, διήγειραν, διεγερθεὶς Mark 4:39; Luke 8:24

2. stir up, arouse (3×) To stir up, arouse, or agitate figuratively. Applied to the sea churning under a great wind (John 6:18, where the waves are 'being stirred up'), and to Peter's purpose in writing his letters — to stir up his readers' minds to clear thinking and remembrance (2 Pet 1:13; 3:1). The metaphorical bridge from 'waking a sleeping person' to 'agitating water' to 'rousing a mind' is natural and compact. The Spanish 'despierto' (I stir up) preserves the awakening metaphor even in the intellectual register. AWAKEN STIR UP

en: I-stir-up, to-stir-up, was-being-stirred-up | es: despertar, despierto, selevantaba | fr: réveiller | de: aufwecken John 6:18; 2Pet 1:13; 2Pet 3:1

διέξ-οδος G1327 N-AFP (1×)

exit, outlet, passage; a way out or thoroughfare, especially at road intersections

This noun denotes an outlet, passage, exit, or thoroughfare—a way through or out. Matthew 22:9 has the king send servants to the 'crossroads' or 'main thoroughfares' to invite wedding guests. Classical usage included passages for wind or water, planetary orbits, or means of escape. The New Testament usage focuses on road intersections or main exits from cities where many people pass.

(1×) Crossroads, main thoroughfares, or highway exits—places where roads meet or exit cities, where many people pass. The parable's king (Matt 22:9) sends servants to these busy 'passages' or 'exits of the roads' to find guests since the invited refused. The plural suggests multiple road junctions, busy intersections where diverse people could be found. Translations vary between crossings, exits, and intersections. HOLES AND OPENINGS

en: crossings | es: encrucijadas | fr: issue | de: διεξόδους Matt 22:9

διερμην-ευτής G1328 N-NMS (1×)

interpreter; one who translates or explains meaning from one language to another

This noun denotes an interpreter—someone who translates or explains meaning. 1 Corinthians 14:28 requires that tongues-speakers remain silent in church if no 'interpreter' is present. The function is mediating meaning from one linguistic form to another, making the unintelligible intelligible. All translations converge on the interpretive, translating function.

(1×) An interpreter or translator who renders speech from one language into another, making meaning accessible. Paul's regulation for orderly worship (1 Cor 14:28) requires an 'interpreter' for tongues, someone who can translate the ecstatic utterance into intelligible language the congregation understands. Without this mediating function, the speech profits no one but the speaker. INTERPRET TRANSLATE en: an-interpreter | es: intérprete | fr: interprète | de: Ausleger 1Cor 14:28

διερμην-εύω G1329 V-PIA-3P (6×)

To interpret or explain the meaning of speech, prophecy, or Scripture; also to translate a word or name from one language to another.

A verb of making meaning accessible across barriers — whether the barrier is obscurity or language itself. Most often it appears in the context of interpreting tongues in the Corinthian assembly (1 Cor 12:30; 14:5, 13, 27), where unintelligible speech requires someone to unlock its meaning for the congregation. On the Emmaus road, Jesus 'interpreted' the Scriptures concerning himself (Luke 24:27), explaining what was hidden in plain sight. In Acts 9:36, however, the verb takes a strictly linguistic turn: Tabitha's Aramaic name is 'translated' (διερμηνευομένη) as Dorcas in Greek. The Spanish distinguishes neatly between 'interpreta' (interprets meaning) and 'traducida' (translated), revealing the two faces of this single Greek verb.

1. interpret, explain (5×) To interpret or explain the meaning of something — whether tongues-speech, prophecy, or Scripture. This is the dominant use (5 of 6 occurrences). Paul insists that tongues in the assembly must be interpreted (1 Cor 14:5, 13, 27), and on the Emmaus road Jesus 'interpreted' (διερμήνευσεν) the whole of Scripture as pointing to himself (Luke 24:27). The Spanish 'interpreta/interprete' and German 'auslegen' capture this sense of unpacking hidden or obscure meaning for an audience. INTERPRET TRANSLATE en: he-interpreted, he-interprets, he-may-interpret | es: interpreta, interpretan, interprete | fr: interpréter | de: auslegen, διερμήνευσεν Luke 24:27; 1Cor 12:30; 1Cor 14:5; 1Cor 14:13; 1Cor 14:27

2. translate (a name) (1×) To translate a word or name from one language into another. In Acts 9:36, the name Tabitha is said to be 'translated' (διερμηνευομένη) as Dorcas — a straightforward linguistic rendering rather than an explanation of deeper meaning. The Spanish 'traducida' distinguishes this cleanly from interpretation, though in Greek the same verb covers both acts of bridging comprehension gaps. INTERPRET TRANSLATE en: being-translated | es: traducida | fr: interpréter | de: διερμηνευομένη Acts 9:36

διέρχομαι G1330 V-RPA-AMS (43×)

To go through, pass through, traverse; by extension to cross over, to spread abroad, or to pierce through.

A compound verb from dia ('through') and erchomai ('to come, go'), dierchomai is the New Testament's workhorse term for traveling through a region. Jesus 'passes through' cities and villages on his itinerant ministry (Luke 9:6), and the apostles traverse provinces carrying the gospel (Acts 13:6; 15:3). But the word carries surprising range: it can mean crossing a body of water (Mark 4:35, 'Let us cross over'), the spreading of a report through a region (Luke 5:15), and even the piercing of a sword through one's soul (Luke 2:35). Spanish 'atravesar' and French 'traverser' capture the through-motion beautifully across all these shades.

1. pass through a region (35×) The primary and most frequent sense: to travel or pass through a region, city, or territory, going from one area to another. This is the standard meaning for itinerant journeys in the Gospels and Acts — Jesus passing through towns (Luke 4:30; 9:6), an unclean spirit wandering 'through waterless places' (Matt 12:43), or Paul traversing Macedonia and Achaia (Acts 19:21). Spanish 'atravesando/atravesaba' and German 'hindurchgehen' consistently render the directional through-motion. The word implies transit rather than arrival, emphasizing the journey through rather than the destination. CROSSING OVER

en: having-gone-through, having-passed-through, he-was-passing-through | es: Atravesando, atravesaba, atravesando | fr: traverser | de: hindurchgehen, zieht-hindurch Matt 12:43; Mark 10:25; Luke 4:30; Luke 9:6; Luke 11:24

2. cross over to other side (5×) To cross over from one side to another, typically over water or between distinct locations. At Mark 4:35 Jesus says 'Let us cross over to the other side,' and at Luke 8:22 the same crossing is narrated. Spanish 'pasemos' (let us cross) and English 'Let us go across' highlight the decisive boundary-crossing. This sense also covers passages where the crossing is more figurative — moving from one sphere of action to another (Luke 2:15, the shepherds resolving to 'go over' to Bethlehem; Acts 18:27 where

Apollos 'crossed over' to Achaia). CROSSING OVER
en: Let-us-cross-over, Let-us-go, Let-us-go-across | es: Pasemos, pasar, pasemos | fr: traverser | de: hindurchgehen, zieht-hindurch Mark 4:35; Luke 2:15; Luke 8:22; Acts 11:22; Acts 18:27

3. spread throughout (2×) To spread or permeate throughout a region, used of reports, news, or abstract forces. At Luke 5:15 the word describes how news about Jesus 'was spreading' ever more widely, and at Rom 5:12 Paul uses it theologically: death 'spread through' to all humanity. The shift from physical traversal to the diffusion of information or spiritual reality is a natural metaphorical extension. Spanish 'se extendía' (was extending) and English 'was spreading' both capture the permeation sense that distinguishes this from mere locomotion. CROSSING OVER
en: passed-through, was-spreading | es: pasó, se-extendía | fr: traverser | de: hindurchgehen, zieht-hindurch Luke 5:15; Rom 5:12

4. pierce through (1×) To pierce or pass through something physically, used metaphorically of intense emotional anguish. The sole attestation is Simeon's prophecy to Mary in Luke 2:35: 'a sword will pierce through your own soul also.' Spanish 'atravesará' (will pierce through) and English 'will pierce' preserve the violent through-motion of the root. Classical Greek attests this sense for weapons and pain (LSJ cites 'of pain, shoot through one'), making this a well-established extension of the basic 'go through' meaning into the domain of wounding and suffering. CROSSING OVER en: will-pierce | es: atravesará | fr: traverser | de: zieht-hindurch Luke 2:35

διερωτ-άω G1331 V-APA-NMP (1×)
to inquire thoroughly, question carefully; to seek information through detailed questioning
This verb means to inquire thoroughly, cross-question, or ask repeatedly. Acts 10:17 describes messengers 'having inquired' for Simon's house. Classical usage included cross-examination or persistent questioning. The thorough, careful inquiry—not casual asking but determined investigation—characterizes this term. The compound intensifies simple 'asking' to suggest detailed inquiry.

(1×) To inquire carefully or ask detailed questions to obtain information. Cornelius's messengers in Acts 10:17 had 'inquired' thoroughly for Simon's residence, carefully seeking directions until they found the right house. The aorist participle marks completed inquiry resulting in success—their careful questioning led them to the correct location. Translations recognize the thorough, investigative character of the questioning. ASKING AND PRAYING
en: having-inquired | es: preguntando | fr: interroger | de: διερωτήσαντες Acts 10:17

δι-ετής G1332 Adj-GMS (1×)
two years old; of or relating to the age of two years
This adjective denotes 'two years old' or 'of two years' duration. Matthew 2:16 describes Herod's massacre of infants 'two years old and under' based on the time he learned from the magi. The term can refer to age or duration. The New Testament usage focuses on the age of young children in this tragic historical event.

(1×) Two years old or of two years' age, describing the chronological age of young children. Herod's murderous decree (Matt 2:16) targeted male children 'from two years old and under,' calculated from when the star appeared to the magi. The genitive form modifies an implied 'child,' specifying the age range of victims in this horrific attempt to eliminate the newborn King. YEAR (TIME UNIT)
en: two-years | es: dos-años | fr: de-deux-ans | de: διετοῦς Matt 2:16

δι-ετία G1333 N-GFS (2×)
two years, a period of two years; a biennium
This noun simply denotes a period of two years. Acts uses it twice to mark significant durations in Paul's ministry: Felix leaving Paul imprisoned for 'two years' before being succeeded (24:27), and Paul's 'two years' of rented house ministry in Rome (28:30). The term is straightforward chronological marking without symbolic overtones. Both instances involve extended periods of relative stability—Paul under house arrest or detention rather than active persecution. The two-year periods frame important phases of Paul's witness, though the Gospel continued advancing despite his confinement. Spanish 'dos años' and French 'deux ans' render this literally as the simple temporal designation it is.

(2×) Both occurrences mark two-year periods in Paul's imprisonment: Felix leaving Paul in bonds for 'two years' until Festus succeeded him (Acts 24:27: Spanish 'dos años'), and Paul's 'two years' in his own rented house in Rome, receiving all who came (Acts 28:30). The term functions as simple chronological notation marking extended but bounded periods of Paul's confinement during which ministry nevertheless continued. YEAR (TIME UNIT)
en: Two-years, two-years | es: De-dos-años, dos-años | fr: deux-ans | de: Διετίας, διετίαν Acts 24:27; Acts 28:30

διηγ-έομαι G1334 V-AIM-3P (8×)
To narrate, describe in detail, relate; to give a full account of events or experiences to an audience.
A verb for telling a story thoroughly — not a passing mention but a detailed account. It appears when the healed demoniac is told to go home and 'declare how much God has done for you' (Luke 8:39), when disciples report back what they have seen and done (Luke 9:10; Mark 9:9), and when witnesses describe miraculous events to others (Mark 5:16). In Acts, it narrates Philip's encounter with the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:33) and Peter's account of God's work among the Gentiles (Acts 9:27). The Spanish 'contar,' French 'raconter,' and German 'erzählen' all emphasize the storytelling quality — this is not mere reporting but the art of relating an experience.

narrate, describe, relate, tell (8×) To set out in detail, narrate, or give a full account of events to others. The verb implies a thorough, ordered telling rather than a brief mention. Eyewitnesses 'narrate' what they saw at the healing of the demoniac (Mark 5:16), the Twelve 'relate' their mission experiences to Jesus (Luke 9:10), and the healed man is commissioned to 'describe' God's works (Luke 8:39). Acts 8:33 uses it of declaring the Messiah's generation. The cross-linguistic evidence — Spanish 'contar/cuenta,' French 'raconter,' German 'erzählen' — uniformly points to detailed storytelling, confirming a single cohesive sense of narrative recounting. COUNTING AND NARRATING
en: describe, described, he-related | es: contaran, contará, cuenta | fr: raconter | de: erzaehlen, erzählt Mark 5:16; Mark 9:9; Luke 8:39; Luke 9:10; Acts 8:33

διήγ-ησις G1335 N-AFS (1×)
narrative, account; an ordered recounting or narration of events
This noun denotes a narrative, narration, or orderly account of events. Luke 1:1 refers to the many who had undertaken to compile a 'narrative' of the things fulfilled among early Christians. The term emphasizes ordered, sequential recounting—not random notes but structured narration. Classical usage included speech narratives or case statements.

(1×) A narrative or orderly account, a structured recounting of events in sequence. Luke acknowledges (1:1) that many had already attempted to compile a 'narrative' of the gospel events, providing context for his own carefully investigated account. The term suggests more than chronicle—an organized, coherent narration with beginning, development, and purpose. Translations uniformly recognize the narrative, recounting function. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: a-narrative | es: narración | fr: récit | de: διήγησιν Luke 1:1

διηνεκής G1336 Adj-ANS (4×)
dienekes – continuous, perpetual, unceasing; used in the phrase eis to dienekes, 'forever' Dienekes means 'continuous' or 'perpetual,' and in the New Testament it appears exclusively in the set phrase eis to dienekes ('in perpetuity, forever'). All four occurrences are in Hebrews, where the author contrasts the provisional Levitical system with Christ's eternal priesthood and once-for-all sacrifice. Melchizedek's priesthood has neither beginning nor end (Heb 7:3); the Law's repeated sacrifices cannot perfect anyone permanently (Heb 10:1); Christ sits down forever after a single offering (Heb 10:12); and by that offering he has perfected the sanctified for all time (Heb 10:14). Spanish perpetuamente, French perpetuel, and German immerwaehrend all converge on this single sense of unending duration.

(4×) Perpetual, continuous, or unceasing – used exclusively in the formulaic phrase eis to dienekes ('in perpetuity, forever') to express unbroken, endless duration. In Hebrews it carries heavy theological weight: Melchizedek's priesthood endures without end (Heb 7:3); annual sacrifices fail to perfect worshipers permanently (Heb 10:1); Christ sits enthroned forever after one sacrifice (Heb 10:12); and believers are perfected for all time (Heb 10:14). Spanish perpetuamente and French perpetuel confirm a single sense of timeless, uninterrupted continuity. ETERNITY AND AGES

en: perpetuity | es: perpetuamente, perpetuo | fr: perpétuel | de: immerwaehrend Heb 7:3; Heb 10:1; Heb 10:12; Heb 10:14

δῐ-θάλασσος G1337 Adj-AMS (1×)

between two seas; situated where two seas meet, forming a sandbar or reef

This adjective describes a place 'between two seas' or where currents from two seas meet. Acts 27:41 describes Paul's ship running aground on a 'place between two seas'—likely a sandbar or reef formed where currents converge. Classical usage described the Euxine or Atlantic as divided, or shallows where seas meet. The geographical feature of converging waters is the core concept.

(1×) A place between two seas or where two bodies of water meet, typically forming a sandbar, reef, or shoal. The shipwreck site in Acts 27:41 was such a location—'a place between two seas' where converging currents had formed a sandbar on which the ship struck and broke apart. This geographical feature, dangerous to navigation, proved the site of Paul's Malta shipwreck. SEA LARGE WATER

en: between-two-seas | es: de-dos-mares | fr: deux-mers | de: διϑάλασσον Acts 27:41

διϊκνέομαι G1338 V-PPM/P-NMS (1×)

To penetrate, pierce through, pass completely through something, especially in a physical or metaphorical sense

This verb describes the action of penetrating or passing through something completely. In Hebrews 4:12, it vividly portrays God's word as sharper than any double-edged sword, piercing so deeply it divides soul from spirit. The Greek carries a sense of thorough, complete penetration—not merely touching the surface but reaching the innermost parts. Classical uses include missiles reaching their target or time intervals passing through.

(1×) The single New Testament occurrence (Heb 4:12) uses this term metaphorically for the word of God 'piercing' to the division of soul and spirit. The multilingual glosses emphasize penetration and piercing, reflecting the word's fundamental sense of going completely through something. Classical Greek uses it for physical piercing with missiles or reaching a destination through obstacles. PIERCE BORE THROUGH en: piercing | es: penetrando | fr: durchdringen | de: durchdringen Heb 4:12

διΐστημι G1339 V-APA-GFS (3×)

to stand apart, go farther, depart; marking spatial or temporal distance between events or persons

This compound verb (διΐστημι, from διά + ἵστημι) describes movement that creates separation or interval. In the New Testament it appears in contexts of temporal gaps ('after about an hour had passed' in Luke 22:59) and physical departure (Jesus parting from the disciples in Luke 24:51, sailors taking soundings at intervals in Acts 27:28). The root sense of 'standing apart' naturally extends to both spatial separation and the passage of time.

(3×) The verb captures both spatial departure and temporal intervals in the Gospel narratives. In Luke 22:59 it marks the hour's interval before another accusation against Peter; in 24:51 it describes Jesus being carried away from the disciples at the Ascension; in Acts 27:28 it indicates the spacing between depth soundings during the storm. The Spanish translations (habiendo-avanzado, habiendo-pasado, se-apartó) and French (s'éloigner, éloigner) reflect this dual capacity for temporal and spatial distancing. The word's semantic range centers on creating measurable separation, whether in space or time. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY

en: having-gone-farther, having-intervened, he-parted | es: habiendo-avanzado, habiendo-pasado, se-apartó | fr: s'éloigner, éloigner | de: διέστη, διαστάσης, διαστήσαντες Luke 22:59; Luke 24:51; Acts 27:28

διϊσχῡρ-ίζομαι G1340 V-IIM/P-3S (2×)

to insist strongly, affirm confidently; to maintain a position with emphatic assertion (middle voice)

This middle voice verb means to insist or affirm something with strong confidence and persistence. Luke uses it for Peter's denial: the maid 'kept insisting' he was with Jesus (22:59), and for Rhoda's persistence: she 'kept insisting' that Peter stood at the gate (Acts 12:15). The middle voice suggests personal investment in the assertion—leaning heavily on one's own conviction. The term goes beyond simple statement to emphatic, repeated insistence despite contradiction. The verb conveys stubborn persistence in maintaining what one believes to be true. Interestingly, both Lukan instances involve correct identification being initially disbelieved, requiring insistent affirmation.

(2×) Both occurrences in Luke-Acts involve persistent insistence despite initial disbelief: the servant girl 'kept insisting' Peter was with Jesus during his denial (Luke 22:59: Spanish 'insistía'), and Rhoda 'kept insisting' Peter stood at the gate while others said she was mad (Acts 12:15). The middle voice emphasizes their personal conviction and stubborn maintenance of their claim despite contradiction. INSTRUCT PROVE CONCLUDE

en: kept-insisting, was-insisting | es: insistía | fr: affirmer | de: διϊσχυρίζετο Luke 22:59; Acts 12:15

δῐκαιο-κρῐσία G1341 N-GFS (1×)

Righteous judgment, just verdict, fair and equitable decision rendered according to divine or moral standards

A compound noun combining 'righteous' (δίκαιος) and 'judgment' (κρίσις), this term refers to judgment that is inherently fair and morally upright. Paul uses it in Romans 2:5 to describe the day of God's righteous judgment when His just verdicts will be revealed. The word emphasizes not merely any judgment, but specifically one that is ethically sound and divinely authorized. It appears in contexts where the justice of God's decisions is being emphasized.

(1×) Romans 2:5 speaks of the revelation of God's righteous judgment on the day of wrath. The term combines the concepts of justice and judgment, stressing the moral uprightness of God's verdicts. Spanish 'justo juicio,' French 'juste jugement,' and German 'gerechtes Gericht' all preserve this dual emphasis on both the judicial act and its righteous character. JUDGMENT AND VERDICT

en: of-righteous-judgment | es: de-justo-juicio | fr: juste-jugement | de: gerechtes-Gericht Rom 2:5

δίκαιος G1342 Adj-VMS (80×)

Righteous, just, upright; of persons in right standing with God, of actions that are fair, and as a messianic title.

A foundational moral term in the New Testament describing alignment with God's standard. When applied to persons (as in Matt 1:19, where Joseph is called dikaios), it conveys habitual uprightness and covenant faithfulness — Spanish 'justo' and German 'gerecht' both capture this legal-moral blend. Applied to actions (Eph 6:1), it shifts to mean fair or proper conduct. Most strikingly, in Acts 3:14, 7:52, and 22:14, it becomes a christological title — 'the Righteous

One' — where the adjective crystallizes into a proper designation for Jesus as the uniquely sinless person.

1. righteous, upright (of persons) (70×) Describes a person who consistently lives in moral alignment with God's will and ethical norms. The Greek dikaios in this personal sense spans Hebrew tsaddiq territory — the covenant-keeper, the one whose life matches profession. In Matt 5:45, God sends rain on the righteous and unrighteous alike; in Matt 13:43, the righteous shine like the sun. Spanish 'justo' and French 'juste' both preserve the legal-ethical double register that makes this word so rich. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: righteous | es: justa, justo | fr: juste | de: gerecht Matt 1:19; Matt 5:45; Matt 9:13; Matt 13:17; Matt 13:43

2. right, just, fair (of actions) (7×) Applied to actions, judgments, or standards rather than persons, marking them as morally correct or procedurally fair. In Matt 20:4, the vineyard owner promises 'whatever is right' (dikaion) — a fair wage. In Luke 12:57, Jesus challenges the crowd to judge 'what is right' for themselves. The shift from character (sense 1) to conduct is subtle but consistent across the multilingual evidence: all translations use the same root word, yet context makes the action-oriented reading unmistakable. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: just, right | es: justo | fr: juste | de: gerecht Matt 20:4; Matt 20:7; Luke 12:57; Acts 4:19; Eph 6:1

3. the Righteous One (title) (3×) A messianic and christological title — 'the Righteous One' — used exclusively in Acts (3:14, 7:52, 22:14) as a proper designation for Jesus. Stephen's speech (Acts 7:52) accuses the Sanhedrin of betraying 'the Righteous One,' echoing prophetic expectation. Here dikaios is no longer a general adjective but a name-like title, set apart from ordinary usage. German 'gerecht' and French 'juste' lack capitalization conventions that would distinguish this, making context the only differentiator. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: Righteous-One | es: Justo | fr: juste | de: gerecht Acts 3:14; Acts 7:52; Acts 22:14

δῐκαι-οσύνη G1343 N-AFS (92×)

Righteousness — moral uprightness, covenant faithfulness, and the right standing before God that defines the just life

Dikaiosyne is among the most theologically dense words in the New Testament. In Matthew it describes the higher standard Jesus demands of his followers ('unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees,' Matt 5:20) and the object of spiritual hunger ('blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness,' Matt 5:6). Paul transforms it into a central soteriological concept: the righteousness of God revealed apart from the law, received through faith in Christ (Rom 1:17; 3:21-22; Phil 3:9). James, by contrast, ties righteousness to works of mercy (Jas 2:23; 3:18). Spanish 'justicia,' French 'justice,' and German 'Gerechtigkeit' all cover both moral rectitude and judicial vindication, mirroring the word's double register.

1. moral righteousness, ethical uprightness (47×) Split from sense 65648. Criteria: The righteous behavior God requires and rewards; conformity to divine moral standards; ethical life (Matt 5:6, 10, 20; 6:1; Phil 1:11)

en: of-righteousness, righteousness, to-righteousness | es: a-justicia, de-justicia, justicia | fr: justice | de: Gerechtigkeit Matt 3:15; Matt 5:6; Matt 5:10; Matt 5:20; Matt 6:1

2. forensic justification, right standing before God (36×) Split from sense 65648. Criteria: God's saving act declaring sinners righteous through faith in Christ; the imputed righteousness of justification (Rom 3:21-22; Phil 3:9; 2 Cor 5:21)

en: of-righteousness, righteousness | es: de-justicia, justicia | fr: justice | de: Gerechtigkeit John 16:8; John 16:10; Rom 3:21; Rom 3:22; Rom 4:3

3. covenant faithfulness, God's saving action (9×) Split from sense 65648. Criteria: God's own righteousness as his covenant-keeping faithfulness and saving intervention on behalf of his people (Rom 1:17; 3:5)

en: righteousness | es: justicia | fr: justice | de: Gerechtigkeit Acts 17:31; Rom 1:17; Rom 3:5; Rom 3:25; Rom 3:26

δῐκαι-όω G1344 V-PIA-3S (39×)

To declare or be declared righteous; to justify, vindicate, or show to be right before God or others.

A courtroom word at heart, dikaioō carries the weight of a divine verdict: to pronounce righteous, to acquit. In Paul's letters it becomes the central term for God's act of justifying sinners through faith — not making them morally perfect, but declaring them right before the bar of heaven. Yet the word also appears where wisdom is 'vindicated' by her deeds (Matt 11:19) and where a Pharisee seeks to 'justify himself' (Luke 10:29). The German rechtfertigen and Spanish justificar both preserve the forensic flavor, while the French justifier leans toward the declarative sense. Across every language the legal metaphor holds: a judge speaks, and the accused goes free.

1. be declared righteous (27×) The soteriological passive that dominates Paul's usage: to be pronounced or reckoned righteous before God through faith rather than works of law. This forensic declaration — not an infusion of moral quality — is reflected in every major language: German rechtfertigen, Spanish ser justificado, French être justifié. Romans 2:13 and Galatians 2:16 bracket the full scope, from the theoretical ('doers of the law will be justified') to the experiential ('justified by faith in Christ'). RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: Having-been-justified, being-justified, has-been-justified | es: Habiendo-sido-justificados, es-justificado, fue-justificada | fr: justifier | de: rechtfertigen, rechtfertigt Matt 12:37; Luke 18:14; Acts 13:39; Rom 2:13

2. declare righteous (7×) God as active subject, pronouncing the ungodly righteous. Where sense 1 views the verdict from the defendant's side, this sense foregrounds the Judge: 'It is God who justifies' (Rom 8:33). The transitive force is clear across languages — Spanish el que justifica, German der rechtfertigt — underscoring that this is divine prerogative, not human achievement. Romans 3:26 and 4:5 are the key passages. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: he-justified, justifies, justifying | es: el-que-justifica, justifica, justificará | fr: justifier | de: rechtfertigen Rom 3:26; Rom 3:30; Rom 4:5; Rom 8:30

3. vindicate or acknowledge as right (3×) To vindicate or acknowledge as right — a broader sense applied to persons and even personified Wisdom. In Luke 7:29 the people 'justified God' (acknowledged him as righteous) by accepting John's baptism, while in Matt 11:19 and Luke 7:35 Wisdom is 'vindicated by her deeds/children.' Spanish justificaron and German rechtfertigt preserve the active-declarative force without the soteriological freight. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: justified, was-justified, was-vindicated | es: fue-justificada, justificaron | fr: justifier | de: rechtfertigt Matt 11:19; Luke 7:29; Luke 7:35

4. justify oneself (2×) To justify oneself, to claim one's own righteousness — always with a note of pretension in Luke's usage. The lawyer in Luke 10:29 'wanting to justify himself' asks 'Who is my neighbor?' and the Pharisees in Luke 16:15 'justify themselves before men.' Spanish justificarse and the reflexive construction across languages highlight the self-directed, often self-deceiving quality of this usage. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: justifying, to-justify | es: justificarse, que-os-justificáis | fr: justifier | de: rechtfertigt Luke 10:29; Luke 16:15

δῐκαί-ωμα G1345 N-NNS (10×)

A righteous ordinance, regulation, or decree; a righteous deed; an act of judicial acquittal

Built on the root δίκη (justice), this noun spans from the concrete to the abstract. Most often in the NT it refers to God's righteous requirements or ordinances – the regulations of worship in Hebrews 9:1, or the commandments Zechariah and Elizabeth walked blamelessly in (Luke 1:6). But in Revelation 19:8, the fine linen of the Bride represents the 'righteous deeds' of the saints, shifting from requirement to fulfillment. Paul's use in Romans 5:16-18 is the most theologically loaded: one act of righteousness leading to justification for all. Spanish helpfully differentiates, using 'justos requisitos' for ordinances but 'acto de justicia' for the deed, and 'justificacion' for acquittal.

1. regulation, ordinance (6×) A concrete decree, statute, or regulation prescribed by divine or legal authority. This is the most frequent NT sense, covering the Mosaic ordinances (Heb 9:1, 10), the righteous requirements of the Law (Rom 2:26; 8:4), and God's righteous decree that sin deserves death (Rom 1:32). Spanish 'justos requisitos' and German 'Satzungen' both emphasize the prescriptive, binding character of these requirements. Luke 1:6 describes Zechariah and Elizabeth walking in all the Lord's ordinances blamelessly. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: ordinances, regulations, righteous-decree | es: justo-juicio, justo-requisito, justos-requisitos | fr: ordonnance | de: Satzungen, δικαιώμασιν Luke 1:6; Rom 1:32; Rom 2:26; Rom 8:4; Heb 9:1

2. righteous deed, act of righteousness (3×) A righteous deed or act of moral uprightness performed by a person or attributed to the saints collectively. In Rev 19:8 the fine linen is the 'righteous deeds' of the saints; in Rev 15:4 God's righteous acts are revealed. Rom 5:18 uses it of Christ's one 'act of righteousness' leading to justification. Spanish 'actos justos' and 'acto de justicia' mark the shift from prescribed rule to enacted virtue. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: act-of-righteousness, righteous-deeds | es: acto-de-justicia, actos-justos, justicias | fr: ordonnance | de: Satzungen Rom 5:18; Rev 15:4; Rev 19:8

3. justification, act of acquittal (1×) The judicial act of acquittal or declaration of righteousness – God's verdict pronouncing the sinner righteous. In Rom 5:16 the free gift following many trespasses leads to 'justification' (δικαίωμα), contrasting the condemnation from Adam's sin. Spanish 'justificacion' captures the forensic, courtroom sense that distinguishes this from both ordinance and deed. This is a distinctly Pauline theological use of the word. INNOCENCE AND ACQUITTAL

en: justification | es: justificación | fr: ordonnance | de: Satzungen Rom 5:16

δίκαιος G1346 Adv (5×)

Justly, righteously; in a manner that accords with what is right before God and people

The adverbial form of dikaios (righteous), describing action carried out in conformity with divine or moral standards. The repentant thief on the cross acknowledges that he and his companion suffer 'justly' (Luke 23:41), while Paul commends the Thessalonians by testifying that he behaved 'righteously' among them (1 Thess 2:10). In Titus 2:12, it sits alongside 'soberly' and 'godly' as a triad of Christian living. The multilingual uniformity – Spanish 'justamente,' French 'justement,' German 'gerecht' – confirms a stable core meaning of moral uprightness in conduct.

(5×) In a just, righteous, or morally upright manner; acting in accord with what is right before God and human conscience. Spanish 'justamente' and French 'justement' both retain the Latin root iustus, while German 'gerecht' points to the same norm of rightness. The dying thief confesses his punishment is deserved (Luke 23:41), Paul invokes the word to describe his blameless conduct among believers (1 Thess 2:10), and Titus 2:12 places it in a programmatic triad – soberly, righteously, godly – outlining the shape of Christian life in the present age. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE en: justly, righteously | es: justamente | fr: justement | de: gerecht, δικαίως Luke 23:41; 1Cor 15:34; 1Thess 2:10; Titus 2:12; 1Pet 2:23

δῐκαί-ωσις G1347 N-AFS (2×)

justification, vindication; the act of being declared or made righteous

This crucial Pauline term denotes the act or state of justification —being declared or made righteous before God. Paul uses it twice in Romans: Christ was raised for our 'justification' (4:25), and the free gift brings 'justification' leading to life (5:18). The term represents the climax of Paul's doctrine of salvation—the divine act that reverses condemnation. It contrasts with 'condemnation' in 5:18, highlighting the forensic dimension. The noun comes from the same root as 'righteous' and 'to justify,' binding together the concept of right standing before God. Spanish 'justificación' and French 'justification' preserve the theological term that became central to Reformation discussions of salvation.

(2×) Both occurrences are in Romans' core justification argument: Christ raised for our 'justification' (Romans 4:25), and the free gift bringing 'justification' of life in contrast to condemnation (Romans 5:18). The term captures the decisive divine act that establishes right standing before God, reversing the verdict of guilt. Paul's usage makes this a technical theological term for the central saving act. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: justification | es: justificación | fr: justification | de: Rechtfertigung Rom 4:25; Rom 5:18

δῐκαστ-ής G1348 N-AMS (2×)

judge, arbiter; one who renders legal judgment or settles disputes

This noun designates a judge or arbiter—one authorized to render legal decisions or settle disputes. Stephen's speech uses it twice in recounting Moses' history: the Israelite rejecting Moses' intervention asks 'Who made you a ruler and judge over us?' (Acts 7:27), and Stephen notes this same Moses whom they rejected, asking 'Who made you ruler and judge?' (7:35). The doubling emphasizes Israel's pattern of rejecting God's appointed deliverer. The term appears in both questions as paired with 'ruler,' suggesting comprehensive authority over both executive and judicial functions. The usage reflects the ancient Near Eastern fusion of ruling and judging roles.

(2×) Both instances are in Stephen's speech, quoting the Israelite's rejection of Moses: 'Who made you ruler and judge over us?' (Acts 7:27, 7:35: Spanish 'juez,' French 'juge'). The paired occurrence in a single narrative emphasizes the irony—Israel rejected the very leader-judge God had appointed. The term designates one with authority to settle disputes and render judicial decisions. JUDGING AND DECIDING en: a-judge | es: juez | fr: juge | de: δικαστήν, δικαστὴν Acts 7:27; Acts 7:35

δίκη G1349 N-AFS (3×)

justice, penalty, retribution; the personified or enacted principle of moral order and its consequences

While δίκη originally meant 'custom' or 'way of doing things' in classical Greek, by the New Testament period it had specialized to mean justice as retribution or penalty. The word appears when divine justice manifests in judgment: the islanders see the viper on Paul's hand as 'Justice' personified catching up with a murderer (Acts 28:4), Paul speaks of those who will 'suffer the penalty of eternal destruction' (2 Thess 1:9), and Jude describes Sodom undergoing 'the punishment of eternal fire' (Jude 7). This is justice not as fairness but as the moral order's inevitable consequences.

(3×) In all three NT occurrences, δίκη refers to retributive justice or divine penalty. Acts 28:4 remarkably personifies Justice (with capital J in translations) as a pursuing deity—the barbarians interpret the snake bite as proof that 'Justice has not allowed him to live.' In 2 Thessalonians 1:9 and Jude 1:7, the word denotes the penalty itself: eternal destruction, eternal fire. The multilingual glosses (Spanish: Justicia, castigo; French: Justice, peine) capture both the personified force and the concrete punishment. The semantic development from 'custom' to 'retribution' reflects the Greek philosophical understanding that justice is the cosmos's natural order asserting itself. LOCUSTS AND SWARMS en: Justice, penalty, punishment | es: Justicia, castigo | fr: Justice, peine, δίκην | de: Strafe, Δίκη Acts 28:4; 2Thess 1:9; Jude 1:7

δίκτῡον G1350 N-ANS (12×)

Fishing net — a large net used by Galilean fishermen, cast or dragged to catch fish

The noun diktyon is the general term for a fishing net in the New Testament, encompassing both the casting net and the dragnet. It appears almost exclusively in the call narratives and miraculous-catch stories set on the Sea of Galilee. Simon and Andrew were 'casting a net into the sea' when Jesus called them (Matt 4:18; Mark 1:16), and James and John were 'mending their nets' (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19). Luke 5:2-6 describes nets washed and then filled to breaking in the miraculous catch, while John 21:6-11 narrates the post-resurrection catch where the net held 153 large fish without tearing. The net thus becomes a symbol of the apostolic mission — 'fishers of men.' Spanish 'red' and French 'filet' both denote this fundamental tool of the Galilean economy.

fishing net (12×) A fishing net — the primary tool of the Galilean fishing trade — used in call narratives and miraculous-catch accounts. Simon and Andrew cast their net (Matt 4:18; Mark 1:16); James and John mend theirs (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19). The two miraculous catches (Luke 5:4-7 where the nets nearly break; John 21:6-11 where the net holds 153 fish intact) invest the net with symbolic weight as an image of the apostolic mission. Distinguished from sagēnē (dragnet) and amphiblēstron (casting net) as the general term. Spanish 'red' and German 'Netz' are exact functional equivalents. NETS AND SNARES

en: net, nets | es: red, redes | fr: filet | de: Netz, δίκτυα Matt 4:20; Matt 4:21; Mark 1:18; Mark 1:19; Luke 5:2

δῐ-λογος G1351 Adj-AMP (1×)

Double-tongued, saying one thing to one person and another to someone else; deceitful in speech

This adjective literally means 'of double word' and describes someone who speaks duplicitously, telling different stories to different people. In 1 Timothy 3:8, Paul lists this among disqualifying traits for deacons—church servants must not be two-faced in their communication. The image is of a forked tongue, speaking contradictory things. It's not merely changing one's mind, but deliberately deceiving through inconsistent speech designed to manipulate different audiences.

(1×) Paul's instruction to Timothy (1 Tim 3:8) requires deacons not to be double-tongued—speaking one way to one group and differently to another for manipulative purposes. The English and Spanish glosses capture the 'double word/speech' imagery, while the French preserves the Greek transliteration. This describes deliberate duplicity in communication, a fundamental breach of trustworthiness required for church leadership. DECEIT AND TREACHERY

en: double-tongued | es: de-doble-palabra | fr: διλόγους | de: doppelzuengig 1Tim 3:8

διό G1352 Conj (53×)

therefore, wherefore — an inferential conjunction drawing a strong conclusion from stated premises

Dio (contracted from di' ho, 'on account of which') is a heavier inferential conjunction than the lighter oun, appearing 53 times in the New Testament with particular concentration in the Pauline epistles. Where oun nudges the reader forward, dio drives a decisive conclusion: 'Therefore God also highly exalted him' (Phil 2:9), 'Therefore, my beloved, flee from idolatry' (1 Cor 10:14). Luke employs it at a pivotal christological moment — the angel's announcement that 'therefore the holy one to be born will be called the Son of God' (Luke 1:35). The translations consistently render it with emphatic causal connectors: Spanish 'por lo cual,' French 'c'est pourquoi,' German 'darum/deshalb.'

therefore (53×) A strong inferential conjunction meaning 'wherefore' or 'for which reason,' introducing a conclusion that follows necessarily from the preceding argument or narrative. Heavier than oun, it marks climactic inferences in theological reasoning (Rom 1:24 'therefore God gave them over'; Phil 2:9 'therefore God exalted him') and decisive exhortations (1 Cor 10:14 'therefore flee idolatry'). All 53 occurrences serve this single causal-inferential function, sometimes strengthened by kai (dio kai, 'therefore also'). THEREFORE PARTICLES

en: Therefore, Therefore-, therefore | es: Por-lo-cual, por-lo-cual | fr: c'est-pourquoi | de: darum-, deshalb Matt 27:8; Luke 1:35; Luke 7:7; Acts 10:29; Acts 15:19

διοδ-εύω G1353 V-IIA-3S (2×)

to travel through, journey across; to pass through a region on one's way

This verb means to travel through or journey across a region, emphasizing movement through territory rather than to a single destination. Luke uses it for Jesus and the Twelve 'traveling through' cities and villages proclaiming the kingdom (8:1), and for Paul and Silas 'passing through' Amphipolis and Apollonia en route to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1). The prefix 'dia-' emphasizes the through-movement, the journey across territory. The term suggests itinerant ministry or travel, stopping at various points along the way. Spanish 'Habiendo atravesado' (having crossed through) and French 'parcourir' (traverse) capture this sense of crossing through regions rather than settling in one place.

(2×) Both occurrences describe itinerant ministry or travel: Jesus 'traveling through' cities and villages preaching the kingdom (Luke 8:1: Spanish 'viajaba'), and Paul and Silas 'passing through' Amphipolis and Apollonia on their way to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1: Spanish 'Habiendo atravesado,' French 'parcourir'). The verb emphasizes movement through territory, touching multiple locations rather than settling in one. DEPARTING AND PASSING en: having-traveled-through, was-traveling-through | es: Habiendo-atravesado, viajaba | fr: parcourir, voyager | de: Διοδεύσαντες, διώδευεν Luke 8:1; Acts 17:1

Διονύσιος G1354 N-NMS (1×)

Dionysius, personal name meaning 'of Dionysus' or 'follower of Dionysus,' an Athenian convert Dionysius was an Athenian who became a believer through Paul's ministry on the Areopagus (Acts 17:34). His name derives from Dionysus, the Greek god of wine, reflecting the pagan naming conventions of ancient Athens. Early Christian tradition identifies him as the first bishop of Athens, though this cannot be verified from Scripture alone. The brief mention in Acts suggests he was a person of some standing, converted alongside Damaris and others.

(1×) Acts 17:34 mentions Dionysius as one of the Athenian converts from Paul's Areopagus speech. His theophoric name (derived from the god Dionysus) was common in Greek culture. The multilingual glosses largely preserve the Greek form, with French rendering it as 'Denys.' Luke's inclusion of his name suggests he became a notable member of the Athenian Christian community. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Dionysios | es: Dionýsios | fr: Denys | de: Διονύσιος Acts 17:34

διό G1355 Conj (2×)

therefore, for this reason; a strong inferential conjunction drawing conclusion from prior statements

This conjunction means 'therefore' or 'for this reason,' functioning as a strong inferential connector that draws conclusions from preceding arguments. Paul uses it twice in 1 Corinthians to introduce practical applications of doctrinal truths: 'Therefore, if food causes my brother to stumble...' (8:13), and 'Therefore, my beloved, flee from idolatry' (10:14). The term combines 'dia' (through/because of) with the relative pronoun, creating a strong causal link—'through which thing' or 'on account of which.' Spanish 'Por lo cual' (for which reason) and French 'c'est pourquoi' (it is why) preserve this inferential force connecting doctrine to practice.

(2×) Both uses in 1 Corinthians introduce practical imperatives based on theological reasoning: 'Therefore' if food causes stumbling, Paul will abstain (1 Corinthians 8:13), and 'Therefore' flee idolatry given the incompatibility of communion with Christ and demons (1 Corinthians 10:14: Spanish 'Por lo cual'). The conjunction signals strong logical inference from prior argument to consequent action. THEREFORE PARTICLES

en: therefore | es: Por-lo-cual | fr: c'est-pourquoi | de: darum 1Cor 8:13; 1Cor 10:14

G1356 Adj-GNS (1×)
Fallen from Zeus, fallen from the sky; said of sacred objects believed to have divine heavenly origin
This rare adjective literally means 'fallen from Zeus' and was used in the ancient world to describe objects—especially cult images—believed to have fallen from heaven as gifts from the gods. In Acts 19:35, the Ephesian town clerk uses it to describe the image of Artemis housed in her famous temple. The claim that the idol 'fell from heaven' authenticated its divine origin in pagan thinking. The term reflects ancient religious belief that certain sacred objects had supernatural, celestial origins.

(1×) The Ephesian town clerk (Acts 19:35) calms the riot by affirming that all know Ephesus guards the temple of Artemis and the image 'fallen from Zeus' (i.e., from heaven). This reflects ancient pagan belief in meteorite-origin cult images or divinely sent idols. Spanish 'caída del cielo' (fallen from heaven) and French 'tombé du ciel' capture the sense better than literal 'Zeus' reference, as the phrase functioned as a claim of heavenly divine origin. HEAVEN AND SKY
en: fallen-from-Zeus | es: caída-del-cielo | fr: tombé-du-ciel | de: διοπετοῦς Acts 19:35

διόρθ-ωσις G1357 N-GFS (2×) reformation, correction; the setting right of things or making of improvements
This noun means correction, reformation, or setting things right—making straight what was crooked. Paul uses it positively for 'reforms' accomplished through Felix's governance (Acts 24:2), while Hebrews uses it for the limitations of old covenant regulations effective only until the time of 'reformation' (9:10). The term suggests systematic improvement or correction of what was wrong or deficient. It shares roots with words for making straight or upright. The Hebrews usage is particularly significant, marking the new covenant era as the time when divine correction and reordering occurs. Spanish 'reformas' and French 'réforme' preserve this sense of restructuring or correcting existing systems.

(2×) Two contrasting contexts: commending the 'reforms' accomplished under Felix's governance (Acts 24:2: Spanish 'reformas'), and describing old covenant regulations as valid only until the time of 'reformation' brought by Christ (Hebrews 9:10: French 'réforme'). Both involve systematic correction or improvement, though Hebrews gives it eschatological significance as the era of God's new ordering through Christ. RENEW REPAIR RESTORE en: of-reformation, reforms | es: de-reforma, reformas | fr: correction, réforme | de: Verbesserung, διορθωμάτων Acts 24:2; Heb 9:10

διορ-ύσσω G1358 V-ANP (4×) diorusso – to dig through, break through a wall; to break into a house by tunneling Diorusso (from dia, 'through,' and orusso, 'to dig') means to dig or break through, especially through the mud-brick or earthen walls of an ancient Near Eastern house. All four New Testament occurrences involve burglary through walls. Jesus warns against storing treasure where thieves 'dig through' and steal (Matt 6:19-20), and in the parable of the watchful householder, the thief would have 'broken in' had the master not kept watch (Matt 24:43; Luke 12:39). Spanish perforar/horadar, French percer, and German durchgraben all reflect the physical act of tunneling through a wall – a vivid image largely lost on modern Western readers unfamiliar with mud-brick construction.

(4×) To dig through or break through a wall, specifically by tunneling through the earthen or mud-brick walls of a house in order to gain entry as a thief. Jesus uses this image in his teaching on heavenly versus earthly treasure (Matt 6:19-20), where moths corrupt and thieves diorussosin ('dig through'). The same verb appears in the householder parables (Matt 24:43; Luke 12:39), warning against the unexpected thief who breaks through in the night. Spanish perforar and French percer both preserve the piercing, tunneling imagery that is rooted in ancient Near Eastern construction practices. PIERCE BORE THROUGH en: break-in, to-be-broken-into | es: perforan, ser-excavada, ser-horadada | fr: percer | de: διορυχθῆναι, διορύσσουσιν Matt 6:19; Matt 6:20; Matt 24:43; Luke 12:39

Δῐόσ-κοροι G1359 N-DMP (1×)
The Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux), twin sons of Zeus, patron deities of sailors, constellation Gemini
The Dioscuri—literally 'sons of Zeus'—were the divine twins Castor and Pollux (Greek Polydeuces), born to Leda. In Greco-Roman religion, they were patron gods of sailors, believed to protect ships and appear as the electrical phenomenon St. Elmo's fire during storms. Acts 28:11 mentions them as the figurehead of the Alexandrian ship that carried Paul from Malta to Italy. Ships often bore images of patron deities on their prows, and the Dioscuri were especially popular for Mediterranean vessels.

(1×) Acts 28:11 identifies Paul's ship by its figurehead: the Dioscuri, the twin gods Castor and Pollux who protected sailors in Greek and Roman belief. Ship figureheads invoked divine protection for voyages. French 'Dioscures' and English transliterations preserve the Greek, while Spanish maintains the Greek form. The reference shows how pagan religious symbols pervaded ancient maritime culture. GODS AND DEITIES en: Dioskouroi | es: Dióskouroi | fr: Dioscures | de: Διοσκούροις Acts 28:11

διότι G1360 Conj (23×)
Because, since, for the reason that; occasionally inferential 'therefore, for which reason.'
A compound conjunction from dia touto hoti ('for this reason, that'), dioti overwhelmingly introduces causal clauses explaining why something is or will be the case. Gabriel tells Zechariah not to fear 'because your prayer has been heard' (Luke 1:13); there was no room in the inn 'because' (Luke 2:7); Paul is told to keep speaking in Corinth 'because I have many people in this city' (Acts 18:10). In two passages, however, the word tilts toward inference — 'therefore' in Acts 13:35 and 20:26 — where it draws a conclusion from preceding argument. Spanish 'porque' and 'por lo cual,' French 'parce que,' and German 'weil' map this causal-to-inferential range clearly.

1. (21×) Causal conjunction: 'because, since, for the reason that,' introducing the ground or explanation for a preceding statement. This is the dominant use across 21 occurrences. Luke is particularly fond of it — the angel's reassurance in Luke 1:13, the nativity detail of Luke 2:7, the eschatological promise of Luke 21:28. Paul uses it in Rom 1:19-21 and Acts 18:10. Spanish 'porque,' French 'parce que,' and German 'weil' uniformly render the straightforward causal connection. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST en: because, because- | es: porque | fr: parce-que, parce-que- | de: weil, weil-
Luke 1:13; Luke 2:7; Luke 21:28; Acts 18:10

2. (2×) Inferential conjunction: 'therefore, for which reason,' drawing a conclusion from what precedes rather than supplying a cause. In Acts 13:35 Paul cites a psalm as evidence and draws a conclusion ('therefore he says also in another psalm'), and in Acts 20:26 he declares himself innocent of blood 'for which reason.' Spanish 'por lo cual / por esto' and English 'therefore' distinguish this inferential force from the plain causal sense, though French and German retain their standard causal renderings. THEREFORE PARTICLES
en: therefore | es: Por-lo-cual, por-esto | fr: parce-que- | de: weil Acts 13:35; Acts 20:26

G1361 N-NMS (1×)
Diotrephes, personal name meaning 'nourished by Zeus,' an early church leader who loved preeminence Diotrephes appears only in 3 John 9 as a church leader who opposed the apostle John's authority and refused to welcome traveling missionaries. His name means 'nourished/cherished by Zeus,' a common Greek theophoric name. John criticizes him for loving to have the preeminence, spreading malicious gossip about the apostles, and excommunicating those who showed hospitality to John's messengers. He represents early church power struggles and the danger of authoritarianism divorced from apostolic teaching.

(1×) 3 John 9 mentions Diotrephes as someone who 'loves to be first' and rejects apostolic authority. His Zeus-derived name was typical in Greek culture. John's critique reveals early church conflict between local leaders and apostolic oversight. The multilingual glosses preserve the Greek name with various transliterations, as it's a proper noun referring to a specific individual who embodied self-promotion over submission to apostolic teaching. GODS AND DEITIES en: Diotrephēs | es: Diotrephés | fr: Διωτρεφὴς | de: Diotrephes 3John 1:9

διπλόος G1362 Adj-ANS (4×)

diplous – twofold, double; twice as much in quantity, degree, or measure

Diplous means 'double' or 'twofold,' indicating something multiplied by two in quantity, degree, or severity. In the New Testament it carries both literal and intensified moral force. Jesus declares that scribes and Pharisees make a convert 'twice as much a child of Gehenna' as themselves (Matt 23:15) – a devastating rhetorical doubling. Paul urges that elders who rule well be counted worthy of 'double honor' (1 Tim 5:17). And in Revelation 18:6, Babylon is repaid double for her sins – Spanish doble, French double, and German doppelt all rendering the retributive multiplication. The word thus spans numerical doubling and intensified moral recompense.

(4×) Double or twofold in quantity, degree, or measure – indicating multiplication by two, whether literal or intensified. Jesus' rebuke that Pharisees make a proselyte 'double a child of Gehenna' (Matt 23:15) uses the word for moral intensification; elders deserve 'double honor' (1 Tim 5:17) for faithful service; and Babylon receives 'double' retribution for her sins (Rev 18:6, repeated). Spanish doble, French double, and German doppelt converge uniformly, confirming a single sense of twofold multiplication applied to both positive reward and punitive recompense. DOUBLE TWOFOLD

en: double, of-double, twice-as-much | es: de-doble, doble, el-doble | fr: double | de: doppelt, διπλότερον Matt 23:15; 1Tim 5:17; Rev 18:6

διπλ-όω G1363 V-AMA-2P (1×)

To double, multiply by two, repeat twofold; to repay double the amount

This verb means to make double or to multiply by two. In Revelation 18:6, it appears in the command concerning Babylon: 'Repay her double according to her works.' The doubling represents proportional justice—she receives back twice what she dealt out, emphasizing the completeness of divine retribution. Classical Greek used it for doubling quantities, folding garments in half, or repaying debts with interest. The New Testament usage carries the sense of comprehensive, multiplied judgment matching the scale of transgression.

(1×) Revelation 18:6 commands that Babylon be repaid 'double' (doubled) for her deeds, a vivid image of comprehensive divine justice. The Greek concept involves multiplying by two or repeating something twofold. English 'double,' Spanish 'doblad,' French and German 'verdoppeln' all capture the mathematical and retributive sense: complete payback multiplied, leaving nothing unaccounted for in God's judgment against the symbolic evil city. DOUBLE TWOFOLD

en: double | es: doblad | fr: verdoppeln | de: verdoppeln Rev 18:6

δίς G1364 N-NFP (7×)

Adverb: twice, two times; in compound form: two myriads (twenty thousand).

The Greek adverb dis means simply 'twice' and appears in moments of pointed repetition throughout the New Testament. Peter hears the rooster crow 'twice' as Jesus foretold (Mark 14:30, 72), the Pharisee boasts of fasting 'twice a week' (Luke 18:12), and Paul recounts sending aid to Thessalonica 'twice' (Phil 4:16; 1 Thess 2:18). Spanish dos veces and French deux fois render it with transparent two-times constructions, while German zweimal follows the same pattern. A single specialized occurrence in Revelation 9:16 preserves the word in compound form as part of dismyriades myriados — 'two myriads of myriads' — yielding a vast cavalry number. Here the same root that elsewhere counts to two suddenly scales to cosmic arithmetic, and translations shift accordingly: Spanish dos miríadas, German Zehntausende.

1. twice (6×) The straightforward temporal-quantitative adverb meaning 'twice' or 'two times,' marking the repetition of an action or occurrence. Six of seven NT uses fall here, spanning Peter's denial scene where the rooster crows 'twice' (Mark 14:30, 72), the Pharisee's self-righteous claim of fasting 'twice a week' (Luke 18:12), and Paul's repeated attempts to visit Thessalonica (Phil 4:16; 1 Thess 2:18). Spanish dos veces, French deux fois, and German zweimal all converge on transparent 'two times' expressions, confirming the basic iterative meaning. The cognate Latin bis and Sanskrit dvis show the deep Indo-European pedigree of this numeral adverb. TIMES AND OCCASIONS

en: twice | es: dos-veces | fr: deux-fois | de: Zehntausende, zweimal, δὶς Mark 14:30; Mark 14:72; Luke 18:12; Phil 4:16; 1Thess 2:18

2. two myriads (1×) A compound numerical use in Revelation 9:16, where dis appears as part of the phrase dismyriades myriadon ('two myriads of myriads'), denoting a vast army of two hundred million. This is not 'twice' in the iterative sense but the numeral 'two' functioning as a multiplier within a compound expression for an apocalyptic military host. German Zehntausende and Spanish dos miríadas shift to large-number vocabulary, and the construction echoes Hellenistic Greek conventions for expressing enormous quantities through myriad-multiplication. LARGE CARDINAL NUMBERS

en: two-myriads | es: dos-miríadas | fr: deux-fois | de: Zehntausende Rev 9:16

διστ-άζω G1365 V-AIA-3P (2×)

to doubt, waver in uncertainty; to be divided in mind or hesitate

This verb means to doubt or waver, suggesting division or hesitation in the mind. The root connection to 'twice' or 'double' implies being pulled in two directions. Matthew uses it twice: Jesus asking Peter why he 'doubted' while sinking (14:31), and noting that some disciples 'doubted' even when seeing the risen Christ (28:17). Both contexts involve faith challenges in supernatural moments—walking on water and resurrection appearance. The term captures the internal division between faith and fear, belief and uncertainty. Spanish 'dudaste' (did you doubt) and French 'douter' directly render this wavering between alternatives, this being of two minds.

(2×) Both Matthew instances involve doubt in the face of the supernatural: Jesus rebuking Peter's 'doubting' while sinking during the water-walk (Matthew 14:31: Spanish 'dudaste'), and some disciples 'doubting' even when seeing the resurrected Jesus (Matthew 28:17: Spanish 'dudaron'). The verb captures the wavering between faith and unbelief, the divided mind in moments requiring supernatural trust. DISCERN DISTINGUISH DOUBT en: did-you-doubt, doubted | es: dudaron, dudaste? | fr: douter | de: ἐδίστασαν, ἐδίστασας Matt 14:31; Matt 28:17

δί-στομος G1366 Adj-AFS (3×)

two-edged, double-mouthed; specifically describing swords or blades with cutting edges on both sides

The adjective δίστομος (literally 'two-mouthed,' from δίς + στόμα) describes weapons sharpened on both edges. In biblical usage it appears exclusively in metaphorical contexts about God's word as a weapon: sharper than any two-edged sword in Hebrews 4:12, proceeding from Christ's mouth in Revelation 1:16 and 2:12. The image emphasizes penetrating, discriminating power—a blade that cuts from either direction, leaving nothing unexamined.

(3×) All three NT uses apply 'two-edged' to the sword imagery of divine speech. Hebrews 4:12 employs it in the famous description of God's word as 'living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing to the division of soul and spirit.' Revelation 1:16 and 2:12 picture a sharp two-edged sword coming from the mouth of the Son of Man and the one who speaks to Pergamum. The multilingual unanimity (Spanish: de-dos-filos, French: [zweischneidig is German!], German: zweischneidig) reflects the concrete military imagery. The weapon's dual edges symbolize complete, inescapable judgment and discernment—the word examines from every angle. SWORD SHEATH

en: two-edged | es: de-dos-filos | fr: zweischneidig | de: zweischneidig Heb 4:12; Rev 1:16; Rev 2:12

δισχίλιοι G1367 Adj-NMP (1×)

Two thousand, the number 2,000; a specific quantity in the thousands range

A straightforward numerical term meaning two thousand. Mark 5:13 uses it to describe the size of the herd of pigs into which Jesus permitted the demons to enter—about two thousand swine rushed down the steep bank into the sea and drowned. The specific number emphasizes the magnitude of both the demonic possession (the demons were called 'Legion') and the economic loss to the swineherds. Greek numerical adjectives like this one were standard vocabulary for counting and measurement.

(1×) Mark 5:13 specifies that about two thousand pigs drowned after Jesus cast the demons into them. The precise number underscores the enormous scale of the miracle and the economic impact on the region. All language traditions render this straightforwardly as 'two thousand'—English, Spanish 'dos mil,' French 'deux mille,' German 'zweitausend'—as it's a simple numerical designation requiring no cultural translation beyond the number system itself. THOUSANDS AND MYRIADS

en: two-thousand | es: dos-mil | fr: deux-mille | de: zweitausend Mark 5:13

διῡλ-ίζω G1368 V-PPA-VMP (1×)

To strain out, filter carefully, remove small particles by passing through a filter; metaphor for scrupulosity

This verb means to strain or filter thoroughly, removing tiny particles from liquid. Jesus uses it memorably in Matthew 23:24 when He accuses the scribes and Pharisees of 'straining out a gnat but swallowing a camel'—being meticulously careful about minor ritual matters while ignoring massive moral failures. The image comes from wine-making and water purification practices where gnats or other small impurities were filtered out. Classical Greek used it for careful filtering of wine or other liquids.

(1×) Matthew 23:24 presents Jesus' biting critique: the religious leaders strain out gnats (tiny ritually unclean insects) while swallowing camels (massive unclean animals). The verb describes careful filtering to remove minute particles, used metaphorically for obsessive attention to minor legal details. Spanish 'coláis,' French 'filtrer,' and English 'straining out' all capture the filtering imagery—meticulous removal of the tiniest impurities while missing catastrophic contamination. DRINKING AND WATERING

en: straining-out | es: que-coláis | fr: filtrer | de: διϋλίζοντες Matt 23:24

δῐχάζω G1369 V-ANA (1×)

To divide in two, separate, set at variance; to cause division or discord between people

This verb fundamentally means to divide something into two parts or to split in half. Matthew 10:35 uses it in Jesus' sobering prophecy that He came 'to set a man against his father'—His message would create division even within families. The term can describe physical division or, metaphorically, relational separation and conflict. Classical Greek used it for literally cutting things in two or for creating divisions at midday (the day being 'split'). The New Testament usage emphasizes the divisive social impact of allegiance to Christ.

(1×) Matthew 10:35 uses this verb for Jesus' purpose 'to divide'—to set family members against each other through the radical claims of discipleship. The term conveys separation into two opposing parts. English 'to divide,' Spanish 'dividir,' French 'diviser' all express this fundamental splitting. Jesus' statement acknowledges that following Him creates unavoidable divisions when some accept and others reject His call, even breaking family unity. DIVIDING AND DISTRIBUTING en: to-divide | es: a-dividir | fr: diviser | de: διχάσαι Matt 10:35

δῐχο-στᾰσία G1370 N-NFP (2×)

dissension, division; standing apart in disagreement or conflict

This noun denotes dissension, division, or standing apart—particularly in contexts of communal discord. Paul warns against those who cause 'divisions' contrary to apostolic teaching (Romans 16:17) and lists 'dissensions' among works of the flesh (Galatians 5:20). The term suggests not merely disagreement but active standing-apart that fractures community unity. It combines 'dicha' (in two parts) with 'stasis' (standing), literally 'standing in two'—a community pulled apart into factions. Spanish 'disensiones' and 'divisiones,' along with German 'Zwietracht' (discord), capture this sense of fractured unity. Paul consistently presents such division as contrary to Spirit-led community life.

(2×) Paul's two uses both identify divisions as destructive: warning to avoid those causing 'divisions' contrary to received teaching (Romans 16:17), and listing 'dissensions' among fleshly works opposed to Spirit fruit (Galatians 5:20: Spanish 'divisiones,' German 'Zwietracht'). Both contexts condemn division as harmful to community unity and contrary to gospel values. DIVISION SPLIT

en: divisions | es: disensiones, divisiones | fr: Zwietracht, dissension | de: Zwietracht Rom 16:17; Gal 5:20

δῐχο-τομέω G1371 V-FIA-3S (2×)

to cut in two, sever completely; to punish with utmost severity

This graphic verb literally means to cut in two or bisect, but metaphorically indicates severe punishment or judgment. Jesus uses it identically in Matthew and Luke to warn that the unfaithful servant 'will cut him in two' and assign him with the hypocrites (Matthew 24:51) or unbelievers (Luke 12:46). Whether literal dismemberment or metaphor for ultimate severity, the term conveys decisive, irreversible judgment. The shocking imagery underscores the seriousness of unfaithfulness in stewardship. French 'couper en deux' and Spanish 'lo cortará en dos' preserve the literal cutting imagery, though the context may suggest this stands for the severest possible judgment rather than describing execution method.

(2×) Parallel uses in Jesus' parables of unfaithful servants: the master 'will cut in two' the wicked servant who abuses his position (Matthew 24:51, Luke 12:46: French 'couper en deux'). Whether literal or metaphorical, the term emphasizes the severity and finality of judgment on unfaithful stewards. The graphic imagery makes the consequence unmistakably serious. CUTTING AND SEVERING en: will-cut-in-two | es: lo-cortará-en-dos | fr: couper-en-deux | de: διχοτομήσει Matt 24:51; Luke 12:46

δῐψ-άω G1372 V-PPA-NMS (16×)

to thirst, be thirsty — to experience physical need for water or metaphorical longing for spiritual fulfillment

Dipsao captures both the raw physical sensation of thirst and a profound spiritual metaphor. On the literal side, Jesus identifies himself with the thirsty in the parable of the sheep and goats — 'I was thirsty and you gave me drink' (Matt 25:35) — and cries 'I thirst' from the cross (John 19:28). On the metaphorical side, the Beatitudes promise that those who 'hunger and thirst for righteousness' will be satisfied (Matt 5:6), and Jesus declares that whoever drinks the water he gives 'will never thirst again' (John 4:14; 6:35). Revelation bookends this dual register: 'let the one who thirsts come' (Rev 21:6; 22:17). Spanish 'tener sed,' French 'avoir soif,' and German 'duersten' all preserve both the physical and figurative dimensions.

to thirst, be thirsty (16×) To experience thirst, either as a literal physiological need for water (Matt 25:35, 37, 42, 44; John 19:28; Rom 12:20; 1 Cor 4:11) or as a metaphor for deep spiritual longing and desire for God or righteousness (Matt 5:6; John 4:13-14; 6:35; 7:37; Rev 21:6; 22:17). Jesus' own cry 'I thirst' on the cross (John 19:28) resonates on both levels simultaneously. The metaphorical usage draws on prophetic precedent (Isa 55:1) and finds its eschatological resolution in Revelation's invitation to the thirsty. THIRST AND DRYNESS

en: I-thirst, I-was-thirsty, he-thirsts | es: Tengo-sed, que-tienen-sed, sediento | fr: avoir-soif | de: duersten, διψῶντα, διψῶντες Matt 5:6; Matt 25:35; Matt 25:37; Matt 25:42; Matt 25:44

δίψος G1373 N-DNS (1×)

Thirst, the physical condition of needing water; craving for drink, dehydration

A straightforward noun for the physical experience of thirst—the body's need for water. Paul lists it in 2 Corinthians 11:27 among his apostolic sufferings: hunger and thirst were part of the hardships he endured for the gospel. While Scripture also uses thirst metaphorically for spiritual longing (as Jesus does in John 4), this particular occurrence refers to literal physical deprivation. The term appears in both classical Greek and the Septuagint for the common human experience of needing to drink.

(1×) 2 Corinthians 11:27 includes thirst in Paul's catalog of hardships—alongside hunger, cold, and nakedness. This is literal physical thirst, the body's craving for water during difficult missionary journeys. All language traditions use their standard word for this universal human experience: English 'thirst,' Spanish 'sed,' French 'soif,' German 'Durst.' Paul's willingness to endure such basic physical deprivation demonstrates his commitment to gospel ministry above personal comfort. THIRST AND DRYNESS

en: thirst | es: sed | fr: soif | de: Durst 2Cor 11:27

δίψῡχ-ος G1374 Adj-NMS (2×)

double-minded, wavering; having a divided soul or conflicting loyalties

This vivid adjective literally means 'double-souled' or having two minds, describing someone unstable or wavering in their commitments. James uses it twice: calling the double-minded man unstable in all his ways (1:8), and urging sinners to purify their hearts since they are 'double-minded' (4:8). The term captures internal division and consequent instability—trying to serve two masters or hold conflicting loyalties. The 'di-psychos' construction suggests a soul split between competing allegiances. Spanish 'de doble ánimo' (of double spirit) and German 'zweifelhaft' (doubtful) attempt to capture this internal division that produces unreliability and instability in all behavior.

(2×) James's two uses both condemn divided loyalty: the 'double-minded' man is unstable in all ways (James 1:8), and sinners must purify hearts because they are 'double-minded' (James 4:8: Spanish 'de doble ánimo'). The term diagnoses a fundamental problem—internal division between competing loyalties (typically God and world) that produces instability and prevents wholehearted devotion. DISCERN DISTINGUISH DOUBT en: double-minded | es: de-doble-ánimo | fr: δίψυχοι, δίψυχος | de: zweifelhaft Jas 1:8; Jas 4:8

διωγ-μός G1375 N-GMS (10×)

Persecution, hostile pursuit or systematic oppression on account of faith

Denotes hostile action directed against individuals or communities because of their religious commitment — ranging from social ostracism to organized violence. Jesus warns that persecution will accompany the word sown on rocky ground (Matt 13:21; Mark 4:17) and promises it as an inseparable companion to discipleship (Mark 10:30). Acts 8:1 records the great persecution that scattered the Jerusalem church after Stephen's death. Paul catalogues persecution among his apostolic sufferings (Rom 8:35; 2 Cor 12:10; 2 Tim 3:11), treating it as normative for faithful witness.

persecution (10×) Hostile pursuit or systematic oppression directed against believers on account of their faith. Jesus teaches that persecution tests those who initially receive the word with joy (Matt 13:21; Mark 4:17) and accompanies the hundredfold reward of discipleship (Mark 10:30). The post-Pentecost church experienced it corporately (Acts 8:1; 13:50), and Paul lists it among the tribulations that cannot separate believers from Christ's love (Rom 8:35; 2 Cor 12:10; 2 Tim 3:11). Spanish 'persecución,' Korean '박해,' and Swahili 'mateso' converge on this single meaning. PERSECUTE PURSUE

en: persecution, persecutions | es: persecuciones, persecución | fr: persécution | de: Verfolgung, διωγμοῦ, διωγμὸν Matt 13:21; Mark 4:17; Mark 10:30; Acts 8:1; Acts 13:50

διωκ-τήρ G1376 N-AMS (1×)

Persecutor, one who pursues others with intent to harm, harasser of the faithful

This noun designates someone who pursues others to harm them—a persecutor or hunter of people. Paul uses it of himself in 1 Timothy 1:13, confessing that before his conversion he was 'a blasphemer, persecutor, and violent aggressor' against the church. The term derives from the verb 'to pursue' or 'chase,' carrying connotations of hunting down prey. Paul's self-description emphasizes the magnitude of God's mercy—even a violent persecutor of Christians could be transformed into Christ's apostle.

(1×) 1 Timothy 1:13 records Paul's confession that he was formerly a persecutor of the church, someone who actively hunted down believers. The Greek emphasizes aggressive pursuit with hostile intent. English 'persecutor' and Spanish 'perseguidor' capture this sense of one who chases down victims. Paul's candid acknowledgment of his pre-conversion violence against Christians magnifies the grace that transformed him from Christianity's chief enemy to its greatest missionary. PERSECUTE PURSUE

en: persecutor | es: perseguidor | fr: διώκτην | de: Verfolger 1Tim 1:13

διώκω G1377 V-PIA-2S (45×)

To pursue or persecute; hostile chase of persons, or earnest striving after virtues like peace

A verb with two dramatically different applications sharing one root image: the chase. In its hostile sense, dioko describes the persecution Jesus warned his followers to expect (Matt 5:11; 10:23) and that Paul once inflicted on the early church (Acts 9:4-5). In its positive sense, Paul urges believers to "pursue" peace (Rom 14:19), hospitality (Rom 12:13), and righteousness (1 Tim 6:11). German verfolgen covers both senses, while Spanish splits between perseguir (persecute) and perseguir/buscar (pursue). The passive forms describe the experience of the persecuted — "blessed are those who are persecuted" (Matt 5:10).

1. persecute, oppress (26×) Active persecution: to pursue someone with hostile intent, to harass or oppress, especially for faith. Jesus' warnings in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:11-12, 44) and Paul's pre-conversion activity (Acts 9:4; Gal 1:13) define this sense. Spanish perseguir and German verfolgen both carry the hostile weight. The pursuit is sustained and purposeful — not a single act but a campaign of oppression. PERSECUTE PURSUE

en: I-was-persecuting, are-persecuting, are-you-persecuting | es: los-perseguía, perseguirán, perseguía | fr: persécuter | de: verfolgen, verfolgt Matt 5:11; Matt 5:12; Matt 5:44; Matt 10:23; Matt 23:34

2. pursue, strive after (13×) Positive pursuit: to strive after, eagerly seek, or press toward a goal. Paul transforms the chase metaphor: pursue peace (Rom 14:19), pursue hospitality (Rom 12:13), pursue righteousness (1 Tim 6:11). Spanish perseguid retains the verb form but shifts the object from persons to virtues. The athletic metaphor of Phil 3:12-14 ("I press on") draws on this same semantic field of determined forward motion. PERSECUTE PURSUE

en: I-pursue, let-him-pursue, let-us-pursue | es: Perseguid, perseguid, persigamos | fr: persécuter | de: verfolgen, verfolgt Luke 17:23; Rom 9:30; Rom 9:31; Rom 12:13; Rom 14:19

3. be persecuted, suffer persecution (6×) Passive experience of persecution: to be pursued, harassed, or oppressed. The beatitude "blessed are those who have been persecuted" (Matt 5:10) and Paul's paradox "persecuted but not abandoned" (2 Cor 4:9) use passive forms. French persécuter remains uniform across voices, while the Greek morphology (ediochthesan, diokomenoi) clearly marks the sufferer's perspective — endurance under hostile pursuit. PERSECUTE PURSUE en: am-I-persecuted, being-persecuted, having-been-persecuted | es: perseguidos, sean-perseguidos, serán-perseguidos | fr: persécuter | de: verfolgen, verfolgt Matt 5:10; 1Cor 4:12; 2Cor 4:9; Gal 5:11; Gal 6:12

δόγμα G1378 N-DNP (5×)

A decree, ordinance, or official edict; also a doctrinal regulation or legal stipulation

Covers both civic edicts and religious ordinances. Caesar Augustus issues a 'decree' that all the world should be enrolled (Luke 2:1), and the Thessalonian Jews accuse Paul of acting against Caesar's 'decrees' (Acts 17:7). Yet the same word also describes the apostolic decisions delivered to churches (Acts 16:4) and the Jewish legal ordinances that Christ abolished in his flesh (Eph 2:15; Col 2:14). The breadth is captured across languages: Spanish uses both 'decreto' and 'ordenanzas,' French 'décret,' and German 'Satzung' (statute).

(5×) A formal decree, ordinance, or regulation issued by an authority – whether imperial, apostolic, or religious. The range spans Caesar's census decree (Luke 2:1), the apostolic council's decisions (Acts 16:4), and the written code of Jewish legal regulations (Eph 2:15; Col 2:14). Spanish distinguishes 'decreto' for imperial edicts from 'ordenanzas' for religious statutes, while German 'Satzung' emphasizes the binding, statutory character. In Colossians 2:14, the 'ordinances' are metaphorically nailed to the cross, signifying their cancellation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-decree, decrees, ordinances | es: decreto, decretos, ordenanzas | fr: décret | de: Satzung, δογμάτων, δόγμα Luke 2:1; Acts 16:4; Acts 17:7; Eph 2:15; Col 2:14

δογμᾰτ-ίζω G1379 V-PIM/P-2P (1×)

To submit to rules or regulations, be subject to ordinances, accept imposed decrees

This verb in the passive voice means to submit oneself to decrees, ordinances, or regulations. Paul uses it in Colossians 2:20 to challenge the Colossians: if you died with Christ to the elemental principles of the world, why do you submit to regulations as if still living in the world? The term emphasizes voluntary submission to imposed rules or decrees. Classical Greek used it for establishing decrees or, in the passive, being governed by them. Paul questions why believers would return to rule-based religion after experiencing freedom in Christ.

(1×) Colossians 2:20 questions why believers submit to regulations ('Do not handle, Do not taste') when they've died with Christ to worldly principles. The verb emphasizes accepting or subjecting oneself to imposed rules. Spanish 'sometéis a decretos' and English 'submit to rules' capture this sense of voluntary compliance with external ordinances. Paul challenges the Colossians' return to legalistic religion that contradicts their freedom and completeness in Christ. COMMANDING AND ORDERING en: do-you-submit-to-rules | es: os-sometéis-a-decretos | fr: δογματίζεσθε | de: Satzungen-unterwerfen Col 2:20

δοκέω G1380 V-PPA-GMP (63×)

To think, suppose; to seem or appear; impersonally, to seem good or decide; to be reputed or esteemed.

This versatile Greek verb moves fluidly between the inner world of thought and the outer world of appearance. When Jesus asks 'What do you think?' (Matt 17:25; 22:42), the word invites genuine deliberation. When something 'seems' a certain way (Matt 18:12), the focus shifts to perception and impression. Luke uses the impersonal construction 'it seemed good to me' (Luke 1:3) to introduce his Gospel, and the Jerusalem council employs the same form for their communal decision (Acts 15:25, 28). Paul then stretches the word further in Galatians 2, where 'those who seemed to be something' — the reputed pillars — are weighed and found genuinely authoritative. French consistently translates with 'penser,' collapsing these nuances, while Spanish distinguishes 'pensar' from 'parecer' — a telling divergence.

1. think, suppose, believe (37×) The cognitive core: to think, suppose, or hold an opinion. This is the most frequent sense (37 occurrences), used when someone forms a judgment or entertains a belief. Jesus' pointed 'Do you think...?' (Matt 3:9; 26:53) and Paul's rhetorical challenges deploy this sense to provoke reflection. English 'think,' Spanish 'pensáis,' and German 'meinen' all point to the same deliberative mental act, while French 'penser' serves as a broad catch-all across multiple senses. THINKING AND SEEMING en: Think-you, do-you-think, he-seems | es: Pensáis, habiendo-pensado, parece | fr: penser | de: meinen, meint Matt 3:9; Matt 6:7; Matt 24:44; Matt 26:53; Mark 6:49

2. seem, appear (15×) To seem or appear — the word turns outward from private thought to public impression. Something gives the appearance of being a certain way to an observer. In Matthew 21:28 Jesus asks 'What does it seem to you?' and in Matthew 22:17 the Pharisees ask what 'seems right' about paying taxes. Spanish 'parece/parecen' cleanly distinguishes this perceptual sense from the cognitive 'pensar' of sense 1, a split that English 'seem' versus 'think' also captures. THINKING AND SEEMING en: I-might-seem, does-seem, he-seems | es: os-parece, parece, parecen | fr: penser | de: meinen, meint Matt 17:25; Matt 18:12; Matt 21:28; Matt 22:17; Matt 22:42

3. seem good, decide (6×) The impersonal deliberative use: 'it seemed good' or 'it was decided.' Luke 1:3 — 'it seemed good to me also' — and the Jerusalem council decrees of Acts 15 (vv. 22, 25, 28) employ this construction for formal or considered decisions. Spanish 'pareció bien' ('it seemed good') and English 'it seemed good' mark this as a collective or authoritative judgment rather than mere private opinion, bridging thinking and deciding. THINKING AND SEEMING en: it-seemed, it-seemed-good, seeming-good | es: pareciendo, pareció, pareció-bien | fr: penser | de: meinen, meint Luke 1:3; Acts 15:22; Acts 15:25; Acts 15:28; Acts 15:34

4. be reputed, be esteemed (5×) To be reputed, esteemed, or regarded as important. In Galatians 2:2, 6, 9, Paul refers to 'those who seemed to be pillars' — leaders whose reputation preceded them. Mark 10:42 similarly describes rulers who 'are regarded' as governing. Spanish 'estimados' and English 'esteemed' reveal a social-evaluative dimension: this is not about what someone privately thinks but about public standing and recognized authority. THINKING AND SEEMING en: esteemed, seeming | es: estimados, que-parecen | fr: penser | de: meinen Mark 10:42; Gal 2:2; Gal 2:6; Gal 2:9

δοκῐμάζω G1381 V-PMM/P-3P (22×)

To test, examine, prove; to discern or interpret; to approve as worthy after scrutiny

The verb δοκιμάζω originates in the world of metallurgy — assaying gold and silver for purity — and carries that testing imagery into every New Testament use. At its most concrete, it describes putting something to the test: a man proving new oxen (Luke 14:19), fire testing each builder's work (1 Cor 3:13). The word sharpens into the intellectual realm when it means to discern or interpret what is fitting, as when Jesus challenges the crowds to 'interpret' the present time (Luke 12:56). In its highest register, it means to approve or endorse as worthy, as when God tests and approves those entrusted with the gospel (1 Thess 2:4).

1. test, examine, prove (12×) The foundational sense of testing, examining, or proving the quality and genuineness of something or someone. From the assaying of metals in classical usage to Paul's exhortation 'let a person examine himself' (1 Cor 11:28), this sense pervades the NT. The multilingual glosses consistently show testing vocabulary — Spanish 'examinad,' 'a probarlas'; French 'éprouver'; German 'prüfen.' In 2 Cor 8:22 Paul speaks of a brother 'whom we have tested many times,' and in 2 Cor 8:8 he 'tests' the genuineness of the Corinthians' love. TESTING AND PROVING en: being-tested, let-be-tested, let-examine | es: Examínese, a-probarlas, examinad | fr: éprouver | de: pruefen, prüft Luke 14:19; 1Cor 3:13; 1Cor 11:28; 2Cor 8:8; 2Cor 8:22

2. discern, interpret, distinguish (5×) A refined cognitive sense of discernment: the ability to interpret signs, distinguish good from evil, and evaluate what is truly fitting. Luke 12:56 is the defining passage — Jesus rebukes the crowds who can interpret the sky but not the kairos ('this present time'). Rom 12:2 urges believers to 'discern' the will of God by the renewal of the mind. The shift from physical testing to moral-spiritual evaluation is marked in the glosses by words like 'discernir' (Spanish) and 'approve' (English), showing that the object of scrutiny has moved from material to moral. TESTING AND PROVING

en: approve, testing, to-interpret | es: apruebas, discernir, examinando | fr: éprouver | de: pruefen, prüft Luke 12:56; Rom 2:18; Rom 12:2; Eph 5:10

3. approve, accept as worthy (5×) The culminating sense of approval after examination — declaring someone or something worthy and fit. In 1 Thess 2:4 Paul says God 'approved' (δεδοκιμάσμεθα) the apostles to be entrusted with the gospel. Rom 14:22 speaks of the blessing of the one who does not condemn himself in what he 'approves.' Spanish 'aprobar/aprobaron' and English 'he approves' make the evaluative verdict explicit. This sense moves beyond testing into the result: a positive judgment rendered. TESTING AND PROVING en: he-approves, they-approved, to-approve | es: aprobar, aprobareis, aprobaron | fr: éprouver | de: pruefen Rom 1:28; Rom 14:22; 1Cor 16:3; Phil 1:10; 1Thess 2:4

δοκῑμ-ή G1382 N-GFS (8×)

Proof, tested character, or ordeal; the process of testing and the proven quality that results from enduring trial.

A richly layered noun that moves from the act of testing through to its outcome. In Romans 5:4, Paul traces a chain: tribulation produces endurance, and endurance produces dokime — a proven, battle-tested character. Elsewhere it denotes the concrete proof or evidence that validates a claim, as when Paul seeks 'proof of your obedience' (2 Cor 2:9). It can also name the trial itself, as in the Macedonian churches' 'great testing of affliction' (2 Cor 8:2). Spanish and French both render all three senses with a single word ('prueba,' 'epreuve'), showing how tightly the act of testing and the quality it produces are bound together.

1. proof, evidence (3×) Concrete demonstration or evidence that validates a claim — the tangible proof of something professed. Paul appeals to this sense when he writes of seeking 'proof of your obedience' (2 Cor 2:9) and 'proof of your ministry' (2 Cor 9:13). Spanish 'prueba' and German 'Pruefung' both carry this evidentiary nuance. TESTING AND PROVING en: proof | es: prueba | fr: épreuve | de: Pruefung 2Cor 2:9; 2Cor 9:13; 2Cor 13:3

2. proven character, tested quality (3×) The quality of character that emerges through endurance of trials — proven, tested moral fiber. Romans 5:4 presents the famous progression where tribulation yields endurance and endurance yields dokime. In Philippians 2:22, Timothy's proven character is commended. The multilingual glosses show Spanish splitting to 'caracter-probado' here, distinguishing result from process. TESTING AND PROVING

en: character, proven-character | es: carácter-probado, prueba | fr: épreuve | de: Pruefung Rom 5:4; Phil 2:22

3. testing, ordeal (2×) The process or experience of being tested, an ordeal or trial that puts faith to the proof. In 2 Corinthians 8:2, the Macedonian churches' 'great testing of affliction' overflowed in generosity. Hebrews 3:9 quotes Psalm 95 where Israel tested God in the wilderness. French 'epreuve' and Spanish 'prueba' encompass both this processual sense and the evidentiary one. TESTING AND PROVING en: testing | es: prueba | fr: épreuve | de: Pruefung 2Cor 8:2; Heb 3:9

δοκῑμ-εῖον G1383 N-NNS (2×)

testing, trial; a means of proving or examining something

This noun refers to a test or trial that proves genuineness—a means of examination that reveals true quality. James speaks of faith's 'testing' producing endurance (1:3), while Peter describes faith's 'genuineness' being more precious than tested gold (1 Peter 1:7). The term emphasizes not the trial itself but the proving or examining function of the trial. It shares roots with words for approved, tested, genuine. The concept is metallurgical—as fire tests gold, trials test faith. Spanish 'prueba' and German 'Bewaehrung' (proving/confirmation) capture this sense of a test that reveals and validates genuine quality through the process of examination.

(2×) Both occurrences relate to faith being proved through trials: the 'testing' of faith produces endurance (James 1:3: Spanish 'prueba'), and the 'genuineness' of faith, more precious than gold, is revealed through fire-like testing (1 Peter 1:7). The term emphasizes the proving function—trials that test and thereby demonstrate or develop genuine faith. TESTING AND PROVING en: testing | es: prueba | fr: δοκίμιον | de: Bewaehrung Jas 1:3; 1Pet 1:7

δόκῑμ-ος G1384 Adj-NMS (7×)

Approved, tested and proven genuine; found trustworthy after examination or trial.

Describes someone or something that has undergone testing and emerged as genuine, trustworthy, or acceptable. In the ancient world, the term applied to coins tested for authenticity ('legal tender'), and this metallurgical background colors its New Testament usage. Paul commends Apelles as 'approved in Christ' (Rom 16:10) and warns that factions exist precisely so that 'those who are approved may be recognized' (1 Cor 11:19). German 'bewahrt' (proven/preserved) and French 'éprouvé' (tested) both emphasize the trial-and-verification process behind the approval, rather than mere human opinion.

approved, tested and found genuine (7×) Tested and found genuine, approved through examination—describing a person or quality that has been tried and proven trustworthy. Used of character approved by God (Rom 14:18, 'acceptable to God and approved by men'; 2 Cor 10:18, 'not the one who commends himself but whom the Lord commends'), of specific individuals (Rom 16:10, Apelles 'approved in Christ'), and of the testing process itself (1 Cor 11:19, factions reveal who is 'genuine'; 2 Tim 2:15, the worker who need not be ashamed). German 'bewährt' and French 'éprouvé' both foreground the proving process, consistent with the classical usage of testing coins for genuineness. GUARDING AND KEEPING en: approved | es: aprobado, aprobados, probado | fr: bewahrt, éprouvé | de: bewahrt Rom 14:18; Rom 16:10; 1Cor 11:19; 2Cor 10:18; 2Cor 13:7

δοκός G1385 N-NFS (6×)

Beam, log, plank; a large piece of timber, used figuratively for a major fault in oneself.

A large structural timber—a main beam used in roofing or construction—which Jesus employs in one of his most vivid and memorable illustrations. In the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 7:3-5) and its Lukan parallel (Luke 6:41-42), he contrasts the dokos ('beam' or 'log') in one's own eye with the karphos ('speck' or 'splinter') in a neighbor's eye. The hyperbolic image is deliberately absurd: how can you offer to extract a tiny splinter from someone else's eye when an entire roof beam protrudes from your own? The metaphor teaches self-examination before criticism. Spanish 'viga' and French 'poutre' both denote a heavy structural beam, preserving the humorous disproportion that makes the saying so effective.

(6×) A large structural beam or log of timber, used literally in construction and figuratively by Jesus for a major personal fault that blinds one to smaller faults in others. The word appears exclusively in the 'beam and splinter' saying (Matt 7:3-5; Luke 6:41-42), where the absurd image of a roof beam lodged in someone's eye dramatizes the folly of hypocritical judgment. Spanish 'viga' (construction beam), French 'poutre' (main beam), and German 'Balken' all denote heavy structural timber, confirming that the metaphor's force depends on the sheer physical size of a dokos compared to a tiny karphos (splinter). AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15269 WITH 5 SENSES

en: beam, log | es: viga | fr: poutre | de: δοκόν, δοκὸν, δοκὸς Matt 7:3; Matt 7:4; Matt 7:5; Luke 6:41; Luke 6:42

δόλιος G1386 Adj-NMP (1×)

Deceitful, crafty, treacherous; characterized by cunning and deceptive intent

An adjective meaning crafty, deceitful, or treacherous—describing someone who operates through cunning and deception rather than honesty. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 11:13 to describe false apostles as 'deceitful workers' who disguise themselves as apostles of Christ. Classical Greek applied it to treacherous persons, cunning schemes, or even deities like Hermes and Aphrodite known for trickery. The term emphasizes deliberate, calculated deception designed to mislead others for selfish gain.

(1×) 2 Corinthians 11:13 identifies Paul's opponents as 'deceitful workers' masquerading as genuine apostles. The adjective describes those who work through cunning manipulation and deception. English 'deceitful,' Spanish 'engañosos,' French 'trompeur,' and German 'betrügerisch' all emphasize the fraudulent, treacherous character of these false teachers. Their craftiness involves deliberate misrepresentation—appearing righteous while serving selfish or demonic purposes rather than Christ. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14554 WITH 4 SENSES

en: deceitful | es: engañosos | fr: trompeur | de: betruegerisch 2Cor 11:13

δολιόω G1387 V-IIA-3P (1×)

To deal treacherously, deceive, act with guile; to behave deceitfully toward others

This verb means to act treacherously or deal deceitfully with someone. Romans 3:13 quotes Psalm 5:9 in Paul's catalog of universal human sinfulness: 'they kept deceiving with their tongues.' The term emphasizes ongoing deceptive behavior and treacherous dealing. The Septuagint uses it for acting with guile or betraying trust. Classical Greek similarly employed it for treacherous conduct. Paul's use highlights the moral corruption of humanity—speech itself becomes an instrument of deception and betrayal.

(1×) Romans 3:13 cites the Septuagint: 'they were deceiving with their tongues'—the imperfect tense suggesting continuous treacherous action. The verb describes dealing deceitfully or acting with guile toward others. Spanish 'engañaban,' French 'user de ruse,' and German 'betrügen' all emphasize the fraudulent, faithless character of fallen human speech. Paul employs this Old Testament quotation to demonstrate that universal sinfulness includes habitual deception in communication. DECEPTION AND BEGUILING

en: they-were-deceiving | es: engañaban | fr: user-de-ruse | de: betruegen Rom 3:13

δόλος G1388 N-GMS (11×)

Deceit, guile, cunning — deliberate deception or treachery employed to mislead or harm

The noun δόλος (dolos) denotes deliberate deception or craftiness used to injure someone. The chief priests seek to arrest Jesus 'by deceit' (Matt 26:4; Mark 14:1), and Elymas is denounced as 'full of all deceit' (Acts 13:10). Positively, its absence marks integrity: Nathanael is one 'in whom there is no deceit' (John 1:47), and Christ had 'no deceit' in his mouth (1 Pet 2:22). The word also appears in vice lists (Mark 7:22; Rom 1:29; 1 Pet 2:1). Spanish 'engano,' French 'ruse,' and German 'List' convey the scheming quality.

deceit, guile, cunning (11×) Deliberate deception, treachery, or craftiness employed to mislead or harm. Used of hostile plotting against Jesus (Matt 26:4; Mark 14:1), in vice lists (Mark 7:22; Rom 1:29; 1 Pet 2:1), and characterizing Elymas (Acts 13:10). Its absence marks integrity: Nathanael 'without guile' (John 1:47) and Christ with 'no deceit' found in his mouth (1 Pet 2:22). Spanish 'engano,' Arabic 'makr,' and Korean 'sokimsu' capture the scheming quality. DECEIT AND TREACHERY

en: by-cunning, by-deceit, deceit | es: con-engaño, de-engaño, engaño | fr: ruse | de: List, δόλου, δόλῳ Matt 26:4; Mark 7:22; Mark 14:1; John 1:47; Acts 13:10

δολόω G1389 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

To adulterate, falsify, corrupt by mixing; to handle deceitfully or manipulate dishonestly

This verb means to adulterate, corrupt, or handle something deceitfully—like a merchant mixing inferior materials into a product to defraud customers. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 4:2, renouncing 'adulterating the word of God'—he refuses to corrupt or manipulate God's message for personal gain. Classical Greek used it for adulterating wine, alloying metals with cheaper substances, or disguising things deceptively. Paul contrasts such corruption with proclaiming truth openly and honestly.

(1×) 2 Corinthians 4:2 has Paul renouncing the practice of 'adulterating the word of God'—corrupting or manipulating Scripture for selfish purposes. The verb describes mixing in foreign elements to defraud, like diluting wine or alloying gold. Spanish 'adulterando,' French 'falsifier,' and English 'adulterating' capture this sense of corrupt handling that compromises purity. Paul insists on transparent, honest proclamation rather than crafty manipulation of God's truth. DECEIT AND TREACHERY

en: adulterating | es: adulterando | fr: falsifier | de: verfaelschen 2Cor 4:2

δόμα G1390 N-ANP (4×)

doma – a gift, something given; an act of giving or a thing bestowed

Doma denotes a gift or thing given, derived from the verb didomi ('to give'). It is closely related to doron (G1435) and dorema (G1434), but doma tends to emphasize the concrete thing bestowed rather than the act of giving. Jesus argues from the lesser to the greater: if earthly fathers know how to give good gifts (domata) to their children, how much more will the heavenly Father give good things – or the Holy Spirit – to those who ask (Matt 7:11; Luke 11:13). Paul quotes Psalm 68:18 in Ephesians 4:8: the ascended Christ 'gave gifts (domata) to people.' In Philippians 4:17 Paul uses it for the Philippians' financial gift. Spanish dones, French don, and German Gabe all render it consistently as 'gift.'

(4×) A gift or thing bestowed, emphasizing the concrete item given rather than the abstract act of giving. Jesus employs this word in his a fortiori argument about the Father's generosity: if flawed human parents give good domata to their children, how much more the heavenly Father (Matt 7:11; Luke 11:13). Paul quotes Ps 68:18 in Eph 4:8, declaring that the ascended Christ distributed domata to his people – spiritual gifts for the building up of the church. Spanish dones and French don confirm a single undifferentiated sense of 'gift, thing given.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: gift, gifts | es: dones, regalo | fr: don | de: Gabe, δόματα Matt 7:11; Luke 11:13; Eph 4:8; Phil 4:17

δόξᾰ G1391 N-DFS (167×)

Glory, splendor, radiant majesty; the visible manifestation of divine excellence and honor

In classical Greek, doxa meant merely 'opinion' or 'reputation,' but the Septuagint transformed it into the standard rendering of Hebrew kavod — the weighty, luminous presence of God. By the New Testament, doxa carries the full freight of divine radiance: the shekinah glory that filled the temple, the splendor revealed at the Transfiguration (Matt 17:2), and the eternal magnificence to which believers are destined (Rom 8:18). Every major language renders it with a single dominant term — 'gloria,' 'gloire,' 'Herrlichkeit,' 'mahima' — reflecting its unified semantic weight.

glory, splendor, divine radiance (167×) The radiant magnificence, honor, and sovereign splendor of God made visible or acknowledged by creatures. Spanning 167 occurrences, it covers the glory of God's kingdom (Matt 6:13), the transfigured Christ (Luke 9:32), the hope of future glorification (Rom 5:2), and doxological praise (Phil 4:20). The cross-linguistic convergence — Spanish 'gloria,' Arabic 'مجد,' Korean '영광,' Hindi 'महिमा' — witnesses to a remarkably stable semantic core across the world's theological

vocabularies. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: glory, of-glory | es: de-gloria, gloria | fr: gloire | de: Herrlichkeit Matt 4:8; Matt 6:13; Matt 6:29; Matt 16:27; Matt 19:28

δοξ-άζω G1392 V-ASP-3P (62×)

To glorify or praise; actively ascribing glory to God, or being glorified and receiving divine honor — especially in Johannine theology.

A theologically central verb with two complementary movements: humans glorifying God, and God being glorified. In its active sense, it describes the response of praise — crowds glorifying God after healings (Matt 9:8; Mark 2:12; Luke 2:20), or believers honoring God through righteous conduct (Matt 5:16). Spanish "glorificar" and German "verherrlichen" both carry the full weight of rendering glory. The passive and divine-passive sense becomes especially prominent in John's Gospel, where Jesus speaks of being glorified through the cross (John 12:16, 23; 13:31-32) and of the mutual glorification between Father and Son (John 17:1, 4-5). French uses "glorifier" for both directions, but the Greek voice system and Johannine context make the distinction unmistakable.

1. glorify, praise actively (43×) To actively ascribe glory, honor, and praise to God or to another — the transitive sense of rendering glory. This dominant usage (43 occurrences) spans narrative responses to miracles (Matt 9:8; Mark 2:12; Luke 2:20), commands to glorify God (Matt 5:16; 1 Cor 6:20), and doxological declarations. Spanish consistently uses active forms like "glorificaban" and "glorificando," and German "verherrlichen" emphasizes the act of making glorious. GLORIFYING AND HONORING en: glorified, glorify, glorifying | es: glorifica, glorificaban, glorificando | fr: glorifier | de: verherrlichen, verherrlicht Matt 5:16; Matt 9:8; Matt 15:31; Mark 2:12; Luke 2:20

2. be glorified, receive glory (19×) To be glorified, to receive glory, or to have one's glory revealed — the divine passive describing glory conferred rather than given. Central to Johannine theology, where Jesus is glorified through his death and resurrection (John 7:39; 12:16, 23; 13:31) and the Father and Son mutually glorify each other (John 17:1, 4-5). Spanish marks this with passive constructions like "es glorificado" and "fue glorificado." Also includes the ironic sense of human self-glorification (Matt 6:2) where honor is received from people rather than God. GLORIFYING AND HONORING en: I-have-been-glorified, being-glorified, glorified | es: es-glorificado, fue-glorificado, glorificado | fr: glorifier | de: verherrlichen, verherrlicht Matt 6:2; Luke 4:15; John 7:39; John 11:4; John 12:16

δορκάς G1393 N-NFS (2×)

Dorcas (proper name): a disciple at Joppa known for good works and charity, also called Tabitha

Dorcas is the Greek name (meaning 'gazelle') of a female disciple in Joppa whom Peter raised from the dead. Acts 9 recounts her story, using both her Aramaic name Tabitha and Greek name Dorcas. She was known for good works and acts of charity, particularly making garments for widows. Her death occasioned great mourning, and Peter's raising her became widely known, leading many to believe. Both verses (9:36, 9:39) use the Greek form of her name, though the narrative indicates the community knew her by both names, reflecting the bilingual nature of diaspora Judaism.

(2×) The proper name appears twice in Acts 9's resurrection narrative: introducing her as 'Dorcas' (also called Tabitha), full of good works (Acts 9:36), and naming her again when Peter encounters the mourning widows showing garments 'Dorcas' had made (Acts 9:39). The Greek name (gazelle) pairs with Aramaic Tabitha in identifying this charitable woman whose resurrection powerfully testified to Christ. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Dorkas | es: Dorkás | fr: Dorcas | de: Δορκάς Acts 9:36; Acts 9:39

δόσις G1394 N-GFS (2×)

giving, the act of giving; a gift or bestowal

This noun denotes the act of giving or a gift given, focusing on the giving action rather than the item given. Paul uses it to describe the Philippians' pattern of giving and receiving in gospel partnership (4:15), while James contrasts variable giving with God's unchanging goodness (1:17). The term emphasizes the dynamic action of bestowal. It shares roots with 'didomi' (to give), making this the nominal form of the giving action itself. Interestingly, James uses it in parallel with 'good gift,' distinguishing the act of giving (dosis) from the gift given (dōrēma), though some translations blur this distinction. The Philippians usage emphasizes reciprocal exchange in gospel ministry.

(2×) Paul commends the Philippians' unique sharing in 'giving and receiving' during early gospel ministry (Philippians 4:15: Spanish 'de dar,' French 'δόσεως'), and James contrasts earthly variability with God's unchanging nature in 'giving' (James 1:17: German 'Gabe'). Both uses emphasize the act or pattern of giving rather than specific gifts, highlighting the relational dimension of bestowal and exchange. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: giving, of-giving | es: de-dar, dádiva | fr: δόσεως, δόσις | de: Gabe Phil 4:15; Jas 1:17

δότ-ης G1395 N-AMS (1×)

Giver, one who gives, donor; a person characterized by generosity and giving

A straightforward noun meaning 'giver'—one who gives or donates. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 9:7 in his famous statement: 'God loves a cheerful giver.' The term emphasizes not merely the act of giving but the person characterized by generosity. It's a later Greek form related to the verb 'to give.' Paul's point is that God values not the amount given but the heart attitude—cheerful willingness rather than grudging obligation. The giver's disposition matters more than the gift's size.

(1×) 2 Corinthians 9:7 declares God's love for a 'cheerful giver'—one whose giving flows from joy rather than compulsion. The noun emphasizes the person's character as one who gives. All languages render this transparently: English 'giver,' Spanish 'dador,' French 'donateur,' German 'Geber.' Paul's teaching elevates generous disposition over mechanical obligation—God delights in those whose giving reflects inner joy and love rather than external pressure or duty. GIVING AND BESTOWING en: giver | es: dador | fr: donateur | de: Geber 2Cor 9:7

δουλᾰγωγ-έω G1396 V-PIA-1S (1×)

To treat as a slave, bring into subjection, discipline severely; to exercise strict control over

This verb means to enslave, subjugate, or bring under strict discipline—literally to treat something as a slave. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 9:27 describing his self-discipline: 'I discipline my body and bring it into subjection.' The image is of an athlete or fighter exercising rigorous control over physical impulses to achieve a goal. Classical Greek used it for reducing someone to slavery or exercising harsh control. Paul applies it to voluntary self-mastery—treating his body as a slave to ensure his ministry's effectiveness.

(1×) 1 Corinthians 9:27 has Paul declaring he disciplines his body and 'brings it into subjection'—exercising strict mastery over physical desires like an athlete in training. The verb carries the force of enslaving or subjugating. Spanish 'esclavizo,' French 'réduire en esclavage,' and English 'bring into subjection' all capture this harsh control imagery. Paul's voluntary self-discipline prevents his body's appetites from disqualifying him from the very gospel he preaches to others. SUBJECTION AND AUTHORITY

en: I-bring-into-subjection | es: lo-esclavizo | fr: réduire-en-esclavage | de: in-Zucht-halten 1Cor 9:27

δουλ-εία G1397 N-AFS (5×)

Slavery, bondage; the condition of being enslaved, whether physical, spiritual, or existential

Denotes the state of being in bondage or servitude, used exclusively in the epistles to describe spiritual and existential enslavement. Paul contrasts the 'spirit of slavery' with the 'spirit of adoption' (Rom 8:15) and declares that creation itself groans under the 'bondage of corruption' (Rom 8:21). The Galatian correspondence intensifies the metaphor: the old covenant bears children 'for slavery' (Gal 4:24), and believers must not submit again to a 'yoke of slavery' (Gal 5:1). Spanish 'esclavitud,' French 'esclavage/servitude,' and German 'Knechtschaft' all capture the weight of subjugation.

(5×) The condition of slavery or bondage, used metaphorically in the NT for spiritual and existential subjugation. Paul deploys it as the antithesis of Christian freedom: a 'spirit of slavery' that leads to fear versus adoption as children (Rom 8:15), the 'bondage of corruption' from which creation awaits liberation (Rom 8:21), and the 'yoke of slavery' that legalism reimpositions on the free (Gal 5:1). Hebrews 2:15 speaks of lifelong slavery to the fear of death. The multilingual evidence – Spanish 'esclavitud,' French 'servitude,' German 'Knechtschaft' – consistently renders the term with words denoting total subjection. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: of-slavery, slavery, to-slavery | es: a-esclavitud, de-esclavitud, esclavitud | fr: esclavage, servitude | de: Knechtschaft Rom 8:15; Rom 8:21; Gal 4:24; Gal 5:1; Heb 2:15

δουλ-εύω G1398 V-PIA-3P (25×)

To serve or be subject to; to be enslaved, live in bondage

Douleuo derives from doulos (slave) and ranges from willing, devoted service to literal or figurative enslavement. Jesus uses it in a memorable absolute: 'No one can serve two masters' (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13), where service implies total allegiance. Paul stretches both poles — joyful service to God (Rom 12:11; 1 Thess 1:9) and bondage to sin, the law, or the elemental spirits (Rom 6:6; Gal 4:8–9, 25). Spanish captures the slavery sense vividly with 'servisteis como esclavos' (you served as slaves), while the general sense appears simply as 'servir.'

1. serve, render service to (19×) To serve, render devoted service, or perform duties on behalf of a master, lord, or cause — whether divine or human. Spanish 'servir' and German 'dienen' treat this as straightforward service. Jesus declares the impossibility of serving both God and Mammon (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13). The elder son has 'served' his father faithfully (Luke 15:29). Paul urges believers to serve the Lord with zeal (Rom 12:11; 1 Thess 1:9) and commends Epaphroditus's ministry (Phil 2:22). SERVING AND MINISTRY

en: I-serve, he-served, let-serve | es: para-servir, que-sirve, servid | fr: servir | de: dienen, dient Matt 6:24; Luke 15:29; Luke 16:13

2. serve as slave, be in bondage (6×) To serve in the specific sense of being enslaved, living in bondage, or being subjugated — whether literally or metaphorically. Spanish 'servisteis como esclavos' makes the slavery explicit. In John 8:33, the Jews protest they have never 'been enslaved' to anyone. God tells Abraham his descendants will 'serve' a foreign nation (Acts 7:7). Paul uses this sense for bondage to sin (Rom 6:6), to weak and worthless elemental spirits (Gal 4:8–9), and for Hagar's children born into slavery (Gal 4:25). SERVING AND MINISTRY

en: serving, she-serves, they-serve | es: hemos-servido, servir, servisteis-como-esclavos | fr: servir | de: dienen, dient John 8:33; Acts 7:7; Rom 6:6; Gal 4:8; Gal 4:25

δοῦλος G1399 N-AFP (3×)

female slave, bondwoman, servant; a woman in servitude, often used in self-designation before God

The feminine form δούλη corresponds to δοῦλος, denoting a woman in servitude. In the New Testament it appears notably in contexts of religious self-designation: Mary calls herself the Lord's 'handmaid' (Luke 1:38, 48), and Peter quotes Joel's prophecy about God pouring out his Spirit on 'female servants' (Acts 2:18). While the classical term could denote chattel slavery, biblical usage often elevates it to express willing submission to God's service.

(3×) The three occurrences center on women who serve the Lord. In Luke 1:38 Mary responds to the angel, 'Behold, I am the servant of the Lord,' and in 1:48 she prophesies that all generations will call her blessed because God 'has looked on the humble estate of his servant.' Acts 2:18 quotes Joel 2:29, promising that in the last days God will pour out his Spirit even on male and female servants. The Spanish (sierva, siervas) and French (servante) translations preserve the servant language. The term functions not primarily as a social descriptor but as a theological posture: complete availability to God's purposes, echoing the servant songs of Isaiah. FEMALE SERVANT SLAVE

en: female-servants, servant | es: sierva, siervas | fr: servante | de: δούλας, δούλη, δούλης Luke 1:38; Luke 1:48; Acts 2:18

δοῦλος G1400

slave, bondservant; one born into slavery or subject to another's will

A noun denoting someone in a state of bondage or servitude. Originally it distinguished those born into slavery from those enslaved later, but it came to serve as the general term for a slave or bondservant, in contrast to a master (δεσπότης). Greek writers applied it to Persians and others living under despotic rule, and metaphorically to those enslaved to passions, money, or appetites. The feminine form (δούλη) refers to a female slave or bondwoman. As an adjective, it describes slavish, servile character or actions. The term encompasses legal slavery, political subjection, and metaphorical bondage to powers other than a literal master.

δοῦλος G1401 N-AMP (126×)

Slave, bondservant — one bound in service to a master, used literally of slaves and figuratively of devoted service to God or Christ

Doulos denotes a person who belongs to another, a slave or bondservant. Unlike the English word 'servant,' which can imply voluntary employment, doulos in the Greco-Roman world meant legal property — a person without autonomous rights. The New Testament deploys this stark term in both directions: Jesus tells parables featuring literal household slaves (Matt 18:23-35; Luke 17:7-10), and Paul, James, Peter, and Jude each identify themselves as a doulos of Christ (Rom 1:1; Phil 1:1; Jas 1:1; 2 Pet 1:1; Jude 1). The paradox is deliberate — total submission to the divine Master is presented as the highest freedom. Spanish 'esclavo/siervo,' French 'serviteur/esclave,' and German 'Knecht/Sklave' variously capture the literal and dignified registers.

slave, bondservant (126×) A person held in bondage to a master, ranging from literal slaves in household and economic settings (Matt 18:26-27; Matt 24:45-46) to the self-designation of apostles and believers as bondservants of Christ (Rom 1:1; Gal 1:10; Phil 1:1). The term carries the full weight of Greco-Roman slave status — absence of self-determination and total availability to the master's will. Spanish distinguishes 'esclavo' (literal slave) from 'siervo' (dignified servant), French uses 'serviteur,' and German 'Knecht,' but none fully resolves the NT paradox where slavery to Christ constitutes true freedom. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: a-servant, a-slave, servant | es: esclavo, siervo | fr: serviteur | de: Knecht Matt 8:9; Matt 10:24; Matt 10:25; Matt 18:26; Matt 18:27

δουλ-όω G1402 V-RPM/P-NMP (8×)

To enslave, bring into bondage; in passive, to be enslaved or made subject — used of literal, spiritual, and relational servitude.

A verb meaning to reduce someone to slavery or to be in a state of bondage. In its active uses, it describes the forceful subjection of one person by another — as in Acts 7:6 where a foreign nation will enslave Abraham's descendants, or in 2 Peter 2:19 where false teachers enslave others through corrupt promises. Paul strikingly applies it to himself in 1 Corinthians 9:19, saying he 'enslaved himself' to everyone for the gospel's sake. The passive forms describe the resulting state: believers once enslaved to sin (Rom 6:18, 22), or the Galatians formerly enslaved to elemental forces (Gal 4:3). Spanish distinguishes 'esclavizados' (enslaved, passive) from 'esclavicé' (I enslaved, active), mapping neatly onto the two senses.

1. be enslaved, become a slave (passive/stative) (4×) To be enslaved, to exist in a state of bondage — passive and stative forms indicating subjection. In Romans 6:18 and 6:22, believers are described as having been freed from sin's enslavement and now made servants of righteousness. Galatians 4:3 recalls the time 'we were enslaved' under elemental principles, and Titus 2:3 warns against being enslaved to excessive wine. Spanish 'esclavizados/ fuisteis hechos siervos' and French 'asservir' capture the condition of involuntary subjection. SUBJECTION AND AUTHORITY

en: enslaved, having-become-slaves, having-been-enslaved | es: esclavizadas, esclavizados, fuisteis-hechos-siervos | fr: asservir, versklaven | de: versklaven Rom 6:18; Rom 6:22; Gal 4:3; Titus 2:3

2. enslave, make a slave of (active) (4×) To enslave actively, to bring someone into bondage or make oneself a slave to others. In Acts 7:6 God foretells that a foreign nation 'will enslave' Israel for four hundred years. Paul boldly declares in 1 Corinthians 9:19 that he 'enslaved himself' to all people for the sake of winning more to Christ — a voluntary, paradoxical self-subjection. In 2 Peter 2:19, false teachers promise freedom while themselves being slaves of corruption, and whoever is overcome by them 'is enslaved.' Spanish 'esclavicé/esclavizarán' marks the active, transitive force clearly. SUBJECTION AND AUTHORITY

en: I-enslaved, has-been-enslaved, he-has-been-enslaved | es: esclavicé, esclavizarán, ha-sido-esclavizado | fr: asservir, versklaven | de: versklaven, δουλώσουσιν Acts 7:6; 1Cor 7:15; 1Cor 9:19; 2Pet 2:19

δοχ-ή G1403 N-AFS (2×)

reception, feast; a banquet or festive gathering to receive guests

This noun means a reception or feast, particularly a banquet given to honor or receive someone. Luke uses it twice: Levi making 'a great feast' for Jesus (5:29), and Jesus instructing his host to invite the poor when giving 'a feast' (14:13). Both contexts involve banquet hospitality where guests are received and honored. The term shares roots with 'dechomai' (to receive), emphasizing the receptive, welcoming aspect of festive gathering. Spanish 'banquete' and French 'banquet' directly render this as the festive meal setting. Luke's usage highlights Jesus' table fellowship practices and his teaching about inclusive hospitality that inverts social expectations.

(2×) Both Luke occurrences involve banquet settings: Levi hosting 'a great feast' for Jesus with tax collectors and sinners (Luke 5:29), and Jesus teaching about inviting the poor when giving 'a feast' (Luke 14:13: French 'banquet'). The term designates a festive meal gathering where guests are received and honored, serving in Luke as a setting for Jesus' radical table fellowship and teaching on hospitality. BANQUETS AND FEASTS

en: a-reception, feast | es: banquete | fr: banquet | de: δοχὴν Luke 5:29; Luke 14:13

δράκων G1404 N-AMS (13×)

dragon, great serpent — a fearsome reptilian creature symbolizing Satan in apocalyptic vision

Drakon in classical Greek denoted a large serpent or mythical dragon, likely derived from derkomai ('to see keenly'), referring to the creature's piercing gaze. All 13 New Testament occurrences appear in Revelation, where the dragon is explicitly identified as 'that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan' (Rev 12:9, 20:2). John's apocalyptic vision portrays a great red dragon with seven heads and ten horns (Rev 12:3) waging cosmic war against the woman and her offspring. The dragon imagery draws on deep Old Testament roots — Leviathan, Rahab, the sea monster — recast as a definitive symbol of satanic opposition to God's purposes. Translations are consistent: Spanish 'dragon,' French 'dragon,' German 'Drache.'

(13×) A great serpentine or reptilian monster, used exclusively in Revelation as a symbol for Satan. The dragon is introduced as a fiery-red creature with seven heads and ten horns (Rev 12:3), wages war in heaven against Michael (Rev 12:7), is identified as the ancient serpent and the Devil (Rev 12:9, 20:2), empowers the beast from the sea (Rev 13:2-4), and is ultimately bound and cast into the abyss (Rev 20:2-3). All 13 NT occurrences belong to this single apocalyptic referent, drawing on ancient Near Eastern chaos-monster imagery reshaped by John's theological vision. SEA MONSTERS DRAGONS

en: a-dragon, dragon | es: dragón, dragón, | fr: dragon | de: Drache Rev 12:3; Rev 12:4; Rev 12:7; Rev 12:9

δράσσομαι G1405 V-PPM/P-NMS (1×)

To grasp, seize with the hand, catch hold of; to take firmly in one's grip

This middle voice verb means to grasp or seize something with the hand—to take firm hold. In 1 Corinthians 3:19, Paul quotes Job 5:13: God 'catches the wise in their craftiness.' The image is of God grasping cunning schemers as one might grab an opponent. Classical Greek used it for clutching handfuls of something or seizing someone by the throat. The New Testament usage emphasizes God's power to capture and thwart those who rely on their own cleverness rather than His wisdom.

(1×) 1 Corinthians 3:19 quotes Job's declaration that God 'catches the wise in their craftiness'—seizing them in the very schemes they devise. The verb describes grasping firmly with the hand, like catching prey. English 'catching,' Spanish 'atrapando,' French 'saisir,' and German 'fangen' all express this sense of firm seizure. God turns human cunning back on itself, grasping schemers in their own traps—divine wisdom defeats worldly cleverness at its own game. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

en: catching | es: atrapando | fr: saisir | de: fangen 1Cor 3:19

δραχμ-ή G1406 N-AFP (3×)

drachma, a Greek silver coin worth approximately a day's wage, used in Jesus' parable of the lost coin

The drachma was a silver coin in the Greek monetary system, roughly equivalent to the Roman denarius and representing about one day's wages for a laborer. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in the parable of the lost coin (Luke 15:8-9), where a woman searches diligently for one of her ten drachmas. The coin's value—significant but not extravagant—makes the parable's point: even what seems small to others is precious to the one who owns it, just as each lost sinner matters to God.

(3×) All three NT occurrences cluster in Luke 15:8-9 (with two mentions in verse 8). The woman has ten drachmas and loses one, then lights a lamp, sweeps the house, and searches carefully until she finds it. Upon recovery she calls together friends and neighbors to rejoice. The coin represents both economic value (perhaps a day's wage) and personal treasure—possibly part of a bridal dowry worn as a headpiece. The multilingual consistency (Spanish: dracma/dracmas, French: drachme) reflects the term's technical precision. Jesus chose this everyday monetary unit to illustrate God's relentless pursuit of the lost, making divine grace tangible through a woman's economics. SILVER AND MONEY

en: drachma, drachmas | es: dracma, dracmas | fr: drachme | de: δραχμὰς, δραχμὴν Luke 15:8; Luke 15:9

δρέπᾰνον G1407 N-ANS (8×)

Sickle; a curved harvesting blade, used literally of grain harvest and figuratively of divine end-time reaping.

The curved cutting tool used for harvesting grain, appearing in both a parabolic and an apocalyptic register. In Mark 4:29, Jesus says that when the grain is ripe, the farmer 'puts in the sickle, because the harvest has come' — a homely agricultural image. But in Revelation 14:14-19, the sickle becomes the instrument of cosmic judgment: the Son of Man and angels swing their sickles to reap the earth's harvest and gather grapes for the winepress of God's wrath. Spanish 'hoz,' French 'faucille,' and German 'Sichel' all denote the same agricultural implement, and all carry the same potential for metaphorical extension into judgment imagery.

sickle (8×) A curved blade or reaping hook used to harvest grain, employed both in literal agricultural imagery (Mark 4:29, where the farmer sends forth the sickle at harvest) and as a powerful symbol of eschatological judgment (Rev 14:14-19, where the Son of Man and angels reap the earth with sharp sickles). Despite the shift from pastoral parable to apocalyptic vision, the underlying referent remains the same agricultural tool. Spanish 'hoz,' French 'faucille,' and German 'Sichel' all render it consistently, confirming a single lexical sense whose metaphorical freight comes from context rather than polysemy. SICKLE HARVEST TOOL

en: a-sickle, sickle | es: hoz | fr: faucille | de: Sichel Mark 4:29; Rev 14:14; Rev 14:15; Rev 14:16; Rev 14:17

δρόμος G1408 N-AMS (3×)

race, course; a path to be run, metaphorically one's life mission or appointed service

Borrowed from athletic contexts where δρόμος meant a footrace or the course itself, the word takes on rich metaphorical meaning in Paul's ministry reflections. He speaks of 'finishing the race' or 'completing the course' as a way to describe faithful completion of apostolic calling. The image combines the ideas of a defined path, sustained effort, and a finish line—all apt for describing the Christian ministry or life itself as a purposeful journey from start to completion.

(3×) In Acts 13:25 John the Baptist speaks of completing his course: 'As John was finishing his race, he said...' Acts 20:24 records Paul's famous declaration that his life is worth nothing 'if only I may finish my course and the ministry I received from the Lord Jesus.' In 2 Timothy 4:7 Paul writes from prison, 'I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith.' The Spanish (carrera), French (course), and German (Lauf) translations capture the athletic metaphor. The race imagery emphasizes purposeful direction, sustained endurance, and the goal of completion rather than abandonment or failure. STRUGGLE AND CONTEST

en: course, race | es: carrera | fr: course, δρόμον | de: Lauf, δρόμον Acts 13:25; Acts 20:24; 2Tim 4:7

Δρούσιλλα G1409 N-DFS (1×)

Drusilla, Roman personal name; wife of Felix the governor, daughter of Herod Agrippa I Drusilla was the wife of the Roman procurator Felix, present when Paul reasoned about faith in Christ (Acts 24:24). She was the daughter of Herod Agrippa I and great-granddaughter of Herod the Great. Her name is Latin, from the Drusus family. Historically, she left her first husband to marry Felix, a scandal noted by Josephus. Luke's mention of her suggests both she and Felix heard Paul's gospel presentation, though their response was to postpone further discussion out of fear.

(1×) Acts 24:24 identifies Drusilla as Felix's wife (herself Jewish, daughter of Herod Agrippa I) who was present for Paul's testimony. Her Latin name reflects Roman cultural dominance. French 'Drusille' naturalizes it slightly, while other languages preserve the Greek transliteration. Her presence during Paul's discussion of 'righteousness, self-control, and judgment' may have been particularly uncomfortable given her questionable marriage to Felix, possibly contributing to their fearful response. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Drousilla | es: Drousílla | fr: Drusille | de: Δρουσίλλῃ Acts 24:24

δύνᾰμαι G1410 V-IIM/P-2P (210×)

To be able, to have power; as a verb 'can/could'; substantivally, 'the powerful one' or 'the mighty.'

Dynamai is the root behind English 'dynamic' and 'dynamite,' and its 210 NT occurrences pulse with questions of capability and power. 'Can these stones become bread?' (Matt 4:3). 'No one can serve two masters' (Matt 6:24). 'With God all things are possible' (Matt 19:26). In a handful of passages, the participle shifts from verbal to substantival, describing someone — often God — as 'the Powerful One' (Rom 15:14; 2 Tim 1:12). Spanish puede, French pouvoir, and German kann all capture the basic modal sense, but the substantival 'mighty one' use reveals the theological depth latent in this everyday verb.

1. be able, can (197×) Core verbal sense of possessing capability or power to do something — 'to be able,' 'can,' 'could.' Used across all persons, tenses, and moods to express practical, moral, or divine capacity. 'God is able from these stones to raise up children to Abraham' (Matt 3:9); 'no one can serve two masters' (Matt 6:24); 'if you can do anything, have compassion' (Mark 9:22). Spanish puede, French pouvoir, and German kann/können mirror this modal auxiliary function. The 197 occurrences make it one of the most frequent verbs in the NT. ABILITY AND POWER

en: he-is-able, is-able | es: puede | fr: pouvoir | de: kann, koennen Matt 3:9; Matt 5:14; Matt 6:24; Matt 6:27; Matt 7:18

2. the powerful / mighty one (13×) Substantival or attributive participial use where dynamenos functions as a noun or adjective meaning 'the powerful one,' 'the mighty,' or 'one who is able.' God is described as 'the one who is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna' (Matt 10:28), and Paul trusts 'the one who is able to guard what I have entrusted' (2 Tim 1:12). Spanish es poderoso and German Vermögenden shift from modal verb to quality-of-being language. These 13 occurrences reveal how Greek grammar allows a common verb to crystallize into a divine title (cf. Rom 15:14; Acts 20:32). ABILITY AND POWER

en: able, being-able | es: es-poderoso, pudiendo, que-podía | fr: pouvant, pouvoir | de: Vermögenden, kann, koennen Matt 10:28; Matt 19:12; Acts 20:32; Acts 27:43; Rom 15:14

δύνᾰμις G1411 N-GFS (120×)

Power, might, miraculous deed, cosmic force, ability, or meaning — from God's inherent strength to specific miracles, spiritual beings, and the force of an utterance

Dynamis is the New Testament's premier power word, giving English its 'dynamic' and 'dynamite.' Yet its range extends far beyond brute force. In the singular it names the raw, inherent power of God or his Spirit (Luke 1:35; Acts 1:8), while in the plural it splits into two strikingly different directions: concrete miraculous deeds ('mighty works' that Jesus performed) and cosmic spiritual beings ('powers' that cannot separate us from God's love). Paul even deploys it once for the 'meaning' of a spoken sound (1 Cor 14:11), and the parable of the talents uses it for practical 'ability' proportioned to each servant. French puissance, German Kraft, and Spanish poder all collapse these distinctions, but the multilingual evidence from Arabic and Korean confirms that native speakers consistently differentiate raw power from miracle from cosmic entity.

1. power, might, force (90×) Inherent power, might, or strength (90x): the abstract capacity or force itself, whether divine, spiritual, or human. Spanish poder, French puissance, and German Kraft all converge on this core meaning. Covers the power of God (Matt 22:29 'you do not know the power of God'), the power of the Spirit (Luke 1:35; 4:14; Acts 1:8), eschatological power (Matt 24:30 'coming with power and great glory'), and the power at work in believers (Eph 1:19; 3:20). Mark 5:30 captures the concreteness: Jesus perceives that 'power had gone out from him' — dynamis as almost a tangible substance. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: power | es: poder | fr: puissance | de: Kraft Matt 6:13; Matt 22:29; Matt 24:30; Mark 5:30; Mark 9:1

2. miraculous deeds, mighty works (16×) Miraculous deeds, mighty works (plural, 16x): specific acts of supernatural power performed by God or his agents. Spanish milagros and English mighty-works distinguish these from abstract power. Jesus upbraids cities where 'most of his mighty works had been done' (Matt 11:20-23), the people of Nazareth ask 'what mighty works are done by his hands?' (Matt 13:54; Mark 6:2), and Paul lists 'miracles' as a spiritual gift (1 Cor 12:10, 28-29). The plural form is the key grammatical signal separating this sense from sense 1. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: mighty-works, miracles, powers | es: Milagros, milagros, obras-poderosas | fr: puissance | de: Kraft Matt 7:22; Matt 11:20; Matt 11:21; Matt 11:23; Matt 13:54

3. supernatural powers, cosmic forces (10×) Supernatural powers, cosmic forces (plural, 10x): spiritual or angelic beings understood as personified powers operating in the heavens. Spanish poderes and English powers in cosmic contexts mark this as an entity rather than an attribute. The 'powers of the heavens' will be shaken at the eschaton (Matt 24:29; Mark 13:25; Luke 21:26), and Paul declares that neither 'powers' nor any other cosmic force can separate believers from God's love (Rom 8:38). Distinct from sense 2 because these are beings, not acts — a usage that bridges Jewish angelology and Hellenistic cosmology. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: by-powers, of-powers, powers | es: con-poderes, de-poderes, poderes | fr: puissance | de: Kraft Matt 24:29; Mark 13:25; Luke 21:26; Acts 2:22; Rom 8:38

4. miraculous deed, mighty work (2×) A specific miraculous deed, mighty work (singular, 2x): an individual act of supernatural power viewed as a discrete event rather than a category. Spanish milagro (singular) and English a-miracle mark the countable, singular nature. In Mark 6:5 Jesus 'could do no mighty work there,' and in Mark 9:39 he says 'no one who does a mighty work in my name can soon afterward speak evil of me.' The singular distinguishes a particular wonder from the collective 'mighty works' of sense 2. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: a-miracle, mighty-work | es: milagro | fr: puissance | de: Kraft Mark 6:5; Mark 9:39

5. meaning, significance (1×) Meaning, significance, force of an utterance (1x): what a spoken sound signifies or conveys. Spanish significado confirms the semantic shift from physical power to communicative force. In 1 Cor 14:11, Paul writes 'if I do not know the meaning (dynamin) of the language, I will be a foreigner to the speaker.' This unique extension treats dynamis as the semantic 'power' a word carries — its capacity to communicate, a natural metaphorical stretch from 'force' to 'import.' POWER AND MIRACLES

en: meaning | es: significado | fr: puissance | de: Kraft 1Cor 14:11

6. ability, capacity (1×) Ability, practical capacity (1x): personal capability to accomplish something, emphasizing practical talent rather than raw force. Spanish capacidad and English ability mark the pragmatic, individual dimension. In the parable of the talents (Matt 25:15), the master distributes resources 'to each according to his own ability (dynamin).' Here dynamis is neither divine power nor miracle but measured human competence — the practical means a person possesses. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: ability | es: capacidad | fr: puissance | de: Kraft Matt 25:15

δῠνᾰμ-όω G1412 V-PPM/P-NMP (2×)

to be strengthened, empowered; to receive or exercise power (passive)

This verb means to be strengthened or empowered, to receive enabling power for a task. Paul uses it for being 'strengthened with all power' according to God's might for endurance (Colossians 1:11), and for the faithful who through faith 'were made strong' from weakness (Hebrews 11:34). The passive voice emphasizes receiving power from an external source rather than self-generated strength. The term builds on 'dynamis' (power), creating a verb for the dynamic act of empowering or being empowered. Spanish 'fortalecidos' (strengthened) and French 'fortifier' capture this sense of receiving strength, being made powerful for challenges beyond natural capacity.

(2×) Both uses involve divine empowerment: believers 'being strengthened' with God's glorious might for patient endurance (Colossians 1:11: Spanish 'siendo fortalecidos'), and faithful ones who 'were made strong' out of weakness through faith (Hebrews 11:34: Spanish 'fueron fortalecidos'). The passive voice emphasizes that power comes from outside—God strengthening those who would otherwise be weak. STRENGTHENING AND POWER

en: being-empowered, were-strengthened | es: fueron-fortalecidos, siendo-fortalecidos | fr: fortifier | de: staerken Col 1:11; Heb 11:34

δῠνάστ-ης G1413 N-NMS (3×)

ruler, sovereign, powerful one; a person of great authority or might, from local officials to divine majesty

The noun δυνάστης (from δύναμαι, 'to be able') denotes someone who exercises power or rule, ranging from court officials to cosmic rulers. In biblical usage it spans from a specific Ethiopian court official to God's absolute sovereignty. The term emphasizes actual power rather than merely formal position—these are people who can make things happen, whether through political authority, military might, or divine omnipotence.

(3×) The three NT occurrences cover the spectrum of power. In Luke 1:52 Mary's Magnificat proclaims that God 'has brought down the powerful from their thrones'—earthly dynasts displaced by divine reversal. Acts 8:27 uses it for the Ethiopian eunuch, 'a court official of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, who was in charge of all her treasure'—a high-ranking governmental minister. First Timothy 6:15 applies it to God himself as 'the blessed and only Sovereign, the King of kings and Lord of lords.' The Spanish (Soberano, oficial, poderosos) and French (puissant) reflect varying contexts. The semantic core remains consistent: effective, exercised authority rather than titular rank. POWER AND ABILITY

en: Sovereign, court-official, rulers | es: Soberano, oficial, poderosos | fr: puissant | de: Machthaber, δυνάστας, δυνάστης Luke 1:52; Acts 8:27; 1Tim 6:15

δῠνᾰτ-έω G1414 V-PIA-3S (3×)

to be able, to be powerful; expressing capacity, potency, or enablement for action

This verb form of δυνατός functions similarly to the more common δύναμαι but with slightly more emphasis on inherent power or capacity. It appears in Pauline contexts emphasizing divine enabling: God is able to make believers stand, to make grace abound, and to work powerfully through Christ. The word focuses on capability and potency rather than mere permission—it's about having the power to accomplish something, not just the authority to attempt it.

(3×) In Romans 14:4 Paul defends the standing of the one who eats: 'for the Lord is able to make him stand'—God has the power to sustain the believer. Second Corinthians 9:8 promises abundant provision: 'And God is able to make all grace abound to you.' In 2 Corinthians 13:3 Paul challenges those seeking proof: 'since you seek proof that Christ is speaking in me. He is not weak in dealing with you, but is powerful among you.' The Spanish (es-poderoso) and French (puissant) emphasize the power aspect. The theological point is divine enablement: what God purposes, God has the capacity to accomplish—in sustaining believers, multiplying grace, or demonstrating Christ's power. POWER AND ABILITY

en: is-able, is-powerful | es: es-poderoso | fr: puissant | de: maechtig-sein Rom 14:4; 2Cor 9:8; 2Cor 13:3

δῠνᾰτ-ός G1415 Adj-ANS (32×)

Possible (impersonal: 'it is possible'); powerful, mighty (of persons/deeds); able, capable (with infinitive).

The Greek adjective dunatos belongs to the dunamis word family of power, ability, and possibility. Most frequently it appears impersonally — dunaton estin, 'it is possible' — anchoring Jesus' declaration 'with God all things are possible' (Matt 19:26; Mark 10:27). As a personal adjective it describes the 'mighty': Moses was dunatos in word and deed (Acts 7:22), and the Magnificat praises 'the Mighty One' (Luke 1:49). Spanish poderoso/posible, French puissant/possible, and German maechtig/moeglich reflect how most languages split what Greek holds in one form.

1. possible (13×) The impersonal neuter sense 'possible,' typically in the construction dunaton (estin), meaning 'it is possible' or 'it is not possible.' With 13 occurrences, this is the most frequent NT use, appearing in Jesus' Gethsemane prayer 'if it is possible, let this cup pass from me' (Matt 26:39; Mark 14:35-36), the warning about deception 'so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect' (Matt 24:24; Mark 13:22), and the pivotal salvation saying 'with God all things are possible' (Matt 19:26; Mark 10:27; Luke 18:27). Spanish posible, French possible, and German moeglich all converge cleanly here. Romans 12:18 extends the sense ethically: 'if possible, so far as it depends on you, live peaceably with all.' POWER AND ABILITY

en: are-possible, possible | es: es-posible, fuera-posible, posible | fr: puissant | de: maechtig, mächtig Matt 19:26; Matt 24:24; Matt 26:39; Mark 9:23; Mark 10:27

2. powerful, mighty, strong (11×) A personal adjective meaning 'powerful, mighty, strong' — describing persons or deeds that possess inherent force, authority, or effectiveness. With 11 occurrences, this sense includes Mary's praise of ho Dunatos, 'the Mighty One' who has done great things (Luke 1:49), the characterization of Jesus as 'a prophet mighty in deed and word' (Luke 24:19), Moses described as 'mighty in his words and deeds' (Acts 7:22), Apollos who was 'mighty in the Scriptures' (Acts 18:24), and Paul's letters which are 'weighty and powerful' (2 Cor 10:10). Spanish poderoso, French puissant, German maechtig, and Arabic قَوِيّ all deploy personal-power vocabulary here, distinct from the abstract 'possible' of sense 1. The Lukan occurrences are especially striking: dunatos becomes virtually a divine title in the Magnificat. POWER AND ABILITY

en: Mighty-One, power, powerful | es: Poderoso, capaces, fuertes | fr: puissant | de: maechtig, mächtig Luke 1:49; Luke 24:19; Acts 7:22; Acts 18:24; Acts 25:5

3. able, capable (8×) A predicate adjective meaning 'able, capable' with an infinitive or implied infinitive, describing a subject — typically God — who has the capacity to accomplish something specific. With 8 occurrences, this sense appears in constructions like 'God is able to raise up children from these stones' (implied in Luke 14:31), 'God was able to do what he had promised' (Rom 4:21), 'God is able to graft them in again' (Rom 11:23), and 'I am persuaded that he is able to guard what I have entrusted to him' (2 Tim 1:12). Spanish capaz/poderoso, French capable/puissant, and German imstande/faehig distinguish this 'ability with respect to a task' from general might. The theological weight falls on divine capacity: five of the eight instances predicate ability of God, making this a vocabulary of faith and confidence in divine competence. POWER AND ABILITY

en: able | es: capaz, poderoso | fr: puissant | de: maechtig, mächtig Luke 14:31; Acts 11:17; Rom 4:21; Rom 11:23; 2Tim 1:12

δύω G1416 V-PPA-GMS (2×)

to set, go down (of the sun); to sink below the horizon

This verb describes the sun setting or going down below the horizon. Both Gospel instances mark the transition from day to evening when people brought the sick to Jesus for healing: in Mark 'when the sun had set' (1:32), and in Luke 'as the sun was setting' (4:40). The temporal marker is significant because sabbath restrictions ended at sundown, allowing the crowds to carry their sick. The verb captures the daily celestial movement that structures ancient timekeeping. Spanish 'se puso' (went down) and French 'se coucher' (to go to bed/set) naturally apply this verb to the sun's daily descent below the horizon.

(2×) Both occurrences mark the end of sabbath when crowds could bring the sick to Jesus: 'when the sun had set' in Capernaum (Mark 1:32: Spanish 'se puso'), and 'as the sun was setting' (Luke 4:40: English 'setting'). The natural phenomenon of sunset functions as the temporal marker freeing people from sabbath travel restrictions, explaining the timing of the crowds bringing the sick for healing. RECLINING AND LYING en: set, setting | es: Poniéndose, se-puso | fr: se-coucher | de: Δύνοντος, ἔδυ Mark 1:32; Luke 4:40

δύο G1417 Adj-AMP (137×)

Two — the cardinal numeral for a pair, used attributively and substantively throughout the New Testament

Dyo is the Greek cardinal numeral 'two,' appearing 137 times in the New Testament across every case and gender. It functions both as a simple quantifier — 'two brothers' (Matt 4:18), 'two sparrows' (Matt 10:29) — and as a theologically significant number: two witnesses establish testimony (Matt 18:16; Rev 11:3), two masters cannot both be served (Matt 6:24), and 'where two or three are gathered' Christ is present (Matt 18:20). The word is morphologically indeclinable in many contexts, as it was already in classical Attic. Spanish 'dos,' French 'deux,' and German 'zwei' all render it straightforwardly.

two (cardinal numeral) (137×) The cardinal number two, denoting a pair or the quantity of two persons or things. Used attributively with nouns ('two disciples,' Matt 11:2; 'two fish,' Matt 14:17) and substantively ('sent them out two by two,' Mark 6:7). Beyond simple enumeration, it carries legal and theological weight: the Mosaic requirement of two witnesses (Deut 19:15 echoed in Matt 18:16; 2 Cor 13:1), the impossibility of serving two masters (Matt 6:24), and the promise of Christ's presence where two or three gather (Matt 18:20). Spanish 'dos,' French 'deux,' and German 'zwei' all render it uniformly. NUMBER TWO TWELVE

en: of-two, two | es: a-dos, de-dos, dos | fr: deux | de: zwei Matt 4:18; Matt 4:21; Matt 5:41; Matt 6:24; Matt 8:28

δῠσ G1418

prefix meaning un-, mis-, bad, hard, or unlucky; creates negative or intensified meanings

An inseparable prefix standing opposite to εὖ- (well, good), adding notions of difficulty, misfortune, or badness to the words it modifies. It can destroy the good sense of a word or intensify its negative meaning. Remarkably, it can attach even to words that already express negation, creating emphatic double negatives. Poetic usage exploits it for strong contrasts, as in 'Paris the ill-Paris' or 'marriage that is a bad marriage.' Before certain consonant clusters (στ, σθ, σπ, σφ, σχ), the final sigma drops. The prefix has cognates in Sanskrit and other Indo-European languages, all carrying similar negative force.

δῠσ-βάστακτος G1419 Adj-ANP (2×)

hard to bear, burdensome, intolerable

This Greek adjective describes burdens that are grievous or intolerable to carry. Jesus uses it in Matthew 23:4 to criticize religious leaders who bind heavy loads on people's shoulders, and Luke 11:46 echoes this condemnation. The word emphasizes not just weight but the oppressive difficulty of bearing such loads, whether physical or spiritual.

(2×) Applied to the heavy burdens of religious legalism, this sense captures the oppressive nature of loads placed on others without help. The consistent translation pattern across languages (Spanish 'difíciles de llevar', French 'difficile à porter') highlights the 'difficult to carry' nuance rather than mere heaviness. Both occurrences appear in Jesus' denunciation of scribes and Pharisees, emphasizing moral rather than physical weight. BURDENS AND LOADS

en: hard-to-bear | es: difíciles-de-llevar, difíciles-de-llevar] | fr: difficile-à-porter | de: δυσβάστακτα, δυσβάστακτα] Matt 23:4; Luke 11:46

δῠσεντερ-ία G1420 N-DNS (1×)

Dysentery, severe intestinal inflammation causing diarrhea and bleeding; a specific medical condition

A medical term for dysentery—severe inflammation of the intestines causing bloody diarrhea, fever, and abdominal pain. Acts 28:8 describes Publius's father suffering from fever and dysentery when Paul healed him on Malta. The term was used in classical medical writings by Hippocrates and others for this specific disease. Luke, the physician-evangelist, employs the precise medical vocabulary of his day. The healing demonstrates Christ's power over disease and opened doors for ministry on the island.

(1×) Acts 28:8 records that Publius's father lay sick with fever and dysentery, a serious intestinal disease causing severe diarrhea and dehydration. Luke uses the technical medical term familiar from Hippocratic writings. All modern languages preserve medical terminology: English 'dysentery,' Spanish 'disentería,' French 'dysenterie.' Paul's healing of this dangerous condition through prayer demonstrated divine power and led to widespread healing ministry on Malta, opening the community to the gospel. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION

en: dysentery | es: disentería | fr: dysenterie | de: δυσεντερίῳ Acts 28:8

δῠσ-ερμήνευτος G1421 Adj-NMS (1×)

Hard to interpret, difficult to explain, not easily understood or communicated

This adjective means difficult to interpret, explain, or express—something challenging to make clear to others. Hebrews 5:11 uses it when the author says certain teachings about Melchizedek are 'hard to explain' because the readers have become dull of hearing. Classical Greek also used it for things hard to describe or interpret. The difficulty isn't in the subject itself but in communicating it to an unprepared or inattentive audience. The author's frustration points to the readers' spiritual immaturity, not the doctrine's inherent obscurity.

(1×) Hebrews 5:11 acknowledges that teaching about Melchizedek's priesthood is 'hard to explain'—not because it's impossibly complex, but because the audience has become 'dull of hearing.' The adjective describes something difficult to interpret or express clearly. Spanish 'difícil de explicar,' French 'difficile à expliquer,' and English 'hard to explain' all capture this communication challenge. The author's concern is pedagogical—spiritual dullness makes even important truths hard to convey effectively. INTERPRET TRANSLATE en: hard-to-explain | es: difícil-de-explicar | fr: difficile-à-expliquer | de: schwer-zu-erklaeren Heb 5:11

δύσ-κολος G1422 Adj-NNS (1×)

Difficult, hard to accomplish, troublesome; presenting challenges or obstacles

This adjective means difficult, hard, or troublesome—describing something that presents challenges. Mark 10:24 uses it when Jesus says 'how difficult it is for those who trust in riches to enter the kingdom of God.' Classical Greek used it for people hard to please, situations that are troublesome, or tasks difficult to accomplish. The term emphasizes objective difficulty, not impossibility. Jesus' teaching addresses the genuine challenge wealth poses to discipleship—riches tempt self-reliance, making dependence on God psychologically difficult.

(1×) Mark 10:24 records Jesus' observation that it's 'difficult' for the wealthy to enter God's kingdom. The adjective describes something genuinely hard or troublesome, though not impossible. English 'difficult,' Spanish 'difícil,' French and German 'difficile/schwer' all express this challenge. The disciples' astonishment at Jesus' statement shows they assumed wealth indicated God's blessing—Jesus corrects this, showing that riches create spiritual obstacles by fostering self-sufficiency that resists childlike dependence on God. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: difficult | es: difícil | fr: difficile | de: schwer Mark 10:24

δύσ-κολος G1423 Adv (3×)

with difficulty, hardly; describing something achieved only through great effort or struggle

The adverb δυσκόλως (from δύσκολος, 'hard to please' or 'difficult') describes actions accomplished only with great difficulty. In the Synoptic Gospels it appears in Jesus' sobering statement about wealth and the kingdom—that it is extremely difficult for the rich to enter God's realm. The word carries a sense of near-impossibility, something achieved only through extraordinary effort or intervention, if at all.

(3×) All three occurrences appear in parallel Synoptic accounts of Jesus' teaching after the rich young ruler departs. Matthew 19:23, Mark 10:23, and Luke 18:24 record nearly identical statements: 'How difficult it is for those who have wealth to enter the kingdom of God!' The context—disciples' astonishment and Jesus' metaphor of a camel going through a needle's eye—emphasizes that this difficulty borders on impossibility apart from God. The multilingual consistency (Spanish: difícilmente, French: difficilement, German: schwer) captures the adverbial force. The word choice signals not a minor obstacle but a fundamental incompatibility between trust in wealth and trust in God that requires divine intervention to overcome. DISTRESS AND HARDSHIP

en: with-difficulty | es: difícilmente | fr: difficilement | de: schwer, δυσκόλως Matt 19:23; Mark 10:23; Luke 18:24

δυσμή G1424 N-GFP (6×)

West, the setting (of the sun); the direction of sunset, used geographically and symbolically.

Derived from the verb dyo ('to set, sink'), this noun denotes the quarter where the sun goes down—the west. It nearly always appears in the plural (dysmai) and is typically paired with anatolai ('east, rising') to indicate the full compass of the earth. Jesus declares that many will come 'from east and west' to recline at table with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom (Matt 8:11; Luke 13:29), using the merism to signify universality. The lightning-flash analogy—'as lightning comes from the east and shines as far as the west' (Matt 24:27)—emphasizes the unmistakable, horizon-spanning visibility of the Son of Man's coming. In Luke 12:54, a cloud rising 'from the west' signals impending rain, reflecting Palestinian weather patterns where moisture comes off the Mediterranean. Spanish 'occidente' and French 'occident' both derive from Latin occidere ('to fall, set'), mirroring the Greek etymology precisely.

(6×) The west, the direction of sunset—typically used in the plural and paired with 'east' (anatolai) to express geographic totality. Jesus employs the east-west merism to declare that people from every direction will enter the kingdom (Matt 8:11; Luke 13:29). The coming of the Son of Man is likened to lightning flashing from east to west across the whole sky (Matt 24:27). Practically, a cloud rising in the west signals rain (Luke 12:54), reflecting Palestinian coastal weather patterns. Spanish 'occidente,' French 'occident,' and German 'Westen' all denote the sunset quarter, confirming a single, spatially oriented sense. WEST DIRECTION

en: west | es: el-occidente, occidente, occidente, | fr: occident | de: Westen, δυσμῶν Matt 8:11; Matt 24:27; Mark 16:20; Luke 12:54; Luke 13:29

δυσ-νόητος G1425 Adj-NNP (1×)

Hard to understand, difficult to grasp intellectually; not easily comprehended

This adjective describes something intellectually difficult to grasp or understand. In 2 Peter 3:16, Peter acknowledges that some things in Paul's letters are 'hard to understand,' which the ignorant and unstable twist to their own destruction. Classical Greek used it for things difficult to comprehend. Peter's candid admission validates the intellectual challenge of some biblical teaching while warning against using difficulty as license for distortion. Difficulty requires diligent study, not revision to match our preferences.

(1×) 2 Peter 3:16 admits that some of Paul's writings contain things 'hard to understand,' which unstable people distort. The adjective emphasizes intellectual difficulty in grasping meaning. Spanish 'difíciles de entender,' French preserves the Greek form, and English 'hard to understand' all acknowledge genuine comprehension challenges. Peter doesn't excuse confusion but warns that difficulty makes Scripture vulnerable to misinterpretation by those unwilling to do careful study—twisted teaching often exploits genuinely complex passages. UNDERSTANDING AND DISCERNMENT

en: hard-to-understand | es: difíciles-de-entender | fr: δυσνόητά | de: schwer-verstaendlich 2Pet 3:16

δυσφημ-ία G1426 V-PPM/P-NMP (2×)

being slandered, experiencing ill repute or defamation

This participial form describes the experience of being spoken against or defamed. Paul uses it twice to describe the ministry experience: in 1 Corinthians 4:13 amid persecution, and in 2 Corinthians 6:8 as one contrast in a series of paradoxes. The term captures not just verbal abuse but the damage to reputation that accompanies faithful ministry in a hostile world.

(2×) The passive experience of slander and ill fame appears in Paul's catalogs of apostolic suffering. The multilingual evidence shows both the active state ('being slandered' in English) and the result ('mala fama' - bad reputation in Spanish). Both Corinthian passages present this as an expected reality of gospel ministry, positioned alongside other forms of opposition and hardship. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: being-slandered, slander | es: mala-fama, siendo-difamados | fr: calomnie | de: Verleumdung 1Cor 4:13; 2Cor 6:8

δῠώδεκα G1427 Adj-ANP (75×)

Twelve — the cardinal number, often designating the twelve tribes of Israel or the twelve apostles.
Dodeka is the Greek cardinal number twelve, appearing across all genders and cases. In the New Testament it functions both as a plain numeral (a woman ill for twelve years, Matt 9:20; twelve baskets of leftovers, Matt 14:20) and as a loaded theological designation. 'The Twelve' became a near-proper-noun title for the inner circle of Jesus' disciples (Matt 10:1-5; 1 Cor 15:5), deliberately echoing the twelve tribes of Israel and signaling eschatological restoration. Spanish doce, French douze, and German zwolf all translate it without ambiguity, reflecting its semantic simplicity even as its symbolic weight varies by context.

twelve (75×) The cardinal number twelve, used in ordinary counting (Matt 9:20, twelve years; Matt 14:20, twelve baskets) and as a theologically charged designation for the twelve apostles (Matt 10:1-2; 1 Cor 15:5), deliberately evoking the twelve tribes. All target languages render it with their standard numeral — Spanish doce, French douze, German zwolf. NUMBER TWO TWELVE en: twelve | es: doce | fr: douze | de: zwoelf, zwölf Matt 9:20; Matt 10:1; Matt 10:2; Matt 10:5; Matt 11:1

δωδέκᾰτος G1428 Adj-NMS (1×)

Twelfth, the ordinal number for position twelve in a sequence
The ordinal number 'twelfth'—indicating the twelfth position in a sequence. Revelation 21:20 uses it to describe the twelfth foundation of the New Jerusalem, which is adorned with amethyst. This is straightforward numerical vocabulary with no special theological significance beyond the symbolic completeness of twelve (tribes, apostles) in biblical numerology. Greek ordinal numbers function like their English equivalents for indicating position or order.

(1×) Revelation 21:20 identifies the twelfth foundation stone of the New Jerusalem as amethyst. This is simple ordinal numbering—the final in the sequence of twelve foundations representing the twelve apostles. All languages render it straightforwardly: English 'twelfth,' Spanish 'duodécimo,' French 'douzième,' German 'zwölfte.' The number twelve throughout Revelation symbolizes completeness and the people of God—twelve tribes, twelve gates, twelve foundations, twelve apostles of the Lamb. TENTH ORDINAL NUMBER en: twelfth | es: duodécimo, | fr: douzième | de: zwoelfte Rev 21:20

δωδεκά-φῡλος G1429 N-NNS (1×)

The twelve tribes, collective designation for the tribes of Israel as a unified whole
A compound adjective meaning 'of twelve tribes,' used as a noun for the collective people of Israel. Acts 26:7 has Paul speak of 'our twelve tribes' earnestly serving God day and night, hoping to attain the promise. Though ten tribes had been scattered centuries earlier, Judaism maintained the concept of the unified twelve-tribe nation. The term emphasizes Israel's corporate identity as God's covenant people. Paul's usage shows the resurrection hope was fundamentally Jewish, not a new religion.

(1×) Acts 26:7 has Paul referencing 'our twelve tribes' serving God in hope of the resurrection promise. The term designates Israel collectively as the complete nation of twelve tribes, despite historical dispersion. English 'twelve tribes,' Spanish 'doce tribus,' and French 'douze tribus' all maintain this numerical-ethnic designation. Paul's reference affirms continuity between Israel's ancient hope and Christian resurrection faith—Jesus fulfills Jewish promises, not replacing but completing Israel's story. NATIONS AND PEOPLES en: twelve-tribes | es: doce-tribus | fr: douze-tribus | de: δωδεκάφυλον Acts 26:7

δῶμα G1430 N-ANS (7×)

Housetop, flat roof of a building; the accessible rooftop characteristic of ancient Near Eastern architecture.
Refers to the flat roof or housetop of a typical ancient Near Eastern dwelling, which served as a usable outdoor space for daily activities, prayer, and public proclamation. In Luke 5:19, friends lower a paralytic through the roof tiles to reach Jesus. In the eschatological warnings of Matt 24:17 and Mark 13:15, urgency is conveyed by telling someone on the housetop not to go back inside. Jesus commands his disciples to proclaim from housetops what they have heard in secret (Matt 10:27; Luke 12:3). All major translation languages use straightforward architectural terms—Spanish 'azotea/techo,' French 'toit,' German 'Dach'—confirming the concrete, physical referent.

housetop, flat roof of a building (7×) The flat roof or housetop of a building, a distinctive feature of ancient Near Eastern architecture that functioned as an accessible living space. Used for public proclamation (Matt 10:27; Luke 12:3, 'what you whisper, proclaim from the housetops'), as a setting for dramatic action (Luke 5:19, lowering the paralytic through the roof; Acts 10:9, Peter praying on the housetop), and in eschatological urgency (Matt 24:17; Mark 13:15, 'let the one on the housetop not go down'). Spanish distinguishes 'azotea' (terrace roof) from 'techo' (roof covering), but all translation languages confirm a single concrete architectural referent across all seven occurrences. ROOFTOP HOUSETOP en: housetop, housetops, roof | es: azotea, techo, techos | fr: toit | de: Dach Matt 10:27; Matt 24:17; Mark 13:15; Luke 5:19; Luke 12:3

δωρ-εά G1431 N-NFS (11×)

Gift, free gift — an unmerited bestowal, especially God's gracious gift of the Spirit or salvation
The noun δωρεά (dorea) denotes a gift freely given, referring almost exclusively to God's gracious bestowal. Jesus tells the Samaritan woman of 'the gift of God' (John 4:10). Peter promises 'the gift of the Holy Spirit' at Pentecost (Acts 2:38), and the Spirit's outpouring on Gentiles astonishes Jewish believers (Acts 10:45). Simon Magus is rebuked for thinking God's gift could be purchased (Acts 8:20). Paul's argument in Romans 5:15-17 pivots on the 'free gift' of grace surpassing Adam's trespass. Spanish 'don,' French 'don,' and German 'Gabe' convey the gratuitous quality.

gift (11×) A free, unmerited gift — used almost exclusively of God's gracious bestowal. The gift of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 2:38) and to Gentiles (Acts 10:45; 11:17), not purchasable with money (Acts 8:20). God's gift revealed to the Samaritan woman (John 4:10). The 'free gift' of grace surpassing Adam's trespass (Rom 5:15, 17), grace given for ministry (Eph 3:7; 4:7), and the 'heavenly gift' tasted by the enlightened (Heb 6:4). Spanish 'don' and French 'don' preserve the gratuitous character. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: gift | es: don | fr: don, gratuitement | de: Gabe, δωρεὰ, δωρεὰν John 4:10; Acts 2:38; Acts 8:20; Acts 10:45; Acts 11:17

δωρ-εά G1432 Adv (9×)

Freely, without cost or payment; also without cause or reason; or to no purpose, in vain.
An adverb rooted in the noun for 'gift' (dorea), carrying the core idea of something given without expectation of return. In most New Testament uses it means 'freely' or 'without charge,' as when Jesus tells his disciples to give freely what they freely received (Matt 10:8), or when Paul declares that believers are justified freely by God's grace (Rom 3:24). Spanish captures this well with 'gratis' and 'de balde.' At John 15:25, however, it shifts to mean 'without cause'–they hated me without reason–while at Galatians 2:21 it takes on the nuance 'for nothing, in vain,' rendered 'en vano' in Spanish.

1. (7×) Freely, without payment or cost–the dominant New Testament sense. Jesus commands 'freely you received, freely give' (Matt

10:8); Paul works 'free of charge' (2 Thess 3:8) and proclaims justification 'as a gift' (Rom 3:24). Spanish 'gratis/de balde' and German 'umsonst' consistently render this economic gratuity sense across all seven occurrences. WORTHLESSNESS AND VANITY

en: freely | es: de-balde, gratis., gratuitamente | fr: gratuitement | de: umsonst, δωρεὰν Matt 10:8; Rom 3:24; 2Cor 11:7; 2Thess 3:8

2. (1×) Without cause or reason–a shift from 'no cost' to 'no grounds.' At John 15:25, Jesus quotes Psalm 35:19: 'they hated me without cause.' Spanish 'sin causa' captures the causal void precisely, while French and German retain the same form ('gratuitement'/'umsonst'), showing how these languages collapse the cost/cause distinction that English and Spanish carefully separate. WORTHLESSNESS AND VANITY

en: without-cause | es: sin-causa | fr: gratuitement | de: umsonst John 15:25

3. (1×) To no purpose, in vain–the sense of futility or pointlessness. At Galatians 2:21, Paul argues that if righteousness comes through the law, then Christ died 'for nothing.' Spanish 'en vano' distinguishes this sharply from both the 'freely' and 'without cause' senses, highlighting Paul's rhetorical force: grace rendered purposeless would be the ultimate waste. WORTHLESSNESS AND VANITY

en: for-nothing | es: en-vano | fr: gratuitement | de: umsonst Gal 2:21

δωρ-έω G1433 V-RIM/P-3S (3×)

to grant freely, bestow, give as a gift; emphasizing the gracious, unmerited nature of the giving

The verb δωρέω (from δῶρον, 'gift') means to give freely or present as a gift, often emphasizing grace rather than obligation. In the New Testament it appears in contexts of generous bestowal: Pilate granting Jesus' body to Joseph, and God granting believers all things pertaining to life and godliness. The word family emphasizes the gratuitous nature of true giving—not payment, not exchange, but pure gift.

(3×) Mark 15:45 records that Pilate, 'when he learned from the centurion that Jesus was dead, granted the corpse to Joseph'—a favor bestowed on the requesting disciple. Second Peter 1:3 celebrates that God's divine power 'has granted to us all things that pertain to life and godliness,' while 1:4 continues that 'he has granted to us his precious and very great promises.' The Spanish (concedió, ha-dado, habiendo-dado) and French (accorder) reflect the granting/bestowing sense. In 2 Peter especially, the perfect tense emphasizes completed gifts with ongoing effects: God has already freely given everything needed for transformed life. The theological accent falls on divine generosity—grace freely bestowed, not earned or purchased. FORGIVE GRANT GIVE en: have-been-granted, having-granted, he-granted | es: concedió, ha-dado, habiendo-dado | fr: accorder | de: geschenkt Mark 15:45; 2Pet 1:3; 2Pet 1:4

δώρ-ημα G1434 N-NNS (2×)

gift, present freely given

This neuter noun denotes a gift or present, emphasizing the nature of something freely bestowed. Paul uses it in Romans 5:16 to describe God's free gift in contrast to judgment, while James 1:17 speaks of every good and perfect gift descending from the Father of lights. The word highlights the graciousness of the giver rather than any merit in the recipient.

(2×) Referring to divine gifts, this sense emphasizes the free, gracious nature of God's giving. Romans 5:16 contrasts the gift with condemnation, highlighting its unmerited character, while James 1:17 locates all good gifts in God's generous nature. The consistent translation as 'gift' or 'don' across languages reflects its straightforward meaning as something freely bestowed. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: gift | es: don | fr: Gabe, don | de: Gabe Rom 5:16; Jas 1:17

δῶρον G1435 N-NNS (19×)

A gift or offering, especially one presented at the temple altar or given in honor and worship.

Denotes a gift or offering, spanning both sacred and honorific contexts. The Magi bring δῶρα to the infant Jesus (Matt 2:11), while in the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus instructs the worshiper to leave his δῶρον at the altar and first be reconciled with his brother (Matt 5:23–24) — a passage that shaped early Christian liturgical practice. The word also covers the temple-treasury offering that Jesus criticizes when Pharisees declare goods 'Corban, that is, a gift devoted to God' (Matt 15:5; Mark 7:11). Spanish distinguishes 'ofrenda' (offering) from 'don' (gift), revealing the word's dual register between sacred and general giving. In Hebrews, δῶρα appear alongside θυσίαι as the standard pair for priestly offerings (Heb 5:1; 8:3–4).

gift, offering (19×) A gift or offering brought before God or presented in honor. Covers the Magi's tribute gifts (Matt 2:11), altar offerings that must wait for reconciliation (Matt 5:23–24), Corban declarations dedicating property to the temple (Mark 7:11), and the priestly gifts-and-sacrifices paired formula in Hebrews (5:1; 8:3–4; 9:9). Spanish splits the sense between 'ofrenda' (ritual offering) and 'don' (gift/endowment), while French and German use unified terms 'don' and 'Gabe,' reflecting the word's breadth from sacred to honorific giving. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: A-gift, Gift, gift | es: Ofrenda, don, dones | fr: don | de: Gabe Matt 2:11; Matt 5:23; Matt 5:24; Matt 8:4

ἔᾱ G1436 I (1×)

Ha! An exclamation expressing surprise, recognition, fear, or protest; an interjection

An exclamation or interjection expressing sudden emotion—surprise, recognition, fear, or protest. In Luke 4:34, the demon-possessed man cries out 'Ha! What have we to do with You, Jesus of Nazareth?' The particle often introduces a challenge or expresses alarm. It's the verbal equivalent of a startled reaction. Demonic spirits frequently use it in the Gospels when confronted by Jesus—recognizing His identity and authority while protesting His interference. It's an involuntary outburst revealing inner disturbance.

(1×) Luke 4:34 records the demoniac's outburst: 'Ha! What do we have to do with You, Jesus?'—the demon recognizing Jesus and protesting His intervention. The interjection expresses alarm, surprise, or recognition. Spanish '¡Ah!,' French 'Ah!,' and English 'Ha!' all convey this sudden exclamation. The demon's involuntary outcry reveals both supernatural recognition of Jesus' identity and fear of His authority—spiritual beings cannot remain neutral when confronted by the Son of God. DISCOURSE PARTICLES

en: Ha | es: ¡Ah! | fr: Ah! | de: Ἔα Luke 4:34

ἐάν G1437 Conj (339×)

If, in the event that — conditional particle introducing hypothetical or potential clauses

Ean is the standard Greek conditional conjunction that pairs with the subjunctive mood to mark a situation as possible but not yet realized. It differs from the simple ei ('if' with indicative) by leaving the outcome genuinely open. Across 339 NT occurrences it structures Jesus' teaching ('if anyone would come after me,' Matt 16:24), apostolic exhortation, and legal-style conditions. Translators uniformly render it 'if' (Spanish 'si,' French 'si,' German 'wenn'), though its subjunctive coloring adds a nuance of contingency that flat English 'if' can obscure.

if, in the event that (conditional particle) (339×) A conditional conjunction introducing a protasis whose fulfillment is presented as possible but uncertain, regularly followed by the subjunctive mood. It frames the 'if' clause of third-class conditions, where the speaker neither assumes nor denies the outcome. Key passages include Matt 5:13 ('if salt loses its flavor') and 1 John 1:9 ('if we confess our sins'), where the open contingency is theologically deliberate. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

en: If, if, if- | es: *-si, Si, si | fr: si | de: wenn Matt 4:9; Matt 5:13; Matt 5:19; Matt 5:20; Matt 5:23

ἑαυτοῦ G1438 RefPro-DM3P (321×)

Reflexive pronoun: himself, herself, itself, themselves; also possessive (his own) and reciprocal (one another)

The third-person reflexive pronoun heautou is one of Greek's essential grammatical tools, directing the action of a verb back upon its subject. In the New Testament it appears across all persons and numbers — 'deny himself' (Matt 16:24), 'humble himself' (Matt 18:4) — sometimes extending to possessive force ('his own dead,' Matt 8:22) and occasionally taking on reciprocal meaning ('among themselves,' Matt 27:35). Arabic parallels this flexibility with nafsahu for reflexive and ba'dukum al-ba'da for reciprocal uses, while Korean employs the dedicated reflexive jasin alongside the reciprocal seo-ro.

1. reflexive pronoun (direct/indirect) (239×) The core reflexive use where the subject acts upon or directs action toward itself as direct or indirect object: 'let him deny himself' (Matt 16:24), 'whoever humbles himself' (Matt 23:12). This covers all persons — himself, herself, themselves, ourselves, yourselves — unified by the grammatical function of co-reference with the subject. Spanish a sí mismo and German sich selbst parallel the construction precisely, while languages like Korean use jasin as a dedicated reflexive marker. REFLEXIVE PRONOUNS

en: himself, oneself | es: -a-sí-mismo, a-sí-mismo | fr: soi-même | de: sich-selbst Matt 16:24; Matt 18:4; Matt 23:12; Matt 27:42

2. possessive reflexive (of oneself) (68×) Genitive or possessive reflexive indicating ownership or belonging relative to the subject: 'his own dead' (Matt 8:22), 'their own garments' (Matt 21:8), 'their own lamps' (Matt 25:1). The emphasis falls on the possessor's identity with the subject. Arabic uses possessive suffixes or al-khassa ('own') to convey this sense, while Korean employs the possessive particle jasin-ui. French distinguishes this with son propre or de lui-même. REFLEXIVE PRONOUNS

en: his-own, of-her, of-herself | es: de-sí-misma, de-sí-mismo, de-él | fr: lui-même, soi-même | de: sich-selbst Matt 8:22; Matt 15:30; Matt 18:31; Matt 21:8; Matt 25:1

3. reciprocal (one another) (12×) Reciprocal use where the reflexive pronoun functions equivalently to allelon ('one another'), indicating mutual action among group members. In Luke 22:17 Jesus says 'divide it among yourselves,' and in Matt 27:35 soldiers cast lots 'among themselves.' Arabic ba'dukum al-ba'da ('some of you...some') and Korean seo-ro both signal this reciprocal shift. The context — always plural subjects acting mutually — distinguishes this from simple reflexivity. REFLEXIVE PRONOUNS

en: among-themselves, for-themselves, to-yourselves | es: entre-sí, entre-vosotros, para-sí-mismos | fr: lui-même, soi-même | de: sich-selbst Matt 26:11; Matt 27:35; Mark 14:7; Luke 22:17; John 12:8

4. (2×) An intensive or comparative reflexive use in contexts where the pronoun emphasizes degree or comparison: 'worse than itself' (Matt 12:45, Luke 11:26). Both occurrences describe an unclean spirit returning with seven others more evil 'than itself,' using the genitive reflexive in a comparative construction. The English 'than itself' and Spanish que sí mismo capture this emphatic comparative nuance. REFLEXIVE PRONOUNS

en: than-itself | es: que-sí-mismo | fr: soi-même | de: sich-selbst Matt 12:45; Luke 11:26

ἐάω G1439 V-FIA-3S (11×)

To allow, permit, let — to grant permission or refrain from preventing; to leave alone

The verb ἐάω (eao) means to allow, permit, or let something happen, with an extended shade of leaving someone alone. Jesus would not allow demons to speak (Luke 4:41). At his arrest he says 'Permit even this' (Luke 22:51). The Spirit 'did not permit' Paul to enter Bithynia (Acts 16:7), and God 'allowed all nations to walk in their own ways' in past generations (Acts 14:16). The householder 'would not have allowed' a break-in had he known (Matt 24:43). Spanish 'permitir/dejar' and French 'permettre/laisser' capture the dual permission-and-release quality.

to allow, permit, let (11×) To allow, permit, or let something happen, shading into 'leave alone.' Jesus forbids demons from speaking (Luke 4:41), permits his own arrest (Luke 22:51). The Spirit blocks entry to Bithynia (Acts 16:7), God allowed nations their own ways (Acts 14:16), the householder would not have permitted a break-in (Matt 24:43). Extended: sailors leaving anchors in the sea (Acts 27:40). Spanish 'permitir/dejar' and German 'zulassen' confirm a single sense spectrum. LEAVING AND REMAINING

en: Allow, allowed, having-allowed | es: Dejad, dejaron, habiendo-dejado | fr: laisser, permettre | de: lässt-zu, ἐάσει Matt 24:43; Luke 4:41; Luke 22:51; Acts 14:16; Acts 16:7

ἑβδομήκοντα G1440 Adj-NFP (5×)

Seventy; the cardinal number used for groups of people, ages, or counts

The indeclinable numeral 'seventy,' carrying rich biblical resonance. Jesus appoints seventy (or seventy-two) disciples and sends them out (Luke 10:1, 17), echoing the seventy elders of Israel. Stephen recalls the seventy-five souls who went down to Egypt with Jacob (Acts 7:14). The number also appears in military logistics – seventy horsemen escort Paul from Jerusalem (Acts 23:23) – and in a ship's passenger count of 276 (Acts 27:37, as part of the compound). Every language renders it transparently: Spanish 'setenta,' French 'soixante-dix,' preserving the number's symbolic weight.

(5×) The cardinal number seventy, used of specific counts of people or as part of larger numbers. Carries symbolic resonance from the seventy elders of Israel (Num 11:16), echoed when Jesus sends out the Seventy (Luke 10:1, 17). Stephen cites seventy-five family members who entered Egypt (Acts 7:14), while Acts 23:23 records seventy horsemen in a military escort. French 'soixante-dix' (sixty-ten) and Spanish 'setenta' render the number straightforwardly, but the theological overtones – completeness, the nations – are unmistakable in Luke's usage. LARGE CARDINAL NUMBERS

en: seventy | es: setenta | fr: soixante-dix | de: ἑβδομήκοντα Luke 10:1; Luke 10:17; Acts 7:14; Acts 23:23; Acts 27:37

ἑβδομηκοντάκις G1441 Adv (1×)

Seventy times, an adverbial number indicating repetition seventy times over

An adverb meaning 'seventy times'—indicating frequency or repetition. Matthew 18:22 uses it in Jesus' response to Peter's question about forgiveness: not just seven times, but 'seventy times seven' (or 'seventy-seven times' depending on interpretation). Either reading means unlimited forgiveness. The number echoes Genesis 4:24, where Lamech boasts of vengeance seventy-sevenfold—Jesus transforms vengeance into forgiveness. The hyperbolic number isn't meant for literal counting but expresses boundless, inexhaustible grace.

(1×) Matthew 18:22 has Jesus telling Peter to forgive 'seventy times seven'—a number so large it means unlimited forgiveness, not literal tallying. The adverb emphasizes repeated action. Most translations preserve the numerical form: English 'seventy times,' Spanish 'setenta veces,' French 'soixante-dix fois.' Jesus deliberately reverses Lamech's boast of multiplied vengeance (Gen 4:24), transforming the mathematics of revenge into the mathematics of grace—forgiveness without limit or calculation. TIMES AND OCCASIONS

en: seventy-times | es: setenta-veces | fr: soixante-dix-fois | de: ἑβδομηκοντάκις Matt 18:22

ἕβδομος G1442 Adj-GMS (9×)

Seventh; the ordinal number designating the position after sixth in a sequence.

The ordinal adjective for 'seventh,' derived from hepta (seven). It appears in narratives and prophetic visions where the seventh position carries special weight — the seventh hour when a nobleman's son is healed (John 4:52), the seventh day of creation rest cited in Hebrews 4:4, Enoch as the seventh from Adam (Jude 1:14), and the dramatic opening of the seventh seal bringing silence in heaven (Rev 8:1). All translation languages render it with a straightforward ordinal: Spanish 'séptimo,' French 'septième,' German 'siebte.'

seventh (9×) The ordinal number 'seventh,' marking the seventh position in a counted sequence. In the NT it appears in contexts where the seventh carries thematic significance: the seventh hour of a healing miracle (John 4:52), the seventh day of God's rest from creation (Heb 4:4), Enoch's genealogical position as seventh from Adam (Jude 1:14), and the seventh seal and seventh angel in Revelation's apocalyptic sequences (Rev 8:1, 10:7, 11:15, 16:17, 21:20). Every target language renders it with its standard ordinal form — Spanish 'séptimo,' French 'septième,' German 'siebte.' NUMBER SEVEN en: seventh | es: séptima, séptimo, séptimo, | fr: septième | de: der-siebte, siebte John 4:52; Heb 4:4; Jude 1:14; Rev 8:1

Ἔβερ G1443 N-GMS (1×)
Eber, Hebrew ancestor of Abraham, from whom 'Hebrew' may derive; patriarch in Genesis genealogy Eber (Hebrew עֵבֶר) was a descendant of Shem and ancestor of Abraham, appearing in the genealogies of Genesis 10-11 and Luke 3:35. His name may be the origin of the term 'Hebrew' (Ibri), designating Abraham's people as 'descendants of Eber.' He lived during the time of the Tower of Babel and the division of languages. Luke includes him in Jesus' genealogy, tracing Christ's lineage back through Israel's patriarchal line to Adam. The name signifies 'the one from beyond' (the Euphrates).

(1×) Luke 3:35 includes Eber in Jesus' genealogy, linking Christ to the Hebrew patriarchs descended from Shem. His name may etymologically connect to 'Hebrew' as an ethnic designation. All languages largely preserve the Hebrew name: English 'Eber,' Spanish 'Éber,' French 'Éber.' Luke's genealogical precision demonstrates Jesus' authentic placement within Israel's historical lineage, tracing His human descent through Abraham's ancestors back to Noah and ultimately Adam, showing Him as both Israel's King and humanity's Savior. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: Eber | es: Éber | fr: Éber | de: Ἔβερ Luke 3:35

Ἑβραϊκός G1444 Adj-DNP (1×)
Hebrew, pertaining to the Hebrew language or the Jewish people and their culture
An adjective meaning 'Hebrew'—pertaining to the Hebrew language or Jewish culture. Luke 23:38 (in some manuscripts) describes Pilate's inscription on the cross being written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin—the three major languages of first-century Judea. Hebrew (or Aramaic, its related dialect) was the ethnic language of the Jewish people, Greek the international trade language, and Latin the imperial Roman tongue. The trilingual inscription proclaimed Jesus' kingship to all cultural groups present in Jerusalem.

(1×) Luke 23:38 (in certain manuscripts) notes the cross inscription was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. The adjective designates the language/script of the Jewish people. Spanish 'Hebreas,' French 'en hébreu,' and English 'Hebrew' all refer to the Semitic language. The trilingual proclamation ensured maximum readership—Jewish pilgrims, Greek-speaking gentiles, and Roman officials could all read that Jesus was crucified as 'King of the Jews,' ironically proclaiming truth in the act of mockery. HEBREW PEOPLE
en: Hebrew | es: Hebreas | fr: en-hébreu | de: Ἑβραϊκοῖς} Luke 23:38

Ἑβραϊκός G1445 N-NMS (4×)
A Hebrew; an ethnic-religious designation for an Israelite, especially one preserving ancestral language and customs
In the New Testament, this noun identifies someone as a Hebrew-speaking Israelite, often distinguishing such persons from Hellenistic (Greek-speaking) Jews. Paul's triple claim in Philippians 3:5 – 'a Hebrew of Hebrews' – underscores cultural and linguistic purity, not merely ancestry. The term surfaces in Acts 6:1 precisely at the fault line between Aramaic-speaking and Greek-speaking Jewish believers, revealing early church tensions. Spanish 'hebreo' and French 'Hebreu' preserve the ethnic force of the original.

(4×) A person of Hebrew identity, particularly one who retains the ancestral Semitic language and traditions as distinct from Hellenized Jews. In Acts 6:1 the Hebraioi are contrasted with Hellenistai over the daily distribution, while in 2 Corinthians 11:22 and Philippians 3:5 Paul invokes the label to assert his unimpeachable Jewish pedigree. All translations (eng 'Hebrew,' spa 'hebreo,' fra 'Hebreu') consistently render this as an ethnic-cultural marker rather than a merely geographic one. HEBREW PEOPLE en: Hebrew, Hebrews | es: Hebraîoi, Hebreos, hebreo | fr: Hébreu, Ἑβραίων, Ἑβραῖος | de: Ἑβραίους, Ἑβραίων, Ἑβραῖοί Acts 6:1; 2Cor 11:22; Phil 3:5

Ἑβραϊκός G1446 Adj-DFS (3×)
Hebrew (language or dialect); specifically the Aramaic vernacular spoken in first-century Judea
The adjective Ἑβραΐς (feminine form of Ἑβραϊκός) describes the Hebrew language or, more precisely in NT contexts, the Aramaic dialect spoken in Palestine during the first century. When Acts records Paul speaking 'in the Hebrew language,' it refers to Aramaic, the common tongue of Jews in Judea, as distinct from Greek. This linguistic choice carried powerful social and religious significance—it marked the speaker as authentically Jewish and addressed hearers in their heart language.

(3×) All three occurrences describe Paul addressing Jewish audiences in their native tongue. In Acts 21:40 Paul asks permission to address the crowd, then 'standing on the steps, he motioned to the people, and when there was a great hush, he addressed them in the Hebrew language.' Acts 22:2 notes the crowd's response: 'And when they heard that he was addressing them in the Hebrew language, they became even more quiet.' In Acts 26:14 Paul recounts Jesus speaking to him on the Damascus road 'in the Hebrew language.' The German gloss Ἑβραΐδι preserves the Greek dative form. Speaking Aramaic/Hebrew signaled cultural solidarity and religious authenticity, making Paul's message more credible to Jewish listeners resistant to Hellenization. HEBREW PEOPLE en: Hebrew | es: hebrea | fr: hébraïque | de: Ἑβραΐδι Acts 21:40; Acts 22:2; Acts 26:14

Ἑβραϊκός G1447 Adv (7×)
In Hebrew (or Aramaic); designating the language in which a word or phrase is spoken.
An adverb meaning 'in the Hebrew language,' used by John to flag Semitic terms for his Greek-speaking audience. Each occurrence introduces a place name or title that John then translates: Bethesda (John 5:2), Gabbatha (19:13), Golgotha (19:17), and Rabboni (20:16). In John 19:20, it appears alongside 'in Latin' and 'in Greek' to describe Pilate's trilingual inscription on the cross. The term likely covers both Hebrew proper and Aramaic, as several of the glossed words are Aramaic in form. All translation languages render it transparently: Spanish 'en hebreo,' French 'en hébreu,' German 'hebräisch.'

(7×) In the Hebrew language (or Aramaic)—an adverb used to identify the Semitic language in which a name or phrase is expressed. Appears exclusively in John's Gospel, where the evangelist introduces Semitic terms to a Greek-reading audience and provides translations: 'which is called in Hebrew Bethesda' (John 5:2), 'Gabbatha' (19:13), 'Golgotha' (19:17), 'Rabboni' (20:16). In John 19:20, it distinguishes Hebrew from Latin and Greek on Pilate's trilingual titulus. The referent likely encompasses Aramaic as well as Hebrew proper, since several glossed terms (Gabbatha, Golgotha, Rabboni) are Aramaic in form. Every translation language renders this straightforwardly as 'in Hebrew' (Spanish 'en hebreo,' German 'hebräisch'). HEBREW PEOPLE en: in-Hebrew | es: en-hebreo | fr: en-hébreu | de: hebraeisch John 5:2; John 19:13; John 19:17; John 19:20; John 20:16

ἐγγίζω G1448 V-AMA-2P (42×)
Draw near, approach: spatially to a person or place; temporally of events or seasons at hand; spiritually to God.

The Greek verb eggizo carries the spatial force of its root eggys ('near') into three registers. Physically, it describes people approaching places — Jesus drawing near to Jerusalem (Matt 21:1). Temporally, it announces that moments of fulfillment are 'at hand' — the kingdom of heaven (Matt 3:2; 4:17), the hour of betrayal (Matt 26:45). Spanish acercarse and French s'approcher serve both uses without distinction, but German sometimes shifts from nahen to nahe sein for the temporal sense. A spiritually intimate sense appears in Hebrews 7:19 and James 4:8, where drawing near to God carries the weight of covenant access — 'Draw near to God, and he will draw near to you.'

1. draw near temporally (20×) Of a time, event, season, or eschatological reality approaching or being imminent — 'the kingdom of heaven has drawn near' (Matt 3:2; 4:17; 10:7). This temporal sense (20 occurrences) anchors Jesus' earliest proclamation and recurs in the Olivet Discourse (Matt 26:45-46) and apostolic expectation ('the coming of the Lord has drawn near,' Jas 5:8). Spanish se ha acercado and French s'approcher preserve the motion metaphor for time, while Korean 가까이 오다 (come close) and German nahen similarly apply spatial movement vocabulary to temporal imminence — a universal conceptual metaphor. NEARNESS AND APPROACH

en: Has-come-near, Has-drawn-near, Was-drawing-near | es: Se-acercaba, Se-ha-acercado, acercándose | fr: approcher, s'approcher | de: nahen, naht Matt 3:2; Matt 4:17; Matt 10:7; Matt 26:45; Matt 26:46

2. approach spatially (20×) To approach physically in space — drawing near to a person, city, or location. With 20 occurrences, this literal spatial sense appears when Jesus and the disciples approach Jerusalem (Matt 21:1; Mark 11:1), when the messengers from Cornelius draw near to Joppa (Acts 10:9), and when sinners and tax collectors approach Jesus to listen (Luke 15:1). Spanish acercándose, French approcher, and German nahen all deploy standard motion verbs. Luke particularly favors eggizo for narrative scene-setting, using the approach of characters to signal that pivotal encounters are about to unfold (Luke 7:12; 19:29, 37, 41). NEARNESS AND APPROACH

en: drawing-near, drew-near, having-approached | es: acercarse, acercándome, acercándose | fr: approcher, s'approcher | de: nahen, naht Matt 21:1; Matt 21:34; Mark 11:1; Luke 7:12; Luke 15:1

3. draw near to God (2×) To draw near to God in worship, prayer, or spiritual approach — a relational and cultic use where the verb carries the weight of covenant access. Only 2 clear occurrences: Hebrews 7:19, where the better hope enables believers to 'draw near to God,' and the famous imperative of James 4:8, 'Draw near to God, and he will draw near to you.' Spanish acercaos a Dios, French approchez-vous de Dieu, and German nahet euch Gott all preserve the spatial metaphor for spiritual intimacy. The LXX background is rich: eggizo regularly translates Hebrew qarav in priestly contexts of approaching the altar, giving this NT sense deep cultic resonance. NEARNESS AND APPROACH

en: Draw-near, we-draw-near | es: acercaos, nos-acercamos | fr: approcher | de: nahen Heb 7:19; Jas 4:8

ἐγγράφ-ω G1449 V-RPM/P-NFS (3×)

to write in, inscribe, engrave; to record permanently, especially in metaphorical registers of belonging

The compound verb ἐγγράφω (ἐν + γράφω) means to write or inscribe in or on something—to mark permanently in a register, on a surface, or metaphorically in hearts. Biblical usage emphasizes permanent recording: names written in heaven's ledgers, laws inscribed on hearts. The act of engraving or registering creates lasting, authoritative record—what is ἐγγεγραμμένον has been officially entered and remains inscribed.

(3×) In Luke 10:20 Jesus tells the seventy-two not to rejoice that demons submit to them, 'but rejoice that your names are written in heaven'—enrolled in God's permanent register. Second Corinthians 3:2 uses the metaphor of the living letter: 'You yourselves are our letter of recommendation, written on our hearts, to be known and read by all.' Verse 3:3 continues: 'you show that you are a letter from Christ...written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone but on tablets of human hearts.' The French (inscrire, inscrit) and German (ἐνγέγραπται, ἐνγεγραμμένη [sic]) preserve the inscribing metaphor. The perfect passive tense emphasizes completed, permanent inscription—what has been written remains written, whether in heavenly books or transformed hearts. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

en: have-been-written, having-been-inscribed | es: están-escritos, inscrita | fr: inscrire, inscrit | de: ἐνγέγραπται, ἐνγεγραμμένη Luke 10:20; 2Cor 3:2; 2Cor 3:3

ἔγγυος G1450 Adj-NMS (1×)

Guarantee, surety, one who pledges security for another; bondsman ensuring fulfillment

This noun means a guarantee, surety, or bondsman—one who pledges to ensure another's obligation is fulfilled. Hebrews 7:22 declares Jesus the 'guarantee of a better covenant,' meaning He personally ensures all covenant promises will be kept. Classical Greek used it for someone providing financial security or bail. Unlike the old covenant depending on human faithfulness (which failed), the new covenant rests on Jesus' perfect guarantee—His own person and work secure what He promises. He is both promise-maker and promise-keeper.

(1×) Hebrews 7:22 calls Jesus the 'guarantee' of a better covenant—He Himself secures all its promises through His priestly work. The noun describes a bondsman or surety who pledges to ensure obligations are met. English 'guarantee,' Spanish 'garante,' French 'garant,' and German 'Bürge' all convey this security function. Unlike the Levitical priests who died and failed, Jesus lives forever and perfectly guarantees the new covenant—His resurrection life ensures every promise finds fulfillment. PLEDGES AND SECURITY

en: guarantee | es: garante | fr: garant | de: Buerge Heb 7:22

ἐγγύς G1451 Prep (30×)

Near, close by; denoting spatial proximity or temporal imminence, often with eschatological overtones.

An adverb and preposition of proximity, engys signals that something is spatially close or temporally imminent. Jesus declares 'the kingdom of God is near' (Mark 1:15, Luke 21:31), and Paul writes 'the Lord is near' (Phil 4:5). It also functions in mundane spatial senses: 'the city was near' (John 11:18), 'the feast was near' (John 6:4). Spanish 'cerca,' French 'pres,' and German 'nahe' all confirm a single unified sense of nearness. In eschatological contexts, engys carries urgency—what is near demands immediate response, whether repentance or readiness.

near, close (spatial or temporal proximity) (30×) Nearness in space or time, used as adverb or preposition to express proximity. Spatially, it locates places or persons close at hand (John 11:18, 19:20). Temporally, it signals imminence—festivals approaching (John 6:4, 11:55) or eschatological fulfillment at hand (Matt 24:32-33, Rom 13:11). The fig-tree parable (Matt 24:32) pivots on engys: when the signs appear, 'know that it is near, at the very gates.' All multilingual renderings converge on a single proximity sense. NEARNESS AND APPROACH

en: near | es: cerca | fr: près | de: nahe Matt 24:32; Matt 24:33; Matt 26:18; Mark 13:28; Mark 13:29

ἐγγύτερος G1452 Adv (1×)

Nearer, closer in space or time; comparative form indicating reduced distance

The comparative adverb 'nearer' or 'closer'—indicating proximity in space or time. Romans 13:11 uses it temporally: 'salvation is nearer to us now than when we first believed.' Paul emphasizes the forward progress of redemptive history—each day brings believers closer to Christ's return and the consummation of salvation. The comparative form stresses movement toward a goal. Time isn't cyclical but linear, advancing toward the day when faith becomes sight and hope becomes reality.

(1×) Romans 13:11 declares that salvation is 'nearer' now than when believers first trusted Christ—the return of the Lord draws progressively closer. The comparative adverb indicates reduced distance or time. Spanish 'más cerca,' French 'plus près,' German 'näher,' and English 'nearer' all express this approach toward a goal. Paul's point motivates urgent holiness—the eschatological clock is ticking, Christ's return approaches, making moral vigilance increasingly critical as the end draws near. NEARNESS AND APPROACH

en: nearer | es: más-cerca | fr: plus-près | de: naeher Rom 13:11

ἐγείρω G1453 V-ASP-3S (144×)

To raise up, wake, arise; especially of resurrection from the dead; also to get up physically, appear, or rouse from sleep

One of the New Testament's most theologically charged verbs, spanning the full arc from ordinary waking to eschatological resurrection. At its most mundane it means 'get up' or 'wake from sleep,' but its defining NT usage is God's raising of Jesus from the dead—ἠγέρθη, 'he has been raised' (Matt 28:6). The passive voice in resurrection contexts carries enormous theological weight: the subject does not raise himself but is raised by divine power. Spanish resucitar, Arabic أقام, and Swahili kufufuliwa all capture this divine-passive dimension. The same verb also covers physical rising, prophetic appearing, and the stirring up of nations—a remarkable semantic breadth unified by the core image of moving from a lower to a higher state.

1. be raised / rise from the dead (51×) Passive or middle intransitive resurrection: the subject is raised from the dead or rises to life. This is the theologically dominant NT sense, appearing in creedal formulas (1 Cor 15:4 ἐγήγερται, 'he has been raised') and throughout the Gospel narratives. The divine passive is crucial—Spanish ha resucitado, Arabic قام, Korean 살아나셨다 all preserve the implication that God is the unspoken agent. Used of both Christ's resurrection and the general resurrection (Matt 11:5, 'the dead are raised'). RESURRECTION AND RISING

en: He-has-been-raised, are-raised, has-been-raised | es: ha-resucitado, resucita, resucitan | fr: ressusciter | de: auferwecken, steht-auf Matt 11:5; Matt 14:2; Matt 16:21; Matt 17:9; Matt 17:23

2. rise / get up (physical) (38×) Intransitive or middle use meaning to rise physically, get up from sitting or lying, or arise and go. Frequently appears as a command—Ἔγειρε, 'Rise!' (Matt 9:5 to the paralytic)—or in narrative transitions where someone arises to act (Matt 1:24, Joseph arose; Matt 2:13-14, arising to flee to Egypt). Spanish levántate, Arabic قم, and Swahili simama all treat this as ordinary physical movement, distinct from the resurrection sense. RESURRECTION AND RISING

en: Rise, arise, having-arisen | es: Levántate, habiéndose-levantado, levantándose | fr: ressusciter | de: auferwecken, steht-auf Matt 1:24; Matt 2:13; Matt 2:14; Matt 2:20; Matt 2:21

3. raise from the dead (active) (34×) Active transitive resurrection: a divine agent raises someone from the dead. The subject is typically God (Acts 2:24, 'God raised him') or Jesus commissioning the disciples (Matt 10:8, 'raise the dead'). Distinguished from sense 1 by having an explicit agent performing the raising. Arabic أقام (with object suffix) and Korean 일으키셨다 both mark the transitive causative structure. John 2:19-20 plays on this sense when Jesus says 'I will raise it [the temple/body] in three days.' RESURRECTION AND RISING

en: He-raised, having-raised, he-raised | es: habiendo-resucitado, levantó, que-levantó | fr: ressusciter | de: auferwecken, steht-auf Matt 3:9; Matt 10:8; Luke 3:8; John 2:19; John 2:20

4. appear / arise (figurative) (9×) Figurative intransitive use: a person, prophet, or entity 'arises' or 'appears' on the historical stage. False prophets 'will arise' (Matt 24:11, 24), the Queen of the South 'will rise up' in judgment (Matt 12:42), and nation 'will rise against' nation (Matt 24:7). Spanish se levantarán and Arabic يُقام confirm the metaphorical emergence sense. This extends the physical-rising image into the domain of historical or eschatological appearing. RESURRECTION AND RISING

en: Will-be-raised, arises, will-arise | es: Se-levantará, se-levantará, se-levantarán | fr: ressusciter | de: auferwecken, steht-auf Matt 12:42; Matt 24:7; Matt 24:11; Matt 24:24; Mark 13:8

5. raise up / lift up (physical) (8×) Active transitive physical raising: to lift someone up, help them stand, or raise them to their feet—without reference to resurrection. Jesus takes the sick boy's hand and 'raised him' (Mark 9:27), Peter 'raised up' the lame man (Acts 3:7), and a sheep is pulled from a pit (Matt 12:11). Spanish levantó and Swahili akamwinua mark simple physical assistance. Luke 1:69 extends this to God 'raising up a horn of salvation' in a metaphorical-political sense. RESURRECTION AND RISING

en: he-awakened, he-raised, he-raised-up | es: levantar, levantará?, levantó | fr: ressusciter | de: auferwecken, steht-auf Matt 12:11; Mark 1:31; Mark 9:27; Luke 1:69; Acts 3:7

6. wake from sleep (4×) To wake or rouse from sleep, either transitively (waking someone) or intransitively (being awakened). The disciples wake Jesus during the storm (Matt 8:25, Mark 4:38), and Paul commands the Ephesians Ἔγειρε ὁ καθεύδων, 'Awake, O sleeper' (Eph 5:14). Spanish despertaron/Despiértate and Arabic استيقظ clearly distinguish this from the resurrection senses. Romans 13:11 uses it metaphorically—'it is time to wake from sleep'—bridging the literal and spiritual dimensions. RESURRECTION AND RISING

en: awake, they-wake, they-woke | es: Despiértate, despertar, despertaron | fr: ressusciter | de: auferwecken, steht-auf Matt 8:25; Mark 4:38; Rom 13:11; Eph 5:14

ἔγερσις G1454 N-AFS (1×)

Raising, resurrection; the act of waking or raising from sleep or death

This noun means raising, awakening, or resurrection—the act of bringing someone up from sleep or death. Matthew 27:53 uses it for the resurrection of saints who came out of tombs 'after His resurrection' and appeared to many. The term can mean simple awakening from sleep or, more significantly, resurrection from death. It derives from the verb 'to raise' or 'awaken.' Matthew's reference connects Jesus' resurrection to the resurrection of Old Testament believers, showing His death and rising as the pivot point for all resurrection hope.

(1×) Matthew 27:53 describes saints rising from tombs 'after His resurrection'—the raising of Jesus triggered the resurrection of these Old Testament believers. The noun denotes the act of raising or awakening, especially from death. Spanish 'resurrección,' French 'résurrection,' and English 'raising' all capture this sense of being brought up from death. This mysterious event demonstrates that Christ's resurrection has corporate implications—His rising inaugurates the general resurrection, beginning with these firstfruits who witness to Jerusalem. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12060 WITH 4 SENSES

en: raising | es: resurrección | fr: résurrection | de: ἔγερσιν Matt 27:53

ἐγκάθ-ετος G1455 Adj-AMP (1×)

Spies, secretly planted agents sent to gather information or entrap someone

This adjective used as a noun means spies or secret agents—people planted to gather information or create a trap. Luke 20:20 describes the religious leaders sending 'spies who pretended to be righteous' to catch Jesus in His words so they could deliver Him to Roman authorities. The term emphasizes their covert, deceptive nature—pretending sincerity while actually seeking to entrap. Classical Greek used it for people secretly inserted into situations for surveillance or subversion. These agents tried to force Jesus into politically dangerous statements.

(1×) Luke 20:20 records scribes and chief priests sending 'spies' disguised as sincere questioners to trap Jesus with politically dangerous statements about taxes. The term designates secretly planted agents working undercover. English 'spies,' Spanish 'espías,' and French 'espion' all convey this covert surveillance function. Their question about Caesar's tax was designed as a no-win scenario—but Jesus' brilliant 'render to Caesar' response escaped their trap while teaching profound truth about dual citizenship in earthly and heavenly kingdoms. AMBUSH LURK

en: spies | es: espías | fr: espion | de: ἐνκαθέτους Luke 20:20

ἐγκαίν-ια G1456 N-NNP (1×)

Feast of Dedication, Jewish festival commemorating temple rededication by Judas Maccabeus in 164 BC

The Feast of Dedication (Hanukkah), an eight-day Jewish festival commemorating the rededication of the temple in 164 BC after Antiochus Epiphanes had desecrated it. Judas Maccabeus cleansed and rededicated the temple following the Maccabean revolt. John 10:22 notes Jesus was in Jerusalem during this feast, walking in Solomon's colonnade during winter. Though not commanded in Torah, this feast celebrated God's faithfulness in restoring temple worship. Jesus' presence there and His claims about being the true temple take on added significance.

(1×) John 10:22 places Jesus in Jerusalem at the Feast of Dedication (Hanukkah), the winter festival celebrating the temple's rededication in 164 BC. The term means 'renewal' or 'consecration.' English 'Dedication,' Spanish 'Dedicación,' French 'dédicace,' and German 'Tempelweihe' all reference this rededication commemoration. Jesus' presence at this feast celebrating restored temple worship sets the stage for His claims to be God's true temple—He is the ultimate fulfillment of what the physical building symbolized. PASSOVER FESTIVAL

en: Dedication | es: Dedicación | fr: dédicace | de: Tempelweihe John 10:22

ἐγκαιν-ίζω G1457 V-RIM/P-3S (2×)

inaugurate, dedicate, consecrate for first use

This verb means to inaugurate or dedicate something for its first sacred use. In Hebrews 9:18 and 10:20, it describes the consecration of the old covenant and the new way opened through Christ's sacrifice. The term carries connotations of ritual dedication, making something newly operational for its holy purpose. Both uses in Hebrews connect sacrifice with the inauguration of covenant relationship.

(2×) Applied to covenant inauguration, this sense emphasizes the consecration required to make a way operational. Hebrews 9:18 refers to the Mosaic covenant not being inaugurated without blood, while 10:20 speaks of the new and living way Christ inaugurated through the veil. The German 'einweihen' (dedicate/consecrate) particularly captures the ceremonial dimension of making something sacred and accessible. RENEW REPAIR RESTORE en: he-inaugurated, was-inaugurated | es: fue-inaugurado, inauguró | fr: einweihen | de: einweihen Heb 9:18; Heb 10:20

ἐγκἄλέω G1458 V-PMA-3P (7×)

To bring a formal charge or legal accusation against someone; to accuse in a judicial setting.

A technical legal term drawn from Greek courtroom procedure, meaning to lodge a formal charge against a person. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in Luke-Acts and Romans, always in contexts of judicial proceedings — whether before Roman magistrates (Acts 19:38, 19:40), the Sanhedrin (Acts 23:28–29), or the imperial tribunal (Acts 26:2). Paul also uses it theologically in Romans 8:33, asking who shall bring a charge against God's elect. The multilingual evidence confirms this forensic focus: Spanish 'acusar,' French 'accuser,' and German 'anklagen' all point squarely to formal accusation rather than casual blame.

accuse, bring charges against (7×) To bring a formal legal accusation or charge against someone in a judicial context. Every NT occurrence sits within a courtroom or tribunal setting — the Ephesian town clerk warns that complaints must be settled in lawful assembly (Acts 19:38–40), the tribune seeks to know the charges against Paul (Acts 23:28), and Paul himself stands accused before Agrippa (Acts 26:2). The Spanish 'acusar,' French 'accuser,' and German 'anklagen' uniformly confirm the forensic register. In Romans 8:33 the term shifts from earthly courts to the divine tribunal: who will bring charges against those whom God has chosen? ACCUSE BRING CHARGES

en: I-am-accused, being-accused, let-them-accuse | es: acusará, acusén, de-ser-acusados | fr: accuser | de: anklagen, ἐγκαλείτωσαν, ἐγκαλεῖσθαι Acts 19:38; Acts 19:40; Acts 23:28; Acts 23:29; Acts 26:2

ἐγκατα-λείπω G1459 V-AIA-3S (10×)

Forsake, abandon, leave behind — whether deserting a person in need or neglecting communal assembly

Egkataleipo is one of the most emotionally charged verbs in the New Testament. Jesus cries from the cross, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' (Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34), quoting Psalm 22:1 — and yet Peter at Pentecost declares that God did not 'abandon' his Holy One to the grave (Acts 2:27, 31). Paul uses it of personal desertion: 'Demas has forsaken me' (2 Tim 4:10) and 'everyone deserted me' (2 Tim 4:16). The word also extends to neglecting an assembly (Heb 10:25), where the object shifts from a person to a communal practice. Spanish 'abandonar' serves both senses uniformly.

1. forsake, abandon (9×) To forsake, abandon, or desert a person, especially in a moment of dire need — carrying deep emotional and theological weight. Jesus' cry of dereliction (Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34) and God's promise 'I will never forsake you' (Heb 13:5) stand at opposite poles of this sense. Paul's personal experience of abandonment by Demas and others (2 Tim 4:10, 16) and Isaiah's remnant prophecy applied in Romans 9:29 all cluster here. Spanish 'abandonar' and German 'verlassen' both convey the relational betrayal involved. LEAVING AND REMAINING

en: abandoned, did-you-forsake, forsaken | es: abandonaron, abandonarás, abandonaré | fr: abandonner | de: verlassen, ἐγκατέλιπες, ἐνκαταλείψεις Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34; Acts 2:27; Acts 2:31; Rom 9:29

2. forsake, desert (an assembly) (1×) To forsake or neglect an established practice of assembling together — a specialized application where the object is not a person but a communal gathering. Hebrews 10:25 urges believers not to forsake 'the assembling of ourselves together,' using the same verb but redirecting it from interpersonal abandonment to communal negligence. The single occurrence distinguishes itself from sense 1 by its corporate, habitual focus rather than personal desertion. LEAVING AND REMAINING

en: forsaking | es: abandonando | fr: abandonner | de: verlassen Heb 10:25

ἐγκατοικ-έω G1460 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

Dwelling among, living in the midst of; residing in or with a community

A participle meaning 'dwelling among' or 'living in the midst of'—residing within or among a group. 2 Peter 2:8 describes righteous Lot 'dwelling among' the people of Sodom, whose lawless deeds tormented his righteous soul. The term emphasizes physical proximity and ongoing residence. Classical Greek used it for inhabiting a place or living among a people. Peter's point is that Lot's geographical location didn't corrupt him—he maintained righteousness despite constant exposure to wickedness, proving God can preserve the godly even in ungodly environments.

(1×) 2 Peter 2:8 describes righteous Lot 'dwelling among' the Sodomites, whose lawless conduct daily tormented his righteous soul. The participle emphasizes ongoing residence in the midst of a community. Spanish 'habitando' and English 'dwelling' capture this sense of living among a people. Peter uses Lot to demonstrate that God knows how to rescue the godly from trials—Lot maintained righteousness despite prolonged immersion in Sodom's wickedness, showing environmental corruption isn't inevitable for those trusting God. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: dwelling | es: habitando | fr: ἐνκατοικῶν | de: darin-wohnen 2Pet 2:8

ἐγκεντ-ρίζω G1461 V-AIP-2S (6×)

To graft a branch into a tree; used metaphorically for incorporating believers into God's covenant people.

Drawn from the agricultural world of olive cultivation, this verb means to insert a shoot or scion into a rootstock so it can draw life from the host tree. Paul commandeers the image in Romans 11:17-24, where wild olive branches (Gentile believers) are grafted into the cultivated olive tree (Israel). The Spanish 'injertar' and French 'greffer' both preserve the horticultural precision, while the metaphor carries deep theological freight: life flows from the root to every grafted branch alike.

graft in (6×) To graft a branch into a living tree so it shares the root's vitality. All six NT occurrences cluster in Romans 11:17-24, where Paul builds an extended allegory of the olive tree representing God's covenant people. Gentile believers are wild branches grafted in (v. 17), some natural branches were broken off (v. 19), and God is able to graft the original branches back (v. 23-24). The multilingual evidence is uniform: Spanish 'injertar,' French 'greffer,' and English 'graft in' all reflect this single agricultural-metaphorical sense. SOWING AND PLANTING

en: might-be-grafted-in, to-graft-in, were-grafted | es: fuera-injertado, fuiste-injertado, para-injertar | fr: greffer | de: einpfropfen Rom 11:17; Rom 11:19; Rom 11:23; Rom 11:24

ἔγ-κλημα G1462 N-ANS (2×)

charge, accusation, formal complaint

This legal term denotes a formal accusation or charge brought against someone. In Acts 23:29 and 25:16, it appears in the Roman legal proceedings against Paul, referring to the specific charges brought by his accusers. The word belongs to the technical vocabulary of Greco-Roman jurisprudence, indicating written complaints that could lead to trial. Both occurrences emphasize the official, legal nature of the accusation.

(2×) Referring to formal legal charges in a Roman court context, this sense captures accusations requiring judicial investigation. Acts 23:29 describes the charge as unworthy of death, while 25:16 contrasts Roman justice (hearing the accused) with unfair condemnation. The lexical evidence shows this is technical legal vocabulary, used for written complaints initiating prosecution, making both instances in Acts particularly appropriate to their juridical setting. LEGAL ACCUSATION CHARGE

en: charge | es: cargo | fr: accusation | de: ἐγκλήματος, ἔγκλημα Acts 23:29; Acts 25:16

ἐγκομβ-όομαι G1463 V-AMM-2P (1×)

To clothe oneself with, put on as a garment; to wrap oneself in or wear something

This middle voice verb means to clothe oneself with something or put on a garment. 1 Peter 5:5 commands believers to 'clothe yourselves with humility toward one another,' using the imagery of putting on a garment or apron. Classical Greek used it for binding something on oneself or wearing it constantly. Peter's metaphor suggests humility should be as visible and constant as clothing—not an occasional posture but a permanent disposition believers deliberately assume in all relationships. Humility becomes the 'uniform' of Christian community.

(1×) 1 Peter 5:5 exhorts believers to 'clothe yourselves with humility' toward each other. The middle voice verb means to put on or wrap oneself in something like a garment. Spanish 'vestíos' and English 'clothe yourselves' capture this imagery of deliberately assuming an attitude as one puts on clothing. Peter's command makes humility a visible, constant characteristic—not hidden internal disposition but outward behavior as obvious as the clothes you wear, defining how believers relate to one another in the community. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: clothe-yourselves | es: vestíos | fr: ἐγκομβώσασθε | de: sich-umguerten 1Pet 5:5

ἐγκοπ-ή G1464 N-AFS (1×)

Hindrance, obstacle, impediment; something that blocks progress or creates difficulty

This noun means hindrance, obstacle, or impediment—something that blocks progress or creates difficulty. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 9:12 when explaining why he refuses financial support: 'lest we hinder the gospel of Christ.' The term can refer to physical obstacles or metaphorical barriers. Classical Greek used it for incisions, interruptions, or material obstacles. Paul's concern is pastoral—he'll surrender legitimate rights rather than create any hindrance that might impede the gospel's advance. Nothing must obstruct people from hearing and receiving Christ's message.

(1×) 1 Corinthians 9:12 explains Paul's refusal of financial support: to avoid putting 'any hindrance in the way of the gospel of Christ.' The noun describes an obstacle or impediment blocking progress. English 'hindrance,' Spanish 'obstáculo,' French 'obstacle,' and German 'Hindernis' all convey this barrier imagery. Paul anticipates critics might accuse him of preaching for money, so he surrenders his apostolic right to support rather than create any stumbling block that might prevent people from receiving the gospel message. STUMBLING BLOCKS

en: hindrance | es: obstáculo | fr: obstacle | de: Hindernis 1Cor 9:12

ἐγκόπτω G1465 V-AIA-3S (5×)

To hinder, impede, or cut in on; to obstruct someone's progress or plans

Originally meaning 'to cut into' (from en + kopto), this verb came to signify obstructing or hindering someone's course of action. Paul uses it repeatedly to explain why his plans were thwarted: he was 'hindered' from visiting Rome (Rom 15:22) and Thessalonica (1 Thess 2:18). In Galatians 5:7, it evokes an athletic metaphor – 'who hindered you from obeying the truth?' – as if someone cut in during a race. Peter urges husbands to honor their wives so that their prayers may not be 'hindered' (1 Pet 3:7). Spanish 'estorbar/impedir' and German 'hindern' confirm the obstruction sense.

(5×) To hinder, obstruct, or impede progress, cutting in on someone's intended course. The athletic metaphor in Galatians 5:7 – 'who cut in on you?' – preserves the original sense of cutting into a path. Paul explains his delayed visits as having been 'hindered' by ministry demands (Rom 15:22) or by Satan (1 Thess 2:18). In 1 Peter 3:7, prayers themselves can be 'hindered' by broken marital relationships. Spanish 'estorbar' (to obstruct) and German 'hindern' consistently render the interference sense. Acts 24:4 uses it more delicately – 'that I may not weary you' – showing the word can shade toward imposition. FORBID HINDER PREVENT en: I-may-weary, I-was-hindered, hindered | es: detenga, era-impedido, estorbó | fr: empêcher, hindern | de: hindern, ἐνκόπτω Acts 24:4; Rom 15:22; Gal 5:7; 1Thess 2:18; 1Pet 3:7

ἐγκράτ-εια G1466 N-GFS (4×)

Self-control; mastery over one's desires, appetites, and impulses

A virtue denoting the inner strength to govern one's passions and appetites. In Galatians 5:23 it crowns the fruit-of-the-Spirit list, while in 2 Peter 1:6 it appears twice in a chain linking knowledge to godliness. When Paul reasoned about 'righteousness, self-control, and the coming judgment' before Felix (Acts 24:25), the governor trembled – suggesting this was no abstract ideal but a piercing moral demand. French 'maitrise de soi' and Spanish 'dominio propio' both capture the reflexive dimension: authority exercised over oneself.

(4×) The capacity to restrain one's desires, appetites, and impulses through inner discipline. Classical Greek usage (enkrateia hedonon kai epithymion) already framed this as mastery over pleasures and lusts. In the NT it appears in ethical catalogs (Gal 5:23, 2 Pet 1:6) and in Paul's pointed discourse before Felix (Acts 24:25). The multilingual evidence – spa 'dominio propio,' fra 'maitrise de soi,' deu approximating the Greek – uniformly treats it as deliberate self-governance rather than mere restraint. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11191 WITH 4 SENSES

en: self-control | es: dominio-propio | fr: maîtrise-de-soi, ἐγκράτεια, ἐγκράτειαν | de: ἐγκράτεια, ἐγκράτειαν, ἐγκρατείας Acts 24:25; Gal 5:23; 2Pet 1:6

ἐγκρατ-εύομαι G1467 V-PIM/P-3P (2×)

exercise self-control, practice restraint

This middle voice verb means to exercise self-control or discipline oneself. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 7:9 regarding sexual self-control in marriage contexts, and in 9:25 of athletic training discipline. The term emphasizes active self-mastery rather than mere passive restraint. Ancient Greek also used it for forcing oneself to do something difficult, highlighting the intentional, effortful nature of self-discipline.

(2×) Describing the active practice of self-control, this sense applies both to sexual restraint (1 Cor 7:9) and athletic discipline (9:25). The multilingual pattern emphasizes the reflexive action ('se controla' in Spanish, 'se maîtriser' in French), highlighting personal agency in mastering one's desires. Paul's athletic imagery in 9:25 draws on the well-known rigorous training regimen of ancient competitors. SOBER-MINDED SELF-CONTROL

en: exercises-self-control, they-have-self-control | es: se-controla, se-controlan | fr: se-maîtriser | de: enthaltsam-sein 1Cor 7:9; 1Cor 9:25

ἐγκρατ-ής G1468 Adj-AMS (1×)

Self-controlled, disciplined, exercising mastery over desires and impulses; temperate

This adjective means self-controlled or disciplined—exercising mastery over one's desires, impulses, and appetites. Titus 1:8 lists it among qualifications for elders: they must be self-controlled, upright, holy, and disciplined. Classical Greek used it for those who had power over themselves, masters of their passions. The term emphasizes strength of character that restrains destructive impulses. Leaders must model the self-discipline they call others to practice—controlling tongue, temper, appetites, and ambitions through the Spirit's power.

(1×) Titus 1:8 requires elders to be 'self-controlled'—exercising disciplined mastery over desires and impulses. The adjective describes someone who has power over themselves, not enslaved to passions. Spanish 'con dominio propio,' French preserves the Greek, and English 'self-disciplined' all emphasize this internal mastery. Church leaders must demonstrate the fruit of the Spirit in personal discipline—their authority over others flows from proven authority over their own appetites, emotions, and impulses through Spirit-empowered character development. SOBER-MINDED SELF-CONTROL

en: self-disciplined | es: con-dominio-propio | fr: ἐγκρατῆ | de: enthaltsam Titus 1:8

ἐγκρίνω G1469 V-ANA (1×)

To count among, classify with; to reckon someone as belonging to a particular group or category

This verb describes the act of placing someone in a particular category or reckoning them as part of a specific group. In 2 Corinthians 10:12, Paul uses it to describe those who dare to classify themselves among the commendable, suggesting a nuanced meaning of self-evaluation and comparison. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'incluirnos', French 'compter parmi', German 'sich vergleichen') captures both the counting-among sense and the comparative aspect of this classification action.

(1×) The single occurrence in 2 Corinthians 10:12 shows Paul critiquing those who 'classify themselves' or 'count themselves among' the worthy. The Spanish 'incluirnos' (include ourselves) and French 'compter parmi' (count among) suggest membership reckoning, while German 'sich vergleichen' (compare oneself) highlights the evaluative dimension. Classical usage confirms this verb meant 'to reckon in/among' or 'to select/admit,' which fits Paul's ironic tone about self-commendation. COUNTING AND NARRATING

en: to-classify | es: incluirnos | fr: compter-parmi | de: sich-vergleichen 2Cor 10:12

ἐγ-κρύπτω G1470 V-AIA-3S (1×)

To hide, conceal within; to place something inside another thing so as to be hidden from view

This compound verb describes hiding something by placing it within or concealing it inside another object. In Matthew 13:33, Jesus uses it in the parable where a woman hides leaven in three measures of flour—a vivid image of the kingdom's hidden, transformative work. The multilingual renderings (Spanish 'escondió', French 'cacher', English 'hid') consistently emphasize the concealment aspect, though the German preserves the Greek form itself, perhaps recognizing the technical precision of this particular compounding.

(1×) The parable context in Matthew 13:33 describes leaven being hidden within flour, where the verb emphasizes intentional concealment with transformative purpose. Spanish 'escondió' and French 'cacher' straightforwardly render 'hid/hide,' while the classical usage ('hide or conceal in') confirms the locative dimension—not just hiding, but hiding within something. The image suggests penetration and dispersal, not mere covering. HIDING AND CONCEALING

en: hid | es: escondió | fr: cacher | de: ἐνέκρυψεν Matt 13:33

ἔγκῡος G1471 N-DFS (1×)

Pregnant, with child; describing a woman carrying a child in her womb

This adjective describes the state of pregnancy, literally 'having within' (from the root meaning 'to conceive'). Luke uses it in 2:5 to describe Mary traveling to Bethlehem while pregnant with Jesus. The multilingual evidence shows remarkable consistency (English 'pregnant', Spanish 'encinta', French 'enceinte'), all conveying this physiological state. Classical sources confirm it applied to both humans and animals, and even metaphorically to the Trojan horse as 'pregnant with silence,' showing the word's semantic range from literal to figurative containment.

(1×) Luke 2:5 describes Mary as 'being pregnant' (ἐγκύῳ) during the census journey. All target languages render this with their standard terms for pregnancy, showing this is an unambiguous physiological descriptor. The classical range (pregnant women, pregnant animals, even the Trojan horse 'pregnant with silence') confirms the core meaning of 'containing/carrying within,' but the New Testament usage is exclusively literal, referring to human gestation. PREGNANCY CONDITION

en: pregnant | es: encinta | fr: enceinte | de: ἐγκύῳ Luke 2:5

ἐγχρίω G1472 V-ANA (1×)

To anoint, rub with oil or ointment; to apply a substance to the surface, particularly for medicinal or ritual purposes

This verb means to anoint or rub with oil or ointment. In Revelation 3:18, Jesus counsels the Laodicean church to anoint their eyes with eye-salve so they may see—a metaphor for spiritual insight. The multilingual evidence reflects both religious anointing (English 'to anoint', Spanish 'para ungir') and medical application (French/German 'einreiben' = to rub in). Classical usage confirms both dimensions: ritual anointing and medical application, even extending to the 'stinging' sense of substances being rubbed into the skin.

(1×) Revelation 3:18's counsel to 'anoint your eyes with eye-salve' uses medical imagery for spiritual healing. While English and Spanish use 'anoint/ungir' (often religious), French and German choose 'einreiben' (rub in), highlighting the medicinal application. The classical range shows both ritual anointing and pharmaceutical rubbing-in, with even a secondary sense of 'sting/prick' from substances penetrating the skin. Here the medical sense dominates, though spiritual overtones remain. ANOINTING AND SMEARING

en: to-anoint | es: para-ungir | fr: einreiben | de: einreiben Rev 3:18

ἐγώ G1473 PPro-N1P (2602×)

First person pronoun: 'I/me/my' (singular) and 'we/us/our' (plural), in all grammatical cases

The first person pronoun ego covers both singular ('I, me, my, mine') and plural ('we, us, our') across all Greek cases. The multilingual evidence separates the two cleanly: Spanish uses 'de-mi' for singular but 'de-nosotros / nuestro' for plural; French distinguishes 'de-moi' from 'de-nous'; German 'meiner' serves both but 'unser' marks the plural possessive. The singular dominates (about 2,084 occurrences), carrying the weight of Jesus's 'I am' declarations and apostolic testimony, while the plural (about 518 occurrences) voices the community of faith — 'Our Father' (Matt 6:9), 'he remembered his holy covenant toward us' (Luke 1:72).

1. first person singular pronoun (2084×) First person singular pronoun ('I, me, my') in all cases. Central to self-disclosure and authority: Jesus's 'I am the one coming after me' (Matt 3:11), 'This is my beloved Son' (Matt 3:17), and 'Not everyone who says to me Lord, Lord' (Matt 7:21). Spanish 'de-mi / mi' and French 'de-moi' consistently mark singularity. About 2,084 occurrences, making it the dominant sense of ego across the New Testament. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

en: me, my, of-me | es: de-mí, de–mí, mí | fr: de-moi | de: meiner Matt 3:11; Matt 3:17; Matt 7:21; Matt 10:33; Matt 11:27

2. first person plural pronoun (518×) First person plural pronoun ('we, us, our') in all cases, voicing collective identity and shared experience. The multilingual split is clear: Spanish 'de-nosotros / nuestro,' French 'de-nous,' German 'unser.' Found in communal prayers and confessions — 'Our Father who is in heaven' (Matt 6:9), 'This is the heir; let us kill him' (Mark 12:7), 'he has visited us' (Luke 1:72). About 518 occurrences. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: of-us, ours | es: de-nosotros, nuestro | fr: de-nous | de: meiner, unser Matt 6:9; Mark 12:7; Luke 1:72; Luke 11:2; Luke 13:26

ἐδᾰφ-ίζω G1474 V-FIA-3P (1×)

To dash to the ground, level to the pavement; to demolish by throwing down, leaving nothing standing

This vivid verb means to level something completely, to dash it to the ground until flat like a pavement. In Luke 19:44, Jesus prophesies that enemies will 'dash you and your children to the ground' within Jerusalem—a devastating image of total destruction. The word originally meant to 'beat level like a floor' (from 'edaphos' = ground/pavement), conveying systematic, thorough demolition. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'derribarán' = will demolish, French 'raser' = raze) confirms this sense of complete leveling, not mere damage but utter destruction.

(1×) Luke 19:44 contains Jesus's stark prophecy about Jerusalem's coming destruction: enemies 'will dash you to the ground.' Spanish 'derribarán' (will knock down) and French 'raser' (raze) capture the totality of demolition. Classical usage confirms the verb meant 'beat level like a floor/pavement' or 'dash to the ground'—not partial damage but complete leveling. The passive form in LXX usage shows this as something suffered, adding to the tragedy of Jesus's lament over the city. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

en: will-dash-to-the-ground | es: te-derribarán | fr: raser | de: ἐδαφιοῦσίν Luke 19:44

ἔδᾰφος G1475 N-ANS (1×)

Ground, floor, pavement; the bottom or base surface, whether earth outdoors or flooring indoors

This noun denotes the ground, floor, or any bottom surface—from ship bottoms and river beds to house floors and city pavements. In Acts 22:7, Paul describes falling 'to the ground' during his Damascus road encounter. Classical usage shows wide application: foundations, pavements, ground-floors, even the soil of one's homeland. The multilingual evidence is consistent (English 'ground', Spanish 'suelo', French 'sol'), all pointing to the fundamental surface upon which things rest or to which they fall.

(1×) Acts 22:7 describes Paul falling 'to the ground' (εἰς τὸ ἔδαφος) when confronted by the risen Christ. All target languages use their basic word for 'ground/soil' (Spanish 'suelo', French 'sol'), the surface of the earth. Classical range shows this extended to any bottom surface (ship bottoms, pavement, foundations), but here it's simply the road surface Paul collapsed upon. The word can also mean 'ground' in the sense of homeland territory, though that's not relevant to Acts 22. EARTH AND LAND

en: ground | es: suelo | fr: sol | de: ἔδαφος Acts 22:7

ἑδραῖος G1476 Adj-NMP (3×)

firm, steadfast, settled; describing unwavering stability in position, purpose, or conviction

The adjective ἑδραῖος (from ἕδρα, 'seat') originally meant 'seated' or 'sedentary,' but developed to mean firmly established, immovable, steadfast. In NT usage it describes the stability Paul urges in believers: settled purpose, unwavering resolve, immovable commitment to faith and service. The word suggests deep-rooted stability rather than mere stubbornness—like a building on solid foundation or a person planted in one place, unmoved by shifting winds.

(3×) First Corinthians 7:37 uses it of a man who 'stands firm in his heart' regarding his decision about marriage—settled resolve unforced by necessity. The famous 1 Corinthians 15:58 exhortation concludes the resurrection chapter: 'Therefore, my beloved brothers, be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord.' Colossians 1:23 conditions continued faith 'provided that you continue in the faith, stable and steadfast, not shifting from the hope of the gospel.' The Spanish (firme, firmes) and French/German (ferme, standhaft) emphasize the stability. The word cluster (ἑδραῖοι, ἀμετακίνητοι in 1 Cor 15:58) reinforces the image: believers planted like unmovable pillars, immune to doctrinal winds or circumstantial pressures. FIRMNESS AND SECURITY

en: firm, steadfast | es: firme, firmes | fr: ferme, ἑδραῖοι | de: standhaft 1Cor 7:37; 1Cor 15:58; Col 1:23

ἑδραί-ωμα G1477 N-NNS (1×)

Foundation, support, bulwark; that which provides stability and grounding for something else

This noun means foundation or support, that which stabilizes and upholds. In 1 Timothy 3:15, Paul calls the church 'the pillar and foundation of the truth'—a striking architectural metaphor for the church's role in upholding revealed truth. The word appears only here in the New Testament, denoting a firm support or bulwark. The multilingual evidence (English 'foundation', Spanish 'fundamento', German 'Grundfeste' = ground-firm) consistently renders the architectural support sense, while French simply transliterates the Greek, perhaps recognizing this as a technical or rare term.

(1×) First Timothy 3:15 uses this rare noun to describe the church as 'pillar and foundation (ἑδραίωμα) of the truth.' English 'foundation', Spanish 'fundamento', and German 'Grundfeste' all convey architectural support and stability. The term appears nowhere else in the New Testament and is rare in classical sources, where it meant 'stay/support.' Paul's pairing with 'pillar' creates a doublet emphasizing the church's structural role in supporting and stabilizing revealed truth in the world. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: foundation | es: fundamento | fr: ἑδραίωμα | de: Grundfeste 1Tim 3:15

Ἑζεκίας G1478 N-NMS (2×)

Hezekiah, king of Judah known for reforms and faith

The Greek form of the Hebrew name meaning 'strength of Yahweh,' referring to the reforming king of Judah (715-686 BC). Hezekiah is remembered for religious reforms, trust in God during Assyrian invasion, and the miraculous extension of his life. Matthew 1:9-10 includes him in Jesus' genealogy, appearing twice as both father and grandfather in successive generations.

(2×) Referring to King Hezekiah in Matthew's genealogy, this proper name appears twice in consecutive verses as Matthew traces the royal line from David to the exile. The transliterations across languages (Hiskia in German, Ézéchias in French) reflect efforts to render the Hebrew original. Hezekiah's inclusion emphasizes the Davidic descent of Jesus through Judah's royal house. HEZEKIAH PERSONAL NAME

en: Hezekias | es: Hezekías | fr: Ézéchias | de: Hiskia Matt 1:9; Matt 1:10

ἐθελο-θρησκεία G1479 N-DFS (1×)

Self-made religion, voluntary worship; religious practices chosen by human will rather than divine command

This compound noun, appearing only in Colossians 2:23, describes 'will-worship' or self-chosen religious service—practices invented by human preference rather than commanded by God. It's a critique of self-imposed spirituality that appears devout but lacks divine authorization. The multilingual evidence reveals the concept: English 'self-made religion', Spanish 'culto voluntario' (voluntary worship), contrasted with worship prescribed by Scripture. This is Paul's warning against impressive-looking but human-originated ascetic practices that have no actual divine mandate.

(1×) Colossians 2:23's unique usage critiques 'will-worship' (ἐθελοθρησκεία)—religion based on human choice rather than divine command. Spanish 'culto voluntario' captures the self-chosen dimension, while English 'self-made religion' highlights the human origin. The compound combines 'will/wish' (ἐθέλω) with 'worship/service' (θρησκεία), creating a term for practices that look pious but originate from human preference. Paul's point: apparent severity and devotion don't validate practices lacking divine authorization. INCENSE AND WORSHIP

en: self-made-religion | es: culto-voluntario | fr: ἐθελοθρησκία | de: selbstgemachte-Religion Col 2:23

ἐθ-ίζω G1480 V-RPM/P-ANS (1×)

Customary, according to habit; that which is done regularly as established practice

This perfect passive participle functions as an adjective meaning 'customary' or 'according to established habit.' In Luke 2:27, it describes Joseph and Mary doing for Jesus 'according to the custom of the Law'—following established practice. The word comes from a verb meaning 'to accustom,' and in passive/perfect form indicates something that has become habitual or customary. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'acostumbrado' = accustomed, French 'habituel' = habitual) confirms this sense of established practice, what has become standard through repetition.

(1×) Luke 2:27 describes the parents doing 'according to the custom (εἰθισμένον) of the Law' when presenting Jesus at the temple. Spanish 'acostumbrado' (accustomed) and French 'habituel' (habitual) both convey established practice. The perfect passive form suggests something that has been made customary, become habitual through repetition—exactly what ritual law creates. Classical usage confirms this for practices made standard through habit, with the phrase 'as is the custom' appearing in Hellenistic texts. CUSTOM AND PRACTICE

en: custom | es: acostumbrado | fr: habituel | de: εἰθισμένον Luke 2:27

ἐθν-άρχης G1481 N-NMS (1×)

Ethnarch, ruler of a people; a governor or leader of an ethnic group or province

This title denotes an 'ethnarch' or ruler of a people—a political leader governing an ethnic group or provincial territory. In 2 Corinthians 11:32, Paul mentions 'the ethnarch under King Aretas' who guarded Damascus to arrest him. Historically, ethnarchs governed territories or ethnic groups with authority below kings but above local officials. The multilingual evidence mostly transliterates (English 'ethnarch', French 'ethnarque', Spanish 'etnarca'), recognizing this as a technical historical title, while German 'Statthalter' (governor) provides functional equivalence.

(1×) Second Corinthians 11:32 refers to 'the ethnarch (ἐθνάρχης) under Aretas the king' who controlled Damascus. Most translations transliterate this technical political title (Spanish 'etnarca', French 'ethnarque'), while German uses 'Statthalter' (governor/deputy). Classical usage shows ethnarchs ruled tribes or nations, and the title was applied to Jewish officials in Hellenistic contexts. Here it designates the Nabataean official governing Damascus under Aretas IV, who sought to arrest Paul. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: ethnarch | es: etnarca | fr: ethnarque | de: Statthalter 2Cor 11:32

ἐθν-ικός G1482 Adj-GMP (4×)

Gentile; a pagan or non-Jewish person, one belonging to the nations outside Israel's covenant

This adjective-turned-substantive designates someone who belongs to the nations (ethne) rather than to Israel. Jesus uses it in the Sermon on the Mount to describe patterns of behavior his followers should transcend: even the Gentiles greet their own (Matt 5:47) and heap up empty phrases in prayer (Matt 6:7). In Matthew 18:17 it becomes the strongest category of social distance – 'treat him as a Gentile and a tax collector.' The Spanish 'gentil' and French 'paien' both carry the sense of outsider-to-the-covenant.

(4×) A person of non-Jewish identity; someone outside Israel's covenant community, often carrying connotations of ignorance of God's law or pagan religious practice. In Matthew 5:47 and 6:7 Jesus cites Gentile behavior as a negative benchmark for his disciples. Matthew 18:17 employs the term as the ultimate category of exclusion in church discipline. In 3 John 1:7 the term denotes pagans from whom traveling missionaries refuse support. Translations consistently mark the ethnic-religious boundary: spa 'gentil/gentiles,' fra 'paien,' eng 'Gentile.' NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: Gentile, Gentiles, nations | es: gentil, gentiles | fr: païen | de: ἐθνικοί, ἐθνικοὶ, ἐθνικὸς Matt 5:47; Matt 6:7; Matt 18:17; 3John 1:7

ἐθν-ικός G1483 Adv (1×)

In Gentile manner, like the nations; behaving according to non-Jewish customs rather than Jewish law

This adverb means 'in Gentile fashion' or 'like the nations'—behaving according to non-Jewish customs rather than Torah observance. In Galatians 2:14, Paul confronts Peter for compelling Gentiles 'to live like Jews' when Peter himself sometimes lived 'like a Gentile' (the implied contrast). The word derives from 'ethnikos' (national, gentile), and the adverbial form describes conduct characteristic of non-Jews. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'gentílicamente', German 'heidnisch' = pagan-like) captures this ethnic-cultural behavioral distinction between Jewish and Gentile lifestyle.

(1×) Galatians 2:14 contains Paul's rebuke of Peter for inconsistency: living 'Gentile-fashion' (ἐθνικῶς) while compelling Gentiles to Judaize. Spanish 'gentílicamente' and German 'heidnisch' (pagan-like) reflect the ethnic behavioral distinction. The adverb describes lifestyle practices characteristic of non-Jews—particularly dietary and table fellowship customs. Paul's point is the hypocrisy of Peter adopting Gentile customs when convenient, then pressuring Gentile Christians toward Jewish observance. The term highlights cultural-religious practice, not merely ethnicity. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: like-nations | es: gentílicamente | fr: ἐθνικῶς | de: heidnisch Gal 2:14

ἔθνος G1484 N-DNP (164×)

Nation, people, ethnic group; in the NT often 'the Gentiles' — non-Jewish peoples collectively contrasted with Israel.

One of the most theologically loaded nouns in the New Testament. In its broader sense it simply means 'nation' or 'people' — any ethnic or political group, including Israel itself (Matt 21:43, 'a nation producing its fruits'). But in Pauline and early church usage, the plural τὰ ἔθνη became almost a technical term for 'the Gentiles,' those outside Israel's covenant. Spanish naciones and German Völker preserve the neutral 'nations' sense, while spa gentiles and the consistent use of the plural across languages signal the specialized theological meaning. Romans 1-2 showcases both: the gospel goes to the nations (1:5), and Gentiles who do by nature what the law requires expose the universality of God's standard (2:14).

1. Gentiles, non-Jewish nations (128×) The Gentiles — non-Jewish peoples collectively, often set in contrast with Israel and the covenant community. This quasi-technical NT usage dominates, appearing 128 times. Translations across languages typically use the plural 'nations' (spa naciones, fra nation, deu Völker), but the theological context makes the Gentile reference clear. Rom 1:5 declares Paul's apostleship 'among all the nations'; Rom 2:14 and 2:24 set up the Jew-Gentile dialectic that shapes Paul's entire argument. The Spanish gloss gentiles appears alongside naciones, reflecting awareness of the specialized sense. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: nations, of-nations | es: de-naciones, gentiles, naciones | fr: nation | de: Voelker Rom 1:5; Rom 1:13; Rom 2:14; Rom 2:24; Rom 9:24

2. nation, people, ethnic group (36×) A nation, people, or ethnic group as a political or cultural entity, without the Jew-Gentile contrast — used of any people including Israel. Matt 24:7 ('nation shall rise against nation') uses it in the generic geopolitical sense; Matt 21:43 applies it to a future covenant community. German distinguishes Volk (singular people) from Völker (nations collectively), and this sense aligns with the singular. Matt 4:15 cites Isaiah's 'Galilee of the nations,' where the word retains its older, broader meaning of an ethnic territory. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

en: nation | es: nación | fr: nation | de: Voelker, Volk Matt 4:15; Matt 21:43; Matt 24:7; Mark 13:8

ἔθος G1485 N-ANP (12×)

custom, habit — an established practice or tradition, especially in religious or communal life

Ethos denotes a settled pattern of behavior that has acquired the force of tradition or convention. In the New Testament its 12 occurrences cluster around religious observance and legal custom — the priestly lot-casting in Luke 1:9, the Passover pilgrimage in Luke 2:42, Jewish burial practice in John 19:40, and the contested customs of Moses in Acts 6:14 and 15:1. The word carries no inherent judgment about whether a custom is good or bad; context supplies that evaluation. The multilingual glosses converge tightly: Spanish 'costumbre,' French 'coutume,' German 'Brauch/Gewohnheit' — all capturing the sense of ingrained social or ritual habit.

custom, habit, established practice (12×) An established practice, tradition, or habitual way of doing things, particularly in religious or legal settings. Covers temple rituals (Luke 1:9, the priestly lot for incense), festival observance (Luke 2:42, annual Passover journey), burial customs (John 19:40), and disputed legal traditions (Acts 6:14, 15:1, 21:21). Spanish 'costumbre' and French 'coutume' both derive from Latin consuetudo, mirroring the Greek ethos in conveying habituated communal behavior. All 12 NT occurrences express this single semantic core without subdivision. CUSTOM AND PRACTICE en: a-custom, custom, customs | es: costumbre, costumbres | fr: coutume | de: Brauch, Gewohnheit Luke 1:9; Luke 2:42; Luke 22:39; John 19:40; Acts 6:14

εἴθω G1486 V-LIA-3S (4×)

To be accustomed; to follow an established habit or custom

From the ancient Greek root for habit, this verb appears almost exclusively in its perfect form (eiotha), functioning as a present tense – 'it is customary' or 'he was accustomed.' The NT uses it to describe entrenched practices: Pilate's custom of releasing a prisoner at Passover (Matt 27:15), Jesus's habitual synagogue attendance on the Sabbath (Luke 4:16), and Paul's regular pattern of reasoning from the Scriptures (Acts 17:2). Spanish 'acostumbraba' and French 'avoir coutume' both convey this ingrained regularity.

(4×) To follow an established pattern of behavior; to do something habitually or by custom. The perfect eiotha functions as a present tense denoting ingrained habit. In Matthew 27:15 it describes the governor's Passover amnesty custom; in Mark 10:1 Jesus teaches as was his manner; Luke 4:16 shows his habitual Sabbath synagogue practice; Acts 17:2 records Paul's standard missionary approach. The multilingual evidence (spa 'acostumbraba/costumbre,' fra 'avoir coutume,' deu 'gewohnt sein') consistently renders the habitual-customary force. CUSTOM AND PRACTICE en: custom, he-was-accustomed, was-accustomed | es: acostumbraba, acostumbrado, costumbre | fr: avoir-coutume | de: gewohnt-sein, εἰωθὸς, εἰώθει Matt 27:15; Mark 10:1; Luke 4:16; Acts 17:2

εἰ G1487 Conj (507×)

If – the primary Greek conditional particle, also used in the combination 'ei me' (if not, except, unless).

As the standard conditional particle of New Testament Greek, ei introduces the protasis ('if'-clause) of conditional sentences across every type: simple conditions of fact (ei + indicative), contrary-to-fact conditions, and mixed forms. It appears over 500 times, making it one of the most frequent function words in the NT. A significant secondary pattern is the combination ei me ('if not'), which functions as an exceptive marker meaning 'except' or 'unless,' as in Matt 11:27, 'no one knows the Father except (ei me) the Son.' Spanish distinguishes the two uses clearly: 'si' for conditional vs. 'sino' for exceptive.

1. if (conditional) (442×) The conditional particle introducing 'if'-clauses across all conditional types: real conditions (ei + indicative), hypothetical scenarios, and rhetorical questions. With 442 occurrences this is the dominant function, spanning doctrinal arguments (Rom 8:9, 'if the Spirit of God dwells in you'), temptation narratives (Matt 4:3, 'if you are the Son of God'), and ethical instruction (Matt 5:29-30). All languages render it with their standard conditional: spa 'si,' fra 'si,' deu 'wenn,' confirming its transparent grammatical function. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

en: If, if, if- | es: Si, si | fr: si | de: wenn Matt 4:3; Matt 4:6; Matt 5:29; Matt 5:30; Matt 6:1

2. if not, except, unless (65×) The combination ei me ('if not') functioning as an exceptive or restrictive marker meaning 'except, unless, only.' In 65 occurrences it negates a preceding generalization and introduces the exception: 'No one knows the Son except the Father' (Matt 11:27), 'salt that has lost its taste is good for nothing except to be thrown out' (Matt 5:13). Spanish 'sino' and German 'wenn nicht' capture the exceptive force, while French often retains 'si' with a negative complement. Key passage: Matt 12:4, where the showbread was lawful for no one 'except' (ei me) the priests. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

en: except, except-, if | es: si, sino | fr: si | de: wenn, wenn- Matt 5:13; Matt 11:27; Matt 12:4; Matt 12:24

εἰμί G1488

to be, exist; the verb of being in its subjunctive optative forms

The Greek verb 'to be' (εἰμί) in its various conjugated forms expressing existence, identity, or predication. This highly irregular verb appears in numerous dialectal variations across Greek literature. As the most fundamental copula, it links subjects with predicates, asserts existence, or identifies location and state. The verb serves as the backbone of Greek predication, enabling statements of what something is, where it is located, what characteristics it possesses, or simply that it exists. Biblical Greek employs it constantly for existential statements, identification of Jesus as Messiah, and theological predications about God's nature.

γε G1489

particle giving emphasis: at least, at any rate, indeed; often only rendered by vocal stress

An enclitic particle that adds emphasis to the word or words it follows. Often it can only be captured in writing through italics or in speech through vocal stress, as it doesn't always translate to a specific English word. It can mean 'at least,' 'at any rate,' 'indeed,' or 'for my part,' depending on context. With pronouns it emphasizes personal involvement or distinction ('I at least,' 'you on your part'). In negative contexts it intensifies the negation ('not even,' 'not the least'). The particle appears more frequently in Attic prose than in Homer, and its Doric form is γα. It serves primarily to highlight or emphasize specific elements within a sentence.

εἰ G1490 Adv (8×)

Otherwise, if not, else; a conditional particle introducing an alternative scenario or contrary consequence.

A compact conditional particle meaning 'otherwise' or 'if not,' used to signal what would happen under an alternative condition. Jesus warns that practicing righteousness for human approval means 'otherwise you have no reward' (Matt 6:1), and explains that new wine in old wineskins will burst them — 'otherwise' the wine is lost (Matt 9:17; Luke 5:36-37). Paul uses it in theological argument: 'otherwise grace would no longer be grace' (Rom 11:6). The word carries a logical sharpness, marking the boundary between one condition and its contrary. German 'andernfalls/sonst' and Spanish 'de otra manera' capture this pivoting function well.

otherwise, if not, else (8×) A conditional particle meaning 'otherwise,' 'if not,' or 'else,' introducing the consequence that follows if a stated condition does not hold. It functions as a logical pivot in Jesus' teaching — 'otherwise you have no reward from your Father' (Matt 6:1), 'otherwise the new wine will burst the skins' (Matt 9:17; Luke 5:36-37) — and in Pauline theology — 'otherwise grace is no longer grace' (Rom 11:6; cf. 11:22). German 'andernfalls' and 'sonst,' Spanish 'de otra manera,' and French 'sinon' all render the same contrastive-conditional function, confirming a unified sense across all eight occurrences. NEGATION PARTICLES en: not, not-indeed, otherwise | es: de-otra-manera, no | fr: sinon | de: andernfalls, sonst Matt 6:1; Matt 9:17; Luke 5:36; Luke 5:37; Luke 10:6

εἶδος G1491 N-DNS (5×)

Form, appearance, visible shape; outward aspect or kind of something perceived

Refers to the outward visible form or appearance of something. At Jesus' baptism, the Spirit descends in bodily 'form' like a dove (Luke 3:22), and during the Transfiguration the 'appearance' of his face changes (Luke 9:29). Jesus tells the crowds they have never seen the Father's 'form' (John 5:37). Paul contrasts walking 'by faith, not by sight' – literally 'not by appearance' (2 Cor 5:7). In 1 Thessalonians 5:22, believers are told to avoid every 'form' (or kind) of evil. The multilingual spread – Spanish 'apariencia/forma,' French 'aspect/forme,' German 'Gestalt' – reflects this dual sense of visible shape and categorical kind.

(5×) The visible form, shape, or appearance of something as perceived by the senses; by extension, a kind or category of something. The Spirit appears in bodily 'form' as a dove (Luke 3:22), and Jesus' facial 'appearance' changes at the Transfiguration (Luke 9:29). German 'Gestalt' (shape, figure) captures the concreteness, while Spanish 'apariencia' and French 'aspect' emphasize the perceived quality. In 2 Corinthians 5:7, the word sets up the faith-versus-sight contrast – walking not by what is visually apparent. In 1 Thessalonians 5:22, it may mean every 'kind' or 'form' of evil, extending from visual appearance to categorical type. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: appearance, form, sight | es: apariencia, forma, vista | fr: aspect, forme | de: Gestalt, εἶδει, εἴδος Luke 3:22; Luke 9:29; John 5:37; 2Cor 5:7; 1Thess 5:22

εἴδω G1492 V-RMA-2P (321×)

To know; from the perfect of eidon ('to see'), meaning to know facts or truths, or to know personally through acquaintance.

Rooted in the ancient connection between seeing and knowing (compare Latin videre, Sanskrit veda, Gothic wait), oida in its perfect tense came to mean 'I know' – knowledge already possessed and settled. In most of its 321 New Testament appearances it denotes factual or propositional knowledge: 'you know that after two days the Passover comes' (Matt 26:2). Spanish helpfully mirrors the distinction: saber for factual knowledge versus conocer for personal acquaintance, exactly tracking the two senses. The smaller personal-knowledge sense appears when someone recognizes a person or situation firsthand (Matt 27:18; Luke 6:8).

1. know facts or truths (285×) To possess factual or propositional knowledge – knowing that something is the case, understanding a truth, or being aware of information (285 occurrences). Spanish 'saber' and Arabic 'alima' both correspond precisely to this cognitive, intellectual knowing. Prominent in Jesus's teachings where he appeals to what hearers already know (Matt 7:11; 24:42; 25:13) and in apostolic arguments built on shared doctrinal knowledge. KNOWING AND LEARNING
en: do-you-know, know, you-know | es: conocéis, sabéis | fr: savoir | de: weiß, wissen Matt 7:11; Matt 20:22; Matt 24:42; Matt 25:13; Matt 27:65

2. know personally or recognize (36×) To know a person, place, or thing through direct encounter or personal acquaintance (36 occurrences). The Spanish distinction is illuminating: this sense aligns with 'conocer' and Arabic 'arafa,' both implying relational or experiential familiarity rather than abstract knowledge. Pilate 'knew' (recognized) that the chief priests had delivered Jesus out of envy (Matt 27:18); the disciples 'did not know' how to respond to the Transfiguration (Mark 9:6). KNOWING AND LEARNING en: he-knew, knew, they-know | es: Conocía, conocen, conoceríais | fr: savoir | de: weiß, wissen Matt 27:18; Mark 9:6; Luke 6:8; Luke 18:20; Luke 22:34

εἰδωλ-εῖον G1493 N-DNS (1×)

Idol temple, shrine for idols; a building or sacred space dedicated to the worship of images

This noun designates a temple dedicated to idol worship. In 1 Corinthians 8:10, Paul addresses the issue of a Christian being seen 'reclining in an idol temple'—eating in pagan shrines connected to temple worship. The compound word combines 'idol' (εἴδωλον) with a locative suffix, creating a term specifically for buildings housing idol worship. The multilingual evidence is remarkably consistent (English 'idol temple', Spanish 'templo de ídolos', French 'temple d'idole', German 'Götzentempel'), all conveying the specific religious architecture dedicated to pagan worship.

(1×) First Corinthians 8:10 addresses the controversial scenario of someone seeing you 'reclining in an idol-temple (εἰδωλείῳ)'—participating in meals within pagan temple precincts. All target languages render this consistently as 'idol temple' or 'temple of idols,' recognizing the specific architectural-religious designation. Paul's concern isn't merely pagan architecture but participation in worship contexts, since temple dining often involved sacrificial meals. The term precisely identifies spaces dedicated to idol worship, distinguishing them from synagogues or neutral public spaces. IDOLS AND IMAGES en: idol-temple | es: templo-de-ídolos | fr: temple-d'idole | de: Goetzentempel 1Cor 8:10

εἰδωλό-θῠτος G1494 Adj-ANS (10×)

Food offered in sacrifice to idols, idol meat — a central issue in early Christian ethical debate

A compound noun designating meat or food that has been ritually offered to a pagan deity before being sold in the marketplace or consumed at temple banquets. The term sits at the center of two distinct early Christian debates: the apostolic decree of Acts 15:29 (reiterated in 21:25) prohibits it alongside blood and sexual immorality, while Paul's extended treatment in 1 Corinthians 8–10 nuances the issue around knowledge, conscience, and love for weaker believers. Revelation 2:14, 20 condemns churches that tolerate its consumption. Hindi 'मूर्तियों को बलि चढ़ाए भोजन' (food sacrificed to idols) and Arabic 'ذبائح الأصنام' (sacrifices of idols) preserve the compound structure.

sacrificed to idols, idol-offered food (10×) Food — particularly meat — that has been offered in sacrifice to a pagan deity, a pressing ethical question in the early church. The apostolic council prohibits it (Acts 15:29; 21:25), Paul addresses it at length in terms of conscience and love for weaker believers (1 Cor 8:1, 4, 7, 10; 10:19, 28), and the risen Christ condemns its toleration in the churches of Pergamum and Thyatira (Rev 2:14, 20). Spanish 'sacrificado a ídolos,' Korean '우상제물,' and Swahili 'vilivyotolewa kwa sanamu' all render the compound concept transparently. IDOLS AND IMAGES en: from-idol-sacrifices, idol-sacrifice, idol-sacrifices | es: cosas-sacrificadas-a-ídolos, de-sacrificado-a-ídolos, ofrecido-en-sacrificio | fr: sacrifice-aux-idoles, viande-sacrifiée | de: Goetzenopfer, εἰδωλοθύτων, εἰδωλόθυτον Acts 15:29; Acts 21:25; 1Cor 8:1; 1Cor 8:4; 1Cor 8:7

εἰδωλο-λατρία G1495 N-NFS (4×)

Idolatry; the worship of idols or false gods, extended to any misplaced ultimate devotion

A compound noun (eidolon + latreia) denoting service rendered to images or false gods. Paul uses it both literally and metaphorically: in 1 Corinthians 10:14 he urges believers to 'flee from idolatry' in the context of pagan temple feasts, while in Colossians 3:5 he strikingly equates greed itself with idolatry. Galatians 5:20 lists it among 'works of the flesh,' and 1 Peter 4:3 recalls it as part of the converts' pagan past. German 'Goetzendienst' (idol-service) preserves the compound structure of the Greek original.

(4×) The worship of idols or false deities, encompassing both literal participation in pagan cult practices and the metaphorical elevation of created things to ultimate allegiance. Paul commands flight from it in 1 Corinthians 10:14 amid discussion of idol-meat, and radically extends it to covetousness in Colossians 3:5. Galatians 5:20 and 1 Peter 4:3 place it in vice catalogs. The translations (spa 'idolatria,' fra 'idolatrie,' deu 'Goetzendienst') all preserve the composite idol-worship meaning, with German particularly mirroring the Greek compound structure. IDOLS AND IMAGES

en: idolatries, idolatry | es: idolatría, idolatrías | fr: idolâtrie, εἰδωλολατρία, εἰδωλολατρίαις | de: Goetzendienst 1Cor 10:14; Gal 5:20; Col 3:5; 1Pet 4:3

εἰδωλο-λάτρης G1496 N-NMP (7×)

An idolater; one who worships images or false gods, often extended to include spiritual unfaithfulness such as greed.

A compound noun formed from eidolon ('image, idol') and latres ('worshipper'), designating someone who renders worship to false gods or their images. Paul deploys it in vice lists alongside sexually immoral persons, drunkards, and the greedy (1 Cor 5:10–11; 6:9), and strikingly equates covetousness with idolatry in Ephesians 5:5. Revelation closes the canon with this word on the lips of judgment, barring idolaters from the holy city (Rev 21:8; 22:15). The multilingual glosses — Spanish 'idolatra,' French 'idolatre,' German 'Gotzendiener' ('idol-servant') — all preserve the concrete image-worship sense, though the Pauline usage pushes the term beyond literal statues to any ultimate allegiance that displaces God.

idolater, one who worships idols (7×) A person who worships idols or false gods — literally one who serves images, but extended by Paul to include anyone whose deepest loyalty belongs to something other than God. In the Corinthian correspondence, idolaters appear in ethical catalogues alongside the sexually immoral and swindlers (1 Cor 5:10–11; 6:9), and 1 Corinthians 10:7 recalls Israel's golden-calf worship as a warning. Ephesians 5:5 broadens the term memorably: a greedy person 'is an idolater.' The German gloss 'Gotzendiener' (idol-servant) captures the underlying etymology well, while Revelation 21:8 and 22:15 place idolaters among those excluded from the new Jerusalem. IDOLS AND IMAGES

en: idolater, idolaters | es: idólatra, idólatras, idólatras, | fr: idolâtre | de: Goetzendiener 1Cor 5:10; 1Cor 5:11; 1Cor 6:9; 1Cor 10:7; Eph 5:5

εἴδωλον G1497 N-DNS (11×)

Idol, image of a false god — a physical representation of a deity used in pagan worship

The noun εἴδωλον (eidolon) denotes a physical image of a deity worshipped in place of the true God, carrying an inherent theological judgment that these are mere forms. Stephen recounts how Israel made a calf idol in the wilderness (Acts 7:41). The Jerusalem council warns against 'pollutions of idols' (Acts 15:20). Paul argues that 'an idol is nothing in the world' yet acknowledges the moral danger for weak consciences (1 Cor 8:4, 7; 10:19). John warns: 'keep yourselves from idols' (1 John 5:21). Spanish 'idolo' and French 'idole' derive from the same Greek root.

idol, image of a false god (11×) A physical image or representation of a false god worshipped in pagan practice. The golden calf in the wilderness (Acts 7:41), pollutions to be avoided (Acts 15:20), philosophically 'nothing' yet morally dangerous (1 Cor 8:4, 7; 10:19). Paul confronts idol-abhorring temple-robbers (Rom 2:22), Thessalonians turned from idols to the living God (1 Thess 1:9), and Revelation laments unrepentant idol worship (Rev 9:20). John's final warning: 'keep yourselves from idols' (1 John 5:21). Spanish 'idolo' and Arabic 'sanam' denote a false-god image. IDOLS AND IMAGES

en: an-idol, idol, idols | es: ídolo, ídolos | fr: idole, idoles | de: Goetzen, εἰδώλων, εἰδώλῳ Acts 7:41; Acts 15:20; Rom 2:22; 1Cor 8:4; 1Cor 8:7

εἰμί G1498

to be, exist; optative forms of the verb of being

The Greek verb 'to be' (εἰμί) in its various conjugated forms expressing existence, identity, or predication. This highly irregular verb appears in numerous dialectal variations across Greek literature. As the most fundamental copula, it links subjects with predicates, asserts existence, or identifies location and state. The verb serves as the backbone of Greek predication, enabling statements of what something is, where it is located, what characteristics it possesses, or simply that it exists. Biblical Greek employs it constantly for existential statements, identification of Jesus as Messiah, and theological predications about God's nature.

εἰ G1499

if (conditional); whether (indirect question); come now! (interjection)

A versatile particle serving multiple grammatical functions in Greek. Most commonly it introduces conditional clauses ('if'), where its regular negative is μή. It also introduces indirect questions ('whether'), where its negative is οὐ. In Homer it can serve as an interjection with imperatives ('come now!') or introduce wishes with the optative mood. With the optative, it expresses wishes—often unattained or unrealizable desires. With past tenses of the indicative, it can express contrary-to-fact conditions or unfulfilled wishes. The particle is fundamental to Greek syntax, enabling hypothetical reasoning, questions, and expressions of desire or regret.

εἰκῇ G1500 Adv (6×)

In vain; without purpose or result; to no effect.

An adverb signaling that an action has been futile or purposeless. Paul uses it pointedly in his letters to challenge complacency: faith received 'in vain' if Christ is not risen (1 Cor 15:2), suffering endured 'in vain' if the Galatians turn back to law (Gal 3:4), and labor expended 'in vain' if they revert to calendrical observance (Gal 4:11). The word carries a sting – it implies real effort or experience that has been rendered meaningless. Spanish 'en vano' and French 'en vain' capture the same hollow resonance.

(6×) Without result, in vain, to no purpose. Used adverbially to describe actions or experiences that fail to produce their intended outcome. In Rom 13:4 the governing authority does not bear the sword 'in vain' (i.e., purposelessly – it genuinely enforces justice). In the Galatian and Corinthian epistles, Paul employs it as a rhetorical warning: the Galatians' suffering would be 'for nothing' if they abandon grace (Gal 3:4), and faith itself becomes empty if divorced from the resurrection (1 Cor 15:2). Every translation tradition – English 'in vain,' Spanish 'en vano,' French 'en vain,' German 'vergeblich' – converges on this single sense of futility. WORTHLESSNESS AND VANITY

en: in-vain, vainly | es: en-vano, vanamente | fr: en-vain | de: vergeblich Rom 13:4; 1Cor 15:2; Gal 3:4; Gal 4:11

εἴκοσι G1501 Adj-GFP (11×)

Twenty — the cardinal number twenty, in counts of people, distances, and apocalyptic imagery

The cardinal numeral εἴκοσι (eikosi) means 'twenty' and appears eleven times across diverse counting contexts. Jesus uses it in the parable of the king calculating whether ten thousand can face twenty thousand (Luke 14:31). The disciples row about twenty-five stadia when Jesus walks on the water (John 6:19). Acts records 120 believers in the upper room (Acts 1:15) and a depth sounding of twenty fathoms (Acts 27:28). In Revelation, the twenty-four elders appear repeatedly around God's throne (Rev 4:4, 10; 5:8; 11:16; 19:4). Spanish 'veinte' and French 'vingt' render it directly.

(11×) The cardinal number twenty, used in various counting and measuring contexts. Distances: twenty-five stadia rowed (John 6:19), twenty fathoms of depth (Acts 27:28). Military calculation: twenty thousand soldiers (Luke 14:31). Crowd size: a hundred and twenty in the upper room (Acts 1:15). Casualties: twenty-three thousand who fell (1 Cor 10:8). Heavenly council: the twenty-four elders around

God's throne (Rev 4:4, 10; 5:8; 11:16; 19:4). Purely a numeral in all occurrences. TWENTY CARDINAL NUMBER

en: twenty | es: veinte, veinticinco | fr: vingt | de: zwanzig, εἴκοσι Luke 14:31; John 6:19; Acts 1:15; Acts 27:28; 1Cor 10:8

εἰκτός G1502 V-AIA-1P (1×)

To yield, give way; to submit or concede rather than resist

This verb means to yield, give way, or submit to pressure. In Galatians 2:5, Paul insists that he and his companions 'did not yield in submission even for an hour' to false brothers demanding circumcision. The word carries connotations of giving ground, conceding, or bending under pressure. The classical usage confirms this sense of yielding or giving way. The multilingual evidence (English 'we yielded', Spanish 'cedimos' = we ceded/yielded, German 'nachgeben' = to give way) consistently conveys the idea of submitting or giving ground in the face of opposition.

(1×) Galatians 2:5 contains Paul's firm declaration: 'we did not yield (εἴξαμεν) in submission even for an hour' to those demanding Gentile circumcision. Spanish 'cedimos' (we ceded) and German 'nachgeben' (give way) both capture the sense of conceding ground or submitting to pressure. Paul's point is resolute refusal to compromise gospel freedom. The aorist form with strong negation emphasizes their complete refusal to yield on this doctrinal point, even momentarily. DESIRE AND WILLING en: we-yielded | es: cedimos | fr: εἴξαμεν | de: nachgeben Gal 2:5

ἔοικα G1503 V-RIA-3S (2×)

be like, resemble, appear similar to

This perfect tense verb with present meaning expresses resemblance or likeness. James uses it twice in chapter 1 to create vivid comparisons: the doubter is like a wave driven by wind (v.6), and the hearer who forgets is like someone who looks in a mirror and walks away (v.23). The word introduces similes that make abstract spiritual realities concrete and memorable.

(2×) Introducing comparisons that make spiritual truths vivid, this sense appears in James' memorable similes about faith and hearing. Both instances use natural imagery (wind-driven waves, a mirror's reflection) to illuminate spiritual instability and forgetfulness. The verb sets up the 'is like' formula common in wisdom literature, making abstract qualities tangible through comparison. LIKENESS AND COMPARISON

en: is-like | es: se-asemeja | fr: ἔοικεν | de: gleichen Jas 1:6; Jas 1:23

εἰκών G1504 N-AFS (23×)

Image, likeness, representation – a visible form reflecting an original, whether coin portrait, idol, or divine nature

Denotes a visible likeness or representation that mirrors an original. When Jesus asks 'Whose image is this?' (Matt 22:20), the word carries both political and theological weight. Paul develops the concept profoundly: Christ is the image of the invisible God (Col 1:15; 2 Cor 4:4), and believers are being transformed into that same image (Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 3:18). In Revelation, the 'image of the beast' (Rev 13:14-15) forms a dark counterpart – a false likeness demanding idolatrous worship. The range spans from coin portraits to Christological glory to apocalyptic idolatry.

image, likeness, representation (23×) A visible likeness or representation that participates in its original. Used of the emperor's portrait on a coin (Matt 22:20; Mark 12:16), of idols as degraded representations (Rom 1:23; Rev 13:14-15), of Christ as image of the invisible God (2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15), and of believers being transformed into Christ's likeness (Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 3:18). The word implies real correspondence, not mere resemblance. IDOLS AND IMAGES

en: an-image, image | es: imagen | fr: image | de: Bild, εἰκών Matt 22:20; Mark 12:16; Luke 20:24; Rom 1:23; Rom 8:29

εἰλικρίν-εια G1505 N-GFS (3×)

sincerity, purity of motive; unmixed genuineness without pretense or ulterior purpose

The noun εἰλικρίνεια derives from εἰλικρινής (possibly from ἡλή 'sunlight' + κρίνω 'judge'—what stands up to sunlight's scrutiny), meaning purity, sincerity, unmixedness. It denotes transparency of motive, absence of deceit, and integrity that welcomes examination. In Paul's usage it describes both proper celebration of Christian festivals and authentic apostolic ministry—conduct pure enough to bear divine scrutiny, unmixed with selfish agendas or duplicity.

(3×) First Corinthians 5:8 commands: 'Let us therefore celebrate the festival, not with the old leaven of malice and evil, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth'—Passover imagery applied to Christian living. In 2 Corinthians 1:12 Paul defends his integrity: 'our boast is this, the testimony of our conscience, that we behaved in the world with simplicity and godly sincerity.' Second Corinthians 2:17 contrasts peddlers of God's word with those who 'speak in Christ...as from God and in the presence of God'—with pure motives. The Spanish (sinceridad) and French (sincérité) capture the sincerity aspect, while German (Aufrichtigkeit) emphasizes uprightness. The metaphor of sunlight-tested purity suggests motives so clear they can withstand God's examining light. HOLINESS AND SINCERITY en: of-sincerity, sincerity | es: de-sinceridad, sinceridad | fr: sincérité | de: Aufrichtigkeit 1Cor 5:8; 2Cor 1:12; 2Cor 2:17 εἰλικριν-ής G1506 Adj-NMP (2×)

sincere, pure, unmixed, without hypocrisy

This adjective means pure, unmixed, or sincere, originally describing something without alloy or contamination. Paul uses it in Philippians 1:10 to describe discernment of what is excellent, and 2 Peter 3:1 applies it to 'pure minds.' The word combines ideas of purity and sincerity, denoting authenticity without mixture of falsehood or hypocrisy. Ancient usage ranged from pure substances to sincere character.

(2×) Describing moral and spiritual purity without mixture of falsehood, this sense emphasizes sincere, unmixed character. Philippians 1:10 connects it with moral discernment, while 2 Peter 3:1 applies it to minds free from error. The root meaning of 'unmixed' or 'without alloy' enriches the moral application: just as pure gold contains no base metal, sincere faith contains no hypocrisy. PURITY AND CLEANNESS

en: sincere | es: sincera, sinceros | fr: εἰλικρινεῖς, εἰλικρινῆ | de: aufrichtig Phil 1:10; 2Pet 3:1

ἑλίσσω G1507

turn, roll, wind, coil; twist or revolve something

A verb meaning to turn, roll, twist, or coil something. It appears in various dialectal forms (ἑλίσσω, εἰλίσσω, ἑλίττω) with the same basic sense of revolving or twisting motion. The verb describes circular or spiral movement—rolling something up, winding it around, or turning it. Both active and middle voices appear, with the middle often suggesting the subject revolving itself or turning around. The passive indicates being twisted, coiled, or turned by another agent. Medical uses describe joints or body parts undergoing twisting or rotating movements. The word captures rotational and spiral motion in various contexts.

εἰ G1508

if not, unless, except; used with negatives to mean 'only' or 'but'

A compound conditional particle (εἰ μή) meaning 'if not' or 'unless,' often functioning as a strong exception marker meaning 'except' or 'but only.' When it introduces an exception, it carves out the one case that doesn't fall under a general statement—'no one can do this except God alone.' With imperatives or commands, it can express urgent conditions. In certain constructions it functions like 'only' or 'but,' narrowing focus to a single option or possibility. The phrase combines the conditional 'if' with the negative 'not' to create exception clauses that are fundamental to precise theological and logical statements in New Testament Greek.

εἰ G1509

if not, unless, except; used with negatives to mean 'only' or 'but'

A compound conditional particle (εἰ μή) meaning 'if not' or 'unless,' often functioning as a strong exception marker meaning 'except' or 'but only.' When it introduces an exception, it carves out the one case that doesn't fall under a general statement—'no one can do this except God alone.' With imperatives or commands, it can express urgent conditions. In certain constructions it functions like 'only' or 'but,' narrowing focus to a single option or possibility. The phrase combines the conditional 'if' with the negative 'not' to create exception clauses that are fundamental to precise theological and logical statements in New Testament Greek.

εἰμί G1510 V-PPA-AMP (2480×)

to be, exist; copulative, existential, locative, and divine self-revelation

The most fundamental verb in Greek, εἰμί expresses being, existence, and identity. It functions as a linking verb connecting subjects to predicates ('the Word was God'), affirms existence ('there was a man'), and indicates location ('he was in the wilderness'). In John's Gospel, Jesus uses it for divine self-revelation in the absolute 'I AM' echoing the name of God from Exodus. The verb also forms periphrastic tenses when paired with participles, creating continuous aspect ('he was teaching').

1. copulative, linking predication (2095×) Functions as a copula linking subject to predicate, establishing identity or classification. This is the verb behind 'the Word was God' (John 1:1) and 'you are the Christ' (Matt 16:16). Cross-linguistic glosses use basic copulative verbs (Spanish es/son, Arabic ٱ, Chinese 是). BEING AND EXISTENCE

en: is, it-is | es: es, está, hay | fr: être | de: ist Matt 2:2; Matt 3:11; Matt 5:10; Matt 5:35; Matt 5:48

2. participial, being (circumstantial/attributive) (157×) Asserts existence or presence, often translated 'there is/was.' This existential sense introduces new participants into narrative space. French il y avait and Arabic ٱ use specialized existential constructions. BEING AND EXISTENCE

en: being | es: estando, habiendo, siendo | fr: être | de: ist, sein Matt 1:19; Mark 4:31; Mark 8:1; Mark 11:11; Luke 3:23

3. infinitival, to be (128×) Expresses spatial location, answering 'where' rather than 'what.' Combined with prepositions, εἰμί situates people and things. Korean 있었다 inherently encodes both existence and location. BEING AND EXISTENCE

en: to-be | es: estar, ser | fr: être | de: ist, sein Matt 16:13; Matt 16:15; Matt 17:4; Matt 19:21; Matt 20:27

4. subjunctive/imperative mood forms (general copula/existence) (83×) Split from sense 66369. Criteria: Subjunctive, optative, or imperative forms expressing wish, purpose, condition, or command regarding state of being en: from-, he-might-be, let-be | es: desde, esté, sea | fr: de-, être | de: ist, sein, von- Matt 5:37; Matt 6:4; Matt 6:22; Matt 6:23; Matt 18:17

5. existential, there is/exists (15×) Ascribes qualities or characteristics to the subject—'you are the salt of the earth,' 'the eye is the lamp.' Where sense 1 identifies, this sense describes what something is like. BEING AND EXISTENCE

en: Is, Was, Were | es: Estaba, Estaban, Había | fr: être | de: ist, sein Matt 27:55; Matt 27:61; Mark 15:40; Luke 15:1; John 1:47

7. (1×) Forms periphrastic verb constructions by combining with participles to create continuous aspect. 'He was teaching' (ἦν διδάσκων) uses εἰμί as an auxiliary to frame ongoing action. BEING AND EXISTENCE

en: it-is | es: es | fr: être | de: ist Matt 15:26

8. Jesus' 'I AM' (divine self-revelation) Split from sense 66369. Criteria: The ego eimi statements in John's Gospel, especially the absolute use claiming eternal being and divine identity (John 8:58)

εἰμί G1511 V-PNA (1×)

To be (infinitive); the infinitive form of the verb 'to be,' expressing existence, identity, or state

This is the infinitive form of the fundamental Greek verb 'to be' (εἰμί), expressing existence, identity, state, or predication. In Acts 8:37 (a textually disputed verse), it appears in Philip's declaration about what it means 'to believe.' As the most basic verb of being, it functions across countless grammatical and semantic contexts. The multilingual evidence naturally uses each language's equivalent infinitive 'to be' (Spanish 'ser', French 'être', German 'sein'), the most fundamental verb in any language, expressing existence and identity.

(1×) Acts 8:37, though textually uncertain in many manuscripts, contains the infinitive εἶναι in Philip's statement about belief. Every target language uses its basic 'to be' infinitive (Spanish 'ser', French 'être'), as this is the foundational existential-copulative verb. Classical and biblical Greek use this infinitive extensively for indirect discourse, purpose, result, and explanation constructions. Its semantic range is as broad as existence and predication itself—the verb underlying all statements of what is. BEING AND EXISTENCE

en: to-be | es: ser | fr: être | de: ἓιναι Acts 8:37

εἴπερ G1512 Conj (6×)

If indeed; since indeed; an emphatic conditional conjunction strengthening a supposition.

A compound particle fusing 'ei' (if) with 'per' (indeed/really), this conjunction intensifies a conditional clause beyond simple 'if.' Depending on context it can convey confident assumption ('since indeed,' as in Rom 8:9 where the Spirit's indwelling is treated as established fact) or concessive force ('even if,' as in 1 Cor 8:5). Paul favors it for theological argumentation where the condition being stated is either firmly believed or rhetorically granted. The Spanish 'si en verdad' and French 'si toutefois' both capture this heightened register of conditionality.

if indeed, since indeed, assuming that (6×) An emphatic conditional meaning 'if indeed,' 'since indeed,' or 'even if,' strengthening the basic conditional particle 'ei' with 'per' to indicate that the supposition is weighty, confident, or concessive. In Rom 8:9 and 8:17 it introduces conditions treated as factually established ('since indeed the Spirit of God dwells in you'), while in 1 Cor 8:5 it grants a hypothetical concession ('even if there are so-called gods'). In 1 Cor 15:15 it underscores the gravity of the resurrection claim. All six Pauline occurrences serve the same rhetorical function of intensifying a conditional clause. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

en: even-if, if-indeed, if-indeed- | es: si-ciertamente, si-en-verdad | fr: si-toutefois, wenn-denn | de: wenn-denn Rom 3:30; Rom 8:9; Rom 8:17; 1Cor 8:5; 1Cor 15:15

εἰ G1513

if somehow, if perhaps, if by any means; expressing contingency or possibility

A compound conditional expression (εἰ πώς) combining the conditional particle 'if' with 'somehow' or 'by some means.' The phrase expresses contingent possibility—'if perhaps' or 'if by any means' something might happen or be true. It introduces conditions with an element of uncertainty or tentativeness, suggesting that the speaker sees the condition as possible but not assured. The construction allows for hypothetical situations where the means or manner of fulfillment is not specified or is uncertain. In New Testament usage, it often appears in contexts of hope or earnest desire that something might come about.

εἰρην-εύω G1514 V-PMA-2P (4×)

To be at peace; to live peaceably, to maintain harmony in relationships

Derived from eirene (peace), this verb calls for the active cultivation of harmonious relationships. Jesus commands it in Mark 9:50 ('be at peace with one another') right after the salt saying, linking peacemaking to communal preservation. Paul echoes this in Romans 12:18 with the realistic qualifier 'if possible, so far as it depends on you,' and again in 2 Corinthians 13:11 and 1 Thessalonians 5:13 as a closing exhortation. French 'etre en paix' and German 'Frieden halten' both emphasize the sustained, intentional quality of this peace.

(4×) To live in a state of peace and concord with others; to maintain or pursue harmonious relationships. In Mark 9:50 Jesus pairs this imperative with the metaphor of salt, suggesting that peaceableness preserves community. Romans 12:18 adds a sobering realism ('if possible'), while 2 Corinthians 13:11 and 1 Thessalonians 5:13 issue it as a communal directive. The translations (spa 'tened paz/estad en paz,' fra 'etre en paix,' deu 'Frieden halten') consistently emphasize active, ongoing maintenance of peace rather than passive absence of conflict. PEACE AND WELLBEING

en: be-at-peace, being-at-peace | es: Tened-paz, estad-en-paz, tened-paz | fr: être-en-paix | de: Frieden-halten Mark 9:50; Rom 12:18; 2Cor 13:11; 1Thess 5:13

εἰρήν-η G1515 N-AFS (93×)

Peace — a state of tranquility, wholeness, and right relationship; the Greek counterpart of Hebrew shalom

Eirene inherits the deep resonance of Hebrew shalom through the Septuagint, carrying far more weight than the mere absence of conflict that the English word 'peace' might suggest. In the Gospels it appears as the greeting of the risen Christ ('Peace be with you,' John 20:19, 21, 26), the gift Jesus promises his disciples (John 14:27), and the condition of those healed by faith ('Go in peace,' Mark 5:34; Luke 7:50). Paul develops it theologically as reconciliation with God through Christ (Rom 5:1) and as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22). Spanish 'paz,' French 'paix,' and German 'Friede' each carry the same breadth — from political cessation of hostilities to interior spiritual well-being.

peace, well-being, harmony (93×) A state of wholeness, tranquility, harmony, and right relationship — encompassing interpersonal concord, inner spiritual rest, and the eschatological peace of God's kingdom. As the Septuagint's standard rendering of Hebrew shalom, eirene carries covenantal weight beyond mere absence of war. Key passages include Jesus' farewell gift of peace (John 14:27), the risen Christ's greeting (John 20:19), Paul's declaration that believers have peace with God through Christ (Rom 5:1), and peace as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22). Spanish 'paz,' French 'paix,' and German 'Friede/Frieden' all reflect this comprehensive range. PEACE AND WELLBEING

en: peace | es: paz | fr: paix | de: Friede, Frieden Matt 10:13; Matt 10:34; Mark 5:34

εἰρην-ικός G1516 Adj-AMS (2×)

peaceful, peaceable, promoting peace

This adjective describes what is characterized by peace or promotes peaceful relations. Hebrews 12:11 uses it of the 'peaceable fruit of righteousness' that discipline eventually produces, while James 3:17 lists it among the qualities of wisdom from above. The word emphasizes peaceful character and peacemaking disposition rather than mere absence of conflict. It describes both states and persons oriented toward shalom.

(2×) Characterizing what produces or embodies peace, this sense appears in descriptions of righteousness and wisdom. Hebrews 12:11 speaks of discipline's eventual peaceful fruit, while James 3:17 makes peaceableness a hallmark of divine wisdom. The German 'friedlich' and French 'paisible' capture the quality of being peaceable in character and effect, not merely experiencing peace but actively promoting it. PEACEABLE FRIENDLY

en: peaceable, peaceful | es: pacífica, pacífico | fr: paisible | de: friedlich Heb 12:11; Jas 3:17

εἰρηνο-ποιέω G1517 V-APA-NMS (1×)

To make peace, effect reconciliation; to bring about peace where there was hostility or separation

This compound verb means to make peace or effect reconciliation between parties. In Colossians 1:20, it describes Christ 'having made peace through the blood of his cross' to reconcile all things to God. The word combines 'peace' (εἰρήνη) with the verb 'to make,' creating a term specifically for peacemaking action. The multilingual evidence (English 'having made peace', Spanish 'habiendo hecho paz', German 'Frieden machen') consistently conveys the active creation of peace, not merely the state of peace but the achievement of reconciliation.

(1×) Colossians 1:20 declares Christ 'having made peace (εἰρηνοποιήσας) through the blood of his cross' as the means of cosmic reconciliation. Spanish 'habiendo hecho paz' (having made peace) and German 'Frieden machen' (to make peace) both capture the active peacemaking. The aorist participle indicates completed action—peace accomplished through the cross. This isn't passive peace-possessing but active peace-effecting, removing hostility and achieving reconciliation between God and creation through Christ's sacrifice. PEACE AND WELLBEING

en: having-made-peace | es: habiendo-hecho-paz | fr: εἰρηνοποιήσας | de: Frieden-machen Col 1:20

εἰρηνο-ποιός G1518 Adj-NMP (1×)

Peacemakers, those who make peace; people who actively work to create peace and reconciliation

This noun designates peacemakers—those who actively work to create peace and reconciliation between parties. In Matthew 5:9, Jesus blesses 'the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God.' The term combines 'peace' (εἰρήνη) with 'maker/doer,' describing people characterized by active peacemaking, not merely peace-loving but peace-effecting. The multilingual evidence shows consistent understanding (English 'peacemakers', Spanish 'pacificadores', French 'pacificateur'), all conveying those who actively bring about peace rather than simply enjoy it or wish for it.

(1×) Matthew 5:9's beatitude blesses 'the peacemakers (εἰρηνοποιοί)' with the promise of being called God's sons. Spanish 'pacificadores' and French 'pacificateur' both mean 'those who pacify/make peace,' emphasizing active reconciliation work. This isn't about peaceful temperaments but active intervention to create peace where there is conflict. Classical usage even includes technical Latin political titles, showing the recognized role of official peacemakers. Jesus elevates this from political function to divine character, reflecting God's reconciling nature. PEACE AND WELLBEING

en: peacemakers | es: pacificadores | fr: pacificateur | de: εἰρηνοποιοί Matt 5:9

ἐν G1519 Prep (1774×)

Preposition: into, to, toward; for, in order to; in, among; against; concerning; as

The most common directional preposition in the Greek New Testament, appearing over 1,700 times. At its core, εἰς indicates motion into or toward a destination — entering a city, going to a place, being cast into fire. But Koine Greek expanded its range far beyond classical usage: it marks purpose ('for the forgiveness of sins,' Matt 26:28), substitutes for ἐν in static location ('in the bosom of the Father,' John 1:18), and even expresses hostility ('against me'). This semantic flexibility makes it one of the most theologically significant function words in the New Testament, carrying weight in texts about baptism, faith, and eschatological destiny.

1. direction: into, to, toward (1061×) Spatial or directional motion into or toward a destination — the core classical sense. Spanish 'a/en' and French 'en' reflect the directional force. With over a thousand occurrences, this is the default reading: entering a house (Matt 2:11), going into the wilderness, descending into water. The directional sense anchors all metaphorical extensions. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: into, into-, to | es: a, en | fr: en- | de: in Matt 2:1; Matt 2:12; Matt 2:20; Matt 3:12; Matt 4:8

2. purpose: for, in order to (561×) Purpose, goal, or intended outcome: 'for' or 'in order to.' Spanish 'para' captures the telic dimension. Theologically crucial in passages like Matthew 26:28 ('for the forgiveness of sins') and Romans 10:10 ('believes unto righteousness'). The multilingual evidence consistently distinguishes purpose εἰς from directional εἰς through contextual glossing. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: for, for- | es: en, para, para- | fr: en- | de: in, in- Matt 3:11; Matt 5:13; Matt 6:34; Matt 8:4; Matt 8:34

3. locative: in, among, at (98×) Static location 'in' or 'among,' reflecting the well-documented Koine merger of εἰς and ἐν. Spanish 'en' serves both senses without distinction. John 1:18 ('in the bosom of the Father') and Mark 9:42 illustrate this post-classical development where motion-into has bleached into simple location, a shift visible across all target languages. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: in, in-, on- | es: en | fr: en- | de: in, in- Matt 18:6; Matt 27:30; Mark 9:42; John 1:12; John 1:18

4. hostile: against (19×) Hostile direction: 'against,' marking the target of opposition or offense. Spanish 'contra' and German glosses distinguish this clearly from neutral direction. Jesus teaches about sinning 'against' a brother (Matt 18:15, 21) and blasphemy 'against' the Holy Spirit (Mark 3:29). The hostility is encoded by context rather than morphology. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: against, against-, toward- | es: contra, contra- | fr: en- | de: in, in- Matt 18:15; Matt 18:21; Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10

5. contact: at, on, upon (16×) Contact or arrival at a surface or point: 'at,' 'on,' 'upon.' Spanish 'a/al' captures the arrival-at-destination sense. Used for coming 'onto' a mountain (Matt 28:16), the Spirit descending 'upon' Jesus (Mark 1:10), or dust clinging 'to' feet (Luke 10:11). Distinct from entry, emphasizing surface contact or arrival rather than penetration. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: against, at, on | es: a, a-, al | fr: en- | de: in, in- Matt 12:41; Matt 28:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 10:11; Luke 11:32

6. reference: concerning, about (15×) Reference or respect: 'concerning,' 'with regard to,' 'about.' Spanish 'por' and French 'pour' mark the topical sense. Concentrated in the Pauline epistles, as in Ephesians 3:16 and 2 Corinthians 6:18. This abstract extension treats the governed noun as the domain of relevance rather than a spatial target. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: all, at, concerning | es: a, en, por | fr: en-, pour | de: in, in- 2Cor 6:18; Eph 3:16; Eph 3:19; Eph 3:21

7. manner or role: as, by (2×) Manner, role, or instrumental means: 'as' or 'by.' A rare usage where the preposition indicates the capacity in which something functions. In Matthew 5:35, the earth serves 'as' God's footstool; in Acts 7:53, the law was received 'by' the disposition of angels. The Spanish 'en/por' and multilingual glosses show this sense is consistently marked by context. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: as, by- | es: en, por | fr: en- | de: in Matt 5:35; Acts 7:53

8. presence: before, in the presence of (2×) Presence before someone: 'before,' 'in the presence of,' equivalent to ἐνώπιον. Spanish 'ante' (before) clearly distinguishes this from directional senses. Acts 22:30 uses it for being brought 'before' the council, and 2 Corinthians 8:24 for demonstrating love 'before' the churches. A specialized extension treating the governed noun as an audience or witness. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: before, to | es: ante | fr: en- | de: in, in- Acts 22:30; 2Cor 8:24

εἷς G1520 Adj-DNS (350×)

One; the cardinal numeral denoting a single entity, also used for 'first,' distributive 'each,' and correlative 'the other'

Among the most foundational words in the New Testament, εἷς (heis) carries more nuance than a bare numeral. While its primary function is simply 'one,' the Gospels deploy it with ordinal force in the memorable phrase μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων — 'on the first day of the week' — at the resurrection accounts (Matt 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; John 20:1). Spanish renders the ordinal use as 'primer/primero,' revealing how translators feel the shift from counting to sequencing. In rarer constructions it takes distributive force ('each one,' Luke 4:40) or correlative force ('the other,' 1 Thess 5:11), where Spanish notably renders it 'otro' rather than 'uno.'

1. cardinal number one (339×) The cardinal numeral 'one,' marking a single entity, quantity, or instance. With 339 occurrences this is overwhelmingly the dominant use. All major languages translate straightforwardly — English 'one,' Spanish 'un/una/uno,' French 'un,' German 'ein' — confirming a stable cross-linguistic core. Jesus uses it emphatically: 'not one jot' (Matt 5:18), 'one of these least commandments' (Matt 5:19), underscoring singularity and totality simultaneously. ONE AND UNITY

en: one | es: un, una, uno | fr: un | de: ein Matt 5:18; Matt 5:19; Matt 5:29; Matt 5:30

2. ordinal first (8×) An ordinal use meaning 'first,' especially in the fixed temporal expression μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων, 'on the first day of the week.' All four Gospels employ this construction in their resurrection narratives (Matt 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; John 20:1). Spanish translations shift from 'uno' to 'primer/primero,' and German from 'ein' to 'eins,' signaling that translators recognize an ordinal rather than cardinal function. This Semitic idiom (cf. Hebrew אֶחָד for 'first') entered Greek usage through the Septuagint. FIRST AND FOREMOST en: first, one | es: primer, primero, uno | fr: un | de: ein, eins Matt 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; John 20:1; John 20:19

3. distributive each or every (2×) A distributive sense meaning 'each one' or 'one by one,' expressing individual attention within a group. In Luke 4:40 Jesus lays hands on each sick person εἷς ἕκαστος, and in Acts 21:19 Paul recounts what God did 'one by one' among the Gentiles. Several languages struggle with this nuance — English resorts to 'on-each,' Spanish to 'a-uno' or 'por-una' — showing it stretches beyond the word's basic numerical meaning. ONE AND UNITY

en: -, on-each | es: a-uno, por-una | fr: un | de: ein Luke 4:40; Acts 21:19

4. the other one correlative (1×) A correlative use meaning 'the other one' in paired constructions. At 1 Thessalonians 5:11, εἷς τὸν ἕνα sets up a reciprocal relationship: 'one another.' Spanish renders this as 'otro' (other) rather than 'uno,' revealing that the numerical sense has entirely yielded to a pronominal, relational function — a development also attested in classical Greek. ONE AND UNITY

en: one | es: otro | fr: un | de: eins 1Thess 5:11

εἰσάγω G1521 V-PNM/P (11×)

Lead in, bring into (a place, dwelling, or presence); passive: be brought in, be led inside.

The Greek verb eisago pairs eis ('into') with ago ('lead'), creating a purposeful movement verb: to bring someone into a specific place. Its NT occurrences range from the tender — Mary and Joseph bringing the infant Jesus into the temple (Luke 2:27) — to the urgent, as the master commands 'go out quickly and bring in the poor' (Luke 14:21). The word carries overtones of authority: someone is always being escorted somewhere with purpose. Spanish introducir, French faire entrer, and German hineinfuehren all capture this directed movement. In the passive (Acts 21:37; 22:24), Paul is 'about to be brought into the barracks,' and the shift from active to passive marks his loss of self-directed movement under Roman custody.

1. bring in, lead into (9×) To lead or bring someone or something into a place — a house, temple, city, or the promised land — as an active, intentional transitive action. This primary sense (9 occurrences) spans contexts from the sacred to the domestic: Joseph and Mary bringing the child Jesus into the temple courts (Luke 2:27), servants bringing the destitute in from the streets for a banquet (Luke 14:21), and the high priest's servant girl letting Peter into the courtyard (John 18:16). The historical anchor in Acts 7:45 — Joshua bringing Israel into the land — echoes the LXX usage where eisago renders Hebrew bo in the hiphil. Spanish introducir/introdujeron, French faire entrer, and German hineinfuehren converge on directed-entry vocabulary, confirming the transitive movement-into-a-space core. GOING AND LEADING en: bring-in, bringing-in, brought | es: había-metido, introdujeron, introdujo | fr: faire-entrer, introduire | de: führt-hinein, hineinfuehren Luke 2:27; Luke 14:21; Luke 22:54; John 18:16; Acts 7:45

2. be brought in (2×) To be brought or led into a place by another's authority, expressed in the passive voice. Only 2 occurrences, both in Acts describing Paul's custody: he asks to speak as he is 'about to be brought into the barracks' (Acts 21:37), and the commander orders him 'to be brought into the barracks' for examination (Acts 22:24). Spanish ser metido and German passive hineingefuehrt werden preserve the passive construction. The shift from active to passive is not merely grammatical — it marks Paul's loss of self-directed movement, now subject to Roman military authority, creating a narrative contrast with his earlier free travels. GOING AND LEADING en: to-be-brought | es: de-ser-metido, ser-metido | fr: introduire | de: führt-hinein Acts 21:37; Acts 22:24

εἰσᾰκούω G1522 V-FIP-3P (5×)

To hear and heed, listen favorably; of God answering prayer or of people being heard

A compound of 'into' (eis) and 'hear' (akouo), this verb conveys not just hearing but hearing with favorable response – the sense of a prayer being answered. An angel tells Zechariah, 'your prayer has been heard' (Luke 1:13), and Cornelius receives the same assurance (Acts 10:31). Jesus warns that the Gentiles think they will be heard for their many words (Matt 6:7), and Hebrews 5:7 says Christ was 'heard because of his reverent submission.' French 'exaucer' (to grant a prayer) and German 'erhoeren' (to answer favorably) beautifully capture this answering dimension, distinguishing it from ordinary hearing.

(5×) To hear favorably and respond, especially of God hearing and answering prayer. French 'exaucer' (to grant, fulfill a prayer) and German 'erhoeren' (to hear and answer) both distinguish this from mere auditory perception, emphasizing divine responsiveness. Zechariah's and Cornelius's prayers are declared 'heard' with the implication of imminent fulfillment (Luke 1:13; Acts 10:31). In Hebrews 5:7, Christ's anguished prayers are 'heard' because of his godly fear. The passive form dominates NT usage, focusing on the recipient whose prayer reaches God. In 1 Corinthians 14:21, Paul quotes Isaiah where God warns that even through foreign tongues the people will 'not listen' – a refusal to heed. HEARING AND HEEDING en: having-been-heard, they-will-be-heard, was-heard | es: fue-oída, habi-endo-sido-oído, me-escucharán | fr: exaucer, être-exaucé | de: erhoeren, εἰσακουσθήσονται, εἰσηκούσθη Matt 6:7; Luke 1:13; Acts 10:31; 1Cor 14:21; Heb 5:7

εἰσδέχομαι G1523 V-FIM-1S (1×)

To receive, welcome, admit; to accept someone into one's presence or household

This verb means to receive into, welcome, or admit someone. In 2 Corinthians 6:17, God promises 'I will receive you' to those who separate from uncleanness. Classical usage shows the verb meant to take into, admit to sacred spaces, or receive into communities. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'os recibiré' = I will receive you, French 'accueillir' = welcome, German 'aufnehmen' = take in) consistently conveys welcoming reception or admission into relationship. This is more than acknowledgment—it's active welcoming into presence and fellowship.

(1×) Second Corinthians 6:17 contains God's promise 'I will receive (εἰσδέξομαι) you' to those who separate from impurity. Spanish 'os recibiré' (I will receive you) and French 'accueillir' (welcome) both emphasize the relational welcoming. Classical usage included admission into temples or colonies—formal reception into community. Here it's God's covenant promise to receive his separated people into intimate relationship, echoing Old Testament adoption language. The future tense makes this a firm promise of coming reception. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: will-receive | es: os-recibiré | fr: accueillir | de: aufnehmen 2Cor 6:17

εἴσειμι G1524 V-IIA-3S (4×)

To enter, go into; to pass from outside to inside a place or structure

A compound verb (eis + eimi, 'to go into') that serves as a near-synonym of eiserchomai but with a slightly more formal or literary register. In the book of Acts it describes movement into sacred and institutional spaces: entering the temple (Acts 3:3, 21:26), going in to visit James (Acts 21:18). Hebrews 9:6 uses it for the priests' regular entry into the outer tabernacle. Spanish 'entrar' and French 'entrer' render it straightforwardly, while German 'hineingehen' preserves the directional prefix.

(4×) To go into or enter a place, especially a building, sacred space, or assembly. This verb functions as a more literary alternative to eiserchomai, appearing predominantly in Acts and Hebrews. In Acts 3:3 a lame man sees people entering the temple; Acts 21:18 and 21:26 describe Paul entering to visit James and then the temple for purification; Hebrews 9:6 describes the priests' regular entry into the first tabernacle. Translations (spa 'entrar/entro,' fra 'entrer,' deu 'hineingehen') uniformly convey physical movement from outside to inside. ENTERING AND GOING IN en: enter, to-enter, was-entering | es: entran, entrar, entró | fr: entrer, hineingehen | de: hineingehen, εἰσιέναι, εἰσῄει Acts 3:3; Acts 21:18; Acts 21:26; Heb 9:6

εἰσέρχομαι G1525 V-AIA-3P (195×)

To enter, go into, or come in; of physical entry into a place or figurative entry into a state or condition.

One of the most common verbs of motion in the New Testament, covering everything from Jesus entering a synagogue to the solemn warning that it is hard for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God. The physical sense dominates – entering houses, cities, boats, and the temple – but the figurative extension into spiritual states (entering life, rest, joy, the kingdom) carries enormous theological weight. When Jesus says 'enter by the narrow gate' (Matt 7:13), both senses vibrate simultaneously: the physical image of a gate and the spiritual reality of entering God's kingdom. Greek translations from classical literature confirm the same dual range, from Herodotus's armies entering cities to Plato's souls entering new states.

1. enter a place physically (179×) To enter a place physically – going into a house, city, temple, boat, or other bounded location. This is the default and most frequent sense (179 of 195 occurrences). Spanish 'entró,' French 'entrer,' and German 'eingehen/hineingehen' all render straightforward spatial movement. Key passages include Jesus entering the synagogue (Mark 1:21), entering Jerusalem (Matt 21:10), and entering the temple (Luke 19:45). ENTERING AND GOING IN en: entered, he-entered, he-went-in | es: entró | fr: entrer | de: eingehen, geht-hinein Matt 2:21; Matt 12:4; Matt 12:29; Matt 18:8; Matt 18:9

2. enter into a state (14×) To enter figuratively into a state, condition, or spiritual reality – such as entering the kingdom of God, entering into life, entering rest, or entering joy. Found in pivotal theological statements like 'unless you turn and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven' (Matt 18:3) and 'enter into the joy of your master' (Matt 25:21). Translations maintain the same verb across languages but context shifts the domain from spatial to spiritual, making this a classic case of metaphorical extension from concrete motion to abstract transition. ENTERING AND GOING IN en: have-entered, shall-enter, they-will-enter | es: entrará, entrarán, entrarían | fr: entrer | de: eingehen, geht-hinein Matt 7:21; Matt 19:23; Mark 5:12; Mark 10:15; Mark 10:23

3. (2×) To pass through or go through a narrow or difficult passage, as in the camel-and-needle's-eye saying (Matt 19:24). English 'to pass' and Spanish 'pasar' appear alongside the standard 'enter,' suggesting translators feel the image is more about traversal than simple entry. The sense is closely related to physical entry but emphasizes the difficulty or impossibility of the passage. ENTERING AND GOING IN en: to-enter, to-pass | es: entrar, pasar | fr: entrer | de: geht-hinein Matt 19:24

εἰσί G1526 V-PIA-3P (1×)

They are (third person plural); the plural form of 'to be,' indicating existence or state of multiple subjects

This is the third person plural present form of the verb 'to be' (εἰμί): 'they are.' In 1 John 5:7 (the Comma Johanneum, textually disputed), it appears in the statement about witnesses. As a basic conjugated form of the most fundamental verb, it asserts existence, identity, or predication of plural subjects. The multilingual evidence naturally uses each language's equivalent third person plural (Spanish 'son' = they are, German 'sie sind'), the standard plural form of 'to be' used countless times in any text.

(1×) First John 5:7, though textually disputed and absent from early manuscripts, contains εἰσί in statements about witnesses. Every target language uses its standard third-person plural 'to be' (Spanish 'son', German 'sie sind'), as this is simply the plural copula. The form appears thousands of times across Greek literature for any plural predication or existence statement. Its semantic range is as broad as plural existence and identity itself—grammatically necessary, semantically foundational. BEING AND EXISTENCE

en: are | es: son} | fr: εἰσι | de: sie-sind 1John 5:7

εἷς G1527

one, single; alone, only; the numeral 1 in all genders

The cardinal number one, appearing in various dialectal forms (masculine εἷς, feminine μία or ἴα, neuter ἕν) across Greek literature. As a numeral, it simply counts: one object, one person, one event. But it frequently carries emphatic force: 'one alone,' 'a single one,' suggesting uniqueness or exclusivity. It can be strengthened by additional words for emphasis ('one only,' 'one single'). With superlatives it intensifies meaning ('the one greatest'). The word serves in idiomatic expressions and can mean 'the same' when repeated. Biblical usage includes theological assertions of monotheism ('one God'), counting of groups ('one of the twelve'), and narrative enumeration.

εἰσκᾰλέω G1528 V-APM-NMS (1×)

To invite in, call into; to summon someone to enter one's house or presence

This compound verb means to invite into or call someone inside, particularly into one's house. In Acts 10:23, Peter 'invited them in' when Cornelius's messengers arrived. The middle voice emphasizes personal initiative in the invitation. Classical usage confirms the meaning of inviting into one's house, summoning for consultation, or calling someone in. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'invitando adentro' = inviting inside, French 'appeler' = call, German preserves the Greek form) shows the hospitable action of welcoming visitors into one's space.

(1×) Acts 10:23 describes Peter 'having invited them in (εἰσκαλεσάμενος)' when Cornelius's Gentile messengers arrived—a significant act given Jewish-Gentile separation customs. Spanish 'invitando adentro' (inviting inside) captures the spatial welcoming, while the middle voice shows Peter's personal initiative. Classical usage included inviting into one's house or summoning for consultation. Here it's a small but crucial step toward the revolutionary Gentile inclusion: Peter welcomes them across his threshold before eventually entering Cornelius's house himself. CALLING AND NAMING en: having-invited-in | es: invitando-adentro | fr: appeler | de: εἰσκαλεσάμενος Acts 10:23

εἴσοδος G1529 N-NFS (5×)

Entrance, entry; both the act of entering and the means or right of access

Denotes both the act of entering and the access or welcome one receives upon arrival. Paul and his companions speak of the 'entrance' they had among the Thessalonians – meaning their reception and welcome (1 Thess 1:9; 2:1). Hebrews 10:19 declares that believers have bold 'entrance' into the holy places through Jesus' blood, and 2 Peter 1:11 promises a 'richly provided entrance' into the eternal kingdom. John the Baptist proclaims repentance before Christ's 'entrance' – his public appearing (Acts 13:24). German 'Eingang' and French 'entree' cover both the spatial doorway and the abstract right of access.

(5×) An entrance, entry, or coming in; encompassing both the physical act of entering a place and the reception or welcome received upon arrival, as well as the right of access. Paul recalls his initial 'entrance' among the Thessalonians – the quality of his arrival and their reception (1 Thess 1:9; 2:1). Hebrews 10:19 uses it for confident access into God's presence through Christ's sacrifice. Second Peter 1:11 promises believers an abundant 'entrance' into the eternal kingdom. German 'Eingang' and French 'entree' both convey doorlike access, while Spanish 'entrada' emphasizes the welcoming aspect. In Acts 13:24, the word refers to Christ's public entry onto the scene, proclaimed by John the Baptist. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: entrance | es: entrada | fr: Eingang, entrée | de: Eingang, εἰσόδου Acts 13:24; 1Thess 1:9; 1Thess 2:1; Heb 10:19; 2Pet 1:11

εἰσπηδάω G1530 V-AIA-3S (3×)

to leap in, rush in, spring up; sudden, impulsive movement, often emotionally charged

The verb εἰσπηδάω combines εἰς ('into') with πηδάω ('leap'), describing sudden, often impulsive rushing into a place or situation. NT occurrences capture emotionally charged moments: a blind man jumping up at Jesus' call, apostles tearing garments and rushing into a crowd to stop blasphemy, and a jailer springing in with trembling urgency. The word conveys immediacy and intensity—not casual entrance but urgent, sometimes desperate movement.

(3×) In Mark 10:50 blind Bartimaeus responds to Jesus' summons: 'throwing off his cloak, he sprang up and came to Jesus'—eager, immediate response. Acts 14:14 describes Paul and Barnabas's reaction when crowds try to sacrifice to them: 'they tore their garments and rushed out into the crowd.' Acts 16:29 depicts the Philippian jailer's response to the earthquake: 'he called for lights and rushed in, and trembling with fear he fell down before Paul and Silas.' The Spanish verbs (habiendo-saltado, saltaron, saltó-adentro) and French (bondir, s'élancer) capture the leaping/springing motion. Each context involves crisis or climax—not calm entry but urgent, emotionally-driven rushing in. The verb choice emphasizes the spontaneity and intensity of response to divine or desperate moments. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 9550 WITH 6 SENSES

en: he-rushed-in, jumping-up, rushed-out | es: habiendo-saltado, saltaron, saltó-adentro | fr: bondir, s'élancer | de: springt-hinein, ἀναπηδήσας Mark 10:50; Acts 14:14; Acts 16:29

εἰσπορεύω G1531 V-PPM/P-NFP (18×)

to enter, go in — to move into a place such as a house, city, or sacred space

Eisporeuomai describes the physical act of entering or going into a space, appearing 18 times in the New Testament. Built from eis ('into') and poreuomai ('to travel, go'), it denotes directional movement through an entrance into a defined area. Mark uses it most frequently: Jesus enters the synagogue at Capernaum (Mark 1:21), goes into a house (Mark 5:40), and is thronged as he enters villages (Mark 6:56). In Mark 4:19, the word shifts to a figurative register as 'the desires for other things enter in' and choke the word — the same spatial metaphor appears in the parallel discussion of what enters a person through the mouth versus the heart (Matt 15:17; Mark 7:15, 18-19). Luke deploys substantivized participles: 'those entering' a house or a city (Luke 8:16; 11:33; 19:30). Acts records people 'going in and out' as a description of community life among believers (Acts 9:28). Spanish 'entrar,' French 'entrer,' and German 'hineingehen' all render the straightforward directional movement.

enter, go in (18×) To move physically into an enclosed or bounded space — a house, synagogue, city, or village — or figuratively into a person's inner life. Mark is the primary user, depicting Jesus entering the Capernaum synagogue (Mark 1:21), a house with mourners (Mark 5:40), and villages where crowds press to touch him (Mark 6:56). The figurative extension in Mark 4:19 has worldly cares 'entering in' to choke the seed of the word, and the food-purity debate turns on what 'enters' the body versus the heart (Matt 15:17; Mark 7:15, 18-19). Luke uses the present participle substantively for 'those who enter' (Luke 8:16; 11:33). Spanish 'entrar' and French 'entrer' map the single directional sense precisely. ENTERING AND GOING IN en: coming, entering, going-in | es: entra, entraba, entran | fr: entrer | de: geht-hinein, hineingehen Matt 15:17; Mark 1:21; Mark 4:19; Mark 5:40; Mark 6:56

εἰστρέχω G1532 V-APA-NFS (1×)

To run in, rush into; to move quickly into a space by running

This compound verb means to run into or rush inside. In Acts 12:14, the servant girl Rhoda 'ran inside' after recognizing Peter's voice at the gate, so excited she forgot to open the door. The participle form describes the quick movement into the house. Classical usage confirms this for running into buildings, ships running into harbors, or conditions rushing into the body. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'corriendo adentro' = running inside, French 'entrer en courant' = enter running) consistently captures both the speed (running) and direction (into/inside).

(1×) Acts 12:14 vividly describes Rhoda 'having run in (εἰσδραμοῦσα)' with joy after recognizing Peter's voice, in her excitement forgetting to actually open the gate for him. Spanish 'corriendo adentro' (running inside) and French 'entrer en courant' (enter running) both preserve the hurried inward movement. The aorist participle suggests quick, decisive action—she bolted inside to announce Peter's presence. Classical usage included ships running into harbors and medical conditions rushing into the body, always with the sense of rapid inward movement. RUNNING AND RACING

en: having-run-in | es: corriendo-adentro | fr: entrer-en-courant | de: εἰσδραμοῦσα Acts 12:14

εἰσφέρω G1533 V-AIA-1P (8×)

To bring in, carry into a place; also to lead into a situation, especially temptation or trial.

A compound verb (eis + phero) meaning to carry or bring something into a space or situation. Its physical sense appears when friends try to bring a paralyzed man into the house where Jesus is teaching (Luke 5:18-19), and when Paul observes that we bring nothing into the world and can take nothing out (1 Tim 6:7). The more theologically charged usage occurs in the Lord's Prayer: 'do not lead us into temptation' (Matt 6:13; Luke 11:4), where the verb shifts from spatial movement to situational exposure. In Luke 12:11 it describes being brought before synagogue authorities — a social rather than purely physical 'bringing in.'

1. bring in, carry into (physical movement) (5×) To bring in or carry into a place physically — moving a person or thing across a threshold into an interior space. Friends attempt to bring a paralyzed man into the house (Luke 5:18-19). Paul reflects that nothing is brought into the world at birth nor taken out at death (1 Tim 6:7). In Acts 17:20 the Athenians say Paul is 'bringing strange things to our ears,' and Hebrews 13:11 speaks of blood brought into the sanctuary. Spanish 'meter/meterlo' and German 'hineinbringen' both emphasize the directional, physical act of entry. BRINGING AND OFFERING

en: is-brought, they-might-bring-in, to-bring-in | es: es-llevada, meter, meterlo | fr: apporter | de: hineinbringen, εἰσενέγκωσιν, εἰσενεγκεῖν Luke 5:18; Luke 5:19; Acts 17:20; 1Tim 6:7; Heb 13:11

2. lead into, bring into (temptation or trial) (3×) To lead into or bring into a situation, especially temptation or trial — a figurative extension of the spatial meaning. The Lord's Prayer petitions God not to 'lead us into' (eisenegkes) temptation (Matt 6:13; Luke 11:4), a usage that has generated centuries of theological reflection on divine testing. In Luke 12:11, believers are warned about being 'brought before' synagogues and authorities. Spanish 'nos metas' (don't put us into) captures the figurative sense of being ushered into a perilous situation rather than a physical room. GOING AND LEADING en: lead, they-bring | es: nos-metas, os-lleven | fr: apporter | de: εἰσενέγκῃς, εἰσφέρωσιν Matt 6:13; Luke 11:4; Luke 12:11

εἶτα G1534 Adv (15×)

Then, next; a temporal adverb marking sequence in a series of events or arguments.

Eita is a sequencing adverb that marks the next step in a narrative or argument. It functions much like 'then' or 'next' in English, placing events or ideas in ordered succession without necessarily implying causation. Mark uses it to describe the stages of grain growth — first the blade, then (eita) the ear, then the full grain (Mark 4:28). Paul employs it prominently in 1 Corinthians 15:5–7 to sequence the resurrection appearances and in 15:24 for the eschatological order. It can also introduce the next point in an argument (1 Tim 2:13; Heb 12:9). Translations across languages render it with simple sequencing particles — Spanish 'luego,' French 'ensuite,' German 'dann.'

(15×) A temporal and logical sequencing adverb indicating what comes next in a series. Mark 4:28 illustrates the temporal use vividly: the earth produces 'first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain.' Paul uses it to order resurrection appearances (1 Cor 15:5, 7) and eschatological events (1 Cor 15:24). Also serves to advance logical argumentation (1 Tim 2:13; Heb 12:9). The consistent translations — Spanish 'luego,' French 'ensuite,' German 'dann' — confirm its straightforward sequential function. THEN (TEMPORAL ADVERB)

en: then, then- | es: Luego, además, luego | fr: ensuite | de: dann, εἶτα Mark 4:17; Mark 4:28; Mark 8:25; Luke 8:12

εἴτε G1535 Conj (65×)

eite – 'whether…or,' a disjunctive conjunction presenting alternatives as equally possible or equivalent

The conjunction eite ('whether...or') typically appears in doubled form – eite...eite – to present two or more alternatives as equally possible or equivalent. Paul is especially fond of this construction, using it to catalogue the irrelevance of distinctions before Christ: 'whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free' (1 Cor 12:13), 'whether we live or die, we are the Lord's' (Rom 14:8), and the sweeping inventory of 1 Cor 3:22: 'whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas or the world or life or death.' Spanish sea...sea, French soit...soit, and German ob...ob each replicate the balanced disjunction cleanly, confirming a single grammatical function.

(65×) A disjunctive conjunction used in pairs (eite...eite) to present alternatives as equally possible or equivalent, forming balanced 'whether...or' constructions. Paul deploys it prominently: 'whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free' (1 Cor 12:13), and the expansive catalogue of 1 Cor 3:22 ('whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas'). It also introduces pairs in Romans 12:6-8's list of spiritual gifts. Spanish sea...sea, French soit...soit, and German ob each capture the balanced disjunctive function, confirming a single monosemous grammatical sense across 65 occurrences. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

en: or-whether, whether, whether- | es: Sea, sea, ya-sea | fr: soit- | de: ob Rom 12:6; Rom 12:7; Rom 12:8; 1Cor 3:22

εἰ G1536

if anyone, if anything; whoever, whatever; any, some (indefinite)

An indefinite compound pronoun (εἴ τις) combining the conditional particle with an indefinite pronoun to mean 'if anyone' or 'if anything.' The construction creates indefinite conditions—referring to any person or thing that might meet the specified criteria, without identifying a specific individual. It enables general statements and principles: 'if anyone does X, then Y follows.' The phrase can also function more simply as an indefinite pronoun meaning 'anyone,' 'someone,' 'anything,' or 'something,' often in contexts where the specific identity doesn't matter. It's a fundamental tool for universal or general statements in both conditional and non-conditional contexts.

ἐκ G1537 Prep (922×)

Preposition: from, out of (source/origin); at, on (position/side); by means of, with (instrument/cause).

The Greek preposition ek (before vowels, ex) is fundamentally a word of origin and emergence — 'from out of.' Governing the genitive case exclusively, it covers spatial extraction ('he went out of the house'), genealogical descent ('of the seed of David'), material source ('by the works of the law'), and partitive separation ('one of the twelve'). With 922 NT occurrences, it ranks among the most frequent prepositions and challenges translators because its semantic range extends well beyond spatial movement. Spanish de, French de, and German aus all capture the core 'from' sense, but the positional use in ek dexion ('at the right hand,' Matt 22:44) and the instrumental use in ek denariou ('for a denarius,' Matt 20:2) push translators toward prepositions they would not normally associate with 'out of.'

1. from, out of (source/origin) (886×) The primary sense of source, origin, separation, or extraction — 'from, out of.' This overwhelming majority usage (886 occurrences) encompasses spatial movement out of a place (Matt 2:15, 'out of Egypt I called my son'), genealogical origin (Matt 1:3-16, the genealogy's repeated ek to mark parentage), material source, cause, and partitive separation ('one from among you'). Spanish de, French de, German aus, and Arabic من all converge on a basic ablative/source preposition. The genealogical thread is especially revealing: Matthew's ek tou David, ek tes Marias shows origin-marking as a core NT function. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: from, from-, of | es: *-porque, de | fr: de- | de: aus Matt 1:3; Matt 1:5; Matt 1:6; Matt 1:16

2. at (position/side) (31×) A positional or locative sense meaning 'at, on (a side),' concentrated in the fixed expressions ek dexion ('at the right hand') and ex euonymon ('at the left'). With 31 occurrences, this specialized usage appears prominently in eschatological judgment scenes (Matt 25:33-34, sheep at the right, goats at the left) and royal seating requests (Matt 20:21, 'that these two sons of mine may sit, one at your right and one at your left'). The shift from directional 'out of' to static 'at' likely traces to the idiom's origin: one stands 'from the right side' and thus 'at the right.' Spanish a and German zu sometimes replace the expected de/aus here, showing that translators feel the positional force. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: at, at- | es: a, de | fr: de- | de: aus, aus- Matt 20:21; Matt 20:23; Matt 22:44

3. by means of, with (instrument/cause) (5×) An instrumental or causal sense: 'by means of, with, for' — indicating the means, instrument, basis, or price of an action. Only about 5 clear occurrences, but each is distinctive: Matt 20:2, 'having agreed with the workers for (ek) a denarius'; Matt 27:7, 'they bought the potter's field with (ek) them [the thirty silver coins]'; John 3:34, God gives the Spirit 'not by (ek) measure.' Spanish con/por and French par/de replace de in these contexts, and German aus sometimes shifts to mit or fuer, all confirming that translators recognize a genuine instrumental reading distinct from simple source. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: -, by-, for | es: con, por | fr: de- | de: aus, aus- Matt 20:2; Matt 26:42; Matt 26:44; Matt 27:7; John 3:34

ἕκαστος G1538 Adj-NMS (82×)

Each, every one — distributive pronoun singling out individual members of a group

The Greek ἕκαστος is a distributive adjective and pronoun that picks out individuals one by one from a collective whole — 'each' or 'every single one.' Unlike πᾶς ('all,' emphasizing totality), ἕκαστος emphasizes individual accountability or participation. This distinction is theologically significant in passages like Matt 18:35 ('if each of you does not forgive his brother from the heart') and 1 Cor 3:8 ('each will receive his own reward'). It appears 82 times across the New Testament, often in contexts of individual judgment, responsibility, or gifting. Spanish cada-uno, French chacun, and German jeder all preserve the distributive nuance precisely.

each, every one (82×) A distributive adjective or pronoun meaning 'each' or 'every individual one,' isolating members of a group for individual attention rather than treating them collectively. Theologically important in contexts of personal accountability — 'each will receive his own reward' (1 Cor 3:8), 'if each of you does not forgive' (Matt 18:35). Also used in narrative distribution such as Luke 2:3 ('each went to his own city'). Spanish cada-uno, French chacun, and German jeder consistently preserve the individualizing force. TOTALITY AND WHOLENESS

en: each | es: a-cada-uno, cada-uno | fr: chacun | de: jeder Matt 18:35; Matt 26:22; Luke 2:3; Luke 13:15; Luke 16:5

ἑκάστοτε G1539 Adv (1×)

Each time, on each occasion; at every instance or whenever something occurs

This adverb means 'each time' or 'on each occasion'—a temporal marker for recurring instances. In 2 Peter 1:15, Peter promises to ensure that believers will be able 'at each time' after his death to recall these teachings. The word combines 'each' (ἕκαστος) with a temporal suffix, creating an expression for every occurrence or instance. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'cada vez' = each time, German 'jedesmal' = each time, French simply transliterates) conveys the distributive temporal sense: not once-for-all but repeatedly, at each instance.

(1×) Second Peter 1:15 contains Peter's pledge to ensure believers can recall his teaching 'at each time (ἑκάστοτε)' after his departure —suggesting written provision for ongoing reference. Spanish 'cada vez' (each time) and German 'jedesmal' (each time/every time) both capture the distributive temporal meaning. Classical usage confirms this for 'on each occasion' or 'whenever,' emphasizing repeated instances rather than single occurrence. Peter envisions not one-time transmission but continual access to apostolic teaching. TIMES AND OCCASIONS

en: at-each-time | es: cada-vez | fr: ἑκάστοτε | de: jedesmal 2Pet 1:15

ἑκατόν G1540 Adj-NNP (17×)

A hundred; the cardinal number one hundred.

Hekaton is the indeclinable Greek cardinal number meaning 'one hundred.' It appears in parables about extravagant yields — the hundredfold harvest of good seed (Matt 13:8, 23; Mark 4:8, 20) — and in teaching about God's care for individuals: leaving ninety-nine sheep to find the one lost (Matt 18:12; Luke 15:4). It also quantifies debts in the parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt 18:28). The number is rendered with perfect consistency across all languages: Spanish 'cien/ciento,' French 'cent,' German 'hundert.'

a hundred (17×) The cardinal number one hundred, used as an exact quantity. In the parable of the sower it describes the maximum yield of good soil — a hundredfold return (Matt 13:8, 23). In the parables of the lost sheep (Matt 18:12; Luke 15:4) and the unforgiving servant (Matt 18:28), it sets the scale of what is at stake. The word is indeclinable and functions identically across every grammatical context. Every target language renders it with its standard numeral: Spanish 'cien,' French 'cent,' German 'hundert.' LARGE CARDINAL NUMBERS

en: Hundred, a-hundred, hundred | es: Cien, cien, ciento | fr: cent | de: hundert Matt 13:8; Matt 13:23; Matt 18:12; Matt 18:28; Mark 4:8

ἑκατοντα-έτης G1541 Adj-NMS (1×)

One hundred years old; describing someone who has reached the age of one hundred years

This compound adjective means 'one hundred years old,' describing someone who has completed a century of life. In Romans 4:19, Paul notes that Abraham was 'about one hundred years old' when considering his body's inability to father children naturally, before Isaac's miraculous conception. The term combines the number 'one hundred' (ἑκατόν) with 'years' (ἔτος), creating an age descriptor.

The multilingual evidence is straightforward (Spanish 'de cien años', French 'cent ans', German 'hundertjährig'), all literally rendering 'hundred years old.'

(1×) Romans 4:19 describes Abraham as 'about one hundred years old (ἑκατονταέτης)' when facing his aged body's natural inability to produce offspring, highlighting the miracle of Isaac's birth. All target languages render this transparently as 'one hundred years old' (Spanish 'de cien años', French 'cent ans', German 'hundertjährig'). Classical usage applied to both persons and time periods of centenarian duration. Paul uses Abraham's advanced age to emphasize faith's triumph over physical impossibility. YEAR (TIME UNIT)

en: hundred-years-old | es: de-cien-años | fr: cent-ans | de: hundertjaehrig Rom 4:19

ἑκᾰτοντα-πλᾰσίων G1542 Adj-AMS (3×)

hundredfold, a hundred times as much; exponential multiplication as divine blessing on sacrifice

The adjective ἑκατονταπλασίων (from ἑκατόν 'hundred' + πλάσιος 'fold') means multiplied one hundred times. In Jesus' teaching it describes the extravagant return on what is given up for the kingdom—not a modest reward but overwhelming abundance. The hundredfold multiplication echoes Old Testament harvest imagery (Genesis 26:12, Isaac reaping a hundredfold) and signals divine blessing that vastly exceeds human calculation or expectation.

(3×) The Synoptic parallels all record Jesus' promise to those who leave everything for his sake. Matthew 19:29: 'everyone who has left houses or brothers or sisters...will receive a hundredfold.' Mark 10:30 adds temporal nuance: 'who will not receive a hundredfold now in this time—houses and brothers and sisters...with persecutions, and in the age to come eternal life.' Luke 8:8 uses it in the parable of the sower: seed on good soil 'grew and yielded a hundredfold'—maximum fruitfulness. The Spanish (cien-veces-más), French (centuple), and German (ἑκατονταπλασίονα) all preserve the hundred-times multiplication. The figure is not literal accounting but theological hyperbole: God's generosity infinitely surpasses human sacrifice, now and eternally. LARGE CARDINAL NUMBERS

en: a-hundred-fold, a-hundredfold | es: cien-veces-más | fr: centuple | de: ἑκατονταπλασίονα Matt 19:29; Mark 10:30; Luke 8:8

ἑκᾰτόντ-αρχος G1543 N-DMS (21×)

Centurion; a Roman military officer commanding approximately one hundred soldiers.

Denotes the mid-ranking Roman officer who commanded a centuria of roughly one hundred legionaries. The centurion figures prominently in the Gospels and Acts as a surprisingly sympathetic character: the centurion of Capernaum whose faith astonished Jesus (Matt 8:5-13; Luke 7:2-10), the centurion at the cross who confessed Jesus as Son of God (Matt 27:54), and Cornelius, the first Gentile convert (Acts 10). Multilingual glosses – 'centurion' (eng, fra), 'centurión' (spa), 'Hauptmann' (deu) – consistently reflect the military rank, though German notably uses its own native term rather than a Latin borrowing.

centurion, Roman officer commanding one hundred soldiers (21×) A Roman military officer in charge of a centuria (nominally 100 soldiers), a key mid-level commander in the Roman army. In the New Testament, centurions consistently appear in a positive light: the centurion of Capernaum whose faith amazed Jesus (Matt 8:5-13; Luke 7:2-10), the officer at the crucifixion who recognized Jesus' identity (Matt 27:54; Mark 15:39), and Cornelius, the God-fearing centurion whose conversion marked the opening of the Gospel to Gentiles (Acts 10). Glosses uniformly reflect the military rank – 'centurion' (eng, fra), 'centurión' (spa) – while German 'Hauptmann' uses a native equivalent rather than a Latin loan. MILITARY OFFICERS

en: a-centurion, centurion, centurions | es: a-un-centurión, centuriones, centurión | fr: centenier, centurion | de: Hauptmann Matt 8:5; Matt 8:8; Matt 8:13; Matt 27:54; Luke 7:2

ἐκβάλλω G1544 V-ANA (81×)

To cast out, expel (esp. demons); to throw out, eject; to take out, extract; to bring forth, produce; to send out

The quintessential exorcism verb of the New Testament, ekballo carries an inherent force — the prefix ek ('out of') combined with ballo ('to throw') yields a word that almost always involves energy and urgency. Jesus casts out demons with a word (Matt 8:16), the Pharisees accuse him of doing so by Beelzebul's power (Matt 9:34), and the Twelve are commissioned with the same authority (Matt 10:1). Yet the verb's range extends well beyond exorcism: it covers extracting a speck from a brother's eye (Matt 7:4-5), throwing the worthless servant into outer darkness (Matt 25:30), bringing forth treasures from a storehouse (Matt 13:52), and even the gentle image of a shepherd who 'leads out' his sheep (John 10:4). The interplay between violent expulsion and purposeful deployment gives ekballo a dramatic versatility that few Greek verbs can match.

1. cast out / expel forcibly (53×) The dominant active sense of forceful expulsion — casting out demons, driving out persons, or ejecting entities from a place or community. Fifty-three occurrences make this the overwhelming core of ekballo in the New Testament, covering Jesus' exorcisms (Matt 8:16; Mark 1:34; Luke 11:14), the disciples' commission to cast out demons (Matt 10:1; Mark 3:15; 6:13), and the removal of persons from assemblies or communities (John 9:34-35; 3 John 1:10). Spanish echar fuera, French chasser, and German austreiben all preserve the forceful outward trajectory. The Beelzebul controversy (Matt 12:24-28) makes this sense a theological flashpoint: by whose authority does one ekballo? EXPELLING AND PRODUCING en: I-cast-out, cast-out, casts-out | es: a-echar-fuera, echa-fuera, echar-fuera | fr: chasser | de: austreiben, treibt-aus Matt 7:22; Matt 8:16; Matt 8:31; Matt 9:34; Matt 10:1

2. take out / extract (7×) A gentler extractive sense — taking out or removing a physical object from a location, especially the speck-and-beam discourse of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 7:4-5; Luke 6:42) and the hyperbolic command to pluck out an offending eye (Mark 9:47). Seven occurrences carry this sense, where the action requires care or precision rather than violent force. Spanish sacar ('to take out, extract') distinguishes this from the explosive echar fuera of Sense 1, revealing the reduced force. The shift from expelling a demon to extracting a splinter shows ekballo's scalar flexibility along the force continuum. EXPELLING AND PRODUCING

en: I-may-cast-out, I-might-take-out, cast-out | es: saca, sacar, saque | fr: chasser | de: austreiben, treibt-aus Matt 7:4; Matt 7:5; Mark 9:47; Luke 6:42

3. throw out / reject violently (6×) Violent throwing or hurling — casting someone or something with physical force, as the tenant farmers who threw the heir out of the vineyard and killed him (Matt 21:39; Mark 12:8; Luke 20:15), or the servant thrown into outer darkness (Matt 22:13; 25:30). Six occurrences emphasize the brutal physicality of the action. Also includes the sailors jettisoning cargo (Acts 27:38), where the violence is directed at objects rather than persons. German austreiben here underrepresents the hurling force that Spanish arrojar ('to hurl') captures vividly. EXPELLING AND PRODUCING

en: cast-out, threw-out, throwing-out | es: arrojando, echad, echaron | fr: chasser | de: austreiben, treibt-aus Matt 21:39; Matt 22:13; Matt 25:30; Mark 12:8; Acts 27:38

4. be cast out (passive) (6×) The passive voice — being cast out, expelled, or ejected by another agent — six occurrences where the subject suffers the action. The sons of the kingdom 'will be cast out' into outer darkness (Matt 8:12), and those who ate and drank in Jesus' presence find themselves thrust outside (Luke 13:28). Spanish fue echada fuera and the participial habiendo sido echado fuera mark the passive morphology explicitly. John 12:31 elevates this to cosmic drama: 'the ruler of this world will be cast out,' fusing demonological and eschatological horizons. EXPELLING AND PRODUCING

en: being-cast-out, having-been-cast-out, is-cast-out | es: es-echado?, fue-echada-fuera, habiendo-sido-echado-fuera | fr: chasser | de: austreiben, treibt-aus Matt 8:12; Matt 9:25; Matt 9:33; Matt 15:17; Luke 13:28

5. bring forth / produce (5×) A productive-metaphorical sense of bringing forth or producing from a source — five occurrences where ekballo describes yielding goods from a treasury or storehouse.

The scribe trained for the kingdom 'brings out' new and old treasures (Matt 13:52); the good person 'brings forth' good from the good stored in the heart (Matt 12:35). John 10:4 extends this to the shepherd who 'brings out' his sheep — a remarkably tender use of a verb whose default register is violent. Spanish saca and sacar confirm the 'drawing out' nuance, while the Isaiah quotation in Matthew 12:20 applies it to justice being 'brought forth' to victory. EXPELLING AND PRODUCING en: brings-forth, brings-out, he-brings-forth | es: ha-sacado, saca, saque | fr: chasser | de: austreiben, treibt-aus Matt 12:20; Matt 12:35; Matt 13:52; John 10:4

6. send out / dispatch (4×) A commissioning-dispatch sense of sending out or deploying someone for a purpose — four occurrences where the forceful connotation is minimal and the emphasis falls on purposeful mission. Jesus urges prayer that the Lord of the harvest 'send out' workers (Matt 9:38; Luke 10:2), and James 2:25 describes Rahab 'sending out' the spies by another way. Mark 1:43 uses it for Jesus 'sending away' the healed leper with stern instructions. Spanish enviar ('to send') and despedir ('to dismiss') replace the violent echar fuera entirely, confirming that the ek- prefix here denotes outward direction rather than forceful ejection. EXPELLING AND PRODUCING en: having-sent-out, he-may-send-out, he-sends-out | es: despidió, envíe, envíe-fuera | fr: chasser | de: austreiben, treibt-aus Matt 9:38; Mark 1:43; Luke 10:2; Jas 2:25

ἔκβασις G1545 V-AIA-3P (3×)

a way out, outcome, result; the end or exit of a situation, especially as deliverance or life's terminus

The noun ἔκβασις (from ἐκβαίνω, 'go out') denotes a way out, exit, or outcome. Originally spatial (a ship's landing place, a mountain pass), it developed to mean the outcome or end result of events, including the end of a person's life. Biblical usage emphasizes both the exit God provides from temptation and the observed outcome of faithful leaders' lives—how things turn out in the end, whether as escape or as completed witness.

(3×) First Corinthians 10:13 promises divine faithfulness in temptation: 'God is faithful, and he will not let you be tempted beyond your ability, but with the temptation will also provide the way of escape'—the exit door from moral danger. Hebrews 11:15 notes that if the patriarchs 'had been thinking of that land from which they had gone out, they would have had opportunity to return'—the potential exit/return they refused. Hebrews 13:7 instructs: 'Remember your leaders...consider the outcome of their way of life, and imitate their faith'—how their lives ended, their completed witness. The German (Ausgang) and French (issue) capture the outcome sense. The semantic range spans from emergency exit (God's provision of escape) to life's outcome (the terminal result of faithful living)—but always the sense of where something comes out in the end. GOING OUT AND FORTH

en: outcome, they-went-out, way-out | es: resultado, salida, salieron | fr: Ausgang, issue | de: Ausgang 1Cor 10:13; Heb 11:15; Heb 13:7

ἐκβολ-ή G1546 N-AFS (1×)

Jettisoning, throwing cargo overboard; the act of discarding ship cargo into the sea to lighten the vessel

This noun denotes jettisoning cargo or throwing things overboard from a ship, typically to lighten the vessel in storms. In Acts 27:18, during Paul's storm-tossed voyage, 'they made a jettisoning' by throwing cargo overboard. The term comes from the verb 'to throw out' and classical usage confirms it meant jettisoning cargo, though it could also mean unloading, expulsion, or even divorce. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'descarga' = unloading, French 'naufrage' = shipwreck, English 'jettisoning') shows varied approaches to this nautical emergency measure.

(1×) Acts 27:18 describes the ship's crew making 'a jettisoning (ἐκβολὴν)' during the violent storm that threatened Paul's voyage to Rome. English 'jettisoning' precisely captures the nautical term for emergency cargo disposal, while Spanish 'descarga' (unloading) is more general. Classical sources confirm this for throwing cargo overboard to save the ship, though the noun had broader meanings (expulsion, divorce, shedding teeth). Here it's the desperate maritime measure of sacrificing cargo to preserve lives during the storm. THROWING AND CASTING

en: a-jettisoning | es: descarga | fr: naufrage | de: ἐκβολὴν Acts 27:18

ἐκγᾰμ-έομαι G1547

to be given in marriage (passive); to marry off (active sense implied)

A verb related to marriage transactions, specifically the giving of someone (typically a daughter) in marriage. The passive voice emphasizes the perspective of the one being married off—receiving the action of being given to a spouse, rather than initiating the marriage oneself. The active sense would denote the giving of someone in marriage, typically by a father or guardian arranging the union. This captures the ancient Mediterranean social structure where marriages were arranged by families, and women were 'given' from one household to another through formal betrothal and marriage processes.

ἐκγᾰμ-έομαι G1548

to be given in marriage (passive); to marry off (active sense implied)

A verb related to marriage transactions, specifically the giving of someone (typically a daughter) in marriage. The passive voice emphasizes the perspective of the one being married off—receiving the action of being given to a spouse, rather than initiating the marriage oneself. The active sense would denote the giving of someone in marriage, typically by a father or guardian arranging the union. This captures the ancient Mediterranean social structure where marriages were arranged by families, and women were 'given' from one household to another through formal betrothal and marriage processes.

ἔκγονος G1549 Adj-ANP (1×)

Grandchildren, descendants; offspring of one's children, the next generation down

This adjective, used substantively, means 'descendants' and particularly 'grandchildren'—the offspring of one's children. In 1 Timothy 5:4, Paul instructs that if a widow has 'grandchildren,' they should learn to show piety toward their own household by caring for their grandmother. The term literally means 'born of' (ἔκγονος), and classical usage showed it meant children, descendants, or specifically grandchildren. The multilingual evidence is consistent (English 'grandchildren', Spanish 'nietos', French preserves the Greek, German 'Enkel'), all conveying the generational relationship.

(1×) First Timothy 5:4 addresses responsibility for widows: if she has 'grandchildren (ἔκγονα),' they should practice piety by caring for her. English 'grandchildren', Spanish 'nietos', and German 'Enkel' all specify the second-generation descendants. Classical usage showed this could mean any offspring or specifically grandchildren (ἐκγόνων ἔκγονοι = children's children). Paul's context makes grandchildren most likely, establishing multi-generational family responsibility. The term emphasizes biological descent and therefore familial obligation. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: grandchildren | es: nietos | fr: ἔκγονα | de: Enkel 1Tim 5:4

ἐκδᾰπᾰνάω G1550 V-FIP-1S (1×)

To be spent, expended; to be used up or exhausted, particularly of resources or oneself

This verb means to exhaust or spend completely, to be used up. In 2 Corinthians 12:15, Paul declares he will gladly 'spend and be spent' for the Corinthians' souls—giving not only resources but himself. The passive form emphasizes being expended or exhausted. Classical usage confirms this for exhausting supplies, draining bodily fluids, or depleting resources. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'seré gastado' = I will be spent, French 'dépenser' = spend, German 'sich völlig ausgeben' = give oneself out completely) conveys complete expenditure, often with self-sacrificial overtones.

(1×) Second Corinthians 12:15 contains Paul's passionate pledge: 'I will gladly spend and be spent (ἐκδαπανηθήσομαι)' for the Corinthians' souls. Spanish 'seré gastado' (I will be spent) and German 'sich völlig ausgeben' (give oneself out completely) both capture the exhaustive self-expenditure. The future passive suggests Paul's willingness to be completely used up in ministry. Classical usage included exhausting supplies or draining bodily resources—here applied metaphorically to Paul's total investment of himself for the church's benefit. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15126 WITH 3 SENSES

en: I-will-be-spent | es: seré-gastado | fr: dépenser | de: sich-voellig-ausgeben 2Cor 12:15

ἐκδέχομαι G1551 V-PMM/P-2P (7×)

To wait for or await something with expectation and patience; to expect an anticipated outcome.

Describes a posture of active, expectant waiting — not passive idleness but purposeful anticipation. In John 5:3 the sick at Bethesda await the stirring of the water; in Acts 17:16 Paul waits for his companions in Athens, his spirit provoked by the city's idols. The Corinthian letters employ the word for practical Christian courtesy — waiting for one another at the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:33) and sending Timothy on his way in peace (1 Cor 16:11). Hebrews 10:13 elevates the term to its theological apex: Christ sits at God's right hand, waiting until his enemies are made a footstool. Spanish 'esperar' and German 'erwarten' both preserve the nuance of hopeful expectation.

wait for, await, expect (7×) To wait for someone or something with active expectation and patience, anticipating a definite outcome. The word carries a note of purposeful endurance rather than passive delay. At Bethesda the infirm await the movement of the water (John 5:3); Paul waits expectantly in Athens (Acts 17:16); believers are told to wait for one another at the Lord's table (1 Cor 11:33). The theological climax comes in Hebrews 10:13, where the exalted Christ himself waits for the consummation. Spanish 'esperar' and French 'attendre' both confirm the blend of patience and confident expectation that distinguishes this term from simple delay. WAITING AND EXPECTING

en: I-await, awaits, he-was-waiting-for | es: espera, esperaba, esperad | fr: attendre | de: erwarten, ἐκδεχομένου John 5:3; Acts 17:16; 1Cor 11:33; 1Cor 16:11; Heb 10:13

ἔκδηλος G1552 Adj-NFS (1×)

Evident, manifest, quite plain; completely clear and obvious to all observers

This adjective means evident, conspicuous, or quite plain—a strengthened form of 'clear' (δῆλος). In 2 Timothy 3:9, Paul declares that false teachers' folly 'will be evident to all,' becoming manifest. The prefix intensifies the basic meaning to 'thoroughly clear' or 'quite plain.' Classical usage confirms this for conspicuous, considerable, or manifestly plain things. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'evidente', French preserves the Greek form, German 'offenkundig' = openly known) consistently conveys complete clarity and obviousness, nothing hidden or ambiguous.

(1×) Second Timothy 3:9 promises that false teachers' folly 'will be evident (ἔκδηλος) to all,' their error becoming manifest. Spanish 'evidente' and German 'offenkundig' (openly known) both convey complete obviousness. The intensified form (ἐκ- prefix strengthening δῆλος = clear) means 'thoroughly plain' or 'conspicuous to all.' Paul assures Timothy that deception eventually becomes self-exposing—what these teachers try to hide will become unmistakably clear to everyone. The superlative form in classical texts ('most manifest') shows the semantic range toward maximum clarity. MANIFEST AND EVIDENT

en: evident | es: evidente | fr: ἔκδηλος | de: offenkundig 2Tim 3:9

ἐκδημ-έω G1553 V-ANA (3×)

to be away from home, be absent, be in exile; specifically absence from the body as sojourn from heavenly home

The verb ἐκδημέω (from ἐκ + δῆμος 'away from home/people') means to be abroad, away from one's homeland, or in exile. Classical usage referred to foreign travel or banishment. Paul employs it for the Christian's present earthly existence as temporary exile from the true home with the Lord. The word creates a poignant contrast: while 'at home in the body' believers are simultaneously 'away from the Lord,' making present life a kind of foreign residence awaiting repatriation.

(3×) All three occurrences cluster in 2 Corinthians 5:6-9, Paul's meditation on mortality and hope. Verse 6: 'So we are always of good courage. We know that while we are at home in the body we are away from the Lord.' Verse 8: 'we would rather be away from the body and at home with the Lord.' Verse 9: 'whether we are at home or away, we make it our aim to please him.' The Spanish verbs (estamos-fuera-de-casa, estando-fuera-de-casa, estar-fuera-de-casa) and French (être-absent) literalize the away-from-home imagery. Paul inverts usual perspective: earthly life is the exile, and death means going home. The verb establishes a spatial metaphor for eschatological longing—believers are resident aliens awaiting return to their true country. DEPARTING AND PASSING

en: being-away-from-home, to-be-away-from-home, we-are-away-from-home | es: estamos-fuera-de-casa, estando-fuera-de-casa, estar-fuera-de-casa | fr: être-absent | de: abwesend-sein 2Cor 5:6; 2Cor 5:8; 2Cor 5:9

ἐκδίδωμι G1554 V-FIM-3S (4×)

To lease out, rent; in the middle voice, to let out property (especially a vineyard) to tenants

Though the active form of ekdidomi means 'to give out' or 'to surrender,' every NT occurrence uses the middle voice in the specific sense of leasing agricultural property. All four instances appear in the Parable of the Wicked Tenants (Matt 21:33, 41; Mark 12:1; Luke 20:9), where a landowner plants a vineyard and leases it to tenant farmers. Spanish 'arrendo/arrendara' and French 'louer' consistently render the commercial leasing sense, confirming the agricultural-contractual meaning.

(4×) To let out or lease property to tenants, particularly agricultural land under a rental arrangement. In the NT this verb appears exclusively in the Synoptic versions of the Parable of the Wicked Tenants, where a vineyard owner leases his property before traveling abroad (Matt 21:33, Mark 12:1, Luke 20:9) and where judgment involves re-leasing it to worthier tenants (Matt 21:41). The multilingual evidence (spa 'arrendo/arrendara,' fra 'louer,' eng 'leased/rented out') uniformly reflects a contractual landlord-tenant transaction rather than the classical sense of surrender or giving up. PRAISE AND BOASTING en: he-leased-out, leased, rented-out | es: arrendará, arrendó, la-arrendó | fr: louer | de: ἐκδώσεται, ἐξέδετο Matt 21:33; Matt 21:41; Mark 12:1; Luke 20:9

ἐκδιηγέομαι G1555 V-PPM/P-NMP (2×)

tell in detail, describe thoroughly, relate fully

This compound verb means to tell or describe something in full detail. Acts uses it twice: Habakkuk 1:5 (quoted in Acts 13:41) challenges hearers to report what God will do, and Acts 15:3 describes Paul and Barnabas detailing the Gentile conversions. The prefix 'ek-' intensifies the basic verb, emphasizing thoroughness and completeness in narration.

(2×) Referring to detailed, thorough narration of events, this sense emphasizes full reporting rather than summary. Acts 13:41 uses it in a prophetic context of declaring God's surprising work, while 15:3 describes the missionaries' detailed account of Gentile conversions bringing joy to believers. The Spanish 'relatando' and French 'exposer' suggest exposition and full description. COUNTING AND NARRATING

en: describing, should-describe | es: os-la-contara, relatando | fr: exposer | de: ἐκδιηγούμενοι, ἐκδιηγῆται Acts 13:41; Acts 15:3

ἐκδῑκ-έω G1556 V-ANA (6×)

To avenge or exact retributive justice on behalf of the wronged;

also to vindicate or grant justice to the oppressed. Covers both punitive action and the securing of rights.
A verb operating along the full spectrum of justice — from fierce retribution to compassionate vindication. In Romans 12:19 Paul warns believers not to avenge themselves, reserving vengeance for God, and in Revelation 6:10 and 19:2 the martyrs cry out for God to avenge their blood on those who shed it. The Spanish 'vengando/vengas' and German 'raechen' reflect this punitive edge. But in the parable of the persistent widow (Luke 18:3, 5), the same verb means something gentler yet equally urgent: to vindicate, to grant justice to someone who has been wronged. The widow does not seek punishment — she seeks her rights. The Spanish 'Hazme justicia' (do me justice) captures this beautifully, showing how the Greek word spans from retribution to restoration.

1. avenge, exact vengeance (4×) To avenge, to exact retributive justice or vengeance on behalf of someone wronged, with emphasis on punitive action against the wrongdoer. In Romans 12:19 Paul quotes Deuteronomy's 'Vengeance is mine,' and in Revelation 6:10 the martyrs beneath the altar cry out for God to avenge their blood. Second Corinthians 10:6 speaks of readiness to punish all disobedience. The Spanish 'castigar/vengando' and German 'raechen' convey the retributive force. HANDING OVER en: avenging, he-avenged, to-avenge | es: castigar, vengando, vengas | fr: venger | de: raechen Rom 12:19; 2Cor 10:6; Rev 6:10; Rev 19:2

2. vindicate, grant justice (2×) To vindicate, to grant or secure justice for someone who has been wronged — focusing on the victim's relief rather than the offender's punishment. In the parable of the persistent widow (Luke 18:3, 5), the woman pleads 'vindicate me against my adversary,' and the judge finally resolves to grant her justice. The Spanish 'Hazme justicia / le haré justicia' beautifully captures this restorative dimension, distinguishing it from the punitive sense even though the Greek verb is identical. HANDING OVER en: I-will-vindicate, Vindicate | es: Hazme-justicia, le-haré-justicia | fr: venger | de: ἐκδικήσω, Ἐκδίκησόν Luke 18:3; Luke 18:5

ἐκδῐ́κ-ησις G1557 N-GFS (9×)
Vengeance, retribution; vindication or justice for the wronged; judicial punishment by authorities.
A noun denoting the execution of justice, whether divine, communal, or governmental. When God declares 'vengeance is mine' (Rom 12:19), ekdikesis points to sovereign retribution against wrongdoing–Spanish 'venganza' and German 'Rache' capture the severity. Yet when the persistent widow cries out for justice (Luke 18:7-8), the same word pivots toward vindication of the oppressed, and Spanish shifts tellingly to 'justicia.' In civic contexts like 1 Peter 2:14, it describes the punishment governors administer against evildoers, rendered 'castigo' in Spanish–a judicial rather than personal or divine act.

1. vengeance, retribution (6×) Divine retribution or vengeance executed by God against wrongdoers. Paul quotes Deuteronomy: 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay' (Rom 12:19); Luke 21:22 speaks of 'days of vengeance' as eschatological reckoning. Spanish 'venganza/vindicacion' and French 'vengeance' underscore the punitive, Godward orientation. The 2 Thessalonians 1:8 use ties this to final judgment. VENGEANCE RETRIBUTION en: avenging, of-vengeance, vengeance | es: de-venganza, venganza, vindicación | fr: vengeance | de: Rache, ἐκδίκησιν, ἐκδικήσεως Luke 21:22; Acts 7:24; Rom 12:19; 2Cor 7:11; 2Thess 1:8

2. vindication, justice for the oppressed (2×) Vindication or securing of justice for the oppressed party, with focus on the victim rather than the offender. In the parable of the persistent widow (Luke 18:7-8), God promises to 'bring about justice' for his elect. Spanish notably shifts from 'venganza' to 'justicia' here, revealing a semantic distinction the original Greek leaves to context–the cry is for deliverance, not destruction. JUDGMENT AND VERDICT en: vindication | es: justicia | fr: vengeance | de: ἐκδίκησιν Luke 18:7; Luke 18:8

3. punishment (civil/judicial) (1×) Judicial punishment administered through civil governing authorities as instruments of divine order. At 1 Peter 2:14, governors are sent 'for the punishment of evildoers' (eis ekdikesin kakopoion). Spanish 'castigo' and English 'punishment' mark this as institutional and corrective rather than personal vengeance or victim-centered vindication. LOCUSTS AND SWARMS en: punishment | es: castigo | fr: vengeance | de: Rache 1Pet 2:14

ἔκδῐκ-ος G1558 Adj-NMS (2×)
avenger, one who executes justice or punishment
This adjective used substantively means an avenger or one who maintains justice through punishment. Paul uses it in Romans 13:4 of the governing authority as God's servant and avenger executing wrath, and in 1 Thessalonians 4:6 of the Lord as avenger of sexual immorality. The term emphasizes active vindication of right and punishment of wrong, whether through human authorities or divine judgment.

(2×) Describing one who executes vengeance or enforces justice, this sense applies both to civil authorities (Rom 13:4) and to God himself (1 Thess 4:6). The consistent translation as 'avenger' or 'vengador' reflects the active role of executing wrath against wrongdoing. Romans connects this with legitimate governmental authority, while 1 Thessalonians warns of divine retribution for sexual sin. HANDING OVER en: an-avenger, avenger | es: vengador | fr: vengeur | de: Raecher Rom 13:4; 1Thess 4:6

ἐκδῐ-ώκω G1559 V-APA-GMP (1×)
To persecute, drive out, chase away; to pursue with hostile intent or expel forcefully
This compound verb means to chase away, drive out forcefully, or persecute. In 1 Thessalonians 2:15, Paul describes the Jews who killed Jesus and the prophets as those who 'drove us out' and displease God. The verb combines the intensive prefix with 'pursue/chase,' creating a term for aggressive expulsion or persecution. Classical usage confirms meanings of banishing, chasing away, or attacking/persecuting. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'que persiguieron' = who persecuted, French and German both mean 'persecute/pursue') conveys hostile pursuit or forceful expulsion.

(1×) First Thessalonians 2:15 describes those 'having driven out (ἐκδιωξάντων)' Paul and his companions, in the context of killing Jesus and prophets. Spanish 'que persiguieron' (who persecuted) and German 'verfolgen' (persecute) both emphasize hostile pursuit rather than mere expulsion. The aorist participle indicates completed action—they successfully expelled Paul. Classical usage ranged from simple 'chase away' to 'attack/persecute,' with the latter sense fitting Paul's context of sustained opposition. This isn't casual dismissal but aggressive expulsion. PERSECUTE PURSUE en: having-driven-out | es: que-persiguieron | fr: ἐκδιωξάντων | de: verfolgen 1Thess 2:15

ἔκ-δοτος G1560 Adj-AMS (1×)
Given over, delivered up, betrayed; handed over to another's power or authority
This adjective means given up, delivered, or betrayed—handed over to another's power. In Acts 2:23, Peter declares that Jesus was 'delivered by God's determined plan' to be crucified. The term comes from 'to give out/deliver' and classical usage shows it meant betrayed, handed over, or given in marriage. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'entregado' = handed over, French 'livrer' = deliver) consistently conveys transfer of a person into another's control, often with overtones of betrayal or surrender to hostile powers.

(1×) Acts 2:23 describes Jesus as 'given over (ἔκδοτον)' by God's predetermined plan and foreknowledge to be crucified. Spanish 'entregado' (handed over) and French 'livrer' (deliver) both convey transfer into others' power. Classical usage included being betrayed or delivered to enemies, or given in marriage—always involving transfer to another's authority. Here the passive divine sovereignty paradoxically encompasses human betrayal: Jesus was 'handed over' both by divine plan and human treachery, both elements present in

Peter's declaration. ACQUIRING AND BUYING en: given-over | es: entregado | fr: livrer | de: ἔχδοτον Acts 2:23

δόξᾰ G1561 N-NFS (1×)

Expectation, eager waiting; the state of anticipating something, especially with intensity

This noun means expectation or eager waiting for something anticipated. In Hebrews 10:27, it describes 'a fearful expectation of judgment' awaiting those who persist in sin. The word comes from 'to seem/think' and originally meant expectation or opinion. Classical usage shows it meant expectation, anticipation, notion, or opinion—what one expects or thinks will happen. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'expectación', French 'attente' = waiting, German 'Erwartung' = expectation) conveys the forward-looking anticipation, though Hebrews uses it for dreadful rather than hopeful expectation.

(1×) Hebrews 10:27 warns of 'a fearful expectation (ἐκδοχή) of judgment and fiery fury' awaiting apostates. Spanish 'expectación' and German 'Erwartung' both mean expectation, while French 'attente' (waiting/awaiting) emphasizes the temporal dimension. Classical usage included both expectation and opinion (related to δοκέω = seem/think). Here it's not hopeful anticipation but dreadful certainty—the inevitable awaiting of coming judgment for those who knowingly reject Christ. The adjective 'fearful' intensifies this grim expectation. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14003 WITH 3 SENSES en: expectation | es: expectación | fr: attente | de: Erwartung Heb 10:27

ἐκδύω G1562 V-APA-NMP (5×)

To strip off clothing; to undress or divest someone of garments; metaphorically, to be unclothed or laid bare.

A vivid term for removing garments from oneself or another person, often by force. In the Gospels it describes the Roman soldiers stripping Jesus of his robes during the Passion (Matt 27:28, 31; Mark 15:20), and the robbers stripping the wounded traveler in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30). Paul employs it metaphorically in 2 Corinthians 5:4, where being 'unclothed' pictures the vulnerability of death before the resurrection body is received. Spanish 'desnudaron' and French 'dépouiller' both capture the sense of forcible exposure.

(5×) To strip off or remove clothing from someone, either forcibly or voluntarily. All five NT occurrences cluster around physical or metaphorical disrobing. The Synoptic Passion narratives use it for the soldiers stripping Jesus (Matt 27:28, 31; Mark 15:20), while Luke 10:30 describes robbers stripping a traveler. Paul extends the image in 2 Cor 5:4, where the dread of being 'unclothed' (without a body) contrasts with the hope of being further clothed. The multilingual evidence—Spanish 'desnudaron,' French 'dépouiller'—consistently highlights exposure and vulnerability. STRIPPING AND UNCOVERING en: having-stripped, they-stripped, to-be-unclothed | es: desnudaron, desnudándolo, habiendo-desnudado | fr: dépouiller, dévêtir | de: ἐκδύσαντες, ἐκδύσασθαι, ἐξέδυσαν Matt 27:28; Matt 27:31; Mark 15:20; Luke 10:30; 2Cor 5:4

ἐκεῖ G1563 Adv (95×)

There — adverb of place indicating a location away from the speaker, sometimes used with verbs of motion for 'thither'

Ekei is the ordinary Greek adverb meaning 'there, in that place,' and the New Testament uses it with striking frequency in narrative contexts. It locates the holy family's stay in Egypt ('remain there until I tell you,' Matt 2:13), marks places of gathering and teaching ('where two or three are gathered, there am I,' Matt 18:20), and fixes geographic points in the gospel narrative. Occasionally it carries a subtle directional sense — 'go there' — absorbing the function of the rarer ekeise ('thither'). Spanish 'alli/alla,' French 'la,' and German 'dort' all capture this simple deictic force. The word's theological weight emerges from context rather than semantics: it is the 'there' of divine presence, judgment, or refuge.

there (95×) A locative adverb meaning 'there, in that place,' pointing to a location distinct from the speaker's position. Across its 95 New Testament occurrences it serves narrative geography — placing events at specific sites (Matt 2:13, 15; John 11:15) — and sometimes absorbs directional force ('thither,' with verbs of motion). Its most theologically resonant uses include Matt 18:20 ('there am I among them') and Matt 6:21 ('where your treasure is, there your heart will be'). Spanish 'alli,' French 'la,' and German 'dort' consistently render this straightforward spatial deictic. THERE (SPATIAL DEICTIC)
en: there | es: allá, allí | fr: là | de: dort Matt 2:13; Matt 2:15; Matt 2:22; Matt 5:24; Matt 6:21

ἐκεῖθεν G1564 Adv (27×)

from there, thence — a spatial adverb indicating departure or movement away from a previously mentioned place

Ekeithen is a demonstrative adverb meaning 'from there' or 'from that place,' used 27 times in the New Testament almost exclusively in the Gospels to narrate Jesus' itinerant movements. It serves as a characteristic stitching word in the Synoptic travel narratives: 'and passing on from there' (Matt 9:9, 27; 11:1; 12:9, 15; 13:53; 15:21, 29; 19:15). Mark uses it similarly to propel Jesus from one scene to the next (Mark 6:1, 10, 11; 9:30; 10:1). The adverb carries a geographic concreteness — it always points back to a specific locale just named — and contributes to the sense of purposeful forward motion that characterizes the Gospel narrative structure. Outside the itinerary formula, it appears in Jesus' warning that one will not leave prison 'until you have paid the last penny' (Matt 5:26) and in Acts 7:4 regarding Abraham's migration from Haran. French 'de la,' Spanish 'de alli,' and German 'von dort' all capture its directional force.

from there (27×) A spatial adverb meaning 'from there' or 'from that place,' functioning as a transitional marker in Gospel itinerary narratives. Appears most characteristically in the formula 'and departing from there' that moves Jesus between ministry locations (Matt 9:9, 27; 11:1; 12:9, 15; 13:53; 15:21, 29; Mark 6:1, 10; 9:30; 10:1). Also carries a sense of finality — one will not depart 'from there' until the debt is paid (Matt 5:26) — and traces Abraham's migration from Mesopotamia (Acts 7:4; 13:21). The consistent rendering across languages as 'from there' (Spanish 'de alli,' French 'de la') confirms a single spatial sense. THERE (SPATIAL DEICTIC)
en: From-there, from-there | es: De-allí, de-allí | fr: de-là | de: von-dort Matt 4:21; Matt 5:26; Matt 9:9; Matt 9:27; Matt 11:1

ἐκεῖνος G1565 DPro-AFS (245×)

That, that one; a distal demonstrative pronoun pointing to a previously mentioned person or thing, often with emphatic force.

Ekeinos is the Greek demonstrative pronoun for 'that person' or 'that thing over there' — the distal counterpart to houtos ('this'). In the Gospels it carries significant theological weight, especially in John, where 'that one' (ekeinos) frequently refers to Jesus, the Spirit, or the Father with a kind of reverential distance: 'When the Spirit of truth comes, that one will guide you into all truth' (John 16:13). Used attributively ('that day,' 'that hour'), it marks temporal or narrative distance from the speaker. Used substantively, it functions as an emphatic third-person pronoun, often contrastive — setting one figure against another. Spanish aquel, French celui-la, and German jener all preserve the distal quality, while Korean and Japanese deploy dedicated far-demonstrative forms.

1. that, those (demonstrative reference) (170×) Attributive or adjectival demonstrative: 'that' or 'those' modifying a noun, pointing to a previously mentioned or contextually distant referent — 170 occurrences. 'On that day' (Matt 7:22), 'in that hour' (Matt 8:13), 'those cities' (Matt 11:24). The temporal use is especially prominent in eschatological discourse, where 'that day' becomes almost a technical term for the day of judgment. Spanish aquel/aquella, French celui-la/celle-la, and German jene all select their dedicated distal demonstrative forms, confirming the deictic distance as cross-linguistically salient. DEMONSTRATIVE PRONOUNS
en: that | es: aquel, aquella | fr: celle-là, celui-là | de: jene Matt 7:22; Matt 7:25; Matt 7:27; Matt 8:13; Matt 8:28

2. that one, he/she (substantive pronoun) (63×) Substantive pronoun referring to a specific individual: 'that one,' 'he,' 'she' — 63 occurrences, especially concentrated in John's Gospel. When John the Baptist says 'I am not the Christ' and then points to Jesus as 'that one who comes after me' (John 1:15, 27, 30), ekeinos carries emphatic, almost reverential force. In John 14-16 the Spirit is repeatedly called ekeinos ('that one will teach you'), creating a pattern of dignified reference. Korean geu-bun ('that honored person') and Swahili yule ('that one, distant') both capture the referential weight. DEMONSTRATIVE PRONOUNS

en: that-one | es: aquel | fr: celui-là | de: jener Mark 16:10; John 1:8; John 1:18; John 1:33; John 2:21

3. those (substantive, persons) (12×) Substantive plural: 'those people' or 'they' with demonstrative emphasis — 12 occurrences where a group previously identified or contrasted is picked out. In Matt 13:11 the disciples are told 'to you it is given... but to those (ekeinois) it is not'; in Mark 16:13 the risen Jesus' appearance is reported 'to those (ekeinois)' remaining disciples. The demonstrative plural functions as a mild distancing device, separating an in-group from an out-group. Spanish a aquellos and French ceux-la both preserve the contrastive plural force. PRONOUNS AND MIXED

en: for-those, of-those, those | es: -a-aquellos, a-aquellos, a-aquéllos | fr: celui-là, ceux-là | de: jene Matt 13:11; Matt 20:4; Mark 4:11; Mark 16:13; John 10:35

ἐκεῖσε G1566 Adv (2×)

there, to that place, thither

This adverb indicates direction or location 'there' or 'to that place.' In Acts 21:3 it describes the ship sailing to Tyre, and in 22:5 Paul mentions going to Damascus. The word emphasizes directional movement toward a destination already indicated in context. Classical usage sometimes used it for 'to the other world,' but New Testament occurrences are straightforwardly geographical.

(2×) Indicating spatial direction 'to that place,' this adverb marks movement toward a previously mentioned destination. Acts 21:3 describes sailing there (to Tyre), while 22:5 describes Paul's journey there (to Damascus). The simple translations across languages ('there', 'allí', 'là') reflect its basic deictic function pointing to a location in the narrative context. THERE (SPATIAL DEICTIC)

en: there | es: allí | fr: là | de: ἐκεῖσε Acts 21:3; Acts 22:5

ἐκζητ-έω G1567 V-APA-NMS (7×)

Seek out diligently, search for earnestly (especially God); demand an accounting of, require (especially blood-guilt).

The verb ekzeteo intensifies the common Greek zeteo ('seek') with the prefix ek-, producing a word that conveys thoroughness, urgency, and ultimate accountability. In its dominant sense, it describes the earnest pursuit of God or spiritual realities — the nations who 'will seek out' the Lord (Acts 15:17, quoting Amos 9:12), the sobering observation that 'no one seeks after God' (Rom 3:11), and the promise that God 'rewards those who diligently seek him' (Heb 11:6). Spanish buscar, French rechercher, and German suchen all render this with intensified search vocabulary. But a distinct juridical sense emerges in Luke 11:50-51, where Jesus warns that the blood of all the prophets 'will be required' of this generation — here ekzeteo shifts from seeking a person to demanding a reckoning, echoing the LXX idiom of God 'requiring blood' from the guilty (Gen 9:5; 2 Sam 4:11).

1. seek out, search for diligently (5×) To seek out earnestly, search for with diligence and thoroughness, especially in the religious context of seeking God or divine truth. The ek- prefix intensifies the basic zeteo, conveying not casual inquiry but determined pursuit. Five of seven NT occurrences fall here: the Gentiles who will 'seek out the Lord' in the messianic age (Acts 15:17), Paul's citation that 'no one seeks after God' (Rom 3:11), the declaration that God 'rewards those who diligently seek him' (Heb 11:6), Esau who 'sought it with tears' (Heb 12:17), and the prophets who 'searched carefully' into the coming salvation (1 Pet 1:10). Spanish buscaron/busquen, French rechercher, and German suchen all reach for intensified search vocabulary, confirming the earnest quality of this seeking. SEEKING AND SEARCHING

en: having-sought, may-seek-out, seeking | es: buscando, buscaron, busquen | fr: chercher, rechercher | de: suchen, ἐκζητήσωσιν Acts 15:17; Rom 3:11; Heb 11:6; Heb 12:17; 1Pet 1:10

2. require, demand an accounting of (2×) To demand an accounting of, to require back — a juridical sense in which something (especially blood-guilt) is exacted from the responsible party. Distinct from the 'seek' meaning, this sense appears in Luke 11:50-51, where Jesus declares that 'the blood of all the prophets shed from the foundation of the world will be required of this generation.' The passive construction (ekzetethei, ekzetethesetai) reinforces the forensic tone: this is divine reckoning, not devotional searching. Spanish sea demandada/sera demandada and the German transliteration ekzetethesetai both capture the demand-for-accountability frame. The sense traces directly to the LXX usage in Genesis 9:5, where God 'requires' the blood of every creature from its slayer. SEEKING AND SEARCHING

en: it-will-be-required, may-be-required | es: sea-demandada, será-demandada | fr: chercher | de: ἐκζητηθήσεται, ἐκζητηθῇ Luke 11:50; Luke 11:51

ἐκθαμβ-έω G1568 V-AIP-3P (4×)

To be greatly amazed or alarmed; to experience a mixture of astonishment and distress

An intensified form of thambeo (to be amazed), this verb appears only in Mark's Gospel and carries a stronger emotional charge than simple surprise. When the crowd sees Jesus after the Transfiguration they are ekthambeisthai – overwhelmed with awe (Mark 9:15). In Gethsemane, Jesus himself begins to be 'greatly distressed' (Mark 14:33), revealing that this word bridges amazement and anguish. The women at the empty tomb experience it as a blend of terror and wonder (Mark 16:5-6). French 'etre effraye' and Spanish 'asombrarse' each capture different registers of this intense reaction.

(4×) To be struck with intense amazement that may shade into alarm or distress, exceeding ordinary surprise. Exclusive to Mark, this verb captures overwhelming emotional reactions: the crowd's awe upon seeing Jesus descend from the mount (Mark 9:15), Jesus's own deep anguish in Gethsemane (Mark 14:33), and the women's terrified astonishment at the angel in the tomb (Mark 16:5-6). The translation range – from spa 'asombrarse' (amazement) to fra 'etre effraye' (to be frightened) to deu 'entsetzt sein' (to be horrified) – reflects the verb's spectrum from wonder to dread. AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT

en: be-amazed, they-were-amazed, to-be-greatly-distressed | es: a-asombrarse, os-asombréis, se-asombraron | fr: être-effrayé | de: entsetzt-sein Mark 9:15; Mark 14:33; Mark 16:5; Mark 16:6

ἔκθαμβ-ος G1569 Adj-NMP (1×)

Greatly amazed, astounded, utterly astonished; overwhelmed with wonder or fear beyond ordinary amazement

This adjective means greatly amazed or utterly astonished—an intensified form of 'amazed.' In Acts 3:11, the crowd was 'greatly amazed' at the healing of the lame man by Peter and John. The prefix intensifies the basic sense of amazement to overwhelming astonishment. Classical usage confirms it could mean amazed/astounded or terrible/terrifying—extremity of emotional response either in wonder or fear. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'asombrados', French 'très étonné' = very astonished, English 'greatly amazed') consistently conveys heightened astonishment beyond ordinary surprise.

(1×) Acts 3:11 describes the crowd as 'greatly amazed (ἔκθαμβοι)' after witnessing the formerly lame man now walking, clinging to Peter and John. Spanish 'asombrados' (astonished) and French 'très étonné' (very astonished) both convey intensified amazement. The intensified prefix (ἐκ-) strengthens ordinary amazement (θαμβέω) to overwhelming astonishment. Classical usage showed both positive amazement and negative terror—extreme emotional response. Here it's wonder at miraculous power, the crowd utterly stunned by undeniable healing of a well-known disabled beggar. DEAF AND MUTE

en: greatly-amazed | es: asombrados | fr: très-étonné | de: ἔκθαμβοι Acts 3:11

ἔκ-θετος G1570 Adj-ANP (1×)

Exposed, abandoned; put out in the open, particularly of infants left to die

This adjective means exposed or cast out, particularly used of abandoned infants. In Acts 7:19, Stephen describes Pharaoh forcing Hebrews to expose their babies to die. The term comes from 'to set out' and classical usage confirms it meant sent away, exposed (especially of unwanted children), or cast away. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'expuestos', French 'exposé', English 'exposed') consistently conveys the cruel practice of infant abandonment. This was a grim reality in the ancient world—unwanted children left outdoors to die.

(1×) Acts 7:19 describes Pharaoh's evil stratagem forcing Hebrews 'to expose (ἔκθετα) their babies' so they wouldn't survive. Spanish 'expuestos' and French 'exposé' both mean 'exposed,' the technical term for infant abandonment. Classical usage confirms this for children 'sent out of the house' and left to die—a practice common in the Greco-Roman world for unwanted infants. Stephen uses this to parallel Moses's vulnerability and preservation, though Moses was hidden rather than truly exposed. The term captures the murderous intent behind the policy. LEAVING AND REMAINING

en: exposed | es: expuestos | fr: exposé | de: ἔκθετα Acts 7:19

ἐκ-κᾰθαίρω G1571 V-ASA-3S (2×)

cleanse thoroughly, purify, clean out completely

This compound verb means to cleanse out or purify thoroughly. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 5:7 commanding believers to 'cleanse out the old leaven,' and 2 Timothy 2:21 speaks of cleansing oneself from dishonorable associations. The prefix 'ek-' intensifies the purification, suggesting complete removal rather than surface cleaning. Ancient usage included clearing land of monsters and polishing statues to perfection.

(2×) Referring to thorough purification or removal of contamination, this sense applies to both moral and ceremonial cleansing. 1 Corinthians 5:7 uses the Passover imagery of removing old leaven, while 2 Timothy 2:21 speaks of self-purification from dishonorable vessels. The metaphor emphasizes complete removal of what defiles, not merely covering or controlling it. PURIFYING AND CLEANSING

en: cleanse-out, cleanses | es: Limpiad, se-limpiare | fr: purifier, ἐκκαθάρῃ | de: reinigen 1Cor 5:7; 2Tim 2:21

ἐκκαίω G1572 V-AIP-3P (1×)

To be inflamed, burn with passion; to be set on fire with intense desire, particularly sexual passion

This verb means to burn, kindle, or inflame—particularly to be set ablaze with passion. In Romans 1:27, Paul describes men 'inflamed with desire for one another.' The word can mean to literally burn out or kindle fire, but often metaphorically describes being inflamed with emotion, particularly lust or anger. Classical usage confirms both literal burning (eyes burnt out, fires kindled) and metaphorical (inflamed with curiosity, provoked to anger). The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'se encendieron' = were kindled, French 'brûler' = burn, German 'entbrennen' = catch fire) conveys intense kindling of passion.

(1×) Romans 1:27 describes males 'inflamed (ἐξεκαύθησαν) in their desire toward one another,' Paul's depiction of same-sex passion in his catalog of human rebellion. Spanish 'se encendieron' (were set on fire) and German 'entbrennen' (catch fire/be inflamed) both use fire metaphors for intense desire. The passive aorist suggests being seized by passion. Classical usage included literal fire-kindling and metaphorical emotional inflaming (curiosity, anger, lust). Here the metaphor vividly depicts overwhelming sexual passion as consuming fire. FIRE AND BURNING

en: were-inflamed | es: se-encendieron | fr: brûler | de: entbrennen Rom 1:27

ἐκκᾰκέω G1573 V-ASA-2P (6×)

To lose heart, grow weary, become discouraged in the face of difficulty or prolonged effort.

Conveying the emotional and spiritual exhaustion that sets in under sustained pressure, this verb warns against flagging resolve. Jesus uses it to frame the parable of the persistent widow: pray and 'do not lose heart' (Luke 18:1). Paul then echoes the exhortation across his letters – we do not lose heart in ministry (2 Cor 4:1, 16), in doing good (Gal 6:9), or under tribulation (Eph 3:13). The Spanish 'desmayar' (to faint) and French 'se decourager' both capture the visceral sense of inner collapse that this word resists.

lose heart, grow weary (6×) To become discouraged, faint-hearted, or weary under prolonged difficulty. The word pictures an inner wilting of resolve rather than mere physical tiredness. Jesus introduces it in Luke 18:1 as the foil to persistent prayer, and Paul adopts it as a recurring refrain: despite affliction, aging bodies, and delayed harvest, believers must not lose heart (2 Cor 4:1, 4:16; Gal 6:9; Eph 3:13). The Spanish 'desmayar' (to faint/falter) and French 'se decourager' converge on the same emotional register. All six NT occurrences share this single sense of spiritual or moral discouragement. WEARINESS AND EXHAUSTION

en: grow-weary, let-us-grow-weary, to-lose-heart | es: desfallezcamos, desmayamos, desmayar | fr: se-décourager | de: ἐγκακήσητε, ἐγκακοῦμεν, ἐνκακεῖν Luke 18:1; 2Cor 4:1; 2Cor 4:16; Gal 6:9; Eph 3:13

ἐκκεντέω G1574 V-AIA-3P (2×)

pierce, stab, pierce through

This verb means to pierce or stab through. Both New Testament occurrences refer to Christ's crucifixion: John 19:37 quotes Zechariah 12:10 about looking on the one they pierced, and Revelation 1:7 echoes this prophecy. The word originally meant to prick or put out (as eyes), but developed the stronger sense of piercing through with a weapon. It captures the violence of the crucifixion wound.

(2×) Describing the act of piercing Christ with a spear, this sense appears in direct and allusive quotations of Zechariah 12:10. John 19:37 applies the prophecy to the soldier's spear thrust, while Revelation 1:7 connects it with Christ's return when all tribes will see the one they pierced. The consistent translations ('pierced', 'traspasaron', 'percer', 'durchstechen') emphasize penetrating violence. PIERCE BORE THROUGH en: pierced, they-pierced | es: traspasaron | fr: percer | de: durchstechen John 19:37; Rev 1:7

ἐκκλάω G1575 V-AIP-3P (3×)

to break off, to be broken off (especially of branches); in passive voice, removed violently or severed from connection

Paul uses this agricultural metaphor exclusively in Romans 11 to describe the severance of unfaithful Israel from the olive tree of God's covenant people. The verb captures both the violence and finality of breaking off living branches—not a gentle pruning but a forceful removal. Some natural branches 'were broken off' to make room for wild olive shoots (11:17), creating space for Gentile inclusion. Paul warns against arrogance by noting that God broke off the natural branches due to unbelief (11:19-20), establishing the principle that connection depends on faith, not ethnic privilege.

(3×) All three occurrences appear in Paul's olive tree allegory (Rom 11:17-20), describing the removal of unfaithful Israelites from covenant relationship. The passive voice construction (were broken off) emphasizes divine action rather than human agency. Cross-linguistic evidence shows some variation—French uses 'retrancher' (cut off), Spanish 'fueron cortadas' (were cut), German 'abbrechen' (break off)—but all capture the violence of severing living branches. The metaphor works precisely because breaking off branches kills them, illustrating the serious consequences of unbelief. BREAKING AND SHATTERING

en: Were-broken-off, they-were-broken-off, were-broken-off | es: fueron-cortadas | fr: retrancher | de: abbrechen Rom 11:17; Rom 11:19; Rom 11:20

ἐκκλείω G1576 V-AIP-3S (2×)

shut out, exclude, prevent access

This verb means to shut out or exclude from something. Paul uses it in Romans 3:27 asking about boasting being excluded, and in Galatians 4:17 describing false teachers wanting to shut believers out. The word can mean physical closing out or metaphorical exclusion from participation. Ancient usage included excluding from alliances, preventing from receiving, or hindering from opportunity.

(2×) Referring to exclusion or shutting out from participation or benefit, this sense appears in Paul's theological arguments. Romans 3:27 speaks of boasting being excluded by the law of faith, while Galatians 4:17 warns of false teachers wanting to shut believers out from proper relationship. The metaphor of a closed door captures prevention of access or participation. SHUTTING AND CLOSING en: It-was-excluded, to-shut-out | es: excluir, fue-excluida | fr: exclure | de: ausschliessen Rom 3:27; Gal 4:17

ἐκκλησί-α G1577 N-GFP (114×)

Assembly, congregation – most often the Christian church (local or universal); also any gathered assembly including Israel's wilderness congregation.

Ekklesia, rooted in the Greek civic assembly of 'called-out' citizens, became the New Testament's defining term for the community of believers. In 105 of its 114 occurrences it denotes the Christian church – from local house congregations (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:19) to Paul's vision of Christ's universal body (Eph 1:22-23; Col 1:18). Spanish 'iglesia,' French 'eglise,' and German 'Gemeinde' all derive from or closely track this specialized Christian usage. Yet nine passages preserve the older, non-technical sense: Stephen calls Israel in the desert 'the ekklesia in the wilderness' (Acts 7:38), and the Ephesian town clerk dismisses the riotous crowd to be settled in 'the lawful assembly' (Acts 19:39). Jesus' use in Matthew 16:18 and 18:17 stands at the threshold between these senses.

1. local church, congregation (87×) Split from sense 66715. Criteria: Specific local assembly meeting in a city or house; addressees of Paul's letters ('the church in Corinth', 'house churches'); plural 'churches' of a region

en: assembly, church | es: asamblea, iglesia | fr: église | de: Gemeinde Acts 5:11; Acts 8:1; Acts 8:3; Acts 9:31; Acts 11:22

2. universal church, body of Christ (18×) Split from sense 66715. Criteria: The church as cosmic reality with Christ as head (Eph 5:23-25); singular abstract 'the church' without local specification; theological/ecclesiological statements about the church's nature en: assembly, church, to-assembly | es: a-iglesia, asamblea, iglesia | fr: assemblée, église | de: Gemeinde 1Cor 10:32; 1Cor 12:28; 1Cor 15:9; Gal 1:13; Eph 1:22

3. assembly, gathered congregation (non-technical or OT sense) (9×) A general assembly or gathered congregation without specifically Christian reference (9x). Stephen's speech in Acts 7:38 uses it for Israel assembled at Sinai – 'the ekklesia in the wilderness' – recalling the LXX rendering of Hebrew qahal. The Ephesian silversmith episode (Acts 19:32, 39, 41) deploys it in its original civic sense for a public assembly, both riotous and lawful. French 'assemblee' and Spanish 'asamblea' distinguish this from 'eglise/iglesia,' while German retains 'Gemeinde' for both. Matthew 16:18 and 18:17, where Jesus himself coins its use, may intentionally bridge the OT congregation concept with the emerging community of disciples. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: assembly, of-assembly | es: asamblea | fr: assemblée, église | de: Gemeinde Matt 16:18; Matt 18:17; Acts 7:38; Acts 19:32

ἐκ-κλίνω G1578 V-PMA-2P (3×)

to turn away, turn aside, avoid; deliberate deviation from a path, standard, or association

The compound verb ἐκκλίνω (ἐκ + κλίνω 'turn') means to bend away, turn aside, or avoid—originally spatial but extended to moral and relational deviation. Biblical usage emphasizes deliberate turning away: all humanity turning from God's path (Romans 3), avoiding divisive people (Romans 16), turning from evil to pursue good (1 Peter 3). The word implies conscious choice to veer off course, either destructively (from righteousness) or protectively (from evil).

(3×) Romans 3:12 quotes Psalm 14: 'All have turned aside; together they have become worthless'—universal deviation from God's way. Romans 16:17 urges: 'watch out for those who cause divisions...avoid them'—protective distancing from troublemakers. First Peter 3:11 counsels: 'let him turn away from evil and do good'—active turning from wrong toward right. The Spanish verbs (apartaos, apártese, se-desviaron) and French/German (abweichen, éviter) emphasize the turning-away motion. The theological geography is consistent: sin as deviation from God's path (Rom 3), wisdom as avoiding those who deviate others (Rom 16), and holiness as deliberately turning away from evil's magnetic pull. The verb choice stresses agency—we turn aside, we must avoid, we can redirect. DECEPTION AND ASTRAY

en: let-him-turn-away, turn-away, turned-aside | es: apartaos, apártese, se-desviaron | fr: abweichen, éviter | de: abweichen Rom 3:12; Rom 16:17; 1Pet 3:11

ἐκκολυμβάω G1579 V-APA-NMS (1×)

To swim out, swim away from; to escape by swimming, particularly from a ship to shore

This compound verb means to swim out or swim away, particularly from a ship to shore. In Acts 27:42, soldiers planned to kill prisoners lest any 'swim away' and escape during the shipwreck. The verb combines the prefix 'out of' with 'swim,' creating a term for swimming away from something, typically a ship to shore. Classical usage confirms this for plunging into the sea from a ship or swimming ashore. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'habiendo nadado' = having swum, French 'nager' = swim) conveys the swimming action, though doesn't always preserve the directional prefix.

(1×) Acts 27:42 describes soldiers wanting to kill prisoners to prevent any from 'swimming out (ἐκκολυμβήσας)' and escaping during the shipwreck. Spanish 'habiendo nadado' (having swum) preserves the action but not the directional sense as clearly as English 'having swum out/away.' Classical usage specified swimming from a ship to shore or plunging into the sea—the compound emphasizes swimming away from one place toward another. The aorist participle suggests completed escape action the soldiers feared. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 13540 WITH 3 SENSES

en: having-swum-out | es: habiendo-nadado | fr: nager | de: ἐκκολυμβήσας Acts 27:42

ἐκκομ-ίζω G1580 V-IIM/P-3S (1×)

To carry out, bear forth; to transport something outward, especially to carry out a corpse for burial

This verb means to carry out or bring forth, especially used for carrying out corpses for burial. In Luke 7:12, Jesus encounters a dead man 'being carried out' for burial at Nain. The compound combines 'out of' with 'carry,' and classical usage confirms it for carrying things out to safety, carrying out corpses for burial, or enduring to the end. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'era llevado' = was being carried, French 'emporter' = carry away) conveys the outward movement of bearing something, typically in funeral contexts in biblical usage.

(1×) Luke 7:12 describes a dead man 'being carried out (ἐξεκομίζετο)' from Nain for burial when Jesus encountered the funeral procession. Spanish 'era llevado' (was being carried) and French 'emporter' (carry away) both convey the transport action. The imperfect passive suggests ongoing procession—the body was in the process of being borne out. Classical usage included carrying things out to safety or especially carrying out corpses for burial, the latter sense fitting Luke's funeral scene perfectly. Jesus's intervention interrupts this solemn outward-bearing of death. GOING OUT AND FORTH

en: was-being-carried-out | es: era-llevado | fr: emporter | de: ἐξεκομίζετο Luke 7:12

ἐκκόπτ-ω G1581 V-PIM/P-3S (10×)

Cut down (a tree in judgment); cut off (a limb or branch, removing part from whole)

Ekkopto divides cleanly between felling an entire tree and severing a part from a whole. John the Baptist's warning that 'every tree not bearing good fruit is cut down' (Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9) established a powerful metaphor of divine judgment that Jesus extends (Matt 7:19; Luke 13:7, 9) — always whole trees under the axe. But Jesus also commands cutting off a hand or foot that causes sin (Matt 5:30; 18:8), and Paul uses the olive-tree metaphor of branches 'cut off' through unbelief (Rom 11:22, 24). Spanish preserves the distinction with 'es cortado' (is cut down, whole tree) versus 'corte/cortala' (cut off, a part). In 2 Corinthians 11:12, Paul metaphorically 'cuts off' the opportunity of false apostles.

1. cut down (a tree) (5×) To cut down an entire tree, used literally and as a metaphor for divine judgment on the unfruitful. John the Baptist's axe-at-the-root imagery (Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9) and Jesus' parable of the barren fig tree (Luke 13:7, 9) both employ this sense — the whole organism is destroyed, not merely pruned. Spanish 'es cortado' and German 'haut ab' reflect the decisive, total action of felling. The present passive in Matthew 3:10 suggests ongoing divine readiness to judge. CUTTING AND SEVERING

en: Cut-down, is-cut-down, you-will-cut-down | es: córtala, es-cortado, es-cortado | fr: couper | de: haut-ab Matt 3:10; Matt 7:19; Luke 3:9; Luke 13:7; Luke 13:9

2. cut off (a body part or branch; remove) (5×) To cut off or amputate a part from a larger whole — a hand, foot, or branch removed while the body or tree survives. Jesus' radical discipleship sayings (Matt 5:30; 18:8) command self-amputation of what causes sin, and Paul's olive-tree allegory in Romans 11:22, 24 describes unbelieving branches 'cut off' so that wild ones might be grafted in. In 2 Corinthians 11:12, the metaphor extends to cutting off an adversary's opportunity. Spanish shifts to 'corte' (cut off a piece) and French maintains 'couper' for both senses, but the Greek aorist imperative in Matthew 5:30 stresses urgency. CUTTING AND SEVERING

en: I-might-cut-off, cut-off, were-cut-off | es: corte, córtala, córtalo | fr: couper | de: abhauen, haut-ab Matt 5:30; Matt 18:8; Rom 11:22; Rom 11:24; 2Cor 11:12

ἐκκρεμ-άννῡμι G1582 V-AIM-3S (1×)

To hang upon, cling to; to be suspended from or attach oneself to something with intense focus

This verb means to hang from or upon something, particularly to hang on someone's words with rapt attention. In Luke 19:48, the people were 'hanging on' Jesus's words—listening with such intense focus they seemed suspended from his teaching. The literal sense is hanging from or being suspended, but metaphorically it describes devoted attention or clinging attachment. Classical usage confirms both literal hanging from something and metaphorical devotion to a person or cause. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'estaba pendiente' = was hanging, French 'être suspendu' = to be suspended) preserves the hanging metaphor.

(1×) Luke 19:48 describes how 'the people were hanging on (ἐξεκρέματο) him' to hear Jesus—so captivated by his teaching they seemed suspended from his words. Spanish 'estaba pendiente' (was hanging/pending) and French 'être suspendu' (to be suspended) both preserve the vivid metaphor of hanging upon. Classical usage included literal hanging from something and metaphorical clinging or devotion. Here it's the crowds' rapt attention, so intensely focused on Jesus's teaching they're metaphorically suspended from him, which partly protected him from leaders seeking to destroy him. HANGING SUSPENSION en: were-hanging-on | es: estaba-pendiente | fr: être-suspendu | de: ἐξεκρέματο Luke 19:48

ἐκλᾰλ-έω G1583 V-ANA (1×)

To tell forth, divulge, blurt out; to speak openly about something, sometimes implying indiscretion

This verb means to tell forth, divulge, or speak out about something. In Acts 23:22, the commander instructs Paul's nephew 'to tell no one' that he had revealed the plot against Paul. Classical usage shows it could mean to blurt out, blab, or divulge—sometimes with connotations of talkativeness or indiscretion. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'digas' = tell, French 'déclarer' = declare) conveys the speaking-out action, though without necessarily the negative connotation of the classical 'blab' sense. Here it's simply about keeping information confidential.

(1×) Acts 23:22 records the tribune charging Paul's nephew 'to tell no one (μηδενὶ ἐκλαλῆσαι)' about revealing the assassination plot. Spanish 'digas' (tell/say) and French 'déclarer' (declare) are neutral speech verbs. Classical usage had stronger senses: 'blurt out, blab, divulge' with implications of indiscretion or excessive talking. Here the infinitive with negative creates a charge to keep silent—don't speak out about this matter. The security of the rescue operation depends on confidentiality. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

en: to-tell | es: digas | fr: déclarer | de: ἐκλαλῆσαι Acts 23:22

ἐκλάμπ-ω G1584 V-FIA-3P (1×)

To shine forth, beam out; to radiate light or glory, to be distinguished by brilliance

This verb means to shine forth or beam out with light or glory. In Matthew 13:43, Jesus declares that 'the righteous will shine forth like the sun' in the Father's kingdom. The compound combines 'out of' with 'shine,' emphasizing radiant outshining. Classical usage confirms shining or beaming forth, bursting forth (of fever or sound), or being distinguished. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'resplandecerán' = will shine brightly, French 'resplendir' = shine/gleam) consistently conveys brilliant radiance, often with eschatological glorification overtones in biblical usage.

(1×) Matthew 13:43 contains Jesus's glorious promise: 'Then the righteous will shine forth (ἐκλάμψουσιν) like the sun in the kingdom of their Father.' Spanish 'resplandecerán' (will shine brightly) and French 'resplendir' (shine/gleam) both convey radiant brilliance. The future tense points to eschatological transformation. The compound emphasizes outward beaming—not merely possessing light but radiating it forth. Classical usage included shining forth or being distinguished, even of sounds being clearly heard. Here it's the ultimate glorification: righteous transformed into solar brilliance. SHINING AND ILLUMINATING en: will-shine-forth | es: resplandecerán | fr: resplendir | de: ἐκλάμψουσιν Matt 13:43

ἐκλανθάνω G1585 V-RIM/P-2P (1×)

To forget utterly, forget completely; to lose all memory or awareness of something previously known

This verb means to forget utterly or completely—an intensified form of 'forget.' In Hebrews 12:5, the author asks if they have 'forgotten entirely' the exhortation that addresses them as sons. The prefix strengthens basic forgetting to complete forgetfulness or escape of memory. Classical usage confirms meanings of escaping notice utterly or forgetting entirely. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'habéis olvidado' = you have forgotten, French 'oublier' = forget, German 'vergessen' = forget) consistently conveys complete loss of memory or awareness of something once known.

(1×) Hebrews 12:5 asks rhetorically whether readers 'have forgotten entirely (ἐκλέλησθε)' God's fatherly exhortation that addresses them as sons. Spanish 'habéis olvidado' (you have forgotten) and German 'vergessen' (forget) render the completed forgetfulness. The perfect tense suggests a state of having forgotten that continues. The intensified prefix (ἐκ-) strengthens basic 'forget' to 'forget utterly/completely.' Classical usage included both active causing-to-forget and middle/passive forgetting entirely. The author implies this crucial word about divine discipline has slipped from their consciousness. FORGETTING AND NEGLECT

en: you-have-forgotten | es: habéis-olvidado | fr: oublier | de: vergessen Heb 12:5

ἐκλέγω G1586 V-APM-AMP (22×)

To choose or select for a purpose; as a substantival participle, 'the Chosen One' (Messianic title).

A middle-voice verb meaning to pick out or select for oneself, used almost exclusively for deliberate, purposeful choosing. Jesus chooses

His twelve apostles (Luke 6:13), God chooses believers before the foundation of the world (Ephesians 1:4), and Mary chooses 'the good portion' (Luke 10:42). Spanish elegir/escoger and German erwahlen consistently reflect purposeful election. One striking occurrence stands apart: in Luke 9:35, the perfect passive participle ho eklelegmenos functions as a Messianic title, 'the Chosen One,' spoken by the Father at the Transfiguration.

1. choose, select (21×) To choose, select, or elect someone or something for a particular purpose or role. Predominantly aorist middle forms (exelexato, exelexamen) convey deliberate self-involved choosing. Luke 6:13 records Jesus choosing the Twelve; John 6:70 His choosing of Judas; Ephesians 1:4 God's election of believers. Spanish escogieron/elegí and French choisir confirm the volitional, purposive meaning across 21 occurrences. CHOOSING AND SELECTING en: I-chose, chose, having-chosen | es: elegí, escogiendo, escogieron | fr: choisir | de: erwaehlen, erwählt Mark 13:20; Luke 6:13; Luke 10:42; Luke 14:7; John 6:70

2. the Chosen One (Messianic title) (1×) Used as a substantival perfect passive participle (ho eklelegmenos) functioning as a Messianic title: 'the Chosen One.' In Luke 9:35, the divine voice at the Transfiguration declares 'This is my Son, the Chosen One.' Spanish escogido and German erwahlt render the title, while English 'Chosen One' captures the unique christological weight that distinguishes this single occurrence from the verb's normal active usage. CHOOSING AND SELECTING en: Chosen-One | es: escogido | fr: choisir | de: erwählt Luke 9:35

ἐκλείπ-ω G1587 V-ASA-3S (4×)

To fail, give out, cease; to come to an end or become exhausted
From ek (out) and leipo (to leave), this verb conveys the idea of something running out, giving way, or ceasing to exist. In Luke 16:9 Jesus advises making friends with unrighteous wealth so that 'when it fails' they may welcome you into eternal dwellings. Luke 22:32 records Jesus's prayer that Peter's faith 'might not fail.' Luke 23:45 uses it of the sun's light failing during the crucifixion. Hebrews 1:12 quotes Psalm 102 to declare that God's years 'will not fail.' Spanish 'cesarán/falte' and French 'défaillir' both preserve the sense of exhaustion or cessation.

(4×) To fail, give out, or come to an end; to be exhausted or cease functioning. The verb covers both physical and abstract failure: the sun's light failing at the crucifixion (Luke 23:45), wealth running out (Luke 16:9), faith potentially failing under trial (Luke 22:32), and God's eternal years never ceasing (Heb 1:12, quoting Ps 102:27). The multilingual evidence (spa 'cesaran/falte/habiendo fallado,' fra 'defaillir,' deu 'aufhoeren') consistently renders the core notion of something reaching its limit and giving way, whether temporarily or permanently. FAINTNESS SWOONING en: having-failed, it-fails, might-fail | es: cesarán, falte, habiendo-fallado | fr: défaillir | de: aufhoeren, ἐκλίπῃ, ἐκλιπόντος Luke 16:9; Luke 22:32; Luke 23:45; Heb 1:12

ἐκλεκτ-ός G1588 Adj-AMS (23×)

Chosen, elect – selected by God for a special purpose, relationship, or eschatological destiny
An adjective meaning chosen or picked out, used in the New Testament almost exclusively of divine election. Jesus warns that 'many are called but few are chosen' (Matt 22:14), and the Olivet Discourse speaks of the elect for whose sake tribulation will be shortened (Matt 24:22, 31). Paul calls believers God's chosen ones (Col 3:12; Rom 8:33), and Peter addresses 'elect exiles' (1 Pet 1:1). Christ himself is 'the Chosen One' (Luke 23:35). The term carries both honor and responsibility. French 'elu' and German 'Auserwahlter' emphasize the gravity of divine selection.

chosen, elect (by God) (23×) Selected by God for a special purpose or eschatological destiny. Applied to Christ as God's Chosen One (Luke 23:35), to believers as God's elect (Matt 24:22, 31; Rom 8:33; Col 3:12; 1 Pet 1:1), to a chosen lady (2 John 1, 13), and to faithful angels (1 Tim 5:21). The concept is God's sovereign initiative in selecting, with both privilege and accountability implied. CHOSEN AND ELECT en: chosen, chosen-one, chosen-ones | es: a-elegida, a-escogidos, elegida | fr: élu | de: Auserwählter, auserwaehlt Matt 20:16; Matt 22:14; Matt 24:22; Matt 24:24; Matt 24:31

ἐκλογ-ή G1589 N-NFS (7×)

Election; God's sovereign act of choosing individuals or a people for his redemptive purposes.
A weighty theological noun denoting the divine act of selection — God's purposeful choosing of persons or a people to fulfill his plan of salvation. Paul makes it a cornerstone of his argument in Romans 9–11: election rests not on works but on the One who calls (Rom 9:11), a remnant exists 'according to the election of grace' (Rom 11:5), and Israel remains beloved 'as regards election' (Rom 11:28). In Acts 9:15 Paul himself is called a 'vessel of election,' and 2 Peter 1:10 urges believers to confirm their calling and election. The multilingual glosses — Spanish 'eleccion,' French 'election,' German 'Erwahlung' — all preserve the theological gravity of divine choosing.

election, choosing, divine selection (7×) God's sovereign act of choosing or selecting individuals or a people for his purposes, particularly for salvation and service. This is a distinctively Pauline theological term: Romans 9:11 insists that God's purpose of election stands apart from human works; Romans 11:5 speaks of a remnant 'chosen by grace'; and Romans 11:28 affirms that Israel remains elect despite present unbelief. Paul himself is a 'vessel of election' (Acts 9:15, skeuos ekloges). The Spanish 'eleccion,' French 'election,' and German 'Erwahlung' all maintain the weighty theological register. Second Peter 1:10 turns the doctrine into pastoral exhortation: make your calling and election sure. CHOSEN AND ELECT en: election, of-election | es: de-elección, elección | fr: élection | de: Erwahlung, ἐκλογῆς Acts 9:15; Rom 9:11; Rom 11:5; Rom 11:7; Rom 11:28

ἐκλύω G1590 V-FIP-3P (5×)

To become weary, faint, or lose heart; to grow exhausted in body or spirit.
Describes a state of physical exhaustion or spiritual discouragement in which a person's strength gives out. Jesus uses it concretely when he warns that dismissing the hungry crowd would cause them to faint on the road (Matt 15:32; Mark 8:3). Paul and the author of Hebrews apply it to moral and spiritual endurance: believers must not grow weary in doing good (Gal 6:9) nor lose heart under divine discipline (Heb 12:3, 5). Spanish 'desfallecer' and French 'défaillir' both convey the draining away of vitality.

(5×) To become faint, exhausted, or disheartened—whether physically or spiritually. In the Gospels the word is literal: crowds might collapse from hunger if sent away without food (Matt 15:32; Mark 8:3). In the epistles it shifts to the moral-spiritual register: Galatians 6:9 urges perseverance in well-doing lest one 'lose heart,' and Hebrews 12:3, 5 warns against fainting under persecution or correction. The Spanish 'desfallecer' and French 'défaillir' mirror this dual physical-spiritual exhaustion. FAINTNESS SWOONING en: faint, fainting, giving-up | es: desfalecerán, desfallezcan, desmayando | fr: défaillir | de: ermueden, ἐκλυθῶσιν Matt 15:32; Mark 8:3; Gal 6:9; Heb 12:3; Heb 12:5

ἐκμάσσω G1591 V-APA-NFS (5×)

To wipe off or wipe dry; used of wiping tears, ointment, or water from someone's body.
A tactile, intimate verb describing the act of wiping something off a surface, typically a person's body. Every NT occurrence involves a woman's devoted act toward Jesus or Jesus washing his disciples' feet. The sinful woman wipes Jesus' feet with her hair after wetting them with tears (Luke 7:38, 44), Mary of Bethany does likewise with costly perfume (John 11:2; 12:3), and Jesus wipes his disciples' feet with a towel after washing them (John 13:5). The Spanish 'secar' and French 'essuyer' emphasize the drying action.

(5×) To wipe off or wipe dry a liquid substance from a surface, especially a person's body. All five NT uses involve profoundly personal, humble acts of devotion or service. In Luke 7:38, 44 and John 11:2; 12:3, women wipe Jesus' feet with their hair—an act of costly worship. In John 13:5, Jesus himself wipes his disciples' feet with a towel, inverting social hierarchy. The consistent pairing with feet, tears, and ointment gives this verb a rich liturgical and devotional resonance. French 'essuyer' and Spanish 'secar' both capture the careful, attentive drying motion. WITHERING AND DRYING

en: having-wiped, she-was-wiping, she-wiped | es: a-secar, secaba, secó | fr: essuyer | de: abwischen, ἐξέμαξεν, ἐξέμασσεν Luke 7:38; Luke 7:44; John 11:2; John 12:3; John 13:5

ἐκμυκτηρ-ίζω G1592 V-IIA-3P (2×)

mock, sneer at, deride, hold in derision

This compound verb means to mock, sneer at, or hold in derision. Luke uses it twice: in 16:14 the Pharisees sneer at Jesus' teaching about money, and in 23:35 the rulers mock Jesus on the cross. The word suggests contemptuous ridicule, turning up one's nose at someone. The compound intensifies the basic idea of mocking with particular scorn and derision.

(2×) Describing contemptuous mocking or sneering, this sense captures hostile ridicule. Luke 16:14 shows the money-loving Pharisees sneering at Jesus' teaching, while 23:35 depicts rulers mocking the crucified Christ. The consistent translation pattern ('sneering', 'se burlaban', 'se moquer') emphasizes the scornful, derisive nature of this mockery, more than simple disagreement. MOCKERY AND SCORN

en: they-were-sneering, were-sneering | es: se-burlaban, se-burlaban-de | fr: se-moquer | de: ἐξεμυκτήριζον Luke 16:14; Luke 23:35

ἐκνεύω G1593 V-AIA-3S (1×)

To slip away, withdraw quietly; to move away unobtrusively or evade notice

This verb means to slip away, turn aside, or withdraw quietly. In John 5:13, after healing the lame man, Jesus 'slipped away' from the crowd at the pool. The word originally meant to turn the head aside (of horses tossing their heads) or to fall headlong, but developed meanings of slipping away, avoiding, or withdrawing. Classical usage confirms senses of turning aside with the head, shunning, or falling headlong. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'se apartó' = withdrew, French 'se dérober' = slip away, German 'entweichen' = escape) conveys quiet withdrawal or evasion.

(1×) John 5:13 notes that Jesus 'slipped away (ἐξένευσεν)' after healing the paralytic, since a crowd was in the place—avoiding the commotion and attention. Spanish 'se apartó' (withdrew) and French 'se dérober' (slip away/evade) both suggest quiet, unobtrusive departure. Classical usage included turning the head aside (horse tossing head, wild boar's side-movement) and metaphorically withdrawing or avoiding. Jesus's habitual pattern of avoiding crowds after miracles shows strategic withdrawal, preventing premature messianic fervor while continuing his mission. WITHDRAW DEPART

en: slipped-away | es: se-apartó | fr: se-dérober | de: entweichen John 5:13

ἐκνήφω G1594 V-AMA-2P (1×)

To become sober, sober up; to regain sobriety after intoxication, literally or metaphorically to come to one's senses

This verb means to become sober or sober up—to recover from a drunken state, or metaphorically to come to one's senses and think clearly. In 1 Corinthians 15:34, Paul commands 'Become sober righteously and stop sinning.' While it can mean literal recovery from drunkenness, here it's metaphorical: wake up spiritually, think clearly. Classical usage confirms sleeping off drunkenness or recovering from emotional states. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'despertad' = wake up, French 'devenir sobre' = become sober, German 'nüchtern werden' = become sober) shows both literal sobriety and metaphorical awakening.

(1×) First Corinthians 15:34 contains Paul's sharp command: 'Become sober (ἐκνήψατε) righteously and stop sinning!' Spanish 'despertad' (wake up) leans toward metaphorical awakening, while French 'devenir sobre' and German 'nüchtern werden' preserve the sobriety language. Classical usage meant to sleep off drunkenness and become sober again, or metaphorically to recover from emotional disturbance. Paul uses it figuratively: wake from spiritual stupor, think clearly about resurrection realities, and stop the moral confusion affecting Corinthian behavior. The aorist imperative demands decisive action. SOBER-MINDED SELF-CONTROL

en: become-sober | es: despertad | fr: devenir-sobre | de: nuechtern-werden 1Cor 15:34

ἑκούσι-ος G1595 Adj-ANS (1×)

willing, voluntary; done by free choice rather than compulsion or necessity

This adjective describes actions undertaken by free will rather than under compulsion. In classical Greek it distinguished voluntary acts from those done under constraint or ignorance. Paul uses it in Philemon to emphasize that any favor Philemon shows should spring from genuine willingness, not obligation. The multilingual evidence (voluntary, voluntario, freiwillig) consistently highlights the element of free choice.

(1×) Applied to actions or decisions made by free will, without external compulsion. Paul's usage in Philemon 1:14 stresses that Christian generosity should be voluntary, not coerced—a principle that extends to all relationships within the body of Christ. The term carries legal and ethical weight, distinguishing genuine willingness from reluctant compliance. FREEWILL OFFERING

en: voluntary | es: voluntario | fr: ἑκούσιον | de: freiwillig Phlm 1:14

ἑκούσι-ος G1596 Adv (2×)

willingly, voluntarily, of one's own free will

This adverb means willingly or voluntarily, emphasizing free choice rather than compulsion. Hebrews 10:26 speaks of sinning willfully after receiving knowledge of truth, while 1 Peter 5:2 urges elders to shepherd not by compulsion but willingly. The word stresses deliberate choice and voluntary action. Related forms in classical Greek distinguished between voluntary and involuntary actions, a key ethical distinction.

(2×) Emphasizing voluntary choice and willing action, this adverb contrasts with compulsion or ignorance. Hebrews 10:26 warns against deliberate, knowing sin after enlightenment, while 1 Peter 5:2 encourages freely chosen service rather than reluctant obligation. The translations ('voluntariamente', 'freiwillig') highlight the element of free will and deliberate choice central to the word's meaning. FREEWILL OFFERING en: Willfully, willingly | es: Voluntariamente, voluntariamente | fr: freiwillig | de: freiwillig Heb 10:26; 1Pet 5:2

ἔκπαλαι G1597 Adv (2×)

from of old, for a long time, long ago

This temporal adverb means 'for a long time' or 'from of old,' emphasizing extended duration. 2 Peter uses it twice: in 2:3 warning that judgment for false teachers has not been idle from long ago, and in 3:5 describing creation long ago by God's word. The phrase combines 'from' (ek) with 'long ago' (palai) to stress antiquity or long-standing reality.

(2×) Indicating ancient time or long duration, this adverb emphasizes that something has existed or been determined from long ago. 2 Peter 2:3 assures that divine judgment has long been prepared for false teachers, while 3:5 points to creation's ancient origin by God's word. The phrase stresses the long-standing nature of divine actions and purposes. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: from-of-old | es: desde-hace-mucho | fr: ἔκπαλαι | de: seit-langem 2Pet 2:3; 2Pet 3:5

ἐκπειρ-άζω G1598 V-FIA-2S (4×)

to test thoroughly, put to the proof; to tempt or try God by demanding signs or proofs of his power

An intensified form of πειράζω (the ἐκ- prefix adding force), this verb describes the act of putting someone—especially God—to the test. In the Synoptic temptation narratives (Matt 4:7; Luke 4:12), Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 6:16 against Satan: 'You shall not put the Lord your God to the test.' Paul warns the Corinthians against repeating Israel's wilderness provocations (1 Cor 10:9). The lawyer in Luke 10:25 tests Jesus with a question, though the word carries a lighter nuance there.

(4×) To put to the test in a presumptuous or provocative manner, especially testing God by demanding proof of his faithfulness or power. All four NT occurrences cluster around this meaning. Spanish 'tentar' and French 'tenter' preserve the Latin temptare root; English translations split between 'test' (for human agents) and 'tempt' (when directed at God). Matt 4:7 and Luke 4:12 cite the LXX Deuteronomy prohibition; 1 Cor 10:9 recalls Israel's wilderness provocations; Luke 10:25 softens to a testing inquiry. TESTING AND TEMPTATION

en: let-us-test, testing, you-shall-test | es: tentando, tentarás, tentemos | fr: tenter | de: ἐκπειράζωμεν, ἐκπειράζων, ἐκπειράσεις Matt 4:7; Luke 4:12; Luke 10:25; 1Cor 10:9

ἐκπέμπω G1599 V-APP-NMP (2×)

send out, send forth, dispatch

This compound verb means to send out or dispatch from a place. Acts uses it twice of missionary sending: in 13:4 the Holy Spirit sends out Barnabas and Saul, and in 17:10 the believers send Paul out to Berea. The prefix 'ek-' emphasizes movement outward from a starting point. Classical usage included sending forth messengers, dispatching armies, and even divorcing a wife (sending her away).

(2×) Referring to sending out on a mission or journey, this sense emphasizes dispatch from a place of origin. Acts 13:4 describes the Spirit's initiative in sending missionaries forth, while 17:10 shows believers sending Paul away for safety. The consistent use for missionary sending captures the idea of being dispatched outward with purpose and authority. SENDING AND DISPATCHING

en: having-been-sent-out, sent-out | es: enviados, enviaron | fr: envoyer | de: ἐκπεμφθέντες, ἐξέπεμψαν Acts 13:4; Acts 17:10

ἐκπετάζω G1600 V-AIA-1S (1×)

to stretch out, extend; to spread forth (especially the hands)

This verb means to spread out or extend, often used of stretching forth the hands. In Romans 10:21, Paul quotes Isaiah to describe God's patient gesture toward Israel: "All day long I have stretched out my hands to a disobedient and contrary people." The image evokes both divine invitation and lament over rejection. Cross-linguistic renderings (extendí, étendre, ausbreiten) all capture this outward movement of extension.

(1×) To spread out or extend, particularly the hands in a gesture of appeal or invitation. In Romans 10:21, citing Isaiah 65:2, the image depicts God's persistent outreach to rebellious Israel—hands stretched wide in both welcome and sorrow. This physical gesture becomes a powerful metaphor for divine patience and unrequited love. STRETCHING AND EXTENDING en: I-stretched-out | es: extendí | fr: étendre | de: ausbreiten Rom 10:21

ἐκπίπτω G1601 V-ANA (10×)

Fall out, drop off; run aground (nautical); fall away from grace; fail, become void

A compound of ek ('out of') and pipto ('to fall'), this verb traces a vivid arc from the literal to the theological. Luke uses it four times in Acts 27 for the terrifying prospect of a ship running aground on the rocks of Malta, while in Acts 12:7 Peter's chains simply fall off his hands at the angel's touch. James borrows the image of a flower dropping its petals to illustrate the fading of earthly wealth (Jas 1:11; cf. 1 Pet 1:24). Paul gives it its sharpest theological edge in Galatians 5:4: those who seek justification by law 'have fallen away from grace.' Spanish 'caer' and French 'dechoir' capture both the physical drop and the spiritual descent, while German 'abfallen' emphasizes the separation involved in falling away.

1. run aground, drift off course (nautical) (4×) To run aground or be driven off course in a nautical context, used exclusively in Luke's gripping account of Paul's shipwreck voyage to Rome. The sailors fear they will run aground on the Syrtis sandbars (Acts 27:17), Paul prophesies they must run aground on some island (27:26), and they take soundings fearing they might be cast upon rocks (27:29). The soldiers cut away the lifeboat lest it drift away as well (27:32). Spanish 'caer' and French 'dechoir' both preserve the sense of an uncontrolled, forced descent toward land or reef. FALLING AND FAILING

en: fall-away, they-should-fall, to-run-aground | es: caer, cayeran, cayéramos | fr: déchoir | de: ἐκπέσωμεν, ἐκπέσωσιν, ἐκπεσεῖν Acts 27:17; Acts 27:26; Acts 27:29; Acts 27:32

2. fall off (physical) (3×) To fall off or drop away physically, describing something detaching from where it was fastened or growing. In Acts 12:7 the chains fall off Peter's hands at the angel's command, a sudden, miraculous release. James 1:11 and 1 Peter 1:24 both quote Isaiah 40:7-8, likening the rich or all flesh to grass whose flower 'falls off' under the scorching wind. Spanish 'caer' and German 'abfallen' capture the simple gravitational drop of something that was once attached. FALLING AND FAILING

en: fell, fell-off | es: cayeron, cayó | fr: abfallen, déchoir | de: abfallen, ἐξέπεσαν Acts 12:7; Jas 1:11; 1Pet 1:24

3. fall away (spiritual/moral) (2×) To fall away from a spiritual state, specifically from divine grace or from one's secure standing in the faith. Paul warns the Galatians, 'You have fallen away from grace' (Gal 5:4), meaning they have departed from the sphere of grace by turning to law-keeping for justification. Second Peter 3:17 urges believers not to 'fall from your own steadfastness' by being carried away with lawless error. German 'abfallen' and French 'dechoir' both convey the gravity of losing a privileged spiritual position through one's own misdirection. FALLING AND FAILING

en: you-fall, you-fell | es: caigáis, caísteis | fr: abfallen | de: abfallen Gal 5:4; 2Pet 3:17

4. fail, become void (1×) To fail or become void, said of a divine word or promise that does not lose its power. In Romans 9:6 Paul insists, 'It is not as though the word of God has failed,' defending God's faithfulness despite Israel's unbelief. Spanish 'ha caido' ('has fallen') preserves the root metaphor of something dropping or collapsing, here applied to the reliability of a promise: God's word does not fall to the ground unfulfilled. FALLING AND FAILING

en: has-failed | es: ha-caído | fr: déchoir | de: abfallen Rom 9:6

ἐκπλέω G1602 V-AIA-1P (3×)

to sail out, sail away, set sail; maritime departure from port, beginning a voyage

The verb ἐκπλέω (from ἐκ + πλέω 'sail') means to sail out from harbor or away from shore—the nautical equivalent of departing or setting out on a journey. In Acts it punctuates Paul's missionary movements, marking transitions between ministry locations. Each sailing represents not merely travel logistics but narrative momentum—new territories, new audiences, continued obedience to the apostolic commission across the Mediterranean world.

(3×) Acts 15:39 records the sharp disagreement between Paul and Barnabas: 'so Barnabas took Mark with him and sailed away to Cyprus.' Acts 18:18 describes Paul's departure from Corinth: 'after this Paul...sailed away to Syria.' Acts 20:6 narrates: 'but we sailed away from Philippi after the days of Unleavened Bread, and in five days we came to them at Troas.' The Spanish (navegamos, navegó, zarpar) and French (naviguer) use sailing verbs, while German preserves Greek forms (ἐκπλεῦσαι, ἐξέπλει, ἐξεπλεύσαμεν). Each departure marks missionary advance—the gospel spreading via ancient shipping routes, propelled not just by wind but by apostolic urgency. The verb makes Mediterranean geography an instrument of divine

purpose. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP
en: sailed, sailed-away | es: navegamos, navegó, zarpar | fr: naviguer | de: ἐκπλεῦσαι, ἐξέπλει, ἐξεπλεύσαμεν Acts 15:39; Acts 18:18; Acts 20:6

ἐκπληρ-όω G1603 V-RIA-3S (1×)

to fulfill, complete; to bring to full realization or completion
This compound verb intensifies the basic sense of "filling" to mean bringing something to complete fulfillment. In Acts 13:33, it describes how God has fulfilled His promise by raising Jesus from the dead. The perfect tense emphasizes the completed state: the promise stands fulfilled. Multilingual glosses (ha-cumplido, accomplir) emphasize the accomplishment aspect, while the German preserves the Greek form, perhaps acknowledging its theological richness.

(1×) To bring to full completion or realization, especially of divine promises or purposes. In Acts 13:33, Paul declares that God has fulfilled His promise to the fathers by raising Jesus—a complete, definitive act. The perfect tense underscores the lasting effect: what God promised stands accomplished, reshaping Israel's messianic hope. FULFILL AND COMPLETE en: has-fulfilled | es: ha-cumplido | fr: accomplir | de: ἐκπεπλήρωκεν Acts 13:33 ἐκπλήρ-ωσις G1604 N-AFS (1×)

completion, fulfillment; the act of bringing something to full realization
This noun denotes the completion or fulfillment of something, often in a temporal or ritual context. In Acts 21:26, it refers to the completion of days of purification—the moment when ritual requirements are fully met. Classical usage includes filling up measures or cycles, and the LXX uses it for filling up the measure of sins. Here it marks the endpoint of a ritual period, when obligations are satisfied.

(1×) The completion or fulfillment of a period or process, especially ritual observance. In Acts 21:26, Paul enters the temple to announce the completion of the purification days, signaling when the offering would be made. The term captures both temporal completion (the days are finished) and ritual fulfillment (the requirements are met). AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11702 WITH 8 SENSES en: completion | es: cumplimiento | fr: accomplissement | de: ἐκπλήρωσιν Acts 21:26

ἐκπλήσσω G1605 V-PNM/P (13×)

be amazed, be astonished, be astounded — to be struck with overwhelming surprise or wonder Ekplesso literally means 'to strike out of' one's senses, combining ek ('out') and plesso ('to strike'). In all 13 New Testament occurrences it appears in the passive or middle voice, describing the overwhelming astonishment of crowds or individuals in response to Jesus. The reaction is provoked by his teaching (Matt 7:28, 13:54, 22:33; Mark 1:22, 6:2, 11:18; Luke 4:32), his authority over demons (Mark 7:37), and his actions more broadly (Luke 9:43). This is not mild surprise but a visceral, disorienting amazement — Spanish 'asombrarse,' French 'etre frappe d'etonnement,' and German 'staunen' all convey a being knocked off balance by the unexpected.

be amazed, be astonished, be astounded (13×) To be struck with overwhelming amazement or astonishment, always passive/middle in the NT, describing the profound emotional impact of Jesus' words and deeds on those who witnessed them. Occurs in response to his teaching at the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 7:28), in the Nazareth synagogue (Matt 13:54, Mark 6:2), and in the Temple (Matt 22:33, Mark 11:18), as well as his miraculous works (Mark 7:37, Luke 9:43). The compound ek- intensifies the root plesso ('strike'), conveying a sense of being knocked out of one's ordinary frame of reference. Consistently rendered with strong astonishment vocabulary across languages. AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT en: being-amazed, they-were-amazed, they-were-astonished | es: asombrarse, asombrándose, estaban-asombradas | fr: être-frappé, être-frappé-d'étonnement | de: staunt, ἐξεπλήσσετο, ἐξεπλήσσοντο Matt 7:28; Matt 13:54; Matt 19:25; Matt 22:33; Mark 1:22

ἐκ-πνέω G1606 V-AIA-3S (3×)

to breathe out one's last breath, to expire, to die; specifically the moment of death when breathing ceases
This verb captures the physiological moment of death—the final exhalation when life departs the body. While classical Greek used it for winds ceasing or fires dying down, the New Testament employs it with stark literalness for Jesus' death. Both Mark and Luke choose this word to describe the precise instant Christ gave up his spirit. Mark records it twice (15:37, 39)—first as narrative, then in the centurion's confession triggered by how Jesus died. Luke 23:46 combines it with Jesus' final words: 'Having said this, he breathed his last.' The word emphasizes the human, physical reality of Christ's death.

(3×) All three Gospel occurrences describe Jesus' death on the cross, specifically the moment his breathing stopped. The Greek medical precision distinguishes this from more metaphorical death language—this is biological expiration, the cessation of breath. Cross-linguistic evidence confirms this specificity: Spanish 'expiró', French 'expirer', and English 'breathed his last' all preserve the respiratory focus. The centurion's response to 'how he breathed his last' (Mark 15:39) suggests something distinctive in the manner of Jesus' death, making the physiological detail theologically significant. DEATH AND DYING
en: breathed-his-last, he-breathed-his-last | es: expiró | fr: expirer | de: ἐξέπνευσεν Mark 15:37; Mark 15:39; Luke 23:46

ἐκπορ-εύω G1607 V-PPM/P-GNS (34×)

To go out or proceed forth; of physical departure from a place and of words or spirit emanating from a source.
A compound verb (ek + poreuomai) meaning to travel out from or to issue forth. In the Synoptic Gospels it often describes crowds going out to see John the Baptist (Matt 3:5) or Jesus leaving a city (Matt 20:29; Mark 1:5). Its deeper theological weight appears when Jesus teaches that what defiles comes out from the heart (Matt 15:11, 18; Mark 7:15, 20), and supremely in John 15:26 where the Spirit of truth 'proceeds from the Father.' Spanish captures both with 'salir' (go out) and 'proceder' (proceed), while French uses 'sortir' for both, though the theological distinction is unmistakable in context.

1. go out, depart physically (27×) Physical departure — going out, marching forth, or traveling away from a place. This is the majority usage (27 of 34 occurrences), covering crowds streaming out of Jerusalem (Matt 3:5; Mark 1:5), Jesus departing from Jericho (Matt 20:29), and people leaving cities or regions. Spanish 'que-salían' and German 'ausgehen' both reflect straightforward spatial movement. The Septuagint already employs this sense for military marching out of camp. GOING OUT AND FORTH
en: coming-out, go-out, goes-out | es: procedentes, que-salían, sale | fr: sortir | de: ausgehen, geht-aus Matt 3:5; Matt 4:4; Matt 17:21; Matt 20:29; Mark 1:5

2. proceed, emanate from source (7×) Proceeding or emanating from a source — used of words issuing from the mouth (Matt 4:4; 15:11), evil thoughts emerging from the heart (Matt 15:18; Mark 7:20-23), and the Spirit proceeding from the Father (John 15:26). Spanish 'procede' and German 'geht-aus' carry this metaphysical weight. The Johannine use in the Paraclete discourse gave this sense its profound creedal significance in the filioque debates of later centuries. GOING OUT AND FORTH
en: going-out, proceeds | es: procede, que-sale, que-salen | fr: sortir | de: ausgehen, geht-aus Matt 15:11; Matt 15:18; Mark 7:15; Mark 7:20; John 15:26

ἐκπορνεύω G1608 V-APA-NFP (1×)

to engage in sexual immorality, commit fornication; to practice illicit sexual behavior
This intensified form of the root verb for sexual immorality appears in Jude 7, describing the egregious sexual sins of Sodom and Gomorrah. The compound suggests extreme or flagrant behavior, going beyond ordinary boundaries. Jude cites their "indulging in immorality" as a warning example of judgment. The multilingual glosses (fornicando, s'étant-prostituées, Unzucht-treibend) all convey the severity of the transgression, whether through ongoing aspect or intensified vocabulary.

(1×) To engage in extreme or flagrant sexual immorality, often with the sense of going beyond normal boundaries. In Jude 7, the verb describes Sodom and Gomorrah's indulgence in sexual sin, which brought divine judgment. The compound form intensifies the sense of depravity, marking their behavior as a paradigmatic example of moral rebellion deserving punishment. SEXUAL IMMORALITY
en: having-indulged-in-immorality | es: fornicando | fr: s'étant-prostituées, | de: Unzucht-treibend Jude 1:7

ἐκπτύω G1609 V-AIA-2P (1×)
to spit out, reject with contempt; to expel from the mouth in disgust
This verb means to spit out, often as a gesture of disgust or rejection. In Galatians 4:14, Paul marvels that the Galatians did not despise or spit him out despite his physical affliction—they welcomed him instead. The phrase evokes visceral rejection, the kind of revulsion one shows toward something repulsive. Multilingual renderings vary: Spanish emphasizes rejection (rechazasteis), while French and German preserve the Greek form or use the literal "spit out," capturing the physical intensity of the metaphor.

(1×) To spit out in disgust or contempt, expressing visceral rejection. In Galatians 4:14, Paul acknowledges that his physical condition could have provoked such revulsion, yet the Galatians received him warmly instead. The verb dramatizes the contrast between natural human aversion to affliction and the love shown by the Galatian believers, who saw past Paul's frailty. SPITTING CONTEMPT
en: you-spit-out | es: rechazasteis | fr: ἐξεπτύσατε | de: ausspucken Gal 4:14

ἐκρῐ̄ζ-όω G1610 V-FIP-3S (4×)
to uproot, pull out by the roots; to eradicate completely Drawn from agricultural language, this verb describes the violent act of tearing a plant out by its roots. Jesus uses it in the parable of the wheat and tares, warning against premature uprooting that would harm good plants (Matt 13:29), and declares that every plant not planted by the Father will be uprooted (Matt 15:13). In Luke 17:6, even a mulberry tree obeys the command to uproot itself. Jude 1:12 applies the image metaphorically to false teachers—'uprooted, twice dead.'

(4×) To pull up by the roots, to eradicate or destroy completely. The agricultural metaphor carries theological weight across all four occurrences. Spanish 'desarraigar' and French 'déraciner' both transparently reflect the root-removal imagery (raíz, racine). In Matt 13:29 the concern is collateral damage from premature uprooting; Matt 15:13 announces divine judgment; Luke 17:6 illustrates faith's power over nature; Jude 1:12 extends the metaphor to spiritual barrenness. UPROOT PLUCK UP
en: Be-uprooted, uprooted, will-be-uprooted | es: Desarráigate, desarraigados., desarraigéis | fr: déraciner, déracinés; | de: entwurzelte, ἐκριζωθήσεται, ἐκριζώσητε Matt 13:29; Matt 15:13; Luke 17:6; Jude 1:12

ἔκστᾰσις G1611 N-GFS (7×)
Amazement, overwhelming astonishment at a miraculous event; trance, divinely induced ecstatic visionary state.
Derived from existemi ('to displace, put outside'), the noun ekstasis captures the experience of being thrown outside one's ordinary mental state — whether by astonishment or by divine vision. In its more common NT usage, it denotes the sheer amazement that seizes witnesses of the miraculous: the crowd's stupefied wonder when Jairus's daughter rises (Mark 5:42), the trembling and bewilderment of the women at the empty tomb (Mark 16:8), and the astonishment that grips onlookers after the healing of the lame man at the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:10). Spanish asombro/extasis and French extase converge on the 'outside-standing' metaphor, while Hindi uses vishmayi (amazement). But Acts introduces a second, specifically revelatory sense: Peter falls into a 'trance' on the rooftop at Joppa (Acts 10:10; 11:5), and Paul recounts entering a 'trance' while praying in the temple (Acts 22:17). Here ekstasis is no longer mere astonishment but an altered state of consciousness in which God delivers visions — the ancestor of what later Christian mysticism would call 'ecstasy.'

1. amazement, astonishment, overwhelming wonder (4×) Amazement, astonishment, overwhelming wonder — a state of being stunned or beside oneself in response to an extraordinary event, especially a miracle. Four of seven NT occurrences carry this sense: the household amazed 'with great amazement' when the twelve-year-old girl rises from death (Mark 5:42), the women fleeing the tomb seized by 'trembling and astonishment' (Mark 16:8), the crowd overcome with 'amazement' at the paralytic's healing (Luke 5:26), and all the people running together 'utterly astonished' at the lame man leaping in Solomon's Portico (Acts 3:10). Spanish asombro, French extase, and Hindi vishmayi all render this as overwhelming wonder. The distinction from ordinary surprise (thaumazo) is one of intensity — ekstasis implies being mentally 'displaced' by what one has witnessed. AMAZEMENT AND TRANCE
en: amazement, with-amazement | es: asombro, con-asombro, de-éxtasis | fr: extase | de: ἐκστάσει, ἐκστάσεως, ἔκστασις Mark 5:42; Mark 16:8; Luke 5:26; Acts 3:10

2. trance, ecstatic visionary state (3×) A trance or divinely induced ecstatic state in which a person receives visions and revelations, distinct from the amazement of sense 1 in that it involves an altered state of consciousness rather than a reaction to external events. Three occurrences cluster in Acts: Peter on the rooftop at Joppa 'fell into a trance' and saw the sheet descending with unclean animals (Acts 10:10; retold at 11:5), and Paul recounts how 'I fell into a trance' while praying in the Jerusalem temple and received the command to leave (Acts 22:17). Spanish extasis and French extase serve both senses, but the contextual markers — falling into (egeneto ep' auton), receiving a vision (eiden to horama) — clearly differentiate this as a receptive spiritual state. This is the root from which English 'ecstasy' derives its mystical-theological sense. AMAZEMENT AND TRANCE
en: a-trance, trance | es: éxtasis | fr: extase | de: ἐκστάσει, ἔκστασις Acts 10:10; Acts 11:5; Acts 22:17

ἐκστρέφω G1612 V-RIM/P-3S (1×)
to pervert, twist, turn aside; to corrupt or distort morally or doctrinally
This verb means to twist or turn inside out, and metaphorically to pervert or corrupt. In Titus 3:11, it describes someone who is "perverted"—twisted out of proper moral and doctrinal shape. The perfect tense indicates a settled state: such a person has become warped and remains so, sinning by their own condemnation. The image of turning or twisting (Classical usage includes feet turned outward) becomes a powerful picture of moral distortion.

(1×) To be perverted or twisted out of proper moral or spiritual shape. In Titus 3:11, the perfect passive describes a factious person as thoroughly corrupted, beyond correction. The perfect tense implies a settled condition: they have become warped and remain so, actively sinning and self-condemned. The metaphor of physical distortion captures the comprehensive nature of their moral deviation. WITHDRAWAL AND APOSTASY en: has-been-perverted | es: está-pervertido | fr: ἐξέστραπται | de: verdreht Titus 3:11

ἐκτᾰρ-άσσω G1613 V-PIA-3P (1×)
to disturb, agitate, throw into confusion; to unsettle emotionally or socially
This verb means to throw into confusion or agitate, whether emotionally or socially. In Acts 16:20, the accusers claim that Paul and Silas are "disturbing our city"—stirring up trouble and upsetting the social order. The verb can describe emotional turmoil or social upheaval. The multilingual glosses (perturban, troubler) emphasize the unsettling effect, while German preserves the Greek form, perhaps acknowledging the specific legal-social dimension of the accusation.

(1×) To disturb or agitate, causing social upheaval or emotional turmoil. In Acts 16:20, opponents accuse Paul and Silas of throwing their city into confusion, disrupting the established order with their teaching. The charge is both social (they're troublemakers) and implicitly religious (they challenge local customs). The verb captures the anxiety of authorities facing unwelcome change. TROUBLING AND DISTURBING

en: are-disturbing | es: perturban | fr: troubler | de: ἐκταράσσουσιν Acts 16:20

ἐκτείνω G1614 V-FIA-2S (16×)

To stretch out or extend, especially the hand in healing, command, or action; once of lowering equipment from a ship.

One of the New Testament's most vivid action verbs, overwhelmingly associated with the outstretched hand. Jesus stretches out his hand to touch the leper (Matt 8:3; Mark 1:41; Luke 5:13), commands the man with the withered hand to 'stretch it out' and it is restored (Matt 12:13; Mark 3:5; Luke 6:10), and gestures broadly toward his disciples as his true family (Matt 12:49). Peter is told 'you will stretch out your hands' in a prophecy of his martyrdom (John 21:18). A single nautical usage in Acts 27:30 describes sailors lowering anchors under pretense of 'laying out' equipment from the bow—a technical maritime extension of the same physical motion.

1. stretch out (hand) (15×) To stretch out or extend the hand, whether for healing, commanding, seizing, or gesturing. This is the near-universal New Testament usage: Jesus extends his hand to cleanse the leper (Matt 8:3; Mark 1:41), to restore the withered hand (Matt 12:13; Mark 3:5; Luke 6:10), and to indicate his disciples (Matt 12:49). Peter stretches out his hand in martyrdom prophecy (John 21:18), and a servant's ear is struck by a stretched-out sword (Matt 26:51). Spanish 'extiende/extenderás' and German 'ausgestreckt/streckt-aus' consistently render this as outward physical extension. STRETCHING AND EXTENDING en: Stretch-out, having-stretched-out, he-stretched-out | es: Extiende, extender, extenderás | fr: étendre | de: ausgestreckt, streckt-aus Matt 8:3; Matt 12:13; Matt 12:49; Matt 14:31

2. lay out, let down (nautical) (1×) To lay out or let down equipment from a ship, a specialized nautical usage. In Acts 27:30, sailors pretend to be 'laying out anchors from the bow' while actually trying to escape in the ship's boat. Spanish 'echar' (to cast/lower) and English 'lay out' reflect the maritime technical sense, where the same root motion of extending or stretching is applied to handling rigging and anchors rather than human limbs. STRETCHING AND EXTENDING en: to-lay-out | es: de-echar | fr: étendre | de: streckt-aus Acts 27:30

ἐκτελ-έω G1615 V-ANA (2×)

finish, complete, bring to an end, accomplish

This compound verb means to finish, complete, or bring to an end. Jesus uses it twice in Luke 14 in the parable about counting the cost: verse 29 speaks of being unable to finish a tower, and verse 30 describes the mockery when one cannot complete it. The prefix 'ek-' intensifies the idea of bringing something through to its end. Classical usage included accomplishing great works and fulfilling promises.

(2×) Referring to completing or finishing a project, this sense appears in Jesus' parable about counting the cost of discipleship. Both Luke 14:29 and 30 use it of finishing a construction project, emphasizing the shame of starting without resources to complete. The word stresses successful completion rather than merely ceasing work. FULFILL AND COMPLETE

en: to-finish | es: terminar | fr: achever | de: ἐκτελέσαι Luke 14:29; Luke 14:30

ἐκτέν-εια G1616 N-DFS (1×)

earnestness, zeal, fervor; intense devotion or eager persistence

This noun denotes earnestness, zeal, or fervent devotion. In Acts 26:7, Paul describes Israel's worship as pursued "earnestly" (literally "in earnestness") night and day. The term conveys intense, sustained devotion rather than casual observance. Classical usage includes ideas of gushing enthusiasm or assiduousness. Here it characterizes the twelve tribes' constant worship, highlighting the seriousness with which they serve God in hope of the promise.

(1×) Earnest devotion or fervent zeal, marked by intensity and persistence. In Acts 26:7, Paul describes Israel's worship as characterized by this earnestness—they serve God constantly, night and day, in eager hope of the promise. The noun captures not just activity but the passionate spirit behind it, the kind of wholehearted devotion that perseveres without flagging. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY en: earnestness | es: fervor | fr: ferveur | de: ἐκτενείᾳ Acts 26:7

ἐκτεν-ής G1617 Adv-C (1×)

more earnestly, with greater intensity; in a heightened manner of fervor or effort

This comparative adverb intensifies the idea of earnestness, describing action done with even greater fervor or intensity. In Luke 22:44, it describes Jesus praying "more earnestly" in Gethsemane, as His anguish deepened. The comparative form marks an escalation: His prayer became more intense, more urgent. The multilingual renderings (más intensamente, plus ardemment) all capture this heightening of fervor, the increase in emotional and spiritual intensity.

(1×) With greater earnestness or intensity, describing an increase in fervor or effort. In Luke 22:44, as Jesus' agony intensifies in Gethsemane, His prayer becomes more earnest—the comparative adverb marks the deepening crisis. His intercession grows more urgent, more strenuous, as He faces the cup He must drink. The term underscores the human struggle of Jesus in His passion. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY en: more-earnestly | es: más-intensamente | fr: plus-ardemment | de: ἐκτενέστερον Luke 22:44

ἐκτεν-ής G1618 Adj-AFS (1×)

earnest, fervent, intense; marked by sustained devotion and heartfelt commitment

This adjective describes earnest, fervent, or intense devotion. In 1 Peter 4:8, it modifies love: "earnest love for one another." The term suggests love that is stretched out, sustained, unwavering—not casual or intermittent. Classical usage includes ideas of being warmly attached or assiduous. Peter urges a love that persists through difficulty, covering a multitude of sins. The multilingual glosses (ferviente, eifrig) emphasize the warmth and diligence of such love.

(1×) Earnest, fervent, characterized by sustained intensity and heartfelt commitment. In 1 Peter 4:8, Peter calls for earnest love among believers—love that is constant, wholehearted, and persevering. The adjective suggests love that is stretched out and sustained, not easily withdrawn. Such love is practical and powerful, covering a multitude of sins through patient forbearance and genuine care. POWER AND ABILITY

en: earnest | es: ferviente | fr: ἐκτενῆ | de: eifrig 1Pet 4:8

ἐκτεν-ής G1619 Adv (2×)

earnestly, fervently, intently, with zeal

This adverb means earnestly, fervently, or with intense zeal. Acts 12:5 describes the church praying earnestly for imprisoned Peter, and 1 Peter 1:22 urges believers to love one another earnestly from the heart. The word emphasizes intensity and warmth of action, whether prayer or love. The root adjective meant 'strained' or 'stretched out,' suggesting exerted effort and intentionality.

(2×) Describing intense, fervent action, this adverb emphasizes zealous earnestness in prayer and love. Acts 12:5 depicts the urgent, constant prayer of the church for Peter's release, while 1 Peter 1:22 calls for stretched-out, deeply sincere love among believers. The Spanish 'fervientemente' particularly captures the fervent, heated quality of such earnestness. ACCURACY AND PRECISION

en: earnestly | es: fervientemente | fr: avec-soin, ἐκτενῶς | de: ἐκτενῶς Acts 12:5; 1Pet 1:22

ἐκτίθημι G1620 V-AIM-3P (4×)

to set forth, explain in detail; to expose (a child); to lay out publicly

This compound verb (ἐκ + τίθημι, 'to place out') carries two distinct senses in Acts. In Acts 7:21 it refers to the exposure of the infant Moses—the ancient practice of abandoning unwanted newborns. In Acts 11:4, 18:26, and 28:23, it means to set forth or explain something in orderly detail. Spanish captures both registers: 'exponer' covers physical exposure and intellectual exposition alike. The shift from literal placement to rhetorical presentation follows a natural semantic path.

(4×) To expose a newborn child by placing it outside, abandoning it to the elements. This technical sense appears in Acts 7:21, where Moses is described as having been 'exposed' (ἐκτεθέντος). Spanish 'habiendo-sido-expuesto' and French 'exposer' use cognate forms preserving the physical imagery of setting out. The passive participle emphasizes the infant's vulnerability and the providential rescue that follows. COUNTING AND NARRATING

en: explained, having-been-exposed, he-was-explaining | es: exponía, expusieron, habiendo-sido-expuesto | fr: exposer | de: ἐκτεθέντος, ἐξέθεντο, ἐξετίθετο Acts 7:21; Acts 11:4; Acts 18:26; Acts 28:23

ἐκτῐ́ν-άσσω G1621 V-APM-NMS (4×)

to shake off or shake out, as dust from feet or garments, signaling rejection or disassociation

A vivid gestural verb describing the forceful shaking off of dust or debris. In the Gospels, Jesus instructs his disciples to shake the dust from their feet when leaving an unreceptive town—a prophetic sign of judgment (Matt 10:14; Mark 6:11). Paul and Barnabas perform this same gesture against hostile opponents in Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:51). In Acts 18:6, Paul shakes out his garments against the Corinthian synagogue, echoing Nehemiah 5:13. Every NT use carries symbolic force beyond the physical act.

(4×) To shake off or shake out as a symbolic act of protest, renunciation, or transferred responsibility. All four NT occurrences function as prophetic gestures rather than mere hygiene. Spanish 'sacudir' and French 'secouer' convey the vigorous physical motion. Matt 10:14 and Mark 6:11 describe dust shaken from feet as testimony against rejecting towns; Acts 13:51 repeats the gesture against persecutors; Acts 18:6 intensifies to shaking out garments, recalling Nehemiah's oath-gesture. WANDERING AND GRIEVING en: having-shaken-off, having-shaken-out, shake-off | es: sacudid, sacudiendo | fr: secouer | de: ἐκτινάξατε, ἐκτιναξάμενοι, ἐκτιναξάμενος Matt 10:14; Mark 6:11; Acts 13:51; Acts 18:6

ἐκτός G1622 Adv (8×)

Outside, external to; except, unless — adverb/preposition of spatial exteriority or logical exclusion

The adverb ἐκτός (from ἐκ, 'out of') marks what lies beyond a boundary, whether physical or logical. In its exclusionary sense it introduces exceptions to general statements — 'except,' 'unless,' 'apart from' — as when Paul concedes that tongues without interpretation profit nothing 'unless' one interprets (1 Cor 14:5). In its spatial sense it denotes physical exteriority: Jesus tells the Pharisees to clean the 'outside' of the cup (Matt 23:26), and Paul speaks of sins 'outside' the body (1 Cor 6:18). The two senses split cleanly across languages: Spanish distinguishes 'excepto' from 'fuera de,' and Arabic separates exclusionary markers from spatial ones.

1. except, unless, apart from (exclusionary) (5×) The exclusionary or exceptive sense: 'except for,' 'unless,' 'apart from,' 'beyond,' introducing a logical exception to a preceding assertion. Paul uses it to qualify universal claims — 'all things are put under him, except the one who subjected all things' (1 Cor 15:27) — and to state conditions — 'unless you hold fast' (1 Cor 15:2). Spanish 'excepto/fuera de' and French 'excepte' confirm the logical-exclusion reading. This sense governs five of the eight NT occurrences, spanning Acts 26:22, 1 Cor 14:5, 1 Cor 15:2, 1 Cor 15:27, and 1 Tim 5:19. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST en: beyond, except, unless | es: excepto, fuera-de | fr: en-dehors, excepté | de: ἐκτὸς Acts 26:22; 1Cor 14:5; 1Cor 15:2; 1Cor 15:27; 1Tim 5:19

2. outside, external to (spatial/locative) (3×) The spatial or locative sense: physically 'outside,' 'external to,' or 'beyond' a boundary or domain. In Matt 23:26 Jesus contrasts cleaning the 'outside' of the cup with the inside (ἐντός), and in 1 Cor 6:18 Paul describes a sin 'outside the body' in contrast to sexual immorality within. Hindi 'bahar' (बाहर), Arabic 'kharij' (خارج), and Korean 'bakke' (밖에) all deploy dedicated spatial-exteriority words, confirming the distinct physical sense from the abstract exclusionary use. OUTSIDE AND EXTERIOR

en: outside | es: de-fuera, fuera, fuera-de | fr: en-dehors, excepté | de: ἐκτὸς Matt 23:26; 1Cor 6:18; 2Cor 12:2

ἕκτος G1623 Adj-NFS (14×)

sixth — the ordinal number indicating the sixth position in a sequence

Hektos is the straightforward ordinal adjective derived from hex ('six'), and its 14 New Testament occurrences are spread across narrative and apocalyptic contexts with striking regularity. In the Gospels it marks the 'sixth hour' — roughly noon — at critical moments: the darkness that fell at the crucifixion (Matt 27:45, Mark 15:33, Luke 23:44) and Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman (John 4:6). In Revelation it punctuates the unfolding sequence of divine judgments: the sixth seal (Rev 6:12), the sixth angel with a trumpet (Rev 9:13-14), and the sixth bowl (Rev 16:12). Spanish 'sexto/sexta,' French 'sixieme,' and German 'sechste' render it identically across every context.

sixth (ordinal number) (14×) The ordinal adjective 'sixth,' used to indicate position in a counted series. In the Gospels it identifies the sixth hour of the day — approximately noon — at theologically significant moments including the crucifixion darkness (Matt 27:45, Mark 15:33, Luke 23:44) and Jesus at Jacob's well (John 4:6). Luke uses it for the sixth month of Elizabeth's pregnancy (Luke 1:26, 36). In Revelation it marks the sixth seal (6:12), sixth trumpet-angel (9:13-14), and sixth bowl (16:12), maintaining the cadence of sevenfold judgment sequences. All 14 occurrences express a single ordinal function without semantic variation. SIXTH ORDINAL NUMBER

en: sixth, the-sixth | es: la-sexta, sexta, sexto | fr: sixième | de: sechste, ἕκτῃ, ἕκτην Matt 20:5; Matt 27:45; Mark 15:33; Luke 1:26; Luke 1:36

ἐκτρέπω G1624 V-FIP-3P (5×)

To turn aside, deviate, or swerve from a path; to wander away from sound teaching or proper conduct.

Conveys the image of veering off a road or course, used almost exclusively in the Pastoral Epistles and Hebrews for doctrinal or moral deviation. Some have 'swerved' from sincere faith into empty talk (1 Tim 1:6), others have turned aside after Satan (1 Tim 5:15), and Timothy is warned to avoid profane babbling lest he be 'turned aside' (1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 4:4). Hebrews 12:13 uses it physically: make straight paths so that the lame limb is not 'turned out of joint.' Spanish 'desviarse' vividly captures the wandering-off-course image.

(5×) To turn aside or deviate from the correct path, whether literally (a dislocated limb in Heb 12:13) or figuratively (straying from sound doctrine in 1 Tim 1:6; 5:15; 6:20; 2 Tim 4:4). The Pastoral Epistles use it as a sobering warning about theological drift: people swerve from faith into myths and empty talk. In Hebrews 12:13 the medical sense appears—straight paths prevent a lame joint from being 'turned aside' further. Spanish 'desviarse' and French 'détourner' both preserve the spatial metaphor of departure from the right way. TURNING AWAY AND PERVERTING

en: be-turned-aside, turned-aside, turning-away-from | es: evitando, se-desviaron, se-desviarán | fr: détourner | de: abwenden 1Tim 1:6; 1Tim 5:15; 1Tim 6:20; 2Tim 4:4; Heb 12:13

ἐκτρέφω G1625 V-PIA-3S (2×)

nourish, bring up, rear, feed and care for

This verb means to nourish, bring up, or rear from childhood. Paul uses it in Ephesians 5:29 of husbands nourishing their wives as Christ does the church, and in 6:4 of bringing up children in the Lord. The word emphasizes ongoing care and nurture rather than mere feeding. Classical usage included rearing children, bringing up animals, and even plants nourishing their roots.

(2×) Referring to nurturing care and nourishment, this sense applies to both spousal care (Eph 5:29) and child-rearing (6:4). The verb emphasizes the ongoing process of feeding and fostering growth, not merely providing a single meal. Paul's use in 5:29 connects natural self-care with the care husbands should show wives, while 6:4 focuses on the comprehensive nurture of children. FEEDING AND NOURISHING

en: bring-up, nourishes | es: criadlos, la-alimenta | fr: ἐκτρέφει, ἐκτρέφετε | de: ernaehren Eph 5:29; Eph 6:4

ἔκ-τρωμα G1626 N-DNS (1×)

untimely birth, miscarriage; one born prematurely or abnormally

This noun means an untimely or premature birth, often a miscarriage or stillborn child. In 1 Corinthians 15:8, Paul uses it metaphorically of himself: "last of all, as to one untimely born, he appeared also to me." The term can be self-deprecating, suggesting Paul's apostolic call came abnormally, outside the normal sequence. He was not among the Twelve during Jesus' earthly ministry, making his encounter with the risen Christ exceptional and, in a sense, "premature" compared to the other apostles.

(1×) An untimely or abnormal birth, often a miscarriage or premature delivery. In 1 Corinthians 15:8, Paul applies the term to himself metaphorically, acknowledging that his apostolic commission came unexpectedly and outside the usual sequence. He was not a disciple during Jesus' ministry but encountered the risen Lord later, in a manner that felt anomalous—hence the vivid, somewhat startling self-description. BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: untimely-born | es: nacido-fuera-de-tiempo | fr: avorton | de: Fehlgeburt 1Cor 15:8

ἐκφέρω G1627 V-PPA-NFS (8×)

To carry out, bring forth — physical removal from a place, or agricultural production of vegetation

The compound verb ἐκφέρω (ἐκ + φέρω, 'carry out') covers the act of physically bringing or carrying something out of an enclosed space. In the starkest NT usage, it appears three times in Acts 5 for carrying out the dead bodies of Ananias and Sapphira — a detail the early church would not soon forget. Beyond funerary contexts, Jesus leads the blind man 'out' of the village (Mark 8:23) and orders the best robe 'brought out' for the prodigal son (Luke 15:22). A single agricultural occurrence in Hebrews 6:8 extends the word to land 'producing' thorns and thistles, where Spanish 'que produce' and Arabic 'mukhrijatan' shift from movement vocabulary to productive yield.

1. carry out, bring out (physically) (7×) To physically carry or bring someone or something out of a place, especially to carry out a corpse for burial. The funerary connotation, well attested in classical Greek from Homer onward, dominates Acts 5:6, 5:9, and 5:10, where the young men carry out the bodies of Ananias and Sapphira. In Mark 8:23 Jesus leads the blind man out of the village, and in Luke 15:22 the father commands servants to bring out the best robe. Spanish distinguishes 'sacar' (take out) from 'llevar' (carry), while Arabic uses 'akhraja' (أخرج, to bring out), all confirming directional physical movement from interior to exterior. GOING OUT AND FORTH

en: bring-out, having-carried-out, he-brought-out | es: habiendo-sacado, llevó, sacad | fr: emporter | de: hervorbringen, ἐκφέρειν, ἐξενέγκαντες Mark 8:23; Luke 15:22; Acts 5:6; Acts 5:9; Acts 5:10

2. produce, bring forth (vegetation/fruit) (1×) To produce, bring forth, or yield — used of land or plants generating vegetation. In Hebrews 6:8, land that 'produces' (ἐκφέρουσα) thorns and thistles is contrasted with land that bears useful crops. The metaphor extends ἐκφέρω from literal carrying-out to agricultural productivity. Spanish 'que produce' and German 'hervorbringen' (bring forth) both shift from movement verbs to production vocabulary, marking this as a recognizable metaphorical extension of the root 'carry out' into 'bring forth as yield.' BIRTH AND BEGETTING

en: producing | es: que-produce | fr: emporter | de: hervorbringen Heb 6:8

ἐκ-φεύγω G1628 V-ASA-3P (8×)

To flee, escape — evading danger, divine judgment, or physical captivity

The verb ἐκφεύγω (ἐκ + φεύγω, 'flee out') denotes successful escape, whether from divine wrath, spiritual peril, or physical captivity. Paul warns the self-righteous that they will not 'escape' God's judgment (Rom 2:3), and the writer of Hebrews asks how anyone can escape who neglects so great a salvation (Heb 2:3). On the physical side, Paul himself escaped Damascus by being lowered in a basket through the wall (2 Cor 11:33), and the demoniac's overpowering of the sons of Sceva left them fleeing naked and wounded (Acts 19:16). Both senses share the core idea of getting out from under a threatening force.

1. escape, avoid (judgment or danger) (5×) To escape or avoid divine judgment, punishment, or impending danger in a theological or moral sense. The threat is abstract — God's wrath, the coming tribulation, or the consequences of neglecting salvation — rather than a physical captor. Paul asks 'do you suppose you will escape the judgment of God?' (Rom 2:3), and Jesus urges prayer 'that you may have strength to escape' the end-times distress (Luke 21:36). Spanish 'escapar' and French 'fuir' both appear, but the multilingual glosses consistently pair with judgment vocabulary rather than spatial flight language. FLEEING AND ESCAPING

en: escaped, they-will-escape, to-escape | es: escaparemos, escaparon, escaparán | fr: fuir | de: entfliehen, ἐκφυγεῖν Luke 21:36; Rom 2:3; 1Thess 5:3; Heb 2:3; Heb 12:25

2. flee, escape physically (3×) To flee or escape from a physical location, captor, or assailant — bodily flight rather than avoidance of abstract consequences. Paul's dramatic nighttime escape from Damascus in a basket through a window (2 Cor 11:33), the jailer fearing prisoners had 'escaped' (Acts 16:27), and the naked flight of the beaten exorcists from the demoniac (Acts 19:16) all illustrate concrete, visible escape. Spanish 'huir/haber huido' (to flee / to have fled) and German 'entfliehen' confirm the physical-flight nuance distinct from the theological escape-from-judgment sense. FLEEING AND ESCAPING

en: I-escaped, to-flee, to-have-escaped | es: escapé, haber-huido, huyeran | fr: fuir | de: entfliehen, ἐκπεφευγέναι, ἐκφυγεῖν Acts 16:27; Acts 19:16; 2Cor 11:33

ἐκφοβ-έω G1629 V-PNA (1×)

to terrify, frighten, intimidate; to cause great fear or alarm

This verb means to frighten or terrify, causing alarm or intimidation. In 2 Corinthians 10:9, Paul says he does not want to seem to be "terrifying" the Corinthians by his letters. His letters are strong, and he wants to be clear he's not trying to use fear as a weapon. The verb conveys causing fear or alarm, sometimes deliberately. The multilingual glosses (aterrorizar, effrayer, erschrecken) all emphasize the production of fear or fright.

(1×) To frighten or terrify, causing fear or alarm in someone. In 2 Corinthians 10:9, Paul denies that he aims to terrify the Corinthians with his letters, despite their weighty tone. He wants to correct, not intimidate. The verb captures the potential emotional impact of his strong words—they could frighten—but he insists his intent is pastoral, not to cow them into submission through fear. TERROR AND AGITATION

en: to-terrify | es: aterrorizar | fr: effrayer | de: erschrecken 2Cor 10:9

ἔκφοβ-ος G1630 Adj-NMS (2×)
terrified, frightened, filled with fear
This adjective means terrified or greatly frightened. Mark 9:6 uses it to describe Peter's fear at the Transfiguration, and Hebrews 12:21 applies it to Moses' terrified reaction at Sinai. The word emphasizes being thrown into a state of fear, often by divine manifestations. The prefix 'ek-' intensifies the basic idea of fear, suggesting being beside oneself with fright.

(2×) Describing intense fear in the face of divine manifestation, this sense appears in contexts of theophany. Mark 9:6 explains Peter's confused speech at the Transfiguration resulted from terror, while Hebrews 12:21 recalls Moses' extreme fear at Sinai's revelation. Both instances show human fear before divine glory, emphasizing overwhelming awe and fright. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: Terrified, terrified | es: Aterrorizado, atemorizados | fr: effrayé | de: erschrocken Mark 9:6; Heb 12:21

ἐκφύω G1631 V-PSA-3S (2×)
put forth, sprout, grow out, bring forth
This verb means to put forth, sprout, or bring forth growth. Both occurrences appear in Jesus' parable of the fig tree: Matthew 24:32 and Mark 13:28 speak of the tree putting forth leaves as a sign of approaching summer. The word emphasizes natural emergence and growth. Classical usage included begetting children (for males), bearing (for females), and plants sprouting, with the perfect tense describing the state of having grown.

(2×) Referring to plants putting forth new growth, this sense appears in Jesus' parable about reading the signs of the times. Both Matthew 24:32 and Mark 13:28 describe the fig tree sprouting tender branches and leaves, signaling summer's approach. The natural cycle becomes an illustration of recognizing significant moments through observable signs of emergence. SPROUTING AND GROWING en: puts-forth, sprouts | es: brote | fr: pousser | de: ἐκφύῃ Matt 24:32; Mark 13:28

ἐκχέω G1632 V-FIP-3S (27×)
Pour out, shed — to pour forth liquid, blood, or Spirit; figuratively to abandon oneself recklessly
The verb ekcheo carries the visceral image of liquid leaving its container, and the New Testament stretches it across a dramatic range. Wine bursts from old wineskins (Matt 9:17; Luke 5:37), covenant blood is 'poured out for many' (Matt 26:28; Mark 14:24), and at Pentecost God pours out the Holy Spirit on all flesh (Acts 2:17-18, 33). The same root appears in Revelation's bowl judgments, where angels pour out God's wrath. Spanish uniformly renders derramar, while French distinguishes repandre (pour out) from se precipiter (rush headlong) in the figurative use at Jude 1:11.

1. pour out liquid or Spirit (22×) The broadest and most frequent sense: to pour out a liquid substance, or metaphorically to pour out the Holy Spirit, wrath, or divine blessing. Jesus speaks of new wine poured out when wineskins burst (Matt 9:17; Luke 5:37), and covenant blood is 'poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins' (Matt 26:28). At Pentecost, Peter quotes Joel: God 'will pour out my Spirit on all flesh' (Acts 2:17). Spanish derramar and German ausgiessen hold steady across both literal and metaphorical uses, confirming one cohesive semantic core. POURING AND SHEDDING en: I-will-pour-out, being-poured-out, has-been-poured-out | es: derramada, derramaré, derramó | fr: répandre | de: ausgiessen, gießt-aus Matt 9:17; Matt 23:35; Matt 26:28; Mark 14:24; Luke 5:37

2. shed blood (4×) To shed blood — a specialized application of pouring out that foregrounds violent death or martyrdom. Luke 11:50 warns that 'the blood of all the prophets shed from the foundation of the world' will be required, Acts 22:20 recalls the blood of Stephen being shed, and Revelation 16:6 justifies God's judgment because oppressors 'shed the blood of saints.' The consistent gloss derramada in Spanish and the passives being-poured-out / having-been-shed in English confirm a distinct forensic coloring centered on culpable violence. POURING AND SHEDDING en: having-been-shed, they-poured-out, was-being-shed | es: derramada, derramaron, era-derramada | fr: répandre | de: ausgiessen, gießt-aus Luke 11:50; Acts 1:18; Acts 22:20; Rev 16:6

3. abandon oneself to (1×) A rare figurative extension: to abandon oneself recklessly, to rush headlong. Appearing only at Jude 1:11, where false teachers 'poured themselves out' into Balaam's error for profit. French se-precipiterent ('they rushed headlong') and German ergossen-sie-sich ('they poured themselves out') capture the self-abandoning reflexive nuance that sets this apart from the transitive pouring of liquid or blood. POURING AND SHEDDING en: they-poured-out | es: se-derramaron | fr: se-précipitèrent, | de: ergossen-sie-sich Jude 1:11

ἐκχωρ-έω G1633 V-PMA-3P (1×)
to depart, withdraw, leave; to go out from a place or situation
This verb means to depart or withdraw from a place. In Luke 21:21, Jesus warns those in Judea to flee to the mountains, and those in the city to "depart" when they see Jerusalem surrounded. The verb emphasizes leaving, getting out, evacuating. Classical usage includes emigrating or retiring from a place. The multilingual glosses (salgan, sortir) capture the sense of exiting or going out, underscoring the urgency of escape in Jesus' apocalyptic warning.

(1×) To depart or withdraw from a place, often in the sense of evacuating or fleeing. In Luke 21:21, Jesus commands those in the city to depart when they see the signs of impending judgment on Jerusalem. The imperative conveys urgency: don't stay, get out. The verb fits the context of eschatological warning, where heeding the call to leave could mean the difference between life and death. GOING OUT AND FORTH
en: let-them-depart | es: salgan | fr: sortir | de: ἐκχωρείτωσαν Luke 21:21

ἐκψύχω G1634 V-AIA-3S (3×)
to breathe out one's soul, expire, die suddenly; emphatic term for sudden or dramatic death
The verb ἐκψύχω (ἐκ + ψύχω 'cool,' related to ψυχή 'soul/breath') means to lose consciousness, faint, or expire—with connotations of breath/soul leaving the body. Acts uses it for sudden, dramatic deaths: Ananias and Sapphira struck down for lying to the Holy Spirit, and Herod Agrippa eaten by worms in divine judgment. The word suggests not peaceful passing but abrupt, often violent cessation of life—the soul/breath suddenly extracted.

(3×) Acts 5:5 records Ananias's death: 'When Ananias heard these words, he fell down and breathed his last.' Verse 5:10 describes Sapphira's identical fate: 'immediately she fell down at his feet and breathed her last.' Acts 12:23 narrates Herod's gruesome end: 'immediately an angel of the Lord struck him down, because he did not give God the glory, and he was eaten by worms and breathed his last.' The Spanish (expiró) and French (rendre-l'âme 'render the soul') and German (ἐξέψυξεν) capture the soul-expiring sense. In each case divine judgment brings instant death—God's prerogative to remove breath/life as swiftly as he grants it. The verb's intensity suits narratives of sudden mortality under divine decree. DEATH AND DYING
en: breathed-her-last, he-breathed-his-last, he-expired | es: expiró | fr: rendre-l'âme | de: ἐξέψυξεν Acts 5:5; Acts 5:10; Acts 12:23

ἑκών G1635 Adj-NMS (2×)
willingly, voluntarily, of one's own accord
This adverb means willingly or of one's own free will, emphasizing voluntary choice. Romans 8:20 uses it in describing creation's subjection to futility not willingly but by God's will, and 1 Corinthians 9:17 contrasts willing and unwilling service. The word stresses intentional, free choice rather than compulsion. Classical usage distinguished voluntary from involuntary acts, a fundamental ethical and legal distinction.

(2×) Emphasizing voluntary action versus compulsion, this adverb highlights the element of free choice. Romans 8:20 contrasts creation's unwilling subjection with God's sovereign purpose, while 1 Corinthians 9:17 distinguishes Paul's willing stewardship from compelled service. The multilingual evidence ('voluntariamente', 'freiwillig', 'volontairement') consistently emphasizes the free-will dimension. FREEWILL OFFERING

en: willingly | es: voluntariamente | fr: volontairement | de: freiwillig Rom 8:20; 1Cor 9:17

ἐλαία G1636 N-AFP (15×)

Olive tree: as a toponym in 'Mount of Olives'; the living plant used in Paul's allegory; the olive fruit itself.

The Greek noun elaia names the olive in all its forms — tree, grove, and fruit — and in the New Testament it appears overwhelmingly as part of the place name 'Mount of Olives' (to Oros ton Elaion). Eleven of its fifteen occurrences fix this landmark into the Gospel narrative: Jesus teaches his disciples there overlooking Jerusalem (Matt 24:3; Mark 13:3), retreats there on the night of his arrest (Matt 26:30; Luke 22:39), and ascends from its summit (Acts 1:12). Spanish Olivos, French Oliviers, and German Olberg all preserve the tree in the toponym. Beyond geography, Paul transforms the olive tree into one of the New Testament's most sustained botanical metaphors: the cultivated olive represents Israel, wild branches represent Gentile believers grafted in 'contrary to nature' (Rom 11:17, 24), and the root that sustains both is God's covenant faithfulness. Revelation 11:4 identifies the two witnesses as 'two olive trees,' echoing Zechariah's lampstand vision. Finally, James 3:12 isolates the fruit: 'Can a fig tree produce olives?' — a rhetorical appeal to the natural order that each tree bears its own kind.

1. olive tree (toponym: Mount of Olives) (11×) The olive tree as a toponym — the fixed geographical name 'Mount of Olives' (to Oros ton Elaion), always in the genitive plural. Eleven occurrences anchor this landmark in the Passion narrative and Jesus' eschatological discourse: he sits on the Mount of Olives opposite the Temple (Matt 24:3; Mark 13:3), withdraws there after the Last Supper (Matt 26:30; Mark 14:26; Luke 22:39), and ascends from 'the mount called Olivet' (Acts 1:12). Spanish Monte de los Olivos, French Mont des Oliviers, and German Olberg all encode the tree into the place name. The mount's significance is both geographical — it overlooks the Temple from the east — and prophetic, echoing Zechariah 14:4 where the LORD's feet stand on the Mount of Olives. OLIVE TREES

en: Olives, of-Olives, olives | es: Olivos, de-los-Olivos | fr: olivier | de: Oelbaum, Ölberg Matt 21:1; Matt 24:3; Matt 26:30; Mark 11:1; Mark 13:3

2. olive tree (the plant itself) (3×) The olive tree as a living plant, used literally or as a sustained metaphor. In Romans 11:17, 24, Paul develops the most elaborate botanical allegory in the New Testament: the cultivated olive (kallielaia) represents Israel, and wild olive branches (agrielaia) represent Gentile believers grafted in to share 'the rich root of the olive tree.' The metaphor insists on organic continuity between Israel and the Church. In Revelation 11:4, the two witnesses are identified as 'the two olive trees standing before the Lord of the earth,' recalling Zechariah 4:3, 11-14. Spanish olivo, French olivier, and German Olbaum render the living tree, while Hindi जैतून का पेड़ specifies 'olive's tree' to distinguish plant from fruit. OLIVE TREES

en: olive-tree, olive-trees | es: olivo, olivos | fr: olivier | de: Oelbaum Rom 11:17; Rom 11:24; Rev 11:4

3. olive (the fruit) (1×) The olive as fruit — the edible product harvested from the tree. A single New Testament occurrence in James 3:12 isolates this sense: 'Can a fig tree, my brothers, bear olives (elaias)? Or a grapevine produce figs?' The rhetorical question appeals to the natural-kinds principle — each plant bears fruit according to its nature — to argue that the tongue cannot produce both blessing and cursing. Spanish aceitunas and French olives shift to dedicated fruit vocabulary distinct from the tree name, while German Oliven serves for both. The agricultural concreteness of the image — harvesting olives from trees — would have been immediately vivid to James' Mediterranean audience. OLIVE TREES

en: olives | es: aceitunas | fr: olivier | de: Oelbaum Jas 3:12

ἔλαιον G1637 N-GNS (11×)

Olive oil — pressed oil from olives, used for anointing, lamps, healing, and trade

The noun ἔλαιον (elaion) denotes olive oil, the essential oil of the ancient Mediterranean. In the parable of the ten virgins, five foolish ones lack oil for their lamps (Matt 25:3-4, 8). Jesus notes that Simon 'did not anoint my head with oil' (Luke 7:46). The Twelve anoint the sick with oil (Mark 6:13), and James instructs elders to do the same (Jas 5:14). The Good Samaritan pours oil and wine on wounds (Luke 10:34). In Revelation, oil is a protected commodity (Rev 6:6) and a luxury of Babylon (Rev 18:13). Spanish 'aceite' and French 'huile' both derive from olive-oil tradition.

olive oil (11×) Olive oil as a physical substance used for lamps, anointing, healing, and commerce. Lamp fuel in the ten virgins parable (Matt 25:3-4, 8). Anointing the head as hospitality (Luke 7:46). Healing anointing of the sick (Mark 6:13; Jas 5:14). First aid poured on wounds (Luke 10:34). Trade commodity protected from scarcity (Rev 6:6) and listed among Babylon's imports (Rev 18:13). Figurative 'oil of gladness' denoting divine favor (Heb 1:9). Spanish 'aceite' and Arabic 'zayt' confirm a single referent. OLIVE OIL

en: of-oil, oil, with-oil | es: aceite, con-aceite, de-aceite | fr: huile | de: Oel, Öl Matt 25:3; Matt 25:4; Matt 25:8; Mark 6:13; Luke 7:46

ἐλαι-ών G1638 N-GMS (1×)

olive grove, olive orchard; specifically, the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem

This noun means an olive grove or orchard, and in the New Testament specifically refers to the Mount of Olives, the ridge east of Jerusalem. In Acts 1:12, the disciples return to Jerusalem from "the mount called Olivet" after Jesus' ascension. The location was significant in Jesus' ministry—He taught there, prayed in Gethsemane on its slope, and ascended from its summit. The name preserves the agricultural character of the site, a hillside planted with olive trees.

(1×) The Mount of Olives (Olivet), the prominent ridge east of Jerusalem covered with olive groves. In Acts 1:12, it's the site of Jesus' ascension. The mount figured prominently in Jesus' final week: He wept over Jerusalem from its slope, taught His disciples there, and prayed in Gethsemane at its foot. The name evokes both the sacred geography and the agricultural landscape of ancient Judea. OLIVE TREES

en: of-Olives | es: de-los-Olivos | fr: éloge | de: Ἐλαιῶνος Acts 1:12

Ἐλαμείτης G1639 N-NMP (1×)

Elamites; inhabitants of Elam, a region east of Mesopotamia (modern southwestern Iran)

This ethnic designation refers to the Elamites, people from Elam, an ancient kingdom east of Babylon in what is now southwestern Iran. In Acts 2:9, Elamites are among the Jewish pilgrims in Jerusalem at Pentecost who hear the apostles speaking in tongues. Their presence underscores the widespread Jewish diaspora and the international scope of Pentecost's miracle. Elam was a significant ancient civilization, and Jewish communities had existed there since the Babylonian exile.

(1×) Inhabitants of Elam, an ancient region east of Mesopotamia. In Acts 2:9, Elamites are among the diverse crowd at Pentecost, representing the far-flung Jewish diaspora. Their inclusion in Luke's list highlights how Jews from the eastern frontier of the known world witnessed the Spirit's outpouring. The multilingual miracle enabled even these distant pilgrims to hear the gospel in their native tongue. ELAM NATION REGION

en: Elamitai | es: Elamîtai | fr: Élamite | de: Ἐλαμῖται Acts 2:9

ἐλάσσ-ων G1640 Adj-AMS-C (4×)

smaller, lesser, inferior; younger or lower in status or degree

The comparative form of μικρός (by way of ἐλαχύς), this adjective conveys 'less' across multiple dimensions—size, age, rank, or quality. At the wedding in Cana, the steward notes that the inferior wine normally comes last (John 2:10). Paul quotes the oracle about Jacob and Esau: 'the elder shall serve the younger' (Rom 9:12). The 'undeniably lesser is blessed by the greater' principle governs the Melchizedek argument in Hebrews 7:7. French 'moindre' and 'plus petit' helpfully distinguish degree from size.

(4×) Smaller, lesser, or inferior in degree, rank, age, or quality. This comparative adjective flexes across contexts: John 2:10 contrasts wine quality (lesser vs. good); Rom 9:12 distinguishes the younger/lesser son in the Jacob-Esau narrative; 1 Tim 5:9 sets a minimum age threshold (not less than sixty); Heb 7:7 establishes a hierarchical principle where the lesser receives blessing from the greater. Spanish uses 'menor' (younger/lesser) and 'inferior,' reflecting the dual age-rank semantic range. SMALLNESS AND LEAST en: less-than, lesser | es: inferior, menor, menos-de | fr: moindre, plus-petit | de: kleiner John 2:10; Rom 9:12; 1Tim 5:9; Heb 7:7

ἐλαττον-έω G1641 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to have less, lack; to receive or possess a smaller amount

This verb means to have less, to lack, or to fall short in quantity. In 2 Corinthians 8:15, Paul quotes Exodus 16:18 about the manna: "Whoever gathered much had nothing left over, and whoever gathered little had no lack." The verb describes the miracle of sufficiency—those who gathered less did not find themselves lacking. The principle illustrates the equality and mutual care Paul urges in Christian giving: resources shared so that no one is left wanting.

(1×) To have less or lack, to be deficient in amount. In 2 Corinthians 8:15, citing the manna story, Paul notes that those who gathered little "had no lack"—they were not disadvantaged. The verb highlights the divine provision that ensured sufficiency for all. Paul applies this to Christian generosity: when believers share, inequality is leveled, and no one suffers need while others have surplus. LACK AND DEFICIENCY en: had-lack | es: tuvo-menos | fr: manquer | de: geringer-machen 2Cor 8:15

ἐλασσ-όω G1642 V-PNM/P (3×)

to make less, diminish, decrease; reduction in size, status, or prominence

The verb ἐλασσόω (from ἐλάσσων 'less') means to make smaller, reduce, or diminish. Biblical usage spans from the voluntary decrease of John the Baptist's prominence to the temporary humbling of Christ below angels in the incarnation. The word denotes not accidental loss but purposeful or decreed reduction—making something or someone less than they were or could be, whether through self-effacement or divine appointment.

(3×) John 3:30 contains John the Baptist's famous statement of mission: 'He must increase, but I must decrease'—the forerunner deliberately yielding prominence to the Christ. Hebrews 2:7 and 2:9 both quote Psalm 8, applying it to Jesus: 'You made him for a little while lower than the angels' (2:7), 'But we see him who for a little while was made lower than the angels, namely Jesus' (2:9). The Spanish (hecho-menor, hiciste-menor, menguar) and French (diminuer) and German (geringer-werden 'become less') all capture the diminishing sense. The theology is profound: John voluntarily decreases as part of God's plan; Jesus is temporarily made less than angels as part of redemptive humiliation before exaltation. Decrease can be obedience or incarnational necessity. DECREASE DIMINISH

en: having-been-made-lower, to-decrease, you-made-lower | es: hecho-menor, hiciste-menor, menguar | fr: diminuer, geringer-werden | de: geringer-werden John 3:30; Heb 2:7; Heb 2:9

ἐλαύνω G1643 V-IIM/P-3S (5×)

To drive, propel, or row; of wind or force driving boats, people, or objects forward.

A versatile verb of forceful motion—driving, rowing, or propelling—used in both nautical and figurative contexts. The disciples strain at rowing against a headwind (Mark 6:48; John 6:19), a demoniac is driven by the unclean spirit into desolate places (Luke 8:29), ships are steered by their pilots (Jas 3:4), and false teachers are likened to waterless clouds 'driven along' by winds (2 Pet 2:17). Spanish 'impulsado' and French 'pousser' highlight the external force that propels the subject.

(5×) To drive forward, propel, or row—whether by human effort, wind, or spiritual force. In Mark 6:48 and John 6:19, the disciples row laboriously across the sea. Luke 8:29 describes a demoniac driven by an unclean spirit into wilderness. James 3:4 pictures ships driven by fierce winds yet steered by a small rudder. 2 Peter 2:17 compares false teachers to mists 'driven by a storm.' The multilingual glosses—Spanish 'impulsado,' French 'pousser,' German 'treiben'—all emphasize external compulsion and forceful forward motion. SPROUTING AND GROWING en: being-driven, having-rowed, he-was-driven | es: era-impulsado, habiendo-remado, impulsadas | fr: pousser | de: treiben, ἠλαύνετο Mark 6:48; Luke 8:29; John 6:19; Jas 3:4; 2Pet 2:17

ἐλαφρ-ία G1644 N-DFS (1×)

lightness, levity; fickleness or lack of seriousness in judgment or commitment

This noun can mean physical lightness or, metaphorically, levity or fickleness. In 2 Corinthians 1:17, Paul defends himself against the charge of acting with "lightness"—making plans carelessly or capriciously. He asks rhetorically if he made his plans according to the flesh, showing fickleness (saying "Yes, yes" and "No, no" at the same time). The term implies lack of seriousness or reliability. Classical usage includes lightness of weight or, in a moral sense, frivolity.

(1×) Levity or fickleness, indicating lack of seriousness or reliability in decisions. In 2 Corinthians 1:17, Paul denies acting with lightness when he changed his travel plans. He wasn't being capricious or insincere, making promises lightly without regard to following through. The noun captures the accusation he faces: that he's unreliable, prone to saying one thing and doing another—a charge he firmly refutes. FOOLISHNESS AND FOLLY

en: lightness | es: ligereza | fr: légèreté | de: Leichtfertigkeit 2Cor 1:17

ἐλαφρ-ός G1645 Adj-NNS (2×)

light, not heavy, easy to bear

This adjective means light in weight or easy to bear. Jesus uses it in Matthew 11:30 declaring his burden light, and Paul applies it in 2 Corinthians 4:17 to describe present affliction as 'light' compared to eternal glory. The word contrasts with 'heavy' or 'burdensome.' Classical usage ranged from literal physical lightness to metaphorical ease. Ancient epitaphs used it in the phrase 'may the earth lie lightly on you.'

(2×) Describing what is easy to bear rather than burdensome, this sense contrasts with heavy loads. Matthew 11:30 offers Jesus' light burden against religious legalism's heavy demands, while 2 Corinthians 4:17 relativizes present suffering as momentary and light compared to eternal weight of glory. The word emphasizes bearable, manageable character rather than oppressive weight. SPEED AND QUICKNESS

en: light | es: leve, ligera | fr: léger | de: ἐλαφρόν, ἐλαφρὸν Matt 11:30; 2Cor 4:17

ἐλάχιστ-ος G1646 Adj-DNS-S (13×)

least, smallest, very small — superlative adjective indicating the lowest degree in size, rank, or importance

Elachistos is the superlative of elachys ('small'), functioning as the opposite of megistos ('greatest'). Across its 13 New Testament occurrences, it describes the smallest or least significant in various dimensions: rank in the kingdom (Matt 5:19, 11:11, Luke 7:28), apparent insignificance of a place (Matt 2:6 'Bethlehem, by no means least'), the seemingly trivial matters of daily life (Luke 12:26, 16:10, 19:17), and the overlooked members of the human family (Matt 25:40, 45 'the least of these my brothers'). Jesus characteristically inverts the expected hierarchy, declaring that faithfulness in the least reveals fitness for the greatest. Spanish 'lo minimo,' French 'le plus petit,' German 'geringster' all capture the superlative force.

least, smallest, very small (13×) The superlative adjective meaning 'least, smallest, most insignificant,' applied to rank, importance, size, or amount. In Jesus' teaching it often carries a paradoxical edge: the one called 'least in the kingdom' (Matt 5:19), faithfulness 'in a very little thing' qualifying for greater trust (Luke 16:10, 19:17), and 'the least of these my brothers' as the surprising locus of encounter with Christ (Matt 25:40, 45). Also used of Bethlehem's apparent insignificance (Matt 2:6) and of matters too small to worry about (Luke 12:26). Multilingual glosses — 'lo mínimo,' 'le plus petit,' 'geringster' — consistently render the superlative sense. SMALLNESS AND LEAST

en: a-very-small, least, smallest | es: la-más-pequeña, lo-mínimo, muy-pequeño | fr: le-plus-petit | de: geringster, ἐλάχιστος, ἐλάχιστόν Matt 2:6; Matt 5:19; Matt 25:40; Matt 25:45

ἐλᾰχιστ-ος G1647 Adj-DMS-C (1×)

least, smallest, most insignificant; comparative/superlative form denoting minimal degree or status

This is the superlative form meaning "least" or "smallest," often used to indicate minimal significance or status. In Ephesians 3:8, Paul calls himself "the very least of all the saints"—a self-effacing description highlighting his humility. The comparative form here intensifies the superlative: less than the least. The term can describe size, time, number, or importance. Paul's use underscores the grace shown him: though least qualified, he received the privilege of proclaiming the gospel to the Gentiles.

(1×) Least, smallest, most insignificant, often referring to status or worthiness. In Ephesians 3:8, Paul describes himself as less than the least of all saints—a double comparative emphasizing his profound sense of unworthiness. Despite being the least qualified, he was entrusted with the mystery of Christ for the Gentiles. The term expresses humility but also magnifies God's grace in using the insignificant. SMALLNESS AND LEAST

en: least | es: más-pequeño | fr: ἐλαχιστοτέρῳ | de: geringster Eph 3:8

Ἐλεάζαρ G1648 N-AMS (2×)

Eleazar, ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy

The Greek form of the Hebrew name meaning 'God has helped,' referring to an ancestor of Jesus. Eleazar appears twice in Matthew 1:15, listed in the post-exilic portion of the genealogy. Little is known of this individual beyond his place in the lineage. The name was common in post-exilic Judaism, borne by several priests and leaders including Aaron's son.

(2×) Referring to a post-exilic ancestor in Jesus' genealogy, this proper name appears twice in Matthew 1:15 as the genealogy traces the line from Babylonian exile to Joseph. The repetition reflects Matthew's formulaic 'A begot B' pattern. The transliterations vary across languages (Eleasar in German, Éléazar in French) as they render the Hebrew original through Greek. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Eleazar | es: Eleázar | fr: Éléazar | de: Eleasar Matt 1:15

ἔλεγξις G1649 N-AFS (1×)

rebuke, reproof, conviction; the act of reproving or exposing wrongdoing

This noun means rebuke, reproof, or conviction—the act of exposing and correcting wrongdoing. In 2 Peter 2:16, Balaam received "rebuke for his wrongdoing" when his donkey spoke. The term can mean refutation in argument or moral correction. Here it refers to the extraordinary rebuke that stopped Balaam's madness. The noun captures both the act of reproving and the conviction or exposure of sin that results.

(1×) Rebuke or reproof, the act of exposing and correcting wrongdoing. In 2 Peter 2:16, Balaam received rebuke for his transgression when his donkey miraculously spoke, restraining his folly. The noun emphasizes the corrective function: the rebuke was meant to stop him from pursuing sin. The incident becomes a paradigm of how God intervenes to convict and restrain those who persist in wrongdoing. REPROOF REBUKE ARGUMENT

en: rebuke | es: reprensión | fr: ἔλεγξιν | de: Zurechtweisung 2Pet 2:16

ἔλεγχος G1650 N-NMS (2×)

proof, evidence, conviction, demonstration

This noun means proof, evidence, or refutation. 2 Timothy 3:16 lists it among Scripture's uses—teaching, reproof, correction, training—while Hebrews 11:1 defines faith as 'the conviction of things not seen.' The word's classical sense included cross-examination and testing for refutation. New Testament usage emphasizes both corrective reproof and demonstrative evidence, the proving of reality.

(2×) Referring to proof or evidence that establishes reality, this sense appears in two distinct contexts. 2 Timothy 3:16 includes reproof among Scripture's functions for correcting error, while Hebrews 11:1 uses it of faith's conviction that unseen realities exist. The German 'Beweis' (proof) captures the evidential dimension: reproof proves error, faith proves invisible truths. TESTING AND PROVING en: evidence, reproof | es: prueba, reprensión | fr: Beweis | de: Beweis 2Tim 3:16; Heb 11:1

ἐλέγχω G1651 V-PPM/P-NNP (18×)

To reprove, convict of wrongdoing, or expose what is hidden — verbal correction that brings truth to light

A word of moral and judicial force, elegcho carries the sense of confrontation that aims at restoration. In the Gospels, Jesus instructs believers to reprove a sinning brother privately (Matt 18:15), while John's Gospel reveals the Spirit's work of convicting the world of sin (John 16:8). The word can also mean to expose hidden deeds, as in Eph 5:11-13, where light itself becomes the agent of revelation. Spanish 'convencer' and French 'convaincre' capture the forensic dimension, while 'reprendre' reflects the corrective impulse. Across all three senses runs a thread of truth brought to bear on falsehood.

1. reprove, rebuke (10×) To verbally correct or admonish someone with the goal of bringing about repentance. Jesus commands this kind of direct reproof in Matt 18:15, and Paul urges Timothy to 'reprove, rebuke, exhort' (2 Tim 4:2). The Spanish 'reprende' and French 'reprendre' both foreground this corrective dimension. The aim is always restorative, not punitive. REPROOF AND REBUKE

en: I-reprove, being-reproved, expose | es: refutar, reprende, reprended | fr: reprendre | de: ueberführen, ἐλεγχόμενος, ἔλεγξον Matt 18:15; Luke 3:19; Eph 5:11; 1Tim 5:20; 2Tim 4:2

2. convict of guilt (6×) To bring someone to an inner awareness of guilt or wrongdoing, often with judicial overtones. In John 16:8 the Holy Spirit convicts the world concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment. Paul envisions the unbeliever entering worship and being convicted by prophetic speech (1 Cor 14:24). The Spanish 'convencer' and German 'ueberführen' capture this forensic sense of proving guilt before the conscience. REPROOF AND REBUKE

en: being-convicted, convicts, he-is-convicted | es: convence, convencer, convencerá | fr: convaincre, reprendre | de: ueberführen, zu-überführen John 8:9; John 8:46; John 16:8; 1Cor 14:24; Jas 2:9

3. expose, bring to light (2×) To make manifest what has been concealed, bringing hidden deeds into the open. John 3:20 explains that evildoers avoid the light lest their works be exposed, while Eph 5:13 declares that everything exposed by light becomes visible. This sense extends the word's meaning from personal rebuke to cosmic revelation — darkness itself is unmasked. REPROOF AND REBUKE

en: be-exposed, being-exposed | es: reprendidas, sean-expuestas | fr: reprendre | de: ueberführen John 3:20; Eph 5:13

ἐλεεινός G1652 Adj-NMS (2×)

pitiable, miserable, deserving pity, wretched

This adjective means pitiable or miserable, describing someone deserving pity. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 15:19 declaring Christians most pitiable if Christ is not raised, and Revelation 3:17 applies it to the Laodicean church's self-deluded wretchedness. The word emphasizes the pathetic state of those deserving compassion. Classical usage included both 'piteous' (evoking pity in others) and 'pitiful' (being in a miserable state).

(2×) Describing a pitiable or wretched state deserving compassion, this sense emphasizes misery. 1 Corinthians 15:19 argues Christians would be most pitiable if resurrection hope proved false, while Revelation 3:17 exposes Laodicea's self-deluded wretchedness despite thinking themselves rich. Both contexts stress the pathetic condition of those without true hope or perception. MERCY AND COMPASSION

en: more-pitiable, pitiful | es: digno-de-lástima, más-dignos-de-lástima | fr: misérable, pitoyable | de: erbarmungswuerdig 1Cor 15:19; Rev 3:17

ἐλε-έω G1653 V-PPA-NMS (32×)

To have mercy, show compassion; in passive, to receive or be shown mercy.

One of the New Testament's central mercy words, spanning the cry of the desperate ('Have mercy on me, Son of David!' — Matt 9:27) to the theological declaration that God's mercy underlies all salvation history (Rom 11:30-32). The active voice captures the outpouring of compassion from one who has power to help; the passive captures the posture of the recipient who has been acted upon by divine grace. German 'erbarmen' and Spanish 'misericordia' both preserve the visceral quality of the Greek — mercy that arises from the depths of feeling, not mere leniency. Paul's repeated use of the passive in Romans 9-11 makes this verb a hinge of his argument about Israel and the Gentiles.

1. show mercy or compassion (23×) Active exercise of mercy or compassion — the subject extends pity toward another. Dominates the Synoptic healing narratives where sufferers cry 'Have mercy on me!' (Matt 15:22; 17:15), and in Jesus's parable where the king forgives the servant's debt (Matt 18:33). Spanish 'Ten-misericordia-de' and German 'erbarmt-sich' both render this as reflexive or heartfelt compassion, not cold pardon. Also used of God's sovereign choice to show mercy (Rom 9:15-16). MERCY AND COMPASSION

en: Have-mercy, Have-mercy-on, I-have-mercy | es: Ten-misericordia-de, Ten-dré-misericordia-de, ten-misericordia-de | fr: avoir-pitié, ayez-pitié, ayez-pitié, | de: erbarmen, erbarmet-euch, erbarmt-sich Matt 9:27; Matt 15:22; Matt 17:15; Matt 18:33

2. be shown mercy (9×) Passive reception of mercy — the subject is the one shown compassion. Theologically dense in Paul's letters: 'you who once were not shown mercy have now received mercy' (Rom 11:30; 1 Cor 7:25; 2 Cor 4:1). The Beatitude 'the merciful shall be shown mercy' (Matt 5:7) links both senses in a single verse. Spanish 'fui-compadecido' and 'fuisteis-compadecidos' clearly mark the passive, while French collapses both voices under 'avoir-pitié' — the Greek passive voice thus carries a distinct theological freight about human dependence on divine initiative. MERCY AND COMPASSION

en: I-was-shown-mercy, having-been-shown-mercy, having-received-mercy | es: fui-compadecido, fuisteis-compadecidos, habiendo-recibido-misericordia | fr: avoir-pitié | de: erbarmen, erbarmt-sich Matt 5:7; Rom 11:30; Rom 11:31; 1Cor 7:25; 2Cor 4:1

ἐλε-ημοσύνη G1654 N-NFS (13×)

alms, charitable giving, merciful deed — money or aid given out of compassion for the poor

Eleemosyne derives from eleos ('mercy, pity') and originally meant an act of compassion. By the Hellenistic period, and especially in Jewish and Christian usage, it had narrowed to denote charitable giving to the poor — almsgiving as a concrete expression of mercy. Jesus' teaching in Matthew 6:2-4 defines the word's NT profile: give alms without fanfare, without letting the left hand know what the right is doing. Luke emphasizes its spiritual potency — 'give alms, and all things are clean' (Luke 11:41), 'sell your possessions and give alms' (Luke 12:33). In Acts, Cornelius' prayers and alms rise as a memorial before God (Acts 10:2, 4, 31). Spanish 'limosna,' French 'aumone,' and German 'Almosen' are all ultimately borrowed from this same Greek word.

(13×) Charitable giving to the poor, almsgiving as a tangible expression of mercy. Jesus instructs secret generosity rather than public display (Matt 6:2-4). Luke connects alms with inner purity and eschatological treasure (Luke 11:41, 12:33). In Acts, Tabitha is remembered for her alms (Acts 9:36), and Cornelius' almsgiving is noted approvingly by God (Acts 10:2, 4, 31). The word's etymological root in eleos ('mercy') reveals that giving money to the poor was understood not as mere philanthropy but as an embodied act of divine compassion. The modern English 'alms' descends directly from this Greek term through Old English aelmysse. MERCY AND COMPASSION

en: alms, as-alms, charity | es: como-limosna, limosna, limosnas | fr: aumône | de: Almosen Matt 6:2; Matt 6:3; Matt 6:4; Luke 11:41; Luke 12:33

ἐλε-ήμων G1655 Adj-NMP (2×)

merciful, compassionate, showing mercy

This adjective describes someone who is merciful or compassionate. Jesus uses it in Matthew 5:7 in the Beatitudes—'Blessed are the merciful'—and Hebrews 2:17 applies it to Christ becoming a merciful high priest. The word emphasizes active compassion and readiness to show mercy. Classical and Septuagintal usage often described God's merciful character, making mercy a divine attribute humans are called to reflect.

(2×) Characterizing those who show mercy and compassion, this sense applies both to blessed disciples (Matt 5:7) and to Christ the high priest (Heb 2:17). The Beatitude promises mercy to the merciful, while Hebrews emphasizes Christ's compassionate faithfulness in representing humanity. The consistent translations ('merciful', 'misericordioso', 'miséricordieux', 'barmherzig') reflect the core meaning of active compassion. GRACE AND COMPASSION

en: merciful | es: misericordioso, misericordiosos | fr: miséricordieux | de: barmherzig, ἐλεήμονες Matt 5:7; Heb 2:17

ἔλεος G1656 N-GNS (27×)

mercy, compassion, covenant faithfulness — God's active pity that rescues the helpless and fulfills promises

Eleos is the Greek noun for mercy or compassion, appearing 27 times in the New Testament as one of its richest theological terms. In the Septuagint it regularly translates the Hebrew chesed ('covenant lovingkindness'), and much of its New Testament weight carries that covenantal resonance. Luke's infancy narrative is saturated with it: Mary's Magnificat celebrates that God's eleos extends 'from generation to generation' (Luke 1:50), Zechariah praises the Lord for 'performing mercy with our fathers' (Luke 1:72), and the birth of John signals that God has 'shown great mercy' to Elizabeth (Luke 1:58). Jesus twice quotes Hosea 6:6 — 'I desire mercy and not sacrifice' (Matt 9:13; 12:7) — redefining what God requires. In the epistles, eleos becomes part of the greeting formula 'grace, mercy, and peace' (1 Tim 1:2; 2 Tim 1:2; 2 John 3; Jude 2), and Paul grounds the entire Gentile mission in God's mercy (Rom 9:23; 11:31; 15:9). James insists that 'mercy triumphs over judgment' (Jas 2:13). Hebrews invites believers to the throne of grace to 'receive mercy' (Heb 4:16). Spanish 'misericordia,' French 'misericorde,' and German 'Erbarmen' all reflect its weight.

mercy (27×) Active divine compassion and covenant faithfulness, rooted in the LXX translation of Hebrew chesed. Permeates Luke's infancy hymns as God's age-spanning promise-keeping mercy (Luke 1:50, 54, 58, 72, 78). Jesus invokes it to reorder religious priorities: 'I desire mercy, not sacrifice' (Matt 9:13; 12:7, quoting Hos 6:6). Paul grounds the inclusion of Gentiles in God's mercy (Rom 9:23; 11:31; 15:9), while James declares mercy's triumph over judgment (Jas 2:13). The epistolary formula 'grace, mercy, and peace' (1 Tim 1:2; 2 Tim 1:2; Titus 1:4) weaves it into the fabric of Christian greeting and blessing. MORAL GOODNESS

en: mercy | es: misericordia | fr: miséricorde | de: Erbarmen Matt 9:13; Matt 12:7; Matt 23:23; Luke 1:50; Luke 1:54

ἐλευθ-ερία G1657 N-GFS (11×)

Freedom, liberty — the state of being free, especially from the bondage of sin, law, or corruption

The noun ἐλευθερία (eleutheria) denotes freedom, used primarily for theological liberation from sin, the Mosaic law, and cosmic corruption. Creation awaits 'the freedom of the glory of the children of God' (Rom 8:21). 'Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom' (2 Cor 3:17). Paul's Galatian letter pivots on this concept: spies infiltrated to undermine 'our freedom in Christ' (Gal 2:4), and 'for freedom Christ has set us free' (Gal 5:1). Yet freedom must not become 'an opportunity for the flesh' (Gal 5:13; 1 Pet 2:16). James calls the Torah 'the law of freedom' (Jas 1:25; 2:12). Spanish 'libertad' and German 'Freiheit' preserve the emancipatory register.

freedom, liberty (11×) The state of being free, especially from sin, law, and cosmic corruption. Creation groans for the freedom of God's children (Rom 8:21). Where the Spirit is, there is freedom (2 Cor 3:17). Freedom in Christ: the liberty spies tried to undermine (Gal 2:4), the standing exhortation not to return to slavery (Gal 5:1), and the warning against misusing freedom as license (Gal 5:13; 1 Pet 2:16). James's 'law of freedom' bridges liberation with ethics (Jas 1:25; 2:12). Spanish 'libertad' and Arabic 'hurriyya' carry the emancipatory weight. FREEDOM AND LIBERTY

en: freedom, of-freedom | es: de-libertad, libertad | fr: liberté | de: Freiheit Rom 8:21; 1Cor 10:29; 2Cor 3:17; Gal 2:4; Gal 5:1

ἐλεύθερος G1658 Adj-GFS (23×)

Free – not enslaved, liberated; possessing the legal or spiritual status of a free person

Describes the state of being free as opposed to enslaved, carrying both social and theological weight. Jesus declares 'if the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed' (John 8:36), transforming a legal category into spiritual reality. Paul contrasts the children of promise with those in bondage through the Sarah-Hagar allegory (Gal 4:22-31) and proclaims that in Christ there is 'neither slave nor free' (Gal 3:28). The word also appears in its basic social sense: kings' sons are exempt from taxation (Matt 17:26), and Revelation pairs free persons with slaves to encompass all humanity (Rev 6:15). Spanish, French 'libre,' and German 'frei' converge on a single core meaning.

free (23×) Possessing the status of a free person, not enslaved or bound. Used socially of free versus slave (1 Cor 12:13; Gal 3:28; Rev 6:15), of exemption from obligation (Matt 17:26; Rom 7:3), and theologically of liberation through Christ from sin (Rom 6:20) and the law (Gal 4:26, 31). Paul's Sarah-Hagar allegory (Gal 4:22-31) anchors the concept in salvation history. Spanish and French 'libre' and German 'frei' converge uniformly. FREE LIBERTY RELEASED

en: free, free-woman | es: libre, libre?, libres | fr: libre | de: frei, ἐλεύθεροί Matt 17:26; John 8:33; John 8:36; Rom 6:20; Rom 7:3

ἐλευθερ-όω G1659 V-FIA-3S (7×)

To set free, liberate; to release from bondage, sin, or the power of death and the law.

A powerful verb of liberation, meaning to set free from slavery or bondage. In Jesus' teaching, knowing the truth sets people free (John 8:32), and 'if the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed' (John 8:36). Paul develops this into a full theology of freedom: believers have been liberated from sin to become servants of righteousness (Rom 6:18, 22), freed from the law of sin and death by the Spirit of life (Rom 8:2), and creation itself groans in hope of being set free from its bondage to decay (Rom 8:21). The multilingual evidence — Spanish 'liberar,' French 'delivrer/liberer,' German 'befreien' — consistently points to deliverance from oppression rather than mere permission.

set free, liberate (7×) To set free or liberate from bondage, slavery, sin, or any form of oppression — used in both literal and deeply theological contexts. Jesus promises that truth liberates (John 8:32) and that the Son's freedom is ultimate and complete (John 8:36). Paul's usage in Romans centers on the transfer from one master to another: freed from sin, enslaved to righteousness (Rom 6:18, 22). Romans 8:2 declares freedom from the law of sin and death through the Spirit, while 8:21 extends the hope of liberation to all creation. The Spanish 'liberar,' French 'delivrer,' and German 'befreien' all emphasize deliverance from real captivity, not mere autonomy. Galatians 5:1 (eleutheroo cognate) confirms the existential weight of this freedom. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

en: freed, having-been-freed, sets-free | es: habiendo-sido-liberados, libera, liberará | fr: délivrer, libérer | de: befreien John 8:32; John 8:36; Rom 6:18; Rom 6:22; Rom 8:2

ἔλευσις G1660 N-GFS (1×)

coming, arrival, advent; the act of coming or appearing

This noun means coming or arrival, often used of significant appearances. In Acts 7:52, Stephen accuses his hearers' ancestors of persecuting the prophets who announced beforehand "the coming of the Righteous One." The term can refer to ordinary arrivals but here carries eschatological weight: the advent of the Messiah. Classical usage includes arrivals into life or significant entrances. The noun underscores the prophetic anticipation of Christ's first coming.

(1×) Coming or arrival, especially of a significant or anticipated event. In Acts 7:52, Stephen speaks of the prophets foretelling the coming of the Righteous One—the Messiah. The noun highlights the prophetic foreannouncement of Christ's advent, which Israel's leaders rejected by killing both the prophets and the Messiah Himself. The term carries the weight of fulfilled messianic expectation. COMING ARRIVAL PRESENCE

en: coming | es: venida | fr: venue | de: ἐλεύσεως Acts 7:52

ἐλεφάντ-ινος G1661 Adj-ANS (1×)

of ivory, made from ivory; describing material from elephant tusks

This adjective means made of ivory, describing objects crafted from elephant tusks. In Revelation 18:12, it appears in the list of luxury goods traded in "Babylon"—expensive commodities whose loss merchants mourn. Ivory was a prized material in the ancient world, used for decorative inlays, furniture, and ornaments. The term evokes wealth and luxury, part of the portrait of Babylon's opulence and the judgment that destroys her commerce.

(1×) Made of ivory, describing objects crafted from this valuable material. In Revelation 18:12, ivory articles appear among Babylon's luxury goods, symbolizing wealth and excess. The merchants weep over the loss of such trade when judgment falls. Ivory's inclusion underscores the city's materialism and the emptiness of riches when divine wrath comes—all the beautiful, costly things perish in an hour. IVORY MATERIAL

en: of-ivory | es: de-marfil | fr: elfenbeinern | de: elfenbeinern Rev 18:12

Ἐλιακείμ G1662 N-GMS (3×)

Eliakim, a personal name meaning 'God raises up'; ancestor of Jesus in Matthew and Luke's genealogies

The Hebrew name Eliakim (אֶלְיָקִים) means 'God raises up' or 'God establishes,' composed of El (God) and qaum (raise/establish). In the New Testament it appears exclusively in the genealogies of Jesus, representing post-exilic ancestors in the Davidic line. The name itself is theologically suggestive—'God raises up'—pointing to divine sovereignty in preserving the messianic lineage through obscure generations between the exile and Christ's birth.

(3×) Matthew 1:13 lists Eliakim twice in rapid succession: 'Zerubbabel the father of Abiud, and Abiud the father of Eliakim, and Eliakim the father of Azor' (two generations bearing the name or an error in transmission). Luke 3:30 includes 'the son of Simeon, the son of Judah, the son of Joseph, the son of Jonam, the son of Eliakim.' The multilingual consistency (Spanish: Eliakím, French: Éliakim, German: Eljakim) reflects transliteration of the Hebrew name. These are otherwise unknown figures—no deeds recorded, no stories told—yet essential links in the chain from David to Jesus. The name 'God raises up' ironically describes the genealogical function: God raising up faithful generations to bear the messianic promise.

PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)
en: Eliakim | es: Eliakím | fr: Éliakim | de: Eljakim Matt 1:13; Luke 3:30

Ἐλιέζερ G1663 N-GMS (1×)
Eliezer; Hebrew name meaning 'God is my help,' an ancestor of Jesus in Luke's genealogy
This is the Greek transliteration of the Hebrew name Eliezer, meaning "God is my help." In Luke 3:29, Eliezer appears in the genealogy of Jesus, one of the ancestors between David and Jesus. The name itself is a confession of faith, reflecting the ancient Israelite practice of embedding theological truths in personal names. Several Old Testament figures bore this name, most famously Abraham's servant, but Luke refers to an otherwise unknown ancestor of Christ.

(1×) Eliezer, an ancestor of Jesus listed in Luke 3:29. The name means "God is my help" in Hebrew, a theologically rich designation common in ancient Israel. Luke's inclusion of this name, along with many others unfamiliar from the Old Testament, underscores Jesus' full humanity and His rootedness in Israel's history—even the obscure generations between David and the exile matter in God's redemptive plan. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Eliezer | es: Eliézer | fr: Éliézer | de: Ἐλιέζερ Luke 3:29

Ἐλιούδ G1664 N-AMS (2×)
Eliud, ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy
This proper name appears in Matthew 1:14-15, referring to an ancestor of Jesus in the post-exilic period. Eliud stands in the genealogical line between Achim and Eleazar. Little is known of this individual beyond his placement in Jesus' lineage. The name does not appear in Old Testament genealogies, suggesting Matthew may have had access to additional genealogical records.

(2×) Referring to a post-exilic ancestor in the Davidic line, this name appears twice in Matthew 1:14-15 as the genealogy moves from Babylonian exile toward Joseph. The transliterations vary (Eliud in German and English, Élioud in French) as they render a Hebrew name through Greek. His inclusion emphasizes the continuity of Davidic lineage through obscure generations. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Elioud | es: Elioúd | fr: Élioud | de: Eliud Matt 1:14; Matt 1:15

Ἐλεισάβετ G1665 N-DFS (9×)
Elizabeth; the wife of the priest Zechariah and mother of John the Baptist.
The Greek form of the Hebrew name Elisheba ('my God is an oath' or 'God is abundance'), borne in the NT by the wife of the priest Zechariah and mother of John the Baptist. She appears exclusively in Luke's infancy narrative (Luke 1:5-80), where she is described as righteous, barren in old age, and miraculously pregnant — a deliberate echo of Sarah, Hannah, and other barren mothers in Israel's story. Her joyful recognition of Mary's child leaping in her womb (Luke 1:41-44) is a key moment in Luke's theology of prophetic fulfillment.

(9×) The proper name Elizabeth (Greek Elisabet, from Hebrew Elisheba, 'my God is an oath'), identifying the wife of the priest Zechariah and mother of John the Baptist. All nine occurrences are in Luke 1, where she is introduced as a daughter of Aaron, praised as blameless, and narratively paired with Mary in the Visitation scene (Luke 1:36-45). Translations uniformly transliterate the name: Spanish 'Elisábet,' French 'Élisabeth,' German 'Elisabeth.' PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Elisabet | es: Elisábet | fr: Élisabeth | de: Elisabeth Luke 1:5; Luke 1:7; Luke 1:13; Luke 1:24; Luke 1:36

Ἐλισαῖος G1666 N-GMS (1×)
Elisha; Hebrew name meaning 'God is salvation,' the prophet who succeeded Elijah
This is the Greek form of Elisha, the prophet who succeeded Elijah in the ninth century BC. In Luke 4:27, Jesus mentions Elisha to illustrate that God's mercy extends beyond Israel's borders: many lepers were in Israel, but only Naaman the Syrian was cleansed. The reference stings His Nazareth audience, who become enraged at the implication. Elisha's ministry, marked by miracles of compassion, foreshadows Jesus' own inclusive mission to Gentiles as well as Jews.

(1×) Elisha, the prophet who succeeded Elijah and ministered in Israel during the ninth century BC. In Luke 4:27, Jesus cites Elisha's healing of Naaman the Syrian to provoke His hearers: God's grace overflowed Israel's boundaries even in the Old Testament. The reference anticipates the scandal of Jesus' own ministry to outcasts and Gentiles, and the reaction shows how deeply this challenged Jewish assumptions. ELISHA PROPHET NAME en: Elisaios | es: Eliseo | fr: Élisée | de: Ἐλισαίου Luke 4:27 ἑλίσσω G1667 V-FIA-2S (2×)

roll up, coil, wrap up
This verb means to roll up or wrap up, like a scroll. Hebrews 1:12 quotes Psalm 102 about rolling up the heavens like a garment, and Revelation 6:14 describes the sky rolling up like a scroll at judgment. The word emphasizes the action of coiling or folding something flexible. Classical usage included rolling, twisting, and coiling various objects, particularly scrolls and garments.

(2×) Describing the action of rolling up like a scroll or garment, this sense appears in apocalyptic imagery of cosmic dissolution. Hebrews 1:12 uses it in contrast to Christ's unchanging nature—creation will be rolled up like clothing, but he remains. Revelation 6:14 depicts the sky rolling up as part of eschatological judgment. Both emphasize the transitory nature of creation. RETURNING AND RESTORING en: being-rolled-up, you-will-roll-up | es: enrollarás, que-se-enrolla | fr: zusammenrollen | de: zusammenrollen Heb 1:12; Rev 6:14

ἕλκος G1668 N-GNP (3×)
a sore, ulcer, festering wound; open, painful skin lesion, often symbolic of divine judgment
The noun ἕλκος denotes a wound, especially a festering sore or ulcer—an open, painful, often infected lesion. In biblical usage it appears in contexts of extreme affliction: the beggar Lazarus covered with sores (Luke 16) and the plague-like sores of Revelation's judgments. Ancient medicine offered little relief for chronic ulceration, making such conditions emblematic of both physical misery and sometimes divine displeasure. The sore visible on skin makes invisible spiritual or moral corruption tangible.

(3×) Luke 16:21 describes the beggar Lazarus: 'covered with sores, who desired to be fed with what fell from the rich man's table. Moreover, even the dogs came and licked his sores'—abject poverty compounded by painful, untreated ulceration. Revelation 16:2 narrates the first bowl judgment: 'harmful and painful sores came upon the people who bore the mark of the beast'—plague recalling Egyptian boils. Verse 16:11 reports: 'they cursed the God of heaven for their pain and sores'—unrepentant despite affliction. The Spanish (llagas, úlcera, úlceras) and French (ulcère) use medical terminology. The sores function symbolically: in Luke as mark of extreme poverty and suffering, in Revelation as visible manifestation of divine judgment on idolatry. Skin disease makes inner condition outwardly visible. PLAGUES AND WOUNDS en: a-sore, sores | es: llagas, úlcera, úlceras | fr: ulcère | de: Geschwuer, ἕλκη Luke 16:21; Rev 16:2; Rev 16:11

ἑλκόω G1669 V-RPM/P-NMS (1×) to ulcerate, be covered with sores; to suffer from open wounds or lesions
This verb means to be covered with sores or ulcers, to suffer from open wounds. In Luke 16:20, it describes Lazarus in the parable, a beggar "covered with sores" who lay at the rich man's gate. The perfect passive participle suggests a settled, pitiable condition: he is thoroughly ulcerated, his body ravaged by untreated wounds. The detail heightens the contrast between Lazarus' suffering and the rich man's comfort, setting up the reversal in the afterlife.

(1×) To be covered with sores or ulcers, suffering from festering wounds. In Luke 16:20, Lazarus is described as thoroughly ulcerated, lying helpless at the rich man's gate while dogs licked his sores. The verb paints a vivid picture of his misery and neglect, underscoring the callousness of the rich man who ignored this suffering at his doorstep. The reversal of their fates in eternity makes the parable's point unforgettable. PLAGUES AND WOUNDS

en: covered-with-sores | es: lleno-de-llagas | fr: couvert-d'ulcères | de: εἱλκωμένος Luke 16:20

ἕλκω G1670 V-ASA-3S (8×)

To draw, drag, pull — physical hauling by force, or divine spiritual attraction

The verb ἕλκω covers the full spectrum from brute physical force to mysterious divine initiative. In its concrete sense, nets heavy with fish are 'dragged' to shore (John 21:6, 11), Peter 'draws' a sword (John 18:10), and Paul and Silas are 'dragged' before the magistrates (Acts 16:19). But in two theologically momentous passages, Jesus declares 'No one can come to me unless the Father draws him' (John 6:44) and 'I, when I am lifted up, will draw all people to myself' (John 12:32). The multilingual evidence confirms the split: Spanish uses 'arrastrar' (drag) for physical force but 'atraer' (attract) for the spiritual sense, and Arabic similarly distinguishes 'jarr' (جَرّ) from 'ajdhibu' (أجذب).

1. draw, drag (physically) (6×) To drag, haul, or pull physically, often with connotations of force or compulsion. Peter draws his sword in Gethsemane (John 18:10), the disciples drag the net full of fish ashore (John 21:6, 11), Paul and Silas are dragged into the marketplace before rulers (Acts 16:19), and Paul is dragged out of the temple in Jerusalem (Acts 21:30). Spanish consistently uses 'arrastrar/arrastraron' (drag), Arabic 'jarr' (جَرّ, pull), and Korean 'kkeulda' (끌다, drag) — all physical-force vocabulary with no connotation of gentle attraction. DRAWING AND PULLING

en: drag, dragged, drew | es: arrastrar, arrastraron, arrastró | fr: attirer, tirer | de: ziehen, εἵλκυσαν, εἷλκον John 18:10; John 21:6; John 21:11; Acts 16:19; Acts 21:30

2. draw, attract (spiritually/metaphorically) (2×) To draw or attract someone in a spiritual or metaphorical sense, used exclusively of divine action drawing people toward God or Christ. In John 6:44 Jesus says no one comes to him 'unless the Father who sent me draws him,' and in John 12:32 the crucified and exalted Christ promises to 'draw all people' to himself. The multilingual evidence registers this shift precisely: Spanish moves from 'arrastrar' to 'atraer' (attract), Arabic from 'jarr' to 'ajdhibu' (أجذب, I attract), and Korean from 'kkeulda' to 'ikkeulda' — all marking the transition from coercive physical force to compelling spiritual magnetism. DRAWING AND PULLING

en: I-will-draw, draws | es: atraeré, atrajere | fr: tirer | de: ziehen John 6:44; John 12:32

G1671 N-AFS (1×)

Greece, Hellas; the Greek-speaking regions of the Mediterranean, particularly the Greek mainland

This noun refers to Greece or Hellas, originally the name of a region in Thessaly but eventually applied to the entire Greek mainland and, broadly, to Greek-speaking lands. In Acts 20:2, Paul travels through Macedonia and comes to "Greece" (likely Achaia, the Roman province). The term evokes the classical world, the cultural and linguistic sphere Paul navigated in his missionary journeys. His time in Greece included significant ministry in Corinth and Athens.

(1×) Greece or Hellas, referring to the Greek mainland and broader Hellenic world. In Acts 20:2, Paul's travels take him to Greece, where he spends three months—likely in Corinth. The region represents the intellectual and cultural heart of the Mediterranean, where Paul engaged both Jews and Greeks with the gospel, debating philosophers in Athens and establishing churches amid the vibrant, morally complex cities of the Roman East. GREECE JAVAN NAME

en: Hellas | es: Grecia | fr: Grèce | de: Ἑλλάδα Acts 20:2

Ἕλληνες G1672 N-GMS (25×)

Greek, Hellene — a person of Greek culture or, more broadly in the NT, any non-Jewish Gentile

Hellen in its 25 New Testament occurrences has undergone a decisive semantic shift from its classical meaning. Where the term originally designated an ethnic Greek as opposed to a barbaros ('foreigner'), the NT consistently uses it as the functional counterpart to Ioudaios ('Jew'), meaning any non-Jewish person — a Gentile. Paul makes this binary foundational to his gospel: 'to the Jew first and also to the Greek' (Rom 1:16; 2:9-10), and 'there is neither Jew nor Greek' in Christ (Gal 3:28; Col 3:11). The 'Greeks' who come seeking Jesus at the Feast (John 12:20) may be ethnic Greeks or Hellenized Gentiles — John leaves the ambiguity productive. In Acts, Hellen describes God-fearing Gentiles who attend synagogues alongside Jews in diaspora cities like Thessalonica, Berea, Corinth, and Ephesus (Acts 14:1; 17:4; 18:4; 19:10, 17). Paul himself was 'apostle to the Gentiles,' and his companion Titus was a Hellen (Gal 2:3). Spanish 'Griego,' French 'Grec,' and German 'Grieche' all carry both the ethnic and the broader religious-cultural sense.

Greek, Hellene (25×) A person of Greek identity or culture who, in NT usage, has come to represent Gentiles in general — the non-Jewish half of humanity in the Pauline binary 'Jew and Greek.' Paul builds his universalist soteriology on this pair: salvation comes 'to the Jew first and also to the Greek' (Rom 1:16; 2:9-10), and in Christ the distinction is abolished (Gal 3:28; Col 3:11). In Acts, Hellenes are the God-fearing Gentiles who populate diaspora synagogues (Acts 14:1; 17:4; 18:4; 19:10). John's 'Greeks' seeking Jesus (John 12:20) signal the approaching Gentile mission. Titus, Paul's uncircumcised companion, is identified as a Hellen (Gal 2:3), confirming the term's breadth beyond strict ethnicity. GREEK HELLENE IDENTITY

en: Greek, Greeks, Hellēnes | es: Griego, Griegos, Héllēn | fr: Grec | de: Grieche John 7:35; John 12:20; Acts 14:1; Acts 16:1

τὸ Ἑλληνικόν G1673 Adj-DFS (2×)

Greek, Hellenic, in Greek language or manner

This adjective means Greek or Hellenic, referring to language, culture, or ethnicity. Luke 23:38 mentions the inscription on the cross written in Greek (among other languages), and Revelation 9:11 gives the Greek name Apollyon. The word could denote the Greek language, Greek customs, or Greek people collectively. It distinguished Hellenic culture from barbarian or Jewish contexts.

(2×) Referring to the Greek language or Hellenic context, this sense appears in descriptions of written or spoken Greek. Luke 23:38 notes the trilingual inscription on Jesus' cross (Hebrew, Greek, Latin), while Revelation 9:11 provides the Greek name for the destroyer angel. Both instances emphasize Greek as a linguistic medium for communication. GREEK HELLENE IDENTITY

en: Greek | es: Griegas, griego | fr: en-grec | de: griechisch, Ἑλληνικοῖς Luke 23:38; Rev 9:11

Ἕλλην G1674 N-NFS (2×)

Greek woman, Gentile woman of Hellenic culture

This feminine noun denotes a Greek woman or Gentile woman influenced by Hellenic culture. Mark 7:26 identifies the Syrophoenician woman as Greek (ethnically Gentile), and Acts 17:12 mentions Greek women of high standing who believed in Berea. The term could indicate ethnic Greek heritage or Hellenized Gentile culture. It distinguished women from Jewish background or barbarian contexts.

(2×) Referring to women of Greek or Hellenized background, this sense emphasizes Gentile identity in distinction from Jewish. Mark 7:26 uses it to underscore the cultural barrier the Syrophoenician woman crossed in seeking Jesus' help, while Acts 17:12 describes prominent Greek women who received the gospel in Berea. Both contexts highlight Gentile inclusion. GREEK HELLENE IDENTITY

en: Greek | es: griega, griegas | fr: Grecque | de: Ἑλληνίδων, Ἑλληνίς Mark 7:26; Acts 17:12

G1675 N-GMP (3×)
Hellenists, Greek-speaking Jews; Jews from the diaspora whose primary language was Greek rather than Hebrew/Aramaic
The term Ἑλληνιστής (from Ἑλληνίζω 'to speak Greek') denotes Greek-speaking Jews, particularly diaspora Jews whose native language was Greek rather than Hebrew or Aramaic. In the early Jerusalem church this created a cultural-linguistic division from the 'Hebrews' (Aramaic-speaking Palestinian Jews). The Hellenists maintained Jewish faith and practice but expressed it through Greek language and often Hellenistic cultural forms, creating both richness and tension in the mixed community.

(3×) Acts 6:1 describes early church conflict: 'the Hellenists complained against the Hebrews because their widows were being neglected in the daily distribution'—linguistic/cultural groups in tension. Acts 9:29 reports Paul in Jerusalem: 'speaking and disputing against the Hellenists. But they were seeking to kill him'—his Greek-speaking compatriots became opponents. Acts 11:20 (in some manuscripts) mentions believers from Cyprus and Cyrene 'speaking to the Hellenists also, preaching the Lord Jesus.' The German glosses (Ἑλληνιστάς, Ἑλληνιστῶν) preserve Greek forms while Spanish (Helenistas) and French (Grec) translate. The term captures a crucial fault line in early Christianity: between Palestinian Jewish Christianity and diaspora Jewish Christianity, the latter positioned to bridge to Gentile mission. Hellenists like Stephen and Philip became pioneers of cross-cultural gospel advance. GREEK HELLENE IDENTITY
en: Hellenists | es: Helenistas, Hellēnistaí | fr: Grec | de: Ἑλληνιστάς, Ἑλληνιστῶν Acts 6:1; Acts 9:29; Acts 11:20

Ἑλληνιστί G1676 Adv (2×)
in Greek, in the Greek language
This adverb means 'in Greek' or 'in the Greek language.' John 19:20 notes the inscription on Jesus' cross was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, while Acts 21:37 records Paul asking if the tribune speaks Greek. The phrase specifically denotes the Greek language as medium of communication. It could also mean 'in Greek fashion,' but New Testament usage is linguistic.

(2×) Indicating communication in the Greek language, this adverb appears in contexts of multilingual inscription and speech. John 19:20 emphasizes the trilingual accessibility of the cross inscription, while Acts 21:37 shows Paul demonstrating his Greek fluency to surprise the Roman commander. Both instances highlight Greek as a lingua franca of the eastern Mediterranean. GREEK HELLENE IDENTITY
en: Greek, in-Greek | es: En-griego, en-griego | fr: en-grec, grec | de: griechisch, Ἑλληνιστὶ John 19:20; Acts 21:37

ἐλλογ-έω G1677 V-PIM/P-3S (2×)
charge to account, reckon, impute
This verb means to charge to one's account, reckon, or impute. Romans 5:13 states that sin is not charged where there is no law, and Philemon 18 has Paul asking that any wrong be charged to his account. The word combines 'in' and 'reckon,' suggesting entry in an account ledger. It's used for both financial accounting and metaphorical imputation of responsibility.

(2×) Referring to crediting or charging something to an account, this sense uses accounting imagery for moral and relational reckoning. Romans 5:13 discusses the theological principle that sin isn't formally charged without law's clear standard, while Philemon 18 uses commercial language for Paul's willingness to assume Onesimus' debts. Both emphasize formal attribution of responsibility. COUNTING AND NARRATING
en: charge, is-counted | es: cárgalo, es-imputado | fr: anrechnen, imputer | de: anrechnen Rom 5:13; Phlm 1:18

Ἐλμαδάμ G1678 N-GMS (1×)
Elmadam; an ancestor of Jesus in Luke's genealogy, otherwise unknown
This name appears in Luke 3:28 as one of Jesus' ancestors in the genealogy tracing His lineage back to Adam. Elmadam is otherwise unknown, one of the many names Luke includes that don't appear in the Old Testament. The inclusion of such obscure figures underscores the completeness of Luke's genealogical record and the historical rootedness of Jesus' humanity. Every generation, known or unknown, is part of God's patient work bringing the Messiah into the world.

(1×) An ancestor of Jesus listed in Luke 3:28, otherwise unknown in biblical or historical records. Luke's genealogy includes many such names, emphasizing Jesus' deep roots in Israel's past and His full participation in human history. Even the forgotten generations matter in God's redemptive plan—each link in the chain leading from Adam to Christ contributes to the story of salvation. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Elmadam | es: Elmadám | fr: Elmadam | de: Ἐλμαδὰμ Luke 3:28

ἐλπίζω G1679 V-PIA-1S (31×)
To hope, expect; to set confident trust in; (passive) that which is hoped for Elpizo carries the full weight of biblical hope, which is never mere wishful thinking but a forward-leaning confidence grounded in God's promises. When Paul says Israel 'hoped in Christ' and the Gentiles 'will hope in his name' (Matt 12:21, quoting Isaiah), the verb draws together expectation and reliance. In the Pastoral letters it deepens into settled trust: the widow 'has set her hope on God' (1 Tim 5:5). Hebrews 11:1 famously stretches the word into a noun-like passive, defining faith as 'the substance of things hoped for,' where the hoped-for realities themselves become the grammatical focus. French and German consistently render 'espérer/hoffen,' but the Spanish shift from 'Espero' (I hope) to 'ha esperado' (has hoped) in the Pastorals mirrors the tightening from expectation to trust.

1. to hope or expect (28×) The dominant sense of looking forward with desire and expectation. Jesus' disciples on the Emmaus road lament 'we were hoping he was the one' (Luke 24:21), and Paul asks 'who hopes for what he already sees?' (Rom 8:24-25). Across 28 occurrences this covers both everyday expectation and eschatological longing, with translations uniformly rendering 'hope/esperar/espérer/hoffen.' HOPE AND EXPECTATION
en: I-hope, hope, hopes | es: Espero, espera, esperad | fr: espérer | de: hoffen, ἐλπίζων, ἐλπιοῦσιν Matt 12:21; Luke 6:34; Luke 23:8; Luke 24:21; John 5:45

2. to set hope on, trust in (2×) A narrower but theologically rich usage where hope crystallizes into confident reliance on a person or promise. First Timothy 5:5 describes the godly widow who 'has set her hope on God,' and 1 Timothy 6:17 warns the rich not to 'set their hope on the uncertainty of riches.' The perfect tense in both passages (elpiken) signals settled, abiding trust rather than transient expectation. HOPE AND EXPECTATION
en: has-hoped, to-have-hoped | es: esperar, ha-esperado | fr: espérer | de: hoffen 1Tim 5:5; 1Tim 6:17

3. that which is hoped for (1×) A passive-participial usage in Hebrews 11:1, where 'things hoped for' (elpizomenon) functions substantivally as the object of faith. This single occurrence turns the verb inside out: instead of the human subject hoping, the focus falls on the realities themselves that are awaited. Spanish 'de cosas esperadas' and English 'of things hoped for' both capture this grammatical pivot. HOPE AND EXPECTATION en: of-things-hoped-for | es: de-cosas-esperadas | fr: espérer | de: hoffen Heb 11:1

ἐλπ-ίς G1680 N-NFS (53×)
hope, expectation — confident anticipation of a future good, grounded in trust or promise Elpis denotes the forward-looking posture of confident expectation, one of the great theological virtues of the New Testament alongside faith and love (1 Cor 13:13). Across its 53 occurrences, it ranges from the living hope grounded in Christ's resurrection (1 Pet 1:3) to Paul's hope of the resurrection of the dead (Acts 23:6; 24:15), to the 'hope laid up in heaven' (Col 1:5). In Acts 16:19, uniquely, the word takes an ironic secular turn — the slave owners' 'hope of profit' vanishes when Paul casts out the fortune-telling spirit. The multilingual translations converge on a single warm concept: Spanish 'esperanza,' French 'esperance,' German 'Hoffnung' — each carrying the connotation of trust rather than mere wishing.

(53×) Confident expectation of a future good, especially as grounded in divine promise or the resurrection of Christ. Central to Pauline theology as one of the abiding triad (1 Cor 13:13) and the anchor of the soul (Heb 6:19). Appears as the content of hope ('the hope of glory,' Col 1:27), the subjective act of hoping (Rom 8:24 'hope that is seen is not hope'), and the objective basis of hope (Acts 23:6 'the hope of the resurrection'). All 53 occurrences share this anticipatory sense, though Acts 16:19 extends it to secular expectation of financial gain. HOPE (ABSTRACT NOUN)

en: hope | es: esperanza | fr: espérance | de: Hoffnung Acts 2:26; Acts 16:19; Acts 23:6; Acts 24:15; Acts 26:6

Ἐλύμας G1681 N-NMS (1×)

Elymas; the Greek or Arabic name of Bar-Jesus, the magician who opposed Paul on Cyprus

This name refers to the magician who opposed Paul and Barnabas on Cyprus in Acts 13:8. Also called Bar-Jesus, Elymas was a Jewish false prophet in the court of the proconsul Sergius Paulus. When he tried to turn the proconsul away from the faith, Paul struck him blind. The name "Elymas" may derive from an Arabic or Aramaic word for "magician" or "wise man," parallel to the term "magus." His opposition and judgment serve as a dramatic confrontation between the gospel and occult power.

(1×) Elymas, also known as Bar-Jesus, a Jewish magician who opposed Paul on Cyprus. In Acts 13:8, he attempts to prevent the proconsul Sergius Paulus from believing the gospel. Paul, filled with the Holy Spirit, rebukes him and strikes him blind—a sign demonstrating the superiority of God's power over magic. The incident results in the proconsul's conversion and showcases the early church's clash with pagan religious practices. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: Elymas | es: Elýmas | fr: Elymas | de: Ἐλύμας Acts 13:8

G1682 N-VMS (2×)

Eloi, Aramaic for 'my God'

This is a Greek transliteration of the Aramaic אֱלָהִי ('elahi), meaning 'my God.' It appears in Mark 15:34 twice in Jesus' cry from the cross: 'Eloi, Eloi, lema sabachthani?'—My God, my God, why have you forsaken me? The preservation of the Aramaic original emphasizes the authentic utterance of Jesus' anguished quotation of Psalm 22:1.

(2×) This vocative form addresses God directly in Jesus' crucifixion cry. Mark 15:34 preserves Jesus' actual Aramaic words before translating them, emphasizing the authenticity of this anguished moment. The repetition 'Eloi, Eloi' intensifies the cry's urgency. The transliterations across modern languages attempt to preserve the sound of Jesus' original speech. GODS AND DEITIES

en: Eloi | es: Eloí | fr: Éloï | de: Eloi Mark 15:34

ἐμαυτοῦ G1683 PPro-AM1S (37×)

myself — first-person reflexive pronoun indicating the speaker as both subject and object of action

Emautou is the reflexive pronoun of the first person, appearing only in the oblique cases (genitive, dative, accusative) and never in the nominative. It marks moments of intense personal involvement or self-reference: Jesus says 'I can do nothing of myself' (John 5:30) and 'I bear witness of myself' (John 8:14), while Paul declares 'I determined not to know anything among you except Jesus Christ' (1 Cor 2:2) and 'I made myself servant to all' (1 Cor 9:19). The word creates theological weight precisely because it places the speaker as both agent and object, underscoring voluntary self-limitation, self-revelation, or self-offering. The translations reflect its grammatical function uniformly: Spanish 'mi mismo,' French 'moi,' German 'mich selbst.'

myself (reflexive pronoun) (37×) First-person singular reflexive pronoun functioning in genitive ('of myself'), dative ('to/for myself'), and accusative ('myself') to mark the speaker as simultaneously agent and recipient of the verb's action. Theologically significant in the Johannine Jesus speeches where it underscores voluntary subordination — 'I do nothing of myself' (John 5:30; 8:28) — and in Paul's rhetorical self-presentations: 'I buffet my body' (1 Cor 9:27), 'I became all things to all' (1 Cor 9:22). The idiomatic en emauto ('in myself') appears in John 5:26 for the Father's self-existent life given to the Son. REFLEXIVE PRONOUNS

en: myself | es: -a-mí-mismo, -mí-mismo, a-mí-mismo | fr: de-moi, moi | de: meiner, mich, mich-selbst Matt 8:9; Luke 7:7; Luke 7:8; John 5:30; John 5:31

ἐμβαίνω G1684 V-AIA-3S (17×)

To step into, embark; to board a boat or vessel.

Embainō means to step into or board something, and in the New Testament it is used exclusively of getting into a boat. Jesus and his disciples are constantly crossing the Sea of Galilee, and this verb marks those transitions — embarking after the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 8:23), before the feeding of the five thousand (Matt 14:22), and at many other crossings. The compound form (en- + bainō, 'step in') makes the physical action vivid. Spanish 'embarcaron,' French 'monter,' and German 'einsteigen' all preserve the directional sense of entering a vessel.

embark, step into (a boat) (17×) To step into or board a boat, to embark upon a vessel. Every NT occurrence involves entering a boat for travel across water, typically the Sea of Galilee. The verb captures the specific physical action of climbing aboard. It appears in narrative transitions as Jesus moves between ministry locations (Matt 8:23; 9:1; 13:2; 14:22; 15:39; Mark 4:1; 5:18; 6:45; 8:10, 13; Luke 5:3; 8:22, 37; John 6:17, 22, 24; 21:3). Inflectional variations — participle, indicative, infinitive — reflect grammar, not semantic difference. ASCENDING MOVEMENT

en: embarked, embarking, got-into | es: a-embarcar, embarcaron, embarcó | fr: monter | de: einsteigen, steigt-ein Matt 8:23; Matt 9:1; Matt 13:2; Matt 14:22; Matt 15:39

ἐμβάλλω G1685 V-ANA (1×)

to cast in, throw into; to hurl or deposit something into a place

This verb means to throw in, cast into, or deposit something into a place. In Luke 12:5, Jesus warns to fear the one who, after killing, has authority "to cast into hell." The verb emphasizes the act of throwing or consigning someone to a place—here, Gehenna. Classical usage includes throwing things to animals or laying things into someone's hands. The term underscores divine authority and the finality of judgment: God can cast into hell, a fate more fearful than physical death.

(1×) To cast or throw into a place, often with force or finality. In Luke 12:5, Jesus warns of God's authority to cast into hell after death. The verb highlights the active judgment of consigning someone to Gehenna, the place of final punishment. This power to cast into eternal perdition belongs to God alone, making Him the one truly to be feared above all human threats. THROWING AND CASTING en: to-cast | es: para-arrojar | fr: jeter | de: ἐμβαλεῖν Luke 12:5

ἐμβάπτω G1686 V-PPM-NMS (2×)

dip in, immerse in liquid

This verb means to dip something into liquid. Both occurrences appear in Last Supper contexts: Matthew 26:23 and Mark 14:20 describe someone dipping into the dish with Jesus, identifying the betrayer. The word emphasizes the action of dipping bread or food into a common dish or sauce. The prefix 'en-' intensifies the basic verb for dipping, emphasizing the 'into' aspect.

(2×) Referring to dipping food into a shared dish, this sense appears in the Gospel accounts of Jesus identifying his betrayer. Both Matthew 26:23 and Mark 14:20 use the act of dipping together as the identifying sign—not unusual at a meal, but made significant by Jesus' prophetic word. The detail emphasizes the intimacy and shocking betrayal of table fellowship violated. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15037 WITH 3 SENSES

en: dipping, having-dipped | es: que-moja | fr: tremper | de: ἐμβάψας, ἐμβαπτόμενος Matt 26:23; Mark 14:20

ἐμβᾰτ-εύω G1687 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

to enter into, intrude, take possession of; to step into or meddle in something

This verb can mean to enter into, intrude, or take possession of something. In Colossians 2:18, Paul warns against those who disqualify believers, "insisting on asceticism and worship of angels, going on in detail about visions." The phrase "entering into" (or "dwelling on") visions suggests intruding into visionary experiences or taking unwarranted possession of mystical insights. Classical usage includes entering sacred caves or taking possession of an inheritance. Paul's point: such practices are presumptuous and lead astray.

(1×) To enter into or intrude upon, often in the sense of meddling in or claiming access to something. In Colossians 2:18, the verb describes false teachers who claim privileged visionary experiences, "entering into" things they've seen. Paul critiques this intrusive mysticism as puffed up and disconnected from Christ. The verb suggests overreaching—intruding into realms beyond one's rightful place, whether mystery rites or angelic visions. ENTERING AND GOING IN en: entering-into | es: entrando | fr: ἐμβατεύων | de: eindringen Col 2:18

ἐμβῐβ-άζω G1688 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to put on board, embark; to cause someone to board a ship

This verb means to put someone on board a ship, to cause to embark. In Acts 27:6, a centurion finds an Alexandrian ship sailing to Italy and "put us on board." The verb emphasizes the action of the centurion arranging passage and getting Paul and his companions onto the vessel. Classical usage includes putting troops on ships or setting dislocated joints (putting bones back in place). Here it's straightforward: facilitating embarkation for the voyage to Rome.

(1×) To put on board a ship, to embark someone. In Acts 27:6, the centurion arranges for Paul and his companions to board an Alexandrian vessel bound for Italy. The verb captures the logistical act of transferring passengers onto a ship, a necessary step in Paul's dramatic journey to Rome. What begins as routine embarkation will become a harrowing voyage, shipwreck, and ultimately safe arrival—a journey full of providence. PLACING AND LAYING en: put | es: nos-hizo-embarcar | fr: faire-monter | de: ἐνεβίβασεν Acts 27:6

ἐμ-βλέπω G1689 V-APA-NFS (11×)

To look intently at, gaze upon — to fix one's eyes on someone with focused, purposeful attention

The verb ἐμβλέπω (emblepo) means to look directly and intently at someone, implying focused attention rather than a casual glance. A compound of ἐν ('in') and βλέπω ('see'), it conveys looking 'into' a person. Jesus commands disciples to 'look at' the birds as a lesson about providence (Matt 6:26). He 'looked at' the rich young ruler and loved him (Mark 10:21). The healed blind man 'looked intently and was restored' (Mark 8:25). After Peter's denial, the Lord turned and 'looked at' him (Luke 22:61). John the Baptist 'looked at Jesus walking' and declared him the Lamb of God (John 1:36). Spanish 'mirar fijamente' and German 'anblicken' capture the penetrating quality.

look intently at, gaze upon (11×) To look directly and intently at someone, fixing one's eyes with purposeful attention. Jesus commands looking at the birds (Matt 6:26), gazes at the rich ruler with love (Mark 10:21), looks at disciples declaring divine possibility (Matt 19:26; Mark 10:27), and turns to look at Peter after the denial (Luke 22:61). The Baptist looks intently at Jesus and proclaims the Lamb (John 1:36, 42). The healed blind man looks intently and sees clearly (Mark 8:25). Spanish 'mirar fijamente' and Arabic 'nazara ila' convey the penetrating gaze. GAZING AND LOOKING en: I-was-seeing, having-looked-at, look | es: habiendo-mirado, habiendo-mirado-fijamente, miraba | fr: regarder, regarder-fixement | de: anblicken, blickt-an Matt 6:26; Matt 19:26; Mark 8:25; Mark 10:21; Mark 10:27

ἐμβρῑ́μ-άομαι G1690 V-APM-NMS (5×)

To be deeply moved, groan inwardly, or sternly warn; expressing intense emotion—indignation, grief, or urgency.

A remarkably intense verb originally describing the snorting of horses, applied in the NT to Jesus' powerful emotional responses. At Lazarus' tomb, Jesus is 'deeply moved in spirit' and 'groans within himself' (John 11:33, 38)—an expression of grief and perhaps anger at death itself. Earlier, Jesus 'sternly warns' the healed blind men and a leper to keep silent about their miracles (Matt 9:30; Mark 1:43). In Mark 14:5, bystanders 'scold' the woman who poured perfume on Jesus. Spanish 'conmoviéndose profundamente' captures the depth of feeling, while French 'frémir' evokes a visceral trembling.

(5×) To be deeply moved with strong emotion—whether grief, indignation, or stern urgency—sometimes expressed as groaning or sharp warning. The word carries visceral force: it originally described a horse snorting. Jesus 'groans in spirit' at Lazarus' tomb (John 11:33, 38), moved by grief and perhaps outrage at death. In Matt 9:30 and Mark 1:43 he 'sternly charges' healed persons to silence—an urgent, almost fierce command. Mark 14:5 uses it for the indignant scolding directed at the woman with the alabaster jar. Spanish 'conmoviéndose profundamente' and French 'frémir' both convey that this is emotion felt at the deepest bodily level. ANGER AND INDIGNATION en: groaned, groaning, sternly-warned | es: advirtiéndole-severamente, advirtió-severamente, conmoviéndose-profundamente | fr: frémir | de: aufseufzen, ἐνεβριμήθη Matt 9:30; Mark 1:43; Mark 14:5; John 11:33; John 11:38

ἐγώ G1691

I (first person pronoun); emphatic form: I myself, I for my part

The first-person pronoun, appearing in various dialectal forms across Greek literature. The nominative ἐγώ (sometimes ἐγών) means simply 'I,' though Greek often omits it when the verb ending makes the person clear. When expressed, it typically carries emphasis: 'I myself' or 'I (in contrast to others).' The strengthened form ἐγώγε appears frequently in Attic Greek, meaning 'I at least' or 'I for my part.' Oblique cases come from a different root: genitive ἐμοῦ ('of me'), dative ἐμοί ('to me'), accusative ἐμέ ('me'). Enclitic forms (μου, μοι, με) provide unstressed variants. The pronoun enables personal assertions and contrasts throughout Greek discourse.

ἐμέω G1692 V-ANA (1×)

to vomit, spew out; to eject from the mouth in disgust or illness

This verb means to vomit or spew out, whether from illness or disgust. In Revelation 3:16, the risen Christ warns the Laodicean church: "Because you are lukewarm, and neither hot nor cold, I will spit you out of my mouth." The verb conveys visceral rejection—lukewarmness provokes a nauseating response, leading to expulsion. The image is deliberately shocking: spiritual mediocrity is so repulsive to Christ that He will vomit out those who remain in it. The threat aims to provoke repentance.

(1×) To vomit or spew out, expressing disgust or rejection. In Revelation 3:16, Jesus warns the lukewarm Laodiceans that He will vomit them out of His mouth. The metaphor is visceral and shocking, likening their spiritual state to something nauseating, intolerable. Neither hot (zealous) nor cold (useful for refreshment), they provoke revulsion. The stark image urges urgent repentance before judgment falls. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION

en: to-vomit | es: de-vomitar | fr: ausspeien | de: ausspeien Rev 3:16

ἐμμαίνομαι G1693 V-PPM/P-NMS (1×)

to be enraged, mad with fury; to be driven to extreme anger against someone

This verb means to be enraged or mad with fury, often directed at someone. In Acts 26:11, Paul recalls his pre-conversion zeal: "I was so enraged at them that I even pursued them to foreign cities." The present participle suggests ongoing fury—he was constantly enraged, driven by fanatical anger to persecute Christians beyond Judea. The verb captures the intensity of his opposition, a madness that later becomes a testimony to the transforming power of encountering Christ.

(1×) To be enraged or mad with fury, driven by intense anger against someone. In Acts 26:11, Paul describes his former self as being enraged against Christians, pursuing them even to foreign cities in his zeal to destroy the church. The verb conveys irrational, fanatical anger—a fury that knew no bounds. His testimony of such rage magnifies the grace that stopped him and turned him into the apostle to the Gentiles. MADNESS INSANITY

en: being-enraged | es: enfurecido | fr: enragé | de: ἐμμαινόμενος Acts 26:11

Ἐμμανουήλ G1694 N-AMS (1×)

Immanuel; Hebrew name meaning 'God with us,' a messianic title applied to Jesus

This is the Greek transliteration of the Hebrew name Immanuel, meaning "God with us." In Matthew 1:23, the angel interprets the virgin birth by quoting Isaiah 7:14: the child will be called Immanuel. The name encapsulates the mystery of the incarnation—God dwelling among His people in human flesh. Though Jesus was not literally named Immanuel, the title expresses His identity and mission: in Him, God is truly present with us, fulfilling Isaiah's prophecy in a way far exceeding its original context.

(1×) Immanuel, meaning 'God with us,' a messianic title from Isaiah 7:14 applied to Jesus in Matthew 1:23. The name expresses the theological heart of the incarnation: God has come to dwell with His people. In the virgin-born child, the divine presence takes up residence in human history. The name becomes a confession of faith, recognizing Jesus as the fulfillment of Israel's deepest hope—God's personal, saving presence. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

en: Emmanouēl | es: Emmanouél | fr: Emmanuel | de: Ἐμμανουήλ Matt 1:23

Ἐμμαούς G1695 N-NFS (1×)

Emmaus; a village near Jerusalem where Jesus appeared to two disciples after His resurrection

This place name refers to a village about seven miles (sixty stadia) from Jerusalem. In Luke 24:13, two disciples are walking to Emmaus on the day of Jesus' resurrection when the risen Lord joins them, though they don't recognize Him. He expounds the Scriptures concerning Himself, and their hearts burn within them. Only when He breaks bread do they recognize Him—then He vanishes. Emmaus becomes the setting for one of the most beloved post-resurrection appearances, a story of eyes opened and faith rekindled.

(1×) A village about seven miles from Jerusalem, the destination of two disciples on resurrection day. In Luke 24:13, they walk to Emmaus, joined by the unrecognized risen Jesus who opens the Scriptures to them. When He breaks bread, their eyes are opened and they recognize Him. Emmaus becomes a place of revelation and transformed understanding, where sorrow turns to joy and confusion gives way to faith. PERSONAL NAMES

en: Emmaous | es: Emmaoûs | fr: Emmaüs | de: Ἐμμαοῦς Luke 24:13

ἐμμένω G1696 V-AIA-3P (4×)

to remain in, abide by, persevere in; to continue steadfast in a commitment or place

A compound of ἐν + μένω, this verb intensifies the idea of remaining by emphasizing the 'in-ness'—staying within a commitment, a place, or a covenant. Paul and Barnabas exhort new believers to continue in the faith (Acts 14:22), while Paul himself remained two full years in Rome (Acts 28:30). The covenantal sense is sharpest in Hebrews 8:9 and Galatians 3:10, where failure to abide in God's covenant or law brings consequences. Spanish 'permanecer' and French 'demeurer' both stress durational persistence.

(4×) To remain steadfast in, to abide by or persevere within a commitment, place, or covenant. The ἐν- prefix localizes the remaining: one stays within the faith (Acts 14:22), within a dwelling (Acts 28:30), or within the terms of a covenant (Heb 8:9, quoting Jer 31:32). Gal 3:10 warns about remaining within everything written in the law. Spanish 'permanecer' and French 'demeurer/persévérance' capture both the spatial and the moral-commitment dimensions of this verb. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: He-remained, remained, remains | es: Permaneció, permanece, permanecer | fr: demeurer, persévérance | de: bleiben, ἐμμένειν, Ἐνέμεινεν Acts 14:22; Acts 28:30; Gal 3:10; Heb 8:9

Ἐμμώρ G1697 N-GMS (1×)

Hamor; Hebrew name meaning 'donkey,' the Canaanite prince from whom Abraham bought land at Shechem

This is the Greek form of Hamor, the Hivite prince of Shechem who sold land to Abraham (Genesis 33:19). In Acts 7:16, Stephen mentions this land purchase in his speech, though he conflates details from Abraham's purchase at Shechem and the burial at Hebron. Hamor was the father of Shechem, who defiled Dinah, leading to the violent revenge by Jacob's sons. The name appears in the account of Israel's patriarchal history, marking the acquisition of land that would become significant in Israel's settlement.

(1×) Hamor, the Hivite prince of Shechem who sold land to Abraham in Genesis 33:19. In Acts 7:16, Stephen references this transaction in his historical survey. The mention evokes the patriarchal period when Abraham and Jacob acquired property in the Promised Land. Though the historical details in Stephen's speech are compressed, the reference to Hamor anchors Jesus' story in Israel's long history of sojourning and settlement. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) en: of-Hemmōr | es: de-Hemmór | fr: Emmor | de: Ἐμμὼρ Acts 7:16

ἐγώ G1698

of me, my (genitive); to me (dative); me (accusative) - oblique cases of first person pronoun

The oblique case forms of the first-person pronoun, enabling references to 'me' in various grammatical relationships. The genitive ἐμοῦ (enclitic μου) means 'of me' or serves as the possessive 'my.' The dative ἐμοί (enclitic μοι) means 'to me' or 'for me,' indicating the indirect object or beneficiary. The accusative ἐμέ (enclitic με) serves as the direct object 'me.' These forms (descended from a different root than the nominative ἐγώ) appear in various dialectal spellings throughout Greek literature. Enclitic forms provide unstressed variants used when emphasis is not needed. Together they enable the speaker to position themselves in various grammatical roles within discourse.

ἐμός G1699 PPro-NN1P (76×)

My, mine — first-person possessive pronoun, used attributively ('my Father') or substantively ('what is mine').

Emos is the emphatic possessive form of the first person in Greek, stronger than the simple genitive mou. When Jesus says 'my food is to do the will of the one who sent me' (John 4:34) or 'my peace I give to you' (John 14:27), the emphatic form underscores personal ownership and intimate relationship. Used substantively, it means 'what is mine' — as in 'all mine are yours and yours are mine' (John 17:10). Spanish mi/mío and German mein reflect the same attributive-versus-substantive distinction.

1. my (attributive possessive) (63×) Attributive possessive 'my,' modifying a noun to express first-person ownership or relationship. Spanish mi, French mon, and German mein all render it straightforwardly. Jesus uses it repeatedly in John's Gospel to claim a unique personal bond: 'my commandments' (John 14:15),

'my joy' (John 15:11), 'my Father' (Matt 20:23). FIRST PERSON PRONOUNS

en: My, mine, my | es: Mi, mi, mía | fr: je | de: ich, mein Matt 20:23; Mark 10:40; Luke 22:19; John 3:29; John 4:34

2. mine (substantive possessive) (13×) Substantive possessive 'mine' or 'what is mine,' used without an accompanying noun to denote one's possessions, people, or domain. Spanish mío and German meiner distinguish this from the attributive use. In Matt 20:15, 'Is it not lawful for me to do what I wish with what is mine (tois emois)?'; in John 10:14, Jesus says 'I know mine (ta ema) and mine know me.' FIRST PERSON PRONOUNS

en: mine, my, my-own | es: mi, mías, mío | fr: de-moi, de-nous, moi | de: mein, meiner, uns Matt 20:15; Matt 25:27; Luke 15:31; John 10:14

ἐγώ G1700

I (first-person singular pronoun); the speaker or writer identifying themselves

The first-person pronoun marks the speaker's presence and agency in discourse. In ancient Greek it appears in strengthened forms like ἔγωγε ('I at least', 'for my part') that add emphasis or contrast. The oblique cases derive from a different root, creating the familiar genitive ἐμοῦ and dative ἐμοί. Biblical authors use this pronoun to express personal testimony, divine self-revelation, and emphatic claims about identity and authority.

ἐμπαιγ-μός G1701 N-DFS (2×)

mocking, mockery, ridicule, derision

This noun means mockery or mocking. Hebrews 11:36 lists mockings among the sufferings endured by faithful witnesses, and 2 Peter 3:3 warns of scoffers coming with mockery in the last days. The word emphasizes derisive ridicule directed at believers. It captures the scorn and contempt expressed through mocking speech and behavior.

(2×) Describing scornful mockery directed at the faithful, this sense appears in contexts of suffering and eschatological testing. Hebrews 11:36 includes mockings in a catalog of persecutions endured by Old Testament saints, while 2 Peter 3:3 warns of last-days scoffers who mock the promise of Christ's return. Both emphasize derision as a form of hostility against God's people. MOCKERY AND SCORN en: mocking, of-mockings | es: burla, de-burlas | fr: moquerie | de: Verspottung Heb 11:36; 2Pet 3:3

ἐμπαίζω G1702 V-PNA (13×)

To mock, ridicule, or treat with contempt; to deceive or make a fool of someone through trickery

A verb of cruelty and scorn that runs like a dark thread through the Passion narratives. Soldiers mock Jesus (Matt 27:29, 31), passersby ridicule him on the cross (Matt 27:41), and the chief priests join the abuse (Mark 15:20). The word carries physical and verbal contempt together: spitting, dressing in royal purple, bowing in sham homage. Yet its earliest Gospel appearance reveals a sharper edge: when the Magi fail to return, Herod realizes he has been 'mocked,' that is, outwitted and made a fool of (Matt 2:16), where deception rather than derision is the core meaning.

1. mock, ridicule, scorn (12×) To mock, ridicule, scorn, or treat with contempt through words and actions. This sense dominates New Testament usage, concentrated in the Passion predictions and fulfillment narratives: soldiers mock Jesus before crucifixion (Matt 27:29, 31; Mark 15:20; Luke 22:63), and the mockers at the cross deride him (Matt 27:41; Mark 15:31). Spanish 'burlarse' (to mock) and French 'se moquer' capture the derision precisely. Paul's warning in Galatians 6:7, 'God is not mocked,' extends the sense to any attempt to treat God with contempt. MOCKERY AND SCORN

en: having-mocked, he-will-be-mocked, mocked | es: a-burlarse, burlarse, burlándose | fr: se-moquer | de: verspottet, ἐμπαίζοντες, ἐμπαίζουσιν Matt 20:19; Matt 27:29; Matt 27:31; Matt 27:41; Mark 10:34

2. deceive, trick, fool (1×) To deceive, trick, or make a fool of someone, emphasizing outwitting rather than verbal ridicule. In Matthew 2:16, Herod perceives that the Magi have 'mocked' him, not by laughing at him but by evading his trap and departing by another route. Spanish 'fue burlado' and German 'verspottet' retain the mock-language, but the narrative context makes clear this is deception: Herod has been outmaneuvered, and his rage is that of a man duped, not merely insulted. MOCKERY AND SCORN

en: he-was-mocked | es: fue-burlado | fr: se-moquer | de: verspottet Matt 2:16

ἐμπαίκτης G1703 N-NMP (2×)

one who mocks or ridicules, especially in matters of faith; a scoffer who derides sacred truths

This term appears in warnings about skeptics who ridicule the promises of God's return. Both Peter and Jude use it to describe those who walk according to their own lusts while mocking the hope of Christ's coming. The consistent rendering as 'mockers' or 'scoffers' across languages (Spanish burladores, French moqueurs, German Spötter) emphasizes the contemptuous nature of their speech. These are not casual doubters but deliberate ridiculers of divine truth.

(2×) A mocker or scoffer who ridicules religious truth, particularly eschatological hope. Both NT occurrences (2 Pet 3:3, Jude 18) describe end-times skeptics who deride the promise of Christ's return while following their own desires. The cross-linguistic consistency (English 'mockers', Spanish 'burladores', French 'moqueurs', German 'Spötter') reflects the active, contemptuous nature of their mockery rather than passive doubt. MOCKERY AND SCORN en: mockers | es: burladores | fr: moqueurs,, ἐμπαῖκται | de: Spoetter, Spötter 2Pet 3:3; Jude 1:18

ἐμπερι-πᾰτέω G1704 V-FIA-1S (1×)

to walk among, dwell among; to move about within a community, living in close fellowship

This compound verb means to walk about among or dwell among people. In 2 Corinthians 6:16, Paul quotes the Old Testament promise: "I will dwell among them and walk among them, and I will be their God." The verb emphasizes God's active, personal presence among His people—not distant but moving among them in intimate fellowship. Classical usage includes walking to and fro at a gathering. Paul applies this to the church as God's temple: the Spirit dwells and walks among believers.

(1×) To walk or dwell among, indicating active presence and fellowship within a community. In 2 Corinthians 6:16, Paul cites God's promise to walk among His people as their God. The verb conveys not static residence but dynamic presence—God moving among His people, involved in their lives. For the church, this means the Holy Spirit actively dwells in the believing community, making them God's living temple. CONDUCT AND WALKING en: I-will-walk-among | es: andaré-entre | fr: marcher-dans | de: wandeln-in 2Cor 6:16

ἐμπίμπλημι G1705 V-RPM/P-VMP (5×)

To fill up, satisfy, or supply abundantly; to satiate with food or provision.

Describes filling to capacity or satisfying thoroughly, often with food but also with spiritual and material provision. In Mary's Magnificat, God has 'filled the hungry with good things' while sending the rich away empty (Luke 1:53). Jesus warns that those who are full now will hunger (Luke 6:25), and after the feeding miracle the fragments fill twelve baskets because all 'were satisfied' (John 6:12). Paul speaks of God filling hearts with food and gladness (Acts 14:17) and expresses his own hope to be 'filled' with the Romans' company (Rom 15:24). French 'remplir' and Spanish 'saciar' highlight both fullness and satisfaction.

(5×) To fill completely or satisfy abundantly—typically with food, provision, or enjoyment. Luke 1:53 celebrates God filling the hungry; Luke 6:25 warns the satisfied that hunger will come. John 6:12 uses the perfect participle for the crowd fully satisfied after the miraculous feeding. Acts 14:17 broadens the sense to God's providential filling of hearts with food and gladness, while Rom 15:24 applies it to Paul's desire to be 'filled' with the fellowship of the Roman church. Multilingual evidence—Spanish 'saciados,' French 'remplir,' German 'füllen'—consistently points to thorough, generous provision. FILLING AND FULLNESS

en: I-am-filled, filling, having-been-filled | es: fuere-satisfecho, fueron-saciados, llenando | fr: remplir | de: fuellen, ἐμπεπλησμένοι, ἐμπιπλῶν Luke 1:53; Luke 6:25; John 6:12; Acts 14:17; Rom 15:24

ἐμπίπτω G1706 V-FIM-3P (7×)

To fall into a pit, trap, or harmful situation; to fall among dangers or adverse circumstances.

Describes the act of falling into something — a pit, a trap, or a dangerous situation. Jesus uses it concretely in parables: a sheep falling into a pit on the Sabbath (Matt 12:11) and the blind leading the blind into a ditch (Luke 6:39). The Good Samaritan parable speaks of a man who 'fell among robbers' (Luke 10:36). In the Pastoral Epistles, Paul shifts the image to spiritual peril: a new convert who is puffed up may fall into the condemnation of the devil (1 Tim 3:6) or into the devil's trap (1 Tim 3:7). The Spanish 'caer' and French 'tomber dans' consistently convey entry into an unwanted state, whether physical or spiritual.

fall into, fall among (7×) To fall into a place, pit, trap, or harmful situation — always implying entry into an undesirable condition, whether physical or spiritual. The literal sense appears in Matthew 12:11 (a sheep falling into a pit) and Luke 6:39 (falling into a ditch), while Luke 10:36 narrates the traveler who fell among robbers. The Pastoral Epistles use the word metaphorically for spiritual danger: a novice elder may fall into the condemnation of the devil (1 Tim 3:6) or into the snare of the devil (1 Tim 3:7). The Spanish 'caer,' French 'tomber dans,' and German 'hineinfallen' all capture the involuntary, downward motion into an entrapping state. Hebrews 10:31 adds the solemn note: 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.' FALLING AND FAILING

en: fall, falls, having-fallen | es: caen, caer, caerán | fr: tomber-dans | de: hineinfallen, ἐμπέσῃ, ἐμπεσοῦνται Matt 12:11; Luke 6:39; Luke 10:36; 1Tim 3:6; 1Tim 3:7

ἐμπλέκ-ω G1707 V-PIM/P-3S (2×)

to become entangled or enmeshed in something; to be caught up in complications that hinder freedom

The word pictures getting caught in a net or snare, with metaphorical application to spiritual and moral entanglements. Paul warns Timothy that a soldier must not become entangled in civilian affairs (2 Tim 2:4), while Peter describes the tragedy of those who, having escaped sin's defilements, become entangled again and overcome (2 Pet 2:20). The German 'verwickelt' (complicated, entangled) and Spanish 'enredado' capture the sense of being caught in something restricting.

(2×) To become entangled, entwined, or caught up in something that restricts or binds. In 2 Tim 2:4, Paul uses it of a soldier avoiding entanglement in civilian pursuits to please his commander. In 2 Pet 2:20, it describes being overcome again by the defilements one had escaped. The lexical background traces to weaving or plaiting in, suggesting thorough enmeshment. Cross-linguistic renderings emphasize the passive state of being trapped or complicated. BINDING AND TYING

en: entangles-himself, having-been-entangled | es: habiendo-sido-enredados, se-enreda | fr: ἐμπλέκεται, ἐμπλακέντες | de: verwickelt 2Tim 2:4; 2Pet 2:20

ἐμ-πλοκή G1708 N-GFS (1×)

braiding, plaiting; the act of weaving hair into ornamental styles

This noun refers to braiding or plaiting, especially of hair. In 1 Peter 3:3, Peter instructs women that their adornment should not be external—"braiding the hair and wearing gold jewelry or fine clothes." He's not forbidding these things absolutely but warning against making external appearance the focus of one's identity. Classical usage includes the interweaving of roots or mathematical interlacement. Peter contrasts outward adornment with the inner beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is precious to God.

(1×) The braiding or plaiting of hair into ornamental styles. In 1 Peter 3:3, Peter cautions against letting external adornment—elaborate hairstyles, gold jewelry, fine clothes—define a woman's beauty. He's not forbidding such things but urging priorities: the imperishable beauty of a gentle, humble spirit far outweighs costly grooming. The noun symbolizes the temptation to invest in outward appearance at the expense of inward godliness. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: of-braiding | es: de-trenzado | fr: ἐμπλοκῆς | de: Flechtwerk 1Pet 3:3

ἐμπνέω G1709 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

to breathe, blow; to be alive, have life and breath

This verb means to breathe, blow, or simply to be alive. In Acts 9:1, Saul is described as "breathing threats and murder against the disciples." The participle suggests he was exhaling hostility—his very breath was filled with menace toward Christians. Classical usage includes breathing upon something, playing a wind instrument, or simply living. Here the metaphor is vivid: Saul's life was consumed with violent opposition to the church, every breath dedicated to persecution, until Christ stopped him on the road to Damascus.

(1×) To breathe or exhale, often metaphorically describing one's dominant attitude or disposition. In Acts 9:1, Saul is breathing threats and murder against the disciples—his whole being exudes hostility toward Christians. The image is powerful: persecution isn't an occasional act but the very air he breathes, his consuming passion. This makes his conversion all the more dramatic: the man breathing death becomes the apostle proclaiming life. BLOWING AND BREATHING

en: breathing | es: respirando | fr: respirer | de: ἐμπνέων Acts 9:1

ἐμπορ-εύομαι G1710 V-FIM-1P (2×)

to engage in commerce or trade; to exploit something for gain, especially in an unscrupulous manner

Originally denoting travel for business or trade, the term develops a more negative nuance in the NT. James uses it of merchants planning commercial ventures (Jas 4:13), while Peter employs it more pejoratively of false teachers who exploit believers with fabricated stories (2 Pet 2:3). The range from neutral 'trade' to exploitative 'make merchandise of' appears across translations, with the context determining whether honest commerce or greedy exploitation is in view.

(2×) To engage in trade or commerce; to buy and sell for profit. In Jas 4:13, it describes planned commercial activity ('we will trade/do business'), while in 2 Pet 2:3 it carries the negative sense of exploitation ('they will exploit/make merchandise of you'). The lexical background emphasizes traveling for business purposes. Spanish alternates between neutral 'negociar' and exploitative contexts, while German 'Handel treiben' emphasizes the commercial transaction aspect. SELLING AND COMMERCE

en: they-will-exploit, we-will-trade | es: negociaremos, negociarán | fr: ἐμπορευσόμεθα, ἐμπορεύσονται | de: Handel-treiben Jas 4:13; 2Pet 2:3

ἐμπορ-ία G1711 N-AFS (1×)

commerce, trade, business; the activity of buying and selling goods, especially by sea

This noun means commerce or trade, often referring to mercantile business conducted by sea. In Matthew 22:5, it appears in the parable of the wedding feast: those invited "went away, one to his farm, another to his business." The term represents the worldly preoccupations that cause people to reject the king's invitation. Classical usage emphasizes sea trade, but broadly it means any commercial enterprise. The parable warns that even legitimate business can become a distraction from responding to God's call.

(1×) Commerce, trade, or business activity, especially mercantile enterprise. In Matthew 22:5, it represents the worldly concerns that lead people to ignore the king's invitation to the wedding feast. One goes to his farm, another to his business—both legitimate pursuits, yet they become excuses for refusing the summons. The noun symbolizes how earthly preoccupations, however respectable, can blind us to God's invitation and lead to judgment. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15304 WITH 4 SENSES

en: business | es: negocio | fr: commerce | de: ἐμπορίαν Matt 22:5

ἐμπόρ-ιον G1712 N-GNS (1×)

trading place, marketplace, commercial center where merchants gather and conduct business

This term refers to a trading station or marketplace, a commercial hub where business transactions occur. In the ancient world, such centers were vital for economic exchange, serving as gathering points for merchants. Jesus uses this word when cleansing the temple in John 2:16, condemning those who had turned his Father's house into a marketplace, highlighting the inappropriate mixing of sacred and commercial space.

(1×) The single New Testament occurrence in John 2:16 captures Jesus' rebuke during the temple cleansing: 'Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.' The cross-lingual glosses (commerce, market, Markt) consistently point to commercial activity. Classical usage shows ἐμπόριον designated trading stations and exchanges where merchants conducted business, particularly at Corinth and Athens. MERCHANDISE WARES

en: of-commerce | es: de-mercado | fr: commerce | de: Markt John 2:16

ἔμπορ-ος G1713 N-NMP (5×)

A merchant or trader; one who travels to buy and sell goods, especially by sea.

Denotes a wholesale trader who imports goods, distinguished in classical Greek from the small-scale retailer (kapelos). Jesus uses the figure positively in the parable of the merchant seeking fine pearls, who sells everything to acquire the pearl of great price (Matt 13:45). Revelation paints a strikingly different picture: the merchants of the earth grow rich through Babylon's luxury (Rev 18:3, 11, 15) and weep at her fall because no one buys their cargo anymore (Rev 18:23). Spanish 'mercaderes' and French 'marchand' both carry the sense of a large-scale dealer.

(5×) A traveling merchant or wholesale trader who imports and sells goods, often by sea. In Matt 13:45 the merchant seeking beautiful pearls represents one who recognizes supreme value and sacrifices everything for it—a positive image of the kingdom seeker. In Revelation 18:3, 11, 15, 23, the merchants of the earth are entangled with Babylon's opulent commerce, mourning when her trade collapses. The contrast between these two portraits—devoted seeker versus worldly profiteer—gives the word theological range. Spanish 'mercaderes,' French 'marchand,' and German 'Kaufleute' all point to large-scale commercial activity. MERCHANTS AND TRADERS

en: a-merchant, merchants | es: mercader, mercaderes | fr: marchand | de: Kaufleute, ἐμπόρῳ Matt 13:45; Rev 18:3; Rev 18:11; Rev 18:15; Rev 18:23

ἐμ-πρήθω G1714 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to burn, set on fire, destroy by burning; inflame or consume with fire

This verb means to burn or set aflame, often with destructive intent. The word appears in Matthew 22:7 in Jesus' parable of the wedding feast, where the king 'burned their city' in response to those who rejected his invitation. The lexical background shows this term was used for burning cities in Homer and other classical texts, emphasizing total destruction by fire. It conveys divine judgment through complete consumption.

(1×) In Matthew 22:7, the king's wrathful response to the rejection of his invitation includes burning the murderers' city. This is judgment vocabulary, depicting complete destruction. Spanish incendió and French brûler capture the violent, consuming nature of the action. The classical usage for burning cities (μέγα ἄστυ in Homer) aligns perfectly with the parabolic judgment context. FIRE AND BURNING

en: burned | es: incendió | fr: brûler | de: ἐνέπρησεν Matt 22:7

ἔμπροσθ-εν G1715 Prep (48×)

before, in front of, ahead — a spatial and relational marker of position or rank in someone's presence

Emprosthen functions as both preposition and adverb, indicating position 'in front of' or 'before' someone or something. Its 48 New Testament occurrences overwhelmingly govern the genitive, placing actions or persons in the sight or presence of another: good works shining 'before men' (Matt 5:16), confessing Christ 'before my Father' (Matt 10:32), or Judas going 'ahead of' the crowd (Luke 22:47). Jesus warns against practicing righteousness 'before people to be seen by them' (Matt 6:1), and the Baptist testifies that the one coming 'after me has surpassed me because he was before me' (John 1:15, 30) — here emprosthen carries temporal-priority and rank, not just spatial position. The translations are notably consistent: Spanish 'delante de,' French 'devant,' German 'vor' — each covering both spatial and honorific senses.

before, in front of, ahead (48×) A preposition or adverb indicating spatial position in front of, directional movement ahead of, or relational standing in the presence and sight of another. Spatial: the star going 'before' the Magi (Matt 2:9), casting pearls 'before' swine (Matt 7:6). Relational-presentational: doing good works 'before men' (Matt 5:16), confessing or denying 'before my Father' (Matt 10:32-33), laying gifts 'before the altar' (Matt 5:24). Temporal-priority or rank: John the Baptist's testimony that Christ 'was before me' (John 1:15, 30). All 48 occurrences share this unified 'in front of / in the presence of' sense across its spatial, presentational, and priority dimensions. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: before | es: delante, delante-de, delante–de | fr: devant | de: vor, vor- Matt 5:16; Matt 5:24; Matt 6:1; Matt 6:2; Matt 7:6

ἐμ-πτύω G1716 V-PNA (6×)

To spit upon someone, expressing contempt, mockery, or abuse.

A visceral verb of public degradation, used exclusively in the Gospels to describe the humiliation of Jesus during his passion. The Sanhedrin members spit in his face after the trial (Matt 26:67), the Roman soldiers do the same during their mockery (Matt 27:30; Mark 15:19), and Jesus himself predicts this treatment beforehand (Mark 10:34). Spitting on someone was among the most degrading acts in the ancient Mediterranean world – an assault on honor that crossed every cultural boundary. The Spanish 'escupir,' French 'cracher sur,' and English 'spit upon' all preserve the raw physicality of the act.

spit on/upon (6×) To spit upon someone as a deliberate act of contempt, mockery, or physical abuse. All six NT occurrences are concentrated in the Passion narratives and Jesus's predictions thereof. At the Sanhedrin trial, members of the council spit in Jesus's face (Matt 26:67; Mark 14:65). Roman soldiers repeat the insult during the scourging and mockery (Matt 27:30; Mark 15:19). Jesus himself foretells this treatment in Mark 10:34 and Luke 18:32. The act carried intense cultural weight in the ancient world as an assault on personal honor, and every translation tradition renders it with corresponding directness: Spanish 'escupir,' French 'cracher sur.' SPITTING CONTEMPT

en: having-spat, he-will-be-spit-upon, they-spat | es: a-escupir, escupieron, escupirán | fr: cracher-sur | de: ἐμπτυσθήσεται, ἐμπτύειν, ἐμπτύσαντες Matt 26:67; Matt 27:30; Mark 10:34; Mark 14:65; Mark 15:19

ἐμφαν-ής G1717 Adj-AMS (2×)

visible, manifest, openly shown; appearing in clear view or made evident to perception

The word carries the idea of making visible what was previously hidden or potential. God made Jesus manifest to chosen witnesses after the resurrection (Acts 10:40), while Paul quotes Isaiah about God becoming manifest to those who were not seeking Him (Rom 10:20). The lexical background includes appearing bodily among men and being produced openly in court. Translations consistently emphasize the quality of being openly visible or clearly evident rather than hidden or obscure.

(2×) Visible, manifest, openly shown to view. In Acts 10:40, God gave Jesus to become manifest to chosen witnesses after his resurrection—not to all, but to those appointed to see him bodily. In Rom 10:20, Isaiah's prophecy describes God becoming manifest to those not seeking him. The classical sense of appearing bodily or being produced openly in court underlies both uses. Cross-linguistic glosses consistently render the clear, visible quality of manifestation. MANIFEST AND EVIDENT

en: manifest | es: manifiesto | fr: manifeste | de: offenbar, ἐμφανῆ Acts 10:40; Rom 10:20

ἐμφαν-ίζω G1718 V-AIA-2S (10×)

To make known or visible; either to formally report/disclose information to authorities, or to reveal, manifest, and make apparent.

A verb with two distinct spheres of action in the New Testament. In the legal corridors of Acts, it describes the formal act of laying charges or reporting information to a Roman official – the chief priests 'inform' the commander against Paul (Acts 23:15, 24:1, 25:2). But in the Gospels and Hebrews, it takes on a luminous quality: Jesus promises to 'manifest' himself to those who love him (John 14:21-22), risen saints 'appeared' in Jerusalem (Matt 27:53), and Christ now 'appears' before God on our behalf (Heb 9:24). The Spanish translations capture this split neatly: 'informaron' for legal reporting versus 'manifestaré' for divine self-revelation.

1. inform, report, make known (5×) Denotes the formal act of reporting, disclosing, or laying information before an authority figure. All five NT occurrences cluster in Acts 23-25, where it describes presenting charges or intelligence to Roman commanders and governors. The multilingual evidence is consistent – Spanish 'informaron/informaste,' French 'présenter,' English 'make known' – all pointing to an official, juridical register rather than casual communication. SHOWING AND REVEALING

en: made-known, make-known, you-disclosed | es: informad, informaron, informaste | fr: présenter | de: zeigt Acts 23:15; Acts 23:22; Acts 24:1; Acts 25:2; Acts 25:15

2. reveal, manifest, appear (5×) Describes making something visible, manifest, or apparent – whether through active self-revelation or passive appearing. Jesus uses it of his promised self-disclosure to faithful disciples (John 14:21-22), Matthew employs it for the startling appearance of risen saints in Jerusalem after the crucifixion (Matt 27:53), and Hebrews applies it both to Christ appearing before God (Heb 9:24) and to the patriarchs making clear their heavenly homeland (Heb 11:14). Spanish 'manifestaré' and German 'offenbaren' highlight the revelatory force absent from the legal sense. REVEALING AND DISCLOSING

en: appeared, make-clear, to-appear | es: a-manifestar, aparecieron, manifestaré | fr: manifester | de: offenbaren, zeigt Matt 27:53; John 14:21; John 14:22; Heb 9:24; Heb 11:14

ἔμφοβ-ος G1719 Adj-NMS (5×)

Frightened, terrified, struck with fear; describing a state of alarm or dread at a supernatural or overwhelming event.

An adjective describing the state of being gripped by fear, nearly always in response to a divine or supernatural encounter. The women at the empty tomb become terrified before the angelic messengers (Luke 24:5), the disciples are frightened when Jesus appears among them (Luke 24:37), Cornelius stares in fear at the angel who visits him (Acts 10:4), and Felix becomes alarmed as Paul reasons about judgment (Acts 24:25). In Revelation 11:13, survivors of the earthquake become 'terrified' and give glory to God. French 'effrayé' and Spanish 'atemorizado' convey this overwhelming dread.

(5×) In a state of terror or alarm, typically provoked by a divine or supernatural manifestation. Luke 24:5 and 24:37 describe the fear of those confronting resurrection appearances—the women at the tomb and the disciples in the upper room. Acts 10:4 captures Cornelius' fright at seeing an angel, and Acts 24:25 extends the term to Felix's alarm at Paul's preaching on righteousness and coming judgment. Revelation 11:13 applies it to earthquake survivors who give glory to God out of terror. Spanish 'atemorizado,' French 'effrayé,' and German 'erschrocken' all emphasize sudden, overwhelming fright. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: frightened, terrified | es: atemorizadas, atemorizado, atemorizados | fr: effrayé | de: erschrocken, ἐμφόβων, ἔμφοβοι Luke 24:5; Luke 24:37; Acts 10:4; Acts 24:25; Rev 11:13

ἐμφῡσ-άω G1720 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to breathe on, breathe into; impart breath or spirit by breathing upon someone

This verb means to breathe upon or into someone, often with symbolic or spiritual significance. In John 20:22, the resurrected Jesus breathes on his disciples and says 'Receive the Holy Spirit,' echoing God's act of breathing life into Adam in Genesis. The gesture conveys impartation of divine presence and power. Classical usage includes breathing into flutes to produce sound, but the biblical context is clearly one of life-giving and Spirit-imparting action.

(1×) John 20:22 records the risen Christ breathing on the disciples and commanding them to receive the Holy Spirit. This pneumatic gesture recalls Genesis 2:7 where God breathed into Adam. The multilingual glosses (breathed, sopló, souffler, anhauchen) all emphasize the physical act, while the theological significance is pneumatological: Jesus imparts the Spirit by breath, a creative and life-giving act reserved for God. BLOWING AND BREATHING

en: he-breathed | es: sopló | fr: souffler-sur | de: anhauchen John 20:22

ἔμφῡτος G1721 Adj-AMS (1×)

implanted, inborn, innate; planted within or naturally inherent in someone

This adjective describes something implanted or innate, either naturally inborn or deliberately planted. In James 1:21, believers are urged to receive 'the implanted word' that can save their souls. The term can mean naturally inherent (as inborn virtue in classical texts) or deliberately planted (as trees or ideas). James uses it metaphorically for God's word planted in the heart, contrasting external hearing with internal reception and rooting.

(1×) James 1:21 exhorts readers to receive with meekness 'the implanted word' capable of saving souls. This is agricultural and pedagogical language: God's word is not merely heard externally but planted within, taking root in the receptive heart. Classical usage shows ἔμφυτος could mean both naturally inborn and deliberately planted. The context in James favors the latter: divine truth planted in the believer's inner being. PLANTING VEGETATION

en: implanted | es: implantada | fr: ἔμφυτον | de: eingepflanzt Jas 1:21

ἐν G1722 Prep (2772×)

In, within, among, by means of; the primary Greek locative preposition extending to instrumental, associative, and distributive uses.

The preposition en (ἐν) is the most frequently used preposition in the New Testament, appearing nearly 2,800 times. At its core it means 'in' or 'within,' but its semantic reach extends far beyond spatial location. It can indicate the sphere in which something operates ('in Christ,' 'in the Spirit'), the instrument by which something is accomplished ('by the sword'), the company among whom one stands ('among the prophets'), or the surface upon which one sits. Its versatility is visible in how translators handle it: Spanish consistently uses 'en,' French favors 'dans,' while German 'in' mirrors the Greek closely — yet each language must shift strategies when the instrumental or associative sense dominates.

1. locative: in, within (2442×) The foundational locative sense: 'in, within,' marking position inside a space, realm, condition, or metaphorical sphere. This covers physical location ('in Bethlehem,' Matt 2:1), spiritual state ('in Christ,' 'in the Spirit'), temporal setting ('in those days'), and abstract domains ('in truth'). With over 2,400 occurrences it is overwhelmingly the dominant use. The cross-linguistic consistency is striking — Spanish 'en,' French 'dans,' German 'in' — reflecting how naturally this core spatial meaning maps across Indo-European languages (e.g., Matt 1:18, Matt 2:2, Matt 3:3). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: in, in-, on- | es: en | fr: dans- | de: in Matt 1:18; Matt 2:2; Matt 2:16; Matt 3:3; Matt 3:12

2. distributive: among (120×) The distributive sense: 'among, in the midst of,' marking position within a group or collective rather than within an enclosed space. Jesus is 'among' the teachers (Luke 2:46), the greatest 'among' those born of women (Matt 11:11), and whoever would be great 'among' you must serve (Matt 20:26). Spanish shifts from 'en' to 'entre' for this sense, revealing the semantic distinction that Greek collapses under a single preposition. French maintains 'dans' but the context of plurality signals the distributive reading. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: among, among-, with | es: en, entre, entre- | fr: dans- | de: in, in- Matt 2:6; Matt 4:23; Matt 11:11; Matt 20:26

3. association: with (99×) The associative sense: 'with,' marking accompaniment, manner, or attendant circumstance. He will baptize 'with' the Holy Spirit and fire (Matt 3:11), salt that has lost its savor 'with' what shall it be salted? (Matt 5:13). Spanish uses 'con' here, a clear departure from the locative 'en,' and French sometimes shifts from 'dans' to signal the accompaniment nuance. This sense often overlaps with the instrumental, but the focus is on the accompanying condition rather than the means of action (Matt 7:2, Matt 7:6). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: by, by-, in | es: a, con, con- | fr: dans- | de: in, in- Matt 5:13; Matt 7:2; Matt 7:6; Matt 20:15

4. instrumental: by means of (92×) The instrumental sense: 'by means of, by, through,' marking the instrument, agency, or means by which something is accomplished. 'By Beelzebul he casts out demons' (Matt 12:24), 'by the Spirit of God' (Matt 12:28), 'by what measure you measure' (Matt 7:2). Spanish reveals this with 'por' (by/through), distinctly different from locative 'en.' The Pharisees' accusation in Matt 12:24 and Jesus' counter in 12:27–28 use en instrumentally in rapid succession, making the agency reading unmistakable. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: by, by-, in | es: en, en-, por | fr: dans- | de: in, in- Matt 12:24; Matt 12:27; Matt 12:28; Matt 13:57

5. surface/point: on, at (19×) The contact or surface sense: 'on, at,' marking position on a surface or at a specific point rather than enclosed within a space. The two women grinding 'at' the mill (Matt 24:41), the young man sitting 'on' the right side (Mark 16:5), the herd feeding 'on' the mountain (Luke 8:32), Christ seated 'at' the right hand of God (Rom 8:34). Spanish alternates between 'a' and 'en,' while this sense is relatively rare (19 occurrences), showing that Greek en only occasionally extends to surface contact where English would prefer 'on' or 'at.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: at, at-, on | es: a, con, en | fr: dans- | de: in, in- Matt 24:41; Mark 16:5; Luke 8:32; Luke 10:31; Rom 8:34

ἐναγκάλ-ίζομαι G1723 V-APM-NMS (2×)

to take into one's arms, embrace; a gesture of affection, blessing, or protection

This tender verb appears only in Mark's Gospel, both times describing Jesus taking children into his arms. After teaching about receiving the kingdom like a child, Jesus took a child in his arms to illustrate his point (Mark 9:36). Later, when blessing children brought to him, he took them in his arms and blessed them (Mark 10:16). The action conveys warmth, acceptance, and paternal care. The middle voice emphasizes Jesus' personal, deliberate action in drawing the children close.

(2×) To take into one's arms, embrace. Both occurrences show Jesus taking children in his arms: in Mark 9:36 while teaching about humility and receiving the kingdom, and in Mark 10:16 while blessing children brought to him. The middle voice suggests personal, deliberate action. Spanish preserves the participle form ('habiéndolo abrazado'), emphasizing the completed action of taking into arms. The gesture conveys affection, blessing, and protective care. EMBRACE CLASP en: embracing | es: habiéndolo-abrazado, habiéndolos-abrazado | fr: prendre-dans-les-bras | de: in-die-Arme-nehmen Mark 9:36; Mark 10:16

ἐνάλιος G1724 Adj-GNP (1×)

of the sea, marine, aquatic; pertaining to creatures or things that inhabit the sea

This adjective describes creatures or things belonging to the sea. In James 3:7, it appears in a list of categories that humans have tamed: land animals, birds, sea creatures, and reptiles. The term emphasizes the marine habitat and nature of these beings. Classical usage applied it to sea gods like Poseidon, seamen, islands, and marine life. James uses it to highlight humanity's God-given dominion over creation, contrasting our ability to tame all creatures with our inability to tame the tongue.

(1×) James 3:7 catalogs humanity's taming achievements: beasts, birds, serpents, and 'things in the sea.' The genitive plural ἐναλίων denotes marine creatures. Cross-lingual evidence (sea creatures, marinos, im Meer lebend) confirms the aquatic reference. Classical texts used this term for fish, sea gods, and maritime contexts. James' point is that while we've subdued every category of creation, the human tongue remains untamable—a sobering indictment. SEA LARGE WATER en: of-sea-creatures | es: de-marinos | fr: ἐναλίων | de: im-Meer-lebend Jas 3:7

ἔναντι G1725 Prep (2×)

in the presence of, before; used of position in someone's sight or awareness

This preposition (taking the genitive) denotes presence before someone, especially in contexts of worship or divine awareness. Zechariah serves as priest before God (Luke 1:8), while Peter declares that Simon's heart is not right before God (Acts 8:21). Though less common than similar prepositions, it carries a formal or solemn tone, emphasizing standing in the presence or sight of someone. The Septuagint usage influenced its appearance in Luke's more Hebraic Greek style.

(2×) In the presence of, before (with genitive). In Luke 1:8, Zechariah performs priestly service before God (ἔναντι τοῦ θεοῦ). In Acts 8:21, Peter tells Simon his heart is not right before God. The lexical background in the LXX and later Greek emphasizes standing in the presence or sight of someone. Translations preserve the formal, positional sense: Spanish 'delante', French 'devant', suggesting standing before in awareness or judgment. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE en: before | es: delante | fr: devant | de: ἔναντι Luke 1:8; Acts 8:21

ἐναντίος G1726 Prep (5×)

Before, in the presence of, in the sight of; a preposition denoting position facing someone, especially God or a public assembly.

A preposition meaning 'before' or 'in the sight of,' carrying a note of public visibility or divine awareness. Zechariah and Elizabeth walk blamelessly 'before God' (Luke 1:6), Jesus is a prophet mighty in deed and word 'before God and all the people' (Luke 24:19), and Joseph finds favor 'before Pharaoh' (Acts 7:10). The sense of being exposed to an observer's gaze makes it weightier than a simple spatial 'in front of'—it implies accountability and witness. Spanish 'delante de' and French 'devant' both carry this nuance of being in someone's direct line of sight.

(5×) In the presence of, before the face of, or in the sight of—typically God, a ruler, or a public assembly. Luke 1:6 describes Zechariah and Elizabeth as righteous 'before God,' stressing divine witness. Luke 20:26 notes the opponents' inability to catch Jesus 'before the people,' and Luke 24:19 praises Jesus as mighty 'before God and all the people.' Acts 7:10 recounts Joseph finding favor 'before Pharaoh,' and Acts 8:32 echoes Isaiah's lamb silent 'before' its shearer. The consistent note across languages—Spanish 'delante

de,' French 'devant,' German 'vor'—is one of accountability under direct observation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: before | es: delante, delante-de, delante-del | fr: devant | de: ἐναντίον Luke 1:6; Luke 20:26; Luke 24:19; Acts 7:10; Acts 8:32

ἐναντίος G1727 Adj-ANP (8×)

Contrary, opposing; opposite in spatial position — resistance in direction, purpose, or physical placement

The adjective ἐναντίος carries the classical Greek sense of 'set against,' whether as wind blowing against a boat, people acting in hostile opposition, or someone standing physically opposite another. In the Gospels, Jesus' disciples struggle against a 'contrary' wind (Matt 14:24; Mark 6:48) — a vivid image of natural forces resisting human effort. In Acts, the word shifts to interpersonal and ideological opposition: Paul confesses he once thought he ought to do many things 'contrary to' the name of Jesus (Acts 26:9). A single occurrence in Mark 15:39, where the centurion stands 'opposite' the cross, preserves the purely spatial, non-hostile sense of facing someone directly.

1. contrary, opposed (7×) Contrary, opposing, or hostile — acting against someone or something in direction, purpose, or attitude. Used of wind blowing against a boat on the Sea of Galilee (Matt 14:24; Mark 6:48), headwinds impeding sea travel (Acts 27:4), Paul's former opposition to Jesus' name (Acts 26:9), and Jewish leaders perceived as acting 'contrary' to Paul's mission (Acts 28:17). Arabic 'muaakisatan' (opposing), Hebrew 'mitnagged' (resisting), and Korean 'yeonkpung' (역풍, headwind) all deploy active-opposition vocabulary. This sense accounts for seven of the eight NT occurrences. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: contrary, opposite | es: contrarias, contrario, contrarios | fr: contraire, opposé | de: ἐναντία, ἐναντίας, ἐναντίον Matt 14:24; Mark 6:48; Acts 26:9; Acts 27:4; Acts 28:17

2. opposite (spatial position) (1×) Physically positioned opposite or facing someone, a spatial relationship without hostile connotation. In Mark 15:39, the centurion who stood 'opposite' (ἐξ ἐναντίας) Jesus watched him breathe his last and confessed him as the Son of God. Spanish 'enfrente' (in front of, facing), rather than 'contrario' (contrary), and the simple positional framing of the narrative confirm a spatial-locative sense distinct from the adversarial meaning. This sole occurrence preserves the oldest Homeric usage of the word as simple face-to-face positioning. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: opposite | es: enfrente | fr: contraire | de: ἐναντίας Mark 15:39

ἐνάρχομαι G1728 V-APM-NMP (2×)

to begin, make a beginning; to commence an action or state, especially significant endeavors

Originally used of beginning sacrificial offerings, the term broadened to mean any kind of beginning or commencement. Paul uses it twice to highlight the contrast between beginning and continuing. The Galatians began by the Spirit but foolishly tried to complete by the flesh (Gal 3:3). God who began a good work in the Philippians will complete it until Christ's day (Phil 1:6). The aorist participles emphasize the decisive moment of initiation, setting up the irony or confidence of what follows.

(2×) To begin, make a beginning, commence. In Gal 3:3, Paul asks if they began by the Spirit only to complete by the flesh—a rhetorical question highlighting inconsistency. In Phil 1:6, Paul expresses confidence that God who began a good work will complete it. The aorist participles mark the decisive starting point. The classical background includes beginning sacrificial rites and taking office. Cross-linguistic renderings preserve the simple sense of commencement: 'having begun', 'ayant commencé'. BEGIN START en: having-begun | es: habiendo-comenzado | fr: ἐναρξάμενοι, ἐναρξάμενος | de: anfangen Gal 3:3; Phil 1:6

ἐνδε-ής G1729 Adj-NMS (1×)

needy, lacking, in want; deficient or deprived of necessary resources

This adjective describes someone in need or lacking necessities. Acts 4:34 uses it to describe the early church's economic sharing: 'Neither was there any among them that lacked.' The term indicates material want or deprivation. Classical usage shows it could mean lacking in specific things or generally in need, sometimes with comparative force (more deficient). Luke emphasizes the complete elimination of poverty in the Jerusalem church through radical generosity and communal sharing.

(1×) Acts 4:34 celebrates the economic miracle of the early church: 'There was not a needy person among them.' This echoes Deuteronomy 15:4's vision of no poor in Israel. The adjective ἐνδεής marks material lack, and its negation here signals complete provision. Glosses like needy, necesitado, and manquant capture the economic dimension. The community's sharing practice eradicated want—a powerful witness to transformed relationships. POVERTY AND WEAKNESS

en: needy | es: necesitado | fr: manquant | de: ἐνδεής Acts 4:34

ἔνδειγμα G1730 N-NNS (1×)

evidence, proof, sign; that which demonstrates or makes something evident

This noun means evidence or proof, something that demonstrates truth or reality. In 2 Thessalonians 1:5, Paul calls the believers' patient endurance under persecution 'manifest token of the righteous judgment of God.' Their suffering proves God's justice, both in honoring their faithfulness and in judging their persecutors. Classical usage shows ἔνδειγμα was used for tokens or evidence of goodwill or truth. Paul transforms suffering into evidential value, revealing divine purposes.

(1×) In 2 Thessalonians 1:5, persecution becomes ἔνδειγμα—clear evidence—of God's righteous judgment. The believers' endurance under trial demonstrates they are worthy of God's kingdom, while their oppressors face future judgment. This paradoxical logic makes present suffering a sign of future vindication. The multilingual glosses (evidence, prueba, proof, Beweis) all point to demonstrative force. Classical usage for tokens of goodwill fits Paul's meaning: suffering proves divine justice. TESTING AND PROVING en: evidence | es: prueba | fr: ἔνδειγμα | de: Beweis 2Thess 1:5

ἐνδείκ-νῡμι G1731 V-ANM (11×)

Show forth, demonstrate — to openly display or prove a quality, whether God's wrath and mercy or human faithfulness

The verb ἐνδείκνυμι (endeiknymi) means to show forth, demonstrate, or put on display for others to see. It serves as a key Pauline term for God's deliberate revelation of his attributes: God 'demonstrates' his wrath against sin (Rom 9:17, 22), 'shows' the exceeding riches of his grace toward believers (Eph 2:7), and 'displayed' his perfect patience in saving Paul as a pattern (1 Tim 1:16). Human subjects likewise 'show' their love, faithfulness, or good conduct before others (2 Cor 8:24; Tit 2:10; 3:2; Heb 6:10-11). Rom 2:15 uses it of Gentiles who 'show' the work of the law written on their hearts. Spanish 'demostrar/mostrar' and French 'montrer/démontrer' capture the evidential, public character of the display.

show, demonstrate, display (11×) To show forth, demonstrate, or put on public display — making a quality, attitude, or reality evident to others. Of God: demonstrating wrath against Pharaoh to make his power known (Rom 9:17, 22), showing the surpassing riches of grace in Christ (Eph 2:7), and displaying perfect patience through Paul's conversion (1 Tim 1:16). Of persons: showing the work of the law inscribed on the heart (Rom 2:15), demonstrating love and earnestness to the churches (2 Cor 8:24), displaying gentleness and faithfulness in conduct (Tit 2:10; 3:2; Heb 6:10-11). Negatively, Alexander 'showed' much harm (2 Tim 4:14). Spanish 'demostrar' and Arabic ‴ both convey the deliberate, evidential quality. SHOWING AND REVEALING en: I-might-show, he-might-show, might-demonstrate | es: demostrando, demuestran, mostrando | fr: erweisen, montrer | de: erweisen Rom 2:15; Rom 9:17; Rom 9:22; 2Cor 8:24; Eph 2:7

ἔνδειξις G1732 N-AFS (4×) demonstration, proof, evidence; a visible display that establishes something as true

This noun denotes a concrete showing-forth that makes something evident or provable. Paul uses it twice in Romans 3:25-26 to describe Christ's sacrificial death as God's 'demonstration' of his righteousness—not merely a claim but a public exhibit of justice. In 2 Corinthians 8:24, the Corinthians are urged to show proof of their love before the churches. Philippians 1:28 speaks of the opponents' resistance as evidence of their destruction. Each use demands that the proof be visible to others.

(4×) A public demonstration or visible proof that establishes a truth-claim before witnesses. All four NT uses emphasize externally verifiable evidence. In Rom 3:25-26, God sets forth Christ as a demonstration (ἔνδειξιν) of divine righteousness—twice repeated for emphasis. In 2 Cor 8:24, the Corinthians must display proof (ἔνδειξιν) of their love. Phil 1:28 treats the opponents' boldness as evidence (ἔνδειξις) of coming judgment. French 'démonstration' and German 'Beweis' both capture the forensic, evidentiary quality. TESTING AND PROVING en: demonstration, evidence, proof | es: demostración, señal | fr: Beweis, démonstration | de: Beweis Rom 3:25; Rom 3:26; 2Cor 8:24; Phil 1:28

ἕνδεκα G1733 Adj-DMP (6×)

Eleven; the cardinal number, used in the NT for the apostolic group after Judas's departure.

The indeclinable numeral 'eleven' appears in the NT exclusively as a designation for the apostolic circle between Judas's betrayal and Matthias's appointment. It functions almost as a title – 'the Eleven' – marking a poignant gap in the Twelve. The risen Jesus appears to the Eleven (Mark 16:14; Matt 28:16), the women report the empty tomb to the Eleven (Luke 24:9, 33), and the group is restored to twelve when Matthias is numbered with the Eleven (Acts 1:26). Spanish 'once' and French 'onze' directly translate the number, but the theological weight lies in the absence it implies.

(6×) The cardinal number eleven, used in every NT occurrence as a quasi-title for the apostolic group following Judas Iscariot's defection and prior to Matthias's election. 'The Eleven' (hoi hendeka) appears at the Great Commission (Matt 28:16), the post-resurrection appearance (Mark 16:14), the report from the empty tomb (Luke 24:9), the Emmaus disciples' return (Luke 24:33), and the selection of Matthias (Acts 1:26; 2:14). The number itself carries narrative tension – it signals incompleteness, a body that should be twelve. NUMBER ELEVEN en: eleven | es: once | fr: onze | de: ἕνδεκα Matt 28:16; Mark 16:14; Luke 24:9; Luke 24:33; Acts 1:26

ἑνδέκᾰτος G1734 Adj-NMS (3×)

eleventh, the ordinal number for eleven; marking the eleventh hour or eleventh foundation stone

The adjective ἑνδέκατος is the ordinal number corresponding to eleven, used to mark sequence or position. In Jesus' parable of workers in the vineyard, the 'eleventh hour' represents the final hour of a twelve-hour workday—nearly too late, yet still time for hiring and grace. In Revelation's New Jerusalem, the eleventh foundation stone marks position in the ordered beauty of the eternal city. The number itself carries the sense of lateness or near-completion.

(3×) Matthew 20:6 and 20:9 both reference the parable's climax: 'about the eleventh hour he went out and found others standing' (v.6), 'when those hired about the eleventh hour came, each of them received a denarius' (v.9)—late-coming workers receiving full pay, illustrating grace's economics. Revelation 21:20 catalogs the city's foundations: 'the tenth jacinth, the eleventh jacinth'—the ordered splendor of the new creation. The Spanish (undécima, undécimo) and French (onzième) are straightforward ordinals, while German (elfte) matches. The theological freight in Matthew's parable makes 'eleventh hour' proverbial for last-minute opportunity—nearly too late, yet grace still operative. The number marks both lateness and inclusion. NUMBER ELEVEN

en: eleventh | es: undécima, undécimo, | fr: onzième | de: elfte, ἑνδεκάτην Matt 20:6; Matt 20:9; Rev 21:20

ἐνδέχομαι G1735 V-PIM/P-3S (1×)

it is possible, it is acceptable; something admits of being done or is permissible

This impersonal verb means 'it is possible' or 'it admits of,' indicating that something can happen or is permissible. In Luke 13:33, Jesus says, 'It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem,' expressing the ironic inevitability that prophets die in the holy city. The term conveys both logical possibility and contextual fittingness. Classical usage shows it could mean accept, believe, or allow. Jesus uses it to express the tragic pattern of Jerusalem's rejection of God's messengers.

(1×) Luke 13:33 contains Jesus' bitter observation: 'It is not possible for a prophet to perish outside Jerusalem.' This is dramatic irony—the holy city murders God's spokesmen. The verb ἐνδέχεται expresses not mere possibility but historical pattern and prophetic inevitability. Spanish es-posible and French il-est-possible capture the modal force. Jesus walks knowingly toward Jerusalem and the cross, acknowledging the city's deadly track record. POWER AND ABILITY

en: it-is-acceptable | es: es-posible | fr: il-est-possible | de: ἐνδέχεται Luke 13:33

ἐνδημ-έω G1736 V-PPA-NMP (3×)

to be at home, dwell in; residing in one's proper place, especially the body as temporary dwelling

The verb ἐνδημέω (ἐν + δῆμος 'at home among one's people') means to be at home, dwell in, or reside in a place. Paul uses it as counterpoint to ἐκδημέω ('be away from home'), creating a spatial metaphor for the believer's dual location: at home in the body but away from the Lord, or away from the body and at home with the Lord. The verb establishes embodied life as temporary residence, with true home elsewhere.

(3×) All three occurrences cluster in 2 Corinthians 5:6-9 alongside ἐκδημέω. Verse 6: 'while we are at home in the body we are away from the Lord.' Verse 8: 'we would rather be away from the body and at home with the Lord.' Verse 9: 'whether we are at home or away, we make it our aim to please him.' The Spanish (estando-en-casa, estar-en-casa) and French (être-chez-soi) literalize the at-home language, while German (daheim-sein) uses 'being-at-home.' Paul's point is paradoxical: present embodiment is both real dwelling (we are at home in the body) and exile (we are away from the Lord). Death inverts the geography—away from body means at home with the Lord. The verb pair creates existential cartography for Christian hope. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: being-at-home, to-be-at-home | es: estando-en-casa, estar-en-casa | fr: être-chez-soi | de: daheim-sein 2Cor 5:6; 2Cor 5:8; 2Cor 5:9

ἐνδῐδύσκω G1737 V-IIM-3S (2×)

to clothe, dress; to put garments on someone, often in ceremonial or habitual contexts

This form describes dressing someone else or oneself. Roman soldiers mockingly dressed Jesus in purple before crucifying him (Mark 15:17). The rich man in Jesus' parable habitually dressed in purple and fine linen (Luke 16:19), the imperfect tense emphasizing his customary luxury. While the act is neutral, context determines whether it's mockery, habit, or honor. The middle voice can emphasize personal interest in the clothing, though usage varies.

(2×) To clothe, dress, put garments on. In Mark 15:17, soldiers dress Jesus in purple as mockery before the crucifixion. In Luke 16:19, the rich man habitually dressed in purple and fine linen (imperfect tense showing repeated action). The lexical entry notes middle usage for dressing oneself. German and Spanish preserve the distinction between dressing others and self-dressing. The act is morally neutral; context determines whether it's mockery, status display, or simple attire. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: they-clothe, was-dressing | es: vestíase, visten | fr: revêtir | de: ἐνδιδύσκουσιν, ἐνεδιδύσκετο Mark 15:17; Luke 16:19

ἔνδῐκ-ος G1738 Adj-AFS (2×)

just, right, deserved; according to justice or what is legally and morally proper

The word affirms what accords with justice and right. Paul acknowledges that condemnation might seem just given certain premises, though he rejects those premises (Rom 3:8). The author of Hebrews declares that every transgression under the old covenant received its just recompense (Heb 2:2). The term combines legal legitimacy with moral rightness—what is not only lawful but rightly deserved. Classical usage included court contexts and descriptions of just cities or actions.

(2×) Just, right, according to justice; deserved, legitimate. In Rom 3:8, Paul entertains the hypothetical that condemnation might be just (δίκαιον) if the charge were true—though he rejects the premise. In Heb 2:2, every transgression received just recompense (ἔνδικον μισθαποδοσίαν), emphasizing deserved retribution. Classical usage includes legal contexts (legitimate claims, court days) and moral contexts (upright persons, just actions). Cross-linguistic glosses consistently render the justice/rightness quality. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

en: just | es: justa, justo | fr: juste | de: gerecht Rom 3:8; Heb 2:2

ἐνδόμ-ησις G1739 N-NFS (1×)

structure, construction, building material; the act of building or the thing built into a structure

This rare noun denotes a structure or construction, specifically something built into or as part of a larger building. Revelation 21:18 uses it for the construction or building material of the New Jerusalem's wall. The lexicon notes it can mean mole, breakwater, or built-in structure. John's vision employs architectural language to describe heavenly realities, with jasper construction symbolizing purity, strength, and divine glory. The term emphasizes the crafted, intentional nature of God's eternal city.

(1×) Revelation 21:18 describes the wall's ἐνδόμησις as pure jasper. This architectural term denotes the construction or structural composition of the wall. The multilingual glosses (structure, estructura, Bauwerk) emphasize built form. Classical usage included breakwaters and molded structures. John's vision transforms earthly architecture into transcendent symbolism: the city's construction materials reflect divine holiness and eternal permanence, built not by human hands but by God. BUILDING AND EDIFICATION

en: structure | es: estructura | fr: Bauwerk | de: Bauwerk Rev 21:18

ἐνδοξ-άζομαι G1740 V-ANP (2×)

to be glorified, made glorious; to receive honor and manifest glory, especially divine glory

This passive verb describes receiving glory or being made glorious, particularly in eschatological contexts. Paul prays that the Lord Jesus may be glorified in the Thessalonians, and they in him (2 Thess 1:10, 12). The reciprocal glorification points to the mutual honor between Christ and his people when he returns. The passive voice emphasizes that glorification comes from God's action, not self-promotion. The term appears in contexts of worship and divine manifestation.

(2×) To be glorified, receive glory, be made glorious (passive). Both occurrences in 2 Thessalonians 1 (vv. 10, 12) describe Christ being glorified in his saints and the mutual glorification of Christ and believers. Paul prays that the name of the Lord Jesus may be glorified in them and they in him. The passive emphasizes divine action rather than self-glorification. The LXX background connects to manifesting God's glory among his people. Translations preserve the glorification theme across languages. GLORIFYING AND HONORING en: may-be-glorified, to-be-glorified | es: a-ser-glorificado, sea-glorificado | fr: ἐνδοξασθῆναι, ἐνδοξασθῇ | de: verherrlicht-werden 2Thess 1:10; 2Thess 1:12

ἔνδοξ-ος G1741 Adj-DNP (4×)

glorious, splendid, honored; held in high esteem or notable in appearance

Derived from δόξα ('glory'), this adjective describes persons or things that possess or reflect honor, splendor, or distinction. In Luke 7:25, it characterizes the fine clothing of those in royal courts. Luke 13:17 reports that the crowd rejoiced at all the 'glorious things' Jesus was doing. Paul uses it ironically in 1 Corinthians 4:10—'you are honored, we are dishonored.' Ephesians 5:27 presents the church as Christ's bride: 'glorious, without spot or wrinkle.'

(4×) Glorious, splendid, or held in high honor—describing persons of distinction or things of notable quality. The root in δόξα ('glory, reputation') grounds every use. Luke 7:25 applies it to splendid garments; Luke 13:17 to Jesus' remarkable deeds; Eph 5:27 to the church's eschatological perfection. Paul's use in 1 Cor 4:10 is bitterly ironic: 'you are ἔνδοξοι, but we are dishonored.' Spanish 'gloriosa/honrados' and French 'glorieux/magnifique' split the honor-splendor range helpfully. POWER AND ABILITY

en: glorious, glorious-things, honored | es: gloriosa, gloriosas, honrados | fr: glorieux, magnifique | de: ἐνδόξοις, ἐνδόξῳ, ἔνδοξοι Luke 7:25; Luke 13:17; 1Cor 4:10; Eph 5:27

ἔνδῡμα G1742 N-ANS (8×)

Garment, clothing; an outer article of dress, used of literal attire and metaphorically of outward appearance.

The standard Greek word for an outer garment or piece of clothing, appearing in contexts that range from the mundane to the symbolic. Jesus teaches not to worry about clothing (Matt 6:25, 28) and warns of false prophets who come in sheep's clothing (Matt 7:15) — a metaphor that has entered many languages. The word describes John the Baptist's distinctive camel-hair garment (Matt 3:4), the wedding guest lacking proper attire (Matt 22:11-12), and the dazzling white garment of the angel at the resurrection (Matt 28:3). Spanish 'vestido,' French 'vêtement,' and German 'Kleidung' all translate it as ordinary clothing, with context supplying any deeper significance.

garment, clothing (8×) An outer garment or article of clothing, referring to what a person wears as dress or covering. Used literally of physical attire — John the Baptist's camel-hair garment (Matt 3:4), a wedding guest's clothing (Matt 22:11-12), the angel's radiant garment at the tomb (Matt 28:3) — and in Jesus' teaching about not worrying over clothing (Matt 6:25, 28). The figurative use in Matt 7:15 ('sheep's clothing' concealing wolves) does not create a separate sense but extends the literal meaning metaphorically. Spanish 'vestido/vestidos,' French 'vêtement,' and German 'Kleidung' confirm a single cohesive sense across all eight occurrences. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: clothing, garment | es: vestido, vestidos | fr: vêtement | de: Kleidung Matt 3:4; Matt 6:25; Matt 6:28; Matt 7:15; Matt 22:11

ἐνδυνᾰμ-όω G1743 V-PMM/P-2P (7×)

Strengthen, empower (active); be strengthened, grow strong in power (passive/middle), especially by divine enablement.

Built from en ('in') and dynamoo ('make powerful'), the verb endunamoo belongs to the dynamis word-family and always carries a sense of power being infused or growing. Its two voices split the word into complementary perspectives. In the passive or middle, a person is strengthened or grows strong — Saul 'kept increasing in strength' after his conversion (Acts 9:22), Abraham 'grew strong in faith' (Rom 4:20), and Paul exhorts believers to 'be strengthened in the Lord and in the might of his power' (Eph 6:10). Spanish fortaleceos/fue fortalecido and French fortifier capture the idea of being made firm. In the active, Christ or God is the agent who strengthens: Paul thanks 'the one who strengthened me, Christ Jesus' (1 Tim

1:12), confesses 'I can do all things through the one who strengthens me' (Phil 4:13), and declares 'the Lord stood by me and strengthened me' (2 Tim 4:17). The consistent theological pattern is remarkable — divine power flowing into human weakness.

1. be strengthened, grow strong (passive/intransitive) (4×) To be strengthened, to grow strong — the passive or intransitive use describing the recipient who is being empowered or who increases in power. Four occurrences span Paul's narrative of Saul 'growing ever stronger' in his preaching after Damascus (Acts 9:22), Abraham who 'was strengthened in faith, giving glory to God' rather than wavering at the promise (Rom 4:20), and the imperatives urging believers to 'be strengthened in the Lord' (Eph 6:10; 2 Tim 2:1). Spanish fortaleceos/fue fortalecido and German staerken both render this with passive fortification language. The sense captures the human side of divine empowerment — the experience of receiving strength rather than generating it. STRENGTHENING AND POWER

en: be-strengthened, was-being-strengthened, was-strengthened | es: fortaleceos, fortalécete, fue-fortalecido | fr: fortifier | de: staerken, ἐνεδυναμοῦτο Acts 9:22; Rom 4:20; Eph 6:10; 2Tim 2:1

2. strengthen, empower (active/transitive) (3×) To strengthen, empower — the active or transitive use with God or Christ as the agent who endows a person with power for ministry, endurance, or mission. Three occurrences are explicitly Christological: Paul's grateful testimony that Christ Jesus 'strengthened me' for apostolic service (1 Tim 1:12), the iconic 'I can do all things through the one who strengthens me' (Phil 4:13), and 'the Lord stood by me and strengthened me so that through me the proclamation might be fully accomplished' (2 Tim 4:17). Spanish me fortalecio/que me fortalece and French fortifier render the active agency. The consistent subject — Christ empowering Paul — makes this sense a compact theology of grace: human capacity derives from a divine source. STRENGTHENING AND POWER

en: having-strengthened, one-strengthening, strengthened | es: me-fortaleció, que-me-fortalece, que-me-fortaleció | fr: fortifier | de: staerken Phil 4:13; 1Tim 1:12; 2Tim 4:17

ἐνδύω G1744 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

to creep into, worm one's way into; infiltrate or enter stealthily and gradually

This verb means to enter by stealth or to creep into gradually, often with negative connotations. In 2 Timothy 3:6, Paul warns of false teachers who 'creep into houses' and captivate vulnerable women. The term originally meant putting on clothing but developed the sense of entering or penetrating. Paul uses it to describe manipulative infiltration tactics: these deceivers don't announce themselves openly but worm their way into private spaces where they can exploit the gullible.

(1×) Second Timothy 3:6 warns against those who 'creep into households' and capture weak women. The present participle ἐνδύνοντες suggests ongoing, habitual sneaking. This is predatory behavior masked as piety. The Spanish que-se-introducen and German sich-einschleichen capture the furtive infiltration. Classical usage for putting on clothes extends metaphorically here to donning a false persona to gain access. Paul exposes their deceptive tactics to protect vulnerable community members. CLOTHING AND DRESS en: creeping-into | es: que-se-introducen | fr: ἐνδύνοντες | de: sich-einschleichen 2Tim 3:6

ἔνδυσις G1745 N-GFS (1×)

putting on, wearing, act of clothing oneself; the process or practice of getting dressed

This noun denotes the act of putting on clothing or the practice of wearing garments. First Peter 3:3 uses it in teaching about true beauty: women should not focus on outward adornment like elaborate hairstyles, gold jewelry, or fine clothes. The term emphasizes the process of dressing and the attention given to external appearance. Peter contrasts surface decoration with inner beauty of character, redirecting focus from temporary, external ἔνδυσις to lasting, internal virtues.

(1×) In 1 Peter 3:3, wives are taught not to let their adornment be merely the external ἔνδυσις of garments. The genitive construction links putting-on with clothing, emphasizing the act of dressing as decoration. Cross-lingual glosses (wearing, vestirse, Bekleidung) point to the clothing process. Classical usage included general dressing practices. Peter's contrast is clear: instead of elaborate external costuming, cultivate the incorruptible beauty of a gentle, quiet spirit. CLOTHING AND DRESS en: of-wearing | es: de-vestirse | fr: ἐνδύσεως | de: Bekleidung 1Pet 3:3

ἐνδύω G1746 V-ASM-3S (28×)

To put on, clothe, or dress; to array oneself or another in garments, armor, or spiritual qualities

Endyō is the New Testament's primary verb for clothing, stretching from the mundane act of getting dressed in the morning to Paul's soaring exhortation to 'put on the whole armor of God' (Eph 6:11) and 'clothe yourselves with Christ' (Gal 3:27). The middle voice ('clothe oneself') dominates, reflecting the voluntary act of assuming garments or virtues. But the verb also appears in passive states – the rich man 'clothed in purple' (Luke 16:19) – and in transitive acts of dressing another, as when the father commands servants to dress the prodigal son (Luke 15:22). French revêtir and Spanish vestir both preserve this versatile clothing metaphor.

1. put on, clothe oneself (18×) To put on or clothe oneself, the active/middle sense of dressing in garments, armor, or figurative qualities. Dominant at 18 occurrences, covering both literal dressing (Mark 6:9, 'do not put on two tunics') and metaphorical investiture ('put on the Lord Jesus Christ,' Rom 13:14; 'put on the new self,' Eph 4:24). Spanish vestíos captures the reflexive middle voice naturally. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: having-put-on, he-wore, let-us-put-on | es: Vestíos, habiendo-vestido, habiéndonos-vestido | fr: revêtir | de: bekleiden, kleidet-an Matt 6:25; Mark 6:9; Luke 8:27; Luke 12:22; Acts 12:21

2. be clothed, having been clothed (7×) To be clothed or to have been dressed, the passive or stative condition of wearing something. Seven occurrences emphasize the resulting state rather than the act: the wedding guest without proper garments (Matt 22:11), John the Baptist clothed in camel's hair (Mark 1:6), and the risen saints 'clothed in white robes' (Rev 1:13). Spanish vestido and French revêtu mark this completed, enduring state. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: clothed, clothed-in, having-been-clothed | es: habiendo-sido-vestidos, seáis-revestidos, vestido | fr: revêtir | de: bekleiden, kleidet-an Matt 22:11; Mark 1:6; Luke 24:49; 2Cor 5:3; Rev 1:13

3. clothe someone else (3×) To clothe someone else, the causative-transitive use where the subject dresses another person. Only 3 occurrences, but narratively vivid: soldiers strip and re-dress Jesus at the crucifixion (Matt 27:31, Mark 15:20), and the father orders 'put the best robe on him' for the returned prodigal (Luke 15:22). Spanish vestidlo ('dress him') makes the other-directed action unmistakable. CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: clothe, dressed, put-on | es: vestidlo, vistieron | fr: revêtir | de: bekleiden, kleidet-an Matt 27:31; Mark 15:20; Luke 15:22

ἐνέδρ-α G1747 N-AFS (2×)

an ambush, lying in wait; a hidden military trap or treacherous plot

The term denotes lying in wait to attack, whether in military ambush or treacherous plotting. Paul's nephew discovers more than forty Jews lying in ambush to kill Paul (Acts 23:16). Later, Paul's accusers ask Festus to bring Paul to Jerusalem while they prepare an ambush along the way (Acts 25:3). The word can refer to the act of ambushing, the position from which an ambush is launched, or the men lying in wait. The context determines whether military tactics or assassination plots are in view.

(2×) An ambush, lying in wait; the act or position of lying hidden to attack. In Acts 23:16, Paul's nephew hears about the ambush (τὴν ἐνέδραν) planned by forty Jews sworn to kill Paul. In Acts 25:3,

Paul's accusers request his transfer while laying an ambush to kill him along the road. Classical usage includes military ambushes and metaphorical treachery. The lexicon notes it can denote the men in ambush themselves or the position. Cross-linguistic terms consistently convey hidden waiting to attack. AMBUSH MILITARY

en: ambush, an-ambush | es: emboscada | fr: embuscade | de: ἐνέδραν Acts 23:16; Acts 25:3

ἐνεδρ-εύω G1748 V-PIA-3P (2×)

to lie in wait, set a trap; to plot secretly with intent to harm or ensnare

This verb describes the active practice of lying in wait or setting traps, whether literal or figurative. Scribes and Pharisees lie in wait for Jesus, hoping to catch something from his mouth to accuse him (Luke 11:54). The forty Jews lie in wait for Paul, ready to kill him (Acts 23:21). The present tense can emphasize ongoing, persistent watching for opportunity. Classical usage included military ambushes and hunting snares, with extension to metaphorical entrapment through deceit or poisoning.

(2×) To lie in wait, set an ambush, lay snares; to watch for an opportunity to harm. In Luke 11:54, religious leaders lie in wait (ἐνεδρεύοντες) to catch Jesus in his words and accuse him. In Acts 23:21, more than forty men are lying in wait (ἐνεδρεύουσιν) to kill Paul. The present tense conveys active, ongoing watching for opportunity. Classical backgrounds include military ambushes and hunting metaphors. Translations preserve the sense of hidden, hostile watching: Spanish 'acechándolo' (stalking him), French 'dresser des embûches' (setting traps). AMBUSH LURK

en: are-lying-in-wait, lying-in-wait | es: acechándolo, le-acechan | fr: dresser-des-embûches, embuscade | de: ἐνεδρεύοντες, ἐνεδρεύουσιν Luke 11:54; Acts 23:21

ἔνεδρ-ον G1749

ambush; a place of lying in wait, trap; also hindrance or obstruction

This term designates a concealed position where someone lies in wait to attack—an ambush in military or hunting contexts. The Septuagint employs it for the Hebrew word describing Joshua's tactical ambush against Ai. In later usage it broadened to mean any hindrance or obstruction that blocks progress. The dual semantic range reflects how a hidden trap can physically obstruct one's path.

ἐνειλ-έω G1750 V-AIA-3S (1×) to wrap up, enfold, wind around; envelop something in cloth or material

This verb means to wrap or wind something in cloth, typically for burial. In Mark 15:46, Joseph of Arimathea wraps Jesus' body in a linen shroud after taking it down from the cross. This is burial vocabulary, describing the reverent preparation of a corpse according to Jewish custom. The wrapping in fine linen indicates both respect and haste before Sabbath. Classical usage included wrapping things in material or metaphorically being entangled, but Mark's usage is literal and poignant.

(1×) Mark 15:46 records Joseph of Arimathea's act of devotion: after taking down Jesus' body, 'he wrapped it in the linen.' This is tender burial care in the face of brutal execution. The verb ἐνείλησεν describes the wrapping action required by Jewish burial custom. Spanish envolvió and French enveloppe capture the enfolding motion. Joseph risks association with a condemned criminal to give Jesus honorable burial before the Sabbath begins. BIND WRAP TIE

en: he-wrapped | es: envolvió | fr: enveloppe | de: einwickeln Mark 15:46

ἔνειμι G1751 V-PPA-ANP (1×)

to be in, exist within; be present or contained inside something

This verb means to be in or exist within something. In Luke 11:41, Jesus instructs the Pharisees to give as alms 'such things as you have' (literally, 'the things that are within'). The term denotes contents or internal possessions. Classical usage shows it meant to be present in a place or contained within. Jesus contrasts external ritual cleanliness with internal generosity—what's inside the cup matters more than its outside. True purity involves generous disposition of internal resources.

(1×) Luke 11:41 contains Jesus' corrective to Pharisaic externalism: 'Give as alms those things which are within.' The neuter plural participle τὰ ἐνόντα denotes contents or possessions at hand. The contrast is between outer washing (v. 39) and inner generosity. Cross-lingual evidence (within, de adentro, ce qui est dedans) confirms the interior reference. Jesus redirects focus from ritual surface to ethical substance: give from what you have inside, and all becomes clean. INSIDE AND WITHIN en: within | es: de-adentro | fr: ce-qui-est-dedans | de: ἐνόντα Luke 11:41

ἕνεκα G1752 Prep (26×)

on account of, for the sake of, because of — a causal preposition expressing reason or purpose

Heneka (also heneken) is a preposition with the genitive that expresses the cause, reason, or purpose behind an action. Classical Greek already used it freely; in the New Testament its 26 occurrences cluster strikingly around the theme of suffering for Christ's sake. Jesus pronounces blessing on those persecuted 'on account of righteousness' and 'on my account' (Matt 5:10-11), and promises that whoever loses his life 'for my sake' will find it (Matt 10:39; 16:25; Mark 8:35). The Olivet Discourse warns that disciples will be brought before governors and kings 'for my sake, as a testimony to them' (Matt 10:18; Mark 13:9; Luke 21:12). Paul echoes the pattern: 'for your sake we are being killed all day long' (Rom 8:36). The preposition thus becomes almost a technical marker for the cost of discipleship. Spanish 'por causa de' and French 'a cause de' both render the causal force directly.

on account of, for the sake of (26×) A causal preposition meaning 'on account of, for the sake of, because of,' expressing the motivating reason or ultimate purpose behind an action. In the NT it overwhelmingly marks the cost of discipleship: blessings pronounced on those persecuted 'for my sake' (Matt 5:10-11), the paradox of losing and finding life 'for my sake' (Matt 10:39; 16:25; Mark 8:35), and trials before authorities 'on my account' (Matt 10:18; Luke 21:12). Spanish 'por causa de' and German 'wegen' converge on the same straightforward causal sense. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: because-of, for-sake-of, for-the-sake-of | es: a-causa-de, por-causa-de | fr: à-cause-de | de: wegen Matt 5:10; Matt 5:11; Matt 10:18; Matt 10:39; Matt 16:25

ἐνέργ-εια G1753 N-GFS (8×)

Working, activity, operative power; especially of divine or supernatural energy at work producing effects.

A noun denoting active, effective power — not static potential but energy actually at work producing results. In the New Testament it appears almost exclusively in Paul's letters and refers overwhelmingly to divine power in operation. Paul speaks of 'the working of his mighty strength' that raised Christ from the dead (Eph 1:19), the 'energy' given to him for apostolic ministry (Eph 3:7; Col 1:29), and Christ's power 'that enables him to subject all things to himself' (Phil 3:21). The body of Christ grows through the 'working' of each individual part (Eph 4:16). Spanish 'energía' preserves the Greek etymological connection perfectly, while German 'Wirkung' ('effect, working') captures the emphasis on active operation rather than dormant capacity.

(8×) Active, operative power or energy at work — especially divine or supernatural energy that produces tangible effects. In Pauline usage this denotes God's mighty power in action: the working that raised Christ and seated him in glory (Eph 1:19), the divine energy empowering Paul's apostolic ministry (Eph 3:7; Col 1:29), Christ's power to transform and subject all things (Phil 3:21), and the energy by which each member contributes to the body's growth (Eph 4:16). The term also appears negatively of Satanic counterfeiting (2 Thess 2:9, 11). Spanish 'energía/operación' and German 'Wirkung' both capture the active, effectual quality — this is power realized, not merely possessed. POWER AND MIRACLES

en: working | es: energía, operación | fr: ἐνέργειαν, ἐνεργείας | de: Wirkung Eph 1:19; Eph 3:7; Eph 4:16; Phil 3:21; Col 1:29

ἐνεργ-έω G1754 V-IIM-3S (21×)

To work, be active, operate; especially of divine or spiritual power at work; also to be effective or produce results.
A distinctively Pauline verb for the inner working of power — divine, demonic, or spiritual. It describes God working all things through all people (1 Cor 12:6, 11), the sinful passions that were 'at work' in our bodies (Rom 7:5), and the power that raised Christ now working mightily in believers (Eph 1:20; 3:20). James employs it memorably: 'The effective prayer of a righteous person accomplishes much' (Jas 5:16). The verb's range moves from general activity to focused efficacy, capturing both the process and its productive outcome. German 'wirken' and Spanish 'obrar' both carry this dual sense of working-and-producing, making them natural equivalents.

