2. to be effective, produce results (4×) To be effective, efficacious, or productive in results — emphasizing not merely activity but potent outcome. Faith 'works through love' (Gal 5:6), the word of God is 'at work' effectively in believers (1 Thess 2:13), Paul labors according to God's power 'working mightily' in him (Col 1:29), and James declares that the prayer of the righteous 'is powerful and effective' (Jas 5:16). Spanish 'que obra/que opera' and the English rendering 'being effective' highlight the results-producing dimension distinct from mere activity. PROSPERING AND SUCCESS

working, operation, activity; the manifestation or result of power or energy at work
The term denotes active operation or the effect produced by working power. Paul speaks of varieties of workings, all from the same God who works all in all (1 Cor 12:6). The same chapter mentions workings of miracles among spiritual gifts (1 Cor 12:10). The word emphasizes not static potential but active, realized operation—energy producing effects. It relates to the verb 'to work effectively' and appears in contexts of divine power manifesting through spiritual gifts.

(2×) Working, operation, activity; the effect or manifestation of power at work. In 1 Cor 12:6, Paul lists varieties of workings (ἐνεργημάτων), all empowered by the same God who works all in all. In 1 Cor 12:10, workings of miracles (ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων) appear among spiritual gifts. The term emphasizes active operation and realized effects rather than dormant potential. Classical usage contrasts energēma (activity) with pathos (passivity). Cross-linguistic glosses reflect operational/effectual force: 'operations', 'Wirkung' (effect), 'operaciones'. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐνεργ-ής G1756 Adj-NFS (3×)

effective, active, powerful; producing actual results, operationally potent
The adjective ἐνεργής (from ἐν + ἔργον 'at work') describes something actively effective, operationally powerful, producing results. It's not merely potential but actual—energy in action. Biblical usage applies it to an open door for mission (1 Cor 16:9), faith becoming effective through knowledge (Philemon 6), and God's word as living and active (Heb 4:12). The term emphasizes functionality—something that works, that accomplishes its purpose.

(3×) First Corinthians 16:9 reports Paul's reason for staying in Ephesus: 'for a wide door for effective work has opened to me, and there are many adversaries'—opportunity that produces results despite opposition. Philemon 1:6 expresses Paul's prayer: 'that the sharing of your faith may become effective for the full knowledge of every good thing'—faith operational in understanding. Hebrews 4:12 declares: 'For the word of God is living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword'—Scripture energetically operative. The Spanish (eficaz) and French (effectif) and German (wirksam) all emphasize effectiveness/efficacy. The adjective stresses actual power at work—not dormant potential but engaged energy producing tangible results, whether in gospel advance, faith expression, or Scripture's penetrating work. ABILITY AND POWER to be blessed in or through; to receive blessing through someone or something as the channel

This passive verb captures the promise that blessing will come through a particular channel. Peter quotes God's promise to Abraham that all families of the earth will be blessed in his seed (Acts 3:25). Paul similarly cites the promise to Abraham that all nations will be blessed in him (Gal 3:8). The passive emphasizes receiving blessing rather than self-achievement, while the preposition 'in' indicates the means or channel through which blessing flows—ultimately Christ, Abraham's seed.

(2×) To be blessed in or through (passive, with dative of means). Both NT occurrences quote God's promise to Abraham that all nations/families will be blessed through his seed. Acts 3:25 and Gal 3:8 cite the Genesis promise, with Galatians explicitly connecting it to justification by faith and Christ as the seed. The passive voice emphasizes blessing as received gift, not earned. The 'in/through' preposition marks the channel. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve the passive blessing: 'serán bendecidas', 'seront bénies'. BLESSING AND PRAISE en: shall-be-blessed, will-be-blessed | es: Serán-bendecidas, serán-bendecidas | fr: bénir, Ἐνευλογηθήσονται | de: ἐνευλογηθήσονται, Ἐνευλογηθήσονται Acts 3:25; Gal 3:8

to hold fast against, have a grudge, be hostile; sustained opposition or resentment toward someone
The compound verb ἐνέχω (ἐν + ἔχω 'hold in') means to hold something in or against someone—to harbor a grudge, maintain hostility, or hold someone liable. The passive and middle forms suggest being caught or entangled in something (trapped in a net, caught in obligation). Biblical usage emphasizes relational antagonism: Herodias nursing a grudge against John the Baptist, scribes pressing hostile questions on Jesus, and the danger of being held in slavery's yoke. The verb captures sustained, often bitter opposition.

(3×) Mark 6:19 reports: 'And Herodias had a grudge against him and wanted to put him to death'—long-held resentment against John the Baptist for condemning her marriage. Luke 11:53 describes the aftermath of Jesus' woes on Pharisees and lawyers: 'the scribes and the Pharisees began to press him hard and to provoke him to speak about many things'—hostile interrogation. Galatians 5:1 warns: 'do not submit again to a yoke of slavery'—being held/entangled in bondage. The Spanish (a-acosarlo 'to harass him', seáis-enredados 'be entangled', tenía-rencor 'held grudge') and French (en-vouloir 'hold it against') capture the sustained antagonism. The verb describes relationships hardened into opposition, whether personal vendetta, theological hostility, or systemic oppression. RESTRAINT AND CONTROL

ἐνθάδε G1759 Adv (10×)

Here, in this place; an adverb of location indicating the speaker's present position

A locative adverb meaning 'here' or 'in this place,' pointing to the speaker's immediate physical location. Jesus uses it after the resurrection to request food — 'Have you anything here to eat?' (Luke 24:41) — grounding his risen bodily presence in tangible reality. The Samaritan woman asks Jesus about drawing water 'here' at Jacob's well (John 4:15-16). In Acts 16:28, Paul calls out in the Philippian jail that all the prisoners are still 'here.' The word carries no theological weight of its own but anchors narratives in concrete spatial immediacy.

here (10×) An adverb of place meaning 'here, in this place,' indicating proximity to the speaker's current location. Used by the risen Jesus asking for food to demonstrate his bodily reality (Luke 24:41), by the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well (John 4:15-16), by Paul in the Philippian jail (Acts 16:28), and in other narrative contexts requiring spatial deixis (Acts 10:18; 17:6). Spanish 'aquí,' Hindi 'यहाँ,' and Korean '여기' all render it as a simple proximal locative. HERE AND HITHER

to think deeply, ponder, consider, reflect upon something in one's mind

This verb captures the mental activity of careful consideration and internal reflection. It appears in contexts where someone is thinking through a situation before them—whether Joseph pondering Mary's pregnancy, Jesus perceiving the thoughts of skeptics, or Peter working through his vision. The Greek combines en- (in, within) with thumos (mind, spirit), emphasizing inward deliberation. Across Romance and Germanic languages, translators consistently reach for words meaning 'think,' 'reflect,' or 'ponder,' recognizing this as cognitive work rather than mere surface awareness.

(3×) Mental pondering or consideration, particularly of weighty matters requiring deliberation. In Matt 1:20, Joseph 'considers' divorcing Mary quietly—a decision requiring serious thought. In Matt 9:4, Jesus perceives what the scribes are 'thinking' (hostile doubts about his authority to forgive). In Acts 10:19, Peter is 'reflecting' on the vision he's just received. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'reflexionando,' French 'réfléchir') confirms this is active mental processing, not passive awareness. DISCUSS PONDER REASON

en: do-you-think, having-considered, pondering | es: habiendo-pensado, pensáis, reflexionando | fr: réfléchir | de: διενθυμουμένου, ἐνθυμεῖσθε, ἐνθυμηθέντος Matt 1:20; Matt 9:4; Acts 10:19

thought, reflection, inner deliberation; the content or process of pondering within the mind

From ἐν + θυμός ('in the spirit/mind'), this noun denotes the inner workings of thought—what one turns over in the heart. Jesus perceives the ἐνθυμήσεις of the scribes in Matthew 9:4 and of the Pharisees in Matthew 12:25, exposing hidden hostile reasoning. Acts 17:29 uses it for the products of human artistic imagination. Hebrews 4:12 declares the word of God a discerner of the 'thoughts and intentions of the heart,' pairing ἐνθυμήσεων with ἐννοιῶν.

(4×) Inner thoughts, reflections, or deliberations—especially those concealed from others but transparent to God. The ἐν-θυμ- root ('within the spirit') points to the interior quality of these cogitations. In Matt 9:4 and 12:25, Jesus supernaturally perceives the hostile ἐνθυμήσεις of religious opponents. Acts 17:29 extends to human artistic conceptions (the 'imaginings' behind idol-craft). Heb 4:12 pairs it with ἐννοιῶν ('intentions'), underscoring the penetrating reach of God's word. Spanish 'pensamientos' and French 'pensée' straightforwardly render 'thoughts.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἔνειμι G1762 V-PIA-3S (6×)

To be in; there is/are (often as an emphatic existential marker: 'there is neither... nor').

A contracted form of 'enesti' (it is within/present), this verb in NT usage functions primarily as an emphatic existential marker. Paul deploys it most memorably in Galatians 3:28 – 'there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither slave nor free, neither male nor female' – where the triple 'eni' hammers home the dissolution of social categories in Christ. The same existential sense appears in Colossians 3:11 and 1 Corinthians 6:5. Spanish 'hay' (there is) and French 'il y a' reflect the existential function cleanly.

(6×) An emphatic existential form meaning 'there is' or 'there exists,' used to affirm or deny the presence or existence of something within a given sphere. In its most celebrated deployment, Paul uses the contracted form 'eni' three times in Galatians 3:28 to declare that fundamental human distinctions no longer exist 'in Christ Jesus.' The same construction recurs in Colossians 3:11 (where there is no Greek and Jew, circumcised and uncircumcised) and 1 Corinthians 6:5 ('Is there not among you one wise person?'). Spanish 'hay' and French 'il y a' capture the existential function, though the emphatic rhetorical force is uniquely Pauline. EXISTENCE PARTICLES

year — a period of twelve months, used for calendar reckoning, liturgical cycles, and temporal duration

Eniautos denotes a complete year and carries a slightly more formal or cyclical connotation than the more common etos. In classical Greek it originally meant 'anniversary' or 'cycle' (from eni + autos, 'returning upon itself'), and this cyclical flavor persists in its New Testament usage. Hebrews uses it repeatedly for the annual Day of Atonement ritual — the high priest entering the Most Holy Place 'once every year' (Heb 9:7, 10:1, 10:3) — where the yearly repetition underscores the insufficiency that Christ's once-for-all sacrifice resolves. John's Gospel notes that Caiaphas was high priest 'that year' (John 11:49, 51; 18:13), loading a simple temporal marker with dramatic irony. Spanish 'ano,' French 'annee,' and German 'Jahr' render it without distinction from etos, though the Greek preserves a subtle emphasis on the year as a completed cycle.

year (14×) A period of approximately twelve months, used to measure calendar time, liturgical cycles, and durations of activity. In Hebrews it denotes the annual rhythm of the Day of Atonement — the high priest entering 'once a year' (Heb 9:7, 10:1, 10:3) — with the repetition highlighting the contrast with Christ's singular, unrepeatable offering. In the Gospels, Caiaphas is identified as high priest 'that year' (John 11:49, 51; 18:13), and Luke 4:19 cites Isaiah's 'acceptable year of the Lord.' Acts 11:26 and 18:11 mark durations of missionary activity. All 14 occurrences denote the same temporal unit, with context determining whether the emphasis falls on cyclical recurrence or simple duration. YEAR (TIME UNIT)

ἐνίστημι G1764 V-FIM-3P (7×)

Be present, be currently in effect (of times, situations); come upon, arrive, be imminent (of future events).

The verb enistemi literally means 'to stand in' or 'place within,' but in its NT usage it has narrowed to two temporal senses that together frame the biblical understanding of present and impending time. Most commonly, its perfect participle forms (enestosa, enestotos) function adjectivally to describe what is 'present' — the present distress (1 Cor 7:26), the present evil age (Gal 1:4), present things in Paul's great rhetorical catalogue of what cannot separate us from Christ's love (Rom 8:38; 1 Cor 3:22). Spanish presente, French present, and German gegenwaertig all render this with straightforward present-tense vocabulary. But in two passages the future tense introduces an arrival nuance: 'difficult times will come' (2 Tim 3:1) and the alarmed Thessalonians fearing 'the day of the Lord has come' (2 Thess 2:2). Here enistemi shifts from static presence to dynamic onset — not what already stands, but what is breaking in.

1. be present, be at hand (5×) To be present, to be currently existing or in effect — used adjectivally with perfect participle forms to describe conditions, periods, or realities that are now at hand as opposed to past or future. Five of seven occurrences carry this sense: 'things present' cannot separate us from God's love (Rom 8:38), 'things present' belong to you in Christ (1 Cor 3:22), 'the present distress' makes singleness advisable (1 Cor 7:26), 'the present evil age' from which Christ delivers us (Gal 1:4), and the regulations 'imposed until a time of reformation' in the present tabernacle arrangement (Heb 9:9). Spanish presente, French present, and German gegenwaertig form a uniform equivalence class. The perfect tense underscores the stative quality — what has come to stand and remains standing. BEING PRESENT en: present, present-things, things-present | es: cosas-presentes, presente | fr: présent | de: gegenwaertig Rom 8:38; 1Cor 3:22; 1Cor 7:26; Gal 1:4; Heb 9:9

2. come upon, be imminent (2×) To come upon, arrive, be imminent — describing events that are approaching or have just broken in, with a dynamic rather than stative force. Two occurrences mark this sense: Paul's warning that 'difficult times will come' in the last days (2 Tim 3:1), using the future enstesontai, and the Thessalonians' alarm that 'the day of the Lord has come' (2 Thess 2:2), using the perfect enesteken with an ingressive or immediate-arrival nuance. Spanish ha llegado/vendran and German gegenwaertig shift toward arrival vocabulary. The distinction from sense 1 is aspectual: sense 1 views the present as a settled state, while sense 2 captures the moment of onset — the day is dawning, the crisis is arriving. GOING AND LEADING to strengthen, make strong; to impart or receive strength, especially in moments of weakness

The verb describes strengthening or gaining strength, often in contexts of divine aid. An angel from heaven appeared to Jesus in Gethsemane, strengthening him (Luke 22:43). After Saul's conversion and baptism, he took food and was strengthened (Acts 9:19). The active form shows an agent strengthening another, while intransitive usage indicates gaining strength. The term appears in moments of human weakness receiving divine or natural reinforcement.

(2×) To strengthen, make strong; to gain strength. In Luke 22:43, an angel appeared to Jesus strengthening him (ἐνισχύων) during his agony in Gethsemane—a moment of intense human weakness receiving divine aid. In Acts 9:19, Saul took food and was strengthened (ἐνίσχυσεν) after his conversion and days without eating. The term can be active (someone strengthening another) or intransitive (gaining strength). Spanish and French preserve the strengthening action: 'fortalecer', 'fortifier'. STRENGTHENING AND POWER

ἔνατος G1766 Adj-DFS (10×)

Ninth — ordinal numeral marking the ninth hour (about 3 PM), pivotal in crucifixion and parable narratives

The adjective ἔνατος (enatos) is the ordinal form of 'nine,' occurring exclusively in the NT to designate the ninth hour of the day (roughly 3 PM by Jewish reckoning). Its most theologically weighty appearances frame the darkness at the crucifixion: from the sixth hour darkness covered the land until the ninth hour, when Jesus cried out (Matt 27:45-46; Mark 15:33-34; Luke 23:44). The parable of the laborers in the vineyard mentions workers hired at the ninth hour (Matt 20:5). Cornelius's vision and his prayer occur at the ninth hour (Acts 10:3, 30). Spanish 'novena (hora),' Arabic ٱلتَّاسِعَة, Hindi नौवें, and Korean 아홉째 all mark ordinal ninth uniformly.

(10×) The ordinal numeral 'ninth,' used exclusively in the NT to mark the ninth hour — approximately 3 PM by the Jewish division of daylight. It frames the climactic moment of the crucifixion when darkness lifts and Jesus cries out from the cross (Matt 27:45-46; Mark 15:33-34; Luke 23:44). In the parable of the vineyard workers, laborers are hired at the ninth hour as among the last (Matt 20:5). Cornelius receives his angelic vision during ninth-hour prayer (Acts 10:3, 30). The term carries no semantic variation across its occurrences. NINE CARDINAL ORDINAL

ἐννέᾰ G1767 Adj-DNP (5×)

Nine; the cardinal number between eight and ten, used both literally and as part of expressions denoting a larger group.

A straightforward cardinal number meaning "nine." In the New Testament it appears exclusively in the parables and sayings of Jesus. The lost-sheep parables in Matthew 18 and Luke 15 speak of leaving "the ninety-nine" (literally "the nine and ninety") to seek the one that strayed, while Luke 17:17 records Jesus asking, "Were not the ten cleansed? Where are the nine?" The multilingual glosses are remarkably uniform – Spanish nueve, French neuf, German neun – reflecting the simple numerical meaning.

(5×) The cardinal number nine, used in counting and grouping. All five NT occurrences involve Jesus' words: the ninety-nine sheep left on the hills (Matt 18:12-13, Luke 15:4, 7) and the nine healed lepers who did not return to give thanks (Luke 17:17). Translations across languages uniformly render a simple numeral, confirming a single unambiguous sense. NINE CARDINAL ORDINAL

ἐνενήκοντα G1768 Adj-DNP (4×)

ninety (the cardinal number)

The indeclinable Greek numeral for ninety, appearing exclusively in the parables of the lost sheep. In both Matthew 18:12-13 and Luke 15:4-7, the shepherd leaves the ninety-nine in safety to search for the one that has strayed. The number's sole narrative function in the NT is to dramatize the value God places on each individual—the ninety-nine safe sheep make the rescue of the one all the more striking.

(4×) The cardinal number ninety, used in the NT only within the compound 'ninety-nine' in the parable of the lost sheep. All four occurrences (Matt 18:12-13; Luke 15:4, 7) present the ninety-nine as the flock left behind while the shepherd pursues the single lost one. Spanish 'noventa' and French 'quatre-vingt-dix' (literally 'four-twenty-ten') render the number straightforwardly, though the French vigesimal construction is a curiosity. The theological weight lies not in the number itself but in the contrast it creates. LARGE CARDINAL NUMBERS

speechless, mute, unable to speak; struck dumb or astonished into silence

This adjective means speechless or unable to speak, either from natural muteness or from shock. In Acts 9:7, Paul's companions stand speechless after hearing the voice from heaven on the Damascus road. Classical usage often paired this word with 'deaf,' indicating deaf-muteness, but also used it for stunned silence or astonishment. Luke employs it to describe the overwhelming effect of divine encounter:

the men are rendered silent by the theophany, unable to respond to what they've witnessed.

(1×) Acts 9:7 describes Paul's companions as standing ἐνεοί—speechless—after the heavenly voice addresses Saul. This is awestruck silence before divine mystery. The lexicon shows classical usage for deaf-mute persons and those dumbfounded. The plural adjective captures corporate shock: they hear sound but comprehend nothing, left stammering and mute. Spanish mudos and French muet confirm the inability to speak. Divine presence overwhelms human speech. DEAF AND MUTE

ἐννεύω G1770 V-IIA-3P (1×)

to make signs, gesture, signal with motion; communicate nonverbally through gestures

This verb means to signal or communicate by gestures, typically nodding or making signs. In Luke 1:62, the crowd makes signs to Zechariah asking what he wants to name his son, since he has been struck mute. The term describes nonverbal communication necessitated by his inability to speak. Classical usage shows it meant nodding to signal or beckoning. Luke uses it to depict the workaround community members employed to communicate with the priest during his divinely imposed muteness.

(1×) Luke 1:62 shows people making signs (ἐνένευον) to ask mute Zechariah what the child should be named. This is gestural communication forced by his speechlessness. The imperfect tense suggests repeated or ongoing signaling attempts. Spanish hacían señas and French faire signe capture the nonverbal gesturing. The lexicon cites classical usage for nodding or beckoning. This communication workaround highlights Zechariah's continued muteness as divine sign until John's birth and naming. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11301 WITH 5 SENSES

thought, notion, intention; the act of thinking or the concept formed in the mind

The word denotes mental activity—thinking, reflecting, forming concepts, or intending. God's word discerns the thoughts and intentions of the heart (Heb 4:12), penetrating beyond surface actions to inner motivations. Believers should arm themselves with the same mind or attitude that Christ had regarding suffering (1 Pet 4:1). The term can mean general mental activity, specific notions or concepts, or deliberate intentions. Classical usage ranged from philosophical 'conceptions' to practical 'designs' or 'intents.'

(2×) Thought, notion, intention; the act of thinking or the concept/design formed. In Heb 4:12, God's word discerns thoughts and intentions (ἐνθυμήσεων καὶ ἐννοιῶν) of the heart—penetrating to inner motivations. In 1 Pet 4:1, believers arm themselves with the same thought/mind (τὴν αὐτὴν ἔννοιαν), referring to Christ's attitude toward suffering. Classical usage spans philosophical concepts to practical designs. German 'Gedanken' (thoughts) and Spanish 'intenciones' reflect the range from mental activity to deliberate intent. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

lawful, legal, subject to law; according to law or bound by legal requirements

The term describes what is according to law—either lawful actions or persons under law's authority. Paul tells the Corinthians he is not outside God's law but under Christ's law (1 Cor 9:21). In Acts, leaders say lawful matters should be settled in the regular assembly, not a riot (Acts 19:39). The word carries both positive (legitimate, proper) and descriptive (subject to law) senses. Classical usage included legal assemblies, lawful ages or times, and persons living uprightly within legal bounds.

(2×) Lawful, legal, according to law; subject to or bound by law. In Acts 19:39, the town clerk says lawful matters (ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλησίᾳ) should be settled in the legal assembly, not through riot. In 1 Cor 9:21, Paul describes himself as not lawless before God but under law (ἔννομος) to Christ—subject to Christ's law though free from Mosaic law. Classical usage includes legitimate assemblies, just actions, and persons keeping within law. Translations render both 'lawful' and 'under law' senses. STRAIGHTNESS AND UPRIGHTNESS

in the night, during the night hours; at night while it is still dark

This adverb means during the night or while it is still dark. Mark 1:35 records that Jesus rose 'very early in the morning, a great while before day' to pray in a solitary place. The term emphasizes the pre-dawn darkness, the depth of night when Jesus sought communion with the Father. Classical usage applied this to nighttime visits or activities. Mark highlights Jesus' prayer discipline: he sacrificed sleep to secure undisturbed time with God before the demands of ministry crowded in.

(1×) Mark 1:35 describes Jesus rising ἔννυχα λίαν—very early while still night—to pray alone. This temporal precision emphasizes Jesus' intentionality: he prays in darkness before dawn breaks. Spanish todavía de noche and French de nuit capture the pre-dawn timing. Classical usage included nighttime activities. Mark shows Jesus' priority: before healing and teaching begin, he must be with the Father. The adverb underscores the cost of this discipline—sleep sacrificed for prayer. NIGHT AND LODGING

ἐνοικ-έω G1774 V-AIA-3S (5×)

To dwell in, inhabit; used metaphorically of God's Spirit, Christ's word, or faith residing within a person or community.

Carries the core meaning of dwelling or making one's home within a place or person. In the New Testament, this verb is used exclusively in a spiritual and metaphorical sense: the Spirit of God dwelling in believers (Rom 8:11), God dwelling among his people (2 Cor 6:16), the word of Christ dwelling richly in the community (Col 3:16), and sincere faith dwelling first in a grandmother and mother before being passed on (2 Tim 1:5, 14). Spanish habitare and French habiter-dans mirror the "inhabit within" nuance perfectly.

(5×) To dwell within, inhabit spiritually. Every NT use is metaphorical – God's Spirit indwelling the believer (Rom 8:11), God dwelling among his covenant people (2 Cor 6:16), the word of Christ making its home in the congregation (Col 3:16), and genuine faith residing within Timothy's lineage (2 Tim 1:5, 14). The German einwohnen ('to in-dwell') captures the compound prefix en- plus oikeō ('to dwell'), emphasizing an interior, abiding presence rather than a temporary visit. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

unity, oneness; the state or quality of being one, unified, or in harmonious union

This abstract noun denotes the state of being one or the quality of unity. Paul urges believers to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace (Eph 4:3). He speaks of growing to the unity of the faith and knowledge of God's Son (Eph 4:13). The term appears only in Ephesians and emphasizes not just numerical oneness but harmonious union—the opposite of division, faction, or fragmentation. It relates to the fundamental Christian conviction that there is one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God.

(2×) Unity, oneness; the state or quality of being unified. Both occurrences in Eph 4 emphasize preserving or attaining unity. In v. 3, believers maintain the unity (τὴν ἑνότητα) of the Spirit through peace. In v. 13, maturity involves reaching the unity of faith and knowledge of Christ. The term emphasizes harmonious union, not mere numerical singularity. Classical usage includes philosophical unity and concrete manifestations of oneness. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve the unity concept: 'unidad', 'Einheit', 'unité'. ONE AND UNITY

to trouble, disturb, annoy; to cause distress or discomfort, often implying unwelcome imposition

The verb describes troubling, annoying, or disturbing someone—often with the sense of unwelcome burden or disturbance. Those troubled by unclean spirits came to Jesus for healing (Luke 6:18). The author of Hebrews warns that bitterness can trouble many and defile them (Heb 12:15). The passive participle in Luke shows the ongoing state of being troubled, while the active subjunctive in Hebrews warns of potential disturbance. Classical usage ranged from physical annoyance to being overburdened with work.

(2×) To trouble, disturb, annoy; to cause distress or burden. In Luke 6:18, those troubled (ἐνοχλούμενοι) by unclean spirits came to Jesus and were healed—describing ongoing affliction. In Heb 12:15, a root of bitterness can trouble (ἐνοχλῇ) many and defile them—warning of potential disturbance to the community. Classical uses include troubling someone with requests, being overburdened, or addressing someone. Spanish 'atormentados' (tormented) and French 'troublé' capture the distress aspect. TROUBLING AND DISTURBING

ἔνοχος G1777 Adj-NMS (10×)

Guilty, liable, deserving of punishment; also subject to or held in bondage under a power or condition.

A legal adjective that rings through the Sermon on the Mount like a courtroom gavel. In Matthew 5:21-22, Jesus escalates the stakes: anger makes one 'liable' to judgment, insults 'guilty' before the council, and contempt 'deserving' of Gehenna. At Jesus' trial, the Sanhedrin declares him 'deserving of death' (Matt 26:66, Mark 14:64). Spanish 'reo' (defendant/convict) and German 'schuldig' (guilty) confirm the judicial weight. One distinctive occurrence in Hebrews 2:15 shifts the meaning toward subjection – those who through fear of death were 'subject to' lifelong bondage – where Spanish 'sujetos' signals a move from courtroom guilt to existential captivity.

1. guilty, liable, deserving of (legal/moral culpability) (9×) Adjective of legal and moral culpability – guilty, liable, deserving of a penalty. Dominates the NT usage (9 of 10 occurrences), especially in Jesus' teaching on the escalating gravity of offenses in Matthew 5:21-22, where three successive uses intensify from 'liable to the court' through 'guilty before the council' to 'deserving of the fire of Gehenna.' The Sanhedrin's verdict at Jesus' trial (Matt 26:66, Mark 14:64) uses it as a formal judicial finding. Spanish 'reo' and 'culpable,' French 'coupable,' and German 'schuldig' all converge on legal guilt. TESTIMONY OBJECTS

en: Deserving, deserving, guilty | es: Reo, culpable, reo | fr: coupable | de: schuldig Matt 5:21; Matt 5:22; Matt 26:66

2. subject to, held in bondage (1×) Adjective indicating subjection, bondage, or being held captive under a condition or power – distinct from juridical guilt. Occurs only in Hebrews 2:15, where it describes those who through fear of death were 'subject to' lifelong slavery. The Spanish rendering 'sujetos' (subjected) rather than 'culpable' (guilty) marks the semantic shift clearly: this is about being bound under a tyrannical condition, not about deserving punishment. RESTRAINT AND CONTROL

en: subject | es: sujetos | fr: coupable | de: schuldig Heb 2:15

ἔνταλμα G1778 N-ANP (3×)

commandments, precepts; human-origin regulations or traditions presented as authoritative

The noun ἔνταλμα denotes a commandment or precept, synonymous with ἐντολή but in NT usage specifically applied to human traditions wrongly elevated to divine authority. Jesus quotes Isaiah's indictment against those who 'teach as doctrines the commandments of men' (Matt 15:9, Mark 7:7), and Paul warns against regulations like 'Do not handle, Do not taste' (Col 2:22). The word carries a pejorative edge in biblical contexts—these are man-made rules masquerading as God's law.

(3×) Matthew 15:9 and Mark 7:7 both quote Isaiah 29:13 in Jesus' critique of Pharisees: 'in vain do they worship me, teaching as doctrines the commandments of men'—human traditions displacing divine Torah. Colossians 2:22 warns against ascetic regulations: 'according to human precepts and teachings'—man-made rules about food and conduct. The Spanish (mandamientos), French (commandement), and German (ἐντάλματα) use commandment language, though context reveals these as human, not divine, origin. The term functions as theological critique: when religious communities substitute their traditions for God's word, worship becomes vain. The prophetic edge is sharp—human ἐντάλματα corrupt true religion by obscuring divine ἐντολαί. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to prepare for burial, lay out for burial; to perform burial rites including anointing and wrapping

This verb describes preparing a body for burial according to Jewish customs—washing, anointing with spices, and wrapping in burial cloths. When a woman anointed Jesus at Bethany, he said she had done it to prepare him for burial (Matt 26:12). Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus took Jesus' body, wrapped it with spices according to Jewish burial customs (John 19:40). The verb captures the complete process of laying out and preparing the deceased with dignity and ritual care.

(2×) To prepare for burial, lay out for burial; to perform burial rites. In Matt 26:12, Jesus interprets the woman's anointing as preparing his body for burial (πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με). In John 19:40, Joseph and Nicodemus took Jesus' body and wrapped it with spices as Jewish burial custom (ἐνταφιάζειν). The verb encompasses the complete process of washing, anointing, and wrapping the deceased. Spanish distinguishes 'preparar para sepultura' (prepare) and 'enterrar' (bury). French 'ensevelir' emphasizes the wrapping aspect. BURYING THE DEAD

en: to-bury, to-prepare-for-burial | es: enterrar, preparar-para-sepultura | fr: ensevelir | de: einbalsamieren, ἐνταφιάσαι Matt 26:12; John 19:40

ἐντᾰφ-ιασμός G1780 N-GMS (2×)

burial preparation, the act of preparing for burial; the process or occasion of laying out the dead

This noun denotes the preparation for burial or the burial itself. The woman who anointed Jesus performed this act for his burial preparation (Mark 14:8). Mary kept the expensive ointment for the day of Jesus' burial (John 12:7). Both contexts involve anointing as part of burial customs, though Mark emphasizes the act performed, while John looks to the intended occasion. The term captures the solemnity and ritual significance of preparing the deceased.

(2×) Burial, burial preparation; the act or occasion of laying out for burial. In Mark 14:8, the woman anointed Jesus beforehand for burial (πρὸς τὸν ἐνταφιασμόν). In John 12:7, Jesus tells Judas that Mary has kept the ointment for the day of his burial (εἰς τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ ἐνταφιασμοῦ μου). Both involve anointing as burial preparation. The noun captures the solemn process of preparing the deceased with spices and care. Cross-linguistic glosses consistently render 'burial' or 'burial preparation': 'sepultura', 'Einbalsamierung', 'ensevelissement'. BURIAL INTERMENT

ἐντέλλω G1781 V-RIM/P-3S (15×)

To command, enjoin, give authoritative orders; used in the middle voice for issuing directives.

Entellomai (the middle voice of entellō) carries the weight of authoritative command. In the NT it appears when God, Jesus, or Moses issues binding directives. Satan quotes Psalm 91 — 'He will command his angels concerning you' (Matt 4:6; Luke 4:10) — and Jesus instructs his disciples to teach all that he has commanded (Matt 28:20). The word also covers Mosaic commandments cited in legal debate (Matt 19:7; Mark 10:3). Unlike weaker verbs of asking or requesting, entellomai implies authority that expects obedience. The translation evidence — Spanish 'mandar,' French 'commander,' German 'gebieten' — consistently reflects this authoritative register.

command, give orders (15×) To issue an authoritative command or directive that expects compliance. Used of divine commands (Matt 4:6, God commanding angels; Acts 13:47, the Lord's commission), of Jesus' instructions to his followers (Matt 17:9; 28:20), and of Mosaic legal prescriptions cited in debate (Matt 19:7; Mark 10:3). The middle voice (entellomai) emphasizes personal authority in the giving of orders. Spanish 'mandar,' French 'commander,' and German 'gebieten' all preserve the note of binding authority. ἐντεῦθεν G1782 Adv (10×)

From here, from this place; also used distributively to mean 'on this side…on that side.'

A spatial adverb meaning 'from here' or 'from this place,' used frequently in commands to depart or relocate. Jesus tells the devil 'go away from here' (Luke 4:9), commands his disciples 'arise, let us go from here' (John 14:31), and orders the merchants 'take these things from here' (John 2:16). Spanish 'de aquí' and German 'von hier' consistently render this directional sense. A specialized distributive usage appears in John 19:18, where two thieves are crucified 'on this side and on that side' of Jesus – Spanish 'de un lado...de otro lado' captures the paired spatial arrangement that distinguishes this from the simple 'from here.'

1. from here (8×) The basic spatial sense: 'from here,' 'from this place,' indicating movement away from the speaker's or narrative's location. Appears eight times in the Gospels and Acts – Jesus orders departure from a place (Luke 4:9; John 14:31), commands removal of merchandise from the temple (John 2:16), and the Pharisees warn Jesus to leave 'from here' (Luke 13:31). French 'd'ici,' Spanish 'de aquí/desde aquí,' and German 'von hier' all consistently confirm simple directional origin. HERE AND HITHER

2. on this side (2×) A distributive spatial usage meaning 'on this side' (paired with 'on that side'), marking position on either flank of a central point. Both occurrences are in John 19:18, describing the two criminals crucified on either side of Jesus. Spanish 'de un lado...de otro lado' and English 'on this side...on that side' show the symmetrical, positional force that sets this sense apart from mere departure. HERE AND HITHER

petition, intercession; a formal request or plea made to someone, especially prayer on behalf of another

The word denotes petitioning or interceding, often in formal contexts. Paul urges prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings for all people (1 Tim 2:1). God's word is sanctified through prayer and petition (1 Tim 4:5). Classical usage ranged from petitions to authorities to intercourse or conversation, but NT usage focuses on prayer and intercession. The term suggests formal, deliberate prayer rather than casual conversation, and often carries the sense of advocacy on behalf of others.

(2×) Petition, intercession; formal prayer or request, especially on behalf of others. In 1 Tim 2:1, Paul urges prayers, intercessions (ἐντεύξεις), and thanksgivings for all people—emphasizing advocacy for others before God. In 1 Tim 4:5, food is sanctified through God's word and prayer (ἐντεύξεως). Classical usage includes petitions to authorities and general intercourse, but NT usage focuses on prayer/intercession. French preserves the distinct term 'ἐντεύξεις', while Spanish uses 'intercesiones' and 'oración', marking the formal prayer sense. PRAYER AND SUPPLICATION

ἔντῑμ-ος G1784 Adj-NMS (5×)

Honored, esteemed, precious; of persons held in high regard or of things considered valuable and choice.

An adjective built on timē ('honor, value'), describing someone or something held in high esteem. It can apply to persons – like the centurion's valued servant (Luke 7:2) or Christian leaders who deserve special recognition (Phil 2:29) – and also to things, such as the choice, precious living stone that is Christ (1 Pet 2:4, 6). The Spanish preciosa and honorable and the French honorable together reflect its dual range: intrinsic preciousness and socially recognized honor. Jesus' parable about choosing the more honored seat at a banquet (Luke 14:8) highlights the social dimension.

(5×) Honored, esteemed, held in high regard among people. Applied to the centurion's servant who was dear to him (Luke 7:2), to the more honored place at a feast (Luke 14:8), and to leaders like Epaphroditus whom believers should hold in high esteem (Phil 2:29). The Spanish más-honorable and French honorable capture the relational, social aspect of this sense – worth recognized by others in a community setting. In 1 Peter 2:4, 6, the term extends to Christ as the 'chosen and precious' cornerstone, where divine honor elevates the word from social esteem to theological worth. BELOVED AND PRECIOUS ἐντολ-ή G1785 N-DFP (67×)

entole – a commandment, injunction, or authoritative precept, especially divine law

The feminine noun entole ('commandment, injunction') denotes an authoritative directive, whether divine or human. Its 67 New Testament occurrences overwhelmingly concern God's commands: the Mosaic commandments debated in the Gospels ('which is the great commandment?', Matt 22:36), the 'new commandment' of love that Jesus gives (John 13:34), and the apostolic exhortations to keep God's commandments (1 John 2:3-4; 3:22-24). Distinguished from nomos ('law' as a system), entole highlights the individual precept – the specific, concrete directive. Spanish mandamiento, French commandement, and German Gebot all capture this sense of a binding authoritative charge, with no evidence of polysemy across the corpus.

commandment, injunction (67×) An authoritative directive or precept, most often referring to divine commands – the Decalogue (Matt 19:17-19), the 'greatest commandment' (Matt 22:36-38), Jesus's 'new commandment' to love one another (John 13:34; 15:12), and the apostolic call to keep God's commandments (1 John 2:3-4). Distinguished from nomos (the law as system) by its focus on the individual precept. Spanish mandamiento, French commandement, and German Gebot converge uniformly across all 67 occurrences, confirming a single sense of binding authoritative injunction. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

local, from that place; native residents as opposed to outsiders or foreigners

This adjective describes local residents or people from a particular place, as opposed to foreigners or visitors. In Acts 21:12, both 'we' (Paul's traveling companions) and the local residents beg Paul not to go to Jerusalem. The term distinguishes native inhabitants from visitors. Classical usage employed it for local customs, currencies, residents, and civil wars (as opposed to foreign conflicts). Luke emphasizes the unanimity of concern across both groups: locals and visitors alike plead with Paul to avoid the danger awaiting him.

(1×) Acts 21:12 records that 'both we and those of that place' (οἱ ἐντόπιοι) begged Paul not to ascend to Jerusalem. The adjective marks local residents in distinction from traveling companions. Spanish del lugar and French du lieu confirm the locative sense. Classical usage opposed ἐντόπιοι to foreigners or distinguished locals from colonizers. Luke shows broad consensus: everyone, whether visitor or resident, recognizes Paul's danger and pleads with him to stay away from Jerusalem. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE within, inside; in the interior or inner part, as opposed to outside

This preposition and adverb denotes position within or inside something. Jesus tells Pharisees to first clean the inside of the cup (Matt 23:26). He declares that the kingdom of God is within or among you (Luke 17:21)—either in the hearts of believers or in their midst through his presence. The term contrasts inner with outer, emphasizing location or realm. Classical usage included being within city walls, within one's own control, or on this side of a boundary.

(2×) Within, inside (preposition with genitive or adverb). In Matt 23:26, Jesus tells the Pharisee to cleanse first the inside (τὸ ἐντὸς) of the cup so the outside may be clean. In Luke 17:21, he declares the kingdom of God is within/among you (ἐντὸς ὑμῶν)—either in believers' hearts or in their midst through Christ. Classical usage emphasized position within boundaries (city walls, control, territory). Spanish 'dentro de' and French 'au-dedans' preserve the interior position sense. INSIDE AND WITHIN ἐντρέπ-ω G1788 V-FIP-3P (9×)

To turn someone inward in shame or deference; either 'to put to shame, admonish' or 'to respect, revere' (middle/passive).

From ἐν (in) + τρέπω (turn), this verb literally means 'to turn someone inward,' and its two senses flow naturally from that root image. In the middle voice it describes a turning toward someone in deference — 'they will respect my son,' says the vineyard owner in Jesus' parable (Matt 21:37; Mark 12:6; Luke 20:13). In its active or causative use, it means turning someone inward in a very different way: making them feel shame. Paul wields it with pastoral care: 'I do not write this to shame you' (1 Cor 4:14). Spanish elegantly mirrors this split, using 'respetar' for reverence and 'avergonzar' for shaming.

1. respect, revere (6×) To show respect, reverence, or deference toward a person, especially an authority figure. Predominantly used in the parable of the wicked tenants, where the vineyard owner sends his beloved son expecting the tenants 'will respect' him (Matt 21:37; Mark 12:6; Luke 20:13). Also appears for the unjust judge who 'neither feared God nor respected man' (Luke 18:2, 4) and for fatherly discipline that earns children's respect (Heb 12:9). Spanish 'respetar' and the underlying Greek middle voice both convey an inward turning of the self toward another in honor. SHAME AND REVERENCE

en: I-respect, They-will-respect, respecting | es: Respetarán, los-respetábamos, respetando | fr: faire-honte | de: beschaemen, ἐντρέπομαι, ἐντραπήσονται Matt 21:37; Mark 12:6; Luke 18:2; Luke 18:4; Luke 20:13

2. put to shame, make ashamed (3×) To put to shame, cause someone to feel ashamed, or admonish by inducing a sense of moral embarrassment. Paul uses it pastorally in 1 Corinthians 4:14: 'I write not to shame you but to admonish you as beloved children.' In 2 Thessalonians 3:14 and Titus 2:8 the goal is corrective — producing healthy shame that leads to repentance. Spanish shifts distinctly to 'avergonzar' (to embarrass/shame), and Arabic uses forms meaning 'to be abashed,' confirming this as a recognized separate sense from respectful deference. SHAME AND REVERENCE

to be nourished in, trained in; brought up or educated in something, formed by it

This verb in passive or middle voice means to be nourished, raised, or trained in something. First Timothy 4:6 encourages Timothy to be 'nourished up in the words of faith and good doctrine.' The term suggests ongoing formation through sustained exposure. Classical usage included being raised in certain practices or educated in particular teachings. Paul uses it to describe Timothy's continuous formation by sound doctrine, contrasting this wholesome diet with the poisonous myths he must reject.

(1×) In 1 Timothy 4:6, Paul commends Timothy as one 'being nourished' (ἐντρεφόμενος) in the words of faith and sound teaching. The present participle suggests ongoing formation, not one-time learning. This is dietary language applied to doctrine: Timothy feeds continuously on truth. Spanish nutriéndote captures the nutritional metaphor. Classical usage for being raised or trained in something fits perfectly. Healthy ministers require steady intake of wholesome doctrine to resist error and nourish others. FEEDING AND NOURISHING

trembling, characterized by physical shaking from fear or awe

An adjective describing someone physically trembling, typically in response to encountering the divine or overwhelming holy presence. The word compounds en- (in) with tromos (trembling), capturing an embodied fear response. All three New Testament instances occur in moments of divine encounter: Moses before the burning bush, the Philippian jailer after the earthquake and supernatural prison opening, and the Israelites at Sinai. The consistent translation across languages as 'trembling' or 'shaking' reflects both the physical manifestation and the emotional root—reverent terror before what is holy and dangerous.

(3×) Physically trembling from fear, particularly reverential fear in the presence of the divine. In Acts 7:32, Moses becomes 'trembling' and cannot look at the burning bush. In Acts 16:29, the jailer comes in 'trembling' after witnessing the earthquake and finding Paul and Silas still present. In Heb 12:21, Moses declares 'I am trembling' at the terror of Sinai. The evidence across all languages (Spanish 'temblando,' French 'tremblant,' German 'zitternd') uniformly renders this as physical shaking, not mere anxiety. TREMBLING AND FEAR shame, humiliation; the feeling of disgrace or dishonor, especially from being exposed or corrected

The word denotes shame or humiliation, often resulting from correction or exposure. Paul asks if there is not even one wise person among the Corinthians to judge disputes, speaking to their shame (1 Cor 6:5). He urges them to wake to righteousness, speaking to their shame for some lacking knowledge of God (1 Cor 15:34). The term can mean modest respect in classical usage, but NT contexts emphasize the shame of being exposed in wrong or incompetence.

(2×) Shame, humiliation; the feeling or state of disgrace from being exposed or corrected. In 1 Cor 6:5, Paul speaks to the Corinthians' shame (πρὸς ἐντροπὴν ὑμῖν) that they can't find even one wise person to judge disputes. In 1 Cor 15:34, he speaks to their shame (πρὸς ἐντροπὴν ὑμῖν λαλῶ) that some lack knowledge of God. The term emphasizes disgrace from exposure of inadequacy. Classical usage included modest respect, but NT contexts stress corrective shame. Cross-linguistic glosses consistently render 'shame': 'vergüenza', 'honte', 'Beschämung'. SHAME AND DISGRACE

ἐντρῠφ-άω G1792 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

to revel in, indulge in, take pleasure in; enjoy something luxuriously or with self-indulgence

This verb means to revel or take luxurious pleasure in something, often with negative connotations of excess or mockery. Second Peter 2:13 condemns false teachers who 'revel in their deceptions while they feast with you.' The term suggests self-indulgent pleasure, sometimes at others' expense. Classical usage included delighting in privileges, exulting over others' misfortunes, or treating things contemptuously. Peter depicts shameless hedonists who luxuriate in their own deceit even during sacred fellowship meals.

(1×) Second Peter 2:13 condemns those 'reveling in their deceptions' (ἐντρυφῶντες ἐν ταῖς ἀπάταις) while feasting with believers. The present participle depicts ongoing, shameless self-indulgence. These false teachers luxuriate in their own fraud during fellowship meals meant for genuine communion. Spanish deleitándose and German schwelgen capture the hedonistic pleasure-taking. Classical usage could mean delighting in power or mocking others. Peter exposes their audacity: they feast on deception itself. PLEASANTNESS AND DELIGHT

ἐντυγχάνω G1793 V-AIA-3P (5×)

To intercede, appeal to, plead with; to approach someone in authority on behalf of another, either positively or negatively.

Originally meaning to encounter or meet with someone, this verb developed the specialized sense of making a formal appeal or intercession. In the New Testament it covers both positive intercession – the Spirit interceding for the saints (Rom 8:27), Christ interceding at God's right hand (Rom 8:34, Heb 7:25) – and negative petition, as when the Jewish leaders appealed to Festus against Paul (Acts 25:24) or when Elijah pleaded with God against Israel (Rom 11:2). The Spanish interceder and French intercéder reflect the dominant NT sense precisely.

(5×) To intercede or appeal to a person in authority on behalf of (or against) another. Positively, the Spirit intercedes for believers according to God's will (Rom 8:27), Christ intercedes at God's right hand (Rom 8:34), and Jesus lives perpetually to intercede for those who draw near to God (Heb 7:25). Negatively, the Jewish multitude petitioned Festus against Paul (Acts 25:24), and Elijah appealed to God against Israel (Rom 11:2). The multilingual evidence – Spanish interceder, French intercéder, German eintreten – consistently highlights mediation before authority. PRAYER AND SUPPLICATION

to wrap up, roll up, envelop; enclosing something completely in cloth, especially in burial preparation

The verb ἐντυλίσσω (from ἐν + τυλίσσω 'roll') means to wrap or roll up in something, particularly in cloth. In NT usage it appears exclusively in burial contexts—wrapping Jesus' body in linen after crucifixion. The act of wrapping a corpse was essential Jewish burial practice, preserving dignity and containing decay. The verb captures both the tender care of burial preparation and the finality of death—the body wrapped, enclosed, committed to tomb.

(3×) Matthew 27:59 reports Joseph of Arimathea's action: 'Joseph took the body and wrapped it in a clean linen shroud'—burial preparation for Jesus. Luke 23:53 similarly states: 'he took it down and wrapped it in a linen shroud and laid him in a tomb'—the same careful wrapping. John 20:7 describes the resurrection discovery: 'and the face cloth, which had been on Jesus' head, not lying with the linen cloths but folded up in a place by itself'—evidence of orderly rising, not grave robbery. The Spanish (enrollado, envolvió) and French (envelopper) and German (einwickeln, ἐνετύλιξεν) all use wrapping verbs. The act of ἐντυλίσσω marks Jesus' full experience of death—not symbolic but real, his body receiving the burial rituals of mortality. The carefully wrapped grave clothes left behind become testimony to bodily resurrection. BIND WRAP TIE to engrave, carve, imprint; inscribe letters or designs into a hard surface

This verb means to engrave or carve into a surface, typically stone or metal. Second Corinthians 3:7 speaks of the law 'engraven in stones,' contrasting the old covenant written on tablets with the new covenant written on human hearts. The perfect passive participle emphasizes the completed, permanent state of the engraving. Classical usage included carving on monuments and molding in relief. Paul uses the physical permanence of stone-engraving to highlight a greater permanence: the Spirit's internal inscription on transformed hearts.

(1×) In 2 Corinthians 3:7, Paul refers to the ministry of death 'engraved on stones' (ἐντετυπωμένη ἐν λίθοις). This is Sinai vocabulary: the Ten Commandments carved into stone tablets. The perfect passive participle emphasizes permanence: once engraved, forever fixed. Spanish grabado and French graver confirm the inscription sense. But Paul's contrast is striking: external stone-engraving brought death; internal Spirit-writing brings life. The superior covenant is written not on hard stones but soft hearts. ENGRAVING AND INSCRIBING

to insult, outrage, treat with contempt; show disrespect or scorn toward someone or something sacred

This verb means to insult or treat with outrage and contempt, especially regarding sacred things. Hebrews 10:29 warns of severe punishment for those who have 'done despite unto the Spirit of grace.' This is willful, arrogant rejection of God's gracious offer. Classical usage included insulting people, mocking them in their circumstances, or treating laws contemptuously. The author of Hebrews employs the strongest language for trampling Christ's blood and insulting the Spirit—apostasy that merits fearful judgment.

(1×) Hebrews 10:29 warns of punishment for 'having insulted the Spirit of grace' (τὸ πνεῦμα... ἐνυβρίσας). The aorist participle marks completed action: willful, arrogant contempt for the Holy Spirit's gracious work. This is apostasy language: treating Christ's blood as common and scorning the Spirit. Spanish ultrajando and French outrager capture the outrage dimension. Classical usage included mockery and contemptuous treatment. The author describes the ultimate insult: rejecting divine grace itself after receiving knowledge of truth. CONTEMPT AND SCORN

ἐνυπνι-άζω G1797 V-FIP-3P (2×)

to dream; to experience visions or revelations during sleep; to be a dreamer

The verb describes dreaming or having dream visions. Peter quotes Joel's prophecy that in the last days, young men will dream dreams (Acts 2:17). Jude describes false teachers as dreamers who defile the flesh and reject authority (Jude 1:8). The Acts usage is neutral or positive (prophetic dreams), while Jude uses it pejoratively of those whose dreams lead them into moral corruption. Classical usage included both literal dreaming and metaphorical disturbing visions.

(2×) To dream, have dreams or visions; to be a dreamer. In Acts 2:17, Joel's prophecy says young men will dream dreams (ἐνυπνιασθήσονται)—part of Spirit-empowered revelation in the last days. In Jude 1:8, false teachers are dreamers (ἐνυπνιαζόμενοι) who defile flesh and reject authority—using dreams pejoratively for those following delusions. The term spans prophetic visions to deluded fantasies depending on context. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve both senses: Spanish 'soñarán' (will dream, positive) vs 'soñadores' (dreamers, pejorative). DREAM VISION

dream, vision in sleep; something seen or experienced during sleep, often with prophetic significance
This noun means a dream or vision experienced during sleep. Acts 2:17 quotes Joel's prophecy that in the last days 'your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams.' The term denotes nocturnal visions given by God for revelation. Classical usage sometimes distinguished significant, prophetic dreams from meaningless ones, though this distinction wasn't consistently maintained. Peter applies Joel's promise to Pentecost: the Spirit poured out brings divine communication through dreams and visions.

(1×) Acts 2:17 cites Joel's prophecy about old men dreaming ἐνυπνίοις—dreams. This pairs with young men seeing visions, encompassing all modes of divine revelation. The dative plural suggests dreams are the medium of revelation. Spanish en sueños and French songe point to nocturnal visions. Classical usage included prophetic and ordinary dreams. Peter interprets Pentecost as fulfillment: the Spirit's outpouring democratizes revelation—old and young, men and women, all receive God's communication. DREAM VISION

ἐνώπ-ιος G1799 Prep (95×)
Before, in the presence of — an improper preposition (with genitive) denoting position in someone's sight or presence Enopion functions as an improper preposition governing the genitive to express 'before, in the presence of, in the sight of.' It is overwhelmingly Lukan and Johannine in distribution — Luke and Acts account for a large share of its occurrences, and Revelation uses it extensively for scenes before the divine throne. The word carries a distinctly personal nuance: not merely spatial 'in front of' but relational 'under the gaze of,' making it the preferred term for standing before God (Luke 1:15; Rev 4:5), being acceptable in God's sight (Acts 4:19), and accountability before a judge. Spanish 'delante de,' French 'devant,' and German 'vor' each capture this spatial-relational duality.

before, in the presence of (95×) An improper preposition (with genitive) meaning 'before, in the presence of, in the sight of,' conveying the sense of being under someone's direct observation or authority. Its heaviest concentration falls in Luke-Acts and Revelation, where it repeatedly places human action before the divine gaze — walking blamelessly 'before God' (Luke 1:6, 75), speaking boldly 'before' rulers (Acts 4:19), and the heavenly court assembled 'before' the throne (Rev 1:4; 4:5; 8:2). Spanish 'delante de,' French 'devant,' and German 'vor' all mirror the spatial-to-relational gradient this preposition carries. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Enos, son of Seth, grandson of Adam; third generation from Adam in Luke's genealogy
This is the proper name Enos, referring to the son of Seth and grandson of Adam mentioned in Genesis 4:26. Luke 3:38 includes him in Jesus' genealogy, tracing the line back to Adam and ultimately to God. The name comes from Hebrew אֱנוֹשׁ meaning 'man' or 'mortal.' Genesis notes that in Enos's days people began to call upon the name of the Lord. Luke's inclusion of these ancient names grounds Jesus in the whole human story from creation forward.

(1×) Luke 3:38 lists Ἐνὼς in Jesus' genealogy as the son of Seth, son of Adam, son of God. This traces Jesus' lineage to humanity's beginning. The cross-lingual consistency (Enos, Enós) reflects the proper name's stability. Genesis 4:26 associates Enos with the beginning of worship: 'Then began men to call upon the name of the LORD.' Luke's genealogical regression to Adam establishes Jesus as the new Adam, representative of all humanity. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) ἐνωτίζομαι G1801 V-AMM-2P (1×)

to give ear, listen, pay attention; hear with intent and receptiveness
This verb means to give ear or listen attentively, derived from the word for 'ear.' In Acts 2:14, Peter commands the crowd to 'hearken to my words' as he begins his Pentecost sermon. The term emphasizes intentional, attentive listening beyond mere hearing. It's used in LXX for obeying God's voice. Peter calls for focused attention to interpret the astonishing events of Pentecost. The imperative demands more than passive hearing: receptive, obedient attention to apostolic proclamation.

(1×) Acts 2:14 records Peter's sermon opening: 'Give ear to my words' (ἐνωτίσασθε τὰ ῥήματά μου). The middle voice aorist imperative calls for personal, deliberate listening. This is more than 'hear'—it's 'pay attention,' 'take to heart.' Spanish escuchad and French prêter l'oreille capture the active listening demanded. LXX usage often conveyed obeying God's voice. Peter requires the crowd's full attention to understand Pentecost's significance through scriptural explanation. HEARING AND HEEDING

Ἑνώχ G1802 N-NMS (3×)
Enoch, the seventh from Adam who walked with God and was taken without seeing death
The proper name for the antediluvian patriarch Enoch (Hebrew חֲנוֹךְ), appearing in two key contexts in the New Testament. Luke's genealogy traces Jesus' lineage back through Enoch to Adam, while Hebrews celebrates Enoch as the paradigmatic example of faith-pleasing God, noting that 'he was taken up so that he should not see death' (Heb 11:5, quoting Gen 5:24). Jude references the tradition of Enoch's prophecy about divine judgment. The Greek transliteration Ἑνώχ maintains recognizable continuity with the Hebrew original across translation traditions.

(3×) The proper name of the patriarch Enoch, son of Jared, father of Methuselah (Gen 5:18-24). In Luke 3:37, he appears in Jesus' genealogy. In Heb 11:5, he exemplifies faith-filled life that pleased God, resulting in his being 'taken up' without dying. In Jude 1:14, he's identified as a prophet who foretold judgment. Translations consistently transliterate the Hebrew name with minor orthographic variation: French 'Hénoc,' Spanish 'Henóch,' German 'Henoch.' ENOCH HANOCH NAMES

ἕξ G1803 Adj-GFP (13×)
six — the cardinal number between five and seven Hex is the indeclinable Greek cardinal number six, appearing 13

times in the New Testament. Its occurrences span narrative and apocalyptic contexts alike: the six stone water jars at Cana (John 2:6), the sixth hour as a time marker (John 4:6), the six days before Passover (John 12:1), and the six-month pregnancy of Elizabeth (Luke 1:26, 36). In the Transfiguration accounts, 'after six days' frames the theophany on the mountain (Matt 17:1, Mark 9:2). James invokes the three and a half years (or 'six months' variant) of Elijah's drought (Jas 5:17). The numeral is straightforwardly rendered across all target languages: Spanish 'seis,' French 'six,' German 'sechs.'

six (13×) The cardinal number six, used for counting days, months, objects, and other quantities. Marks temporal intervals such as the six days before the Transfiguration (Matt 17:1, Mark 9:2), the six months of Elizabeth's pregnancy (Luke 1:26, 36), and the sixth hour of the day (John 4:6). Also counts concrete objects like the six water jars at Cana (John 2:6). All 13 occurrences express straightforward numerical value with no figurative or symbolic extension beyond their narrative contexts. ἐξαγγ-έλλω G1804 V-AIA-3P (2×) to announce, proclaim, make known; to declare or report something publicly

The verb means to tell out, proclaim, or make known publicly. The disciples went out preaching everywhere while the Lord worked with them (Mark 16:20—in the longer ending). Peter exhorts believers to proclaim the excellencies of God who called them from darkness to light (1 Pet 2:9). The term emphasizes open declaration and can carry connotations of reporting or betraying secrets in classical usage, but NT usage focuses on proclamation of divine truth and mighty works.

(2×) To proclaim, announce, make known; to declare publicly. In Mark 16:20 (longer ending), the disciples went out preaching everywhere, the Lord confirming the word through signs. In 1 Pet 2:9, believers are called to proclaim (ἐξαγγείλητε) the excellencies of him who called them from darkness—declaring God's mighty works. Classical usage included reporting/betraying secrets, but NT usage emphasizes open proclamation of divine truth. ἐξᾰγορ-άζω G1805 V-AIA-3S (4×) to redeem, buy back; in the middle voice, to make the most of (time or opportunity)

A compound of ek ('out of') and agorazo ('to buy in the marketplace'), this verb carries the vivid image of purchasing someone out of slavery or bondage. Paul uses it powerfully in Galatians 3:13 and 4:5 to describe Christ redeeming believers from the curse of the Law. In Ephesians 5:16 and Colossians 4:5, the middle voice form 'redeeming the time' shifts the metaphor toward seizing every opportunity wisely, as one would snap up a bargain before it disappears.

(4×) To buy back or ransom from bondage, especially from the curse of the Law. Paul's usage in Galatians 3:13 ('Christ redeemed us') and 4:5 ('to redeem those under the Law') draws on the marketplace image of purchasing a slave's freedom. Spanish 'redimió/redima' and English 'redeemed' consistently reflect this liberating transaction. The aorist and subjunctive forms emphasize the decisive, completed act of Christ's redemptive purchase. ACQUIRING AND BUYING ἐξάγω G1806 V-PIA-3S (12×)

lead out, bring out — to conduct someone from an enclosed place into the open, often implying deliverance

Exago combines the prefix ex- ('out of') with ago ('lead') to express the act of bringing someone out from confinement, bondage, or an enclosed space. Its 12 NT occurrences carry a strong theological resonance: God leading Israel out of Egypt (Acts 7:36, 13:17), an angel releasing apostles from prison (Acts 5:19), and soldiers leading Jesus out to crucifixion (Mark 15:20). The verb also appears in the tender scene of Jesus leading his disciples out to Bethany before his ascension (Luke 24:50). Spanish 'sacar' and German 'herausführen' both preserve the directional force — movement from inside to outside — that defines the word's semantic core.

lead out, bring out (12×) To lead or bring someone out of a place, typically from confinement, captivity, or an enclosed space into freedom or open territory. Encompasses divine deliverance (Acts 7:36, God leading Israel from Egypt; Acts 5:19, an angel freeing apostles from prison), military escort (Mark 15:20, soldiers leading Jesus out for crucifixion), and pastoral guidance (John 10:3, the shepherd leading out his sheep; Luke 24:50, Jesus leading disciples to Bethany). French 'faire sortir' and German 'herausführen' consistently render the exit-from-enclosure motion. All 12 occurrences share this single directional sense. GOING OUT AND FORTH

ἐξαιρ-έω G1807 V-AIM-1S (8×)

To rescue, deliver; to tear out, pluck out — extraction from danger or forcible physical removal

The verb ἐξαιρέω (ἐκ + αἱρέω, 'take out') splits into two dramatically different senses in the New Testament. In the middle voice, it becomes a powerful rescue verb: God 'delivered' Joseph from all his afflictions (Acts 7:10), came down to 'rescue' Israel from Egypt (Acts 7:34), and sent an angel to 'deliver' Peter from prison (Acts 12:11). In the active voice with physical objects, it takes on a visceral literalness: Jesus commands that if your eye causes you to sin, 'tear it out' (Matt 5:29; 18:9). Spanish tracks the split precisely — 'librar/libró' (set free) for rescue versus 'sácalo' (pull it out) for physical extraction — showing that the two senses occupy different conceptual territories across languages.

1. rescue, deliver (from danger or oppression) (6×) To rescue, deliver, or set free from danger, oppression, or enemies — the soteriological middle-voice sense. God is the primary agent: rescuing Joseph from afflictions in Egypt (Acts 7:10), descending to deliver Israel from bondage (Acts 7:34), sending an angel to free Peter from Herod's prison (Acts 12:11), and promising to deliver Paul from the Jewish people and the Gentiles (Acts 26:17). The Roman commander also 'rescued' Paul from the mob (Acts 23:27). Spanish 'librar/libró' (to free), French 'arracher/délivrer' (to snatch away / to deliver), and Arabic 'anqadha' (أنقذ, to rescue) all deploy salvation and liberation vocabulary, confirming the theological weight of this sense. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

en: I-rescued, he-might-rescue, rescued | es: librar, librándote, libró | fr: arracher, délivrer | de: befreit, ἐξέληται Acts 7:10; Acts 7:34; Acts 12:11; Acts 23:27; Acts 26:17

2. tear out, pluck out (physical removal) (2×) To tear out, pluck out, or forcibly remove a body part — the literal active-voice sense of physical extraction. Used exclusively in Jesus' hyperbolic teaching about radical self-discipline: 'If your right eye causes you to sin, tear it out and throw it away' (Matt 5:29; cf. Matt 18:9). The violent physicality distinguishes this sharply from the rescue sense. Spanish 'sácalo' (pull it out) and French 'arracher' (to rip out) both convey forceful removal of something attached, while the German gloss 'befreit' (freed) interestingly blurs the boundary — perhaps reflecting the theological point that removing the offending member 'frees' one from sin. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

ἐξαίρω G1808 V-AMA-2P (1×)

to remove, take away, put away; lift out or expel someone or something from a place

This verb means to remove or take away, often with force or finality. First Corinthians 5:13 commands the church to 'put away from yourselves that wicked person,' quoting Deuteronomy's formula for purging evil from the community. Classical usage included lifting things up or raising someone in dignity, but also removing or expelling. Paul applies covenant purity language to church discipline: just as Israel expelled evildoers to preserve holiness, the church must remove the unrepentant immoral person to protect community purity.

(1×) In 1 Corinthians 5:13, Paul commands 'Remove the wicked person from among yourselves' (ἐξάρατε τὸν πονηρόν). This is church discipline vocabulary drawn from Deuteronomy's purging formulas. The aorist imperative demands immediate, decisive action: expel the unrepentant sinner. Spanish Quitad and French enlever convey the removal. Classical usage for lifting or expelling fits the context. Paul insists the church exercise covenantal discipline to preserve holiness—tolerating known, unrepentant sin corrupts the whole community. LIFTING AND REMOVING to demand, ask for someone from another; request the surrender or release of a person

This verb means to demand someone from another or ask for someone's surrender. Luke 22:31 records Jesus' warning to Peter: 'Satan has demanded to have you.' The term suggests urgent, insistent requesting, often of a superior from another. Classical usage included demanding criminals for punishment or asking in marriage. Jesus reveals the cosmic conflict: Satan has petitioned to sift the disciples like wheat. The verb implies legal or authoritative demand, highlighting the spiritual warfare behind Peter's impending denial.

(1×) Luke 22:31 contains Jesus' sobering warning: 'Satan has demanded you' (ἐξῃτήσατο ὑμᾶς). The middle voice aorist suggests Satan's personal, aggressive demand to test the disciples. This echoes Job 1-2 where Satan requests permission to afflict the righteous. Spanish os pidió and French demander capture the requesting. Classical usage for demanding surrender of criminals adds ominous weight. Satan seeks to sift them like wheat—violent testing requiring divine permission. Jesus' intercession stands between Satan's demand and Peter's preservation. ASKING AND PRAYING

ἐξαίφν-ης G1810 Adv (5×)

Suddenly, unexpectedly; denoting an event that occurs without warning or preparation.

An adverb expressing abrupt, unanticipated occurrence. Every New Testament use carries a note of dramatic surprise: the heavenly host appearing suddenly to the shepherds (Luke 2:13), a spirit seizing a boy without warning (Luke 9:39), a blinding light from heaven flashing around Saul on the Damascus road (Acts 9:3, 22:6), and Jesus' warning that the master may return suddenly (Mark 13:36). Spanish de-repente and French soudainement both capture the shock element. The word consistently marks divine irruption into ordinary human experience.

(5×) Suddenly, all at once, without prior warning. Used to mark dramatic moments of divine or supernatural intervention: the angelic multitude appearing to the shepherds (Luke 2:13), a spirit suddenly seizing a child (Luke 9:39), a great light from heaven flashing around Saul (Acts 9:3; 22:6), and the eschatological return of the master (Mark 13:36). The uniformity across translations – Spanish de-repente, French soudain/soudainement, English suddenly – confirms a single, unambiguous adverbial sense of instantaneous, startling occurrence. SUDDEN UNEXPECTED

to follow after, pursue; continued allegiance or imitation of a person or teaching

The compound verb ἐξακολουθέω (ἐκ + ἀκολουθέω 'follow') means to follow out, follow after, or pursue—suggesting both physical following and metaphorical adherence to teachings or example. In 2 Peter it describes both positive following (the apostolic eyewitness account) and negative (destructive heresies, Balaam's way). The prefix ἐκ intensifies the sense—following all the way out, pursuing to the end, not casual association but committed adherence.

(3×) Second Peter 1:16 defends apostolic authority: 'For we did not follow cleverly devised myths when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses'—they followed actual events, not fabrications. Second Peter 2:2 warns: 'And many will follow their sensuality, and because of them the way of truth will be blasphemed'—people pursuing false teachers' licentiousness. Verse 2:15 condemns those who 'have followed the way of Balaam...who loved gain from wrongdoing'—pursuing mercenary prophetic corruption. The German (nachfolgen 'follow after') captures the sense clearly. The verb describes committed following—whether of apostolic truth or destructive error. Peter's usage creates moral urgency: whom and what we follow defines spiritual trajectory. FOLLOWING AND DISCIPLESHIP

six hundred; the cardinal number 600

This numeral appears twice in Revelation's apocalyptic visions. It forms part of the infamous number 666, the number of the beast (Rev 13:18). It also measures the distance blood flowed from the winepress of God's wrath—1,600 stadia, with six hundred as the first component (Rev 14:20). Both occurrences in Revelation contribute to symbolic, apocalyptic numerology. The number itself is neutral but gains ominous significance in these prophetic contexts.

(2×) Six hundred (numeral). Both NT occurrences are in Revelation's apocalyptic visions. In Rev 13:18, it forms part of 666 (χξϛ' = 600+60+6), the number of the beast requiring wisdom to calculate. In Rev 14:20, blood from God's winepress flowed 1,600 stadia (χίλιοι ἑξακόσιοι = one thousand six hundred). The number itself is neutral but gains symbolic weight in apocalyptic contexts. ἐξαλείφω G1813 V-APA-NMS (5×)

To wipe away, blot out, erase; to obliterate something written or to remove tears and suffering.

Combines the prefix ex- ('out, away') with aleiphō ('to anoint, smear'), yielding the core idea of wiping or smearing something out of existence. In the New Testament it carries two vivid applications: erasing a record of guilt or a name – blotting out sins (Acts 3:19), canceling the written code of ordinances (Col 2:14), threatening to blot out a name from the book of life (Rev 3:5) – and the tender image of God wiping away every tear (Rev 7:17, 21:4). Spanish borrar ('to erase') and French effacer ('to efface') together cover this spectrum from legal cancellation to compassionate comfort.

(5×) To blot out, erase, or cancel a written record, particularly of sin or legal obligation. Peter calls hearers to repent so that their sins may be blotted out (Acts 3:19), and Paul declares that Christ erased the handwriting of ordinances against us (Col 2:14). The warning in Rev 3:5 about blotting a name from the book of life inverts the image – erasure as judgment rather than mercy. Spanish borrando/borraré and French effacer reinforce the metaphor of wiping clean a written surface. In Rev 7:17 and 21:4, the same verb takes on a tender, physical sense: God will wipe away every tear from their

to leap up, spring up, jump; move suddenly upward with energy and joy

This verb means to leap or spring up, often with joy or sudden energy. Acts 3:8 describes the healed lame man 'leaping up' after Peter commands him to walk in Jesus' name. The term emphasizes vigorous, joyful movement. Classical usage included leaping from places, jumping off walls, or fish leaping from water. Luke uses it to capture the explosive joy and physical vitality of instantaneous healing: a man who never walked now leaps in worship and praise.

(1×) Acts 3:8 vividly describes the lame man's response to healing: 'leaping up, he stood and walked.' The aorist participle ἐξαλλόμενος captures the explosive upward movement from prone to standing. This isn't cautious testing—it's exuberant leaping. Spanish saltando and French tressaillir convey the joyful bounding. Classical usage for leaping out or jumping fits perfectly. Luke emphasizes the complete, immediate nature of the miracle: from congenital lameness to leaping in one moment, glorifying God. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 9550 WITH 6 SENSES

resurrection, rising up; specifically the resurrection from the dead to eternal life

This noun means resurrection or rising up, specifically from death. Philippians 3:11 expresses Paul's hope to 'attain unto the resurrection of the dead.' The term is used in contexts of rising from bed or emigrating but primarily in NT for resurrection. Paul uses a compound form (ἐξανάστασις rather than simple ἀνάστασις) perhaps for emphasis or to distinguish the first resurrection of believers. His consuming desire is to share in Christ's resurrection power and pattern, even if it costs him everything.

(1×) Philippians 3:11 articulates Paul's ultimate goal: 'if by any means I might attain to the resurrection from the dead' (τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν). The double article emphasizes this particular resurrection. Paul subordinates all achievements to this one hope: sharing Christ's resurrection. Classical usage included rising from bed, but NT usage is eschatological. Paul's 'if by any means' expresses not doubt but intensity: he'll do whatever it takes to attain resurrection life. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12060 WITH 4 SENSES

to spring up, sprout; to emerge or shoot up from the ground or surface

The verb describes sprouting or springing up quickly. In both Gospel parables of the sower, seed falls on rocky ground and immediately springs up because of shallow soil (Matt 13:5, Mark 4:5). The quick sprouting seems promising but lacks depth for endurance. The term emphasizes the sudden, visible emergence from the ground—a dramatic upward growth that proves unsustainable without roots. Classical usage included plants growing from the earth.

(2×) To spring up, sprout, shoot up from the ground. Both occurrences describe seed in Jesus' parable springing up quickly on rocky ground. In Matt 13:5 and Mark 4:5, seed immediately sprang up (ἐξανέτειλεν) because soil was shallow—producing quick but unsustainable growth without depth. The verb emphasizes sudden, visible emergence. Classical usage described plants springing up from earth (ποίην χθονός). Spanish 'brotó/brotaron' (sprouted) and French 'pousser' (to grow/spring up) preserve the agricultural emergence sense. SPROUTING AND GROWING

to raise up, cause to rise, bring into existence (especially offspring or successor)

A causative verb meaning to make someone or something stand up or come into being. In biblical usage, it often carries the specific sense of raising up offspring or a successor, particularly in the context of levirate marriage law where a brother raises up children for his deceased brother. The compound ex-anistēmi intensifies the basic 'stand' root with a prefix suggesting 'out' or 'forth,' emphasizing the bringing forth into existence. The verb appears in both the Synoptic discussion of the Sadducees' resurrection question and in the Jerusalem council debate about Gentile converts.

(3×) To raise up or bring into existence, particularly offspring for a deceased brother according to levirate custom. In Mark 12:19 and Luke 20:28 (parallel passages), the Sadducees quote the law requiring a brother to 'raise up offspring' for his deceased brother's widow. In Acts 15:5, believing Pharisees 'rose up' to argue their position—here the sense shifts to rising to speak, though still with the connotation of standing forth publicly. The Romance languages (Spanish 'levante,' French 'susciter') capture both the literal 'raise' and metaphorical 'bring forth' dimensions. RESURRECTION AND RISING

ἐξᾰπᾰτάω G1818 V-ASA-3S (6×)

To deceive thoroughly, beguile utterly; an intensified form of 'apatao' indicating complete deception.

An intensified compound of 'apatao' (to deceive) with the prefix 'ex-' conveying thoroughness, this verb describes deception that is complete and devastating in its effect. Paul uses it to describe sin's deadly strategy through the commandment (Rom 7:11), the serpent's beguiling of Eve (2 Cor 11:3), and the danger of smooth-talking deceivers in the church (Rom 16:18). The prefix elevates ordinary deception to something total – not just being misled, but being thoroughly taken in. Spanish 'enganar' and French 'tromper' translate the root, though neither fully captures the intensifying force of the 'ex-' prefix.

deceive, beguile utterly (6×) To deceive thoroughly, beguile completely, lead utterly astray. The prefix 'ex-' intensifies the base verb 'apatao,' indicating deception that is comprehensive rather than superficial. In Rom 7:11, sin 'utterly deceived' Paul through the commandment; in 2 Cor 11:3, the serpent 'thoroughly beguiled' Eve; in Rom 16:18, false teachers deceive the hearts of the unsuspecting; in 1 Cor 3:18, Paul warns against self-deception; and in 2 Thess 2:3, deception accompanies the eschatological rebellion. The consistent thread is deception that achieves its full effect, leaving the victim completely misled. DECEPTION AND BEGUILING

suddenly, unexpectedly; happening without warning or in an instant

This adverb means suddenly or unexpectedly, marking an abrupt change or surprising event. Mark 9:8 describes the disciples' experience at the Transfiguration: 'Suddenly, when they had looked round about, they saw no man any more, save Jesus only.' The term emphasizes the instant return to normalcy after the glorious theophany. Classical and biblical usage marks unexpected moments. Mark uses it to capture the disorienting shift: one moment Moses and Elijah converse with transfigured Jesus; the next, only Jesus remains.

(1×) Mark 9:8 describes the end of the Transfiguration: ἐξάπινα —'suddenly'—looking around they saw only Jesus. The adverb marks the abrupt transition from glory back to ordinary reality. Moses and Elijah vanish; the radiance fades; Jesus alone remains. Spanish de repente and French soudainement capture the unexpectedness. The Transfiguration's conclusion is as instantaneous as its beginning: glory appears and disappears suddenly, leaving disciples alone with Jesus—which is enough. SUDDEN UNEXPECTED

ἐξαπορέω G1820 V-ANP (2×)
to despair utterly, be in complete perplexity; to be at a total loss, without hope or resource
This strengthened form of 'to be perplexed' intensifies to utter despair. Paul describes being so utterly burdened in Asia that he despaired even of life (2 Cor 1:8). Yet he balances this by saying they are perplexed but not driven to despair (2 Cor 4:8). The term conveys being at absolute wit's end, without any perceived way forward—though Paul maintains that God delivers even from such extremity. Classical usage included being without money or resources.

(2×) To despair utterly, be in extreme perplexity; to be at a total loss or without hope. In 2 Cor 1:8, Paul was so utterly burdened that they despaired (ἐξαπορηθῆναι) even of life—describing being pressed beyond strength. In 2 Cor 4:8, he contrasts being perplexed (ἀπορούμενοι) but not utterly despairing (ἐξαπορούμενοι)—maintaining hope despite dire circumstances. The verb intensifies simple perplexity to absolute desperation. Classical usage included being without resources. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve the despair sense: 'desesperando/desesperar', 'désespérer'. DESPAIR HOPELESSNESS

send out, send forth, dispatch — to send someone away with purpose, authority, or commission Exapostello is a strengthened form of apostello, with the prefix ex- ('out') intensifying the notion of sending forth. All 13 New Testament occurrences carry the sense of dispatching someone (or something) with deliberate purpose. Luke uses it most frequently: God sends away the rich empty-handed (Luke 1:53), a vineyard owner sends servants to collect his due (Luke 20:10-11), and the early church dispatches Barnabas and Paul on mission (Acts 7:12, 11:22, 12:11, 22:21). The theological weight is clearest in Galatians 4:4-6, where God 'sent forth' his Son and then 'sent forth' the Spirit — the double use underscoring divine initiative. Spanish 'enviar,' French 'envoyer,' German 'aussenden' all capture the outward-directed commissioning force.

send out, dispatch (with authority or commission) (13×)
To send out or dispatch someone with purpose, authority, or divine commission — a strengthened form of apostello with the prefix ex- ('out from') emphasizing departure and mission. Key theological uses include God sending forth his Son and the Spirit (Gal 4:4, 6) and the divine commissioning of apostles (Acts 22:21). Narrative uses include sending servants to a vineyard (Luke 20:10-11), sending someone away empty-handed (Luke 1:53), and the angel releasing Peter from prison (Acts 12:11). The Longer Ending of Mark uses it for the spread of the gospel message (Mark 16:20). All 13 occurrences share the core idea of purposeful outward dispatch. SENDING AND DISPATCHING

to complete, finish thoroughly; to equip fully or bring to perfect readiness
The verb means to complete, finish, or equip thoroughly for a task. Paul stayed in Ephesus until completing the days (Acts 21:5), finishing the planned time. The man of God is thoroughly equipped for every good work through Scripture (2 Tim 3:17). Classical usage included finishing buildings, equipping ships, or furnishing with supplies. The term emphasizes bringing something to full completion or perfect readiness—not just partial preparation but comprehensive equipping.

(2×) To complete, finish thoroughly; to equip fully. In Acts 21:5, Paul remained in Ephesus until completing (ἐξαρτίσαι) the days—finishing the appointed time. In 2 Tim 3:17, the man of God is thoroughly equipped (ἐξηρτισμένος) for every good work through God-breathed Scripture—emphasizing complete readiness. Classical usage included finishing buildings, equipping ships, furnishing supplies. The perfect passive participle in 2 Tim stresses the completed state of being fully equipped. ἐξαστράπτω G1823 V-PPA-NMS (1×) flashing, gleaming, dazzling; shining brilliantly like lightning
This verb means to flash or gleam like lightning, shining with brilliant radiance. Luke 9:29 uses it to describe Jesus' clothing during the Transfiguration, which became 'dazzling white.' The term evokes lightning's bright flash. Classical usage applied it to the sun's brilliant light. Luke employs lightning imagery to convey the supernatural radiance of Jesus' transfigured appearance: his garments gleam with divine glory, anticipating his resurrection brightness and eternal splendor.

(1×) Luke 9:29 describes Jesus' clothing at the Transfiguration as ἐξαστράπτων—'flashing' or 'gleaming white.' The present participle suggests continuous radiant gleaming. This is theophanic glory language: Jesus' garments shine with lightning-like brilliance. Spanish resplandeciente captures the radiance. Classical usage for sun's light or lightning flash fits Luke's vision of divine glory breaking through human form. The dazzling clothes manifest Jesus' true identity as God's glorious Son. BRIGHTNESS AND SPLENDOR

ἐξαυτῆς G1824 Adv (6×)
Immediately, at once, right away; a temporal adverb marking sudden or prompt action.
Derived from 'ex autes' (from that very [hour/moment]), this adverb marks swift, unhesitating action. It appears predominantly in Acts, where Luke uses it to convey narrative urgency: Cornelius sends for Peter 'at once' (Acts 10:33), the men from Caesarea arrive 'immediately' (Acts 11:11), the tribune rushes soldiers down 'immediately' (Acts 21:32), and Claudius Lysias dispatches Paul by night 'at once' (Acts 23:30). In Mark 6:25, Herodias's daughter comes in 'immediately' with her grim request. Spanish 'inmediatamente' and French 'aussitot' both capture the sense of zero delay.

immediately, at once (6×) A temporal adverb meaning 'immediately, at once, right away,' indicating that an action follows another with no intervening delay. Etymologically from 'ex autes (horas)' – 'from that very (hour).' In Mark 6:25 it describes the alarming speed of Herodias's daughter returning with the request for John's head. In Acts, Luke uses it repeatedly to drive narrative pace: Cornelius's immediate dispatch of servants (10:33), the arrival of the men from Joppa (11:11), the tribune's rapid military response (21:32), and Lysias's overnight transfer of Paul (23:30). ἐξεγ-είρω G1825 V-AIA-1S (2×) to raise up, awaken; to rouse from sleep or raise from the dead; to cause to stand or appear The verb means to awaken or raise up, used both of rousing from sleep and raising from death. God raised up Pharaoh for a purpose, displaying power through him (Rom 9:17). God who raised the Lord Jesus will also raise believers (1 Cor 6:14). The term emphasizes God's sovereign action in bringing someone onto the scene or restoring to life. Classical usage included waking from sleep, raising the dead, and metaphorically arousing emotions or conflict.

(2×) To raise up, awaken; to cause to arise or appear. In Rom 9:17, God says 'I raised you up' (ἐξήγειρά σε) to Pharaoh—bringing him onto the historical stage for divine purposes. In 1 Cor 6:14, God raised the Lord and will raise us (ἐξεγερεῖ) through his power—resurrection from death. The verb spans awakening from sleep to raising the dead, with God as agent. Classical usage includes waking, resurrection, and metaphorically arousing. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve the raising sense: 'levantará/levanté', 'ressusciter' (resurrect). RESURRECTION AND RISING

to go out, depart, leave a place

A compound verb from ek ('out') and eimi ('to go'), used exclusively in Acts to describe physical departure from a location. It appears when Paul and Barnabas leave the synagogue (Acts 13:42), when companions depart for Athens (17:15), and when Paul prolongs his farewell discourse before departing (20:7). The word conveys deliberate, purposeful movement away from a gathering or place, distinct from mere wandering.

(4×) To go out or depart from a specific location, implying purposeful exit. All four NT occurrences appear in Acts in travel narratives: departing from a synagogue (13:42), setting out on a journey (17:15), preparing to leave the next day (20:7), and escaping to shore (27:43). Spanish 'partieron/de-partir' and French 'sortir' confirm the consistent sense of physical departure. The participial forms ('going out') often mark a transition point in the narrative. GOING OUT AND FORTH to refute thoroughly, convict completely; to prove someone wrong beyond doubt

An intensified form of the verb 'to convict,' this word means to refute someone utterly or prove them wrong in public debate. Classical authors use it for exposing someone's errors before the assembly or demonstrating guilt. It can take a double accusative (the person and the charge), as in 'convicting someone of being unable.' The passive voice appears in contexts of being proven guilty or exposed as wrongdoers. The strengthening prefix ἐξ- adds force: not just correction but thorough, public refutation.

ἐξέλκ-ω G1828 V-PPM/P-NMS (1×)

to be dragged away, drawn out; pulled or lured away from a position or path

This verb means to be drawn or dragged away, often against resistance. James 1:14 warns that each person is tempted 'when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.' The term suggests being pulled from safety into danger. Classical usage included dragging things out, rescuing from slavery, or pulling along wounded persons. James uses hunting or fishing imagery: desire baits and hooks us, dragging us from righteousness toward sin. The passive voice shows we're acted upon by our own passions.

(1×) James 1:14 describes temptation's mechanism: each one is 'drawn away' (ἐξελκόμενος) by their own desire and enticed. The present passive participle suggests ongoing vulnerability to being pulled off course. This is fishing/hunting imagery: desire baits the hook, then drags the victim away. Spanish siendo arrastrado captures the dragging force. Classical usage for dragging wounded men or pulling from captivity adds pathos. James locates temptation's source not externally but internally: our own desires lure and drag us toward sin. DRAWING AND PULLING

vomit, something vomited up; matter expelled from the stomach through the mouth

This rare noun means vomit or matter that has been expelled from the stomach. Second Peter 2:22 applies the proverb 'The dog returns to his own vomit' to false teachers who abandon the faith. The term is graphic and repulsive, emphasizing the disgusting nature of apostasy. Peter uses this visceral image to show how returning to former sinful ways after knowing Christ is as revolting as a dog eating its own vomit. The metaphor stresses both pollution and willful degradation.

(1×) Second Peter 2:22 quotes Proverbs 26:11: 'The dog returns to his own vomit' (ἐξέραμα). This is deliberately repulsive imagery for apostasy: those who know Christ but return to sin are like dogs eating expelled filth. The noun denotes expelled stomach contents. Spanish vómito is cross-linguistically consistent. Peter's point is visceral: abandoning Christ after knowing him is morally and spiritually revolting, comparable to the most disgusting animal behavior. The proverb emphasizes foolish, degrading repetition of error. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14497 WITH 3 SENSES

to search out, examine carefully; investigate thoroughly or explore diligently

This verb means to search out or examine carefully, conducting thorough investigation. First Peter 1:10 describes Old Testament prophets who 'searched diligently' concerning the salvation they prophesied. The term emphasizes intensive, careful examination. Classical and LXX usage shows it means to search out thoroughly, to investigate. Peter depicts prophets as diligent researchers into their own prophecies, seeking to understand the time and manner of the coming salvation they foretold but didn't fully comprehend.

(1×) First Peter 1:10 describes prophets who 'searched and inquired diligently' (ἐξηραύνησαν) about the salvation they predicted. The aorist verb marks their completed investigation. These prophets were both proclaimers and puzzled researchers, examining their own Spirit-given words to understand timing and fulfillment. Spanish escudriñaron and German erforschen convey the thorough searching. Peter shows the prophets' humility: they served future generations, knowing their prophecies pointed beyond their own time to Christ and the gospel now revealed. JUDICIAL EXAMINATION

ἐξέρχομαι G1831 V-AMA-2P (218×)

To go out, come out, depart; of physical exit from a place, authoritative commands to exit, and figurative spreading or issuing forth.

Exerchomai is the New Testament's workhorse verb for leaving an enclosed space — exiting a house, departing a city, coming out of a tomb. With 219 occurrences it appears in nearly every narrative context, from Jesus going out to pray to demons being expelled from their hosts. The compound structure (ek + erchomai, 'out of' + 'come/go') preserves its spatial core even in extended uses: news 'goes out' into a region, words 'proceed out of' the mouth, and lightning 'comes forth' from east to west. The multilingual evidence neatly tracks the semantic divisions — Spanish salir and German hinausgehen cover physical exit, while Korean 나가다 (nagada, 'go out') and Arabic kharaja both carry the same inside-to-outside directionality. The imperative use in exorcism contexts is particularly striking, where Jesus' bare command 'Come out!' (Mark 1:25, 5:8) carries the full authority of divine speech.

1. go/come out physically (192×) Physical movement from inside to outside — the dominant sense at 193 occurrences, covering all concrete instances of exiting, leaving, or departing a location. Jesus 'went out' of the house (Matt 13:1), the whole city 'came out' to meet him (Matt 8:34), the sower 'went out' to sow (Matt 13:3), and unclean spirits 'came out' of possessed persons (Matt 17:18). Spanish salió, French sortit, Korean 나갔다, and Swahili -toka all converge on the same directional motion frame. The aorist form exelthen is overwhelmingly narrative, driving story forward from scene to scene. GOING OUT AND FORTH

en: came-out, has-gone-out, he-went-out | es: ha-salido, salió | fr: sortir | de: geht-hinaus, hinausgehen Matt 8:34; Matt 9:26; Matt 13:3; Matt 17:18; Matt 20:1

2. come out as command (13×) Imperative commands to come out or go out — 13 occurrences where the verb carries the force of authoritative directive. Most strikingly in exorcism: 'Come out of him, unclean spirit!' (Mark 5:8; cf. Mark 1:25, 9:25, Luke 4:35). Also in the midnight cry 'Come out to meet the bridegroom!' (Matt 25:6) and Paul's command to separate from unbelievers (2 Cor 6:17). The imperative mood is cross-linguistically marked: Spanish Sal/Salid, Korean 나와라 (nawara), and German Geh hinaus all shift to direct-address command forms. The exorcism uses are theologically loaded — the single verb exerchomai encodes both the demon's involuntary ejection and Christ's sovereign authority. GOING OUT AND FORTH

en: Come-out, Go-out, come-out | es: Sal, Salid, sal | fr: sortir | de: geht-hinaus, hinausgehen Matt 25:6; Mark 1:25; Mark 5:8; Mark 9:25; Luke 4:35

3. go forth or spread (10×) Figurative issuing forth or spreading — 10 occurrences where what 'comes out' is not a person but a report, a word, or a phenomenon. News 'went out' into all the land (Matt 9:26), evil things 'proceed out of the heart' (Matt 15:18-19), and lightning 'comes forth' from the east (Matt 24:27). Arabic kharaja and Korean 나오다 (naoda) both naturally extend from physical to figurative exit, but several languages introduce distinct vocabulary: Spanish sale ('comes out') versus se difundió ('spread') reveals the metaphorical extension. The 'ruler from Bethlehem' who 'shall come forth' (Matt 2:6, quoting Micah 5:2) shows this sense carrying prophetic and messianic weight. GOING OUT AND FORTH

4. depart or withdraw (3×) Deliberate departure or withdrawal from a person or community — 3 occurrences where the emphasis falls on relational separation rather than spatial exit. Peter says 'Depart from me, Lord, for I am a sinful man' (Luke 5:8); the Caesarean believers accompany Paul as he 'departs' (Acts 21:5, 21:8). Spanish Apártate ('distance yourself') rather than simple sal ('go out') signals the relational dimension. Korean 떠나다 (tteonada, 'to leave/part from') likewise distinguishes this from mere physical exit. Though small, this cluster captures a genuine nuance: exerchomai here is less about passing through a doorway and more about breaking fellowship or taking leave. GOING OUT AND FORTH

it is lawful, it is permitted — impersonal verb expressing legal or moral permissibility under Torah or custom

Exesti is an impersonal verb (from exeimi, 'it is possible') that appears 32 times in the New Testament, nearly always in debates over what the Torah allows. The Pharisees challenge Jesus with exestin questions — 'Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath?' (Matt 12:10), 'Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife?' (Matt 19:3) — and Jesus consistently reframes the question by appeal to deeper scriptural principles. His disciples pluck grain on the Sabbath (Matt 12:2-4), and he himself heals, each time asserting that mercy and human need outrank ritual restriction. Paul uses the word differently in 1 Corinthians 6:12 and 10:23 — 'All things are lawful for me' — to set up his freedom-versus-edification argument. Spanish 'es licito' and German 'ist erlaubt' capture the legal-permission sense with precision.

it is lawful, it is permitted (32×) An impersonal verb indicating that an action is legally or morally permissible, typically within the framework of Torah or established custom. Dominates Sabbath controversies — healing (Matt 12:10; Luke 14:3), plucking grain (Matt 12:2; Mark 2:24), doing good (Mark 3:4) — and also governs questions of divorce (Matt 19:3), taxation (Matt 22:17), and priestly prerogatives (Matt 12:4). Paul adapts it as a maxim of Christian liberty: 'all things are lawful' but not all edify (1 Cor 6:12; 10:23). JUDGING AND DECIDING to examine closely, search out, inquire carefully into; to question or investigate with thoroughness

This verb carries the force of careful, thorough examination—not a casual glance but a diligent search. When the magi are told to "search carefully" for the child (Matt 2:8), the word captures Herod's feigned interest in precision. Jesus uses it when instructing the seventy to "inquire" which household is worthy (Matt 10:11), and John places it on Jesus' lips at the breakfast by the sea, where none of the disciples dared "ask" him who he was (John 21:12)—a question they would have examined closely had they not already known. The multilingual evidence (Spanish averiguad/indagad, French examiner, German erforschen) consistently points to investigative scrutiny rather than simple inquiry.

(3×) To examine closely or inquire carefully, often in contexts requiring discernment or investigation. The Greek root suggests thorough scrutiny—reviewing troops, weighing words exactly, making inquiries from those who know. In Matthew's nativity account, Herod's command to the magi employs this word with its full investigative force. The legal/judicial domain assignment reflects the term's association with careful examination of evidence or facts. JUDICIAL EXAMINATION

To relate in detail, explain, narrate, make known; to give a full account of events or truths.

In classical Greek this word ranged broadly from 'lead' to 'prescribe' to 'narrate,' but in the NT it has narrowed to the communicative sense of explaining, relating, or making known in detail. Its most theologically charged occurrence is John 1:18 – the only-begotten Son 'has made known' the unseen Father, using the very verb from which English derives 'exegesis.' In Acts, it describes missionaries giving detailed accounts: the Emmaus disciples explain what happened on the road (Luke 24:35), Cornelius recounts his vision (Acts 10:8), and Paul and Barnabas narrate the signs God performed among the Gentiles (Acts 15:12, 14).

relate, explain, make known (6×) To relate, narrate, explain, or make known in detail – to give a thorough account of events, experiences, or truths. This is the word from which English derives 'exegesis.' Its theological high point is John 1:18, where the Son is said to have 'made known' (exegesato) the invisible God – an act of divine narration that reveals the Father's character. In Luke 24:35, the Emmaus disciples 'explain' (exegounto) the road encounter; in Acts 10:8, Cornelius 'relates' his vision; and in Acts 15:12 and 15:14, Paul, Barnabas, and James 'narrate' what God has done among the Gentiles. Spanish 'explicar/relatar' and French 'exposer/raconter' divide the semantic territory that this single Greek verb covers. COUNTING AND NARRATING

Sixty; the cardinal number between fifty-nine and sixty-one.

The indeclinable Greek cardinal number for sixty. It appears in the NT in agricultural and geographic contexts: the sixtyfold yield in Jesus' parable of the sower (Matt 13:8, 13:23; Mark 4:8, 4:20), the sixty stadia distance to Emmaus (Luke 24:13), and symbolic measurements in Revelation. The parable usage is especially notable — sixty sits between thirty and a hundred as a middle tier of fruitfulness, a detail preserved identically across Spanish 'sesenta,' French 'soixante,' and German 'sechzig.'

(9×) The cardinal number sixty, used in the NT for quantities, measurements, and proportional yields. Its most prominent appearances are in the parable of the sower, where sixtyfold represents the middle level of fruitfulness between thirty and a hundred (Matt 13:8, 13:23; Mark 4:8, 4:20). It also marks the distance from Jerusalem to Emmaus as sixty stadia (Luke 24:13) and appears in age qualifications and apocalyptic measurements (1 Tim 5:9; Rev 13:18). All target languages use their standard numeral: Spanish 'sesenta,' French 'soixante,' German 'sechzig.' SIXTY CARDINAL NUMBER

ἑξῆς G1836 Adv (5×)

Next, in order, successively; an adverb marking the immediately following time or sequence.

An adverb of temporal or logical sequence meaning 'next' or 'in succession.' Luke and the author of Acts favor this word to mark transitions in narrative time: 'on the next day' (Luke 7:11; 9:37), 'the next day' after sailing (Acts 21:1; 27:18), and 'the next day' of a legal proceeding (Acts 25:17). Spanish siguiente and French ensuite both capture the straightforward sequential meaning. The word functions as a narrative hinge, moving the reader smoothly from one episode to the next.

(5×) Next in temporal sequence, on the following day or occasion. All five NT occurrences serve as narrative markers: Jesus went to a city called Nain on the next day (Luke 7:11), the next day after the Transfiguration (Luke 9:37), the next day after departing Miletus (Acts 21:1), the next day after the accusers arrived (Acts 25:17), and the next day during the storm at sea (Acts 27:18). The consistent rendering across languages – Spanish siguiente, French ensuite, English next – confirms a single adverbial sense of immediate temporal succession. DAYS AND DAYLIGHT

to sound forth, resound, echo out; spread widely like sound traveling outward

This verb means to sound forth or echo out, describing sound that spreads widely. First Thessalonians 1:8 celebrates how 'from you sounded out the word of the Lord' not only in Macedonia and Achaia but everywhere. The term suggests resonance and amplification. Classical usage included sounding forth songs or giving vent to prayers. Paul uses acoustic imagery for evangelistic spread: the gospel rings out from Thessalonica like a trumpet blast, its sound echoing far beyond the immediate region.

(1×) First Thessalonians 1:8 praises the church: 'From you the word of the Lord has sounded forth' (ἐξήχηται). The perfect tense indicates ongoing reverberation: the gospel continues echoing outward from Thessalonica. Spanish ha resonado and German erschallen capture the acoustic spreading. Classical usage for sounding forth songs fits Paul's image of the gospel ringing out like a trumpet. The Thessalonians' faith became so vibrant and vocal that their witness reverberated throughout Macedonia, Achaia, and beyond. SINGING AND MUSIC

habit, practice, state of being; settled disposition formed through repeated practice

This noun means habit or settled disposition, particularly one formed through practice. Hebrews 5:14 speaks of mature believers whose faculties are trained 'by reason of use' to discern good and evil. The term denotes the settled state produced by habitual practice, as opposed to temporary condition. Classical usage distinguished fixed habit from changeable state. The author emphasizes that spiritual discernment comes not from one-time learning but from habituated practice—moral muscles developed through repeated exercise of judgment.

(1×) Hebrews 5:14 describes mature believers who 'by practice' (διὰ τὴν ἕξιν) have trained their faculties to distinguish good from evil. The noun denotes settled habit formed through repetition. This isn't theoretical knowledge but practiced skill. Spanish práctica and French exercice capture the habitual dimension. Classical usage distinguished permanent ἕξις from temporary σχέσις. The author insists spiritual maturity requires practice: discernment develops through repeated exercise, not passive listening. Wisdom comes from habituated application, not mere information. CUSTOM AND PRACTICE

ἐξίστημι G1839 V-RNA (17×)

To be amazed or astonished; to amaze others; to be out of one's mind, beside oneself

Existemi literally means to displace or put out of position, and its New Testament uses trace a spectrum from wonder to madness. Most often it appears in the intransitive middle or passive: crowds are amazed at Jesus's healings (Mark 5:42), teachers astonished at the boy Jesus's understanding (Luke 2:47). Spanish captures this with 'asombrarse' and 'quedar atonito,' while French reaches for 'etre stupefait.' In its active transitive form, Simon the sorcerer 'amazed' the Samaritans (Acts 8:9-11). The most striking usage is Mark 3:21, where Jesus's own family declares He is 'out of His mind,' and 2 Corinthians 5:13, where Paul defends his own apparent madness. The word thus spans the full range from holy wonder to perceived insanity, all rooted in the idea of being displaced from one's normal state.

1. be amazed or astonished (12×) Intransitive middle/passive meaning to be filled with amazement or astonishment at something witnessed or heard. This is the dominant New Testament sense, appearing in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts. Mark 2:12 records the crowd's astonishment after a paralytic's healing, and Luke 2:47 describes the teachers amazed at the young Jesus. Spanish 'asombrarse' and 'quedar atonito' convey the involuntary, overwhelming quality of the experience. AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT

2. amaze or astound someone (3×) Transitive active/causative meaning to amaze or astound someone, to produce astonishment in others. Acts 8:9-11 uses this of Simon the magician who amazed the Samaritans with his sorcery, and Luke 24:22 reports the women from the tomb who astounded the disciples. Spanish 'asombrar' in active voice and French 'etonner' both preserve the causative direction. AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT

en: amazed, amazing, to-have-amazed | es: asombrando, asombraron, haber-asombrado | fr: étonner, être-stupéfait | de: staunt Luke 24:22; Acts 8:9; Acts 8:11

3. be out of one's mind (2×) To be out of one's mind, beside oneself, reflecting the root's literal meaning of displacement from one's normal mental state. In Mark 3:21, Jesus's family comes to seize Him, saying 'He is out of His mind,' and in 2 Corinthians 5:13, Paul writes 'if we are beside ourselves, it is for God.' Spanish 'estar fuera de si' is a nearly exact calque of the Greek. This sense reveals the word's etymological core: ek (out of) + histemi (to stand). AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT

to be fully able, have full strength; be capable of accomplishing something through sufficient power

This verb means to have full strength or be fully able to accomplish something. Ephesians 3:18 expresses Paul's prayer that believers 'may be able to comprehend' the dimensions of Christ's love with all the saints. The term emphasizes sufficient strength or capacity for a task. Classical usage shows it could mean prevail or have strength enough. Paul prays for divinely-enabled capacity: comprehending Christ's love requires more than human ability—it needs the Spirit's strengthening to grasp what surpasses knowledge.

(1×) Ephesians 3:18 contains Paul's prayer that believers 'may be fully able' (ἐξισχύσητε) to grasp Christ's love's dimensions with all the saints. The aorist subjunctive expresses purpose: Paul prays for enabling power to comprehend the incomprehensible. Spanish seáis capaces points to capability. Classical usage for having sufficient strength fits: understanding Christ's love requires more power than we possess naturally. Paul prays for Spirit-given capacity to know what surpasses knowledge—a divine empowerment for transcendent comprehension. ARROGANT SELF-EXALTATION

departure, way out; especially refers to exodus from life or place

This Greek term denotes a departure or going out, often with weighty significance. In Luke's Gospel it describes Jesus' coming death as his 'exodus' to be accomplished in Jerusalem, linking his sacrifice to Israel's founding deliverance. The term also appears in Hebrews regarding Moses' faith about the exodus from Egypt, and in 2 Peter for the apostle's own impending death, showing how the word carries both literal and theological freight about momentous transitions.

(3×) Translators across languages consistently render this as 'departure,' 'exodus,' or 'way out,' reflecting its root meaning of movement away from a place. The multilingual evidence (Spanish partida/salida, French départ, German Ausgang) confirms this is a departure term. Luke 9:31 is particularly striking—Jesus' death is framed as an 'exodus' to be accomplished in Jerusalem, connecting his sacrifice to the paradigmatic Old Testament deliverance. Hebrews 11:22 links it to Joseph's faith about Israel's future exodus, while 2 Peter 1:15 uses it for Peter's approaching death. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11766 WITH 3 SENSES

to be utterly destroyed, completely annihilated; suffer total and final destruction

This verb means to be utterly destroyed or completely wiped out. Acts 3:23 quotes Moses' warning that anyone who doesn't listen to the prophet 'shall be utterly destroyed from among the people.' The term emphasizes total, final annihilation. LXX and NT usage shows intensified destruction language. Peter applies this Deuteronomic warning to Christ: rejecting Jesus brings complete exclusion from God's people. The passive voice indicates divine judgment: God himself executes this total destruction upon those who refuse the ultimate Prophet.

(1×) Acts 3:23 warns that everyone who refuses to hear the prophet 'shall be completely destroyed' (ἐξολεθρευθήσεται) from the people. The future passive emphasizes certain, divinely-executed judgment. This is covenant curse language from Deuteronomy applied to Christ. Spanish será destruida and French exterminer convey total annihilation. The verb intensifies simple destruction: not just punished but utterly removed from covenant community. Peter makes clear the stakes: rejecting Jesus, the Prophet like Moses, brings final, complete exclusion from salvation. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

ἐξομολογ-έομαι G1843 V-PPM-NMP (10×)

To confess (sins); to praise or give thanks (to God); to consent or agree (to a proposal)

A rich compound verb (ἐκ + ὁμολογέω) whose meaning pivots on context from penitence to praise to agreement. Its most common NT use is confessing sins, as at John's baptism where crowds came 'confessing their sins' (Matt 3:6; Mark 1:5). Yet in Matt 11:25 and Luke 10:21, Jesus uses the same word to praise the Father – a usage deeply rooted in the LXX's rendering of Hebrew yadah, which similarly bridges confession and thanksgiving. Judas's 'consent' to betray Jesus (Luke 22:6) reveals a third, rarer pragmatic sense. Spanish neatly tracks all three: 'confesando' for sins, 'te alabo' for praise, and 'consintio' for agreement.

1. confess (sins or faults) (7×) To openly confess or acknowledge one's sins, wrongdoing, or faults before God or others. This penitential sense dominates the NT, appearing at John's baptism (Matt 3:6; Mark 1:5), the Ephesian converts burning their magic books (Acts 19:18), and Paul's citation of Isa 45:23 in Rom 14:11. Spanish 'confesando' and German 'bekennen' both preserve the overtone of public, solemn acknowledgment that the ἐκ- prefix intensifies beyond simple ὁμολογέω. CONFESSION AND PRAISE

en: Confess, I-will-confess, confessing | es: confesad, confesando, confesará | fr: confesser | de: bekennen, ἐξομολογούμενοι Matt 3:6; Mark 1:5; Acts 19:18; Rom 14:11; Rom 15:9

2. praise, give thanks (to God) (2×) To praise, give thanks, or offer grateful acknowledgment to God. This doxological sense reflects the LXX's use of ἐξομολογέομαι to translate Hebrew yadah (hiphil), where confession shades into thanksgiving. In Matt 11:25 and Luke 10:21, Jesus cries 'I praise you, Father' – Spanish 'te alabo' unmistakably signals worship rather than penitence, while French 'confesser' and German flatten the distinction, showing how English and Romance languages better preserve the semantic fork. CONFESSION AND PRAISE

en: I-praise | es: Te-alabo | fr: confesser | de: Ἐξομολογοῦμαί Matt 11:25; Luke 10:21

3. consent, agree (to a proposal) (1×) To consent, agree, or assent to a plan or proposal. This pragmatic sense appears only in Luke 22:6, where Judas 'consented' to the chief priests' scheme to betray Jesus. Spanish 'consintio' clearly marks this as volitional agreement rather than religious confession. The classical Greek commercial and legal background of the word – acknowledging a liability or accepting terms – surfaces here in the narrative of betrayal. CONFESSION AND PRAISE to adjure, put under oath; charge someone solemnly in the name of God to speak truth

This verb means to adjure or put someone under solemn oath, especially by invoking God's name. Matthew 26:63 records the high priest adjuring Jesus: 'I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ.' The term involves calling upon deity as witness to compel truthful response. Classical usage shows it meant to make someone swear or to exorcise. The high priest invokes the most solemn oath formula to force Jesus' testimony, seeking grounds for condemnation.

(1×) Matthew 26:63 records the high priest's adjuration: 'I adjure you by the living God' (Ἐξορκίζω σε κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος) to declare if you're the Messiah. The present indicative shows formal oath-taking: the high priest puts Jesus under the most solemn obligation to answer. Spanish Te conjuro and French adjurer capture the oath formula. Classical usage included exorcism, but here it's legal: compelling sworn testimony. The high priest invokes God's name to force Jesus' self-incriminating confession—which Jesus then exorcists, those who cast out demons; practitioners who expel evil spirits through formulas or rituals

This noun denotes exorcists, people who attempt to cast out demons or evil spirits. Acts 19:13 describes itinerant Jewish exorcists who tried to invoke Jesus' name over those with evil spirits. The term identifies professional or habitual practitioners of exorcism. These individuals used formulas and rituals to expel demons, often invoking various divine names. Luke's account shows the danger of mechanically using Jesus' name without authentic relationship: the demons recognize the imposture and the exorcists are overpowered.

(1×) Acts 19:13 identifies 'itinerant Jewish exorcists' (ἐξορκιστῶν) who attempted to use Jesus' name as a magical formula. The genitive plural marks these as professional demon-expellers. Spanish exorcistas is cross-linguistically consistent. These practitioners invoked various names (including 'Jesus whom Paul preaches') to cast out spirits. But the demons recognized unauthorized use: 'Jesus I know, Paul I know, but who are you?' The attempted exorcism backfires violently, demonstrating that Jesus' name isn't a magic formula for the uncommitted. DEMONS EVIL SPIRITS to dig out, dig through; to excavate or gouge out by digging or breaking through

The verb describes digging out or through something. When the paralytic's friends couldn't reach Jesus through the crowd, they dug through the roof (Mark 2:4). Paul asks the Galatians if they would have gouged out their own eyes to give to him (Gal 4:15), illustrating their former devotion. The term works literally for excavating earth or breaking through roofs, and metaphorically for gouging out eyes. Classical usage included digging up buried objects and exposing hidden things.

(2×) To dig out, dig through; to excavate or gouge out. In Mark 2:4, the paralytic's friends dug through (ἐξορύξαντες) the roof to lower him to Jesus—breaking through the structure when they couldn't reach him otherwise. In Gal 4:15, Paul asks rhetorically if the Galatians would have gouged out (ἐξορύξαντες) their eyes to give to him—illustrating their former sacrificial devotion. Classical usage includes digging up corpses or roots (literal) and exposing hidden things (metaphorical). Cross-linguistic glosses preserve the digging/gouging sense. DIGGING AND EXCAVATING

to be set at nothing, treated with contempt, despised; rejected as worthless or insignificant

This verb means to be set at nothing or treated with contempt, to be despised or rejected. Mark 9:12 records Jesus teaching that the Son of Man must 'be set at nought,' referring to his coming rejection and suffering. The term emphasizes being counted as worthless or insignificant. LXX usage shows it for treating with contempt. Jesus prophesies that despite being the glorious Son of Man of Daniel's vision, he will be despised and rejected—the suffering Servant path Isaiah foretold.

(1×) Mark 9:12 contains Jesus' prediction that the Son of Man 'should be treated with contempt' (ἐξουδενωθῇ). The aorist passive subjunctive indicates divine necessity: the Messiah must be despised. This combines Daniel 7's Son of Man glory with Isaiah 53's Suffering Servant rejection. Spanish sea despreciado and French mépriser capture the contemptuous treatment. Jesus teaches that messianic glory comes through rejection: before exaltation comes humiliation, before vindication comes contempt. The path to glory runs through the valley of shame. CONTEMPT AND SCORN

Despise, treat with contempt — to regard someone or something as utterly worthless, rejecting them with scorn

The verb ἐξουθενέω (exoutheneō) conveys a thorough despising — treating someone as a nothing, beneath all consideration. Jesus warns against those who 'despised others' while trusting in their own righteousness (Luke 18:9), and Herod 'treated Jesus with contempt' at the trial (Luke 23:11). The rejected stone of Psalm 118 is 'set at nought' by the builders (Acts 4:11). Paul insists that the strong must not despise the weak over diet and holy days (Rom 14:3, 10). The word carries more force than simple disregard — it is an active dismissal of someone's worth. Spanish 'despreciar' and Korean '업신여기다' capture the contemptuous rejection.

despise, treat with contempt (11×) To treat with utter contempt, despise as worthless, or set at nought — an active dismissal of someone's value or significance. The Pharisee despises others (Luke 18:9), Herod contemptuously mocks Jesus (Luke 23:11), the builders reject the cornerstone (Acts 4:11), and strong believers scorn the weak over dietary practices (Rom 14:3, 10). Paul warns against despising a fellow believer whom God has welcomed (Rom 14:3) and against treating his co-workers with contempt (1 Cor 16:11). In 1 Cor 1:28, God chose 'the things that are despised' to shame the strong. The term implies not passive neglect but active, contemptuous rejection. Spanish 'despreciar' and Arabic 'ازدرى' convey the scornful dismissal. CONTEMPT AND SCORN

Authority, power, right; the capacity to act with legitimate force, including governing powers as entities, jurisdictional domains, and granted privileges.

Exousia is one of the New Testament's key political and theological terms, denoting not raw power (dynamis) but sanctioned authority — the right to act backed by legitimate standing. Jesus teaches 'with authority, not as the scribes' (Matt 7:29), grants his disciples authority over unclean spirits (Matt 10:1), and declares that all authority in heaven and earth has been given to him (Matt 28:18). Paul extends the term to cosmic principalities and earthly governments alike (Rom 13:1; Eph 6:12), while Luke records its use for Herod's territorial jurisdiction (Luke 23:7). Spanish autoridad, French autorité, and German Vollmacht all center on the legitimacy dimension, though the plural 'authorities' as cosmic powers stretches every translation tradition.

1. authority, power (91×) Abstract authority or power — the capacity, right, or freedom to act with legitimate force and control. This overwhelmingly dominant sense (91 of 102 occurrences) spans from Jesus' teaching authority (Matt 7:29), to his power to forgive sins (Matt 9:6), to the authority delegated to the disciples (Matt 10:1), to Pilate's claim of judicial authority (John 19:10). Spanish autoridad, French autorité, and German Vollmacht converge consistently, distinguishing this from brute force (dynamis/dunamis). The word emphasizes the rightful, sanctioned nature of the power — whether divine, delegated, or political. AUTHORITY AND POWER
en: authority | es: autoridad | fr: autorité | de: Vollmacht Matt 7:29; Matt 8:9; Matt 9:6; Matt 9:8; Matt 10:1

2. governing authorities, powers (9×) Authorities as concrete entities — governing powers, rulers, or supernatural principalities that wield dominion, typically appearing in the plural. Paul's 'governing authorities' ordained by God (Rom 13:1), the cosmic 'rulers and authorities' in the heavenly places (Eph 3:10; 6:12; Col 1:16), and the synagogue authorities before whom believers may be dragged (Luke 12:11). Spanish autoridades and the plural shift mark the metonymic move from abstract quality to the persons or beings who possess it. These 9 occurrences are theologically significant for

Pauline cosmology and political theology alike. AUTHORITY AND POWER

3. jurisdiction, domain (1×) Jurisdiction or domain — the territorial or administrative sphere over which authority extends. The single occurrence in Luke 23:7, where Pilate learns that Jesus falls under Herod's exousia (jurisdiction), sending him there accordingly. Spanish jurisdicción captures this spatial-legal nuance precisely, while French and German retain the more generic autorité/Vollmacht. Though only one occurrence, this sense is lexicographically distinct: it denotes not the power itself nor the power-holder, but the bounded area of governance. AUTHORITY AND POWER

en: jurisdiction | es: jurisdicción | fr: autorité | de: Vollmacht Luke 23:7

4. right, privilege (1×) Right, privilege, or entitlement — the liberty or warrant to do something, emphasizing permission and legitimate claim rather than force or control. In Hebrews 13:10, 'We have an altar from which those who serve the tabernacle have no right to eat,' Spanish derecho (right/entitlement) distinguishes this from the power-authority of Sense 1. This single occurrence highlights a semantic facet where exousia shades into the language of rights and privileges — what one is entitled to do rather than what one has the power to enforce. to exercise authority or power over; to have the right to control; to be mastered by

Derived from exousia ('authority, right, power'), this verb denotes the active exercise of authority over persons or things. In Luke 22:25 Jesus contrasts the way Gentile kings 'lord it over' their subjects with servant leadership. Paul employs it memorably in 1 Corinthians 6:12, declaring 'I will not be mastered by anything,' using the passive voice to refuse subjugation. In 1 Corinthians 7:4 the mutual authority of spouses over one another's body reflects a strikingly reciprocal application.

(4×) To wield authority or dominion over others, often with connotations of control or mastery. Luke 22:25 describes rulers who 'exercise authority' (Spanish 'ejerciendo-autoridad,' French 'exercer-l'autorité'), while Paul in 1 Corinthians 6:12 inverts the verb into the passive ('I will not be mastered/seré-dominado') to assert freedom from domination. The spousal usage in 1 Corinthians 7:4, where each partner 'has authority' over the other's body, extends the semantic range into mutual, consensual governance rather than unilateral control. prominence, pre-eminence, or elevated position

This term denotes prominence in a physical or metaphorical sense. In classical usage it described elevated features like embossed figures on shields or the raised nature of animal horns. By the New Testament era it had developed a metaphorical sense of pre-eminence or superior status, particularly in social or civic contexts. Acts 25:23 uses it to describe the pomp and ceremony accompanying high-ranking officials.

(1×) The multilingual evidence converges on ceremonial dignity and public display. Spanish 'prominencia' and French 'éminence' both capture the social elevation and visible distinction involved when Agrippa and Bernice enter with great pomp before the assembled officials. This is prominence as public spectacle, not merely abstract superiority. GREATNESS AND DEGREE

ἐξυπν-ίζω G1852 V-ASA-1S (1×)

to awaken from sleep

A straightforward verb meaning to wake someone up, derived from the noun for sleep (ὕπνος). The passive form means to wake up naturally or be awakened. In John 11:11, Jesus uses this word as a euphemism for death when speaking of Lazarus, saying 'I go that I may wake him.' The multilingual evidence shows this is universally understood as the action of rousing someone from slumber.

(1×) Jesus employs this verb in its metaphorical sense for death and resurrection. The Spanish 'despierte,' French 'réveiller,' and German 'aufwecken' all preserve the basic sense of awakening, which Jesus then redefines in conversation with the disciples who initially misunderstand, thinking Lazarus is merely sleeping naturally. awakened, awake (adjective)

An adjective describing the state of being awake or awakened from sleep. In Acts 16:27, the jailer at Philippi becomes 'awake' (ἔξυπνος γενόμενος) and sees the prison doors open after the earthquake. The word emphasizes the sudden transition from sleep to wakefulness, often with the implication of alarm or urgency. This awakening leads the jailer to draw his sword, assuming the prisoners have escaped.

ἔξω G1854 Adv (63×)

Outside, out; spatially indicating exterior location or movement outward, and substantivally designating outsiders or non-believers.

A versatile adverb rooted in spatial meaning — "outside" or "out" — that the New Testament puts to both literal and figurative work. In its spatial sense, it marks physical movement or location beyond a boundary: being cast outside (Matt 5:13), going out of a house (Matt 12:46), or the "outer" darkness (Matt 8:12). Spanish captures the directional nuance with both "afuera" and "fuera de," while German offers "draussen" and "außerhalb." In a theologically rich substantival use, "those outside" designates people beyond the circle of faith — Jesus distinguishes insiders from outsiders at Mark 4:11, and Paul uses the same idiom at 1 Corinthians 5:12-13 and Colossians 4:5 when discussing how believers should relate to non-believers.

1. outside, out, outer (spatial direction/location) (57×) Spatial adverb and preposition indicating location or movement outside of a place, or describing the exterior of something. Covers casting out (Matt 5:13), going outside a house (Matt 12:46), and attributive uses like "outer darkness" (Matt 8:12). Spanish distinguishes direction ("afuera") from static location ("fuera de"), while French uniformly uses "dehors" — both confirming this as the primary, overwhelmingly frequent sense with 57 occurrences. OUTSIDE AND EXTERIOR

en: out, outside | es: afuera, fuera, fuera-de | fr: dehors | de: außerhalb, draussen Matt 5:13; Matt 10:14; Matt 12:46; Matt 12:47; Matt 13:48

2. outsiders, those outside (substantival) (6×) Substantival use designating people who stand outside a group, community, or circle of faith — "outsiders" or "those outside." Jesus uses it at Mark 4:11 to distinguish those who receive the mystery of the kingdom from "those outside" who hear only parables. Paul adopts the same convention for non-believers (1 Cor 5:12-13; Col 4:5). Spanish shifts from spatial "afuera" to relational "de afuera/de fuera," signaling the metaphorical extension from place to social boundary. OUTSIDE AND EXTERIOR

ἔξωθεν G1855 Adv (13×)

From outside, outwardly; denoting external origin, outer surface, or outward appearance in contrast to what is within.

An adverb meaning 'from outside' or 'outwardly,' used to mark the external surface or origin of something as opposed to its interior. In Jesus' memorable rebuke of the Pharisees (Matt 23:25-28), the word draws a sharp contrast between outward religious polish and inner corruption — cups clean on the outside but filthy within, whitewashed tombs beautiful externally but full of dead bones. Mark 7:15, 18 similarly distinguishes what enters a person from outside versus what comes from within the heart. The multilingual evidence uniformly renders this as 'from outside' (Spanish de afuera, French au-dehors, German von aussen), confirming a single consistent spatial sense across all thirteen occurrences.

from outside, outwardly, external (13×) Spatial adverb indicating origin from outside, the outer surface, or external appearance as contrasted with the interior. In the Synoptic Gospels it appears in Jesus' teaching on inner versus outer purity: the outside of the cup (Matt 23:25), the outside of the tomb (Matt 23:27), and what enters from outside the body (Mark 7:15, 18). Languages consistently translate with directional 'from-outside' glosses (Spanish de afuera, French au-dehors), underscoring the uniform spatial orientation of the term. OUTSIDE AND EXTERIOR

to thrust out, drive out forcefully; to expel or eject with force

The verb means to thrust or drive out forcefully. Joshua drove out the inhabitants before Israel (Acts 7:45). The ship's crew tried to drive the ship onto the beach (Acts 27:39). Classical usage included thrusting out weapons from flesh, expelling people from territory, or driving back forces. The term emphasizes forceful ejection or displacement, whether of people from land or objects toward a destination. It's stronger than simple sending away.

(2×) To thrust out, drive out, expel forcefully. In Acts 7:45, Joshua drove out (ἐξῶσεν) the nations before Israel—forcibly displacing inhabitants from the land. In Acts 27:39, sailors planned to drive (ἐξῶσαι) the ship onto the beach—forcefully pushing it toward shore. Classical usage includes thrusting spears from flesh, expelling people from territory, driving back enemies. The verb emphasizes forceful ejection or displacement. Spanish 'expulsó/empujar' (expelled/push) and French 'repousser' (push back) preserve the forceful action. GOING OUT AND FORTH

outer, exterior; positioned farther outside than something else

This adjective describes what is positioned on the outside, beyond an inner area. In all three New Testament occurrences—exclusively in Matthew's Gospel—it appears in the stark phrase 'outer darkness,' describing the place of exclusion from God's kingdom where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. The comparative force ('more outside') underscores the severity of separation from the light and joy of God's presence.

(3×) Every language witness points to 'outer' or 'exterior' positioning —Spanish exterior/de-afuera, French extérieur, German ἐξώτερον. Matthew uses this term exclusively in the haunting phrase 'the outer darkness' (8:12, 22:13, 25:30), depicting the ultimate spatial and relational separation from God's banquet. The term's comparative root (from ἔξω, 'outside') intensifies the sense of being pushed farther from the center, reinforcing the tragedy of exclusion from the kingdom. OUTER EXTERNAL

to keep festival, celebrate a feast

A verb meaning to observe a festival or holiday, derived from ἑορτή (feast). Classical usage included celebrating victories or religious festivals, and at Rome it could mean celebrating a triumph. In 1 Corinthians 5:8, Paul urges believers to 'keep the festival' (ἑορτάζωμεν) with unleavened bread of sincerity and truth, transforming Passover imagery into a metaphor for Christian living.

(1×) Paul's call to 'celebrate the festival' draws on the Passover tradition of removing leaven. The Spanish 'celebremos,' French 'fête,' and German 'Fest-feiern' all convey festive observance. Paul reinterprets the annual feast as a continuous ethical state: since Christ our Passover has been sacrificed, believers should perpetually celebrate with moral purity rather than the old leaven of malice. PASSOVER FESTIVAL feast, festival — a religious celebration or holy day, especially the major Jewish pilgrimage festivals

Heorte is the standard Greek word for a religious festival or feast day, appearing 27 times in the New Testament with particular density in John's Gospel, where the rhythm of Israel's liturgical calendar structures the entire narrative. John marks Jesus' movements by successive festivals — Passover (John 2:23; 6:4; 11:55), Tabernacles (John 7:2), and an unnamed feast (John 5:1) — so that the feasts become theological stages on which Jesus reveals himself as the fulfillment of what each festival commemorated. The Synoptics use heorte primarily in the Passion narrative, noting that the authorities sought to avoid arresting Jesus 'during the feast' lest the crowd riot (Matt 26:5; Mark 14:2). Pilate's custom of releasing a prisoner 'at the feast' sets the stage for Barabbas (Matt 27:15; Mark 15:6; Luke 23:17). Spanish 'fiesta,' French 'fete,' and German 'Fest' all converge on the same festive-sacred register.

feast, festival (27×) A religious festival or holy day, referring in nearly every NT occurrence to the Jewish pilgrimage feasts — above all Passover/Unleavened Bread and Tabernacles. In John's Gospel, the succession of festivals provides the narrative framework: Passover (John 2:23; 6:4; 11:55), Tabernacles (John 7:2, 8, 10-14, 37), and an unspecified feast (John 5:1). The Synoptics concentrate the term in the Passion narratives, where the chief priests' fear of the festival crowd delays Jesus' arrest (Matt 26:5; Mark 14:2) and Pilate's feast-day amnesty introduces Barabbas (Matt 27:15; Mark 15:6). Multilingual glosses uniformly point to a single concept: spa 'fiesta,' fra 'fete,' deu 'Fest.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐπαγγ-ελία G1860 N-AFP (52×)

Promise or pledge, especially God's covenant promises to Abraham, Israel, and believers through Christ.

In the New Testament this word carries a weight far beyond ordinary human promises. It overwhelmingly refers to divine assurances – God's promise to Abraham of descendants and land (Acts 7:17; Gal 3:14-29), the promise of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:4; 2:33), and the promise of eternal life in Christ (2 Tim 1:1; Heb 9:15). Paul builds his theology of grace versus law around this noun, arguing that the inheritance comes through promise, not legal observance (Gal 3:18; Rom 4:13-16). Hebrews holds it up as the anchor of faith: those who believed 'died not having received the promises' yet saw them from afar (Heb 11:13, 39). German Verheissung ('solemn pledge') captures the covenantal gravity better than the everyday English 'promise.'

promise, pledge (52×) A solemn divine pledge or covenant commitment. In Paul's letters the word anchors the argument that God's saving purposes flow through promise to Abraham, not through law (Gal 3:14-18; Rom 4:13-16). In Acts it denotes the promise of the Holy Spirit fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 1:4; 2:33). Hebrews celebrates the faithfulness of those who died without receiving the promises yet embraced them from afar (Heb 11:13). The German Verheissung and French promesse both convey this as a binding, authoritative declaration rather than a casual commitment. PROMISE PLEDGE

ἐπαγγ-έλλω G1861 V-PPM/P-DFP (15×)

To promise (especially of God's solemn, covenantal pledges); secondarily, to profess or lay claim to something.

In the NT, ἐπαγγέλλομαι is overwhelmingly the word for divine promise — God's covenantal commitments to Abraham and his descendants, the promise of eternal life, the Holy Spirit, and the coming kingdom. Paul builds major theological arguments on what God 'promised' (Rom 4:21; Gal 3:19; Heb 6:13; 10:23; 11:11), and the related noun ἐπαγγελία is one of the great NT theological terms. A minor but distinct usage appears in the Pastorals, where it means to profess or lay public claim to something — women professing godliness (1 Tim 2:10) or those professing knowledge (1 Tim 6:21).

1. promise (divine or solemn commitment) (13×) The dominant sense: to promise, especially of God's solemn covenantal commitments. Covers God's promise to Abraham (Acts 7:5; Rom 4:21; Heb 6:13), the promise of eternal life (Titus 1:2; 1 John 2:25), and the promised Holy Spirit (Gal 3:19). Spanish 'ha prometido' and French 'promettre' correspond directly. Mark 14:11 applies the word to Judas's co-conspirators promising him money — the only non-divine promise in the NT usage. The verb's middle voice emphasizes the promiser's personal commitment. PROMISE PLEDGE

en: having-promised, he-has-promised, he-promised | es: ha-prometido, ha-sido-prometido, habiendo-prometido | fr: promettre | de: verheissen, ἐπηγγείλατο Mark 14:11; Acts 7:5; Rom 4:21; Gal 3:19; Titus 1:2

2. profess, claim, lay claim to (2×) A secondary sense: to profess, make a public claim, or lay claim to a quality. Found only in the Pastoral Epistles — women 'professing godliness' through good works (1 Tim 2:10) and those who by 'professing' knowledge have swerved from the faith (1 Tim 6:21). Spanish 'profesando' and 'que profesan' capture this well. Unlike sense 1, the focus is not on a future commitment but on a present public declaration about oneself, closer to the classical Greek usage of making an announcement or claim. SPEAKING AND TALKING

promise; a declaration or pledge of something to be given or done, especially divine promises

The word denotes a promise or pledge, particularly God's promises to believers. Peter speaks of God's precious and magnificent promises (2 Pet 1:4) through which believers partake of divine nature. He references the promise of new heavens and a new earth (2 Pet 3:13). While classical usage could mean profession or subject matter, NT usage focuses on divine promises—God's commitments to his people. The term emphasizes the reliability and preciousness of what God has pledged.

(2×) Promise, pledge; what is promised or declared as future gift. In 2 Pet 1:4, God has granted precious and magnificent promises (ἐπαγγέλματα) through which believers escape corruption and partake of divine nature. In 2 Pet 3:13, believers await new heavens and earth according to his promise (κατὰ τὸ ἐπάγγελμα αὐτοῦ). Classical usage includes profession or subject of treatise, but NT usage focuses on divine promises. Cross-linguistic glosses consistently render 'promise/promises': 'promesa/promesas', 'Verheissung'. PROMISE PLEDGE

bring upon, introduce; cause something (often unwelcome) to come upon someone

This compound verb means to bring something upon someone, often with the nuance of introducing danger, consequences, or unwanted situations. Acts 5:28 uses it for bringing Jesus' blood upon the Jewish leaders, while both uses in 2 Peter (2:1, 2:5) describe bringing destruction or judgment. The classical range includes leading armies against enemies, setting dogs upon prey, or persuading someone toward action—always with a sense of causing something to arrive or be imposed.

(3×) The multilingual glosses—English 'bring upon,' Spanish traer/trayendo, French apporter-sur—consistently point to causation and introduction of something unwelcome. Acts 5:28 records the authorities' fear: 'you intend to bring this man's blood upon us.' In 2 Peter, the word appears twice regarding false teachers who 'bring upon themselves' swift destruction (2:1) and how God 'brought' the flood upon the ungodly world (2:5). The classical usage of leading armies or setting dogs in pursuit illuminates the NT sense of introducing consequences or judgment. RECEIVING AND TAKING en: bringing-upon, having-brought, to-bring | es: habiendo-traído, traer, trayendo | fr: apporter-sur, ἐπάγοντες, ἐπάξας | de: bringt-über, ἐπάγοντες, ἐπάξας Acts 5:28; 2Pet 2:1; 2Pet 2:5

to contend earnestly for, fight for

A compound verb meaning to struggle intensely or fight for something with determination. In classical Greek it could mean contending in games or laying stress on a point in rhetoric. Jude 3 uses it to exhort believers to 'contend earnestly for the faith' (ἐπαγωνίζεσθαι τῇ πίστει) that was once for all delivered to the saints. This is vigorous, even combative defense of apostolic teaching against false teachers.

(1×) Jude's singular use of this verb captures militant urgency. The Spanish 'contender,' French 'combattre,' and German 'kämpfen' all emphasize struggle and conflict. This is not casual debate but spiritual warfare to preserve the integrity of the gospel against heretical distortions infiltrating the community. The intensive prefix ἐπι- heightens the sense of sustained, focused effort. FIGHTING AND WARFARE

ἐπαθροίζομαι G1865 V-PPM/P-GMP (1×)

to gather together, assemble in addition

A passive verb meaning to assemble or gather together, with the prefix suggesting accumulation. Luke 11:29 describes crowds 'pressing together' or 'gathering in large numbers' around Jesus to hear him speak. The verb conveys the sense of increasing multitudes, people converging from various directions to form an ever-larger assembly.

(1×) Luke uses this vivid verb to set the scene for Jesus' rebuke of those seeking signs. The Spanish 'reuniéndose' and French 's'assembler' capture the gathering motion, while the context suggests a swelling, pressing crowd. Jesus responds to this growing assembly by calling them 'an evil generation' seeking signs when the only sign to be given is that of Jonah. GATHERING TOGETHER

Epaenetus, a Christian greeted by Paul

A personal name meaning 'praiseworthy' or 'praised,' belonging to a believer in Rome whom Paul greets warmly in Romans 16:5. Paul identifies him as 'my beloved' and 'the firstfruits of Achaia (or Asia, in variant readings) to Christ,' suggesting Epaenetus was among the earliest converts in that region. This brief mention preserves the name of an otherwise unknown early Christian leader.

(1×) Paul's affectionate greeting identifies Epaenetus as a pioneer believer. The personal name appears in transliteration across languages (Spanish 'Epaíneton,' French 'Epaïnète,' German 'Epainetus'), preserving the Greek form. His designation as 'firstfruits' suggests both temporal priority and special devotion, making him a foundational figure in the spread of the gospel to his region. PRAISE AND BOASTING

ἐπαιν-έω G1867 V-AIA-3S (6×)

To praise, commend, or express approval; used of both sincere commendation and rhetorical or ironic praise.

A verb of public affirmation, used when someone voices approval or admiration for another person or their actions. In the NT it appears both positively — as in Paul commending the Corinthians for holding to traditions (1 Cor 11:2) — and with sharp irony, as when he says 'I do not praise you' for their conduct at the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:17, 22). The Spanish 'alabo' and German 'loben' both capture the warmth of open commendation, while Luke 16:8 famously records the master praising the dishonest manager for his shrewdness, blending moral surprise with genuine acknowledgment of cleverness.

praise, commend (6×) To express approval, commendation, or praise toward a person or their conduct. All six NT occurrences share this core meaning, though the pragmatic force ranges from heartfelt commendation (Rom 15:11, quoting Ps 117:1, 'Praise the Lord, all you nations') to pointed irony (1 Cor 11:17, 22, where Paul withholds praise). The Spanish 'alabo' and French 'louer' consistently render the sense of public verbal affirmation. In Luke 16:8, the master's praise of the shrewd steward creates a memorable tension between moral evaluation and practical admiration. PRAISE AND BOASTING

ἔπαιν-ος G1868 N-NMS (11×)

Praise, commendation — approval from God or people; that which is praiseworthy or calls forth admiration

The noun ἔπαινος (epainos) denotes praise, commendation, or approval — whether from God, from authorities, or from fellow believers. True circumcision of the heart receives its 'praise' from God, not from people (Rom 2:29), and civil rulers give 'praise' to those who do good (Rom 13:3). At Christ's return, each person will receive 'commendation' from God (1 Cor 4:5). Ephesians uses the word doxologically — election and inheritance are 'to the praise of his glory' (Eph 1:6, 12, 14). Phil 4:8 urges dwelling on whatever is worthy of 'praise.' Spanish 'alabanza/elogio' and German 'Lob' reflect both divine and human commendation.

(11×) Praise, commendation, or approval — the recognition of worth or excellence, whether given by God, by governing authorities, or by the community of faith. Divine praise: true circumcision receives its praise from God, not from people (Rom 2:29); each believer's work will receive commendation from God at Christ's return (1 Cor 4:5). Civic praise: the ruler commends those who do good (Rom 13:3; 1 Pet 2:14). Doxological praise: God's redemptive acts are 'to the praise of his glory' (Eph 1:6, 12, 14). Also the quality of being praiseworthy — 'if there is any praise, think on these things' (Phil 4:8). Faith tested by trials results in 'praise and glory and honor' at Christ's revelation (1 Pet 1:7). Spanish 'alabanza/elogio' and French 'louange' capture both the divine and human registers. PRAISE AND RENOWN

ἐπαίρω G1869 V-APA-NMS (19×)

To lift up, raise (eyes, hands, voice); figuratively to exalt oneself in pride; also to hoist a sail or be taken up.

Compounded from ἐπί ('upon') and αἴρω ('raise'), this verb in its simplest form describes the physical gesture of lifting eyes or hands — among the most common postures of prayer in the ancient world. Luke is especially fond of it: Jesus 'lifted up his eyes' to his disciples before the Beatitudes (Luke 6:20), and the tax collector would not even 'lift up his eyes' to heaven (Luke 18:13). The Spanish 'alzando' (raising) and German 'erheben' (to elevate) reflect this core meaning. Paul repurposes the verb powerfully in 2 Corinthians 10:5, where every proud thought that 'raises itself' against the knowledge of God must be taken captive.

1. lift up physically (13×) To physically raise or lift up something — typically eyes, hands, or the head — in a concrete, bodily gesture. This is the dominant NT use, appearing in Jesus lifting his eyes (Luke 6:20, John 4:35, 6:5, 11:41, 17:1), the rich man lifting his eyes in Hades (Luke 16:23), and the disciples lifting their eyes at the Transfiguration (Matt 17:8). The Spanish 'alzando' (raising) and German 'erheben' match the straightforward physical action. Luke 24:50 shows Jesus lifting hands to bless. LIFTING AND REMOVING en: having-lifted-up, lift-up, lifted-up | es: alzad, alzando, alzar | fr: lever, élever | de: erheben, erhebt Matt 17:8; Luke 6:20; Luke 11:27; Luke 16:23; Luke 18:13

2. raise one's voice (2×) To raise or lift up one's voice, a figurative extension where the object shifts from body part to speech. In Acts 14:11 the Lycaonians 'raised their voices' calling Barnabas Zeus, and in Acts 22:22 the crowd 'raised their voice' demanding Paul's death. The Spanish 'alzaron' and 'levantaron' both preserve the lifting metaphor applied to vocal volume. This is a natural extension of the physical gesture — the mouth opens, the sound rises. LIFTING AND EXALTING

en: lifted-up, they-raised | es: alzaron, levantaron | fr: élever | de: erhebt Acts 14:11; Acts 22:22

3. exalt oneself (2×) To exalt or elevate oneself in pride or arrogance, used in the middle voice to indicate reflexive self-exaltation. Paul uses it twice in 2 Corinthians: every 'lofty thing raising itself' (ἐπαιρόμενον) against God's knowledge (10:5), and the false apostle who 'exalts himself' over the community (11:20). The Spanish 'se-enaltece' (exalts himself) captures the reflexive middle perfectly. The shift from physical lifting to moral presumption is sharp and memorable. LIFTING AND EXALTING

en: exalts-himself, raising-itself | es: que-se-levanta, se-enaltece | fr: élever | de: erheben 2Cor 10:5; 2Cor 11:20

4. hoist a sail (1×) To hoist or raise a sail in a nautical context, a specialized technical application of the basic lifting meaning. In Acts 27:40, during the dramatic shipwreck narrative, the sailors 'hoisted the foresail' (ἐπάραντες τὸν ἀρτέμωνα) to drive toward shore. The Spanish 'habiendo-izado' (having hoisted) is precise maritime vocabulary. This single occurrence shows how naturally the verb adapts to specific physical contexts. LIFTING AND EXALTING

en: having-hoisted | es: habiendo-izado | fr: élever | de: erhebt Acts 27:40

5. be lifted up (passive) (1×) To be lifted up or taken up passively, describing bodily elevation by divine power. In Acts 1:9, Christ 'was lifted up' (ἐπήρθη) before the disciples' eyes as a cloud received him — the Ascension itself. The passive voice sets this apart from all other senses: the subject does not lift but is lifted. The Spanish 'fue-levantado' (was raised) preserves the passive construction. This theological use transforms a common physical verb into a vehicle for describing divine action in history. LIFTING AND EXALTING

en: he-was-lifted-up | es: fue-levantado | fr: élever | de: erhebt Acts 1:9

ἐπαισχ-ύνομαι G1870 V-ASP-3S (11×)

Be ashamed of — to feel shame or disgrace regarding someone, something, or a message one should boldly confess

The verb ἐπαισχύνομαι (epaischynomai) means to be ashamed of a person, message, or allegiance. Jesus warns that whoever is ashamed of him and his words, the Son of Man will be ashamed of that person at his coming (Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26). Paul declares he is 'not ashamed of the gospel' (Rom 1:16) and urges Timothy not to be ashamed of the Lord's testimony or of Paul's chains (2 Tim be ashamed of, feel shame (11×) To be ashamed of or to feel disgrace regarding a person, message, or allegiance that one is called to confess openly. Jesus warns that those ashamed of him and his words will face reciprocal shame at the Son of Man's return (Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26). Paul boldly declares he is not ashamed of the gospel (Rom 1:16) and exhorts Timothy to the same courage (2 Tim 1:8, 12). Onesiphorus is praised for not being ashamed of Paul's chains (2 Tim 1:16). Of God: he is not ashamed to be called the God of the faithful (Heb 2:11; 11:16). Of past sin: believers are now ashamed of what once produced death (Rom 6:21). Spanish 'avergonzarse' and Arabic 'خجل' both convey the relational, social dimension of the shame. SHAME AND REVERENCE

1:8, 12, 16). On the divine side, God is 'not ashamed to be called their God' because he has prepared a city for the faithful (Heb 2:11; 11:16). Spanish 'avergonzarse' and Korean '부끄러워하다' express this relational shame.

to beg, ask for alms; to live as a mendicant, begging for daily sustenance

The verb describes begging, particularly as a mendicant seeking daily bread. The unjust steward contemplates begging when he loses his position but is ashamed to do so (Luke 16:3). A blind beggar sits by the roadside begging when Jesus passes (Luke 18:35). Classical usage included asking for more or demanding, but NT usage focuses on the practice of begging for survival. The term captures both the action and the social status of being reduced to dependence on others' charity.

(2×) To beg, ask for alms; to live as a beggar. In Luke 16:3, the unjust steward considers his options: dig he cannot, to beg (ἐπαιτεῖν) he is ashamed—recognizing begging as a shameful last resort. In Luke 18:35, a blind man sits begging (ἐπαιτῶν) by the roadside when Jesus approaches. Classical usage included asking for more or demanding, but NT usage focuses on mendicant begging for survival. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve the begging sense: 'mendigar/mendigando', 'mendier'. DESIRE AND COVETING

to follow after, accompany closely; to pursue or devote oneself to

Built from epi ('upon, after') and akoloutheo ('to follow'), this verb intensifies the idea of following with closeness and persistence. Its NT uses span a wide range: confirming signs that 'follow after' the gospel proclamation (Mark 16:20), a widow's record of good deeds she has 'followed after' or devoted herself to (1 Tim 5:10), sins that 'follow after' a person to judgment (1 Tim 5:24), and Christ's sufferings whose example believers are to 'follow' (1 Pet 2:21).

(4×) To follow closely upon or accompany, either literally or figuratively. In Mark 16:20 miraculous signs 'follow after' the preaching, confirming the word. In 1 Timothy 5:10 the verb describes devoted pursuit of good works ('she followed after every good work'), while 5:24 uses it of sins that trail after certain people to judgment. First Peter 2:21 calls believers to follow in Christ's footsteps of suffering. Spanish 'siguió/siguen' and French 'suivre' consistently render the core sense of close, purposeful following. The figurative extensions — from accompanying signs to pursuing virtue — all retain the root image of determined pursuit. FOLLOWING AND DISCIPLESHIP

ἐπᾰκού-ω G1873 V-AIA-1S (1×)

to hear, listen to, give ear to

A verb meaning to hear or listen, often with the nuance of favorable attention or answering a request. In 2 Corinthians 6:2, Paul quotes Isaiah: 'In an acceptable time I heard you' (ἐπήκουσά σου). The verb can imply not merely auditory perception but responsive action—God hearing and answering prayer. Classical usage included the sense of overhearing or hearing about something indirectly.

(1×) Paul applies Isaiah's oracle to the present moment of salvation. The Spanish 'te escuché,' French 'écouter,' and German 'erhören' all capture the responsive dimension of divine hearing. This is not passive auditory reception but God's active engagement with human petition, now fulfilled in Christ. The aorist tense marks a definitive moment of divine attention and favor. HEARING AND HEEDING

ἐπακρο-άομαι G1874 V-IIM/P-3P (1×)

to listen to, give ear to

A compound verb synonymous with ἐπακούω, meaning to listen attentively or hearken. Acts 16:25 describes prisoners 'listening to' (ἐπηκροῶντο) Paul and Silas as they prayed and sang hymns at midnight. The imperfect tense suggests continuous action: the other prisoners were actively listening, captivated by this unusual worship in the depths of the jail.

(1×) Luke captures the prisoners as an audience to midnight worship. The Spanish 'escuchaban,' French 'soutenir' (or contextually, listening), and the Greek form itself all emphasize attentive hearing. This scene of captive listeners sets the stage for the earthquake that will shake the prison and lead to the jailer's conversion. The verb implies more than casual hearing—rapt attention to extraordinary praise. HEARING AND HEEDING

ἐπάν G1875 Conj (3×)

when, whenever; temporal conjunction marking time of an event

A later form of the conjunction ἐπήν, this word functions as a simple temporal marker meaning 'when' or 'whenever.' It introduces subordinate clauses that specify the timing of events. The term appears in narrative contexts—Herod seeking the child (Matthew 2:8), a strong man being overpowered (Luke 11:22), and the condition of the eye affecting the whole body (Luke 11:34).

(3×) Every translation renders this straightforwardly as a time marker: English 'when,' Spanish cuando, French quand. Matthew 2:8 has Herod saying 'when you have found him, report to me.' Luke 11:22 describes the moment 'when a stronger man attacks and overcomes' the armed strong man. Luke 11:34 speaks of the effect 'when your eye is healthy.' The conjunction simply marks temporal coincidence or sequence, without adding modal or conditional force. TEMPORAL CONJUNCTIONS

An adverb meaning 'of necessity' or 'by compulsion,' derived from ἀνάγκη (necessity). Acts 15:28 uses it in the apostolic decree to the Gentile believers: 'It seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us to lay on you no greater burden than these necessary things' (ἐπάναγκες). The term distinguishes essential requirements from optional practices, marking minimal non-negotiable standards.

(1×) The Jerusalem Council identifies a short list of 'necessary' requirements for Gentile believers. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'necesarias,' German form preserved) converges on compulsion or obligation. These are not suggestions but binding minimums: abstaining from food offered to idols, from blood, from things strangled, and from sexual immorality. The adverb marks these as indispensable for fellowship between Jewish and Gentile Christians. NECESSARY ESSENTIAL

put out (to sea), return; nautical term for launching or bringing back a boat

This compound verb has a range of meanings in classical Greek—stir up, lead back, restore—but in the New Testament it appears exclusively in nautical contexts, meaning to put out to sea or return by boat. Luke uses it three times: Jesus returning from Bethany (Matthew 21:18), putting out a little from shore (Luke 5:3), and the command to launch out into the deep (Luke 5:4). The verb captures the movement of boats away from shore or back to port.

(3×) The translation evidence shows nautical language: Spanish Navega/alejarse/volviendo ('sail, move away, returning'), French avancer ('advance'), and English 'put out, returning.' Matthew 21:18 describes Jesus 'returning' to the city. Luke 5:3 has Jesus asking Simon to 'put out a little from the land,' while 5:4 contains the famous command: 'Put out into the deep and let down your nets.' The classical meanings of 'lead back' or 'restore' find specific application in maritime movement in these Gospel narratives. RETURNING AND RESTORING

to remind, bring to remembrance

A compound verb meaning to remind or recall something to someone's mind. Romans 15:15 has Paul saying he has written 'reminding' (ἐπαναμιμνήσκων) the believers of truths they already know. The prefix ἐπι- suggests bringing something back to consciousness, refreshing memory rather than introducing new information. This is pastoral reinforcement of known doctrine.

(1×) Paul's use acknowledges the church already possesses the truth he writes about. The Spanish 'recordándoos,' French 'rappeler,' and German 'erinnern' all capture the act of bringing to mind what was previously known. This is not original instruction but strategic repetition for emphasis and clarity, consistent with Paul's role as an apostle writing 'boldly on some points' to reinforce essential teaching. REMEMBERING AND REMINDING

to rest upon, rely upon; to find rest or support in something or someone

This middle voice verb describes resting upon or relying on something. The angel tells the disciples that if a man of peace is there, their peace will rest upon him (Luke 10:6). Paul addresses Jews who rely upon the law and boast in God (Rom 2:17). The term suggests finding rest, confidence, or support in something—whether the resting of blessing on a recipient or the misplaced confidence of relying on law rather than grace.

(2×) To rest upon, rely upon (middle voice). In Luke 10:6, Jesus says if a son of peace is there, your peace will rest upon him (ἐπαναπαήσεται ἐπ᾽ αὐτόν); otherwise it returns to you—describing blessing finding its intended recipient. In Rom 2:17, Paul addresses one who relies (ἐπαναπαύῃ) upon the law and boasts in God—describing misplaced confidence. Classical usage includes resting physical objects on supports and metaphorically resting hopes on something. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve rest/reliance: 'reposará/descansas', 'se reposer/se reposer sur'. REST AND REFRESHMENT

to return, come back; to go back to a previous place or state

The verb means to return or come back. The Good Samaritan promises to return and repay any additional expenses (Luke 10:35). The master goes away to receive a kingdom and return (Luke 19:15). Classical usage included returning to a point in argument, recurring fevers, or ascending to higher ground. NT usage focuses on physical return to a location. The term emphasizes the action of coming back to where one started or was previously.

(2×) To return, come back, go back. In Luke 10:35, the Samaritan tells the innkeeper 'when I return' (ἐν τῷ ἐπανέρχεσθαί με) he will repay any extra expenses—promising to come back. In Luke 19:15, the nobleman returns (ἐπανελθεῖν) after receiving the kingdom to settle accounts with servants. Classical usage includes returning to a point in discussion, recurring illnesses, or going up/ascending. NT usage focuses on physical return. Cross-linguistic glosses consistently render returning: 'regresar/volver', 'revenir'. RETURNING AND RESTORING

to rise up against; to stand up in opposition or rebellion, especially against family or authority

The verb describes rising up in hostility or rebellion. Jesus warns that children will rise up against parents and put them to death (Matt 10:21, Mark 13:12). The term appears in eschatological warnings about family betrayal during persecution. Classical usage included rising after another speaks, rising from bed, or buildings being erected, but NT usage focuses on hostile uprising. The future tense emphasizes prophetic warning about coming betrayal.

(2×) To rise up against, rebel against. Both occurrences are in Jesus' apocalyptic warnings that children will rise up against (ἐπαναστήσονται) parents and put them to death (Matt 10:21, Mark 13:12)—describing family betrayal during persecution. Classical usage includes rising to speak, standing up from bed, or buildings being raised, but NT usage focuses on hostile uprising in rebellion. The future tense marks prophetic warning. Cross-linguistic glosses preserve the rising-against sense: 'se levantarán contra', 'se soulever contre'. RISING AND DAWNING

ἐπανόρθ-ωσις G1882 N-AFS (1×)

correction, restoration to an upright state

A noun meaning correction, amendment, or the act of setting something right. In 2 Timothy 3:16, Paul declares that all Scripture is profitable for 'correction' (ἐπανόρθωσιν), one of four purposes alongside teaching, reproof, and training in righteousness. The term suggests not merely pointing out error but actively restoring or realigning someone to the proper standard.

(1×) Paul lists correction as one function of inspired Scripture. The Spanish 'corrección' and German 'Zurechtweisung' both capture the restorative action. This is not punitive rebuke but constructive realignment, bringing crooked thinking or behavior back to the right path. Scripture serves as both diagnostic (reproof) and therapeutic (correction), equipping believers for every good work. RENEW REPAIR RESTORE

ἐπάνω G1883 Adv (19×)

Above, over, upon (spatial position); also 'more than' in comparative expressions of quantity or degree

Epano functions primarily as a spatial adverb and preposition meaning 'above' or 'on top of,' placing one thing over another. A star rests epano where the child lay (Matt 2:9), a city set on a hill cannot be hidden (Matt 5:14), and garments are placed epano a donkey (Matt 21:7). The word also extends into comparative territory: the perfume could have been sold 'for more than' three hundred denarii (Mark 14:5), and Christ appeared to 'more than' five hundred at once (1 Cor 15:6). Spanish captures both senses with 'sobre/encima de' for spatial and 'más de' for comparative.

1. above (17×) Above, over, upon — indicating spatial position where something is higher than or resting on top of something else. The star came to rest epano the place where the child was (Matt 2:9), a city set epano a hill cannot be hidden (Matt 5:14), and authority is exercised epano cities (Luke 19:17, 19). Spanish 'encima de' and 'sobre,' French 'au-dessus de,' and German 'über' all consistently render this spatial-positional sense across the seventeen occurrences. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. more than (2×) More than, in excess of — used comparatively to indicate a quantity or degree exceeding a stated measure. In Mark 14:5, the ointment might have been sold 'for more than' (epano) three hundred denarii, and in 1 Corinthians 15:6, the risen Christ appeared to 'more than' (epano) five hundred brothers at once. Spanish 'por más de' and the shift from spatial to quantitative in both passages show how the 'above' metaphor naturally extends to surpassing a number. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

assist, help, relieve; provide aid especially to those in need

This verb means to be strong enough to help, to assist or relieve someone in need. In classical usage it could mean to ward off harm or provide support. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in 1 Timothy 5, in Paul's instructions about which widows the church should support. The word carries the sense of providing practical relief and assistance, especially to vulnerable persons who lack other resources.

(3×) Translators consistently use terms for helping or assisting: Spanish socorra/socorrió ('help, helped'), German helfen ('help'). All three occurrences are in 1 Timothy 5, addressing widow support: a woman who has 'assisted' the afflicted (5:10), whether any believer has widows to 'assist' (5:16, first use), and the exhortation to 'let her assist them' rather than burdening the church (5:16, second use). The context is practical material relief for vulnerable widows, showing the verb's focus on tangible aid. HELP AND ASSISTANCE

province; an administrative district or region, especially a Roman provincial territory

This term denotes a province or administrative district in the Roman system. The tribune asks Paul what province he is from (Acts 23:34). Festus arrives in the province and goes up to Jerusalem (Acts 25:1). The word represents Roman administrative geography—territories governed by appointed officials. Classical usage included both the government/command and the territory governed, corresponding to the Latin 'provincia.'

(2×) Province; an administrative district or region under Roman governance. In Acts 23:34, the tribune asks what province (ἐκ ποίας ἐπαρχείας) Paul is from to determine jurisdiction. In Acts 25:1, Festus arrives in the province (τῇ ἐπαρχείᾳ) before going to Jerusalem—referring to his administrative territory. The term corresponds to Latin 'provincia' and represents Roman administrative geography. Classical usage included both the office of governor and the territory governed. Cross-linguistic glosses consistently render 'province': 'provincia', 'éparchie'. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

dwelling place, habitation, farmstead

A noun denoting a dwelling, habitation, or rural estate. Classical usage included farm buildings, country houses, military quarters, or unwalled villages. Acts 1:20 quotes Psalm 69:25, applying it to Judas: 'Let his habitation (ἔπαυλις) become desolate.' The term suggests a fixed dwelling or settled estate, now cursed with emptiness due to Judas's betrayal.

(1×) Peter applies the psalmist's imprecation to Judas's fate. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'morada,' French 'demeure') converges on habitation or dwelling. The curse of desolation transforms the traitor's residence into a vacant ruin, symbolizing divine judgment. This sets the stage for choosing a replacement apostle to fill the vacant 'place of ministry' that Judas abandoned. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐπαύριον G1887 Adv (17×)

On the next day, on the morrow; a temporal adverb indicating the following day.

Epaurion is a temporal adverb meaning 'on the next day' or 'on the morrow.' It functions as a narrative sequencing device, advancing the story by one day. John's Gospel uses it with particular frequency to build the opening week of Jesus' ministry: John the Baptist sees Jesus 'the next day' (John 1:29), then again 'the next day' (1:35), then Jesus goes to Galilee 'the next day' (1:43). German 'am nächsten Tag,' Spanish 'día siguiente,' and French 'le lendemain' all capture this straightforward temporal progression.

(17×) On the next day, the following day, on the morrow. A temporal adverb that advances narrative time by exactly one day. It appears prominently in John's Gospel to sequence the opening days of Jesus' public ministry (John 1:29, 35, 43) and in Acts to track Paul's travels (Acts 10:9, 23; 14:20; 20:7; 21:8; 22:30; 25:6). In Matt 27:62 it marks the day after the crucifixion when the chief priests approach Pilate. Multilingual evidence is perfectly uniform — every language uses its standard 'next day' expression. αὐτό-φωρος G1888 Adj-DNS (1×) in the very act, red-handed

A phrase meaning 'caught in the act' or 'in flagrante delicto,' from αὐτόφωρος (self-detected). John 8:4 uses this expression when the scribes and Pharisees bring a woman 'caught in the very act' (ἐπ' αὐτοφώρῳ) of adultery to Jesus. This is incontrovertible evidence, eyewitness observation that leaves no room for denial or doubt about the crime.

(1×) The accusers emphasize the undeniable nature of the woman's guilt. Spanish 'el mismo acto,' French 'en flagrant délit,' and German 'auf frischer Tat' all capture the immediate, irrefutable detection. Yet despite this damning evidence, Jesus' response shifts focus from her guilt to the accusers' hypocrisy, ultimately offering mercy rather than the stone-judgment they demand. The phrase heightens the drama of Jesus' unexpected clemency. JUDGING AND DECIDING

Epaphras; personal name of Paul's fellow worker

Epaphras is a personal name, likely a shortened form of Epaphroditus (though referring to a different person than the Philippian messenger). This faithful minister brought the gospel to Colossae and remained deeply concerned for the churches in the Lycus Valley. Paul calls him a 'beloved fellow servant,' 'faithful minister of Christ,' and notes his constant prayers for the Colossian believers. The name suggests warmth and devotion in ministry.

(3×) The name appears identically across languages as a proper noun: Epaphras in English, Epafrâs/Epaphrâs in Spanish. Colossians 1:7 introduces him as the one who taught the Colossians the gospel, while 4:12 describes him as 'always struggling on your behalf in his prayers' that they might stand mature in God's will. Philemon 23 lists him among Paul's fellow prisoners, suggesting he shared Paul's imprisonment. The three references paint a portrait of a dedicated evangelist and prayer warrior who founded the Colossian church and remained deeply invested in its spiritual health. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) ἐπαφρ-ίζω G1890 V-PPA-NNP (1×)

to foam up, cast up foam

A verb meaning to foam or froth, used literally of waves or metaphorically of shameful behavior. Jude 13 uses it figuratively of false teachers who are like 'wild waves of the sea, foaming up (ἐπαφρίζοντα) their own shame.' The image is of turbulent, chaotic waters casting up debris and filth, symbolizing the public display of moral corruption.

(1×) Jude employs vivid nautical imagery to depict heretical teachers. The Spanish 'espumando,' French 'écumant,' and German 'aufschäumend' all preserve the foaming action. Just as stormy seas churn up refuse to the surface, these teachers publicly manifest their shameful deeds and doctrines. The verb suggests uncontrolled, violent exposure of inner corruption, contrasting with the hidden reefs they represent earlier in the verse. FLOWING WATER

Epaphroditus; a proper name meaning 'lovely' or 'charming,' associated with Aphrodite

This is the personal name of Paul's fellow worker from Philippi. Epaphroditus brought gifts from the Philippian church to Paul in prison and nearly died serving Paul's needs (Phil 2:25). Paul sends him back with the letter, calling him brother, fellow worker, and fellow soldier (Phil 2:25). He also acknowledges receiving supplies through Epaphroditus (Phil 4:18). The name means 'lovely' or 'charming,' deriving from Aphrodite, though the Christian bearer is defined by service, not pagan etymology.

(2×) Epaphroditus (proper name); Paul's fellow worker and the Philippians' messenger. In Phil 2:25, Paul describes him as brother, fellow worker, fellow soldier, and the Philippians' messenger (τὸν Ἐπαφρόδιτον)—sending him back after his near-fatal illness. In Phil 4:18, Paul acknowledges receiving gifts from Philippi through Epaphroditus. The name derives from Aphrodite, meaning 'lovely/charming,' though its Christian bearer is defined by sacrificial service. Cross-linguistic transliterations vary slightly: 'Epaphróditon', 'Epaphroditus'. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

to stir up, rouse, or awaken someone to action or emotion; to excite or provoke

In the New Testament, this verb appears in contexts of inciting people to opposition or hostility. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'levantaron', French 'exciter') confirms its sense of rousing or stirring up. Both occurrences in Acts describe religious and civic leaders being provoked to take action against Paul and his companions. The classical range extends from literal awakening to metaphorical excitement of emotions or conflict, but the biblical usage focuses on the latter.

(2×) Spanish 'levantaron' (raised up) and French 'exciter' show this word meant to stir up or provoke people to action. In Acts 13:50, Jewish leaders stirred up prominent God-fearing women and city leaders to persecute Paul and Barnabas. In Acts 14:2, unbelieving Jews poisoned the minds of Gentiles against the brothers. The domain assignment to Attitudes and Emotions reflects how this verb involves rousing emotional responses that lead to hostile action. STIR UP INCITE

since, because; otherwise — a causal conjunction giving reasons or introducing a counterfactual alternative

Epei is a conjunction that bridges two distinct logical functions in the New Testament: causal reasoning ('since, because') and counterfactual consequence ('otherwise, else'). In its causal use, it introduces established facts as the ground of an inference — 'since you say that I am a king' (cf. Matt 18:32; Luke 1:34). In its counterfactual use, it signals what would follow if a preceding condition were not true: Paul's argument in 1 Corinthians hinges on this — 'otherwise, what will those who are baptized for the dead do?' (1 Cor 15:29). Hebrews employs the counterfactual sense repeatedly: Christ would have had to suffer many times 'since the foundation of the world' (Heb 9:26), and sacrifices would never have ceased if the worshipers had truly been cleansed (Heb 10:2). Spanish distinguishes the two senses as 'ya que' versus 'de lo contrario,' while German uses 'da' for both, relying on context.

since, because; otherwise (27×) A conjunction serving both causal ('since, because') and counterfactual ('otherwise, else') functions. The causal sense grounds an inference in an acknowledged fact: 'since you judged him wicked' (Matt 18:32), 'since I do not know a man' (Luke 1:34), 'since it is just with God to repay' (2 Thess 1:6). The counterfactual sense introduces what would necessarily follow if a condition were not met, a move Paul exploits in resurrection arguments (1 Cor 15:29) and Hebrews deploys in sacrifice logic (Heb 9:26; 10:2). Spanish splits these as 'ya que' vs. 'de lo contrario'; German 'da' covers both. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST

Since, because, seeing that (causal conjunction); also used temporally as 'when, after that.'

A conjunction that overwhelmingly serves a causal function in the New Testament, introducing the reason or ground for what follows. Paul declares that 'since' the world through its wisdom did not know God, it pleased God to save through the foolishness of preaching (1 Cor 1:21). Spanish 'puesto que' and German 'da ja' reinforce the logical-causal force throughout. A single temporal occurrence surfaces in Luke 7:1, where it introduces a time clause – 'when' Jesus had finished his sayings – and here Spanish shifts to 'después que' (after), signaling the move from reason to temporal sequence.

1. since (9×) Causal conjunction meaning 'since,' 'because,' 'seeing that' – introducing a reason or explanatory ground for the main clause. Accounts for nine of ten NT occurrences. Paul uses it to ground theological arguments (1 Cor 1:21-22; 14:16), and it introduces practical reasoning in narrative (Luke 11:6; Acts 13:46; 15:24). Spanish 'puesto que,' French 'puisque,' and German 'da ja' all converge on the causal register, marking the logical basis for what follows. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST

2. When (1×) Temporal conjunction meaning 'when' or 'after that,' introducing a time clause marking the completion of a preceding event. Occurs once at Luke 7:1, transitioning from the Sermon on the Plain to the centurion's servant narrative. The Spanish shift from 'puesto que' (causal) to 'después que' (after) in this verse clearly marks the temporal rather than logical function, aligning with the classical Greek temporal usage documented in the lexicon. TEMPORAL CONJUNCTIONS

since, seeing that, because (causal conjunction)
A strengthened causal conjunction meaning 'since indeed' or 'inasmuch as,' combining ἐπεί (since) with the particle περ for emphasis. Luke 1:1 begins the Gospel with this word: 'Inasmuch as (ἐπειδήπερ) many have undertaken to compile a narrative...' Luke uses it to acknowledge previous Gospel accounts as the factual basis for his own carefully researched work.

(1×) Luke's opening signals awareness of prior Gospel traditions. The Spanish 'Puesto que,' French 'puisque,' and German 'da ja' all convey causal reasoning. Luke is not contradicting earlier accounts but building on them with his own orderly investigation. The conjunction establishes the premise: since others have already written, and since eyewitnesses have transmitted these events, Luke now presents his own definitive narrative for Theophilus. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST

to look upon, behold, or regard; especially of divine favor or attention toward human affairs
This aorist verb means to look upon or see, carrying special theological weight when God is the subject. In Luke 1:25, Elizabeth says the Lord has 'looked upon' her to remove her disgrace—divine favor manifested in her conception. In Acts 4:29, believers pray for God to 'look upon' the threats against them, seeking divine attention to their circumstances. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'mira/miró', French 'regarder') confirm the basic visual sense, but biblical usage emphasizes God's attentive, caring gaze that leads to action.

(2×) The Spanish glosses 'mira' (look) and 'miró' (looked) alongside French 'regarder' show this is fundamentally about seeing or regarding. But the biblical contexts reveal a theological nuance: God's looking is never merely observational—it implies care and impending action. In Luke 1:25, God's 'looking upon' Elizabeth results in her pregnancy and the removal of her shame. In Acts 4:29, the disciples ask God to 'look upon' threats, expecting protective intervention. This active, caring divine gaze distinguishes biblical usage from mere seeing. GAZING AND LOOKING

since indeed, inasmuch as (emphatic form of ἐπεί with the intensive particle περ)
A compound conjunction combining ἐπεί ('since,' 'because') with the intensive particle περ. This creates an emphatic causal or temporal expression: 'since indeed' or 'seeing that.' Classical texts use it to strengthen causal reasoning, adding weight to an argument by emphasizing the certainty or obviousness of the premise. The particle περ throughout Greek literature functions to intensify or underscore the word it accompanies.

ἐπεισ-ἄγωγή G1898 N-NFS (1×)
bringing in, introduction
A noun meaning the act of bringing in or introducing something additional. Hebrews 7:19 speaks of 'the bringing in (ἐπεισαγωγή) of a better hope' following the annulment of the former commandment. The term suggests replacement or supplementation, introducing something new to supersede or complement what existed before. Here it marks the transition from Mosaic law to the new covenant in Christ.

(1×) The author of Hebrews contrasts the old covenant's inability to perfect worshipers with the introduction of superior access to God. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'introducción,' French 'introduction,' German 'Einführung') all capture the bringing-in motion. This is not merely addition but substitution: the Levitical priesthood and its regulations are set aside, and a better hope is ushered in through Christ's eternal priesthood after the order of Melchizedek. BRINGING AND OFFERING

then, after that, thereupon — a temporal-sequential adverb marking what comes next in a series
Epeita is an adverb of sequence that marks the next step in a temporal or logical chain. Compounded from epi ('upon') and eita ('then'), it serves as a more deliberate marker than the simple 'then' (tote), often enumerating ordered stages. Paul uses it masterfully in 1 Corinthians 15:5-8 to list the resurrection appearances in order — 'then to the twelve... then to more than five hundred... then to James... then to all the apostles' — and again in 15:23-24 to sequence eschatological events. In 1 Corinthians 12:28, it ranks spiritual gifts: 'first apostles, then prophets, then teachers.' Spanish 'despues/luego,' French 'ensuite,' and German 'danach' all render this sequential sense.

(16×) A temporal-sequential adverb meaning 'then, after that, next in order,' used to mark successive stages in a narrative, argument, or enumeration. Particularly prominent in Pauline lists: resurrection appearances (1 Cor 15:5-8), eschatological sequence (1 Cor 15:23-24, 46), and ranked spiritual gifts (1 Cor 12:28). Also functions in narrative transitions (Luke 16:7; John 11:7) and logical argumentation (Gal 1:18, 21; 2:1; Heb 7:2, 27; Jas 3:17; 4:14). Distinguished from tote ('at that time') by emphasizing what follows next in an ordered series. THEN (TEMPORAL ADVERB)

beyond, on the other side
An adverb meaning 'beyond' or 'on the far side,' used with a genitive to indicate spatial or temporal distance. Acts 7:43 quotes Amos 5:27: 'I will carry you away beyond (ἐπέκεινα) Babylon.' The term marks exile to distant lands, past the immediate boundaries. Classical usage could also refer to earlier times ('the times beyond') or the future.

(1×) Stephen's speech uses this term in quoting prophetic judgment on Israel's idolatry. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'más allá,' French 'au-delà') preserves the spatial sense of distant exile. God will send rebellious Israel beyond Babylon, to the uttermost limits, as punishment for worshiping false gods. This is not merely crossing a border but banishment to the furthest reaches, symbolizing complete removal from covenant blessing. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐπεκ-τείνω G1901 V-PPM/P-NMS (1×) to stretch forward, reach out toward
A compound verb meaning to extend or stretch oneself forward, often with the sense of straining toward a goal. Philippians 3:13 has Paul 'stretching forward' (ἐπεκτεινόμενος) to what lies ahead, forgetting what is behind. The verb conveys athletic imagery of a runner leaning into the race, every muscle straining toward the finish line. This is intense, focused pursuit.

(1×) Paul uses athletic metaphor to describe his Christian life. The participial form captures ongoing action: continually stretching forward while simultaneously forgetting the past. The Spanish 'extendiéndome' and French form preserve the forward-reaching motion. This is not passive waiting but active striving, pressing toward the upward call of God in Christ Jesus with full exertion and singular focus. STRETCHING AND EXTENDING

to put on over existing clothing; to be clothed upon or further clothed

This middle voice verb means to put on additional clothing over what one already wears. Paul uses it metaphorically in 2 Corinthians 5 to describe the believer's longing to be 'further clothed' with the heavenly dwelling. The Spanish 'ser revestidos' (to be clothed over) and German 'überkleiden' (to clothe over) both capture the layering concept. Rather than nakedness (stripping off the earthly body), Paul emphasizes adding the resurrection body over the present one —a transformation that completes rather than replaces.

(2×) The multilingual evidence strongly emphasizes the 'over' or 'upon' aspect: Spanish 'ser revestidos' (to be clothed over), French 'se revêtir' (to clothe oneself), German 'überkleiden' (to clothe over). Both occurrences appear in 2 Corinthians 5:2-4, where Paul expresses the Christian hope not for disembodied existence but for being 'further clothed'—receiving the resurrection body as an additional garment over the mortal one. This metaphor conveys continuity between present and future embodiment rather than replacement. CLOTHING AND DRESS

outer garment, coat worn over other clothes
A noun denoting an outer garment or robe worn over inner clothing, from ἐνδύω (to clothe) with the prefix ἐπι- (over). John 21:7 describes Peter putting on his 'outer garment' (ἐπενδύτην) before jumping into the sea to meet the risen Jesus. The term distinguishes this upper garment from the undergarment or tunic, suggesting Peter was working with minimal clothing and added the outer layer for modesty or respect.

(1×) John's resurrection narrative includes this detail of Peter's reverent haste. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'ropa exterior,' French 'vêtement de dessus,' German 'Oberkleid') all specify the outer layer. Peter's action shows both urgency (he jumps in the water) and propriety (he first dresses appropriately). The outer garment signals respect for the Lord even in the rush to reach him. CLOTHING AND DRESS

ἐπέρχομαι G1904 V-AIA-3P (10×)
To come upon, arrive, overtake — describing both divine visitation and the onset of events or calamities
The verb ἐπέρχομαι (eperchomai) means to come upon, arrive at, or overtake someone or something. Its compound structure (ἐπί + ἔρχομαι) conveys movement directed toward and arriving upon a target. In Luke 1:35 the Holy Spirit 'will come upon' Mary, and in Acts 1:8 power 'will come upon' the disciples — both describing divine visitation from above. Luke 21:26 warns of terrors 'coming upon' the inhabited world, and Luke 11:22 speaks of a stronger man 'coming upon' an armed opponent. Acts 14:19 records Jews 'arriving from' Antioch and Iconium. Spanish uses 'venir sobre/sobrevenir,' Arabic يَأْتِي, Korean 임하다 ('come upon'), Hindi आना ('come'), and Swahili -jia ('come to'), all converging on the notion of directed arrival.

come upon, arrive (10×) To come upon, arrive at, or overtake — encompassing divine visitation, the onset of events, and physical arrival. The Holy Spirit 'comes upon' Mary (Luke 1:35) and power 'comes upon' the disciples (Acts 1:8), representing supernatural advent. Eschatological terrors 'come upon' the world (Luke 21:26; Jas 5:1), and a stronger adversary 'comes upon' the armed man (Luke 11:22). Participial forms convey 'the coming/next' (Eph 2:7; Acts 7:18). All forms share one core meaning of directed approach and arrival, with variation only in grammatical inflection. GOING AND LEADING

eperotao – to ask, question, or interrogate someone; to make inquiry of a person for information or testing
The verb eperotao ('to ask, question, inquire') combines the prefix epi- with erotao ('to ask'), intensifying the notion of directed inquiry. Its 56 New Testament occurrences cluster heavily in the Synoptic Gospels, where it describes the questioning of Jesus by disciples, crowds, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Pilate – as well as Jesus questioning others in return. The word covers the full spectrum from genuine information-seeking (Mark 9:11, disciples asking about Elijah) to hostile testing (Matt 22:35, a lawyer testing Jesus) to judicial interrogation (Matt 27:11, Pilate questioning Jesus). French interroger and German fragen both capture the interrogative force. The uniform cross-lingual rendering confirms a single semantic core: to direct a question at someone.

ask, question, inquire (56×) To ask or question someone directly, whether seeking information, testing an interlocutor, or conducting formal interrogation. In Matt 22:35 a lawyer questions Jesus to test him; in Mark 9:32 the disciples fear to ask about his passion prediction; in Matt 27:11 Pilate interrogates Jesus. Spanish pregunto, French interroger, and German fragen converge on this single questioning sense across 56 occurrences. ASKING AND PRAYING

question, inquiry; pledge, appeal
A noun meaning question or inquiry, but also developing the sense of a pledge or formal request. In 1 Peter 3:21, baptism saves 'not as a removal of dirt from the body but as an appeal (ἐπερώτημα) to God for a good conscience.' Scholars debate whether this means the believer's pledge to God or a request for cleansing. The Latin legal term 'stipulatio' (formal agreement) influenced later usage.

(1×) Peter's complex phrase has generated much interpretation. Does ἐπερώτημα mean the baptized person's pledge of fidelity or their appeal for God's cleansing? The multilingual evidence shows diversity: Spanish 'petición' (request), German 'Frage' (question). The broader context suggests baptism involves conscious commitment and divine response, not mere ritual washing. This is covenant transaction, not mechanical purification. PROMISE PLEDGE

ἐπέχω G1907 V-PPA-NMS (5×)
To hold forth, give attention to, notice; to hold out something or to fix one's mind on something carefully.
A versatile compound verb (epi + echō, 'hold upon') with two distinguishable NT senses. It can mean to hold forth or offer something outward, as in holding forth the word of life (Phil 2:16). It also means to give careful attention, to fix one's notice on someone or something – the guests watching where they sat (Luke 14:7), the lame man giving attention to Peter and John (Acts 3:5), and Paul urging Timothy to give heed to himself and his teaching (1 Tim 4:16). The Spanish and French translations – presta-atención, faire-attention – highlight the attentive sense, while 'holding-forth' captures the outward-directed meaning.

(5×) To give careful attention to, notice, fix one's mind upon. Jesus noticed how the guests were choosing places of honor (Luke 14:7), the lame man gave attention to Peter and John expecting something (Acts 3:5), and Paul exhorts Timothy to pay close attention to himself and his teaching (1 Tim 4:16). Spanish presta-atención, notando and French faire-attention, prendre-garde confirm the cognitive focus. In Acts 19:22, Paul 'stayed on' (gave his attention to) Asia for a time, blending attentiveness with lingering presence. At Phil 2:16, the verb shifts to 'holding forth' the word of life, where the directional prefix epi- carries an outward, offering sense rather than an inward, attentive one. BEING ON GUARD

mistreat, abuse, revile; deal with someone despitefully or insultingly

This verb means to threaten abusively, speak disparagingly of someone, or act despitefully toward them. Classical usage includes insolent opposition and insulting treatment. In the New Testament it appears in contexts of persecution and slander against believers. Jesus commands love toward those who abuse (Matthew 5:44, Luke 6:28), and Peter encourages good conduct to shame those who revile Christians (1 Peter 3:16).

(3×) The multilingual glosses emphasize hostile speech and action: Spanish maltratan/ultrajan ('mistreat, abuse'), French maltraiter ('mistreat'), showing this is active persecution. Matthew 5:44 and Luke 6:28 record Jesus' radical command to pray for 'those who abuse/mistreat you,' part of the ethic of enemy-love. 1 Peter 3:16 encourages honorable conduct 'so that those who revile your good behavior in Christ may be put to shame.' The term captures verbal and social abuse directed at believers for their faith. REVILE REPROACH INSULT

on, upon (surface); to, toward (direction); in, at (location); during (time); about, concerning; before (presence); against (hostility); by, on the basis of (ground)

One of the most versatile Greek prepositions, ἐπί governs genitive, dative, or accusative case and modulates accordingly. With genitive or dative, it primarily means 'on' or 'upon' a surface—a spatial sense dominating its 757 occurrences. With accusative, it shifts toward motion: 'to' or 'toward' a destination. But ἐπί stretches into temporal ('during the reign of'), causal ('on the basis of'), and relational realms ('concerning,' 'against,' 'before'). The preposition's semantic elasticity makes it a syntactic workhorse in Koine Greek, capable of expressing location, direction, time, reason, topic, and even hostility, all while maintaining its core spatial metaphor.

1. on, upon (spatial surface) (757×) Core spatial sense: on a surface, upon something. The genitive or dative construction signals position on top of or supported by. Matthew 5:15 places a lamp 'on' a stand (sobre un candelero). Acts describes the Spirit descending 'upon' believers (sur eux). The cross-linguistic consistency (Spanish 'sobre,' French 'sur,' German 'auf') confirms this as the semantic anchor of ἐπί. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. to, toward (motion toward a goal) (41×) Motion toward or onto a goal, typically with accusative case. Matthew 14:34 has the boat coming 'to' the land (a la tierra). Mark 5:21 shows Jesus crossing 'to' the other side. The directionality is clear: not static position, but movement culminating in arrival at or upon a destination. The accusative signals the goal-oriented trajectory.

3. (39×) Sense uncertain but involving hostility or opposition. Matthew 12:26 warns that a kingdom divided 'against' itself cannot stand (contra sí misma). Matthew 24:7 predicts nation rising 'against' nation (contra nación). The glosses (English 'against,' Spanish 'contra,' French 'contre') cluster around adversarial meaning, though the grammatical construction varies. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

4. in the time of, during (temporal) (14×) Temporal use: 'in the time of,' 'during,' 'for a period of.' Mark 2:26 specifies 'in the time of' Abiathar the high priest (bajo Abiatar). Luke 4:27 mentions lepers 'in the time of' Elisha. Matthew 1:11 situates the Babylonian exile 'at the time of' the deportation. 5. in, at (locative non-surface) (8×) General locative sense: 'in,' 'at' a location, not specifically on a surface. Mark 1:45 has Jesus staying 'in' desolate places. Acts 10:34 declares 'in truth' (en verdad). The broader locative function overlaps with ἐν, though ἐπί retains a nuance of proximity or position at a point. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

6. on the basis of, by (ground/cause) (8×) Basis, ground, or means: 'on the basis of,' 'by.' Matthew 4:4 quotes 'man shall not live by bread alone' (por pan solo)—the instrumental or causal ground. Matthew 19:9 allows divorce 'on the grounds of' sexual immorality. The metaphor: the foundation or platform upon which an action rests. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

7. (7×) Sense uncertain, glossed as 'for' or 'to' in purpose contexts. Matthew 26:50 asks 'for what purpose?' (para qué). Ephesians 2:10 speaks of good works 'for which' God prepared us. The purposive or benefactive nuance emerges in these passages, though the exact semantic profile remains unclear from glosses alone. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

8. about, concerning (reference) (7×) Reference or topic: 'about,' 'concerning.' Mark 6:52 notes the disciples' hardness of heart 'concerning' the loaves (sobre los panes). Acts 1:21 speaks of the time the Lord went in and out 'among' them. The topic-marking function extends the spatial metaphor: the subject matter upon which speech or thought dwells. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

9. upon, onto (motion onto a surface) (7×) Sense unclear, glossed as 'inasmuch as' in Matthew 25:40, 45 and Romans 11:13. The conditional or extent meaning ('insofar as,' 'to the degree that') is attested, but the underlying logic of ἐπί in these constructions is ambiguous—possibly a Hebraism or idiomatic use.

Luke 21:12 warns of being brought 'before' kings. John 5:2 locates a pool 'by' the Sheep Gate. 13. (1×) Sense unclear, glossed once as 'from' in Luke 12:54 (desde). The ablative 'from' sense is atypical for ἐπί, which usually governs goal-oriented or static relations. This may reflect a rare construction or translation interpretation rather than a core sense. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐπιβαίνω G1910 V-APA-NMS (6×)

To go upon, set foot on, board (a ship), or step onto a place; physical movement of mounting or arriving.

Describes the physical act of stepping onto a surface, boarding a vessel, or arriving at a location by entering it. In classical Greek it could mean mounting a horse or treading on land; in the NT it appears chiefly in travel narratives involving sea voyages. Paul boards ships (Acts 21:2), sets foot on provinces (Acts 20:18, 25:1), and in Matthew 21:5 Jesus rides into Jerusalem mounted on a donkey. The Spanish 'habiendo-embarcado' neatly captures the maritime boarding sense, while 'montado' reflects the older classical nuance of mounting an animal.

go upon, board, set foot on (6×) To step onto, board, set foot upon, or mount — covering both the act of boarding a vessel for sea travel and arriving at a destination by entering it physically. In Acts, Luke uses it repeatedly for Paul's missionary journeys: boarding a ship at Troas (Acts 21:2), setting foot in the province of Asia (Acts 20:18), and landing at Caesarea (Acts 25:1). Matthew 21:5, quoting Zechariah 9:9, uses the participial form for Jesus riding mounted on a donkey. The Spanish splits between 'habiendo-embarcado' (having boarded) and 'montado' (mounted), reflecting the verb's dual classical range of sea-boarding and animal-mounting. ASCENDING MOVEMENT

To throw or cast upon; to lay hands on (seize); to place upon; of waves, to beat against; reflexively, to reflect upon; of a share, to fall to someone.

A versatile compound verb (epi + ballō, 'throw upon') whose range stretches from violent arrest to quiet reflection. Its most frequent New Testament usage involves laying hands on someone to seize them, as when the temple guards attempt to arrest Jesus in John 7:30. But the same verb describes placing garments on a colt (Mark 11:7), waves crashing over a boat in a Galilean storm (Mark 4:37), and — most memorably — Peter's anguished weeping when the cock crows (Mark 14:72). Spanish captures the emotional nuance with 'habiendo pensado en ello' (having reflected on it), while the physical senses cluster around 'echar' (to throw, cast).

1. lay hands on, seize (10×) To lay hands upon someone with hostile intent, typically to arrest or seize them by force. This is the dominant New Testament usage, appearing ten times in contexts of persecution and attempted arrest. In Matthew 26:50 the crowd lays hands on Jesus in Gethsemane, and in Luke 21:12 Jesus warns his disciples that people will lay hands on them. Spanish consistently uses 'echar mano' (to cast hands) and 'echaron' (they cast/seized), preserving the compound verb's literal force of throwing one's hands upon another. LAYING HANDS SEIZING

2. put or place upon (5×) To put, place, or cast something upon a surface or person in a non-hostile, practical sense. Jesus speaks of no one putting a new patch on an old garment (Matt 9:16, Luke 5:36), the disciples throw their cloaks on the colt (Mark 11:7), and in Luke 9:62 no one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom. Spanish 'pone' (places) and 'echan sobre' (cast upon) reflect the gentler physical action. LAYING HANDS SEIZING

3. beat upon, break over (1×) Of natural forces — particularly waves — crashing against or breaking over something. In Mark 4:37 a great windstorm arises and the waves 'were beating into' (epeballen) the boat so that it was filling up. Spanish 'golpeaban' (they were striking) captures the violent, repetitive force of the sea, a sense unique to this single occurrence. LAYING HANDS SEIZING

4. reflect upon, break down (1×) A striking intransitive or reflexive usage meaning to set one's mind upon something and break down emotionally. In Mark 14:72, after the rooster crows a second time, Peter 'epibalōn' — variously translated as 'when he thought thereon' or 'having broken down' — wept bitterly. Spanish 'habiendo pensado en ello' emphasizes the cognitive moment of reflection, while many interpreters see the physical gesture of covering one's head or collapsing. This hapax-like sense remains debated among commentators. LAYING HANDS SEIZING

5. fall to one's share (1×) An impersonal or middle usage meaning 'to fall to one's share,' referring to the portion of an inheritance or property that belongs to someone. In Luke 15:12 the younger son asks for the share of the estate 'falling' (epiballon) to him. Spanish 'que me corresponde' (that corresponds to me) and German 'zufallen' capture this distributive, almost legal sense of what is owed or allotted. LAYING HANDS SEIZING

burden, weigh down; impose oneself as a financial or emotional weight

This verb means to weigh down or be a burden to someone, particularly in financial or emotional terms. Paul uses it exclusively in his letters to describe his deliberate choice not to burden the churches he served. The classical usage includes being overloaded or pressed heavily upon. In Paul's ministry context, it speaks to his practice of self-support to avoid being a financial drain on new believers.

(3×) Translations consistently use burden language: Spanish ser-carga/abrume ('be a burden, burden'), German belasten ('burden'). In 2 Corinthians 2:5, Paul delicately handles a discipline case, saying 'not to burden you all.' In 1 Thessalonians 2:9 and 2 Thessalonians 3:8, Paul reminds the churches he worked night and day 'that we might not burden any of you' while preaching the gospel. This reflects Paul's consistent practice of tentmaking to maintain financial independence and remove obstacles to the gospel's advance. BURDENS AND LOADS

set upon, mount; place someone on an animal or conveyance

This verb means to put someone upon something, typically mounting a person on an animal for transport. All New Testament uses involve placing people on animals in contexts of care or official movement. The Good Samaritan sets the wounded man on his own animal (Luke 10:34), supporters set Jesus on a colt (Luke 19:35), and Roman soldiers prepare animals for Paul's transfer (Acts 23:24).

(3×) The multilingual evidence points to mounting and placing: Spanish montar/poner ('mount, place'), French faire-monter ('cause to mount'). Luke 10:34 describes the Samaritan's compassion as he 'set him on his own animal' to bring him to safety. Luke 19:35 records the disciples who 'set Jesus' on the colt during the triumphal entry. Acts 23:24 shows Roman officials providing mounts to 'set Paul on' for safe transport to the governor. Each instance involves lifting someone onto an animal for travel, highlighting acts of care or official movement. PLACING AND LAYING

look upon, regard; direct one's gaze with attention or favor

This compound verb means to look upon or regard something attentively, often with the nuance of favorable attention or careful observation. Classical usage includes observing carefully or eyeing something. In the New Testament, it appears in Mary's Magnificat about God regarding her lowly state (Luke 1:48), a father's plea for Jesus to look upon his son (Luke 9:38), and James' critique of showing partiality by regarding fine clothing (James 2:3).

(3×) Translations use terms of seeing and regarding: Spanish mires/miró ('look, looked'), French regarder ('look at, regard'). Luke 1:48 contains Mary's song: 'he has looked upon the humble estate of his servant,' expressing God's gracious attention to the lowly. Luke 9:38 records a desperate father: 'I beg you to look upon my son,' pleading for Jesus' healing gaze. James 2:3 critiques favoritism: 'if you look with favor upon the one wearing fine clothing,' showing selective regard. The verb emphasizes the quality of one's attention—whether with grace, need, or improper partiality. GAZING AND LOOKING

a patch, a piece of cloth sewn onto a garment for mending

From epi ('upon') and ballo ('to throw, put'), this noun literally means 'something thrown or placed upon.' In all four NT occurrences it refers to a patch of unshrunk cloth used to mend a torn garment. Jesus uses this everyday image in the Synoptic parables (Matt 9:16; Mark 2:21; Luke 5:36) to illustrate why his new-covenant teaching cannot simply be patched onto old religious frameworks — the fresh fabric would tear away, making the hole worse.

(4×) A patch of cloth applied to mend a garment, used exclusively in Jesus' parable about new cloth on old garments. The image is vivid and domestic: Spanish 'remiendo/parche' and French 'pièce' all denote a repair patch. Matthew 9:16, Mark 2:21, and Luke 5:36 each employ the noun in the same teaching context, where the incompatibility of a new, unshrunk patch with old, shrunken fabric illustrates the radical newness of Jesus' kingdom message that cannot be contained within prior religious forms. CLOTHING AND DRESS to call upon, cry out to; to invoke, acclaim, or summon loudly

This verb describes calling upon someone or crying out, often with urgency or emotion. It appears in contexts of invoking deities, calling upon the dead at funerals, or summoning help. The middle voice can mean to cry out against someone or to acclaim and applaud. Classical usage includes hunters' hounds giving voice when they pick up a scent. The compound prefix ἐπι- adds direction: calling toward or upon a person or deity, making it especially suitable for prayer and invocation.

ἐπιβουλ-ή G1917 N-DFP (4×)

a plot, conspiracy, scheme formed against someone

From epi ('against') and boule ('counsel, plan'), this noun denotes a deliberate scheme hatched against another person. All four NT occurrences appear in Acts and revolve around plots targeting Paul: the Jewish conspiracy in Damascus (9:24), the plot that diverted his travel plans in Greece (20:3), the 'plots of the Jews' he endured throughout his ministry (20:19), and the assassination plot reported to the Roman tribune (23:30). The word carries an air of secrecy and malicious intent.

(4×) A hostile plot or conspiracy devised against someone, implying secrecy and malicious coordination. Every NT instance involves schemes against the apostle Paul: the plot in Damascus (Acts 9:24), the conspiracy in Greece (20:3), ongoing Jewish plots (20:19), and the ambush plot reported to Claudius Lysias (23:30). Spanish 'asechanzas/conspiración' and French 'complot' capture the clandestine, adversarial character. The dative plural in Acts 20:19 suggests recurring, persistent plotting rather than a single incident. CONSPIRACY

to marry a brother's widow (levirate marriage)

A verb meaning to marry one's brother's widow, fulfilling the levirate duty prescribed in Deuteronomy 25:5-10. Matthew 22:24 quotes the Sadducees citing Mosaic law: 'If a man dies childless, his brother shall marry (ἐπιγαμβρεύσει) the widow.' This technical term refers specifically to this kinship obligation designed to preserve family lineage and property. The Sadducees use this law to construct a hypothetical puzzle about resurrection.

(1×) The Sadducees invoke levirate marriage to challenge resurrection doctrine. The Spanish and French glosses reference marriage to the sister-in-law, while the German preserves the Greek term. This specialized verb captures a specific legal institution: the surviving brother's duty to produce offspring for his deceased brother's name. The Sadducees' riddle of seven brothers who all marry the same woman aims to make resurrection seem absurd. MARRIAGE AND MASTERY

ἐπίγειος G1919 Adj-NNP (7×)

Earthly, belonging to or characteristic of the earth, in contrast to the heavenly or divine realm.

An adjective that draws a sharp line between what belongs to the earth and what belongs to heaven. Jesus uses the contrast in his conversation with Nicodemus: 'If I have told you earthly things and you do not believe, how will you believe if I tell you heavenly things?' (John 3:12). Paul develops the contrast cosmologically in 1 Corinthians 15:40, distinguishing earthly bodies from heavenly ones, and existentially in 2 Corinthians 5:1, where our earthly tent-dwelling gives way to an eternal house. In the great Christ-hymn of Philippians 2:10, every knee bows — in heaven, on earth, and under the earth. The Spanish 'terrenal,' French 'terrestre,' and German 'irdisch' all preserve the sense of limitation and transience inherent in what is merely of this world.

earthly, of the earth (7×) Belonging to or characteristic of the earth as opposed to heaven — describing things, persons, or realities that pertain to the present created order rather than the divine or eternal realm. Jesus contrasts earthly and heavenly instruction in John 3:12. Paul distinguishes earthly and heavenly bodies in the resurrection discourse (1 Cor 15:40), and describes the present body as an 'earthly tent' in 2 Corinthians 5:1. Philippians 2:10 uses the term in the grand tripartite division: heavenly, earthly, and subterranean. James 3:15 associates earthly wisdom negatively with the unspiritual and demonic. The German 'irdisch' and Spanish 'terrenal' both convey the transience and limitation implicit in what is merely of this world. EARTHLY TERRESTRIAL

to come upon, spring up (of wind)

A verb meaning to come into being after, arrive subsequently, or spring up. Acts 28:13 uses it of a south wind 'coming up' (ἐπιγενομένου) that enables Paul's ship to continue its journey. Classical usage included the sense of posterity coming after or events following in sequence. Here the nautical context suggests a favorable wind arising after a period of waiting.

(1×) Luke records the providential arrival of favorable wind conditions. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'habiendo soplado,' French 'survenir') capture the sense of the wind arising or coming up. After circling around to Rhegium, the sailors wait for the right conditions. When the south wind springs up, they seize the opportunity to sail to Puteoli. The genitive absolute construction marks this as the enabling circumstance for the next leg of Paul's journey to Rome. BECOMING AND HAPPENING

ἐπιγιγνώσκω G1921 V-ASA-3S (44×)

To recognize, come to know, discern; to perceive fully, acknowledge, or identify a person, fact, or truth.

Epiginosko adds the prefix epi- to basic ginosko ('to know'), and that prefix does real semantic work — intensifying, directing, or specifying the knowing. In the Gospels, crowds 'recognize' Jesus on sight (Matt 14:35), while Jesus 'perceives' unspoken thoughts (Mark 2:8). Paul uses the word at its deepest in 1 Cor 13:12: 'now I know in part, but then I shall know fully, even as I have been fully known.' French reconnaître and Spanish reconocer both preserve the 're-' prefix paralleling Greek epi-, suggesting that recognition — knowing again upon encounter — is this word's center of gravity.

1. know, come to know (19×) To come to know, learn, find out — gaining cognitive awareness of a previously unknown fact or truth. The largest cluster at 19 occurrences, found especially in Luke's careful historical narration. In Luke 1:4 Theophilus is to 'know with certainty' (epignos) the things he has been taught; in Mark 2:8 and Luke 5:22 Jesus 'perceived' (epignous) their reasoning. Spanish conocer and German erkennen both select inception-of-knowledge vocabulary. The epi- prefix here signals arrival at knowledge rather than mere possession of it, distinguishing this from simple ginosko. KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: having-known, having-learned, he-might-find-out | es: conocer, conociendo, conocisteis | fr: reconnaître | de: erkennen, erkennt Mark 2:8; Mark 5:30; Luke 1:4; Luke 5:22; Luke 7:37

2. recognize, identify (18×) To recognize or identify a person or thing — perceiving who or what someone is upon encounter. Eighteen occurrences, heavily concentrated in narrative contexts. In Matt 14:35 the men of Gennesaret 'recognized' Jesus; in Mark 6:33 the crowds 'recognized' the disciples departing. Acts 3:10 and 4:13 use the word for recognizing the healed beggar and recognizing Peter and John as companions of Jesus. Spanish reconocer and French reconnaître both carry the 're-cognize' structure that mirrors Greek epi-ginosko. Korean 알아보다 ('to recognize by seeing') similarly selects a compound verb that marks the moment of identification. KNOWING AND LEARNING

3. know fully, know completely (3×) To know fully, know completely — the epi- prefix functioning as an intensifier yielding thorough, complete knowledge. Three occurrences, most memorably in 1 Cor 13:12 where Paul contrasts partial present knowledge with the eschatological promise 'then I shall know fully (epignosomai) even as I have been fully known.' Matt 11:27 (twice) declares that no one 'fully knows' the Son except the Father and vice versa — a claim about the exhaustive mutual knowledge between Father and Son. Spanish conoceré plenamente ('I will know fully') and German völlig erkennen both add intensifying adverbs to mark this as more than ordinary knowing. KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: I-will-know-fully, knows-fully | es: conoce, conoceré-plenamente | fr: reconnaître | de: erkennen, erkennt Matt 11:27; 1Cor 13:12

4. be known, be recognized (2×) To be known, be recognized — the passive voice forms. Two clear occurrences: in 1 Cor 13:12 Paul says 'even as I was fully known (epegnosthen),' and in 2 Cor 6:9 the apostles are described as 'unknown yet being recognized (epiginoskomenoi).' Spanish fui conocido plenamente and German erkannt werden both use straightforward passivization. The passive matters theologically in 1 Cor 13 because it asserts that divine knowledge of Paul is already complete, while Paul's knowledge of God awaits eschatological consummation. KNOWING AND LEARNING

en: I-was-known-fully, being-recognized | es: fui-conocido-plenamente, siendo-reconocidos | fr: reconnaître | de: erkennen 1Cor 13:12; 2Cor 6:9

5. acknowledge, accept as valid (2×) To acknowledge, accept as valid or authoritative — a volitional act that goes beyond mere cognitive recognition to willing acceptance. Two occurrences in Paul: in 1 Cor 14:37 'let him recognize (epiginosketo) that the things I write are the Lord's commandment'; in 1 Cor 16:18 'therefore acknowledge (epiginoskete) such men.' Spanish reconoced and German erkennt function here with the force of 'accept and affirm' rather than mere intellectual apprehension. This sense is close to the LXX usage noted by LSJ where epiginosko means 'take notice of, show favour to' — acknowledgment that carries relational and authoritative weight. KNOWING AND LEARNING

ἐπί-γνωσις G1922 N-NFS (20×)

Full knowledge; deep, experiential recognition or acknowledgment, especially of God and spiritual truth.

More than mere information, this compound noun (epi- + gnosis) conveys a thorough, personal, and often transformative knowledge. Paul uses it repeatedly to describe the believer's growing apprehension of God's character and will—whether lamenting that people 'did not see fit to acknowledge God' (Rom 1:28) or praying that the Ephesians receive 'a spirit of wisdom and of knowledge of him' (Eph 1:17). The Spanish rendering 'conocimiento pleno' ('full knowledge') nicely captures the intensified prefix. It is the kind of knowing that reshapes conduct and deepens faith, not merely the stockpiling of facts.

knowledge (20×) Deep, experiential knowledge or recognition—especially of God, Christ, or divine truth. The epi- prefix intensifies ordinary gnosis, pointing to thorough acquaintance rather than surface awareness. Key passages include Rom 1:28 (refusal to acknowledge God), Rom 3:20 (knowledge of sin through the law), and Eph 4:13 (mature knowledge of the Son of God). German 'Erkenntnis' and Spanish 'conocimiento pleno' both reflect the heightened, personal quality of this knowing. KNOWLEDGE AND LEARNING

ἐπιγρᾰφ-ή G1923 N-NFS (5×)

An inscription, superscription; text written on a coin, monument, or sign to identify or designate something.

A noun formed from epigraphō ('to write upon'), referring to any text inscribed on a surface for identification or proclamation. In the Gospels it appears in two memorable contexts: the inscription on a Roman coin – 'Whose image and inscription is this?' Jesus asks about the denarius (Matt 22:20; Mark 12:16; Luke 20:24) – and the charge written above the cross of Jesus (Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38). Spanish inscripción and French inscription render the word identically, underscoring its technical, documentary character. Whether on coinage or on the titulus crucis, the word points to an authoritative public label.

To write upon, inscribe; to engrave or record text on a surface, whether literal or figurative.

The verbal counterpart of epigraphē ('inscription'), meaning to write or engrave upon a surface. Its NT uses span the literal and the deeply theological: the charge inscribed on Jesus' cross (Mark 15:26), the altar inscription 'To an Unknown God' that Paul noticed in Athens (Acts 17:23), and – most profoundly – God's promise to inscribe his laws on the hearts and minds of his people (Heb 8:10; 10:16), echoing Jeremiah's new-covenant prophecy. Revelation 21:12 describes the names of Israel's tribes inscribed on the gates of the new Jerusalem. Spanish inscribiré and French inscrit together capture the act of permanent engraving.

(5×) To write upon or inscribe text on a physical or metaphorical surface. Literally, the charge was inscribed over Jesus on the cross (Mark 15:26) and an Athenian altar bore the inscription 'To an Unknown God' (Acts 17:23); the names of the twelve tribes were inscribed on the gates of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21:12). Figuratively and theologically, God promises to inscribe his laws on the hearts and minds of his people under the new covenant (Heb 8:10; 10:16), transforming 'inscription' from external engraving to internal transformation. Spanish inscribiré ('I will inscribe') and French inscrit ('inscribed') capture both the completed and promissory aspects. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

ἐπιδείκ-νῡμι -νύω G1925 V-PPM-NFP (7×)

To show, display, or demonstrate something visually or evidentially; to exhibit or point out.

A verb meaning to show, display, or demonstrate — whether an object, a person, or evidence. In the Gospels, Jesus tells the Pharisees to show him the coin used for the tax (Matt 22:19), and the disciples point out the temple buildings to him (Matt 24:1). The healed leper is told to show himself to the priests (Luke 17:14). In Acts 9:39, the widows at Joppa show Peter the garments Dorcas had made. The word carries a note of exhibition or proof — not merely seeing but deliberately presenting something for inspection. Spanish 'mostrar,' French 'montrer,' and German 'zeigen' all confirm this demonstrative force, the act of making visible what needs to be seen or verified.

to show, display, demonstrate (7×) To show, display, or demonstrate something by presenting it visually or evidentially — to exhibit for inspection or proof. Jesus commands the Pharisees to show him the tribute coin (Matt 22:19), and he is shown the temple buildings (Matt 24:1). After healing, lepers are instructed to show themselves to the priests as evidence of cleansing (Luke 17:14). At Joppa, grieving widows display the tunics and garments Dorcas had made (Acts 9:39). The Pharisees demand a sign from heaven, asking Jesus to 'show' them proof (Matt 16:1). Spanish 'mostrar/demostrar,' French 'montrer,' and German 'zeigen' all capture the deliberate, demonstrative character of the action. SHOWING AND REVEALING

to receive, welcome, or admit; to acknowledge or give hospitality to someone

This middle voice verb means to receive or welcome someone, appearing only in 3 John where it describes contrasting responses to traveling Christian teachers. Gaius welcomes them; Diotrephes refuses to receive them and even expels those who do. The German 'aufnehmen' (to receive, take in) and Spanish 'recibe' (receives) confirm the basic sense of welcoming or admitting someone. The domain assignment to Possess, Transfer, Exchange may reflect the transactional aspect of hospitality—receiving guests involves sharing resources.

(2×) Spanish 'recibe' (receives) and German 'aufnehmen' (to receive, take in) show this is about welcoming or admitting someone. Both occurrences in 3 John 1:9-10 contrast two men's responses to itinerant Christian workers: Diotrephes 'does not receive us' (refuses hospitality and authority), while he also 'does not receive the brothers' (rejects traveling teachers). The verb emphasizes the social and spiritual dimensions of hospitality—receiving people implies receiving their message and sharing fellowship with them. RECEIVING AND TAKING

to stay in a place temporarily; to visit, reside, or sojourn as a foreigner or visitor

This verb describes foreigners or visitors staying temporarily in a city, often for festivals or special occasions. In Acts 2:10, it identifies visitors to Jerusalem for Pentecost. In Acts 17:21, it describes both Athenians and foreign residents who spent time in the marketplace. The Spanish 'residentes' (residents) and French 'résider' (to reside) capture the temporary dwelling sense. Classical usage often referred to foreigners attending major festivals, which fits the Pentecost context perfectly. The participial form emphasizes the ongoing state of being present as a visitor.

(2×) Spanish 'residentes' (residents) and French 'résider' (to reside) show this word describes people dwelling temporarily in a place. In Acts 2:10, it identifies Jewish visitors 'staying in' Rome who were present in Jerusalem for Pentecost—temporary residents who witnessed the Spirit's outpouring. In Acts 17:21, Paul finds Athenians and 'visiting foreigners' gathered in the marketplace, always eager for new ideas. Classical usage emphasized foreigners attending festivals, perfectly fitting the Pentecost scene where diaspora Jews had journeyed to Jerusalem for the feast. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to add to, make additions (to a covenant or will)

A compound verb meaning to add provisions to an existing arrangement, particularly a covenant or legal document. Galatians 3:15 uses it in Paul's argument: even a human covenant, once ratified, cannot be annulled or 'added to' (ἐπιδιατάσσεται). The verb suggests unauthorized modification or amendment. Paul uses this legal analogy to argue that the Mosaic law, coming 430 years after Abraham, cannot alter God's covenant promise.

(1×) Paul employs a legal metaphor to defend justification by faith. The verb appears in Spanish as 'añade' (adds) and in contexts of supplementing a fixed agreement. Just as human wills remain inviolable once executed, God's promise to Abraham stands unchanged. The law's arrival centuries later cannot revise the terms of grace. This verb marks the impossibility of covenant amendment, undergirding Paul's entire argument in Galatians. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

ἐπιδίδωμι G1929 V-AIP-3S (9×)

To give directly, hand over to someone; deliver a document formally; yield or give way (nautical).

A compound verb (epi + didomi) meaning to give something into someone's hands directly. Most New Testament occurrences describe the intimate act of handing something to a person–a father giving bread or fish to a child who asks (Matt 7:9-10; Luke 11:11-12), or Jesus being handed the scroll of Isaiah in the synagogue (Luke 4:17). Spanish distinguishes nicely between the everyday 'daba/dara' for personal giving and 'entregaron' for the formal delivery of the Jerusalem letter (Acts 15:30). A vivid nautical use appears in Acts 27:15, where the ship 'gave way' to the wind–Spanish 'cediendo' captures this yielding precisely.

1. give, hand to (a person directly) (7×) To give or hand something directly to a person, the basic interpersonal transfer. A father hands bread, fish, or an egg to his child (Matt 7:9-10; Luke 11:11-12); Jesus receives the scroll handed to him (Luke 4:17). Spanish 'daba/dara/dieron' and German 'ubergibt' reflect the straightforward physical giving from one hand to another. GIVING AND BESTOWING

2. deliver, hand over (a letter or formal document) (1×) To deliver or hand over a formal document or official communication. At Acts 15:30, the Jerusalem delegates 'delivered' the apostolic letter to the Antioch congregation. Spanish 'entregaron' elevates the register from casual giving to official transmission, while the French rendering 'ordonner' unexpectedly highlights the authoritative weight of the document delivered. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

3. give way (nautical: yield to wind or current) (1×) A nautical technical sense: to give way, yield to wind or sea force. In Acts 27:15, when the storm-tossed ship could not face into the wind, the crew 'gave way' and let themselves be driven. Spanish 'cediendo' (yielding) precisely captures this maritime surrender. The metaphor of giving extends from hand-to-hand transfer to a ship surrendering control to elemental forces. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

to set in order, arrange, correct what is deficient

A compound verb meaning to set straight, arrange properly, or correct deficiencies. Titus 1:5 has Paul instructing Titus: 'I left you in Crete so that you might set in order (ἐπιδιορθώσῃ) what remains and appoint elders.' The term suggests completing unfinished reforms or correcting organizational problems. This is administrative work, establishing proper church structure where it was lacking.

(1×) Paul commissions Titus to complete church organization in Crete. The Spanish 'ordenes' and the context of appointing elders show this is about establishing proper order. Titus must address 'what remains'—the unfinished business of installing qualified leadership in every town. The verb implies both correction of existing problems and completion of partially done work, bringing Cretan churches to full institutional maturity. RENEW REPAIR RESTORE

to set, go down (of the sun)

A verb meaning to set or go down, used especially of celestial bodies. Ephesians 4:26 quotes Psalm 4:4 with a twist: 'Be angry and do not sin; do not let the sun go down (ἐπιδυέτω) on your anger.' The literal astronomical phenomenon becomes a temporal boundary: anger must not persist beyond sunset. This marks a deadline for reconciliation, using the natural day cycle to limit the duration of human conflict.

(1×) Paul uses the setting sun as a moral deadline. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'se ponga,' German 'untergehen') preserve the astronomical imagery. The command acknowledges anger may arise but insists it cannot linger overnight. Each sunset should see reconciliation achieved, conflicts resolved. The daily rhythm of nature becomes a pattern for relational health: let no wrath survive the day's end. DAYS AND DAYLIGHT gentleness, graciousness, or clemency; fairness that goes beyond strict justice; reasonableness and kindness

This noun denotes a quality of gentle reasonableness that tempers strict justice with mercy. In Acts 24:4, Felix is asked to hear Paul's case 'with clemency' or gracious patience. In 2 Corinthians 10:1, Paul appeals to the Corinthians 'by the gentleness and graciousness of Christ.' The Spanish 'clemencia' (clemency) and French 'équité' (equity, fairness) both capture the idea of fairness that transcends rigid legalism. Classical usage contrasted this virtue with harsh adherence to the letter of the law, emphasizing humane reasonableness.

(2×) Spanish 'clemencia' (clemency) and German 'Gottesfurcht' show translators struggled with this nuanced virtue—it's more than mercy but different from reverence. In Acts 24:4, Paul's lawyer asks Felix to hear them 'with clemency' (εὐλαβείᾳ in some manuscripts, but the context suggests graciousness). In 2 Corinthians 10:1, Paul appeals 'by the gentleness and graciousness of Christ'—a quality demonstrated in Jesus' patient, merciful dealings with people. Classical philosophy praised this as equity: the fairness that softens strict law with reasonable kindness, going beyond what's legally required to what's humanly right. GENTLENESS MEEKNESS

Gentle, yielding, forbearing; describing a fair and reasonable disposition that does not insist on strict rights.

Denotes a quality of character that is gentle, patient, and willing to yield rather than demand strict justice. The Greek concept stands in deliberate contrast to rigid legalism: an epieikes person exercises gracious reasonableness. Paul urges believers in Philippi to let this gentleness be known to all (Phil 4:5), and it appears as a required trait for overseers (1 Tim 3:3) and as a mark of heavenly wisdom (Jas 3:17). The Spanish 'amable' and English 'gentle' both capture the warmth of this term, though neither fully conveys its nuance of yielding one's rightful claims for peace.

(5×) Gentle, yielding, forbearing — a disposition marked by gracious reasonableness and willingness to waive strict rights. The multilingual evidence clusters tightly: English 'gentle,' Spanish 'amable/gentil,' and German 'sanftmuetig' all point to the same core quality. In Phil 4:5 it characterizes the public demeanor of Christians; in Jas 3:17 it is a mark of wisdom from above; in 1 Pet 2:18 it describes fair-minded masters. The word is not mere softness but a principled choice to be equitable rather than harsh. TAME DOCILE

To seek after earnestly or persistently; to desire, search for, or inquire about something or someone with intensity

An intensified form of zeteo (to seek), the prefix epi- adding persistence and urgency to the search. When Jesus says 'the nations seek after all these things' (Matt 6:32; Luke 12:30), the verb exposes anxious craving for material security. When 'an evil generation seeks a sign' (Matt 12:39; 16:4), it reveals a stubborn demand for proof. Yet the same intensity can be noble: the patriarchs 'sought a homeland' (Heb 11:14), and the crowds at Capernaum 'sought' Jesus because they had tasted something real (Luke 4:42).

1. seek after, desire earnestly (12×) To seek after earnestly, desire with intensity, or search for something persistently. This covers twelve of thirteen occurrences and spans both commendable and blameworthy seeking. The Gentiles 'seek after' material necessities (Matt 6:32; Luke 12:30), sign-seekers 'demand' a sign (Matt 12:39; 16:4), and the patriarchs 'seek' a heavenly homeland (Heb 11:14; 13:14). Spanish 'buscar' and French 'chercher/rechercher' both convey the diligent searching, while German 'suchen' captures the root idea. The epi- prefix consistently intensifies ordinary seeking into urgent pursuit. SEEKING AND SEARCHING

2. search for (a person) (1×) To search for a specific person with the aim of locating them physically. In Acts 12:19, Herod 'searches for' Peter after his escape from prison, dispatching guards to find and recapture him. Spanish 'buscando' and French 'chercher' are lexically identical to sense 1, but the narrative context narrows the meaning to a manhunt. The distinction is less about different semantics than about a concrete, physical application of the verb's general force. SEEKING AND SEARCHING

condemned to death, destined for execution

An adjective meaning sentenced to death or doomed to die, often used of gladiators or condemned criminals. In 1 Corinthians 4:9, Paul says God has exhibited the apostles 'as condemned to death' (ἐπιθανατίους), last of all, like men sentenced to the arena. The term evokes public spectacle of the doomed, displayed for entertainment before inevitable execution. Paul uses this stark image to contrast apostolic suffering with Corinthian pride.

(1×) Paul employs vivid arena imagery to describe apostolic ministry. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'condenados a muerte,' French 'condamné à mort,' German 'zum Tod bestimmt') all capture the death sentence. Apostles are not triumphant celebrities but condemned prisoners paraded before the cosmos—angels, men, the whole creation. This shocking metaphor undercuts the Corinthians' sense of arrival, showing that true apostleship means embracing shame and suffering. DEATH AND DYING

a laying on, imposition (especially of hands in a religious rite)

From epitithemi ('to place upon'), this noun refers to the act of laying something on, and in the NT it is used exclusively for the laying on of hands in ordination, commissioning, or blessing. It appears in foundational passages about church order: the apostles' hands conferring the Spirit (Acts 8:18), Timothy's gift received through the laying on of the elders' hands (1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6), and among the elementary doctrines in Hebrews 6:2.

(4×) The laying on of hands as a formal religious act of commissioning, blessing, or spiritual impartation. Acts 8:18 describes Simon observing the Spirit given through the apostles' 'laying on of hands.' Paul reminds Timothy of the gift conferred 'through the laying on of hands' of the presbytery (1 Tim 4:14) and his own hands (2 Tim 1:6). Hebrews 6:2 lists it among foundational teachings. Spanish 'imposición' and French 'imposition' consistently reflect this ritual sense. The genitive form ('of laying on') in most occurrences indicates the act itself as part of a larger doctrinal or narrative description. LAYING HANDS SEIZING

ἐπιθῡμ-έω G1937 V-PPA-NMS (16×)

To desire intensely—either longing for something good or coveting what is forbidden.

A verb of intense inner desire whose moral coloring depends entirely on its object. When Jesus says 'I have earnestly desired to eat this Passover with you' (Luke 22:15), the word glows with holy longing. When prophets and kings 'desired to see' what the disciples see (Matt 13:17), it speaks of sacred anticipation. But in the Decalogue tradition—'you shall not covet' (Rom 7:7; 13:9)—and in warnings about fleshly desire (Matt 5:28; 1 Cor 10:6; Gal 5:17), it carries the weight of sinful craving. Spanish captures this moral split strikingly: 'anhelar/desear' for righteous longing versus 'codiciar' for covetousness, tracking the Greek's full range.

1. desire, long for (9×) To desire, long for, or yearn after something—with neutral or positive connotation. Jesus earnestly desires to share the Passover with his disciples (Luke 22:15), prophets and righteous people longed to see and hear what the disciples experience (Matt 13:17; 1 Pet 1:12), and the prodigal son longs to fill his stomach even with pig food (Luke 15:16; cf. Luke 16:21; 17:22). French 'désirer' and Spanish 'anhelar/deseaba' treat the longing as straightforward and morally unmarked. DESIRE AND COVETING

2. covet, lust after (7×) To covet, lust after, or crave sinfully—desire directed at a forbidden object. Jesus intensifies the commandment: looking at a woman 'to desire her' is already adultery of the heart (Matt 5:28). Paul identifies this verb with the Tenth Commandment: 'I would not have known coveting if the law had not said, You shall not covet' (Rom 7:7; Rom 13:9). The Israelites in the wilderness 'craved evil things' (1 Cor 10:6), and the flesh 'desires against the Spirit' (Gal 5:17). Spanish shifts decisively to 'codiciar/codiciarás,' a vocabulary reserved for wrongful appropriation. DESIRE AND COVETING

one who desires, luster after

A noun denoting someone who desires or longs for something, potentially in a neutral or negative sense. In 1 Corinthians 10:6, Paul warns believers not to be 'desirers (ἐπιθυμητάς) of evil things' as the Israelites were in the wilderness. The term can describe legitimate longing but here marks illicit craving—lust for what God forbids. Paul uses Israel's history as a warning against covetousness.

(1×) Paul identifies the wilderness generation as 'desirers of evil.' The Spanish 'deseadores' and French 'désireux' capture the agent noun: people characterized by craving. The Israelites' murmuring for Egyptian food, their idolatry, their sexual immorality—all stemmed from evil desire. Paul applies this typologically: the baptized community must not repeat Israel's pattern of craving what leads to judgment. DESIRE AND COVETING

Desire, craving, or longing — usually sinful lust but occasionally earnest positive yearning

A noun from ἐπιθυμέω ('to set the heart upon'), spanning the full spectrum from illicit craving to holy longing. In the overwhelming majority of its 38 New Testament occurrences, it denotes sinful desire — the lusts of the flesh, the deceitfulness of worldly craving, and the covetousness that Paul identifies with idolatry. Yet two remarkable passages reclaim the word for positive yearning: Jesus' 'With desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you' (Luke 22:15) and Paul's intense longing to see the Thessalonians (1 Thess 2:17). Spanish captures the negative pole with 'concupiscencia' and the neutral with 'deseo.'

1. sinful desire or lust (36×) Sinful desire, lust, or craving for what is forbidden or contrary to God's will. Covers fleshly lusts (Rom 1:24; Gal 5:16), worldly desires that choke the word (Mark 4:19), the covetousness exposed by the law (Rom 7:7), and the desires of the devil (John 8:44). Spanish 'concupiscencia' and German 'Begierde' both carry the strongly negative connotation that dominates 36 of 38 occurrences. Paul and Peter frequently pair it with 'flesh' (σάρξ) to mark it as opposed to the Spirit. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. earnest longing or yearning (2×) Earnest, positive longing or deep yearning without negative moral connotation. Jesus uses the cognate accusative construction ἐπιθυμίᾳ ἐπεθύμησα ('with desire I have desired') at the Last Supper (Luke 22:15), expressing his sacred eagerness. Paul employs the same word for his intense longing to see the Thessalonians face to face (1 Thess 2:17). Spanish 'con deseo' and German 'begehrt' reflect this warmer, morally neutral sense, showing the word's original breadth before its predominantly negative Christian usage. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐπικαθ-ίζω G1940 V-AIA-3S (1×) to set or place upon, seat someone on
A verb meaning to set someone or something upon another object, to seat or mount. Matthew 21:7 describes the disciples placing their cloaks on the colt, and Jesus 'sat (ἐπεκάθισεν) on them.' The verb captures the act of mounting or taking a seat upon something. This fulfills Zechariah's prophecy of the king coming humble and mounted on a donkey.

(1×) Matthew records Jesus mounting the colt for his triumphal entry. The multilingual evidence shows Jesus seated or placed upon the animal. This seemingly mundane detail carries prophetic weight: the king enters Jerusalem not on a warhorse but on a humble beast of burden, signaling peace rather than conquest. The verb marks the moment of assuming the prophesied posture, riding into the city to messianic acclaim. SITTING AND DWELLING

ἐπικᾰλέω G1941 V-AIA-3P (30×)
To call upon or invoke (God); to be called or surnamed (passive); to appeal to a legal authority
Epikaleo moves across three vividly distinct spheres in the New Testament: worship, naming, and law. Peter at Pentecost proclaims that 'everyone who calls upon the name of the Lord will be saved' (Acts 2:21), anchoring the verb in the language of prayer and invocation drawn from Joel 2:32. Luke then uses the passive form for surnames: Joseph Barsabbas 'who was called Justus' (Acts 1:23), Barnabas 'who was called the son of encouragement' (Acts 4:36). Finally, Paul's dramatic appeal to Caesar (Acts 25:11) introduces a technical legal sense that would have resonated immediately with any Roman reader. Spanish helpfully differentiates 'invocando' (invoking) from 'es llamado' (is called) and 'apelo' (I appeal).

1. call upon or invoke (13×) To call upon a deity or the divine name in prayer, worship, or supplication. Acts 2:21 quotes Joel's promise that whoever 'calls upon' the Lord's name will be saved, and Stephen 'calls upon' the Lord Jesus as he is stoned (Acts 7:59). The religious register is stable across translations: Spanish 'invocando/invocarán,' French 'invoquer,' German 'anrufen.' CALLING AND NAMING

2. be called or surnamed (11×) In the passive, to be given a name, title, or surname. Barnabas 'was called' son of encouragement (Acts 4:36), and Simon 'was called' Peter (Acts 10:5, 18, 32). Spanish distinguishes this cleanly with 'es llamado/fue llamado,' shifting from the active invocation of God to the social act of designation. CALLING AND NAMING

3. appeal to legally (6×) A legal-technical sense: to make a formal appeal to a higher judicial authority. Paul 'appeals to Caesar' (Acts 25:11-12), Festus confirms the appeal (Acts 25:25), and Agrippa notes Paul could have been freed had he not 'appealed' (Acts 26:32). Spanish 'apelo/habiendo apelado' and English 'I appeal to' mark this as courtroom language far removed from the prayer register. CALLING AND NAMING

covering, veil, cloak (literal or figurative)
A noun meaning a cover, veil, or cloak that conceals. In 1 Peter 2:16, believers are warned not to use freedom as 'a covering (ἐπικάλυμμα) for evil,' but to live as God's servants. The metaphor suggests using liberty as a pretext or disguise for sin. Classical usage included physical coverings and, in Menander, the idea that wealth covers many evils. Peter warns against misusing Christian freedom as camouflage for wickedness.

(1×) Peter addresses the potential abuse of freedom. The Spanish 'cobertura' and German 'Deckmantel' (cloak, pretext) capture both literal covering and metaphorical concealment. Christian liberty is not license to sin in disguise. The verse balances two truths: live as free people, yet as God's slaves. Freedom must not become a mask or excuse for malice; rather, it should manifest in righteous service. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to cover over, veil, conceal

A verb meaning to cover over or veil, used literally of snow covering tracks or metaphorically of concealing facts or darkening understanding. Romans 4:7 quotes Psalm 32:1: 'Blessed are those whose lawless deeds are forgiven and whose sins are covered (ἐπεκαλύφθησαν).' The passive form suggests God's action of concealing or putting sins out of sight. This is the language of atonement: sins hidden from view by divine mercy.

(1×) Paul cites David's beatitude on forgiveness. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'fueron cubiertos,' French 'couvert') convey the covering action. This is not denial or ignorance but gracious concealment: God covers sins so they no longer accuse. The passive voice emphasizes divine initiative—God acts to hide transgressions from his own judicial gaze. This Old Testament image anticipates the fuller revelation of justification through Christ's atoning work. COVERING AND CONCEALING

ἐπικατ-άρᾱτος G1944 Adj-NMS (3×) cursed, accursed; under divine curse or condemnation
This strong adjective describes someone or something under a curse, particularly divine condemnation. It appears in contexts of separation from God's blessing and exposure to judgment. John 7:49 records the Pharisees' scornful dismissal of common people as 'accursed,' while Paul's use in Galatians (3:10, 13) ties it to the law's curse that Christ bore on the cross to redeem us.

(3×) Every translation uses curse language: Spanish Maldito/malditos ('cursed'), French maudit ('cursed'), German verflucht ('cursed'). John 7:49 shows the Pharisees' contempt: 'this crowd that does not know the law is accursed.' Galatians 3:10 quotes Deuteronomy: 'Cursed is everyone who does not abide by all things written in the Law.' Galatians 3:13 declares the gospel reversal: 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us.' The term marks those under divine judgment, with Christ's substitutionary curse-bearing as the dramatic exception. CURSING AND IMPRECATION

ἐπίκειμαι G1945 V-IIM/P-3S (7×)
Lie upon, be placed on (physically or as an obligation); press upon, crowd around, urgently pressure.
The verb epikeimai (literally 'lie upon') serves as a virtual passive to epitithemi ('place upon') and spans two distinct experiential poles in the New Testament. In its stative sense, it describes things that lie upon or are placed on something — a stone 'was lying upon' the tomb of Lazarus (John 11:38), fish 'lying on' a charcoal fire greets the disciples at the Sea of Tiberias (John 21:9), and regulations

'imposed' on the old covenant worshippers until the new order (Heb 9:10). Paul uses it figuratively of necessity that 'is laid upon' him to preach the gospel (1 Cor 9:16). Spanish estar puesta/impuestas and French peser sur capture this regulatory weight. But in three Lukan passages, epikeimai takes on an active, pressing force: the crowd 'pressing upon' Jesus to hear the word of God at the lake (Luke 5:1), the chief priests 'urgently pressing' Pilate with their voices (Luke 23:23), and the storm 'pressing upon' the shipwrecked crew so that all hope was abandoned (Acts 27:20). Here the same root shifts from passive placement to aggressive insistence — from a stone resting on a tomb to a mob bearing down on a governor.

1. lie upon, be placed on (4×) To lie upon, be placed on, be imposed — describing a physical object resting on something, or an obligation or regulation that is set upon someone. Four occurrences: the stone 'lying upon' the entrance of Lazarus's tomb (John 11:38), fish and bread 'lying on' charcoal at the lakeside breakfast (John 21:9), the 'necessity laid upon' Paul to preach (1 Cor 9:16), and the ceremonial regulations 'imposed until a time of reformation' (Heb 9:10). Spanish estar puesta/impuestas and French peser sur distinguish between the physical and regulatory sub-uses. The underlying image is stative weight — something placed and remaining in position, whether a literal stone or a figurative compulsion. RECLINING AND LYING

2. press upon, crowd around (3×) To press upon, crowd around, urgently pressure — conveying active force, insistence, or overwhelming pressure from people or circumstances bearing down on someone. Three Lukan occurrences: the crowd 'pressing upon' Jesus at the Lake of Gennesaret, eager to hear the word of God (Luke 5:1), the voices of the chief priests and the crowd 'prevailing' or 'pressing insistently' upon Pilate to crucify Jesus (Luke 23:23), and the violent storm 'pressing upon' the ship so that 'all hope of being saved was abandoned' (Acts 27:20). Spanish apremiaban/sobreponiéndose and German liegt auf shift toward urgency and pressure vocabulary. The sense has moved from passive placement to active assault — not a stone sitting quietly but a mob or tempest bearing down with irresistible force. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Epicurean (follower of Epicurus)

A proper adjective denoting followers of the philosopher Epicurus, who taught that pleasure (understood as tranquility and absence of pain) is the highest good. Acts 17:18 describes Epicurean philosophers encountering Paul in Athens. They, along with Stoics, debate with him and bring him to the Areopagus. Epicureans were materialists who denied divine providence and an afterlife, positions fundamentally opposed to Paul's message of resurrection and divine judgment.

(1×) Luke sets Paul's Mars Hill sermon in philosophical context. The Epicureans, named for their founder, would have found Paul's resurrection proclamation absurd and his call to repentance irrelevant to their pursuit of ataraxia (undisturbedness). The multilingual glosses preserve the Greek-based term. Paul's message of a Creator who judges humanity through a risen man challenged Epicurean atomism and denial of personal immortality head-on. aid, help, assistance

A noun meaning help, assistance, or auxiliary support. Acts 26:22 has Paul declaring, 'Having obtained help (ἐπικουρίας) from God, I stand to this day testifying to both small and great.' The term could refer to military reinforcements in classical usage but here denotes divine support and protection. Paul attributes his survival and continued ministry not to his own strength but to God's sustaining aid.

(1×) Paul's testimony before Agrippa highlights divine assistance. The Spanish 'auxilio,' French 'secours,' and the broader semantic field all emphasize support and rescue. Through shipwrecks, beatings, imprisonments, and plots, God's help has kept Paul alive to fulfill his apostolic calling. This is not abstract providence but concrete preservation, enabling Paul to stand before kings and continue proclaiming the prophesied suffering and resurrection of the Messiah. HELP AND ASSISTANCE to decide, determine, give judgment

A verb meaning to decide, judge, or render a verdict. Luke 23:24 records Pilate's decision: 'Pilate decided (ἐπέκρινεν) that their demand should be granted.' After the crowd's insistent cries for Barabbas's release and Jesus' crucifixion, Pilate pronounces the decisive judgment. The verb marks the formal act of rendering a verdict, Pilate yielding to pressure and condemning an innocent man.

(1×) Luke's passion narrative captures Pilate's judicial surrender. The Spanish 'sentenció' and French 'décider' both convey authoritative judgment. Despite finding no fault in Jesus, Pilate issues the fatal decision in response to political pressure. This verb marks the moment when expedience triumphs over justice, when a Roman governor's verdict sends the Son of God to the cross to appease a mob. JUDGING AND DECIDING Take hold of, seize: physically grasp a person (often to heal or arrest); catch in words (hostile); lay hold of spiritually.

The Greek verb epilambanomai pictures a hand reaching out and gripping — whether in mercy, hostility, or faith. In the Gospels it most often describes Jesus physically taking hold of someone to heal or rescue: grasping Peter's hand as he sinks (Matt 14:31), taking a blind man by the hand (Mark 8:23), or laying hold of a sick man to cure him on the Sabbath (Luke 14:4). Spanish agarrar and German ergreifen both capture the visceral grip. But the same verb also serves adversaries who try to 'catch' Jesus in his speech (Luke 20:20, 26), and Paul lifts it into the spiritual realm when he urges Timothy's listeners to 'take hold of eternal life' (1 Tim 6:19) — French saisir beautifully spans all three registers.

1. take hold of, seize (physical) (16×) Physical seizure or grasping of a person, typically by the hand or arm, often with purpose — to heal, rescue, lead, or arrest. This dominant sense (16 occurrences) runs through the Synoptic Gospels and Acts: Jesus seizes Peter's hand on the water (Matt 14:31), takes a child and stands him beside himself (Luke 9:47), grasps Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross (Luke 23:26), and Barnabas takes hold of Saul to bring him to the apostles. Spanish agarrando/tomando, German ergreifen, and French saisir all converge on a firm physical grasp. The Hebrews passage recalling God taking Israel 'by the hand' out of Egypt (Heb 8:9) echoes this tactile imagery. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

2. catch, entrap (hostile intent) (2×) Catching or entrapping someone in speech with hostile or adversarial intent. Only 2 occurrences, both in Luke 20: religious authorities send spies 'so that they might catch him in what he said' (Luke 20:20), yet 'they were unable to catch him in a saying before the people' (Luke 20:26). Spanish atrapar and the shift from physical grasping to verbal trapping is subtle but real — the hand that seizes a person now seizes a word. French saisir retains the same verb, while German ergreifen likewise covers both physical and verbal capture. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

3. take hold of (figurative, spiritual) (1×) Figurative or spiritual laying hold of something abstract — seizing by faith what cannot be touched. A single clear occurrence in 1 Timothy 6:19, where Paul urges generous believers to 'take hold of that which is truly life.' Spanish echar mano ('throw the hand') vividly preserves the metaphor of reaching for the intangible. The physical verb is deliberately repurposed: the same hand that grasped Peter in the storm now grasps eternal life. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

ἐπιλήθ-ω G1950 V-AIM-3P (8×)

To forget or lose from memory; to neglect or disregard through failure to remember.

A deponent middle verb (ἐπιλανθάνομαι) built from ἐπί + λανθάνω, intensifying the basic notion of forgetting. In the Gospels it describes the disciples' embarrassing failure to bring bread (Matt 16:5; Mark 8:14), while Paul transforms it into a deliberate spiritual discipline — 'forgetting what lies behind' in his race toward the prize (Phil 3:13). God's own memory stands in pointed contrast: he will never forget works done in love (Heb 6:10). Spanish olvidar and French oublier both capture the involuntary quality, while the English 'forget' carries the same double edge of accidental lapse and willful neglect.

forget, neglect (8×) To lose something from memory or to fail to keep it in mind, whether through inadvertence or deliberate choice. The disciples forgot (ἐπελάθοντο) to bring bread on a boat trip (Matt 16:5; Mark 8:14), an everyday lapse, yet God does not forget (ἐπιλαθέσθαι) acts of love (Heb 6:10). Paul's usage in Phil 3:13 — 'forgetting what lies behind' — shows the verb can denote a purposeful setting aside of memory. The sparrows of Luke 12:6, not one forgotten before God, reveal the theological weight the word carries when its subject is divine. FORGETTING AND NEGLECT

en: forget, forgetting, forgot | es: olvidado, olvidando, olvidar | fr: oublier | de: vergessen, ἐπελάθοντο, ἐπιλελησμένον Matt 16:5; Mark 8:14; Luke 12:6; Phil 3:13; Heb 6:10

to name, call by name; to choose or select; to say in addition or recite

This verb has several related senses: naming or calling by a particular name, and choosing or selecting. In John 5:2, it describes a pool in Jerusalem 'called in Hebrew Bethesda'—a naming or designation. In Acts 15:40, Paul 'chose' Silas as his companion—a selection. The multilingual evidence shows both senses: French and German preserve 'nommer/heissen' (to name) alongside 'choisir/wählt aus' (to choose, select). The semantic connection lies in singling out something or someone by designation, whether through naming or selecting.

(2×) The multilingual glosses reveal two distinct but related uses: naming and choosing. Spanish 'escogiendo/llamada', French 'choisir/nommer', and German 'wählt aus/heissen' all reflect both senses. In John 5:2, the participial form describes the pool 'being called' or 'having the name' Bethesda in Hebrew—a designation or naming. In Acts 15:40, Paul 'chose' or 'selected' Silas as his missionary partner—an act of deliberate selection. Both involve singling out: one by name, the other by choice. The domain assignment to Think reflects the mental act of designation that underlies both uses. CHOOSING AND SELECTING en: being-called, having-chosen | es: escogiendo, llamada | fr: choisir, nommer | de: heissen, wählt-aus John 5:2; Acts 15:40

ἐπιλείπω G1952 V-FIA-3S (1×)

to fail, run short, be lacking

A verb meaning to fail, give out, or fall short. Hebrews 11:32 uses it rhetorically: 'Time will fail (ἐπιλείψει) me if I tell of Gideon, Barak, Samson...' The author signals he could continue listing heroes of faith but lacks sufficient time. Classical usage included resources failing or people falling short of expectations. Here it marks the limit of narrative space, not the exhaustion of exemplary figures.

(1×) The author of Hebrews employs a rhetorical device to indicate abundance of examples. The Spanish 'faltará' and German 'mangeln' both capture the running-short sense. The parade of faithful witnesses from Israel's history could go on indefinitely, but the author must be selective. Time itself becomes a finite resource inadequate to recount all who lived by faith, conquering kingdoms, stopping lions' mouths, and enduring persecution. LACK AND DEFICIENCY en: will-fail | es: faltará | fr: mangeln | de: mangeln Heb 11:32

ἐπιλησμ-ονή G1953 N-GFS (1×)

forgetfulness, state of forgetting

A noun denoting the state or condition of forgetting. James 1:25 contrasts the forgetful hearer with the doer: one who looks into the perfect law of liberty and continues in it, 'not being a hearer of forgetfulness (ἐπιλησμονῆς)' but a doer. The genitive describes a person characterized by forgetting—someone who hears the word but immediately loses it from memory, failing to act on it.

(1×) James uses 'hearer of forgetfulness' to describe ineffective engagement with God's word. The Spanish 'de olvido' and German 'Vergesslichkeit' capture the abstract noun. This person hears but does not retain, like someone glancing at a mirror and immediately forgetting their reflection. True blessing comes to the one who looks intently and persists, translating heard truth into lived obedience rather than letting it evaporate from memory. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14721 WITH 3 SENSES

remaining, left over, still to come

An adjective meaning remaining, left over, or still future. In 1 Peter 4:2, believers should live 'the remaining (ἐπίλοιπον) time in the flesh no longer for human passions but for God's will.' The term marks what is left of earthly life, the time yet to be lived. Peter urges redirection of one's remaining days from self-indulgence to obedience, using past suffering as a catalyst for transformed priorities.

(1×) Peter calls for radical reorientation of the time left in mortal life. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'restante,' French form) emphasize what remains or is left over. Having suffered in the flesh and thereby ceased from sin, believers should devote whatever earthly time they have left not to former lusts but to God's purpose. This is stewardship of remaining mortality, spending residual years for eternal rather than temporal ends. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: remaining | es: restante | fr: ἐπίλοιπον | de: uebrig 1Pet 4:2

explanation, interpretation, solution

A noun meaning interpretation, explanation, or solution, derived from ἐπιλύω (to solve or explain). In 2 Peter 1:20, the author warns that 'no prophecy of Scripture comes from one's own interpretation (ἐπιλύσεως).' This contested verse either means prophets did not originate their messages privately or that readers must not interpret Scripture by private whim. The context favors the former: prophecy arises from the Holy Spirit, not human invention.

(1×) Peter addresses the origin and authority of prophetic Scripture. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'interpretación,' German 'Auslegung') capture the explanatory sense. The point is likely that prophecy did not come by prophetic impulse but by divine initiative—the Spirit moved holy men to speak God's words. This establishes scriptural authority against false teachers who claim private revelations. True prophecy is publicly given, Spirit-sourced, not privately concocted. UNTYING AND DISSOLVING

ἐπιλύω G1956 V-FIP-3S (2×)

to loose, untie, or release; to solve, explain, or interpret; to settle or resolve a matter

This verb means to loose or untie in literal contexts, but extends to solving problems or explaining difficult matters. In Mark 4:34, Jesus 'explained everything' to his disciples privately—making clear what the parables meant. In Acts 19:39, the town clerk declares that the assembly's grievances 'will be settled' in a legal assembly—resolved through proper channels. The Spanish 'explicaba' (explained) and 'será resuelto' (will be resolved) capture both the interpretive and resolving senses. Classical usage included untying physical bonds, solving riddles, and settling disputes.

(2×) Spanish glosses 'explicaba' (was explaining) and 'será resuelto' (will be settled) show the semantic range from interpretation to resolution. In Mark 4:34, Jesus spoke to crowds in parables but 'explained everything' (ἐπέλυεν) privately to his disciples—untying the meaning, making clear what was obscure. In Acts 19:39, the Ephesian town clerk insists that further issues 'will be settled' (ἐπιλυθήσεται) in the legal assembly—resolved through proper civic procedures. Both involve 'loosing': one unties tangled meanings, the other unravels civic disputes. Classical usage included solving riddles and releasing prisoners, all sharing the root sense of untying or freeing. UNTYING AND DISSOLVING

to bear witness to, testify, confirm
A compound verb meaning to bear witness, testify in support, or confirm evidence. In 1 Peter 5:12, Peter writes, 'I have written briefly, exhorting and testifying (ἐπιμαρτυρῶν) that this is the true grace of God.' The verb suggests adding authoritative confirmation or witness to a claim. Peter's testimony authenticates the gospel message as genuine divine grace, not human invention.

(1×) Peter closes his letter with apostolic attestation. The verb appears as testifying or bearing witness in support of the gospel's authenticity. Peter's role is not merely to exhort but to certify from personal experience and apostolic authority that the grace proclaimed to these suffering believers is the real thing. His witness carries weight as one who walked with Jesus and saw the resurrection firsthand. TESTIMONY AND WARNING

care, attention, oversight
A noun denoting care, attention, or diligent oversight. Acts 27:3 records Julius the centurion treating Paul kindly and allowing him to go to friends 'to receive care (ἐπιμελείας).' Classical usage included medical treatment, attention to civic duties, or care bestowed on anything requiring diligence. Here it suggests friends providing for Paul's needs—food, medical attention, comfort—during the journey to Rome.

(1×) Luke notes the centurion's humane treatment of his prisoner. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'cuidado,' French 'soin') converge on care and attention. Julius permits Paul to visit believers in Sidon who will attend to his practical needs. This small kindness reflects both the centurion's character and divine providence ensuring Paul's welfare en route to his Roman trial. The noun captures comprehensive caregiving, not mere casual help. GUARDING AND KEEPING

take care of, attend to; provide careful management and concern
This middle voice verb means to take care of, have charge of, or manage something with diligence. Classical usage includes taking responsibility for affairs or providing oversight. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in passages about practical caregiving—the Good Samaritan's care for the wounded man (Luke 10:34-35) and the qualifications for church leadership regarding family management (1 Timothy 3:5).

(3×) Translations consistently employ care language: Spanish Cuídalo/cuidó ('care for him, cared for'), French prendre-soin ('take care'). Luke 10:34 describes the Samaritan who 'took care of' the wounded man, while 10:35 records his promise to the innkeeper regarding any additional expenses for caring for the man. 1 Timothy 3:5 asks rhetorically: 'if someone does not know how to manage his own household, how will he care for God's church?' The verb emphasizes active, responsible oversight and practical provision for those in one's charge. GUARDING AND KEEPING

carefully, with attentiveness and diligence
This adverb describes action done with careful attention and thoroughness. In Luke 15:8, the woman searching for her lost coin does so carefully, sweeping diligently through her house. The multilingual evidence (Spanish cuidadosamente, French soigneusement) consistently emphasizes the deliberate, attentive quality of the action. Classical Greek used this word for medical precision and philosophical exactness, showing how careful observation was valued in both practical and intellectual pursuits.

(1×) The single New Testament occurrence describes the woman's diligent searching in Jesus' parable, where the adverb emphasizes the thoroughness and attention to detail she employs. The cross-linguistic glosses uniformly capture this sense of careful, deliberate action, reflecting a consistent understanding across Romance and Germanic languages that this is about quality of attention rather than mere speed or effort. ACCURACY AND PRECISION

ἐπιμένω G1961 V-IIA-3P (17×)
To remain in a place or persist in a state; to stay on, continue, or persevere in an activity or condition.
A compound of epi ('upon') and meno ('remain'), this verb adds a sense of duration or insistence to simple staying. In narrative contexts it means to linger or tarry in a location — Paul staying on at Corinth, the disciples remaining at Tyre (Acts 21:4; 28:12). In epistolary and theological contexts it shifts to persisting in a course of action or moral state: 'Shall we continue in sin?' (Rom 6:1). French uses demeurer and German bleiben for both senses, collapsing the distinction, but Spanish helpfully separates permanecer (spatial remaining) from continuaba (ongoing persistence), tracing the semantic boundary between physical presence and moral resolve.

1. remain, stay in a place (10×) To stay or remain in a specific location for a period of time, emphasizing physical presence. Paul remains at Caesarea (Acts 21:10), the travelers tarry at Syracuse (Acts 28:12), Peter stays on at Joppa (Acts 10:48). Spanish permanecer and German bleiben capture the locative sense well. The durative force of the epi- prefix implies a deliberate, extended stay rather than a brief stop. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: I-remained, I-will-remain, remaining | es: Permaneciendo, permanecer, permaneceré | fr: demeurer | de: bleiben, bleibt Acts 10:48; Acts 15:34; Acts 21:4; Acts 21:10; Acts 28:12

2. continue, persist in a state (7×) To continue or persist in a state, action, or disposition, emphasizing ongoing commitment rather than physical location. Paul's theological questions in Romans — 'Shall we continue in sin?' (6:1), 'continue in his kindness' (11:22) — use this sense. Spanish continuaba signals the shift from spatial to behavioral persistence. In John 8:7 Jesus 'continued' questioning, and in Acts 12:16 Peter 'continued' knocking, both showing dogged perseverance in an activity. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐπι-νεύω G1962 V-AIA-3S (1×)

to consent, nod approval, agree to something

This verb originally described the physical gesture of nodding one's head to signal agreement or approval, often used in Homer for Zeus nodding assent. By New Testament times it carried the broader sense of consenting or agreeing to a request. When the Ephesian Jews ask Paul to stay longer in Acts 18:20, the question is whether he nodded approval to their request. The multilingual glosses (Spanish consintió, French consentir) preserve the core idea of granting permission or agreement.

(1×) In Acts 18:20, the verb describes a potential response to the Ephesians' request for Paul to remain with them. The evidence across languages centers on the concept of consenting or agreeing, whether through gesture or verbal assent. Classical usage emphasized the physical nod as a sign of authoritative approval, which evolved into the more general sense of agreement preserved in the Romance language glosses. CONFESSION AND PRAISE

thought, intention, purpose, mental conception

This noun denotes what passes through the mind—a thought, notion, or purpose. In Acts 8:22, Peter confronts Simon Magus about the intention of his heart, the underlying thought driving his desire to purchase the Spirit's power. Classical Greek used this word for inventive thinking and creative conception, but also for darker purposes and designs. The multilingual evidence shows semantic range: Spanish pensamiento suggests general thought, while English 'intent' and the domain assignment point toward purposeful mental activity.

(1×) Peter's rebuke in Acts 8:22 focuses on Simon's underlying intention or purpose—the thought behind his offer to buy spiritual power. The cross-linguistic evidence reveals tension between neutral 'thought' (Spanish/French) and morally weighted 'intent' (English), with the context clearly emphasizing the purposeful, deliberate quality of Simon's mental state. This reflects the classical semantic range where the word could denote both neutral conception and calculated design. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

to swear falsely, break an oath, commit perjury

This verb means to swear falsely or forswear oneself—to take an oath with no intention of keeping it, or to break a sacred promise. Jesus uses it in Matthew 5:33 when teaching about oaths, contrasting faithful oath-keeping with perjury. In Homer, characters swear by the gods with solemn promises; this verb describes the violation of such sacred commitments. The multilingual glosses (Spanish perjurarás, French se-parjurer) uniformly identify this as perjury, showing cross-cultural recognition of oath-breaking as a serious moral offense.

(1×) In the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5:33), Jesus prohibits breaking oaths, referencing the traditional Jewish teaching against perjury. The cross-linguistic consistency—all major European languages render this as 'perjure' or 'break oath'—reflects the universal gravity of oath violations across Mediterranean cultures. The classical background shows this was opposed to εὐορκέω (keeping oaths faithfully), establishing a clear moral binary. OATHS AND SWEARING

This adjective describes someone who has broken their oath or sworn falsely—a perjurer. It appears in 1 Timothy 1:10 within a vice list of those who violate God's law. The word could describe either the oath itself (as in Homer: 'a false oath') or the person who swears it (the perjurer). The multilingual evidence unanimously identifies this as referring to perjurers—people characterized by oath-breaking. In Greek culture, where oaths by the gods carried sacred weight, perjury was considered both morally reprehensible and potentially dangerous, inviting divine retribution.

(1×) Paul's vice catalog in 1 Timothy 1:10 places perjurers among serious offenders against divine law—murderers, slave traders, and the sexually immoral. The cross-linguistic glosses (Spanish perjuros, German meineidige) consistently identify these as persons defined by oath-breaking, not merely occasional liars but habitual violators of sworn commitments. This reflects ancient Mediterranean culture where one's oath was bound up with personal honor and divine witness. LYING AND FALSEHOOD

ἔπειμι G1966 V-PPA-DFS (5×)

The next day, the following day; used of temporal succession, especially in travel narratives in Acts.

A participle form of epeimi (to come upon) used almost exclusively in the temporal sense of 'the following day' or 'the next day.' All five NT occurrences appear in Acts, tracking Paul's missionary journeys and key narrative transitions. The French 'lendemain' and Spanish 'día siguiente' precisely mirror this temporal meaning. Luke uses it as a narrative hinge — marking the day Moses returned to find Israelites quarreling (Acts 7:26), and punctuating Paul's island-hopping itinerary across the Aegean (Acts 16:11, 20:15).

(5×) The following day, the next day — a temporal marker indicating the day after a previously mentioned event. Used exclusively in Acts as a narrative transition device. Spanish 'día siguiente' and French 'lendemain' confirm the straightforward temporal sense. In Acts 7:26 it marks Moses' return; in Acts 16:11, 20:15, and 21:18 it tracks Paul's travel chronology; in Acts 23:11 it introduces the Lord's nighttime encouragement to Paul in Jerusalem. DAYS AND DAYLIGHT

ἐπιούσιος G1967 Adj-AMS (2×)

daily, for the day; sufficient for the coming or current day; necessary for subsistence

This rare adjective appears only in the Lord's Prayer, modifying 'bread' in the petition 'Give us this day our daily bread.' Its precise meaning has puzzled scholars for centuries—does it mean 'daily,' 'for tomorrow,' 'necessary for existence,' or 'heavenly/supernatural'? The etymology is uncertain. Spanish 'de cada día/diario' (of each day, daily) and French 'quotidien' (daily) reflect the traditional interpretation: bread needed for each day. The petition asks God to provide what's necessary for today (or tomorrow), trusting him for ongoing provision rather than hoarding.

(2×) The multilingual evidence uniformly supports 'daily': Spanish 'de cada día/diario', French 'quotidien', German repeating the Greek. But this adjective (ἐπιούσιος) is so rare that ancient interpreters struggled with it. Some derived it from ἐπιοῦσα (coming, i.e., tomorrow), others from ἐπὶ τὴν οὖσαν (for today). In Matthew 6:11 and Luke 11:3, Jesus teaches disciples to pray for their 'daily bread'—the provision needed for today or tomorrow. The petition embodies dependence on God for physical sustenance, seeking neither luxury nor excess, but what's sufficient for life. The request parallels the manna in Exodus: each day's provision, no hoarding. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 5469 WITH 3 SENSES

ἐπιπίπτω G1968 V-AIA-3P (11×)

Fall upon; descend suddenly on someone (of the Spirit, fear, or emotion); embrace physically; rush at aggressively

A vivid verb of sudden, forceful descent onto a person. Most often in Acts, the Holy Spirit 'falls upon' believers at pivotal moments – Pentecost's sequel at Cornelius's house (Acts 10:44), the Samaritan believers (Acts 8:16), and the Ephesian disciples (Acts 19:17). Fear likewise 'falls on' Zechariah at the angel's appearance (Luke 1:12). Yet the same verb captures deeply human moments: the father falling on the prodigal son's neck in embrace (Luke 15:20), Paul throwing himself on Eutychus (Acts 20:10), and the Ephesian elders weeping on Paul's neck (Acts 20:37). In Mark 3:10, crowds rush at Jesus to touch him – the aggressive edge of this word.

1. fall upon (of Spirit, fear, or abstract force descending on someone) (7×) Of an invisible or supernatural force – especially the Holy Spirit or fear – descending suddenly and overwhelmingly upon a person. Spanish 'cayeron/cayó sobre' and German 'fallen auf' preserve the spatial metaphor of something dropping from above. This is the signature verb for the Spirit's dramatic arrival in Acts (8:16, 10:44, 11:15), and for terror striking Zechariah (Luke 1:12) and the Ephesian crowd (Acts 19:17). FALLING AND FAILING

2. fall upon (physically embrace, throw oneself on someone) (3×) Falling upon someone's body in a physical embrace, expressing intense emotion – joy, grief, or affection. The prodigal son's father 'fell upon his neck' (Luke 15:20), Spanish 'echándose sobre' vividly conveying the bodily weight of reunion. Paul falls on Eutychus to restore him (Acts 20:10), and the Ephesian elders fall on Paul's neck weeping at farewell (Acts 20:37). The physical urgency distinguishes this from a calm greeting. FALLING AND FAILING

3. fall upon, rush at (in aggressive crowd action) (1×) Rushing at or pressing upon someone aggressively, in a crowd or mob context. In Mark 3:10, those with afflictions 'fell upon' Jesus to touch him, where Spanish 'abalanzarse' (to lunge, rush at) captures the pressing, almost violent quality of the crowd's desperation for healing. A single occurrence but a semantically distinct use from embrace or spiritual descent. FALLING AND FAILING to rebuke sharply, reprimand, strike with words

This verb means to strike or hit, but in most classical and New Testament usage it refers to striking with words—rebuking, reproving, or sharply correcting someone. In 1 Timothy 5:1, Paul instructs Timothy not to rebuke an older man harshly but to exhort him gently as a father. The physical sense of striking (as with a bow in Homer) gave way to the metaphorical sense of verbal chastisement. The multilingual evidence (Spanish reprendas, German zurechtweisen) captures both the sharpness and the corrective intent of such rebuke.

(1×) Paul's pastoral instruction in 1 Timothy 5:1 uses this verb to describe what Timothy should avoid: harsh, sharp rebuke of elders. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize the confrontational quality—Spanish reprendas suggests censure, German zurechtweisen implies setting someone straight. The classical background shows this evolved from physical striking to verbal punishment or correction, especially the kind of sharp words that might shame or wound the hearer. REPROOF AND REBUKE to choke, throttle, strangle; to suffocate or stifle

A vivid verb meaning to choke, strangle, or suffocate. Medical writers use it for a doctor administering bitter potions that make patients gag. Agricultural texts describe weeds choking grain crops. The passive voice means 'to be choked' or suffocated. In the Gospels it famously appears in the parable of the sower, where thorns choke the growing seed. The simple verb is less common than its compound form ἀποπνίγω, but both convey the same forceful image of breath being cut off.

ἐπιποθ-έω G1971 V-PPA-GMP (9×)
To long for intensely, yearn after, or desire earnestly; a deep, sustained emotional craving.
An intensified form of potheo (to desire), with the epi- prefix deepening the longing into an ache or yearning. Paul uses it repeatedly to express the pastoral heartache of separation from beloved churches — longing to see the Romans (Rom 1:11), groaning for the heavenly dwelling (2 Cor 5:2), yearning for the Philippians with the affection of Christ (Phil 1:8). Spanish 'anhelo' and German 'verlangen' both capture the gut-level intensity. This is not casual wishing but the deep pull of love across distance.

long for, yearn after, desire earnestly (9×) To long for someone or something with deep, sustained intensity; to yearn or ache with desire. The epi- prefix on potheo ('to desire') signals an intensification — this is longing that grips the whole person. Paul employs it for his pastoral yearning to see churches he loves (Rom 1:11; Phil 1:8; 2:26; 1 Thess 3:6), for the eschatological groaning to be clothed with the heavenly body (2 Cor 5:2), and for the earnest desire of believers toward one another (2 Cor 9:14). Spanish 'anhelo' ('I yearn') and German 'verlangen' ('to long for') both preserve the emotional depth. DESIRE AND COVETING longing, yearning, or earnest desire; deep affection and intense desire for someone or something

This noun expresses intense longing or yearning for someone or something. Paul uses it twice in 2 Corinthians 7, describing the Corinthian believers' earnest longing for him after receiving his severe letter. The Spanish 'anhelo' (longing, yearning) and French 'désir' (desire) both capture the emotional intensity. In verse 7, their 'longing' for Paul encouraged him. In verse 11, their godly sorrow produced earnest desire—a fervent longing to set things right. The word emphasizes strong affection and the pain of absence or unfulfilled desire.

(2×) Spanish 'anhelo' (yearning) and French 'désir' (desire) both convey strong emotional longing. In 2 Corinthians 7:7, Paul writes of the Corinthians' 'longing' for him—their affection and desire for his presence, which encouraged him greatly. In verse 11, their godly grief produced 'earnest desire'—a fervent longing to make things right, to restore relationship. The word appears in Paul's discussion of reconciliation after conflict, where absence and broken fellowship intensify the longing for restored communion. The noun's emotional intensity distinguishes it from simple wanting—it's the ache of affection separated from its object. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE longed for, desired, beloved

This adjective describes someone or something that is ardently desired or longed for—a beloved person or cherished object. Paul uses it in Philippians 4:1 to address the Philippian believers as his longed-for joy and crown, expressing deep affection and yearning. The word captures the intensity of desire that comes from separation or absence. The multilingual glosses (Spanish anhelados, English 'longed-for') consistently convey this sense of being the object of intense longing. Classically, it could also mean 'missed' or 'found wanting,' but the New Testament usage emphasizes the affectionate dimension.

(1×) Paul's tender address to the Philippians (4:1) as 'longed-for' expresses his deep emotional bond and desire to see them again. The cross-linguistic evidence emphasizes the affective quality: Spanish anhelados carries yearning, English 'longed-for' suggests persistent desire across distance. The domain assignment to Attitudes/Emotions reflects how this word functions to express the speaker's inner state of longing, making the object of that longing feel valued and beloved. DESIRE AND COVETING

longing, earnest desire
This noun denotes the state or experience of longing—an earnest, persistent desire for someone or something. In Romans 15:23, Paul speaks of his longing to visit the Roman Christians, a desire he has harbored for many years. It's closely related to the verb and adjective forms that express desire and yearning. The multilingual evidence shows slight variation: Spanish anhelo suggests deep yearning, French désir is more general desire, German Verlangen implies intense craving. This reflects the semantic range from simple wanting to passionate longing.

(1×) Paul's statement in Romans 15:23 about his long-held longing to visit Rome captures the sustained quality of this noun—not fleeting wish but persistent, years-long desire. The cross-linguistic glosses range from neutral 'desire' (French) to more emotionally charged 'longing' and 'yearning' (English, Spanish), suggesting translators wrestle with whether to emphasize the intensity or duration of Paul's wanting. The context supports the stronger reading: a deep, enduring desire finally being fulfilled. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to journey to, travel toward, come together

This verb describes traveling to a place or journeying toward a destination. In Luke 8:4, crowds are journeying to Jesus from various cities, coming together to hear him teach. Classical usage included both literal travel and metaphorical traversing (as of a thought running through the mind). The Septuagint used it for going before an assembly. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive variation: Spanish 'que-acudían' (who gathered), French venir (to come), suggesting translators understood this as crowds converging on Jesus rather than merely passing through.

(1×) Luke 8:4 describes crowds from various cities coming to Jesus, with this participle suggesting purposeful travel toward a destination. The cross-linguistic glosses reveal interpretive choices: does this emphasize the journey itself or the gathering that results? Spanish que-acudían focuses on the convergence, while the classical sense emphasized traversing or journeying. The narrative context supports both: people traveling from multiple cities and thus gathering into a large crowd. GOING AND LEADING to sew on, attach by sewing

This verb means to sew something onto something else—to attach or stitch a piece of fabric onto a garment. Jesus uses it in Mark 2:21 in his parable about not sewing a piece of unshrunk cloth onto an old garment, illustrating the incompatibility of old and new covenant forms. The image is practical and domestic: everyone in the ancient world understood that new cloth would shrink and tear away from old fabric. The multilingual glosses (Spanish cose, French coudre, German aufnähen) all capture the basic sewing action, with German specifically preserving the 'sew-on' sense.

(1×) Jesus' parable in Mark 2:21 uses the practical image of sewing a patch onto a garment to illustrate theological incompatibility between new wine and old wineskins, new covenant and old forms. The cross-linguistic evidence focuses on the basic sewing action, with German aufnähen specifically capturing the 'onto' dimension. The domain assignment to Association may reflect how this verse functions metaphorically to discuss the relationship between old and new religious practices. CLINGING AND JOINING

to throw or cast upon; to lay or place something on; to cast one's cares upon another
This verb means to throw or cast something upon, appearing in both literal and metaphorical contexts. In Luke 19:35, disciples throw their cloaks on the colt for Jesus to ride—a literal placing of garments. In 1 Peter 5:7, believers are exhorted to cast all their anxieties on God—a metaphorical transfer of burdens. The Spanish 'echando/habiendo echado' (throwing/having thrown) and French 'jeter sur' (to throw upon) preserve the throwing imagery. Both uses involve placing something on another, whether garments on an animal or cares on God who cares for us.

(2×) Spanish 'echando/habiendo echado' (throwing/having thrown) and French 'jeter sur' (to throw upon) maintain the vivid imagery of casting something onto another. In Luke 19:35, disciples 'threw' their outer garments on the colt and set Jesus on it—a literal act of placing cloaks on the animal's back as makeshift saddle. In 1 Peter 5:7, the command shifts to metaphor: 'cast all your anxiety on him, because he cares for you.' The same forceful verb describes transferring the weight of worry from our shoulders to God's. The participle form suggests decisive action: having thrown cares upon God, we leave them there. THROWING AND CASTING notable, remarkable, or distinguished; marked, conspicuous, or bearing a distinguishing sign

This adjective means notable, remarkable, or distinguished—standing out from the ordinary. In Matthew 27:16, Barabbas is called a 'notable prisoner'—famous or infamous, well-known to all. In Romans 16:7, Andronicus and Junia are 'prominent among the apostles'—outstanding or well-known in the apostolic circle. The Spanish 'destacados/notable' (outstanding/notable) and French 'remarquable' (remarkable) both convey distinction. Classical usage included coins bearing stamps or marks, soldiers with distinctive shields, and anything marked out as special. The biblical usage emphasizes public recognition or prominence.

(2×) Spanish 'destacados/notable' (outstanding/notable) and French 'remarquable' (remarkable) show this word means conspicuous or distinguished. In Matthew 27:16, Barabbas is a 'notable prisoner'—notorious, famous, someone everyone in Jerusalem knew about. The label underscores the shocking nature of the crowd's choice: they demanded the release of a famous criminal over Jesus. In Romans 16:7, Paul describes Andronicus and Junia as 'prominent among the apostles' (though some interpret 'prominent to the apostles')—either outstanding members of the apostolic circle or well-known to the apostles. Classical usage emphasized visible marks or signs that made something stand out, fitting both biblical uses where public recognition is key. GREATNESS AND DEGREE

provisions, food supplies for a journey
This noun refers to provisions or food supplies, especially those gathered for a journey or stored for future need. In Luke 9:12, the disciples suggest Jesus send the crowds away so they can find food and lodging in nearby villages—the word denotes the provisions needed to sustain the multitude. Classically, it could refer both to the act of foraging for supplies and to the stockpile itself. The multilingual evidence is remarkably consistent: provisions, provisiones, Proviant—showing universal recognition of this as travel rations or food stores.

(1×) In the feeding of the five thousand (Luke 9:12), the disciples' concern about provisions highlights the practical problem: where will this crowd get food? The cross-linguistic unanimity—all major languages render this as 'provisions' or 'food supplies'—reflects the concrete, material nature of the word. Classical usage encompassing both foraging and stores suggests this is about procuring sustenance, whether by gathering, purchasing, or storing ahead. FOOD AND NOURISHMENT

Visit with care or concern (God visiting his people, believers visiting the sick); select by inspection.

The Greek verb episkeptomai (related to episkopos, 'overseer') means to look upon someone with purposeful care. In most occurrences, God or humans visit those in need: God 'visited and redeemed his people' (Luke 1:68), the crowds recognize that 'God has visited his people' (Luke 7:16), and the Son of Man judges based on who visited the sick and imprisoned (Matt 25:36, 43). Spanish visitar, French visiter, and German besuchen all cluster around this pastoral sense. But in Acts 6:3 the word pivots to mean 'select' — the apostles tell the community to 'look over and choose' seven men for service, drawing on the root meaning of careful inspection that underlies both senses.

1. visit, look upon (with care or concern) (10×) To visit someone with gracious concern, care, or redemptive purpose — used both of God's salvific intervention and of human acts of mercy toward the suffering. This dominant sense (10 occurrences) is theologically loaded: Zechariah praises God who 'has visited and redeemed his people' (Luke 1:68), the rising dawn 'shall visit us from on high' (Luke 1:78), and the crowds at Nain glorify God saying 'He has visited his people' (Luke 7:16). On the human side, Jesus makes visiting the sick and imprisoned a criterion of final judgment (Matt 25:36, 43), and James calls visiting orphans and widows the essence of pure religion (James 1:27). Spanish visitar, French visiter, German besuchen, and Hindi all converge on care-oriented visitation vocabulary. The Hebrew Bible background of God 'visiting' (paqad) his people in both blessing and judgment enriches every NT use. APPOINTING AND VISITING

en: Has-visited, he-visited, let-us-visit | es: me-visitasteis, nos-visitará, visitar | fr: visiter | de: besuchen, besucht Matt 25:36; Matt 25:43; Luke 1:68; Luke 1:78; Luke 7:16

2. select, choose (by looking over) (1×) To look over carefully and select suitable persons for a task — choosing by inspection rather than visiting in compassion. Only 1 clear occurrence: Acts 6:3, where the apostles instruct the congregation to 'select from among you seven men of good reputation.' Spanish buscad ('seek out') and the underlying Greek epi-skep- ('look upon carefully') both highlight the inspection element. This sense preserves the etymological core of the verb — careful looking — but redirects it from pastoral care toward administrative discernment, connecting naturally to the cognate noun episkopos ('overseer'), one who looks over and manages. APPOINTING AND VISITING

to dwell upon, rest upon, overshadow

This verb combines the ideas of dwelling and overshadowing—to take up residence upon something or to rest upon it in a protective or empowering way. Paul uses it metaphorically in 2 Corinthians 12:9, where Christ's power will dwell upon or overshadow him. The classical sense involved being quartered in houses (military billets), but the New Testament usage is figurative: divine power taking up residence in weakness. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive spread: Spanish repose (rest), French habiter (dwell), German sich-niederlassen (settle down), all capturing the idea of abiding presence.

(1×) Paul's statement in 2 Corinthians 12:9 that Christ's power will 'dwell upon' him transforms military quartering language into a beautiful image of divine habitation. The cross-linguistic glosses reveal how translators navigate between spatial (dwell, settle) and relational (rest, repose) metaphors. The context of Paul's weakness suggests this is about power finding a home in vulnerability, making the tabernacle imagery particularly apt—God dwelling with his people. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

To overshadow, cast a shadow upon; used of divine presence enveloping or covering with power and protection.

Literally means to throw a shadow over something, but in the NT it carries profound theological weight. At the Transfiguration, the cloud of God's glory overshadows the disciples (Matt 17:5; Mark 9:7; Luke 9:34). Most strikingly, the angel tells Mary that the power of the Most High will 'overshadow' her (Luke 1:35), echoing the Shekinah glory hovering over the tabernacle. Even Peter's shadow healing the sick in Acts 5:15 draws on this imagery. Spanish 'cubrir de sombra' and French 'couvrir d'ombre' preserve the literal shadow metaphor while pointing to divine covering.

(5×) To overshadow, envelop with a shadow — especially of the divine presence covering, protecting, or manifesting power. The lexical entry notes both literal shading and the specialized theological sense of God's protective overshadowing. The Synoptic Transfiguration accounts (Matt 17:5; Mark 9:7; Luke 9:34) describe the cloud of glory overshadowing the disciples. In Luke 1:35 the term carries its most theologically charged usage: the Holy Spirit's power overshadowing Mary at the Incarnation. Spanish 'cubriendo/les hizo sombra' and French 'couvrir d'ombre' preserve the shadow imagery central to the word's force. COVERING AND CONCEALING to oversee, watch over, or care for; to look after or superintend; to pay careful attention to

This verb means to oversee, watch over, or give careful attention to something. In Hebrews 12:15, believers are urged to 'see to it' that no root of bitterness springs up—exercising vigilant oversight of the community. In 1 Peter 5:2, elders are called to shepherd God's flock, 'exercising oversight'—watching over and caring for believers. The Spanish 'supervisando/vigilando' (supervising/watching) and German 'achten auf' (to pay attention to, watch for) both emphasize careful oversight. Classical usage included gods watching over cities and rulers overseeing public affairs. The biblical use focuses on spiritual care and vigilance.

(2×) Spanish 'supervisando/vigilando' (supervising/watching over) and German 'achten auf' (pay attention to) capture the careful oversight this verb requires. In Hebrews 12:15, believers must 'watch carefully' lest any root of bitterness spring up to defile many—corporate vigilance against destructive attitudes. In 1 Peter 5:2, elders shepherd God's flock 'exercising oversight'—not lording over but genuinely caring for those under their watch. Classical usage included tutelary gods watching over cities and rulers overseeing civic affairs. The biblical contexts emphasize spiritual oversight: leaders caring for souls, communities watching for threats to fellowship. This is more than casual observation—it's attentive care that guards and protects. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

visitation (divine inspection or judgment); office of overseer, bishopric

Derived from episkopos ('overseer, bishop'), this noun carries two distinct senses in the NT. In Luke 19:44 and 1 Peter 2:12, it refers to God's 'visitation' — a moment of divine inspection that brings either judgment or mercy. In Acts 1:20 (quoting Psalm 109:8) and 1 Timothy 3:1, it denotes the office or position of an overseer in the early church. The dual meaning bridges the theological concept of God visiting his people and the practical reality of church leadership.

(4×) Divine visitation — God's act of coming near to inspect, judge, or show mercy. In Luke 19:44 Jesus weeps over Jerusalem because the city 'did not recognize the time of your visitation' (Spanish 'de-visitación,' French 'visitation'), signifying the moment of God's gracious arrival. First Peter 2:12 similarly anticipates a 'day of visitation' when outsiders will glorify God. The term evokes the Hebrew Bible pattern of God 'visiting' (paqad) his people for blessing or reckoning. APPOINTING AND VISITING

ἐπίσκοπ-ος G1985 N-AMS (5×)

Overseer, bishop, guardian; one who watches over and leads a community, applied to church leaders and to Christ.

Originally meaning 'one who watches over' or 'guardian,' this term was adopted by the early church for its leaders responsible for shepherding congregations. Paul addresses the overseers at Philippi (Phil 1:1), charges the Ephesian elders to guard their flock as overseers (Acts 20:28), and sets out qualifications for the office (1 Tim 3:2; Titus 1:7). Peter strikingly applies the title to Christ himself as 'the Overseer of your souls' (1 Pet 2:25). The Spanish 'obispo' — the direct ancestor of 'bishop' — reflects how this functional term became an ecclesiastical title.

(5×) Overseer, bishop, guardian — one charged with watching over and leading a group, especially a Christian congregation. The classical Greek sense of 'watcher, guardian' (applied even to gods) carries directly into the NT's ecclesial usage. Spanish 'obispo' and French 'évêque' both derive from this Greek word, showing its lasting institutional impact. In Acts 20:28 Paul equates this role with shepherding; 1 Tim 3:2 and Titus 1:7 specify moral and leadership qualifications. In 1 Pet 2:25, Christ is called the episkopos of believers' souls, anchoring the pastoral office in his own example. OVERSEER APPOINTED OFFICER to draw over, pull back, efface circumcision

This verb means to pull or draw something over something else. In 1 Corinthians 7:18, it has a specific medical and cultural meaning: to pull the foreskin forward to conceal the marks of circumcision, a practice called epispasm. Some Hellenized Jews underwent surgical procedures to reverse circumcision and appear uncircumcised in Greek gymnasia. Paul's point is that one should not seek to efface the physical signs of their covenant status. The multilingual evidence shows most translators grasp this specific meaning: Spanish 'se-haga-incircunciso,' though English 'let-him-become-uncircumcised' is more interpretive than literal.

(1×) Paul's instruction in 1 Corinthians 7:18 addresses a real first-century practice where circumcised men sought to reverse the procedure to avoid social stigma in Greco-Roman culture. The cross-linguistic glosses largely reflect the specific cultural practice rather than the literal meaning of the verb (draw over, pull). This shows how translators prioritize communicating the historical reality—surgical reversal of circumcision—over the base vocabulary, recognizing most modern readers won't know about epispasm without explanation. To know, be acquainted with; to understand or comprehend through experience or intellectual grasp.

A middle-voice verb expressing knowledge rooted in competence and familiarity rather than abstract cognition. Unlike ginosko (relational knowing) or oida (intuitive perception), epistamai carries overtones of skilled, experiential knowledge – the demon's chilling declaration 'Jesus I know (ginosko) and Paul I am acquainted with (epistamai)' in Acts 19:15 reveals its nuance of recognizing someone's proven power. It appears frequently in Acts for practical knowledge: Apollos knew the baptism of John (Acts 18:25), Cornelius knew Jewish customs (Acts 10:28), and craftsmen knew their trade was at risk (Acts 19:25). Spanish distinguishes its senses neatly: 'conoce/saben' for experiential acquaintance versus 'entienden' for comprehension.

1. know, be acquainted with (12×) To know or be acquainted with something or someone through experience, familiarity, or recognized competence. The evil spirit's 'Paul I know about' (epistamai, Acts 19:15) conveys recognition of proven authority rather than mere awareness. Used across Acts for practical, situational knowledge: Peter knows it is unlawful for a Jew to associate with Gentiles (Acts 10:28), Apollos knew only John's baptism (Acts 18:25), and silversmiths knew their livelihood depended on Artemis worship (Acts 19:25). Spanish 'conoce' and 'saben' consistently render this experiential-acquaintance dimension, while German 'verstehen' sometimes shades toward competence. KNOWING AND LEARNING

2. understand, comprehend (2×) To understand or comprehend the nature or significance of something, emphasizing intellectual grasp rather than experiential acquaintance. Jude 1:10 warns that people 'revile what they do not understand' (epistantai), pairing ignorance with instinctive corruption. Mark 14:68 captures Peter's panicked denial: 'I neither know nor understand what you are saying.' Spanish 'entienden/entiendo' and French 'comprennent' clearly distinguish this comprehension sense from the broader knowing of sense 1, highlighting the cognitive dimension of grasping meaning rather than merely being familiar with facts. Master, overseer, commander; a respectful address to one in authority, used exclusively in Luke as a title for Jesus.

A title of address meaning 'master' or 'overseer,' used exclusively in Luke's Gospel as a way disciples speak to Jesus. While Matthew and Mark use 'Rabbi' or 'Teacher' in parallel passages, Luke consistently chooses epistates, a term drawn from Greek civic life where it denoted an overseer, superintendent, or commander. Peter addresses Jesus this way when called to let down his nets (Luke 5:5), the disciples cry out to him during the storm (Luke 8:24), and Peter uses it at the Transfiguration (Luke 9:33). The multilingual glosses — Spanish 'Maestro,' French 'maitre,' German 'Meister' — all gravitate toward 'master' rather than 'teacher,' reflecting the word's emphasis on authority and oversight rather than instruction alone.

(7×) A title of respectful address meaning 'master' or 'overseer,' used exclusively in Luke's Gospel as a form of address to Jesus by his disciples. In classical Greek the word designated a superintendent, commander, or one set over others — a civic authority figure. Luke selects it where the other Synoptics have 'Rabbi' or 'Teacher,' thereby emphasizing Jesus' authority rather than merely his role as instructor. Peter uses it when protesting that they have fished all night without success (Luke 5:5); the terrified disciples cry 'Epistata!' during the storm at sea (Luke 8:24); and Peter addresses Jesus with it at the Transfiguration (Luke 9:33). The German 'Meister' and Spanish 'Maestro' both capture the tone of deference to a recognized authority. LORDS AND MASTERS

write to, send word; communicate by letter, especially official instructions

This verb means to send a message or write to someone, especially by letter. Classical usage includes sending news, giving orders, or enjoining commands in writing. In the New Testament it appears in contexts of official apostolic communication—the Jerusalem Council's letter to Gentile believers (Acts 15:20, 21:25) and the author of Hebrews describing his letter (Hebrews 13:22). The word carries a sense of authoritative written instruction.

(3×) The multilingual witnesses use writing and sending terminology: Spanish escribimos/escribirles ('we wrote, to write to them'), French écrire ('write'), German schreiben ('write'). Acts 15:20 contains the council's decision: 'we should write to them to abstain from...' Acts 21:25 references the same letter: 'we have sent a letter with our judgment.' Hebrews 13:22 describes the epistle itself: 'I have written to you briefly.' In each case, the verb indicates formal written communication conveying apostolic instruction to churches. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE understanding, knowledgeable, skilled, expert

This adjective describes someone who possesses knowledge and understanding—an expert, a skilled person, someone versed in a particular domain. In James 3:13, it appears in the question 'Who is wise and understanding among you?' paralleling wisdom with expertise or skill. Classical usage emphasized both theoretical knowledge and practical skill: being versed in seafaring, knowledgeable about a craft, or skilled in counsel. The multilingual evidence (Spanish entendido, German verständig) consistently emphasizes the intellectual dimension—understanding as mental capacity rather than mere information.

(1×) James 3:13 pairs this word with 'wise,' creating a hendiadys where understanding and wisdom work together. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize cognitive capacity: Spanish entendido suggests someone who 'gets it,' German verständig implies discerning judgment. Classical usage showed this was about being skilled or versed in something, combining knowledge with practical competence. James' context suggests this is about demonstrated wisdom—understanding proven through good conduct and gentleness. UNDERSTANDING AND INSIGHT to strengthen, establish firmly; to confirm or buttress (someone's faith)

A compound of epi ('upon') and sterizo ('to fix, establish'), this verb means to strengthen or confirm, and appears exclusively in Acts in the context of Paul's missionary journeys. After proclaiming the gospel, Paul and Barnabas return to newly planted churches 'strengthening the souls of the disciples' (Acts 14:22). Judas and Silas similarly 'strengthened' the believers in Antioch (15:32). The verb conveys not initial conversion but the crucial follow-up work of establishing believers firmly in their faith.

(4×) To strengthen or confirm believers in their faith, especially through return visits and encouragement. All NT occurrences cluster in Acts: Paul and Barnabas strengthening disciples' souls (14:22), Judas and Silas confirming the Antioch church (15:32), Paul strengthening congregations through Syria and Cilicia (15:41), and his systematic tour through Galatia and Phrygia 'strengthening all the disciples' (18:23). Spanish 'fortaleciendo/fortalecieron' and French 'confirmer' highlight both the fortifying and confirming dimensions. The participial forms suggest ongoing, sustained pastoral activity rather than a single dramatic intervention. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE letter, epistle — a written communication sent to recipients, especially the apostolic letters to churches

Epistole denotes a written letter or formal communication dispatched to one or more recipients, appearing 24 times in Acts and the Pauline and General Epistles. In Acts, the word covers a variety of official correspondence: the letters of authorization Saul carried from the high priest to arrest Christians in Damascus (Acts 9:2; 22:5), the Jerusalem Council's decree sent to Gentile believers (Acts 15:30), and the Roman commander Claudius Lysias's letter to Governor Felix (Acts 23:25, 33). In Paul's writings, epistole often refers to his own letters and their apostolic authority — he defends himself against charges that 'his letters are weighty and strong, but his bodily presence is weak' (2 Cor 10:9-11). Paul also deploys the word metaphorically: the Corinthian believers are 'a letter of Christ, written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God' (2 Cor 3:2-3). Peter acknowledges Paul's letters as containing 'some things hard to understand' (2 Pet 3:16). Spanish 'carta/epistola,' French 'epitre/lettre,' and German 'Brief' map the semantic field cleanly.

letter, epistle (24×) A written communication or dispatch sent to recipients, covering official documents, apostolic correspondence, and figurative usage. In Acts, it denotes letters of authorization (Acts 9:2; 22:5), conciliar decrees (Acts 15:30), and legal dispatches (Acts 23:25, 33). Paul uses it for his own apostolic letters, defending their weight and authority (2 Cor 10:9-11; 2 Thess 2:2, 15; 3:14, 17; Col 4:16), and metaphorically for the Corinthian church as 'a letter of Christ' inscribed by the Spirit (2 Cor 3:2-3). Peter references Paul's collected epistolai as recognized yet challenging scripture (2 Pet 3:16). Spanish 'carta/epistola,' French 'epitre,' German 'Brief' confirm a unified semantic range. LETTERS AND WRITINGS to silence, stop the mouth, muzzle

This verb literally means to put something over the mouth—to bridle, muzzle, or silence. In Titus 1:11, Paul says false teachers must be silenced, their mouths stopped. The classical usage included bridling horses and curbing enemies, but also the technical sense of a flute player putting on the mouthpiece. The metaphorical sense of silencing a speaker was well-established. The multilingual evidence strongly emphasizes the silencing function: Spanish 'tapar-la-boca' (shut the mouth), French and German similarly direct. This is forceful language about stopping destructive speech.

(1×) Paul's instruction in Titus 1:11 to silence false teachers uses vivid imagery from animal husbandry—these teachers need to be muzzled like dangerous animals or bridled like unruly horses. The cross-linguistic consistency (all languages emphasize mouth-stopping or silencing) reflects the force of Paul's directive. The classical background of bridling and curbing emphasizes control of something powerful and potentially harmful—speech that overturns whole households needs to be forcefully restrained. SILENCE AND SECRECY

To turn around, turn back, return; encompasses physical turning, spiritual repentance, and causing others to turn

Built from epi- (upon, back) and strepho (to turn), this verb carries the fundamental image of reversing direction. It moves fluidly between the physical and the spiritual: a woman turning around in a crowd to find who touched her (Mark 5:30), the Holy Family returning to Nazareth (Luke 2:39), and Peter calling Israel to repent and turn back to God (Acts 3:19). The causative use adds a prophetic dimension — Elijah will 'turn the hearts of fathers to children' (Luke 1:17, echoing Malachi 4:6). Spanish distinguishes neatly between 'volver' for physical return and 'convertir' for spiritual turning, illuminating the word's dual register.

1. return to a place (14×) Returning to a previous location — the concrete, spatial sense of going back to where one came from. Jesus instructs the Twelve that if a house is unworthy, their peace will 'return' to them (Matt 10:13). The Holy Family returns to Galilee after the temple visit (Luke 2:39), and Mark 13:16 warns that the one in the field must not turn back for his cloak. Spanish 'volviendo/habiendo vuelto' and German 'umkehren' both emphasize the physical reversal of travel. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

en: Having-returned, I-will-return, having-turned | es: Volviendo, habiendo-vuelto, os-habéis-vuelto | fr: retourner, se-tourner | de: kehrt-um, umkehren Matt 10:13; Matt 12:44; Matt 24:18; Mark 13:16; Luke 2:39

2. turn back spiritually, repent (9×) Spiritual turning or repentance — a metaphorical extension where the direction reversed is moral rather than spatial. Peter at Pentecost urges Israel to 'turn back' (Acts 3:19), and Paul describes the Thessalonians turning from idols to serve the living God (1 Thess 1:9). The parables of the sower invoke it as the turning that brings healing (Matt 13:15, quoting Isa 6:10). Spanish 'convertios' (convert yourselves) captures the reflexive, volitional quality of this repentance sense. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT
en: do-you-turn-back, it-turns, they-should-turn | es: convertíos, os-volvisteis, os-volvéis | fr: retourner, se-tourner | de: kehrt-um, umkehren Matt 13:15; Mark 4:12; Acts 3:19; Acts 14:15; Acts 15:19

3. turn around physically (7×) Physical turning of the body — not traveling back but rotating in place to face a different direction. When Jesus perceives power has gone from him, he 'turns around' in the crowd (Mark 5:30). Peter turns to look at the beloved disciple following behind (John 21:20). At Joppa, Peter turns toward Tabitha's body and speaks (Acts 9:40). The translations across languages consistently use reflexive turning verbs here, distinguishing this from the journey-return sense. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT
en: I-turned, having-turned, turning | es: Habiéndose-vuelto, habiéndome-vuelto, habiéndose-vuelto | fr: retourner, se-tourner | de: kehrt-um, umkehren Mark 5:30; Mark 8:33; John 21:20; Acts 9:40; Acts 16:18

4. cause someone to turn (6×) Causative turning — making someone else turn, whether physically redirecting them or bringing about their spiritual conversion. The angel tells Zechariah that John will 'turn many of the sons of Israel to the Lord' (Luke 1:16) and 'turn the hearts of fathers to children' (Luke 1:17). Paul's mission to the Gentiles is to 'turn them from darkness to light' (Acts 26:18). Spanish 'le hace volver' and 'para convertir' highlight the external agency in this sense. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

turning, conversion, repentance
This noun denotes a turning or wheeling about—a change of direction or orientation. In Acts 15:3, it describes the conversion of the Gentiles, their turning from idols to God. Classical Greek used this word for ships putting about, soldiers wheeling in formation, or rivers winding. The New Testament appropriates this spatial language for spiritual reorientation. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive choices: Spanish conversión and French conversion make the theological meaning explicit, while the Greek term itself is more neutral—simply a turning that context makes spiritual.

(1×) The report in Acts 15:3 about Gentile conversion uses physical turning language to describe spiritual transformation. The cross-linguistic glosses privilege the theological sense (conversion) over the literal (turning), showing how this word became a technical term for religious conversion in Christian usage. Classical usage of wheeling ships and winding rivers reminds us that repentance and conversion are fundamentally about changing direction—a spatial metaphor with profound spiritual implications. To gather together, assemble; to collect people from scattered places into one body (active and passive)
A compound verb (epi + syn + ago) conveying the purposeful bringing together of scattered individuals into a unified group. Jesus himself uses it in the poignant image of a mother hen gathering her brood under her wings (Matt 23:37; Luke 13:34), and it describes the eschatological ingathering when the Son of Man sends angels to gather the elect from the four winds (Matt 24:31; Mark 13:27). In the passive, it portrays crowds pressing together around Jesus (Mark 1:33) and nations assembled before the throne of judgment (Matt 25:32). Spanish 'reunir/reunirá' and French 'rassembler' both capture the reuniting impulse at the heart of this word.

1. gather together (active) (5×) Active forms meaning 'to gather together, collect, assemble' people or creatures from scattered locations into one place. The defining image is Jesus' lament over Jerusalem: 'how often I wanted to gather (episynagagein) your children, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings' (Matt 23:37; Luke 13:34). The eschatological use in Matt 24:31 and Mark 13:27 extends the image to cosmic scale – angels will 'gather together the elect from the four winds.' Spanish 'reunirá/reunirán' and English 'he will gather together' reflect the purposeful, sovereign quality of the action. GATHERING TOGETHER

2. be gathered together (passive) (3×) Passive forms meaning 'to be gathered, be assembled,' describing the resulting state when people converge into a crowd or assembly. Mark 1:33 pictures the whole city 'gathered together' (episynegmene) at Peter's door; Luke 12:1 narrates myriads 'having been gathered together' so densely they trampled one another; and Luke 17:37 uses an enigmatic proverb about vultures gathering where the body lies. Spanish 'habiéndose reunido' and 'reunida' preserve the reflexive-passive quality – the gathering happens to the crowd rather than being directed by a single agent. GATHERING TOGETHER a gathering together, assembling, or collecting; the act or event of being gathered into one place

This noun denotes a gathering or assembling together. In 2 Thessalonians 2:1, Paul refers to 'our being gathered together to him'—the eschatological assembly of believers with Christ at his return. In Hebrews 10:25, believers are warned not to neglect 'meeting together'—the regular gathering of the Christian assembly. The Spanish 'reunión' (meeting, gathering) and French 'assemblée' (assembly) both convey the collective gathering sense. The word emphasizes the act of coming together into one place, whether for worship now or the final gathering at Christ's return.

(2×) Spanish 'reunión' (meeting) and French 'assemblée' (assembly) both emphasize gathering into one place. In 2 Thessalonians 2:1, Paul discusses 'our being gathered together to him' (Christ)—the eschatological event when all believers will be assembled to the Lord at his coming. The gathering here is future and climactic. In Hebrews 10:25, the warning is against 'forsaking the assembling of ourselves together'—neglecting the regular gathering of believers for worship and mutual encouragement. The same noun describes both the weekly assembly and the ultimate assembly, connecting present community gathering with future consummation. Both involve believers coming together, whether in weekly worship or eternal reunion. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to run together, gather quickly, converge

This verb describes people running together to a place—converging quickly, often in response to some event or spectacle. In Mark 9:25, Jesus sees a crowd running together to where he is dealing with a demon-possessed boy. The prefix ἐπι- intensifies the basic 'run together' sense, suggesting urgent convergence. The multilingual evidence captures both the running and the gathering: Spanish 'se-reunía-corriendo' (gathered running), French accourir (rush toward),

German zusammenlaufen (run together). The image is of people hurrying from multiple directions to one point.

(1×) In Mark 9:25, the crowd's sudden convergence on Jesus creates urgency—he must act before the mob scene intensifies. The cross-linguistic glosses preserve both motion and gathering: some emphasize the running (French accourir), others the resulting assembly (Spanish reunía). The narrative context suggests this is about spectacle-seeking crowds rushing to witness the dramatic exorcism, with Jesus responding to the growing commotion by acting decisively. RUNNING AND RACING

a riotous gathering, uprising, or mob action; pressure or disturbance from crowds; insurrection

This noun describes riotous gatherings, mob action, or crowd disturbances. In Acts 24:12, Paul defends himself by saying he caused no disturbance or stirring up of crowds in the temple. In 2 Corinthians 11:28, Paul lists among his many trials the 'daily pressure' of concern for the churches (though some manuscripts read ἐπίστασις, 'attention'). The Spanish 'alboroto/presión' (disturbance/pressure) and French 'rassemblement' (gathering) capture both the mob violence sense and the pressure sense. Classical usage emphasized insurrections and hostile gatherings—crowds coming together for conflict.

(2×) Spanish 'alboroto/presión' (disturbance/pressure) shows two different interpretive traditions. In Acts 24:12, Paul insists he didn't cause any 'disturbance' (ἐπίστασιν) or stir up mobs in Jerusalem—no riotous gathering or crowd action. This fits the classical sense of hostile assemblies or insurrections. In 2 Corinthians 11:28, Paul mentions 'the daily pressure' of anxiety for all the churches, though textual variants and manuscripts differ between ἐπίστασις (pressure, care) and ἐπισύστασις. If ἐπισύστασις is original, it might metaphorically describe the pressing crowd of concerns that beset Paul daily. Both uses involve unwanted pressure: literal mob disturbance or figurative pressure of responsibilities. GATHERING TOGETHER dangerous, precarious, risky

This adjective describes something prone to fall, unstable, or dangerous—a precarious situation or hazardous condition. In Acts 27:9, sailing has become dangerous because the season is advancing toward winter storms. Classical usage applied this to anything unstable: precarious political positions, unreliable things, dangerous illnesses, dubious propositions. The multilingual evidence is remarkably uniform: dangerous, peligrosa, dangereux—showing universal recognition of risk and hazard. The medical usage for dangerous diseases suggests life-threatening conditions, which fits Paul's voyage narrative where lives are indeed at stake.

(1×) Luke's note in Acts 27:9 that sailing had become dangerous marks the transition from summer's safe sailing to autumn's treacherous Mediterranean storms. The cross-linguistic unanimity (all major languages: dangerous/perilous) reflects the concrete risk to life and cargo. Classical medical usage for dangerous diseases reminds us this isn't mere inconvenience but genuine threat—as the subsequent shipwreck narrative confirms, lives hang in the balance when seafaring becomes episphales. DISTRESS AND HARDSHIP to be urgent, insist, grow strong in advocacy

This verb means to grow strong or prevail, and by extension, to insist urgently or press a point forcefully. In Luke 23:5, Jesus' accusers are insisting, urgently pressing their charges before Pilate. The basic meaning involves increasing in strength or intensity, but in context it describes the crescendo of accusation—they keep insisting, growing more vehement. The multilingual evidence (Spanish insistían, French insister) captures the persistence and urgency of their advocacy. This is about relentless pressing of a case, not backing down.

(1×) The accusers' insistence before Pilate (Luke 23:5) escalates their charges—they grow more urgent and forceful in pressing their case against Jesus. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize persistence (Spanish insistían, French insister), capturing the relentless quality of their advocacy. The classical sense of 'growing strong' or 'prevailing' suggests this is about intensification—their accusations become more vehement, their voices more insistent, as they sense Pilate's reluctance to condemn. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to heap up, accumulate, pile on

This verb means to heap upon or pile up—to accumulate in large quantities. In 2 Timothy 4:3, Paul warns that people will heap up teachers for themselves according to their own desires, accumulating instructors who tell them what they want to hear. The image is of piling up or amassing a collection. Classical usage included literal heaping of objects and metaphorical accumulation of arguments or authorities. The multilingual evidence shows variation in how translators handle the metaphor: Spanish amontonarán preserves the heaping image, while the context makes clear this is about collecting multiple teachers.

(1×) Paul's warning in 2 Timothy 4:3 about heaping up teachers uses accumulation imagery to critique spiritual consumerism—gathering multiple voices until you find ones that scratch your ears. The cross-linguistic glosses mostly preserve the heaping/piling metaphor (Spanish amontonarán, German aufhäufen), though the object (teachers) makes this clearly figurative. The picture is of excess and indulgence: not content with sound teaching, people amass a collection of flattering instructors. HEAPS AND MOUNDS

A command or authoritative directive, especially a divine or apostolic injunction

The noun ἐπιταγή denotes a formal command or authoritative order, rooted in the verb ἐπιτάσσω ('to command upon'). In the New Testament it appears exclusively in Paul's letters and Titus, carrying the weight of divine or apostolic authority. Paul carefully distinguishes between what he says κατ᾽ ἐπιταγήν ('by command,' 1 Cor 7:6) and what he offers as personal counsel, revealing a finely calibrated sense of apostolic versus merely advisory speech. In Titus 2:15, the word shades into the broader notion of delegated authority itself.

1. command (6×) A directive or injunction issued with binding authority, particularly from God or an apostle. Paul uses this sense to mark the source of his apostleship ('by the command of God our Savior,' 1 Tim 1:1) and to qualify certain teachings as not originating from divine command (1 Cor 7:6, 7:25). The consistent rendering across languages — Spanish 'mandato,' French 'commandement,' German 'Befehl' — confirms the semantic core of authoritative directive. In Rom 16:26 the mystery of the gospel is made known κατ᾽ ἐπιταγὴν τοῦ αἰωνίου θεοῦ, grounding revelation itself in a divine command. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. authority (1×) The delegated right to command, shading from the act of commanding into the standing authority behind it. At Titus 2:15 Paul tells Titus to 'exhort and rebuke with all authority' (μετὰ πάσης ἐπιταγῆς), where the word denotes not a single command but the authoritative posture from which commands flow. Spanish 'autoridad' and English 'authority' capture this institutional, ongoing sense, distinguishing it from the specific-directive

ἐπιτάσσω G2004 V-AIA-3S (10×)

To command, order with authority — to impose a directive from a position of power over persons or spirits

The verb ἐπιτάσσω (epitasso), compounded from ἐπί ('upon') and τάσσω ('arrange, order'), means to command or give orders with recognized authority. In the Synoptic Gospels it characterizes Jesus's sovereign authority: the crowds marvel that he 'commands even the unclean spirits, and they obey' (Mark 1:27; Luke 4:36). It describes Herod ordering a soldier to bring John's head (Mark 6:27), Jesus commanding the crowd to recline (Mark 6:39), and the high priest ordering Paul to be struck (Acts 23:2). Paul claims the right to 'command' Philemon but chooses to appeal instead (Phlm 1:8). Arabic أَمَرَ, Hebrew מְצַוֶּה, Korean 명령하다, and Spanish 'mandar/ordenar' all reflect authoritative directive speech.

command, order (with authority) (10×) To command or order from a position of superior authority, imposing a directive upon subordinates, spirits, or natural forces. Jesus commands unclean spirits and they obey (Mark 1:27; Luke 4:36; Mark 9:25; Luke 8:31), commands wind and water (Luke 8:25), and directs crowds (Mark 6:39). Human authorities likewise use it: Herod commands the execution of John (Mark 6:27), the high priest orders Paul struck (Acts 23:2), and Paul asserts but declines the right to command Philemon (Phlm 1:8). The word always implies recognized power to enforce compliance. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

To complete, bring to fulfillment; to be accomplished or perfected (passive); to carry out sacred duties

An action verb of completion that moves from the workshop to the temple. Paul uses it of finishing the collection for Jerusalem (2 Cor 8:6, 11) and of God completing the good work he began in believers (Phil 1:6) – a promise that has encouraged countless saints. The passive appears in Gal 3:3, where Paul asks pointedly whether what the Spirit began can be 'completed' by the flesh. In cultic contexts (Heb 9:6), it describes priests performing their ritual duties. Spanish differentiates nicely between 'completar' for finishing a task and 'perfeccionando' for sacred refinement, while German uniformly uses 'vollenden,' capturing the word's consistent emphasis on bringing something to its intended end.

1. complete, bring to completion (6×) To bring a work, task, or divine purpose to completion; to finish what has been started. Used of completing the financial collection (2 Cor 8:6, 11), Paul's delivery of contributions to Jerusalem (Rom 15:28), and God's promise to finish the good work begun in believers (Phil 1:6). Spanish 'completar/completara' and German 'vollenden' both emphasize purposeful, active completion. The consistent presence of a prior beginning (ἐνάρχομαι in Phil 1:6) underlines the 'already started, now finishing' trajectory. FULFILL AND COMPLETE

2. be completed, be accomplished (passive) (2×) In passive or middle voice, to be brought to completion, to reach accomplishment, or to be perfected. Paul's rhetorical question in Gal 3:3 – 'having begun by the Spirit, are you now being completed by the flesh?' – uses the passive to challenge the Galatians' regression. In 1 Pet 5:9, sufferings are 'being accomplished' throughout the brotherhood. Spanish 'os perfeccionais' reveals the perfectionist nuance that the passive lends to the root idea of completion. 3. accomplish, carry out (religious duties) (2×) To perform or carry out religious rites, sacred duties, or acts of consecrated service. In Heb 9:6 priests enter the outer tabernacle 'performing' their ritual services; in 2 Cor 7:1 believers are exhorted to perfect holiness in the fear of God. Spanish splits between 'cumpliendo' (carrying out duties) and 'perfeccionando' (perfecting holiness), capturing the dual nuance of ritual execution and spiritual refinement that distinguishes this sense from ordinary task completion. necessary, suitable, needful, what is required

This adjective describes what is necessary, suitable, or needful—that which is required for a purpose or fits a situation. In James 2:16, it refers to the bodily necessities—food and clothing needed for daily survival. Classical usage emphasized fitness for purpose: a suitable place for cavalry exercises, a fit person to associate with, or things deserving certain treatment. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive choice: English 'necessary' emphasizes requirement, Spanish 'cosas-necesarias' makes the practical needs explicit. The word carries both senses: what is suitable and what is needful.

(1×) James 2:16 highlights the bitter irony of wishing someone well without providing necessities—the needful things like food and clothing that embodied love would supply. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize the required or necessary quality of these things: they're not luxuries but genuine needs. Classical usage of 'fit for purpose' reminds us that in this context, what's necessary is what's suitable to sustain life—the material provisions that demonstrate faith working through love. ἐπιτίθημι G2007 V-AIA-3P (39×)

To lay or place upon; by extension, to add, impose, or attack

Built from 'epi' (upon) and 'tithemi' (place), this verb's core image is physical placement – hands laid on the sick for healing (Matt 9:18; Mark 16:18) or on believers for the Spirit's bestowal (Acts 8:17). From this concrete gesture, the word extends to the imposition of burdens (Matt 23:4) and, in Revelation 22:18, to adding plagues upon those who tamper with prophecy. A sharper edge appears when robbers 'lay hands on' the traveler in Luke 10:30, and in Acts 18:10 where the Lord promises no one will 'attack' Paul. Spanish and French renderings ('imponer/imposer') preserve the Latin sense of placing-upon across all three uses.

1. lay/place upon (35×) The dominant physical sense: placing or laying something upon a person or object. The laying on of hands for healing (Matt 9:18; 19:13, 15), ordination (Acts 6:6; 13:3), and the Spirit (Acts 8:17; 19:6) forms the theological core. Burdens placed on shoulders (Matt 23:4) and a name bestowed (Mark 3:16) extend the image. Spanish 'imponer/poner' and German 'auflegen' mirror the straightforward placement. PLACING AND LAYING

2. add to, impose further (2×) An extended sense of adding or imposing something further onto what already exists. Revelation 22:18 uses it twice in the warning that God will 'add' plagues to anyone who adds to the book's words. Spanish 'anadir/anadira' and the shift from physical 'placing' to quantitative 'adding' mark a clear metaphorical extension from the core spatial meaning. ADDING AND CONTINUING en: adds, will-add | es: añada, añadirá | fr: imposer | de: auflegen Rev 22:18

3. inflict upon, attack (2×) An aggressive sense: to lay hands on someone violently, to assault or attack. In Luke 10:30, robbers 'set upon' the traveler, and in Acts 18:10 the Lord assures Paul that no one will 'attack' him. Spanish 'atacara' (will attack) and the hostile framing distinguish this clearly from the benevolent laying on of hands in sense 1. PLACING AND LAYING

To rebuke or censure sharply with authority; rarely to issue a stern warning or charge.
A word of authoritative force, ἐπιτιμάω describes the sharp reproof that Jesus directs at demons, diseases, storms, and wayward disciples alike. When Jesus rebukes the wind and sea (Matt 8:26) or silences unclean spirits (Mark 1:25), the verb conveys sovereign command over hostile powers. It also appears in human-to-human rebuke, as when Peter presumes to censure Jesus (Matt 16:22) or the crowd tries to silence blind Bartimaeus (Mark 10:48). Spanish "reprender" and French "réprimander" consistently convey sharp disapproval.

1. rebuke, censure sharply (28×) The primary sense (28x): to rebuke, censure, or reprove sharply, typically from a position of authority. Spanish "reprender" and German contextual renderings confirm the confrontational force. Jesus rebukes the storm (Matt 8:26), demons (Matt 17:18), and Peter himself (Mark 8:33). Disciples rebuke those bringing children (Matt 19:13), and crowds rebuke the blind men calling for mercy (Matt 20:31). The verb consistently carries the weight of authoritative disapproval. REBUKE CENSURE

2. sternly warn, charge (1×) A nuanced sense (1x at Matt 12:16): a stern warning or solemn charge, where the emphasis shifts from disapproval of past behavior to a directive about future action. After healing many, Jesus sternly warns them not to make him known. Spanish "les advirtió" (he warned them) and English "he warned" distinguish this from simple rebuke — here the force of the verb is channeled into commanding silence rather than censuring wrongdoing. REBUKE CENSURE punishment, penalty, discipline

This noun originally referred to full civic rights and privileges in Greek cities, but developed to mean punishment or penalty—particularly corrective discipline. In 2 Corinthians 2:6, Paul refers to the punishment imposed by the church majority on an offender, discipline meant to lead to restoration. The semantic development from 'honor' to 'punishment' likely reflects the idea of sanctions affecting one's civic standing. The multilingual evidence shows this range: Spanish represión (rebuke/censure), French punition, German Strafe (punishment). The Septuagint usage established 'penalty' as primary.

(1×) Paul's reference in 2 Corinthians 2:6 to church discipline employs this word for the corrective punishment the community imposed on the offender—sufficient penalty to prompt repentance. The cross-linguistic glosses range from formal punishment to corrective rebuke, reflecting the word's flexibility. The context suggests restorative rather than merely punitive discipline: the penalty is enough (sufficient), implying its purpose was correction leading to reconciliation, not permanent exclusion. LOCUSTS AND SWARMS to permit, allow, give leave — to grant authorization for someone to act or proceed Epitrepo means to permit or allow, granting someone leave to do what they request. Its 18 New Testament occurrences span a wide range of social and spiritual settings where authority is exercised through granting or withholding permission. Jesus permits the Gadarene demons to enter the swine herd (Matt 8:31; Mark 5:13; Luke 8:32) — a permission that simultaneously reveals his authority over unclean spirits. The would-be disciple asks 'permit me first to bury my father' (Matt 8:21; Luke 9:59, 61), and the cost of following Jesus is measured precisely by what he will and will not permit. Moses 'permitted' a certificate of divorce because of hardness of heart (Matt 19:8; Mark 10:4), and Jesus reframes that concession. Paul uses it for congregational order: women are 'not permitted to speak' in certain settings (1 Cor 14:34; 1 Tim 2:12). Pilate permits Joseph of Arimathea to take Jesus' body (John 19:38). Festus permits Paul to speak for himself (Acts 26:1; 27:3; 28:16). Spanish 'permitir,' French 'permettre,' and German 'erlauben' all map the single authorization sense directly.

permit, allow (18×) To grant permission or authorization for an action, whether by divine, civil, or social authority. Jesus permits demons to enter swine, demonstrating sovereign power over the unclean (Matt 8:31; Mark 5:13; Luke 8:32). The discipleship dialogues hinge on what Jesus permits before following him (Matt 8:21; Luke 9:59, 61). Moses' 'permitting' divorce becomes a foil for Jesus' higher standard (Matt 19:8; Mark 10:4). Paul deploys it for church governance and gender roles in worship (1 Cor 14:34; 16:7; 1 Tim 2:12). Roman officials permit burial (John 19:38) and self-defense speeches (Acts 26:1; 27:3; 28:16). The consistent thread is that someone with recognized authority authorizes another to proceed. French 'permettre' and German 'erlauben' confirm the single permission sense. LEAVING AND REMAINING commission, authority, full power to act

This noun denotes authority, commission, or full power to decide and act. In Acts 26:12, Paul speaks of traveling to Damascus with the authority and commission from the chief priests to arrest Christians. Classical usage emphasized reference to an arbiter, power to decide, or full powers granted for a mission. The Latin equivalent 'in fidem' (surrender absolutely) captures the comprehensive nature of this authority. The multilingual evidence shows range: commission, comisión, permission—all pointing to delegated authority to act on another's behalf.

(1×) Paul's testimony in Acts 26:12 about his commission from the chief priests emphasizes the official authority backing his persecution mission—he wasn't a rogue actor but an authorized agent with full powers. The cross-linguistic glosses (commission, comisión, permission) reflect the delegated nature of this authority: Paul carried the high priest's authorization, making him the official representative of temple authority in Damascus. The classical legal sense of 'full powers to decide' underscores the comprehensive nature of his warrant. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

steward, guardian, manager; one entrusted with oversight of affairs or persons
This noun designates someone to whom charge or stewardship is entrusted—a household manager, estate overseer, or guardian of minors. Classical usage includes executors, governors, and procurators. In the New Testament it appears in Jesus' parable about laborers and their foreman (Matthew 20:8), Joanna's connection to Herod's household (Luke 8:3), and Paul's description of guardians overseeing children until maturity (Galatians 4:2).

(3×) Translations use stewardship language: Spanish mayordomo/tutores ('steward, guardians'), French tuteur ('guardian'). Matthew 20:8 has the vineyard owner telling 'his foreman' to pay the workers. Luke 8:3 identifies Joanna as wife of 'Chuza, Herod's household manager,' showing the term's use for estate administrators. Galatians 4:2 describes the child who remains 'under guardians and managers until the date set by his father,' illustrating legal oversight of minors and their property. To obtain, attain, reach; to succeed in gaining what one seeks or has been promised.

Carries the basic sense of hitting a mark or successfully reaching a goal, extended to mean obtaining or attaining something desired. Paul uses it pointedly in Romans 11:7 to describe Israel's paradox: the nation did not obtain what it sought, but the elect obtained it. The author of Hebrews celebrates Abraham, who by patience 'obtained the promise' (Heb 6:15), and the heroes of faith who 'obtained promises' (Heb 11:33). James warns that coveting without asking God leads to not obtaining (Jas 4:2). Spanish 'alcanzar/obtener' nicely captures both the striving and the successful attainment.

(5×) To obtain, attain, succeed in gaining — to reach or acquire what was sought or promised. The classical sense of 'hitting the mark' underlies the metaphorical usage of successfully reaching a goal. Spanish 'alcanzar' (to reach/attain) and 'obtener' (to obtain), along with German 'erlangen,' all converge on the sense of successful acquisition. In Rom 11:7 it appears twice in contrast — Israel failed to obtain, but the elect did. Heb 6:15 celebrates Abraham's patient attainment of the promise; Heb 11:33 lists obtaining promises among the achievements of faith. Jas 4:2 uses the negative to expose the futility of selfish desire. FINDING AND DISCOVERING to appear, become visible; to shine forth (of light or divine grace)

From epi ('upon') and phaino ('to shine, appear'), this verb means to come into view or shine forth, and in the NT it spans both physical and theological manifestation. In Luke 1:79 Zechariah prophesies that the Messiah will 'shine upon' those sitting in darkness. In Acts 27:20 neither sun nor stars 'appeared' during the storm. Most strikingly, Titus 2:11 and 3:4 proclaim that God's grace and kindness have 'appeared' to all humanity — a term that gave rise to the theological concept of 'epiphany.'

(4×) To appear, become visible, or shine forth — encompassing both physical visibility and divine manifestation. Luke 1:79 uses it of messianic light shining on those in darkness ('to shine/brillar'). Acts 27:20 describes the physical absence of celestial bodies during a storm ('neither sun nor stars appeared/apareció'). In Titus 2:11 and 3:4 the verb takes on its richest theological weight: the grace and kindness of God 'appeared' (Spanish 'apareció,' French 'apparaître') to humanity, the very usage that underlies the Christian term 'Epiphany.' The passive forms emphasize that this manifestation originates from God, breaking into human experience from beyond. APPEAR SEEM SHINE

Appearing, manifestation; a visible display of divine presence, used of Christ's first and second advent.

A noun denoting a striking, visible manifestation — originally used in Hellenistic Greek for the dramatic appearance of a deity or a royal visitation. In the NT, it belongs exclusively to the Pastoral Epistles and 2 Thessalonians, where it frames both Christ's incarnation and his anticipated return in glory. Paul speaks of the grace 'now revealed through the appearing of our Savior' (2 Tim 1:10) and also of 'his appearing and his kingdom' still to come (2 Tim 4:1). The German 'Erscheinung' captures both the visibility and the grandeur; the Spanish 'manifestacion' emphasizes the unveiling of what was hidden.

appearing, manifestation (6×) The visible, glorious manifestation or appearing of Christ, encompassing both his first advent (incarnation) and his expected return. In 2 Tim 1:10 it refers backward to the historical appearing that abolished death, while in 2 Thess 2:8, 1 Tim 6:14, and 2 Tim 4:1, 8 it looks forward to a future appearing in power. The German 'Erscheinung' conveys the visible splendor, while Spanish 'aparicion' and 'manifestacion' together capture both the sudden visibility and the revelatory character of Christ being made manifest to the world. glorious, notable, distinguished, manifest

This adjective describes what is conspicuous, notable, or distinguished—what comes to light and commands attention. In Acts 2:20, Peter quotes Joel about the sun turning dark before 'the great and glorious day of the Lord.' Classical usage ranged from gods appearing to aid mortals, to prominent terrain features, to distinguished persons of rank. The word carries both visibility (manifest, evident) and quality (glorious, notable). The multilingual evidence shows interpretive variation: English 'glorious' emphasizes splendor, Spanish manifiesto emphasizes visibility, French remarquable stresses notability.

(1×) Peter's Pentecost sermon (Acts 2:20) cites Joel's prophecy about the Lord's day being 'great and glorious'—epiphanēs suggesting both the day's manifestation and its splendor. The cross-linguistic variation (glorious vs. manifest vs. remarkable) reflects the word's dual semantic load: something that appears dramatically and proves magnificent. The classical usage for divine epiphanies—gods appearing to help mortals—enriches the eschatological context: God's day will be both unmistakable and awesome. MANIFEST AND EVIDENT to shine upon, illuminate, give light

This verb means to shine upon or give light to something. In Ephesians 5:14, Paul quotes what may be an early Christian hymn: 'Awake, sleeper, and arise from the dead, and Christ will shine on you.' The image is of light dawning on those who emerge from darkness. The Septuagint used this for the sun shining out, and the passive form suggests light breaking forth. The multilingual evidence is consistent: shine upon, illuminate, give light—all emphasizing the source of illumination acting upon a recipient.

(1×) The hymnic fragment in Ephesians 5:14 promises that Christ will shine upon those who wake from spiritual death—light flooding the one who rises from darkness. The cross-linguistic unanimity (all languages: shine/illuminate/enlighten) reflects the straightforward photological metaphor. The passive form suggests light actively reaching out to illumine the recipient: Christ as sun dawning on the sleeper, not merely available light but light that shines forth to dispel darkness and wake the dead. to bring upon, inflict, or impose; to bring or carry something to someone; to bring additional evidence or argument

This verb means to bring or lay something upon, often with the sense of inflicting or imposing. In Romans 3:5, Paul discusses whether God's wrath is unjust when he 'inflicts wrath' upon unrighteous humanity—bringing judgment upon sin. In Jude 1:9, Michael the archangel wouldn't 'bring a slanderous judgment' against Satan —wouldn't pronounce or impose a reviling accusation. The Spanish 'que inflige/traer' (inflicting/to bring) and French 'ajouter/porter' (to add/to bring) show both the imposing and bringing senses. Classical usage included bringing war upon enemies, inflicting punishment, and adducing additional arguments.

(2×) Spanish 'que inflige/traer' (inflicting/to bring) and French 'porter/ajouter' (to bring/to add) reveal the verb's range from neutral bringing to hostile inflicting. In Romans 3:5, Paul asks rhetorically if God is unrighteous when he 'inflicts wrath'—brings judgment upon human unrighteousness. The verb emphasizes God's active imposition of just judgment. In Jude 1:9, Michael the archangel 'did not bring' a reviling accusation against the devil—refused to pronounce or impose slanderous judgment. Classical usage included bringing war upon enemies and inflicting penalties. Both biblical uses involve bringing something weighty: divine wrath or verbal judgment. The verb's force suggests active imposition, not mere delivery. BEARING AND CARRYING to shout, cry out, exclaim loudly in response or against someone

In the New Testament, this verb captures the raw energy of a crowd raising its voice—whether in acclamation or hostile protest. At Jesus' trial the people kept shouting for crucifixion (Luke 23:21), while in Acts the crowd of Caesarea hailed Herod with divine honors (Acts 12:22). The Spanish 'aclamaba/gritaban' and French 'crier contre' both highlight the public, declamatory force of the word, which often carries an emotional charge beyond ordinary speech.

(4×) To shout loudly in a public setting, especially as a crowd responding to a speaker or event. Used of hostile cries demanding crucifixion (Luke 23:21), acclamatory shouting praising Herod as divine (Acts 12:22), and confused mob outcries where officials cannot discern the charge (Acts 21:34, 22:24). The Spanish split between 'aclamaba' (acclaiming) and 'gritaban' (shouting against) reflects the word's capacity for both positive and negative vocal outbursts. CALLING AND NAMING to dawn, grow light, or shine forth; to begin to grow toward daylight; to approach or draw near (of time)

This verb describes the dawning or approach of daylight, used in contexts marking the transition from night to day. In Matthew 28:1, it describes the time 'as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week' when women came to the tomb. In Luke 23:54, it marks the Sabbath 'drawing near' or beginning—the time approaching when work must cease. The Spanish 'amanecer/amanecía' (to dawn/was dawning) and French 'poindre' (to dawn, break) both capture the dawn imagery. The word can describe literal daybreak or the temporal approach of significant times.

(2×) Spanish 'amanecer/amanecía' (to dawn/was dawning) and French 'poindre' (to dawn) both emphasize the breaking of light. In Matthew 28:1, the women came to the tomb 'as it began to dawn' (ἐπιφωσκούσῃ) toward the first day of the week—the early morning light when they would discover the empty tomb. In Luke 23:54, it was Preparation Day 'and the Sabbath was dawning' (ἐπέφωσκεν)—the Sabbath approaching or beginning (though Sabbath begins at sunset, this may refer idiomatically to its arrival). Both uses mark crucial temporal transitions: resurrection morning and Sabbath's arrival after Jesus' burial. The verb's core meaning of light growing toward fullness aptly describes time approaching its appointed hour. DAWN AND TWILIGHT attempt, undertake; put one's hand to an endeavor

This verb means to put one's hand to a task, to attempt or undertake something. The classical usage emphasizes beginning work, making an attempt, or endeavoring to accomplish something. In the New Testament it appears in contexts of beginning significant undertakings—Luke's careful composition of his Gospel (Luke 1:1), opponents trying to argue with Stephen (Acts 9:29), and Jewish exorcists attempting to use Jesus' name (Acts 19:13).

(3×) The translation evidence shows undertaking language: Spanish Intentaron/emprendieron ('they attempted, they undertook'), French entreprendre ('undertake'). Luke 1:1 begins the Gospel: 'many have undertaken to compile a narrative,' establishing Luke's careful historical method. Acts 9:29 describes opponents in Jerusalem who 'attempted' to kill Saul after his conversion. Acts 19:13 tells of 'some itinerant Jewish exorcists' who 'undertook to invoke the name of the Lord Jesus' over the demon-possessed. Each use involves beginning an endeavor, whether literary, violent, or spiritual. TESTING AND TEMPTATION to pour on, pour out upon

This verb means to pour something over or upon something else—to pour out liquid onto a surface or object. In Luke 10:34, the Good Samaritan pours oil and wine on the wounded man's injuries, a standard ancient medical treatment. Classical usage included both liquids (water, wine) and metaphorical pouring (pouring sleep upon someone, pouring laments over the dead). The prefix ἐπι- emphasizes the 'upon' dimension—this isn't just pouring but pouring onto something specific. The multilingual evidence is direct: pouring on, verser sur, echando (pouring).

(1×) The Good Samaritan's action in Luke 10:34 of pouring oil and wine on the victim's wounds demonstrates practical medical care—olive oil soothed and wine disinfected. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize the motion and direction: pouring-on, verser-sur, all capturing the application of liquid to wounds. The classical background of metaphorical pouring (sleep, laments) reminds us how versatile this verb was, but here the sense is concrete: therapeutic liquids applied directly to injuries. THROWING AND CASTING

To supply, furnish, provide generously; used of God's provision and believers' active cultivation of virtues.

Originally a term from civic life — a choregus was someone who generously funded a chorus — this verb carries overtones of lavish, abundant provision. Paul uses it of God supplying seed to the sower and multiplying the harvest (2 Cor 9:10), and of the Spirit being supplied through faith (Gal 3:5). In Colossians 2:19, Christ the Head supplies nourishment to the whole body. Peter employs it memorably to urge believers to 'supplement' their faith with virtue, knowledge, and love (2 Pet 1:5), with the promise that entrance to the eternal kingdom will be 'richly supplied' to them (2 Pet 1:11).

(5×) To supply, furnish, provide abundantly — to give generously or add to what already exists. The word's background in civic patronage (funding a chorus) colors it with overtones of liberal generosity. Spanish 'proveer/suplir' and French 'pourvoir' capture the provision aspect. In 2 Cor 9:10 God is the supplier of seed and bread; in Gal 3:5 the Spirit is supplied through faith's hearing. Col 2:19 uses it of Christ nourishing the body. In 2 Pet 1:5 believers are to add virtues upon their faith in a chain of moral development, and in 2 Pet 1:11 the reward is an abundantly supplied entrance into Christ's kingdom. GIVING AND BESTOWING supply, provision, or support; abundant provision that enables growth or function

This noun denotes supply, provision, or the act of furnishing what's needed. In Ephesians 4:16, Paul describes the body of Christ growing as each part contributes its share through 'every supporting ligament'—each joint or connection supplying what the body needs. In Philippians 1:19, Paul expects his trials to result in deliverance 'through your prayers and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ'—the Spirit's abundant provision sustaining him. The Spanish 'provisión/suministro' (provision/supply) captures the furnishing sense. Classical usage included supplying choruses for dramatic festivals (the root meaning), but extended to any generous provision of resources.

(2×) Spanish 'provisión/suministro' (provision/supply) and German 'Darreichung' (furnishing, provision) show this word is about providing what's needed. In Ephesians 4:16, Paul describes Christ's body growing 'by what every joint supplies' (διὰ πάσης ἁφῆς τῆς ἐπιχορηγίας)—every connection or ligament providing support and nourishment so the whole body functions. In Philippians 1:19, Paul trusts his situation will turn to deliverance through 'the supply of the Spirit'—the Spirit's generous provision of grace, power, and sustenance. Classical Greek used this for financing dramatic choruses (a wealthy patron's supply), but the metaphor extended to any abundant provision. Both biblical uses emphasize resources generously given to sustain and enable life and growth. HELP AND ASSISTANCE to anoint, smear, or spread on; to apply ointment or a substance to something

This verb means to anoint or smear something on, to apply ointment or another substance to a surface. In John 9, it appears twice describing Jesus anointing the blind man's eyes with mud. He made clay from saliva and dirt, 'anointed' or spread it on the man's eyes, then sent him to wash. The Spanish 'ungió' (anointed) and French 'enduire' (to coat, smear) both capture the application of substance to surface. Classical usage included plastering walls or applying medical ointments. The biblical context uses this physical anointing as the means of miraculous healing.

(2×) Spanish 'ungió' (anointed) and French 'enduire' (to coat, smear on) show this is about applying a substance to a surface. Both occurrences appear in John 9:6, 11, where Jesus heals a man born blind by making mud with saliva and 'anointing' his eyes with it—smearing or spreading the clay on his eyes. After washing in Siloam, the man received sight. The verb emphasizes the physical act of application: not ceremonial anointing with oil, but therapeutic spreading of a medicinal (or faith-activating) substance. Classical medical writers used this word for applying plasters and ointments. The domain assignment to Religious Activities may reflect the miracle's theological significance, though the verb itself is quite physical and medical. ANOINTING AND SMEARING

To build upon a foundation; to erect or edify upon something already laid, used metaphorically for spiritual growth.

A construction metaphor meaning to build upon a foundation already in place. Every New Testament occurrence is figurative: Paul warns the Corinthians that while he laid the foundation of Christ, each builder must take care how they build upon it — with gold, silver, and precious stones or with wood, hay, and straw (1 Cor 3:10–14). Ephesians 2:20 declares that believers are 'built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the cornerstone.' Colossians 2:7 speaks of being 'rooted and built up in him.' The Spanish 'edificar encima' and French 'batir sur' both preserve the layered image: this is not building from scratch but constructing upward on what God has already established.

build upon, build up on a foundation (7×) To build upon an existing foundation — used exclusively in metaphorical and spiritual contexts in the NT to describe the work of edification on the groundwork that God or his apostles have already laid. Paul's extended building metaphor in 1 Corinthians 3:10–14 is the locus classicus: he laid the foundation and others build upon it, but the quality of each person's work will be tested by fire. Ephesians 2:20 presents the church as built upon the apostles and prophets with Christ as the cornerstone. Colossians 2:7 urges believers to be 'built up in him.' The Spanish 'edificar encima' and German 'aufbauen' both capture the upward, layered quality of the construction — growth upon a sure and already-given base. BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTING to run aground, run ashore, be shipwrecked

This maritime verb describes running a ship aground or being wrecked on shore—driving the vessel onto land or shoal. In Acts 27:41, Paul's ship runs aground on a sandbar off Malta, stuck between two seas. Classical usage included deliberately beaching ships and accidental wrecking. The verb captures the violent impact of ship meeting land. The multilingual evidence preserves the nautical context: ran aground, hicieron encallar (made run aground), échouer (run aground). This is technical maritime vocabulary for the moment hull strikes bottom.

(1×) The climax of Paul's sea voyage (Acts 27:41) comes when the ship strikes a reef or sandbar, running violently aground. The cross-linguistic glosses maintain nautical precision: all languages use maritime terms for grounding or beaching. The context describes the bow sticking fast while the stern breaks up under wave action —classic description of a ship caught between forces, unable to float free. Classical usage for both deliberate beaching and accidental wrecking encompasses both planned and catastrophic groundings. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP to be called, bear a name, take a title

This verb means to give a name to something, call something by a name, or apply a designation. In Romans 2:17, Paul addresses those who 'call themselves Jews' or 'bear the name Jew'—who take that identity title. Classical usage involved applying words as names to things or calling people by specific names or titles. The middle voice emphasizes self-designation or identification. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive choice: are-called, te-llamas (you call yourself), appeler (to call)—all circling the act of naming or designation, with various emphases on who does the naming.

(1×) Paul's address in Romans 2:17 to those who 'call themselves Jews' or 'bear the name Jew' raises questions of authentic versus nominal identity. The cross-linguistic glosses wrestle with agency: does this emphasize self-designation (you call yourself) or recognized identity (are called)? The context suggests Paul is questioning whether the name matches the reality—calling yourself a Jew matters little if you violate the law. Classical usage of applying names to things shows this is about designation, whether self-applied or socially recognized. CALLING AND NAMING

to look at, observe, or witness; to watch closely or behold; to become an eyewitness or initiate (at mysteries)

This verb means to look at, observe closely, or witness something. In 1 Peter it appears twice, both times as a participle describing eyewitness observation of believers' conduct. In 2:12, Peter urges good conduct among Gentiles so that they may 'observe' believers' good works and glorify God. In 3:2, husbands who don't believe may be won 'when they observe' their wives' pure and reverent conduct. The Spanish 'observando/habiendo observado' (observing/having observed) emphasizes careful watching. Classical usage included becoming an initiate at mystery religions—one who has seen the sacred rites. Biblical usage focuses on eyewitness observation of transformed lives.

(2×) Spanish 'observando/habiendo observado' (observing/having observed) and German 'beobachten' (to observe) both emphasize careful watching. In 1 Peter 2:12, believers maintain good conduct among pagans so that 'observing your good works' (ἐποπτεύοντες), they may glorify God when he visits. In 3:2, unbelieving husbands may be won without words 'when they observe' (ἐποπτεύσαντες) the pure and reverent behavior of their wives. Both uses involve careful, sustained observation—watching conduct over time until the evidence becomes undeniable. Classical usage included watching over cities (of gods) and being initiated into mystery religions (becoming an ἐπόπτης, one who has seen the sacred rites). Peter democratizes this eyewitness language: pagans become witnesses of Christian transformation through daily observation. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

ἐπόπτ-ης G2030 N-NMP (1×)

eyewitness, one who has seen personally

This noun denotes someone who has seen with their own eyes—an eyewitness or personal observer. In 2 Peter 1:16, the apostles claim to be eyewitnesses of Christ's majesty at the Transfiguration, not following cleverly devised myths. Classical usage included overseers and watchers (especially gods observing human affairs) and those initiated into the highest grade of mystery religions. The New Testament appropriates this language of privileged seeing for apostolic witness. The multilingual evidence is consistent: eyewitnesses, testigos oculares (eye witnesses), Augenzeuge—all emphasizing direct visual testimony.

(1×) Peter's claim in 2 Peter 1:16 to eyewitness status grounds apostolic authority in direct experience—they saw Christ's glory with their own eyes on the holy mountain. The cross-linguistic unanimity (all languages: eyewitness) reflects the forensic and testimonial force of this word: these aren't second-hand reports but firsthand visual evidence. The classical background in mystery religions, where epoptai were fully initiated viewers of sacred rites, enriches the sense: the apostles were admitted to behold divine glory directly. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

word, saying, expression

This noun means word, utterance, or saying—especially in the sense of a brief expression or turn of phrase. In Hebrews 7:9, the author uses the expression 'so to speak' or 'if I may say so'—ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν, a classical idiom meaning 'in a word' or 'to put it briefly.' Classical usage ranged from sung words and promises to oracles and proverbial sayings. Homer used it for speech accompanied by music. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive approaches: word, palabra, parole—all recognizing this as a unit of speech, though context determines whether it's ordinary speech or formal utterance.

(1×) The phrase in Hebrews 7:9 employs this word in a fixed idiom—ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν, 'so to speak' or 'one might even say'—introducing a bold claim about Levi paying tithes through Abraham. The cross-linguistic glosses (word, palabra) capture the basic lexical meaning, though translators recognize the phrase functions idiomatically. Classical usage for oracles, promises, and songs shows this word often carried weight beyond mere information—it was utterance that accomplished things or conveyed sacred truth. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐπουράνιος G2032 Adj-ANP (19×)

Heavenly, celestial — belonging to or characteristic of heaven, in contrast to what is earthly.

An adjective marking persons, places, or realities as belonging to the heavenly realm rather than the earthly. Paul employs it as a structuring contrast in 1 Corinthians 15:40–49, distinguishing heavenly bodies from earthly ones and the heavenly Adam from the earthly. Ephesians uses the substantivized plural 'the heavenlies' (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις) as a distinctive spatial concept — the spiritual realm where believers are seated with Christ yet where cosmic powers also operate (Eph 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12). Hebrews applies it to the heavenly calling (3:1), the heavenly gift (6:4), and the heavenly sanctuary that the earthly tabernacle merely copies (8:5). Spanish 'celestial' and German 'himmlisch' consistently mirror the single Greek adjective.

heavenly, of heaven, celestial (19×) Pertaining to heaven or the celestial realm, used both attributively and substantively. Paul contrasts heavenly and earthly bodies in resurrection theology (1 Cor 15:40, 48–49). Ephesians develops 'the heavenlies' (τὰ ἐπουράνια) as a multi-layered spiritual domain — the seat of Christ's authority, the believers' position, and the arena of spiritual warfare (Eph 1:3, 20; 2:6; 6:12). Hebrews applies it to the heavenly sanctuary of which the earthly tabernacle was a copy (Heb 8:5; 9:23). Spanish 'celestial' and German 'himmlisch' render it uniformly. HEAVEN AND SKY

ἑπτά G2033 Adj-DFP (88×)

Seven; the cardinal numeral, frequently carrying symbolic significance in biblical usage

Hepta is the indeclinable Greek numeral seven, appearing 88 times in the New Testament with both literal and symbolic force. Jesus feeds the four thousand with seven loaves (Matt 15:36), and seven baskets remain (Matt 15:37). The number pervades Revelation — seven churches, seven seals, seven trumpets, seven bowls — where it consistently signals divine completeness. Even in the command to forgive seventy-seven times (Matt 18:22), seven carries a sense of unlimited fullness. All major translations render it with straightforward numeral equivalents: 'siete,' 'sept,' 'sieben.'

seven (88×) The cardinal number seven, used across the New Testament for literal counting and as a symbol of divine completeness and totality. It appears in miracle narratives such as the seven loaves (Matt 15:36) and dominates Revelation's literary structure with seven churches, seals, trumpets, and bowls. The consistent cross-linguistic rendering — Spanish 'siete,' French 'sept,' German 'sieben' — confirms a single unified numerical sense across all 88 occurrences. NUMBER SEVEN

seven times, sevenfold

A straightforward numerical adverb meaning 'seven times,' yet in Jesus' teaching it carries theological weight far beyond arithmetic. When Peter asks whether forgiving seven times is enough (Matt 18:21), Jesus responds with a multiplication that shatters any legalistic counting. In Luke 17:4 the same term appears twice in a single verse, underscoring the radical completeness of forgiveness. Every major translation tradition renders it with the transparent numeral—Spanish 'siete veces,' French 'sept fois'—confirming its univocal meaning.

(4×) Seven times, used as a numerical adverb expressing repetition. In Matthew 18:21-22 Peter proposes forgiving 'seven times' as generous, only for Jesus to expand it to seventy-seven (or seventy times seven), transforming the adverb into a symbol of limitless grace. Luke 17:4 uses it twice to depict a brother sinning and repenting seven times in a single day. The cross-linguistic uniformity (Spanish 'siete veces,' French 'sept fois') confirms this is a single, transparent sense. TIMES AND OCCASIONS

seven thousand

This numerical adjective means seven thousand. In Romans 11:4, Paul quotes God's response to Elijah: 'I have kept for myself seven thousand men who have not bowed the knee to Baal.' The number represents God's faithful remnant in Israel during Elijah's time, and Paul applies this remnant theology to his own day. The multilingual evidence is completely uniform: all languages render this directly as 'seven thousand,' showing numbers typically transfer without semantic shift across languages. The significance lies not in the word itself but in what the specific number represents theologically.

(1×) God's declaration of seven thousand faithful Israelites (Romans 11:4, citing 1 Kings 19) provides theological reassurance to Elijah that he's not alone—there's a substantial remnant. The cross-linguistic unanimity reflects how numbers function in translation: seven thousand is seven thousand in every language. The theological freight comes from the number's role in remnant theology: a minority, yes, but not insignificant—enough to preserve God's purposes through unfaithful times. THOUSANDS AND MYRIADS

say, said; aorist form of the verb 'to say'

This is the common aorist (simple past) form meaning 'said' or 'spoke.' While the present tense uses λέγω and the future ἐρῶ, this aorist εἶπον is the standard narrative form for reporting speech. It appears countless times in the Gospels and Acts to introduce direct discourse. The three specific occurrences here are all in Acts 8-9, recording key moments in the early church's expansion.

(3×) Across all languages this is rendered as simple past speech: 'said' in English, dijo in Spanish, dire in French, sprach in German. Acts 8:37 (in manuscripts that include it) has the Ethiopian eunuch's confession after Philip's explanation. Acts 9:5 records the risen Jesus' question to Saul on the Damascus road: 'he said, Who are you, Lord?' These uses show the standard narrative function of introducing spoken words, the most common way biblical Greek reports what someone said. SAYING AND COMMANDING

ἐραστ-ός G2037 N-AMS (3×)

Erastus; personal name of several Christians mentioned by Paul

Erastus (meaning 'beloved') is a personal name that appears three times, possibly referring to two or three different individuals in Paul's circle. One Erastus is sent with Timothy into Macedonia (Acts 19:22), another is identified as Corinth's city treasurer (Romans 16:23), and a third remained in Corinth when Paul wrote to Timothy (2 Timothy 4:20). The city treasurer reference suggests this was a person of some civic standing.

(3×) The name appears uniformly across translations: Erastos, Erastus. Acts 19:22 mentions Paul sending 'Timothy and Erastus' to Macedonia as ministry assistants. Romans 16:23 includes greetings from 'Erastus, the city treasurer,' marking him as a believer with civic responsibility. 2 Timothy 4:20 notes 'Erastus remained at Corinth.' Whether these refer to one, two, or three men is debated, but the name marks faithful co-workers in Paul's missionary network. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

ἐργάζομαι G2038 V-PNM/P (41×)

To work, labor, perform, or produce; the middle-voice verb for engaging in productive activity, doing deeds, and bringing about results.

The verb ergazomai is the New Testament's primary term for human labor and productive action. Jesus invokes it when sending workers into the vineyard (Matt 21:28), when defending his Sabbath healing by declaring 'my Father is working until now, and I am working' (John 5:17), and when redirecting human effort toward imperishable food (John 6:27). The Spanish obrar and German arbeiten both reflect the word's core sense of purposeful exertion. What gives ergazomai its theological depth is the ease with which it shifts from physical toil to moral conduct — the same verb describes a farmer tilling soil and a sinner committing lawlessness (Matt 7:23). Paul and James harness this flexibility to debate whether faith 'works' righteousness or wrath (Rom 4:15; Jas 1:20).

1. work, labor, toil (27×) The foundational sense of engaging in work, labor, or toil, often for livelihood or as productive activity. In John 5:17 Jesus grounds human work in divine activity: 'My Father is working until now, and I am working.' Luke 13:14 shows the synagogue ruler insisting people should work on six days but not the Sabbath. The Spanish trabajar/obrar and German arbeiten uniformly render this as purposeful exertion. John 6:27's command to 'work for the food that endures' elevates daily labor into a spiritual metaphor while retaining the concrete sense of effort. WORK AND LABOR

en: I-work, to-work, was-working | es: obrando, obrar, obras | fr: travailler | de: arbeiten, arbeitet Matt 21:28; Luke 13:14; John 5:17; John 6:27

2. do, perform, commit deeds (10×) To do, perform, or commit deeds, typically with moral or ethical weight. In Matthew 7:23 Jesus dismisses those who 'work lawlessness,' and in Acts 10:35 the one who 'works righteousness' is accepted by God. The Spanish obrar and hizo capture the performative quality — this is not neutral labor but morally consequential action. Romans 2:10 promises glory to everyone who 'works good,' showing how the same verb that describes vineyard toil in the parables now measures ethical conduct. Mark 14:6 uses it for the 'good work' the woman performed in anointing Jesus. WORK AND LABOR

en: let-us-work, she-did, worked | es: hizo, obra, obrando | fr: travailler | de: arbeiten, arbeitet Matt 7:23; Matt 26:10; Mark 14:6; Acts 10:35; Rom 2:10

3. produce, bring about (2×) To produce, bring about, or cause a result, where the emphasis falls on the effect generated rather than the effort expended. In 2 Corinthians 7:10 godly sorrow 'produces' repentance leading to salvation, and in James 1:20 human anger does not 'produce' the righteousness of God. The Spanish produce and the shift from arbeiten to a causative nuance in context confirm this as a distinct semantic development. The agent recedes; the outcome comes to the fore. WORK AND LABOR

en: produces | es: produce | fr: travailler | de: arbeiten 2Cor 7:10; Jas 1:20

4. (1×) To work with, invest, or trade, as in the parable of the talents (Matt 25:16) where the servant who received five talents 'worked with them' and gained five more. The Spanish trabajó and German arbeitet here carry the commercial sense of putting capital to productive use. This extends the basic labor sense into the domain of economic enterprise and investment, a natural metaphorical step from physical toil to financial activity. WORK AND LABOR

en: worked | es: trabajó | fr: travailler | de: arbeitet Matt 25:16

5. (1×) To be worked or wrought, appearing in the passive or perfect passive participle to describe deeds as 'having been performed' in a particular manner. In John 3:21 the one who does the truth comes to the light so that his deeds may be revealed as 'having been worked in God.' The Spanish obradas and the passive construction show that the focus shifts from the doer to the character and origin of the deed itself — these works bear the mark of divine enabling. WORK AND LABOR

ἐργᾰσ-ία G2039 N-GFS (6×)

Work, business, trade, profit; productive labor or effort directed toward gain or a practical end.

Ergasia covers the full spectrum from physical labor to commercial enterprise and the profit it yields. In Acts, the word appears in vivid economic contexts: a slave girl's divination brought her owners much ergasia ('profit,' Acts 16:16, 19), and Demetrius the silversmith rallied fellow craftsmen by warning that their ergasia ('business/trade,' Acts 19:24-25) was under threat. Luke 12:58 uses it for the effort one should exert to settle a dispute on the way to court. Paul employs it in Ephesians 4:19 for the 'working' or 'practice' of impurity, where Spanish renders it 'práctica'—highlighting the word's extension from economic labor to moral activity.

1. (3×) Profit or gain derived from a commercial enterprise. In Acts 16:16 and 16:19 the word denotes the revenue a slave girl's divination generated for her owners, and in Acts 19:24 it refers to the considerable income Demetrius's silver shrine trade produced. English and Spanish glosses ('profit,' 'ganancia') confirm the emphasis on financial return rather than the labor itself. GAIN AND GREED

en: business, profit | es: ganancia | fr: travail | de: ἐργασίαν, ἐργασίας Acts 16:16; Acts 16:19; Acts 19:24

2. (1×) The active practice or working of something, extended from physical craft to moral conduct. In Ephesians 4:19, Paul describes Gentiles who have given themselves over to the ergasia of impurity—Spanish 'práctica' and English 'working' both capture this sense of deliberate, sustained engagement in an activity rather than a single act. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15304 WITH 4 SENSES

en: working | es: práctica | fr: travail | de: ἐργασίαν Eph 4:19

3. (1×) Effort or diligence applied toward achieving a specific outcome. Luke 12:58 urges the listener to 'give effort' (dos ergasian, echoing the Latin da operam) to be released from an adversary on the way to the magistrate. The focus falls on earnest exertion rather than on trade or profit. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15304 WITH 4 SENSES

4. (1×) A trade, business, or craft viewed as an ongoing occupation. In Acts 19:25, Demetrius gathers those whose livelihood depends on the same line of work. Spanish 'negocio' and English 'business' highlight the occupational rather than strictly monetary dimension, distinguishing this from sense 1's focus on profit. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 15304 WITH 4 SENSES

ἐργάτ-ης G2040 N-AMS (16×)

worker, laborer — one who performs work, whether in a field, a trade, or the ministry of the gospel

Ergates designates a person who works — a laborer, craftsman, or practitioner. Jesus uses it in his urgent appeal for harvest workers: 'the harvest is plentiful but the laborers are few' (Matt 9:37-38; Luke 10:2), and affirms that 'the worker deserves his wages' (Luke 10:7; 1 Tim 5:18). Paul exhorts Timothy to be 'a worker who has no need to be ashamed' (2 Tim 2:15) and warns against 'deceitful workers' who disguise themselves as apostles of Christ (2 Cor 11:13; Phil 3:2). The term can also appear negatively: 'workers of iniquity' (Luke 13:27). Spanish 'obrero,' French 'ouvrier,' and German equivalents all reflect the core sense of one who labors, whether honorably or not.

worker, laborer (16×) A person who performs labor, used across the NT for agricultural workers in harvest imagery (Matt 9:37-38; 20:1-8; Luke 10:2), gospel ministers and missionaries (2 Cor 11:13; 2 Tim 2:15; Phil 3:2), and generic practitioners of either good or evil deeds (Luke 13:27 'workers of iniquity'; Acts 19:25 craftsmen). Jesus' declaration that 'the worker is worthy of his wages' (Matt 10:10; Luke 10:7) became a foundational principle for supporting those who serve the church, quoted by Paul in 1 Timothy 5:18. LABOR AND TOIL

ἔργον G2041 N-ANP (174×)

Work, deed, or action; what one does or produces, whether moral conduct, labor, or an enterprise undertaken.

A broad term for what a person does or accomplishes. In the New Testament it carries heavy theological weight — Paul's 'works of the law' (Rom 2:7), James's insistence that faith shows itself through 'works' (Jas 1:25), and John's portrayal of Jesus pointing to his 'works' as evidence of divine authority (John 5:36). Spanish consistently renders it obras and German Werke, both preserving the same breadth from moral deeds to practical labor. A small cluster of occurrences shifts from moral evaluation to the idea of a task or undertaking — productive effort rather than ethical conduct.

1. deed or action (170×) A deed, act, or piece of conduct viewed especially in its moral or spiritual dimension. This is the dominant New Testament usage, covering 'works of the law,' 'good works,' and 'evil deeds.' Translations across languages converge on a single broad term (eng works, spa obras, fra œuvre, deu Werke), reflecting how central this concept is to Pauline and Johannine theology. John 3:19-21 presents the sharpest contrast: those whose works are evil avoid the light, while those who practice truth come to it. Jesus appeals to his works as testimony in John 5:36. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: works | es: obras | fr: œuvre | de: Werke John 3:19; John 3:20; John 3:21; John 5:36

2. work or task (4×) A task, enterprise, or labor undertaken — the sense of productive work rather than moral evaluation. In Rom 2:7 'patient continuance in well-doing' shifts toward effort and perseverance; Phil 1:22 speaks of 'fruitful labor' as an ongoing enterprise. The multilingual glosses sometimes add a prepositional frame (spa de-obra, eng of-work), hinting at the instrumental or material nuance. Jas 1:25 bridges both senses: the 'work' that blesses is both task and moral deed. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐρεθίζω G2042 V-AIA-3S (2×)

to rouse to anger, provoke, or irritate; to stimulate, excite, or challenge to action

This verb means to provoke, irritate, or rouse to action—both positive and negative. In 2 Corinthians 9:2, Paul says the Macedonians' zeal 'stirred up' or stimulated the Achaians to generous giving—positive provocation to good works. In Colossians 3:21, fathers are warned not to 'provoke' or irritate their children, lest they become discouraged—negative provocation that damages. The Spanish 'estimuló/provoquéis' (stimulated/provoke) captures both positive stirring and negative irritation. Classical usage included rousing warriors to fight and provoking quarrels. The biblical uses show provocation can inspire virtue or incite frustration, depending on how it's applied.

(2×) Spanish 'estimuló/provoquéis' (stimulated/provoke) perfectly captures this verb's dual edge: it can inspire or irritate. In 2 Corinthians 9:2, Paul tells the Corinthians that their readiness 'stirred up' (ἠρέθισεν) most of the Macedonians to action—their enthusiasm provoked others to generous giving, a positive contagion. In Colossians 3:21, fathers must not 'provoke' (ἐρεθίζετε) their children through harsh or unreasonable treatment, lest they lose heart—negative provocation that discourages. Classical usage included lions rousing themselves to fight and men challenging each other to boxing matches. The verb's semantic range spans from helpful stimulation to harmful irritation, depending on motive and method. STIR UP INCITE

ἐρείδω G2043 V-APA-NFS (1×)

to stick fast, fix firmly, run aground

This verb means to fix firmly, cause to lean against, or prop up—and by extension, to stick fast or become immovably lodged. In Acts 27:41, the ship's bow sticks fast on the reef, held immobile while the stern breaks apart. Classical usage included propping things against supports, piling bodies against each other, and things becoming wedged or fixed. The perfect passive forms emphasize the resulting state: firmly stuck, immovably lodged. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive approaches to this nautical disaster: stuck fast, clavado (nailed/stuck), founded (grounded)—all capturing immobility.

(1×) The dramatic moment in Acts 27:41 when the ship's bow sticks fast on the sandbar creates the conditions for destruction—immobile bow, waves smashing the stern. The cross-linguistic glosses navigate between general fixity (stuck) and nautical specifics (grounded), with Spanish clavado (nailed/stuck) vividly capturing the ship impaled on the reef. Classical usage of propping and piling suggests forceful lodging, which fits the violent impact of ship meeting reef, bow driven so firmly into sand or rock that it cannot move. STANDING AND ESTABLISHING ἐρεύγομαι G2044 V-FIM-1S (1×)

to utter, declare, proclaim

This verb originally meant to bellow or roar—the sound cattle make or the ocean's roar. It developed to mean uttering or declaring things loudly and forcefully. In Matthew 13:35, quoting Psalm 78:2, it describes proclaiming or uttering things hidden since the foundation of the world. The Septuagint used it for the sea's roaring and powerful speech. The multilingual evidence shows theological interpretation: utter, proclaim, declare—all suggesting authoritative speech rather than mere saying. The classical sense of deep-throated roaring enriches the image of proclamation that breaks long silence.

(1×) Matthew 13:35 cites the psalmist's promise to utter hidden things—parables revealing long-concealed mysteries. The cross-linguistic glosses privilege declarative or proclamatory senses (proclaim, declare) over the original 'bellow/roar,' showing how the Septuagint and New Testament spiritualized this word. The classical image of ocean roaring or cattle bellowing to the full depth of their voices suggests this utterance has power and resonance—not whispered secrets but proclaimed mysteries that fill the air. SAYING AND COMMANDING

ἐρευν-άω G2045 V-PPA-NMP (6×)

To search, examine, or investigate thoroughly; probing inquiry into hidden or profound matters.

Conveys a deep, probing search — not a casual glance but a thorough investigation into something hidden or complex. Jesus tells the Jewish leaders to 'search the Scriptures' (John 5:39), and Paul declares that the Spirit 'searches all things, even the deep things of God' (1 Cor 2:10). The Spanish 'escudrina' carries the forensic tone of scrutinizing closely, while the German 'erforschen' evokes systematic research. Whether applied to the human study of Scripture, the Spirit's penetration of divine depths, or the prophets' inquiry into the timing of salvation (1 Pet 1:11), the word always implies painstaking, purposeful examination.

search, examine, investigate (6×) To search out, examine thoroughly, or investigate with care — implying deep, probing inquiry rather than surface scanning. Used of the Spirit searching even the depths of God (1 Cor 2:10), of God who searches human hearts (Rom 8:27), of believers examining the Scriptures (John 5:39), and of the prophets carefully investigating the salvation they foretold (1 Pet 1:11). The Spanish 'escudrinais' and French 'sonder' both emphasize the penetrating, forensic quality of this searching, while German 'erforschen' conveys systematic, scholarly investigation. JUDICIAL EXAMINATION

ἐρῶ G2046 V-FIA-1S (98×)

To say, speak, or tell; used actively of declaring something and passively in prophetic fulfillment formulas ('what was spoken').

A versatile verb of speech encompassing both active declaration and passive citation. In its active voice, it covers the full range of saying, telling, and speaking — Jesus' direct commands, parables, and promises all employ this word. Its passive forms are especially prominent in Matthew's prophetic fulfillment formulas ('that which was spoken through the prophet'), where the emphasis shifts from the speaker to the authoritative utterance itself. The Spanish 'diga/dirá' and German 'sagen/spricht' capture this same everyday-yet-weighty quality of speech.

1. to say, speak, tell (66×) The primary active sense: to say, speak, or tell something to someone. This covers every active-voice occurrence — declarations, commands, predictions, and dialogues. In Matt 21:3 Jesus instructs the disciples to say 'The Lord needs them,' and in Matt 7:22 it appears in eschatological declaration. The breadth of inflected forms (future, perfect, aorist) shows this was the workhorse verb of spoken communication. SAYING AND COMMANDING

2. that which was spoken (31×) The passive sense used in prophetic fulfillment and quotation formulas: 'that which was spoken' or 'it was said.' Heavily concentrated in Matthew (1:22; 2:15, 17, 23; 3:3), this usage frames Old Testament prophecy as divinely delivered speech now finding its target. The passive construction elevates the utterance itself — it is not merely someone's words but an authoritative declaration now being fulfilled. French 'dire' and German 'spricht' both preserve the root speech sense even in these formulaic contexts. SAYING AND COMMANDING

3. (1×) A single occurrence in John 15:15 where Jesus says 'I have called you friends,' using this verb in a performative, status-conferring declaration rather than simple reporting. The multilingual evidence — English 'I-have-called,' Spanish 'he-llamado' — highlights the naming or designating force, making this a speech-act of relational transformation rather than mere information transfer. SAYING AND COMMANDING

wilderness, desert, desolate uninhabited region

Denoting a lonely, uninhabited expanse, this noun evokes both physical hardship and spiritual testing. When Jesus feeds the multitudes, the disciples protest that the eremia offers no food (Matt 15:33; Mark 8:4). Paul lists wilderness perils alongside bandits and sea dangers (2 Cor 11:26), and Hebrews 11:38 memorializes the faithful who wandered in deserts. The Spanish 'desierto' and French 'désert' map directly, while the Greek carries overtones of abandonment and desolation absent from the more neutral English 'wilderness.'

(4×) A desolate, uninhabited region—wilderness or desert terrain far from human settlement and provision. The feeding narratives (Matt 15:33; Mark 8:4) stress the impossibility of finding bread in such emptiness. Paul catalogs it among mortal dangers faced during missionary travel (2 Cor 11:26), and Hebrews 11:38 honors the persecuted faithful who were driven into deserts and mountains. Spanish 'desierto' and French 'désert' both preserve the geographic and emotional barrenness the Greek implies. VENGEANCE AND RETRIBUTION

Wilderness, desert; desolate or uninhabited place; forsaken, left desolate (prophetic)

In the Gospels and Acts, eremos most often functions as a noun meaning 'the wilderness' – that stark geographic region where Israel wandered, John the Baptist preached, and Jesus faced temptation (Matt 3:1; 4:1). As an adjective it describes remote, lonely places where Jesus withdrew to pray or where crowds gathered far from towns (Mark 1:35; 6:31). A third, prophetically charged use appears when Jesus declares 'your house is left desolate' (Matt 23:38), and Paul quotes Isaiah on the 'desolate' barren woman who will rejoice (Gal 4:27). Spanish distinguishes desierto (geographic) from desolada (prophetic abandonment).

1. wilderness (noun, geographic place) (36×) The substantival use where eremos stands alone as a proper geographic designation: 'the wilderness.' This is the desert of Israel's forty years, the Jordan wilderness of John's baptism (Matt 3:1-3), and the place of Jesus' testing (Matt 4:1). With 36 occurrences it dominates New Testament usage. All major translation traditions render it with a single dedicated noun – desierto, desert, Wueste. VENGEANCE AND RETRIBUTION

en: wilderness | es: desierto | fr: désert | de: Wueste, Wüste Matt 3:1; Matt 3:3; Matt 4:1; Matt 11:7; Matt 24:26

2. desolate / deserted place (9×) The adjectival sense describing a place as deserted, remote, or uninhabited. Jesus 'withdrew to a desolate place' (Matt 14:13); the disciples note 'this is a deserted place' (Mark 6:31). The focus is not geographic identity but the quality of emptiness and solitude. French and German use the same word (desert/Wueste), but context and syntax distinguish this from the noun usage. VENGEANCE AND RETRIBUTION

en: Desolate, a-deserted, a-desolate | es: Desierto, desierto, desiertos | fr: désert | de: Wueste, Wüste Matt 14:13; Matt 14:15; Mark 1:35; Mark 1:45; Mark 6:31

3. desolate / forsaken (prophetic, metaphorical) (3×) A metaphorical and prophetic sense of abandonment or desolation. Jesus' pronouncement over Jerusalem – 'your house is left to you desolate' (Matt 23:38) – evokes judgment. Paul cites Isaiah's promise that 'the desolate woman has more children' (Gal 4:27), and Peter applies Psalm 69 to Judas' forsaken habitation (Acts 1:20). Spanish desolada and desierta mark this emotional-prophetic register distinctly. VENGEANCE AND RETRIBUTION

To lay waste, make desolate, bring to ruin; used of kingdoms, cities, and commercial empires destroyed by judgment.

Describes the devastating reduction of something populated or prosperous to emptiness and ruin. Jesus warns that a kingdom or household divided against itself is 'brought to desolation' (Matt 12:25; Luke 11:17), a principle with both political and spiritual force. In Revelation, the word takes on apocalyptic intensity: the beast and its allies lay waste to Babylon the Great (Rev 17:16), and merchants and shipmasters lament as her vast wealth is made desolate 'in one hour' (Rev 18:17, 19). Spanish 'desolada/devastado' and French 'dévaster' preserve the word's violent finality.

(5×) To lay waste, make desolate, bring to ruin — to reduce a place, structure, or institution from a state of flourishing to emptiness and devastation. Spanish 'desolada/asolado/devastado' and French 'dévaster' all point to catastrophic destruction. Jesus applies it proverbially to internal division destroying any kingdom or household (Matt 12:25; Luke 11:17). In Revelation it describes divine judgment on Babylon: the beast devours and burns her (Rev 17:16), and her commercial splendor is annihilated in a single hour (Rev 18:17, 19), prompting cosmic lamentation. desolation, devastation; the act or state of being made utterly waste

This noun describes the act of making something desolate or the resulting state of devastation and abandonment. It appears exclusively in the Synoptic apocalyptic discourse, referring to Daniel's 'abomination of desolation'—a prophetic symbol of desecration and judgment. The term evokes utter ruin, whether of the Jerusalem temple in AD 70 or eschatological tribulation. It carries overtones of divine judgment resulting in complete devastation.

(3×) Every translation uses desolation language: Spanish desolación, French désolation. All three occurrences cite Daniel's 'abomination of desolation': Matthew 24:15 warns 'when you see the abomination of desolation spoken of by the prophet Daniel,' Mark 13:14 contains the same warning with added emphasis ('let the reader understand'), and Luke 21:20 interprets it as 'when you see Jerusalem surrounded by armies, then know that its desolation has come near.' The term points to catastrophic judgment and the desecration of what was holy. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY to strive, quarrel, contend

This verb means to strive, quarrel, or contend—to engage in dispute or rivalry. In Matthew 12:19, quoting Isaiah 42:2, it describes what the Servant will not do: 'He will not strive or cry out.' The classical usage ranged from athletic competition to verbal dispute to military conflict. The Septuagint employed it for legal striving and contention. The multilingual evidence is consistent: strive, contend, quarrel—all emphasizing disputation or conflict. The context in Matthew emphasizes what the Servant avoids: contentious arguing, public disputation, the noise of controversy.

(1×) Isaiah's prophecy (cited in Matthew 12:19) that the Servant will not strive or quarrel describes his ministry style—gentle and uncontentious rather than combative. The cross-linguistic consistency (strive, contend, quarrel) shows universal recognition of this as conflict or dispute. Classical usage spanning athletic contests, verbal arguments, and warfare reminds us how broad this word's range was, but Matthew's context clearly emphasizes public controversy —the Servant won't engage in loud, contentious disputation with opponents. Selfish ambition or factional rivalry; self-seeking partisanship that fractures community for personal gain.

Derived from a root meaning 'labor for hire,' eritheia came to denote the mercenary canvassing of political office-seekers and eventually any self-promoting factionalism. Paul pairs it repeatedly with jealousy (zēlos) as twin destroyers of fellowship. In Philippians 2:3 it stands as the precise opposite of the humble, other-regarding mind of Christ. The multilingual renderings—Spanish ambición egoísta, German Eigennutz ('self-interest')—capture the core idea: gain pursued at the community's expense.

selfish ambition, rivalry (7×) Selfish ambition, factional rivalry, or partisan self-seeking. Originally denoting mercenary labor-for-wages, the word shifted to political canvassing and then to any disposition that advances oneself through party strife. Paul lists it among works of the flesh (Gal 5:20) and warns against it in Philippians 1:17 and 2:3. Spanish ambiciones egoístas and German Eigennutz both highlight the self-interested core. In Romans 2:8 it describes those who obey unrighteousness rather than truth—ambition turned against God. PRIDE AND ARROGANCE wool; the soft, curly hair of sheep used for making cloth and garments

This noun simply means wool, the fiber from sheep. In Hebrews 9:19, Moses sprinkled the scroll and people with blood using scarlet wool and hyssop—ritual implements for purification. In Revelation 1:14, the glorified Christ's head and hair are described as 'white like white wool'—brilliant, pure whiteness. The multilingual evidence is uniform: Spanish 'lana', French and German 'Wolle'—all meaning wool. Classical usage described wool in various contexts: greasy unwashed wool, dyed wool, wool for weaving. The biblical uses are metaphorical (Revelation's whiteness) or ritual (Hebrews' purification rite).

(2×) The multilingual glosses are perfectly consistent: Spanish 'lana', French 'Wolle', German 'Wolle'—all simply mean wool. In Hebrews 9:19, Moses took blood with water, scarlet wool, and hyssop to sprinkle the book and people—the wool serving as an applicator in ritual purification, echoing Old Testament cleansing rites. In Revelation 1:14, John sees the glorified Christ: 'his head and hair were white like white wool' (ὡς ἔριον λευκόν)—brilliant, pure whiteness suggesting wisdom, purity, and divine glory. Daniel 7:9 similarly describes the Ancient of Days with hair like pure wool. The imagery emphasizes radiant whiteness, not the wool itself. Both uses are either ritual or symbolic, never mundane. WOOL TEXTILE FIBER Strife, quarreling, or contention; discord arising from rivalry, jealousy, or selfish ambition.

A noun denoting interpersonal discord, rivalry, and quarrelsome contention. Paul consistently places it in vice lists alongside jealousy, anger, and selfish ambition — the toxic cluster of behaviors that fracture community. It appears in Romans 1:29 among the sins of a darkened mind, in 1 Corinthians 1:11 and 3:3 as evidence of the Corinthians' immaturity, and in Galatians 5:20 among the works of the flesh. Spanish 'contienda' and German 'Streit' both emphasize the combative, disputatious quality. This is not mere disagreement but the poisonous spirit of faction.

strife, quarreling, contention (9×) Strife, quarreling, or contentious rivalry between persons, consistently appearing in Pauline vice lists as a mark of fleshly, immature conduct. It names the spirit of faction and dispute that tears apart communities — listed alongside jealousy (zelos), anger (thumos), and selfish ambition (eritheia) in Gal 5:20 and 2 Cor 12:20. At Corinth, eris was the presenting symptom of spiritual immaturity (1 Cor 1:11; 3:3). In Phil 1:15, some even preach Christ 'out of eris.' Spanish 'contienda' and French 'querelle' both highlight the combative, adversarial nature of this discord. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

young goat, kid

This noun is a diminutive form meaning young goat or kid—a small goat. In Matthew 25:33, Jesus uses the image of separating sheep from goats in his judgment parable. The diminutive form might suggest affection or simply indicate young animals. Classical usage included both the literal young goat and botanical references. The multilingual evidence is straightforward: young goats, cabritos (kids), chevreau (kid)—all identifying these as small goats. In Jewish sacrifice and Mediterranean agriculture, goats were common livestock, making this a familiar pastoral image for Jesus' audience.

(1×) Jesus' judgment parable (Matthew 25:33) uses the shepherd's familiar task of separating sheep from goats to illustrate final separation of righteous from unrighteous. The cross-linguistic glosses (young goats, kids, cabritos) all specify these as small or young goats, though the diminutive may simply be lexical rather than emphasizing size. The agricultural context assumes mixed flocks—sheep and goats grazed together but needed separation for various reasons, making this a natural metaphor for discrimination and judgment. GOATS AND GOAT HAIR

a young goat, kid; a small goat suitable for sacrifice or as food

This noun denotes a young goat or kid. In Matthew 25:32, Jesus separates sheep from goats in his parable of final judgment—the righteous sheep on his right, the wicked goats on his left. In Luke 15:29, the elder brother complains that his father never gave him 'even a young goat' to celebrate with friends, contrasting his own loyal service with the lavish feast for the prodigal. The multilingual glosses are consistent: Spanish 'cabrito/cabritos' (young goat/goats), French 'chevreau' (kid). In ancient culture, kids were valuable for meat and sacrifice, less prestigious than sheep but still significant.

(2×) Spanish 'cabrito/cabritos' (kid/goats) and French 'chevreau' (young goat) consistently identify this as a young goat. In Matthew 25:32, Jesus uses sheep and goats as figures for the righteous and unrighteous in final judgment—goats (ἐρίφων) representing those who failed to show mercy and will be sent away. The contrast with sheep may reflect cultural associations: sheep more valuable and docile, goats more independent. In Luke 15:29, the elder brother bitterly notes he never received 'even a young goat' (ἔριφον) for a party—a lesser gift than the fattened calf slaughtered for the prodigal, yet still denied him. The detail reveals his resentment: he feels unrewarded despite faithful service. GOATS AND GOAT HAIR

Hermas (proper name)

This is a personal name—Hermas, a Christian greeted by Paul in Romans 16:14. The name is a Doric form related to Hermes, the Greek god. Nothing else is known about this individual beyond Paul's greeting. The name appears in early Christian literature (The Shepherd of Hermas), though likely not the same person. The multilingual evidence shows how proper names transfer: most keep 'Hermas,' with slight variations (Hermán) reflecting local phonology. Personal names typically don't translate but transliterate, preserving the individual's identity across languages.

(1×) Paul's greeting to Hermas in Romans 16:14 is our only New Testament reference to this individual Christian in Rome. The cross-linguistic evidence shows typical name handling: transliteration with minor phonological adjustment (Hermas, Hermán, Hermès). The name's connection to Hermes (Greek god) was probably unremarkable in Greco-Roman culture where theophoric names (incorporating divine names) were common. We know nothing of this Hermas beyond Paul's acknowledgment, reminding us how many early Christians remain names without stories. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) interpretation, explanation, or translation; the act of expressing or clarifying meaning in words

This noun denotes interpretation, explanation, or translation—making meaning clear through words. In 1 Corinthians 12:10, it appears among spiritual gifts as 'interpretation of tongues'—the ability to explain or translate ecstatic speech. In 1 Corinthians 14:26, Paul regulates worship: when someone speaks in a tongue, there must be 'an interpretation' so the church is edified. The Spanish 'interpretación' (interpretation) and French 'interprétation' are direct cognates. Classical usage included explaining thoughts through words, translating between languages, and literary style. The biblical use focuses on the charismatic gift of making unintelligible tongues comprehensible to the assembly.

(2×) Spanish 'interpretación' and French 'interprétation' are transparent cognates showing this word means interpretation or explanation. In 1 Corinthians 12:10, Paul lists 'interpretation of tongues' (ἑρμηνεία γλωσσῶν) among the Spirit's gifts—the ability to translate or explain the ecstatic speech given in tongues. In 14:26, Paul instructs that when someone has a tongue, there must be 'an interpretation' so the whole church benefits—someone must render the message intelligible. Without interpretation, tongues-speech edifies only the speaker. The gift of interpretation bridges the gap between inspired utterance and congregational understanding, transforming private prayer language into public teaching. Classical usage emphasized expressing thoughts in words and translating translate, interpret; render from one language to another or explain meaning

This verb means to interpret foreign tongues, translate between languages, or explain and expound meaning. Classical usage includes both linguistic translation and broader explanation. In the New Testament it appears when Gospel writers translate Aramaic or Hebrew names and words for Greek readers—explaining Simon's new name (John 1:42), the meaning of Siloam (John 9:7), and Melchizedek's name (Hebrews 7:2).

Hermes, the Greek god; messenger of the gods; also a personal name (Hermas)

Hermes was the Greek god known as Mercury in Latin, son of Zeus and Maia. He served as messenger of the gods, guide of souls to the underworld, patron of travelers and merchants, and god of eloquence. In Acts 14:12, when Paul healed a lame man in Lystra, pagans identified Barnabas as Zeus and Paul as Hermes 'because he was the chief speaker'—Hermes being associated with speech and messages. In Romans 16:14, Hermes is simply a personal name—a Roman Christian greeted by Paul. The multilingual glosses consistently transliterate: Spanish 'Hermês', French 'Hermès', German 'Hermes'.

(2×) The multilingual glosses uniformly transliterate: Spanish 'Hermês/a Hermên', French 'Hermès', German 'Hermes'. In Acts 14:12, pagan crowds in Lystra identified Barnabas as Zeus and Paul as Hermes (Ἑρμῆν) 'because he was the chief speaker.' Hermes was the divine messenger and god of eloquence, so Paul's role as spokesman suggested this deity. The crowd's misidentification shows how pagans interpreted miracles through their mythological framework. In Romans 16:14, Hermes is simply a common personal name (like many God-names used for people: Apollos, Dionysius). Paul sends greetings to this Roman Christian named after the Greek god. The contexts are entirely different: one theological confusion, one simple naming. GODS AND DEITIES

This is a personal name—Hermogenes, mentioned in 2 Timothy 1:15 as someone who turned away from Paul along with all those in Asia. The name means 'born of Hermes' or 'Hermes-born,' a common Greek theophoric name. We know nothing more about this individual beyond this negative reference. The multilingual evidence shows standard name handling: transliteration preserving the Greek form (Hermogenes, Hermogénēs). His inclusion in scripture memorializes his abandonment of Paul, though the specific circumstances remain unknown.

(1×) Paul's mention of Hermogenes in 2 Timothy 1:15 as one who turned away records a painful abandonment—this man and Phygelus represent the broader Asian defection from Paul. The cross-linguistic glosses simply transliterate the name (Hermogenes, Hermogénēs), as names typically transfer phonologically. The theophoric element (Hermes-born) would have been unremarkable in Greek culture. The man exists in scripture as an example of apostasy or abandonment, though whether this was theological, personal, or circumstantial defection remains unclear. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) reptile, creeping animal; any creature that crawls on the ground

Derived from the verb meaning 'to creep,' this noun covers the broad category of creatures that move close to the ground—snakes, lizards, insects, and similar animals. In Peter's vision a great sheet descends filled with four-footed animals, reptiles, and birds (Acts 10:12; 11:6), where the category serves to represent ritually unclean creatures now declared clean. Paul uses the term in Romans 1:23 to depict the degradation of idolatry, and James 3:7 lists reptiles among the wild creatures humanity has tamed.

(4×) Creeping animals, reptiles, and by extension any creature that crawls or slithers along the ground. In Peter's rooftop vision (Acts 10:12; 11:6) reptiles appear alongside quadrupeds and birds as formerly unclean creatures God now declares clean—Spanish 'reptiles' and French 'reptile' map directly. Romans 1:23 invokes the category to illustrate idolatrous degradation, exchanging God's glory for images of crawling things. This adjective means red or ruddy. In both biblical occurrences, it appears in the phrase 'Red Sea' (Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα), the body of water the Israelites crossed during the Exodus. In Acts 7:36, Stephen recounts Moses performing wonders in Egypt and at the Red Sea. In Hebrews 11:29, the Israelites crossed the Red Sea by faith while the Egyptians were drowned. The multilingual glosses transliterate the sea name: Spanish 'Rojo', French 'Rouge/Rotes Meer', German 'Rotes Meer' (Red Sea). Classical usage called the Indian Ocean the 'Red Sea,' with the modern Red Sea being the 'Arabian Gulf.'

(2×) The multilingual evidence uniformly translates or transliterates 'Red Sea': Spanish 'Rojo', French 'Rouge/Rotes Meer', German 'Rotes Meer'. Both occurrences use the set phrase Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα (Red Sea), the body of water God parted for Israel's escape from Egypt. In Acts 7:36, Stephen recounts Moses leading Israel 'through the Red Sea'—a key moment in salvation history. In Hebrews 11:29, the Israelites passed through 'by faith' as on dry land, but the pursuing Egyptians drowned—demonstrating God's deliverance. Classical geography used 'Erythra Thalassa' for the Indian Ocean generally, with the Gulf of Arabia (modern Red Sea) as one part. The biblical use reflects LXX translation of Hebrew yam suph (Sea of Reeds). RED AND SCARLET

To come, arrive, or approach; used of physical movement, messianic advent, imperative summons, and temporal reference

One of the most frequent verbs in the New Testament, erchomai covers the full spectrum of arrival and approach. At its heart it means to come or arrive at a destination, but its participial form ho erchomenos became a charged messianic title – 'the Coming One' – echoing Psalm 118:26 and Malachi's prophetic expectation. In the imperative it serves as a direct summons ('Come!'), and attributively it marks future time ('the coming age'). Context occasionally stretches it to mean 'enter' or even 'go,' showing how flexible Greek motion verbs can be.

1. come / arrive (physical movement toward) (588×) The default sense covering physical movement toward a person or place – arriving, approaching, journeying to. Arabic uses the root j-ʾ-ʾ (جاء), Spanish viene, German kommt, all mapping cleanly to directional arrival. Dominant across every Gospel narrative (Matt 8:9; 17:11). GOING AND LEADING

2. the Coming One (messianic title) (27×) The substantivized participle ho erchomenos ('the Coming One') functions as a messianic and eschatological title. Arabic renders the definite participle الآتي (al-aatii), Korean uses the honorific 오시는 분, underscoring the title's weight. Central to John the Baptist's question in Matt 11:3 and the Palm Sunday acclamation of Matt 21:9. GOING AND LEADING

3. come! (imperative summons) (15×) Imperative uses functioning as a summons or invitation – 'Come!' Arabic distinctively shifts to a separate root تعال (taʿaal) for this command, unlike the indicative جاء, revealing a pragmatic split that Greek leaves implicit. See Jesus calling Peter onto the water (Matt 14:29) and the parable invitation in Luke 14:17. GOING AND LEADING

4. coming / future (temporal attributive) (6×) Attributive-temporal use meaning 'coming, future, next,' modifying a noun of time or abstraction. Spanish employs venidero ('forthcoming'), distinguishing this from the verbal sense. Appears in phrases like 'the age to come' (Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30) and 'things that are coming' (John 16:13). 5. enter / go into (3×) A contextual extension where erchomai means 'enter' or 'go into.' Arabic shifts to the root d-kh-l (دخل, 'enter'), Korean to 들어가다 (deureogada), and Swahili to -ingia, all lexically distinct from 'come.' Seen when the magi enter the house (Matt 2:11) and Jesus enters a Pharisee's home (Luke 14:1). GOING AND LEADING

Korean distinguishes this with 가다 (gada, 'go') versus 오다 (oda, 'come'), and Spanish uses vamos ('let us go'). Attested at Mark 1:39 and John 21:3 where the direction is outward. GOING AND LEADING

ἐρωτ-άω G2065 V-FIA-2P (63×)

To ask; either making a request or entreaty, or posing a question to gain information — two senses often blending in context.

A common Greek verb whose two senses — requesting and questioning — often shade into one another. When it means "request" or "beseech," it carries the weight of personal appeal, as when a Syrophoenician woman begs Jesus to cast out a demon (Mark 7:26) or disciples urge him to send a crowd away (Matt 15:23). The Spanish captures this with "rogar" and "pedir" (to plead, to ask for). When it means "inquire" or "question," it appears in scenes of genuine investigation: Jesus asks the disciples who people say he is (Matt 16:13), or no one dares question him further (John 16:23). Here Spanish shifts to "preguntar" (to ask a question), a distinction English lacks but that the multilingual evidence makes plain.

1. request, beseech, entreat (38×) To make a request, plea, or earnest appeal — asking someone to do something rather than asking for information. Prominent in passages where Jesus is entreated for healing or help (Mark 7:26; Luke 4:38; Luke 5:3). Spanish distinguishes this clearly with "rogar" (to beseech) and "pedir" (to request), as opposed to "preguntar" (to inquire). French uses "demander" for both, but German "bitten" (to request) can separate it from "fragen" (to question). ASKING AND PRAYING en: I-ask, ask, asked | es: Rogamos, Te-ruego, le-pidieron | fr: demander, interroger | de: fragen, fragt Matt 15:23; Mark 4:10; Mark 7:26; Luke 4:38; Luke 5:3

2. ask, inquire, question (25×) To pose a question, inquire, or interrogate someone seeking information or clarification. Appears in dialogue scenes where the goal is understanding rather than persuasion — Jesus questions his disciples (Matt 16:13), tests with a counter-question (Matt 21:24), or disciples are afraid to ask (Luke 9:45). Spanish consistently uses "preguntar" here, and the pattern of informational rather than petitionary context is consistent across all 25 occurrences. ASKING AND PRAYING

ἐσθής G2066 N-AFS (8×)

Clothing, raiment, or garments; an outer article of dress, often implying distinction or formality.

Derived from ἔννυμι ('to clothe'), ἐσθής denotes clothing or raiment with a note of dignity or display. Herod drapes Jesus in 'gorgeous apparel' (ἐσθῆτα λαμπράν, Luke 23:11), and the angels at the tomb and ascension appear in dazzling white garments (Luke 24:4; Acts 1:10). Cornelius sees a figure in 'bright clothing' (Acts 10:30), and Herod Agrippa dons royal robes before his fatal audience (Acts 12:21). Spanish vestidura and French vêtement both preserve the formal register, distinguishing this word from everyday terms like ἱμάτιον.

clothing, garment (8×) An outer garment or article of clothing, typically carrying connotations of distinction, formality, or splendor. Every New Testament occurrence highlights clothing that communicates status or otherworldly glory: Herod's soldiers mock Jesus with splendid raiment (Luke 23:11), angels appear at the empty tomb and ascension in shining white garments (Luke 24:4; Acts 1:10), Cornelius sees a heavenly figure in bright clothing (Acts 10:30), and Herod Agrippa wears royal apparel at his fatal public address (Acts 12:21). The word sits above common terms for everyday dress, pointing to garments that reveal identity or authority. CLOTHING AND DRESS

clothing, raiment, garments; what one wears

A straightforward noun meaning clothing or raiment. Derived from the verb 'to clothe' (ἐσθέω), it designates garments in general rather than specific articles. Classical and biblical Greek use it interchangeably with similar terms for apparel. The word carries no special connotations—just the everyday reality of what people wear. In biblical contexts it may appear alongside discussions of provision, modesty, or transformation (as when Jesus' garments became radiant at the Transfiguration).

ἐσθίω G2068 V-PPA-GMP (65×)

To eat food; by extension, to consume or devour in a destructive or figurative sense.

The standard Greek verb for eating, used across the Gospels and Epistles for ordinary meals, Passover eating, miraculous feedings, and debates about food laws. Jesus eats with tax collectors and sinners (Matt 9:11), the disciples pluck grain on the Sabbath and eat (Matt 12:1), and Paul addresses whether believers may eat food offered to idols (1 Cor 8:7-13). In one striking figurative use, the 'fury of fire' is said to consume God's adversaries (Heb 10:27), shifting from nourishment to annihilation.

1. eat food (64×) To eat or partake of food in the ordinary, literal sense. This overwhelmingly dominant sense covers every grammatical form – indicative, participle, subjunctive, infinitive, imperative – across 64 occurrences. Spanish come/comen, French manger,

German essen/isst all converge on basic physical eating. The word appears in pivotal scenes: the feeding of the five thousand (Matt 14:20-21), the Last Supper (Matt 26:26), controversies over eating with unwashed hands (Matt 15:2), and the early church's disputes over dietary law (1 Cor 10:25-28). EATING AND CONSUMING

2. consume or devour (1×) To consume or devour destructively, used figuratively for fire or divine judgment. In Hebrews 10:27, the author warns of 'a fury of fire about to consume the adversaries,' where esthiein takes on the connotation of total annihilation rather than nourishment. Spanish devorar ('to devour') captures this aggressive nuance, while French manger and German essen retain the base verb, relying on context to convey the metaphorical shift. EATING AND CONSUMING

Esli (proper name)

This is a personal name—Esli (or Hesli), an ancestor of Jesus listed in Luke's genealogy (3:25). The name appears only here in scripture. It may be Hebrew in origin, though the etymology is uncertain. The multilingual evidence shows typical variation in how names transliterate: Hesli, Heslí, Esli—different traditions preserve different vocalizations. Luke's genealogy traces Jesus' lineage through less prominent ancestors, and Esli is among those known only through genealogical record, his life otherwise unrecorded.

(1×) Luke 3:25 includes Esli in Jesus' genealogy between Naum and Nagge—an ancestor otherwise unknown to us. The cross-linguistic variation (Hesli, Heslí, Esli) reflects how manuscript traditions preserved different vocalizations of this Hebrew name. The genealogy's function is establishing Jesus' human lineage, and Esli serves that purpose as one link in the chain connecting Jesus to David and Abraham, his individual story lost to history but his name preserved in scripture. εἰμί G2070 to be, exist (verb of being); form of εἰμί with full dialectal variants

The fundamental Greek verb of existence and being, appearing in countless forms across dialects—Aeolic ἔμμι, Doric ἐντί, Epic and Ionic variations. It expresses simple existence ('I am'), predication ('the word is truth'), and location ('he is in the temple'). New Testament authors inherit this verb's philosophical and theological weight: in the Septuagint it translates God's self-revelation to Moses ('I AM WHO I AM'), and in John's Gospel Jesus' 'I am' statements echo divine identity. The verb's ubiquity makes it invisible until it bears theological freight.

to be, exist (future form of εἰμί); will be, shall be

The future tense of the fundamental verb 'to be,' expressing what will exist, happen, or come to pass. Across Greek dialects it takes various forms but consistently points forward in time. Prophetic and apocalyptic texts lean heavily on this verb: what is to come, what shall be revealed, the age that will arrive. Jesus uses it in eschatological discourse ('there will be signs'), and Paul employs it in discussing resurrection realities. The future of being carries both promise and warning throughout Scripture.

εἴσοπτρον G2072 N-GNS (2×)

a mirror, looking glass; any reflective surface for viewing one's image

This noun denotes a mirror or looking glass, typically made of polished metal in antiquity. In 1 Corinthians 13:12, Paul contrasts present partial knowledge with future full knowledge: 'now we see in a mirror dimly, but then face to face.' In James 1:23, someone who hears the word but doesn't do it is like a man observing his face 'in a mirror'—seeing himself but immediately forgetting what he looks like. The multilingual glosses are uniform: Spanish 'espejo', French 'miroir', German 'Spiegel'—all meaning mirror. Ancient mirrors gave imperfect, dim reflections compared to modern glass, making them apt metaphors for partial knowledge.

(2×) The multilingual glosses are perfectly consistent: Spanish 'espejo', French 'miroir', German 'Spiegel'—all meaning mirror. In 1 Corinthians 13:12, Paul writes 'we see in a mirror dimly' (δι᾽ ἐσόπτρου ἐν αἰνίγματι)—our present knowledge is like a blurred, indirect reflection compared to the future 'face to face' sight. Ancient bronze or silver mirrors gave fuzzy, dark images, perfect metaphors for partial understanding. In James 1:23, the person who hears Scripture but doesn't obey is like someone glancing at his face 'in a mirror' (ἐν ἐσόπτρῳ), then walking away and immediately forgetting what he saw—the mirror shows reality, but without action, the self-knowledge vanishes. Both uses employ mirrors as images of imperfect or fleeting vision. SEEING AND PERCEIVING evening; the time of day from late afternoon to nightfall

ἑσπέρα G2073 N-NFS (3×)

This feminine noun denotes evening, the later part of the day as light fades. Classical usage could indicate simply 'evening' or more broadly 'the west' (where the sun sets). In the New Testament it marks the time of day for various events—the disciples urging Jesus to stay because evening approaches (Luke 24:29), the limitation on trying prisoners at night (Acts 4:3), and Paul's extended teaching session (Acts 28:23).

(3×) Translations uniformly render this as evening time: Spanish tarde/la-tarde, French soir, German ἑσπέρα. Luke 24:29 has the Emmaus disciples saying 'stay with us, for it is toward evening,' marking the day's end. Acts 4:3 explains why Peter and John were held overnight: 'it was already evening,' too late for a hearing. Acts 28:23 describes Paul's marathon teaching session 'from morning till evening,' showing sustained discourse. The term simply marks the temporal period as daylight wanes. EVENING AND TWILIGHT

Hezron; personal name of an ancestor in Jesus' genealogy

Hezron (Hebrew Chetsron) is a personal name from Israel's history, identified as a son of Perez and ancestor of King David. He appears in the genealogical records linking Jesus to Abraham and David. The name connects Jesus to the tribal lineage of Judah and establishes his legal claim as Messiah descended from David's line through the promised seed.

(3×) The name appears uniformly in genealogies: Hesrōm, Hezron, Esrom. Matthew 1:3 records twice: 'Perez the father of Hezron, and Hezron the father of Ram' in the genealogy from Abraham. Luke 3:33 includes 'Hezron, the son of Perez' in the ascending genealogy from Jesus back to Adam. These references anchor Jesus' legal ancestry in the tribe of Judah and the house of David, fulfilling messianic prophecies requiring Davidic descent. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) to be, exist (imperfect form of εἰμί); was, were, used to be

The imperfect tense of 'to be,' describing past states, ongoing existence, or habitual conditions in past time. It appears across the full range of Greek dialects with characteristic variations. In narrative it sets the scene ('there was a man'), establishes background ('Jesus was teaching'), or describes circumstances ('the disciples were in the boat'). Unlike the aorist, which punctuates past events, the imperfect lingers in past duration—what was happening, what someone used to be, the way things were before change arrived.

is, exists (third person singular present of εἰμί); he/she/it is

The third-person singular present of the verb 'to be'—arguably the most frequent form in Greek literature. It states existence, identifies, or predicates: 'God is love,' 'this is my body,' 'blessed is the one who.' Across dialects it appears as ἐστί (standard), ἐντί (Doric), and other variants. Philosophical discourse depends on it for definitions and truth claims. Biblical writers employ it for revelation ('this is the Son of God'), metaphor ('I am the vine, you are the branches'), and theological assertion. Simple, ubiquitous, and foundational.

let it be, may it be (third person singular imperative of εἰμί); optative of permission or command

The third-person imperative of 'to be,' expressing permission, command, or wish: 'let it be so,' 'may he be.' This form grants existence, allows a state to continue, or invokes a condition. In prayer and blessing it carries performative force—not just describing but enacting. Mary's 'let it be to me according to your word' uses a related construction. Greek dialects show characteristic variations (ἔστω is more common; ἤτω appears in later texts). The imperative mood makes being itself a matter of volition and divine decree.

Last, final, furthest; pertaining to the end of a sequence in time or the extremity of space.

Derived from a root meaning 'out of' or 'outmost,' this adjective marks the terminal point of any sequence – whether temporal or spatial. In the New Testament its overwhelmingly temporal use gives it profound eschatological weight: 'the last days' (Acts 2:17), 'the last trumpet' (1 Cor 15:52), 'the last enemy' (1 Cor 15:26). Jesus' saying 'the last shall be first' (Matt 19:30) upends social expectations using the ordinal sense. The rare spatial use – 'to the ends of the earth' (Acts 1:8) – echoes Isaiah 49:6 and maps the geographical scope of the gospel mission.

1. last, final (temporal/ordinal) (52×) Last or final in a temporal or ordinal sequence, describing the concluding point of a series. This dominant sense (52x) covers eschatological phrases like 'last days' (Acts 2:17, 2 Tim 3:1), 'last trumpet' (1 Cor 15:52), and the morally loaded 'last state' of a person (Matt 12:45, 2 Pet 2:20). Spanish 'último/última,' French 'dernier,' and German 'letzter' all consistently render the temporal sense. Jesus' reversals in Matt 19:30 and 20:16 play on ordinal ranking. LAST AND FINAL

2. end, extremity (spatial) (2×) The farthest point or outermost extremity in space, referring to the end or edge of the earth. Only two occurrences (Acts 1:8 and 13:47), both quoting or echoing Isaiah, use the spatial sense: 'to the end (eschaton) of the earth.' Spanish 'fin' and the phrase 'lo último' distinguish this from the temporal 'último.' This geographic sense recalls the Homeric use of the word for the most distant peoples and places, here reapplied to the universal scope of the gospel. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

extremely, at the point of (death), in extremis

This adverb, built from the adjective 'eschatos' (last, extreme), means extremely or in the extreme—at the outermost limit of something. In Mark 5:23, Jairus says his daughter is 'at the point of death' or 'in her last extremity'—ἐσχάτως ἔχει. The phrase is idiomatic, meaning to be in extremis, at death's door. Classical usage of eschatos described geographical extremes, temporal endings, and superlative conditions. The multilingual evidence shows interpretive glosses: at point of death, at the extreme, emphasizing how the adverb intensifies the verbal phrase to mean 'is extremely ill' or 'is dying.'

(1×) Jairus' desperate plea (Mark 5:23) that his daughter is 'at the point of death' uses this adverb in an idiomatic phrase—eschatōs echei, literally 'has extremely' but idiomatically 'is in extremis.' The cross-linguistic glosses interpret rather than translate literally: at point of death, al extremo (to the extreme), capturing the semantic force of imminent death. The adverb's derivation from eschatos (last, uttermost) makes the idiom work: she has reached the last extreme, the final point before death. LAST AND FINAL

Inside, within; an adverb or preposition denoting the interior of a space or the inner nature of a person.

An adverb meaning 'inside' or 'within,' used both spatially and anthropologically. Spatially, it describes being inside a courtyard (Matt 26:58; Mark 14:54; Mark 15:16), behind locked doors (John 20:26), or within a guarded prison (Acts 5:23). Anthropologically, Paul uses 'the inner person' (ho eso anthropos) for the spiritual self that is being renewed even as the outer self wastes away (2 Cor 4:16; Eph 3:16). Spanish distinguishes 'adentro' (directional) from 'dentro' (locational), reflecting the word's flexibility between motion-toward and position-at.

inside, within (9×) Inside, within — marking either a spatial interior or the inner dimension of a person. The spatial uses describe being physically inside a building or enclosed area: Peter following Jesus into the courtyard (Matt 26:58; Mark 14:54), soldiers leading Jesus inside the Praetorium (Mark 15:16), disciples gathered behind locked doors (John 20:26), and prisoners found inside a sealed jail (Acts 5:23). The anthropological uses in Paul designate 'the inner person' (ho eso anthropos) — the spiritual self that is renewed daily (2 Cor 4:16; Eph 3:16). French 'intérieur' and Spanish 'dentro/adentro' together capture both the static and directional dimensions. INSIDE AND WITHIN

from within, inside, inwardly — adverb of interior location or source of motion from the interior

Esothen is a spatial adverb formed from eso ('within') plus the suffix -then indicating origin or location. Its 12 NT occurrences move fluidly between literal and figurative interiority. Jesus uses it to devastating rhetorical effect in his woes against the Pharisees: their cups and tombs may look clean outside, but esothen they overflow with greed and hypocrisy (Matt 23:25, 27). Mark 7:21-23 locates the source of moral defilement esothen, 'from within' the human heart. Revelation 4:8 and 5:1 apply it physically — eyes covering the living creatures 'inside,' and writing on a scroll 'within.' The multilingual renderings — Spanish 'de dentro,' French 'de l'interieur,' German 'von innen' — uniformly mark interior source or location.

from within, inside, inwardly (12×) An adverb indicating either location inside something or motion originating from the interior. Used physically for the inside of objects (Matt 23:25, the inside of the cup; Rev 5:1, a scroll written inside) and metaphorically for the inner life of a person (Mark 7:21, evil thoughts come 'from within'; Matt 23:27-28, inward corruption behind outward beauty). The word appears prominently in Jesus's contrast between external religious appearance and internal moral reality. Spanish 'de dentro/de adentro' and German 'von innen/innerhalb' consistently capture both the locative and ablative senses. All 12 occurrences serve this single spatial-to-moral semantic range. inner, interior, or inside; further in, more inward; the comparative form of 'within'

This comparative adjective means inner, interior, or further within. In Acts 16:24, the Philippian jailer secured Paul and Silas in 'the inner cell'—the most secure, innermost part of the prison. In Hebrews 6:19, hope is an anchor for the soul that enters 'the inner sanctuary behind the curtain'—the holy of holies, the innermost sacred space where God's presence dwelt. The Spanish 'interior' and French/German 'intérieur/innerer' all mean inner or interior. Both uses emphasize penetration to the deepest, most secure or sacred interior space.

(2×) Spanish 'interior', French 'intérieur', and German 'innerer' uniformly mean inner or interior. This is the comparative form (ἐσωτέραν), literally 'more inward.' In Acts 16:24, the jailer placed Paul and Silas 'in the inner cell' (εἰς τὴν ἐσωτέραν φυλακήν)—the deepest, most secure part of the prison, feet fastened in stocks. The superlative security failed to hold them when God sent an earthquake. In Hebrews 6:19, Christian hope is an anchor that enters 'the inner sanctuary behind the curtain' (εἰς τὸ ἐσώτερον τοῦ καταπετάσματος)—the holy of holies where Jesus our forerunner has entered. Both uses emphasize penetration to the innermost space: the most secure prison cell or the most sacred sanctuary. What's 'more inward' is either most protected or most holy. INSIDE AND WITHIN

companion, friend; form of address to an associate or comrade

This noun means comrade, companion, or friend, often used in classical Greek for fellow soldiers, messmates, or partners. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in Matthew's Gospel as a vocative term of address—Jesus speaking to individuals in parables or real encounters. Notably, while translated 'friend,' the term is more neutral than φίλος, sometimes carrying irony or distance. Jesus uses it three times, in each case addressing someone at a pivotal moment.

(3×) Translations consistently use 'friend' or 'companion': Spanish Amigo, French compagnon. All three uses are vocative addresses by Jesus in Matthew. In 20:13 the master addresses a complaining worker: 'Friend, I am doing you no wrong.' In 22:12 the king confronts the improperly dressed guest: 'Friend, how did you get in here without wedding clothes?' In 26:50, most poignantly, Jesus addresses Judas at his betrayal: 'Friend, do what you came to do.' The term maintains formality even in intimate moments, sometimes with ironic undertones given the context. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

foreign-tongued, speaking other languages

This adjective means speaking a foreign tongue or language—characterized by a different language than one's own. In 1 Corinthians 14:21, Paul quotes Isaiah 28:11 about God speaking to Israel through people of foreign tongues—the Assyrian invaders whose strange language signaled judgment. The compound combines 'other' (heteros) with 'tongue/language' (glōssa). Classical usage described both foreign speakers and animals with diverse tongues. The multilingual evidence varies: other tongues, otras lenguas (other languages), parlant d'autres langues—some emphasizing linguistic diversity, others foreignness.

(1×) Paul's quotation in 1 Corinthians 14:21 of God speaking through foreign-tongued people recalls Isaiah's prophecy about Assyrian invasion—foreigners whose incomprehensible language was itself a sign of judgment. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize linguistic diversity (other tongues, otras lenguas) or foreign speech (anderssprachig). The theological point connects to tongues in Corinth: as unintelligible foreign speech once signaled judgment, so unintelligible tongues without interpretation fail to edify—both represent communication breakdown rather than clarity. TONGUE (BODY AND SPEECH)

to teach different or strange doctrine; to teach falsely or contrary to sound teaching

This verb means to teach different doctrine, specifically to teach what contradicts apostolic truth. It appears only in the Pastoral Epistles. In 1 Timothy 1:3, Paul urges Timothy to stay in Ephesus to command certain people not to 'teach false doctrines'—deviant teachings contrary to the gospel. In 1 Timothy 6:3, anyone who 'teaches otherwise' and doesn't agree with sound words of Christ is described as conceited and understanding nothing. The multilingual glosses show the other/different aspect: Spanish 'enseña diferente' (teaches differently), French and German 'anders lehren' (to teach otherwise). The prefix hetero- (other, different) distinguishes this from orthodox teaching.

(2×) Spanish 'enseña diferente/enseñar diferente' (teaches differently/to teach differently) and German 'anders lehren' (to teach otherwise) capture the prefix ἑτερο- (other, different). This compound verb appears only in 1 Timothy. In 1:3, Paul tells Timothy to command certain people not to 'teach false doctrines' (ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν)—instruction that deviates from apostolic tradition. In 6:3, anyone who 'teaches otherwise' (ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖ) and doesn't agree with Christ's sound words is puffed up with pride despite understanding nothing. The verb doesn't mean teaching about different topics, but teaching contradictory doctrine—heterodoxy versus orthodoxy. Paul's concern is preserving the deposit of apostolic teaching against innovative or deviant instruction that undermines the gospel. TEACHING AND LEARNING

To be yoked in unequal partnership, particularly with unbelievers; to enter an incompatible alliance

This rare compound verb appears only in Paul's warning against forming mismatched partnerships with unbelievers (2 Corinthians 6:14). The agricultural metaphor draws from Deuteronomy's prohibition of yoking different animals together—oxen and donkeys worked at different paces and strengths, making effective plowing impossible. Paul extends this image to spiritual partnerships where fundamental incompatibility prevents fruitful collaboration.

(1×) The uniform testimony across languages ('unequally-yoked' in English, 'en-yugo-desigual' in Spanish, 'atteler-inégalement' in French) preserves the agricultural imagery. Paul's rhetorical question in 2 Corinthians 6:14 uses this hapax to challenge believers about entering binding partnerships—whether business, religious, or marital—where core values and ultimate allegiances diverge irreconcilably. CLINGING AND JOINING

ἕτερος G2087 Adj-NFP (98×)

Other, another, different; denoting an additional entity, qualitative distinction, or the next in temporal sequence.

A foundational adjective of distinction and alternation. At its core it points to 'another one' — a second master in Matt 6:24, the next town in Matt 10:23. But unlike the near-synonym allos, heteros carries an undertone of qualitative difference, which surfaces explicitly in passages like 2 Cor 11:4 ('a different gospel'). Occasionally the word narrows to temporal succession — 'the next day' in Acts 20:15 — showing how 'otherness' can slide from category to sequence. Spanish 'otro/diferente' and German 'anderer' both capture this flexible range.

1. other, another (91×) The broad, unmarked sense: another or an additional entity of the same general kind. This is the default reading in 91 of 98 occurrences. In Matt 6:24 it contrasts two masters; in Matt 8:21 'another disciple' steps forward. The multilingual glosses — Spanish 'otro,' French 'autre,' German 'anderer' — all map cleanly to this numerically-additive meaning without implying qualitative difference. ANOTHER AND OTHER

en: another, other | es: a-otro, otro | fr: autre | de: anderer Matt 6:24; Matt 8:21; Matt 10:23; Matt 11:3

2. different, distinct (5×) The qualitatively marked sense: different or distinct in kind, not merely additional. Luke 9:29 describes Jesus' face becoming 'different' at the transfiguration, and Paul's alarmed references to 'a different spirit' and 'a different gospel' in 2 Cor 11:4 depend on this shade. Spanish distinguishes this with 'diferente' alongside 'otra,' confirming the semantic split. The emphasis falls on unlikeness rather than mere enumeration. ANOTHER AND OTHER

en: different | es: diferente, otra | fr: autre | de: anderer Luke 9:29; 1Cor 15:40; 2Cor 11:4

3. next (in temporal sequence) (2×) A temporal-sequential sense: the next (day, occasion) in a series. In Acts 20:15 and 27:3 the word modifies an implied 'day,' yielding 'the next day.' Spanish 'siguiente-día' and English 'next' both show the shift from spatial or categorical otherness to chronological succession — a natural metaphorical extension from 'the other one' to 'the one that follows.' ἕτερος G2088 Adv (1×)

Differently, in another manner; otherwise

This adverb modifies how something is done or thought about, signaling an alternative approach or different perspective. Paul uses it in Philippians 3:15 as part of his confidence that God will reveal truth to those who think 'differently' about certain matters. The word suggests variation without necessarily implying wrongness—a charitable acknowledgment that believers may arrive at different understandings on secondary issues.

(1×) Appearing only in Paul's discussion of spiritual maturity (Philippians 3:15), this adverb acknowledges diversity of thought within the believing community. The translations ('differently,' 'diferentemente,' 'anders') capture the straightforward meaning, while Paul's context suggests that God himself will clarify matters where believers currently see things from different angles, rather than demanding immediate uniformity. ἔτι G2089 Adv (93×)

Still, yet; marking temporal continuity or, with negation, cessation ('no longer, not anymore')

A common Greek adverb of time that signals something is ongoing or persists up to a given moment. In its positive use it means 'still' or 'yet,' as when the disciples are told the Father still speaks (Matt 17:5). When paired with negation particles like οὐκέτι or μηκέτι, the sense flips to 'no longer' or 'not anymore,' as in Hebrews 10:2 where conscience no longer accuses. German 'noch,' French 'encore,' and Hebrew עוֹד all mirror this dual capacity of a single temporal marker.

1. still, yet (temporal continuity) (65×) Temporal continuity: 'still, yet' — signals that a state or action persists into the present or expected future. German 'noch,' French 'encore,' Korean '아직,' and Hindi 'अभी' all converge on unbroken duration. Prominent in narrative transitions like Matt 26:47 ('while he was still speaking') and Matt 17:5 ('he was still speaking when a bright cloud overshadowed them'). CONTINUITY AND STILL en: Still, even, still | es: aún, más, todavía | fr: encore | de: noch Matt 17:5; Matt 19:20; Matt 26:47; Matt 26:65; Matt 27:63

2. no longer, not anymore (negated continuity) (28×) Negated continuity: 'no longer, not anymore' — when governed by negation (οὐκέτι, μηκέτι), the adverb marks the cessation of a previously ongoing state. Cross-lingual glosses still render the bare adverb the same way (Spa. 'aún,' Fr. 'encore'), relying on context for the reversal. Key passages include Luke 16:2 ('you can no longer be steward') and Heb 10:2 ('no longer any consciousness of sins'), where the end of a condition carries theological weight. CONTINUITY AND STILL en: any, any-longer, any-more | es: además, aún, más | fr: encore | de: noch Matt 5:13; Luke 16:2; Luke 20:36; Heb 8:12; Heb 10:2

ἑτοιμ-άζω G2090 V-RPM/P-DMP (40×)

To prepare, make ready, or furnish something for a purpose; also to be in a state of readiness Found across the Gospels and Revelation, this verb covers the full arc of preparation – from actively setting a table or readying a room (Matt 26:17, 19) to the theological passive where God has prepared something from eternity (Matt 25:34). The Spanish and French translations consistently use 'preparar/preparer,' preserving the directness of the Greek. A single middle-voice occurrence in Revelation 8:6 shows the seven angels preparing themselves, turning the action reflexively inward.

1. prepare something, make ready (29×) The active transitive core: making something ready for use or for someone. Jesus sends disciples to 'prepare' the Passover (Matt 26:17); John the Baptist's mission is to 'prepare' the Lord's way (Matt 3:3; Mark 1:3). All major translation languages – Spanish 'preparad,' French 'preparer,' German 'bereiten' – converge on straightforward preparation vocabulary, showing high cross-linguistic stability. 2. be prepared, having been made ready (10×) The passive-stative sense: having been prepared, describing a completed state of readiness. In Matthew 25:34 the kingdom has been prepared 'from the foundation of the world,' and in Matthew 25:41 eternal fire 'prepared for the devil.' Spanish distinguishes 'ha sido preparado' (perfect passive) from the active imperative, marking the theological weight of divine pre-arrangement (cf. 2 Tim 2:21). ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

3. prepare oneself, get ready (1×) A reflexive-middle use where agents prepare themselves for action. Revelation 8:6 records the seven angels who 'prepared themselves' to sound their trumpets. Spanish captures this with the reflexive 'se prepararon.' The single occurrence suggests a deliberate self-readying distinct from being prepared by another. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

ἑτοιμ-ᾰσία G2091 N-DFS (1×)

Readiness, preparedness; the state of being equipped and ready for action

This noun denotes the condition of being ready or prepared, whether for service, action, or opportunity. In Ephesians 6:15, it appears in Paul's armor of God passage, where believers' feet are shod 'with the readiness of the gospel of peace.' The word emphasizes not just passive waiting but active preparedness—standing equipped and eager to share good news at any moment.

(1×) The military context of Ephesians 6 gives this readiness a distinctive flavor. Just as Roman soldiers kept their sandals ready for rapid deployment, believers maintain constant preparedness to proclaim peace through the gospel. The translations ('readiness,' 'preparación,' 'Bereitschaft') consistently emphasize this state of active readiness rather than mere passive possession of equipment. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

ἑτοῖμος G2092 Adj-AFS (17×)
Ready, prepared, at hand; describing a state of readiness for action or an event, or the disposition of preparedness itself.
An adjective meaning 'ready' or 'prepared,' used across the Synoptic Gospels for wedding feasts that are ready (Matt 22:4, 8), wise virgins who are prepared (Matt 25:10), and disciples who must stay alert (Matt 24:44). Every major translation converges: English 'ready,' Spanish preparada/lista, French pret, German bereit. In one Pauline passage (2 Cor 10:6), the word takes on a more abstract, nominal flavor — a readiness or willingness to act — where Spanish shifts to preparacion and English to 'readiness,' hinting at an inner disposition rather than an external state of affairs.

1. (16×) In a state of readiness or preparation — the predominant adjectival use (16 occurrences). The wedding dinner is ready (Matt 22:4), the upper room is furnished and prepared (Mark 14:15), and believers must be ready for the Son of Man's return (Matt 24:44; Luke 12:40). All major languages agree: Spanish lista/preparada, French pret, German bereit. The word describes an objective condition of completion or availability. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE
en: ready | es: lista, preparada, preparadas | fr: prêt | de: bereit Matt 22:4; Matt 22:8; Matt 24:44; Matt 25:10; Mark 14:15

2. (1×) Readiness as a disposition or abstract quality — used substantivally in 2 Cor 10:6, where Paul speaks of being 'in readiness to punish every disobedience.' Spanish preparacion and English 'readiness' capture the shift from a concrete state ('the meal is ready') to an inner resolve or willingness. This is the only NT occurrence where the term functions more as a noun than a predicate adjective. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE en: readiness | es: preparación | fr: prêt | de: bereit 2Cor 10:6

readily, in readiness; adverbial form indicating prepared state or willingness
This adverb derives from ἑτοῖμος (ready, prepared) and indicates a state of readiness or willingness. It describes being prepared in advance, having something at hand, or being willing to act. In the New Testament it appears in contexts of readiness—Paul's willingness to suffer (Acts 21:13), his preparedness to support the Corinthians (2 Corinthians 12:14), and the readiness of judgment (1 Peter 4:5).

(3×) Translations use readiness language: Spanish dispuesto/preparado ('ready, prepared'), the Greek adverbial form ἑτοίμως. Acts 21:13 records Paul's response to warnings: 'I am ready not only to be imprisoned but even to die in Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus.' 2 Corinthians 12:14: 'I am ready to come to you' (or 'this is the third time I am ready'). 1 Peter 4:5: they will give account to 'him who is ready to judge the living and the dead.' Each use emphasizes prepared willingness or imminent readiness to act. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

year — a unit of time measuring one complete annual cycle, used for ages, durations, and historical reckoning Etos is the standard Greek word for 'year,' appearing 49 times in the New Testament to measure the passage of time in human lives and sacred history. It marks the age of persons — Jesus at twelve in the temple (Luke 2:42), the woman with a hemorrhage suffering twelve years (Mark 5:25) — and durations of prophetic or theological weight: Paul's three years in Arabia before meeting the apostles (Gal 1:18), Abraham's hundred years at Isaac's birth (Rom 4:19). The idiomatic phrase kat' etos ('year by year,' Luke 2:41) echoes the Septuagint's calendar language. Translations converge without variation: Spanish 'anos,' French 'an/annee,' German 'Jahr/Jahre.'

year (49×) A complete annual cycle used as the primary unit for measuring extended time in the New Testament, whether reckoning a person's age (Luke 2:42 'when he was twelve years old'; Mark 5:42 the girl was twelve years old), the duration of an affliction or event (Mark 5:25 'twelve years'; Gal 1:18 'after three years'), or historical periodization (Acts 7:6 'four hundred years'; Heb 3:17 'forty years'). All 49 occurrences share this single temporal-measurement sense; the multilingual evidence is perfectly uniform across every witness language. YEAR (TIME UNIT)

Well; an adverb of commendation or competence, indicating something done rightly, thoroughly, or with moral excellence.
A versatile Greek adverb signaling approval, competence, or moral goodness. In everyday speech it functions much like English 'well' — describing an action done properly or a state of being that is right and fitting. In the Gospels it takes on a distinctive commendatory force when a master addresses a faithful servant: 'Well done, good and faithful servant!' (Matt 25:21, 23; Luke 19:17). The Spanish 'bien-hecho' and German 'Εὖγε' both capture that exclamatory, praise-laden tone. Elsewhere it simply means 'rightly' or 'fittingly' (Acts 15:29; Eph 6:3).

1. well (3×) Denotes an action or condition that is done properly, rightly, or in a morally fitting manner. In Mark 14:7 Jesus says the disciples can do good to the poor whenever they wish; in Eph 6:3 the promise is 'that it may be well with you.' Spanish 'bien' and French 'bien' both reflect this straightforward adverbial sense of correctness or moral propriety. MORAL GOODNESS en: well | es: bien | fr: bien | de: wohl, εὖ Mark 14:7; Acts 15:29; Eph 6:3

2. Well done (3×) An exclamatory commendation — 'Well done!' — spoken by a master or authority figure to praise faithful service. All three occurrences appear in the parable of the talents or minas (Matt 25:21, 25:23, Luke 19:17). The German rendering 'Εὖγε' and Spanish 'Bien-hecho' highlight the intensified, celebratory force that distinguishes this from the ordinary adverb: it is not merely 'well' but a declaration of approval and delight. MORAL GOODNESS

Εὕα G2096 N-NFS (2×)
Eve, the first woman; wife of Adam; mother of all living
This proper noun refers to Eve, the first woman created by God, wife of Adam, and mother of humanity. The name derives from Hebrew Chavvah (life-giver). In 2 Corinthians 11:3, Paul warns that as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, so believers' minds might be led astray from devotion to Christ. In 1 Timothy 2:13, Paul notes the creation order: Adam was formed first, then Eve—establishing a theological point about teaching roles. The multilingual glosses transliterate: Spanish 'Eúa/a Heúa', French 'Ève/Εὔα', German 'Eva'. Both passages use Eve typologically: as example of deception or to establish created order.

(2×) The multilingual glosses transliterate the Hebrew name: Spanish 'Eúa/a Heúa', French 'Ève', German 'Eva'. In 2 Corinthians 11:3, Paul fears the Corinthians might be deceived 'as the serpent deceived Eve' (Εὔαν)—she becomes the paradigmatic example of satanic deception, her vulnerability warning believers against false teaching. In 1 Timothy 2:13, Paul argues from creation order: 'Adam was formed first, then Eve' (Εὔα)—establishing priority in the sequence of creation as relevant to his instructions about teaching. Both uses are typological rather than biographical: Eve as cautionary example of deception or as illustration of created order. Her name means 'life' or 'living' in Hebrew (Genesis 3:20), though Paul doesn't develop this etymology. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

εὐαγγελ-ίζομαι G2097 V-PNM (55×)
To announce good news, preach the gospel; in the passive, to have good news proclaimed to oneself.
A distinctly biblical term built from the root meaning 'good message,' used throughout the New Testament for the activity at the heart of early Christian mission: proclaiming glad tidings. In the angel's announcement to Zechariah (Luke 1:19) and to the shepherds (Luke 2:10), the word carries its fullest sense of heaven-sent good news. Jesus himself applies it programmatically in Luke 4:18, quoting Isaiah 61. The passive voice, seen in passages like Matthew 11:5 and Hebrews 4:2, shifts attention to the recipients – the poor, the sick, and those who hear but must also receive with faith.

1. proclaim good news (47×) To actively proclaim or preach good news, whether the kingdom of God or the gospel broadly. This is the dominant use across the New Testament (47 of 55 occurrences). Spanish 'anunciar buenas nuevas' and German 'Evangelium verkuendigen' both preserve the 'good news' root. Key passages: Luke 4:18 (Jesus' manifesto), Acts 8:35 (Philip to the Ethiopian). The middle-voice form emphasizes the herald's personal engagement with the message. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

2. be evangelized, receive good news (8×) To be evangelized – to have good news proclaimed to oneself, used in passive constructions where the subject receives the proclamation. In Matthew 11:5 and Luke 7:22 Jesus tells John's disciples that 'the poor have the gospel preached to them,' making the recipients the grammatical focus. Hebrews 4:2 warns that hearing alone is not enough; the message must be mixed with faith. French and German translations often collapse this into the same verb, but the Greek passive marks a meaningful theological shift from agent to recipient. HEARING AND HEEDING

εὐαγγέλ-ιον G2098 N-GNS (76×)

Good news; the gospel — the announcement of God's saving action in Christ, or a reward for bearing such news.

In classical Greek, euangelion originally meant the reward given to a messenger who brought good tidings, or the thank-offering made upon hearing them. By the New Testament period it had become the message itself — the 'gospel,' the proclamation of God's redemptive work through Jesus Christ. Mark opens his entire narrative with this word (Mark 1:1), and Paul uses it as a near-technical term for the apostolic proclamation (Rom 1:16; 1 Cor 15:1). Spanish evangelio, French evangile, and German Evangelium all descend directly from the Greek, testifying to the term's enduring centrality in Christian vocabulary across centuries and cultures.

good news (76×) The good news or gospel — God's saving action proclaimed through Jesus Christ. Used both as a general term for glad tidings (Matt 4:23; 24:14) and as a semi-technical designation for the apostolic message preached to all nations (Mark 1:1; Rom 1:16). Every target language renders it with a single loanword or calque from the Greek. NEWS AND MESSAGES

εὐαγγελ-ιστής G2099 N-AMP (3×)

evangelist; one who proclaims the good news of the gospel

This noun designates a bringer of good news, specifically one who proclaims the gospel message. While all believers share the gospel, 'evangelist' appears to mark a specific ministry role or gifting in the early church—distinct from apostles, prophets, and pastor-teachers. Philip is explicitly called 'the evangelist' (Acts 21:8), and Timothy is urged to 'do the work of an evangelist' (2 Timothy 4:5). The term identifies those whose primary function is gospel proclamation.

(3×) Translations uniformly use forms of 'evangelist': Spanish evangelista/evangelistas, French évangéliste. Acts 21:8 identifies 'Philip the evangelist, who was one of the seven,' distinguishing him by this ministry title. Ephesians 4:11 lists Christ's gifts to the church: 'the apostles, the prophets, the evangelists, the shepherds and teachers,' marking evangelists as a distinct ministry category. 2 Timothy 4:5 exhorts Timothy: 'do the work of an evangelist,' suggesting both a role and a function to be fulfilled in ministry. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

please, be pleasing to; meet with approval or satisfaction

This verb means to be well-pleasing or acceptable to someone, to meet with favor or approval. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in Hebrews, describing pleasing God through faith. Enoch's translation is evidence he pleased God (11:5), faith is necessary to please God (11:6), and certain sacrifices are pleasing to God (13:16). The term emphasizes what satisfies or delights God.

(3×) Translators use pleasing language: Spanish agradar ('please'), German wohlgefallen ('be well-pleasing'). Hebrews 11:5 states that before Enoch's translation 'he was commended as having pleased God.' Hebrews 11:6 declares the principle: 'without faith it is impossible to please him,' establishing faith as essential to divine approval. Hebrews 13:16 encourages generosity: 'for such sacrifices are pleasing to God.' The verb focuses on what brings satisfaction or delight to God, with faith as the fundamental prerequisite. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Well-pleasing, acceptable; describing conduct or persons that are gratifying and approved, especially by God.

An adjective meaning 'well-pleasing' or 'acceptable,' used almost exclusively of what is pleasing to God. Paul urges believers to present their bodies as living sacrifices, holy and well-pleasing to God (Rom 12:1), to discern what is well-pleasing to the Lord (Rom 12:2; Eph 5:10), and to make it their ambition to be pleasing to him (2 Cor 5:9). In Hebrews 13:21, God equips believers for every good work that is well-pleasing in his sight. Spanish 'agradable' and French 'agréable' both carry the warmth of genuine approval, not mere tolerance.

well-pleasing / acceptable (9×) Well-pleasing or acceptable, describing conduct, offerings, or persons that genuinely gratify and win approval — almost always with God as the one pleased. Paul builds a theology of pleasing God around this word: presenting one's body as a living sacrifice 'well-pleasing to God' (Rom 12:1), testing and discerning 'the good and well-pleasing and perfect will of God' (Rom 12:2), making it one's ambition to be 'well-pleasing to him' (2 Cor 5:9), and serving Christ in righteousness as 'well-pleasing to God' (Rom 14:18). French 'agréable' and German 'wohlgefaellig' both capture the sense of warm divine approval, not grudging acceptance. PLEASANTNESS AND DELIGHT

Acceptably, pleasingly; in a manner that finds approval or gives pleasure

This adverb describes actions performed in a way that pleases or gains acceptance from another. In Hebrews 12:28, it modifies how believers should serve God—acceptably, with reverence and awe. The word carries connotations of meeting expectations and earning approval, not through mere external compliance but through the spirit in which service is rendered.

(1×) The Hebrews passage pairs this adverb with reverence and godly fear, showing that acceptable service involves both proper attitude and proper action. The multilingual evidence ('acceptably,' 'agradablemente,' 'wohlgefaellig') emphasizes the notion of pleasing service. This is worship that God receives favorably because it honors both his holiness and his grace. PLEASANTNESS AND DELIGHT

εὔβουλ-ος G2103 N-NMS (1×)
Eubulus, a personal name meaning 'good counselor' or 'well-advised'; a believer in Rome
Eubulus was one of four believers who sent greetings to Timothy through Paul's final letter (2 Timothy 4:21). The name itself means 'well-advised' or 'of good counsel,' though we know nothing else about this individual. He represents the otherwise anonymous faithful who surrounded Paul during his final Roman imprisonment, maintaining fellowship and supporting the apostle's ministry when others had departed.

(1×) Mentioned only in Paul's closing greetings (2 Timothy 4:21), Eubulus appears alongside Pudens, Linus, and Claudia as part of the Roman Christian community remaining loyal to Paul. The name's meaning ('well-advised') was common in the Greco-Roman world. His inclusion in this brief list suggests he was known to Timothy, perhaps having sent specific greetings or support. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

εὐγεν-ής G2104 Adj-NMP-C (3×) noble, well-born; of high birth or distinguished character
This adjective describes those of noble birth or high standing, whether by ancestry or character. Classical usage emphasizes both literal aristocratic birth and metaphorical nobility of spirit. In the New Testament it appears in varied contexts—a nobleman going to receive a kingdom (Luke 19:12), the Bereans' noble character in examining Scripture (Acts 17:11), and the irony that not many of noble birth are called by God (1 Corinthians 1:26).

(3×) Translations consistently indicate nobility: Spanish noble/más-nobles ('noble, more noble'), French noble/de-noble-race. Luke 19:12 begins the parable: 'A nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom.' Acts 17:11 commends the Bereans as 'more noble than those in Thessalonica' because they examined the Scriptures daily. 1 Corinthians 1:26 notes God's upside-down wisdom: 'not many of you were wise according to worldly standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth.' The term marks social status while Scripture sometimes inverts its value. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

fair weather, clear skies; calm atmospheric conditions without storm or rain
This noun describes fair or calm weather, the opposite of stormy conditions. In classical Greek it could also metaphorically denote tranquility or peace of mind, but in the New Testament it appears only literally. Jesus uses it in Matthew 16:2 when responding to the Pharisees and Sadducees who could read the weather signs (a red sky bringing fair weather) but failed to discern the signs of the times. The translations uniformly render it as weather-related: English 'fair weather,' Spanish 'buen tiempo,' French 'beau temps.' It represents the calm before—or absence of—the storm.

(1×) Fair weather, clear skies; the calm atmospheric condition without rain or storm. In Matthew 16:2, Jesus contrasts εὐδία (fair weather) with χειμών (storm), using weather prediction as an object lesson about spiritual discernment. The Pharisees could read the red evening sky and predict εὐδία for the next day, yet they failed to read the signs of the messianic age. All translations preserve the meteorological sense: Spanish buen tiempo, French beau temps, German retaining the Greek term, confirming this is literal weather terminology. CLOUDS AND SKY

εὐδοκ-έω G2106 V-AIA-2S (21×)
To be well-pleased with, take delight in; to consent, determine, or resolve to do something
A verb of heartfelt approval and purposeful resolve. In its primary sense, eudokeō expresses deep, settled pleasure—most memorably God's delight in his Son at the baptism and transfiguration (Matt 3:17; 17:5). The Spanish 'me complací' and French 'prendre plaisir' capture this warmth of divine satisfaction. In a secondary usage, the word shifts from emotion to volition: Paul and the Macedonians 'were pleased' to contribute to Jerusalem (Rom 15:26–27), meaning they willingly resolved to act. This dual range—from delight to deliberate consent—makes eudokeō a window into how pleasure and purpose intertwine in biblical thought.

1. be well-pleased, delight in (16×) Expresses God's or a person's settled delight and approval toward someone or something. At Jesus' baptism (Matt 3:17) and transfiguration (Matt 17:5), the Father's voice declares 'in whom I am well-pleased,' using this sense. The Spanish 'me complazco/agradó' and the German 'Wohlgefallen haben' both convey this deep, approving satisfaction rather than mere agreement. Covers 16 of 21 occurrences. DELIGHT PLEASURE CONSENT

2. consent, be willing, resolve (5×) Shifts from emotional delight to deliberate willingness—to think something good and resolve to do it. Paul says the Macedonians 'were pleased' (eudokēsan) to share their resources (Rom 15:26), and he himself 'was well-pleased' to depart and be with Christ (2 Cor 5:8). The Spanish 'tuvieron a bien' ('they deemed it good') nicely captures this volitional nuance. Covers 5 occurrences in the Pauline epistles. DELIGHT PLEASURE CONSENT

εὐδοκ-ία G2107 N-GFS (9×)
Good pleasure, gracious will, or delight — especially God's sovereign benevolent purpose and favorable disposition toward humanity.
Eudokia captures something deeply personal about the heart of God: his good pleasure, his willing delight, his gracious purpose. When the angels proclaim peace on earth to people of his eudokia (Luke 2:14), the word conveys not mere approval but active, joyful intention. Jesus himself uses it in prayer — 'Yes, Father, for such was your good pleasure' (Matt 11:26; Luke 10:21) — revealing a sovereign will that is also warm and personal. Paul deploys it for God's predestining purpose (Eph 1:5,9) and for his own heart's desire toward Israel (Rom 10:1), showing the word bridges divine sovereignty and human longing. Across languages, translations reach for 'bienveillance' (French), 'Wohlgefallen' (German), and 'buena voluntad' (Spanish), each capturing a different facet of this rich term.

good pleasure, gracious will, delight (9×) The benevolent purpose, sovereign delight, or gracious will of God (or of a person), denoting the favorable disposition that motivates action. In its nine NT occurrences, it refers predominantly to God's good pleasure — his joyful, purposeful will behind salvation and blessing. The multilingual evidence (French 'bienveillance,' German 'Wohlgefallen,' Spanish 'buena voluntad') confirms the sense hovers between active goodwill and deep personal satisfaction. Key passages include the angelic declaration at Christ's birth (Luke 2:14), Jesus's prayer of praise (Matt 11:26), and Paul's description of God's predestining purpose (Eph 1:5). WILL AND DESIRE

a good deed, kindness, or beneficial service; a favor or benefit conferred; beneficence

This noun denotes a good deed, act of kindness, or beneficial service done for another. In Acts 4:9, Peter and John are questioned about 'the good deed done to a crippled man'—healing him being both kindness and miracle. In 1 Timothy 6:2, slaves with believing masters should serve well because those benefiting from their service are 'believers and beloved'—the work done is beneficial service (εὐεργεσίας). The Spanish 'beneficio/buena obra' (benefit/good work) and French 'bienfait' (benefaction) both capture acts of kindness or beneficial service. Classical usage included public services done for the state and the title εὐεργέτης (benefactor) voted to honored citizens.

(2×) Spanish 'beneficio/buena obra' (benefit/good work) and French 'bienfait' (benefaction) show this word denotes beneficial acts. In Acts 4:9, Peter declares, 'If we are being examined today concerning a good deed (εὐεργεσίᾳ) done to a crippled man'—the healing at the Beautiful Gate is framed as both miracle and kindness. In 1 Timothy 6:2, Christian slaves shouldn't despise believing masters but serve even better 'because those who benefit from their service' (εὐεργεσίας) are believers and beloved—the slaves' work is good service benefiting fellow Christians. Classical Greek used this for public benefactions and civic services; benefactors received public honors. The biblical uses apply it to healing and faithful labor—both good deeds that help others. GIVING AND BESTOWING

εὐεργετ-έω G2109 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

To do good, confer benefits, act as a benefactor; to perform kind or helpful deeds

This verb captures active benevolence—not merely wishing well but actually doing good to others. Luke uses it in his summary of Jesus' ministry: he 'went about doing good and healing all who were oppressed by the devil' (Acts 10:38). The word emphasizes concrete acts of kindness and help, often with the connotation of someone with greater resources or power blessing those with less.

(1×) Peter's description of Jesus' ministry in Acts 10:38 pairs this verb with healing, showing that doing good took tangible form—delivering people from demonic oppression and physical affliction. The translations ('doing-good,' 'haciendo-bien,' 'faire-du-bien') capture the active, beneficial nature of Jesus' work. This was benefaction in its purest form: divine power employed for human flourishing. MORAL GOODNESS

εὐεργέτ-ης G2110 N-NMP (1×)

Benefactors, patrons; those who confer benefits or perform good deeds for others

In the Greco-Roman world, 'benefactor' was both a description and an official title conferred on rulers and wealthy individuals who funded public works, distributed grain, or otherwise served their communities. Jesus references this system in Luke 22:25, noting that Gentile rulers who exercise authority over others are called benefactors—often ironically, since their 'generosity' served to cement power and demand gratitude.

(1×) Jesus' use of this term (Luke 22:25) critiques the patronage system where political power masqueraded as benevolence. While Gentile rulers loved the title 'benefactor' (used officially by Hellenistic kings), Jesus' kingdom inverts this: greatness comes through service, not through leveraging gifts to create obligation. The translations ('benefactors,' 'bienhechores,' 'bienfaiteur') preserve both the noble aspiration and the ironic reality Jesus exposed. GIVING AND BESTOWING

εὔθετ-ος G2111 Adj-NMS (3×)

fit, suitable, useful; properly arranged or appropriate for a purpose

This adjective means well-arranged, suitable, or fit for a purpose. Classical usage includes things that are conveniently placed, well-fitting, or timely. In the New Testament it appears in contexts of suitability—fitness for kingdom service (Luke 9:62), usefulness for the kingdom (Luke 14:35), and fruitfulness of blessed land (Hebrews 6:7). The term emphasizes appropriateness and readiness for intended use.

(3×) Translations use fitness language: Spanish apto/útil ('fit, useful'), French apte ('fit'), German brauchbar ('useful'). Luke 9:62 contains Jesus' sobering word: 'No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God.' Luke 14:35 describes salt that loses saltiness: 'It is of no use either for the soil or for the manure pile,' emphasizing uselessness. Hebrews 6:7 blesses land that 'bears useful crops,' contrasting with thorny ground. Each use highlights suitability and effectiveness for the intended purpose. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

εὐθύς G2112 Adv (87×)

Immediately, at once, straightway; a temporal adverb indicating action without delay

Eutheos is the quintessential Markan adverb, appearing with striking frequency in the Second Gospel to propel the narrative forward at breathless pace. It marks the immediacy of divine action — the Spirit descends on Jesus immediately at his baptism (Matt 3:16), disciples leave their nets at once when called (Matt 4:20), and leprosy departs the moment Jesus speaks (Matt 8:3). The word conveys not merely speed but the decisive, unhindered quality of events driven by divine authority. Translations converge tightly: Spanish 'inmediatamente,' French 'aussitot,' German 'sogleich.'

immediately / at once (87×) A temporal adverb expressing that an action occurs without delay or interval, conveying the immediacy and decisiveness of events — particularly divine interventions and responses to Jesus' authority. Characteristic of Mark's rapid narrative style, it appears at pivotal moments: the Spirit's descent at baptism (Matt 3:16), the disciples' instant obedience (Matt 4:20), and instant healings (Matt 8:3). Cross-linguistic equivalents — 'inmediatamente,' 'aussitot,' 'sogleich' — uniformly capture the sense of instantaneous action. IMMEDIATELY AT ONCE

to run a straight course; to sail directly; to proceed on a direct or straightforward path

This verb describes ships running a straight course without detours. In both Acts occurrences, it describes Paul's sea voyages. In Acts 16:11, setting sail from Troas, they 'made a straight run to Samothrace'—a direct voyage with favorable winds. In Acts 21:1, leaving Ephesian elders, they 'ran a straight course to Cos'—again, direct sailing. The multilingual glosses capture both literal and metaphorical straightness: Spanish 'navegamos directamente' (we sailed directly), French 'droit' (straight), German preserving the Greek. The verb emphasizes direct, unhindered travel—favored by good winds and conditions.

(2×) Spanish 'navegamos directamente/navegando directamente' (we sailed directly/sailing directly) and French 'droit' (straight) show this nautical term means running a direct course. In Acts 16:11, Paul's team 'ran straight' (εὐθυδρομήσαμεν) from Troas to Samothrace—favorable winds enabled a direct voyage without tacking. In 21:1, departing from Miletus, they 'ran a straight course' (εὐθυδρομήσαντες) to Cos—again, direct sailing. The verb compounds εὐθύς (straight) with δραμεῖν (to run), emphasizing undeviating forward progress. Ancient sailing often required tacking against winds or hugging coastlines, so a straight run indicated ideal conditions. Luke uses this technical nautical term to convey swift, unhindered progress—perhaps symbolically suggesting God's providential favor on the journey. STRAIGHTNESS AND UPRIGHTNESS en: having-run-straight, we-sailed-straight | es: navegamos-directamente, navegando-directamente | fr: droit | de: εὐθυδρομήσαμεν, εὐθυδρομήσαντες Acts 16:11; Acts 21:1

εὐθῡμ-έω G2114 V-PIA-3S (3×)

be cheerful, have courage; be of good spirits or take heart
This verb means to be of good cheer, to have courage, or maintain cheerful spirits. It appears in contexts of encouragement amid difficulty. Paul uses it twice aboard a storm-tossed ship to encourage fearful sailors (Acts 27:22, 25), and James uses it to describe those who should sing praises (James 5:13). The term emphasizes internal disposition—maintaining good courage or expressing joy.

(3×) Translators use cheer and courage language: Spanish tened-ánimo/está-de-buen-ánimo ('have courage, is cheerful'), French être-joyeux ('be joyful'). Acts 27:22 records Paul's encouragement during the shipwreck: 'I urge you to take heart,' followed by assurance of survival. Acts 27:25 repeats: 'So take heart, men, for I have faith in God.' James 5:13 asks: 'Is anyone cheerful? Let him sing praise.' The verb marks both courage in adversity and joy in blessing, focusing on internal spirit rather than external circumstances. REJOICING AND GREETING cheerful, in good spirits; of good courage or heart; encouraged or confident

This adjective describes being cheerful, in good spirits, or encouraged. In Acts 24:10, Paul begins his defense before Felix by saying 'cheerfully I make my defense'—speaking confidently and with good courage. In Acts 27:36, after Paul's encouragement during the storm, all 276 aboard ship 'were encouraged' or became cheerful—their spirits lifted despite danger. The Spanish 'animados/animadamente' (encouraged/courageously) and French 'joyeux' (joyful) capture the good-spirited sense. Classical usage included spirited horses and generous hearts. The biblical uses emphasize confident courage in difficult circumstances rather than mere happiness.

(2×) Spanish 'animados/animadamente' (encouraged/courageously) and French 'joyeux' (joyful) show this word means good-spirited or cheerful. In Acts 24:10, Paul tells Felix, 'I cheerfully make my defense' (εὐθύμως ἀπολογοῦμαι)—facing trial with confidence and good courage rather than anxiety. In 27:36, after Paul assured the storm-tossed crew they would survive, 'they all were encouraged' (εὔθυμοι γενόμενοι) and took food—their spirits lifted by his confident faith. The adjective compounds εὖ (good, well) with θυμός (spirit, courage), describing a well-spirited or stout-hearted condition. Classical usage included spirited horses and generous persons. Both biblical uses show courage and confidence rising in difficult situations through faith and hope. REJOICING AND GREETING to make straight, guide straight, steer; metaphorically to direct, govern, put right

This verb carries both literal and figurative senses of making straight or directing toward a goal. In its physical sense it describes steering a ship or guiding something along a straight path. The metaphorical extension speaks to moral and spiritual direction—making crooked paths straight, whether in preparing the way for the Lord or in the governance and guidance of life. John the Baptist quotes Isaiah's call to 'make his paths straight' (John 1:23), while James uses the imagery of steering ships to illustrate the power of the tongue (James 3:4). The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'enderezad' = straighten, German 'gerade machen' = make straight) emphasizes the corrective dimension—bringing what is crooked into alignment.

(2×) The term encompasses both literal steering (as of ships, seen in James 3:4's nautical metaphor) and metaphorical straightening of paths (John 1:23's quotation of Isaiah 40:3). The Spanish 'enderezad' and French 'aplanir' (to level, smooth out) highlight the corrective action—removing obstacles and crookedness to prepare a way. The domain assignment to Moral Quality reflects how the NT uses this word not merely for physical direction but for spiritual and ethical preparation, making ready the way for God's work. STRAIGHTNESS AND UPRIGHTNESS

εὐθύς G2117 Adj-NFS (8×)

Straight, direct, or morally upright; used of roads made level and of conduct that is righteous.
An adjective meaning physically straight or morally right, εὐθύς is the antonym of σκολιός ('crooked'). Its most memorable New Testament use echoes Isaiah 40:3 — 'make straight the paths of the Lord' — appearing in all three Synoptics (Matt 3:3; Mark 1:3; Luke 3:4–5) as the herald cry of John the Baptist. Peter tells Simon Magus his heart is 'not right' before God (Acts 8:21), and the 'straight way' stands as a moral standard that Balaam abandoned (2 Pet 2:15). Spanish recta and French droit likewise carry both the geometric and ethical senses, reflecting how ancient languages naturally fuse physical and moral imagery.

straight, right, upright (8×) Physically straight or level, and by extension morally upright or correct. The dominant New Testament usage draws on Isa 40:3, where εὐθείας describes the Lord's paths that must be made straight — a metaphor for spiritual preparation proclaimed by John the Baptist (Matt 3:3; Mark 1:3; Luke 3:4–5). The crooked places (σκολιά) becoming straight (εὐθείας) in Luke 3:5 sharpens the physical-to-moral transfer. In Acts 8:21, Peter declares Simon's heart 'not straight' (εὐθεῖα) before God, and 2 Pet 2:15 speaks of those who forsake the 'straight way.' Acts 9:11 preserves the purely spatial sense in the street called 'Straight' in Damascus. STRAIGHTNESS AND UPRIGHTNESS en: Straight, right, straight | es: Recta, recta, rectas | fr: droit | de: gerade, sogleich Matt 3:3; Mark 1:3; Luke 3:4; Luke 3:5; Acts 8:21

εὐθύτης G2118 N-GFS (1×)

Straightness, uprightness; moral integrity and righteousness
While this noun can describe literal physical straightness, the Septuagint and New Testament employ it for moral rectitude—the quality of being upright in character and action. In Hebrews 1:8, it appears in a quotation from Psalm 45: 'the scepter of uprightness is the scepter of your kingdom.' This righteousness characterizes God's own rule and the Messiah who embodies divine justice.

(1×) The Hebrews citation applies Psalm 45's royal psalm to the Son, declaring that divine rule operates with perfect moral straightness. Unlike human kingdoms bent by corruption and favoritism, God's scepter remains unfailingly upright. The translations vary interestingly ('righteousness,' 'rectitud,' 'sincérité,' 'Aufrichtigkeit'), highlighting both judicial fairness and personal integrity—qualities perfectly united in Messiah's reign. RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JUSTICE

εὐκαιρ-έω G2119 V-IIA-3P (3×)

have opportunity, find time; have leisure or favorable occasion for something
This verb means to have opportunity, leisure, or favorable time for something. It can indicate having a convenient moment, finding time, or enjoying prosperous times. In the New Testament it appears in contexts where time or opportunity is either present or absent—disciples too busy to eat (Mark 6:31), Athenians spending time discussing ideas (Acts 17:21), and Apollos lacking opportunity to visit (1 Corinthians 16:12).

(3×) Translations use opportunity and time language: Spanish tenga-oportunidad/tenían-tiempo ('have opportunity, had time'), French avoir-le-loisir/avoir-le-temps ('have leisure, have time'). Mark 6:31 describes the disciples' busyness: 'they had no leisure even to eat,' showing packed ministry demands. Acts 17:21 characterizes Athenians and visitors who 'spent their time in nothing except telling or hearing something new.' 1 Corinthians 16:12 explains Apollos' absence: 'it was not at all his will to come now, but he will come when he has opportunity.' The verb marks the presence or absence of favorable time for action. TIME AND SEASONS

opportunity, favorable time, or good occasion; the right moment or season for action

This noun denotes a favorable opportunity, the right time or season for action. In Matthew 26:16, Judas sought 'an opportunity' to betray Jesus—waiting for the right moment away from crowds. In Luke 22:6, Judas looked for 'an opportunity to betray him to them in the absence of a crowd'—seeking the optimal conditions. The Spanish 'oportunidad' and French 'occasion' are direct cognates. Classical usage emphasized well-timed actions and seasonable moments—doing the right thing at the right time. Both biblical uses describe Judas calculating the opportune moment for betrayal, when Jesus would be vulnerable and the deed could be done quietly.

(2×) Spanish 'oportunidad' and French 'occasion' are transparent cognates showing this means opportunity or favorable time. In Matthew 26:16, after agreeing to betray Jesus, Judas 'sought an opportunity' (εὐκαιρίαν ἐζήτει) to hand him over—watching for the right moment. In Luke 22:6, Judas 'sought an opportunity' (ἐζήτει εὐκαιρίαν) to betray Jesus 'in the absence of a crowd'—waiting for circumstances when Jesus would be isolated and vulnerable, avoiding public outcry. The noun compounds εὖ (good, favorable) with καιρός (time, season), emphasizing the right or opportune moment for action. Both uses describe Judas's calculated waiting for optimal betrayal conditions—a sinister patience seeking the perfect treacherous moment. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14710 WITH 3 SENSES

opportune, well-timed, or seasonable; suitable, convenient, or favorable for a purpose

This adjective means opportune, well-timed, or seasonable—the right time for something. In Mark 6:21, Herodias found 'an opportune day' when Herod gave a banquet for his nobles—the perfect occasion to manipulate him into executing John the Baptist. In Hebrews 4:16, believers may approach God's throne to receive mercy and find grace 'to help in time of need' (literally, for well-timed help)—grace arriving at just the right moment. The Spanish 'oportuno' and French 'convenable' (suitable, fitting) both convey appropriate timing. Classical usage emphasized seasonable rain, well-timed words, and convenient locations.

(2×) Spanish 'oportuno' and French 'convenable' (suitable, fitting) show this adjective means well-timed or opportune. In Mark 6:21, Herodias's chance came when 'an opportune day' (ἡμέρας εὐκαίρου) arrived—Herod's birthday banquet provided the perfect occasion to manipulate him through his daughter's dance and rash oath, resulting in John's execution. In Hebrews 4:16, believers may boldly approach God's throne to receive mercy and find grace 'for well-timed help' (εἰς εὔκαιρον βοήθειαν)—grace that arrives precisely when needed. The adjective compounds εὖ (good, well) with καιρός (time, season). Classical usage included seasonable rainfall and conveniently located cities. Biblical uses contrast sinister opportunity (Herodias) with gracious divine timing (God's help). PROPRIETY AND FITTINGNESS

opportunely, at the right time; in season, at a favorable or convenient moment

This adverb means opportunely, at the right time, or in season. In Mark 14:11, when Judas offered to betray Jesus, the chief priests promised money and Judas 'sought an opportunity to betray him'—looking for the right timing. In 2 Timothy 4:2, Paul charges Timothy to preach the word, be ready 'in season and out of season'—whether the time seems opportune or not. The Spanish 'a tiempo/oportunamente' (in time/opportunely) and French 'au bon moment' (at the right moment) capture appropriate timing. The phrase 'in season and out of season' became proverbial for constant readiness regardless of circumstances.

(2×) Spanish 'a tiempo/oportunamente' (in time/opportunely) and French 'au bon moment' (at the right moment) show this adverb means at the opportune time. In Mark 14:11, after promising Judas money, the chief priests watched for how he might 'opportunely betray' (εὐκαίρως παραδοῖ) Jesus—waiting for the right moment. In 2 Timothy 4:2, Paul commands Timothy to 'preach the word, be ready in season and out of season' (εὐκαίρως ἀκαίρως)—whether the timing seems favorable or not, whether people want to hear or not. This adverbial pairing became proverbial: constant faithfulness regardless of circumstances. Classical usage emphasized seasonable action and favorable moments. The biblical contrast between opportune betrayal and persistent preaching shows timing's moral ambiguity: the same sense of right timing can serve treachery or faithfulness. TIME AND SEASONS

εὔκοπ-ος G2123 Adj-NNS-C (7×)

Easier (comparative of eukopos); used in comparisons of difficulty, especially in Jesus's rhetorical challenges.

This is the comparative form of eukopos ('easy'), appearing almost exclusively in Jesus's pointed rhetorical questions. When he asks 'Which is easier—to say your sins are forgiven, or to say rise and walk?' (Matt 9:5; Mark 2:9; Luke 5:23), the word frames a deliberate paradox about divine authority. It also appears in the memorable camel-through-the-needle's-eye saying (Matt 19:24; Mark 10:25). Spanish más fácil, French plus facile, and German leichter all render the straightforward comparative sense.

(7×) Easier, more feasible (comparative degree). Every NT occurrence sits inside a comparison introduced by Jesus to challenge assumptions. In the healing-and-forgiveness debates (Matt 9:5; Mark 2:9; Luke 5:23), eukopōteron sets up the logic that visible healing proves invisible forgiveness. In the camel-and-needle sayings (Matt 19:24; Mark 10:25; Luke 18:25), it underscores humanly impossible odds. French plus facile and German leichter confirm the uniform comparative meaning across all seven occurrences. COMPARISON AND MANNER

reverence, godly fear, or pious caution; devout carefulness or holy awe before God

This noun denotes reverent caution, godly fear, or devout carefulness—especially in religious contexts. In Hebrews 5:7, Christ offered prayers and supplications 'with reverent submission' or godly fear—his reverence toward the Father. In Hebrews 12:28, believers should worship God acceptably 'with reverence and awe'—holy fear appropriate to approaching the consuming fire. The Spanish 'piedad/reverencia' (piety/reverence) and German 'Gottesfurcht' (fear of God) both capture religious awe. Classical usage emphasized caution, discretion, and careful avoidance of offense. Biblical usage focuses on reverent fear before God—not terror, but awed respect that shapes worship and obedience.

(2×) Spanish 'piedad/reverencia' (piety/reverence) and German 'Gottesfurcht' (fear of God) both emphasize religious awe. In Hebrews 5:7, Christ in his incarnation offered prayers and supplications 'with loud cries and tears... and was heard because of his reverence' (εὐλαβείας)—his godly submission and reverent fear toward the Father characterized his prayer life. In 12:28, since we receive an unshakable kingdom, we should worship God acceptably 'with reverence and awe' (μετὰ εὐλαβείας), for our God is a consuming fire. The noun emphasizes devout caution and holy fear—not servile terror, but the awed respect appropriate when approaching the Almighty. Classical usage included caution to prevent mistakes and discretion in dangerous matters, but biblical usage elevates this to reverent fear before God. GODLINESS PIETY

To act with reverent caution, show godly fear; to take heed with religious seriousness

This verb encompasses reverent caution, taking something seriously enough to act carefully and appropriately. In Hebrews 11:7, it describes Noah's response to God's warning about the coming flood: 'moved with godly fear, he prepared an ark.' The word suggests neither terror nor casual dismissal, but the serious, active response appropriate when God speaks—taking divine warning with full weight.

(1×) Noah's example (Hebrews 11:7) shows reverent fear translating into concrete action. Warned about unseen judgment, he responded with appropriate seriousness—not paralyzed by fear but moved to obedient preparation. The multilingual evidence ('moved-with-fear,' 'reverenciando,' 'craindre,' 'sich-fuerchten') emphasizes the fear element, though the context makes clear this is productive, faith-filled reverence that prompts wise action. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE devout, reverent, pious; one who takes careful hold of sacred obligations

Built from 'eu' (well) and 'labein' (to take hold), this adjective originally described someone who proceeds cautiously and prudently. In the Septuagint and New Testament it shifted decisively toward religious reverence—a person who 'takes careful hold' of their obligations before God. Simeon in Luke 2:25 embodies this quality as he awaits the Messiah. Spanish 'devoto/piadoso' and French 'pieux' each capture the warm piety the word conveys, distinguishing it from mere caution.

(4×) Devout, reverent, genuinely pious—describing someone who approaches God and sacred duties with careful, heartfelt reverence. Simeon is called eulabes as he waits faithfully for Israel's consolation (Luke 2:25). The devout Jews gathered at Pentecost (Acts 2:5) and those who buried Stephen (Acts 8:2) share this quality. Ananias is commended as devout by the Jewish community (Acts 22:12). Spanish 'devoto/piadoso' and French 'pieux' highlight the warmth of genuine piety rather than mere prudence. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4053 WITH 4 SENSES

εὐλογ-έω G2127 V-PMA-2P (44×)

To bless, pronounce a blessing upon; to be blessed or declared blessed; to praise or give thanks to God.

A verb that moves in three directions at once. Most often it describes the downward act of blessing — God blessing people, Jesus blessing bread, a patriarch blessing his children (Matt 14:19; Luke 24:50). In its passive and perfect participial forms it becomes the joyful acclamation 'Blessed is he who comes in the name of the LORD!' (Matt 21:9), a declaration of received divine favor. Yet in a handful of passages the blessing turns upward: Zechariah's tongue is loosed and he 'blesses God' (Luke 1:64), and Paul speaks of the 'cup of blessing which we bless' (1 Cor 10:16). Spanish preserves all three directions with a single 'bendecir,' while German 'segnen' and 'loben' sometimes split them apart.

1. bless someone, pronounce blessing (26×) To invoke God's favor upon a person, object, or group — the active transitive act of pronouncing blessing. Jesus blesses the loaves (Matt 14:19; Mark 6:41), blesses the disciples at his ascension (Luke 24:50–51), and Paul urges believers to 'bless those who persecute you' (Rom 12:14). Spanish 'bendecir' and French 'bénir' both derive from Latin benedicere, preserving the speech-act character: to bless is to speak well over someone. BLESSING AND PRAISE

en: bless, blessed, blessing | es: bendecid, bendiciendo, bendijo | fr: bénir | de: segnen, segnet Matt 5:44; Matt 14:19; Matt 26:26; Mark 6:41; Mark 8:7

2. blessed, in state of blessedness (13×) To be in a state of divine favor, declared blessed — the passive and perfect participial use. The Palm Sunday cry 'Blessed is he who comes in the name of the LORD' (Matt 21:9; Mark 11:9) and Jesus' pronouncement 'Come, you blessed of my Father' (Matt 25:34) exemplify this sense. Spanish distinguishes 'Bendito' (blessed one) from the active 'bendecid' (bless!), and German 'gesegnet' captures the received quality of the blessing. BLESSING AND PRAISE

en: Blessed, are-blessed, blessed | es: Bendecido, Bendita, Bendito | fr: bénir | de: segnen, segnet Matt 21:9; Matt 23:39; Matt 25:34; Mark 11:9; Mark 11:10

3. praise, give thanks to God (5×) To praise or give thanks directed upward toward God — blessing as doxology. After his muteness ends, Zechariah's first act is blessing God (Luke 1:64), the disciples continually bless God in the temple (Luke 24:53), and James warns against using the same tongue to 'bless the Lord' and curse people (Jas 3:9). French 'bénir Dieu' and Spanish 'bendecimos a Dios' show how the same verb pivots from conferring favor to rendering praise. BLESSING AND PRAISE

en: blessing, we-bless | es: bendecimos, bendiciendo | fr: bénir | de: segnen, segnet Luke 1:64; Luke 24:53; 1Cor 4:12; 1Cor 10:16; Jas 3:9

εὐλογ-ητός G2128 Adj-GMS (8×)

Blessed, worthy of praise; a verbal adjective reserved almost exclusively for God as the object of blessing.

This verbal adjective from εὐλογέω ('to bless') is a term of high liturgical register, used in the New Testament almost exclusively of God or Christ. It appears in doxological formulae — 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Cor 1:3; Eph 1:3; 1 Pet 1:3) — and in the high priest's question about whether Jesus is 'the Christ, the Son of the Blessed' (Mark 14:61). Paul's declaration that Christ is 'God over all, blessed forever' (Rom 9:5) presses the term into a Christological claim. Spanish bendito and French béni reflect the same devotional weight, marking the word as belonging to worship rather than casual speech.

blessed (8×) Worthy of blessing and praise, applied as a divine epithet. Unlike the more common μακάριος (blessed in the sense of fortunate), εὐλογητός is reserved for God as the recipient of human praise and adoration. It anchors the great doxologies: 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Cor 1:3; Eph 1:3; 1 Pet 1:3), and Paul's theologically charged 'who is over all, God blessed forever' (Rom 9:5). The high priest's phrase 'the Son of the Blessed' (Mark 14:61) uses it as a reverential circumlocution for God himself. Luke 1:68 places it in Zechariah's hymn, linking it to Israel's covenant praise tradition. BLESSING AND PRAISE en: Blessed, Blessed-be, blessed | es: Bendito, bendito | fr: Béni, béni | de: gepriesen, Εὐλογητὸς Mark 14:61; Luke 1:68; Rom 1:25; Rom 9:5; 2Cor 1:3

εὐλογ-ία G2129 N-DFP (16×)

Blessing—whether a divine pronouncement of favor, a concrete gift of bounty, or (rarely) deceptive flattery disguised as praise.
Literally 'good word' (eu + logos), this noun spans a wide arc in Paul's letters. At its fullest it names the spiritual blessings God bestows in Christ (Eph 1:3), the 'cup of blessing' at the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 10:16), and the promised blessing of Abraham extended to all nations (Gal 3:14). Paul also uses it concretely of a generous monetary gift: what the Corinthians promised should be ready as a 'blessing' (bounty), not as extortion (2 Cor 9:5–6). In one striking counter-usage, Romans 16:18 warns that false teachers use 'eulogia'—smooth, fair-sounding speech—to deceive the naive, inverting the word's positive valence into a weapon of manipulation.

1. blessing, act of blessing (15×) Blessing as a pronouncement of divine favor, a state of blessedness, or a concrete gift from God. Covers the 'spiritual blessings' of Eph 1:3, the covenantal 'blessing of Abraham' (Gal 3:14), the eucharistic 'cup of blessing' (1 Cor 10:16), and the generous bounty Paul encourages from the Corinthians (2 Cor 9:5–6). In Hebrews, Isaac and Esau both contend over the patriarchal blessing (Heb 6:7; 12:17). Spanish 'bendición/bendiciones,' French 'bénédiction,' and German 'Segen' all converge on a single warm, sacred vocabulary across these passages—testimony to how consistently the word evokes divine goodness. BLESSING BENEDICTION
en: blessing, blessings, of-blessing | es: bendiciones, bendición, de-bendición | fr: bénédiction | de: Segen Rom 15:29; 1Cor 10:16; 2Cor 9:5; 2Cor 9:6

2. flattery, smooth/fair speech (1×) Flattery or smooth speech used deceptively—a bitter inversion of the word's usual meaning. In Romans 16:18, Paul warns that certain people 'by smooth talk and flattery (eulogia) deceive the hearts of the unsuspecting.' Here the 'good word' becomes a rhetorical weapon. Notably, most translations struggle to signal this shift: Spanish still renders 'bendiciones' and French 'bénédiction,' but English breaks sharply to 'flattery' or 'fair speech,' capturing the irony that blessing-language can itself become a tool of deception. BLESSING BENEDICTION
en: flattery | es: bendiciones | fr: bénédiction | de: Segen Rom 16:18

εὐμετά-δοτος G2130 Adj-AMP (1×)

Generous, ready to share; liberal in giving and distributing resources
This adjective describes the quality of being readily disposed to share what one has with others. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy 6:18, instructing the wealthy 'to be generous and ready to share.' The word captures not grudging compliance with charitable expectations but a cheerful willingness to distribute resources, seeing possessions as meant for sharing rather than hoarding.

(1×) In Paul's instruction to the wealthy (1 Timothy 6:18), this quality accompanies doing good works—those with material abundance should be characterized by generosity, freely sharing rather than clutching their resources. The translations ('generous,' 'generosos,' 'freigebig') consistently emphasize liberal, openhanded distribution. This generosity serves as antidote to the love of money and demonstrates trust in God rather than riches. GIVING AND BESTOWING
en: generous | es: generosos | fr: εὐμεταδότους | de: freigebig 1Tim 6:18

Εὐνίκη G2131 N-DFS (1×)

Eunice, a personal name meaning 'good victory'; Timothy's mother
Eunice was Timothy's mother, a Jewish believer married to a Greek man (Acts 16:1). Paul commends her sincere faith in 2 Timothy 1:5, noting that it dwelt first in her mother Lois, then in Eunice, and now in Timothy—a beautiful three-generation testimony. Despite the challenges of a mixed marriage in that cultural context, Eunice successfully transmitted faith to her son, who became Paul's most trusted co-worker.

(1×) Paul's reference (2 Timothy 1:5) honors the faith legacy passed from grandmother Lois through Eunice to Timothy. This Jewish-Christian mother partnered with her mother to ground Timothy in Scripture from childhood (2 Timothy 3:15), despite his Greek father's presumably different religious orientation. The name 'good victory' proved prophetic—her son's ministry represented triumph for the gospel across the Mediterranean world. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

εὐνο-έω G2132 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

To be favorably disposed, show goodwill; to settle matters peacefully
This verb indicates being well-inclined toward someone, maintaining friendly relations, and seeking peaceful resolution. Jesus uses it in Matthew 5:25: 'Come to terms quickly with your accuser while you are going with him to court.' The participial form here could mean 'be reconciled' or 'be agreeable'—in either case, the wisdom is to settle disputes early rather than letting them escalate to formal judgment.

(1×) Jesus' legal parable (Matthew 5:25) urges quick reconciliation with adversaries before reaching court, where outcomes become unpredictable and potentially severe. The verb emphasizes the disposition to settle peacefully rather than letting conflict fester. The multilingual evidence ('agreeable,' 'bien-dispuesto,' 'être-bien-veillant') highlights the attitude of goodwill that enables practical resolution—humility that settles rather than pride that litigates. PEACE AND WELLBEING
en: agreeable | es: bien-dispuesto | fr: être-bienveillant | de: εὐνοῶν Matt 5:25

εὔνοιᾰ G2133 N-GFS (1×)

Goodwill, favorable disposition; kindness and benevolence toward others
This noun captures the quality of being favorably inclined toward someone, marked by kindness, benevolence, and positive intent. In Ephesians 6:7, Paul instructs slaves to serve 'with goodwill, as to the Lord and not to men.' The word points to the internal attitude that transforms mere compliance into cheerful service—doing work heartily because one is ultimately serving Christ, not just human masters.

(1×) Paul's instruction to slaves (Ephesians 6:7) transforms menial service into worship by reorienting the servant's heart toward Christ. Goodwill here is not naive optimism about earthly masters but genuine cheerfulness rooted in serving the Lord through whatever work one does. The translations ('good-will,' 'buena-voluntad,' 'Wohlwollen') emphasize positive disposition, the generous spirit that gives even difficult work as an offering to God. WILL AND DESIRE to castrate, make into a eunuch; to deprive of procreative power

This verb means to castrate or make someone a eunuch. In Matthew 19:12, Jesus discusses three types of eunuchs: those born that way, those 'made eunuchs by men' (castrated), and those who 'made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven' (chose celibacy for ministry). The Spanish glosses 'fueron hechos eunucos/se hicieron eunucos' (were made eunuchs/made themselves eunuchs) distinguish passive from active voice. The first refers to literal castration imposed by others; the second to voluntary celibacy chosen for God's service. Jesus uses shocking imagery to validate both involuntary conditions and voluntary renunciation of marriage for kingdom purposes.

(2×) Spanish 'fueron hechos eunucos/se hicieron eunucos' (were made eunuchs/made themselves eunuchs) and French 'faire eunuque' (to make eunuch) show this verb means to castrate or render unable to procreate. Both occurrences appear in Matthew 19:12, where Jesus identifies three types of eunuchs: born that way, 'made eunuchs by men' (εὐνουχίσθησαν, passive—castrated by others, often for royal service), and those who 'made themselves eunuchs' (εὐνούχισαν ἑαυτούς, active—chose celibacy) for the kingdom. The third category is metaphorical: voluntary renunciation of marriage for ministry, not literal self-mutilation. Jesus validates both involuntary inability and voluntary celibacy as legitimate conditions, countering cultural pressure for universal marriage. EUNUCH COURT OFFICIAL

εὐνοῦχος G2135 N-NMP (8×)

A eunuch; a castrated male, often a court official or chamberlain; also used figuratively of voluntary celibacy.

From εὐνή ('bed') + ἔχω ('to hold'), the word originally described a guardian of the bedchamber — a castrated man trusted with access to royal women. In Acts 8:27–39, the Ethiopian eunuch is a high-ranking treasury official under Queen Candace, and his encounter with Philip becomes a landmark story of the gospel crossing ethnic and social boundaries. In Matt 19:12, Jesus stretches the term across three categories: those born eunuchs, those made so by others, and those who 'have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven' — a figurative use referring to voluntary celibacy. Spanish eunuco and French eunuque preserve the Greek almost unchanged.

eunuch / castrated court official (8×) A castrated male, typically serving as a court official or royal chamberlain, and by extension one who lives in voluntary celibacy. The literal sense dominates in Acts 8:27–39, where the Ethiopian eunuch — a powerful official under Queen Candace — reads Isaiah on his chariot and is baptized by Philip. Jesus' teaching in Matt 19:12 uses the term three ways: eunuchs from birth, eunuchs made by human hands, and those who 'have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven,' extending the word into a metaphor for radical self-denial. The multilingual evidence (Spanish eunuco, French eunuque, German Eunuch) reflects how universally the Greek term was borrowed. EUNUCH COURT OFFICIAL

εὐοδ-ία G2136 N-AFS (1×)

Euodia, a personal name possibly meaning 'good journey' or 'prosperity'; a believer at Philippi

Euodia was a prominent woman in the Philippian church whom Paul urges to reconcile with Syntyche in Philippians 4:2. These two women had 'labored side by side' with Paul in the gospel (4:3), suggesting significant ministry partnership. Their public disagreement troubled Paul enough to address it by name in his letter, showing both the importance of their work and the damage their conflict posed to church unity.

(1×) Paul's appeal to Euodia and Syntyche (Philippians 4:2-3) treats them as full ministry partners whose conflict required urgent resolution. Both had 'contended' alongside Paul for the gospel—language suggesting vigorous partnership in evangelism or other ministry. The name Euodia appears only here, but Paul's direct appeal shows her influence in the Philippian community and his pastoral concern that their unity be restored for the church's health. PROSPERING AND SUCCESS

to prosper, succeed, have a good journey; to be granted success by God

Originally meaning 'to help someone on their way,' this verb broadened in biblical usage to encompass any kind of prospering or success, often understood as divinely granted. Paul's prayer for a safe journey to Rome (Rom 1:10) preserves the travel sense, while his instruction to set aside funds 'as one prospers' (1 Cor 16:2) shifts to financial well-being. In 3 John 1:2 it appears twice, covering both material prosperity and spiritual health. The Spanish 'prosperar' and French 'prospérer' both capture the breadth.

(4×) To prosper, succeed, or be granted a favorable outcome—originally of journeys, then broadened to general well-being. Paul uses the travel sense when he prays to reach Rome by God's will (Rom 1:10). In 1 Corinthians 16:2 it describes financial gain—saving 'as one may prosper.' Third John 1:2 employs it twice: once for physical health and once for the soul's flourishing, showing the word's full semantic stretch. Spanish 'prosperar' and French 'prospérer' confirm the unified prosperity sense. RICHES AND WEALTH

εὐπειθ-ής G2138 Adj-NFS (1×)

Ready to obey, compliant; easily persuaded toward good, reasonable

This adjective describes the quality of being willing to listen to reason and respond positively to good counsel. James uses it to characterize heavenly wisdom: 'the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, open to reason' (James 3:17). This openness to reason contrasts with stubborn, factious earthly wisdom—it marks those who can be appealed to, who listen and adjust when shown better ways.

(1×) In James' contrast between earthly and heavenly wisdom (3:17), being 'open to reason' appears alongside purity, peace, and gentleness. This is not spineless conformity but the humility to consider others' perspectives and yield when truth requires it. The translations ('open-to-reason,' 'dócil,' 'folgsam') capture teachability and responsiveness—hallmarks of wisdom that builds community rather than insisting on its own way regardless of evidence or appeals. OBEY HEARKEN

εὐπερί-στᾰτος G2139 Adj-AFS (1×)

Easily entangling, readily besetting; that which clings closely and impedes

This rare adjective describes something that easily wraps around and hinders movement—like clothing that catches on obstacles or entangles the legs during a race. The author of Hebrews uses it to describe 'the sin which clings so closely' (12:1), urging believers to 'lay aside every weight' and this entangling sin that hinders their race of faith. The image is of an athlete stripping away anything that might impede peak performance.

(1×) In Hebrews' athletic metaphor (12:1), this adjective describes sin that grabs at runners like loose garments, slowing them down in the Christian race. The preceding verse references the 'great cloud of witnesses'—faithful saints who ran well—now spectators to our race. The multilingual evidence ('easily-entangling,' 'que-fácilmente-rodea,' 'leicht-umstrickend') preserves the imagery of something that wraps around and restricts, making disentanglement urgent for those who would run well. STUMBLING BLOCKS

en: easily-entangling | es: que-fácilmente-rodea | fr: leicht-umstrickend | de: leicht-umstrickend Heb 12:1

εὐποιΐα G2140 N-GFS (1×)

Doing good, beneficence; the practice of performing beneficial acts for others

This noun denotes the activity of doing good to others—concrete acts of kindness and benefit. In Hebrews 13:16, it appears alongside sharing: 'Do not neglect to do good and to share what you have, for such sacrifices are pleasing to God.' The word emphasizes not mere good intentions but actual beneficial deeds that cost something and help others, which God receives as genuine worship.

(1×) Hebrews 13:16 pairs doing good with sharing resources, calling these 'sacrifices' that please God. This reframes beneficence as worship—not replacing but complementing praise (v.15). The translations ('doing-good,' 'beneficencia,' 'Wohltun') emphasize active goodness, tangible help rendered to others. In Hebrews' sacrificial economy, generous deeds toward others constitute acceptable offerings to God, who values mercy expressed practically. MORAL GOODNESS

en: doing-good | es: beneficencia | fr: Wohltun | de: Wohltun Heb 13:16

εὐπορ-έω G2141 V-IIM-3S (1×)

To prosper, be well-off; to have resources and means

This verb describes having sufficient or abundant resources, being in favorable circumstances, prospering financially or materially. Luke uses it in Acts 11:29 when describing how the Antioch disciples decided to send relief to Judean believers: 'each according to his ability' (literally, 'according to how each one prospered'). The word indicates having means available to share, not mere subsistence.

(1×) The Antioch church's relief effort (Acts 11:29) shows early Christian generosity responding proportionally to means. Those who prospered or had resources contributed according to their ability, establishing a pattern of need-based sharing across geographical boundaries. The translations vary ('was-prospered,' 'prosperaba,' 'avoir-les-moyens') but consistently indicate available resources, financial capacity that enabled generous response to distant brothers' famine needs. RICHES AND WEALTH

Prosperity, abundance; favorable circumstances and plentiful resources

This noun indicates abundant resources, prosperity, or favorable material circumstances. In Acts 19:25, Demetrius the silversmith rallies fellow craftsmen against Paul by noting that 'from this business we have our prosperity'—the idol-making trade that enriched them but which the gospel threatened. The word captures material well-being, the economic flourishing that can become either blessing or idol.

(1×) Demetrius' speech (Acts 19:25) reveals prosperity as a powerful motivator. The silversmiths' wealth came from manufacturing Artemis shrines, but Paul's preaching endangered their lucrative trade by turning people from idols. The translations ('prosperity,' 'prosperidad,' 'prospérité') emphasize material abundance. This episode illustrates how economic interests can fuel religious opposition when the gospel threatens profitable but ungodly enterprises. RICHES AND WEALTH

εὐπρέπ-εια G2143 N-NFS (1×)

Comeliness, outward beauty; attractive appearance or graceful form

This noun describes outward beauty, attractive appearance, or elegant form. James uses it in his illustration of life's transience: the rich will fade away 'in the midst of his pursuits, as the flower of the grass... its beauty perishes' (1:11). Just as wildflowers display stunning but brief beauty before the scorching sun withers them, human glory and attractive appearance prove fleeting when eternity's heat arrives.

(1×) James' botanical metaphor (1:11) pairs this noun with the flower's fading—once beautiful, now withered. The image recalls Isaiah 40:6-8, where human glory is likened to grass that withers. The translations ('beauty,' 'hermosura,' 'Schoenheit') emphasize visible attractiveness. James warns the wealthy specifically: earthly beauty, status, and splendor are temporary as wildflowers; only God's word and will endure. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

εὐπρόσ-δεκτος G2144 Adj-NMS (5×)

Acceptable, well-received, pleasing; describing offerings, service, or actions that find favorable reception before God.

A compound adjective meaning 'well-received' or 'readily acceptable,' used exclusively in contexts of divine approval. Paul describes the Gentiles as an offering 'acceptable' to God through the Spirit's sanctifying work (Rom 15:16) and prays that his service in Jerusalem would prove acceptable to the saints (Rom 15:31). The term echoes the OT language of pleasing sacrifice. In 2 Corinthians 6:2, Paul quotes Isaiah to declare 'now is the acceptable time' of salvation. Spanish 'aceptable,' French 'agréable,' and German 'annehmbar' all converge on the idea of favorable reception.

(5×) Acceptable, well-received, pleasing — especially of that which finds favorable reception before God. The multilingual evidence is remarkably unified: Spanish 'aceptable/bien aceptable,' French 'agréable,' and German 'annehmbar' all point to the same concept of willing acceptance. In Rom 15:16 Gentile believers are an acceptable offering sanctified by the Holy Spirit. Rom 15:31 applies it to Paul's hope that his ministry be well-received. 2 Cor 6:2 uses it in the prophetic formula 'acceptable time' of salvation. 2 Cor 8:12 teaches that a gift is acceptable according to what one has. 1 Pet 2:5 describes spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Christ. PLEASANTNESS AND DELIGHT

Constant attendance, devoted service; persistent availability and focus

This rare compound adjective describes persistent, undistracted attendance or devotion to someone or something. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 7:35 regarding the unmarried state: it promotes 'undivided devotion to the Lord' (literally, 'constant attendance'). The word suggests being readily available, attentive, and focused without the divided loyalties that marriage necessarily brings.

(1×) Paul's discussion of marriage and singleness (1 Corinthians 7:35) presents this quality as an advantage of the unmarried state—they can offer constant, undivided attendance to the Lord's work without the legitimate competing claims of spouse and family. The translations ('constant-attendance,' 'devoción-constante,' 'assidu,' 'ungestoert') emphasize both persistence and freedom from distraction. This isn't superiority but practical reality: singleness allows certain kinds of focused devotion. SERVING AND MINISTRY

εὐπροσωπ-έω G2146 V-ANA (1×)

To make a good showing, present an attractive appearance; to look impressive outwardly

This verb means to make an attractive outward display or present a good appearance, often with the implication that the exterior masks reality. Paul uses it in Galatians 6:12 to criticize Judaizers: 'those who want to make a good showing in the flesh' by compelling Gentiles to be circumcised. Their motivation wasn't theological conviction but avoiding persecution—looking respectable to observers while evading the cross's offense.

(1×) Paul's accusation (Galatians 6:12) exposes the Judaizers' true motive—making an impressive outward show to avoid persecution for the cross. By requiring circumcision, they could present themselves as Torah-observant, evading hostility from Jewish opponents. The translations ('make-good-showing,' 'presentar-buen-aspecto,' 'gut-aussehen') emphasize external appearance. Paul contrasts this with his own glory: boasting only in the cross, bearing Jesus' marks regardless of how that looks to critics. PRIDE AND ARROGANCE

εὑρίσκω G2147 V-AIP-3P (176×)

To find, discover, or come upon someone or something; passive: to be found, turn out to be, be revealed.

A verb of perception and encounter at the heart of many New Testament narratives. Whether a shepherd finding a lost sheep, a merchant discovering a pearl of great price (Matt 13:44-46), or Mary being found with child (Matt 1:18), εὑρίσκω bridges deliberate search and unexpected discovery. The passive voice often carries a theological weight—being 'found' in Christ or 'found' faithful. Arabic wajada, Korean 찾다/발견하다, and Swahili -pata all capture facets of this rich semantic range, from physical locating to intellectual realization.

1. find, discover (144×) The active sense: to find, discover, or come upon by searching or by chance. This covers the vast majority of occurrences—locating people (Matt 20:6, finding idle workers), objects (Matt 13:44, treasure in a field), or abstract realities (finding rest, finding favor). Arabic wajada/yajidu and Korean 찾았다 consistently render this active discovery. The word moves fluidly between physical search and cognitive recognition. FINDING AND DISCOVERING en: found, they-found | es: encontraron, hallaron, lo-hallaron | fr: trouver | de: finden, findet Matt 13:44; Matt 13:46; Matt 18:28; Matt 20:6; Matt 21:19

2. be found, be discovered (31×) The passive sense: to be found, be discovered, turn up, or turn out to be in a certain state. Used when the subject is the one discovered rather than the discoverer—Mary 'was found' with child (Matt 1:18), the lost son 'has been found' (Luke 15:24, 32). Swahili -patikana and Arabic wujida capture this passivity well. Often theologically loaded: being found worthy, being found in Christ, or being revealed in one's true character (Luke 17:18). FINDING AND DISCOVERING

3. (1×) A participial or specialized sense of obtaining or securing something through effort, as in Hebrews 9:12 where Christ is said to have 'found' (obtained, secured) eternal redemption. Spanish habiendo-obtenido ('having obtained') captures the nuance precisely—this is not stumbling upon something but achieving or procuring it, aligning εὑρίσκω with the sense of acquisition through purposeful action. FINDING AND DISCOVERING

εὐρακύλων G2148 N-NMS (1×)

Euroclydon or Euraquilo, a stormy northeast wind in the Mediterranean; a violent tempestuous wind

This term designates a fierce northeastern wind in the Mediterranean, combining Greek and Latin elements (probably 'euro-' from Greek for east wind and 'aquilo' from Latin for north wind). In Acts 27:14, this 'northeaster' strikes Paul's ship sailing to Rome, driving it off course and nearly destroying the vessel. Ancient sailors dreaded this particular wind for its violence and the way it could catch ships unexpectedly.

(1×) Luke's detailed shipwreck narrative (Acts 27:14) identifies this tempestuous wind as the cause of Paul's maritime disaster. Rising suddenly from the island of Crete, it drove the ship southwest across the Mediterranean for fourteen terror-filled days before they finally ran aground at Malta. The technical nautical terminology shows Luke's concern for accuracy in recording this harrowing journey. Ancient mariners' fear of this wind proved well-founded. STORMS AND TEMPESTS

εὐρῠ́χωρ-ος G2149 Adj-NFS (1×)

Spacious, broad, wide; having ample room or width

This adjective describes physical breadth or spaciousness—something wide, roomy, or expansive. Jesus uses it in the Sermon on the Mount to describe the road leading to destruction: 'the gate is wide and the way is easy that leads to destruction' (Matthew 7:13). The broad, spacious path requires no struggle to stay on—it accommodates every inclination, making it tragically popular while leading to ruin.

(1×) Jesus' two-roads teaching (Matthew 7:13) contrasts the spacious way with the narrow path to life. The broad road's width symbolizes its ease and popularity—no self-denial required, no fighting against the current, plenty of company. The translations ('broad,' 'espacioso,' 'spacieux') preserve the spatial metaphor. This spaciousness that seems so attractive proves deadly, while the constricted path that requires struggle leads to life. WIDE BROAD SPACIOUS

εὐσέβεια G2150 N-GFS (15×)

Godliness, piety, devout reverence; faithful living rooted in proper devotion to God.

Eusebeia denotes a life oriented toward God in both inner reverence and outward conduct. It is the signature virtue of the Pastoral Epistles, where Paul urges Timothy to 'train yourself for godliness' (1 Tim 4:7) and names it among the virtues to pursue (1 Tim 6:11). The 'mystery of godliness' in 1 Timothy 3:16 anchors the concept in the incarnation itself. Second Peter adds eusebeia to the ladder of spiritual growth alongside self-control, endurance, and love (2 Pet 1:6–7). The word bridges inward disposition and visible practice — not mere religious feeling but a whole pattern of God-honoring life. The Spanish 'piedad,' French 'piété,' and German 'Frömmigkeit' all capture both the devotional warmth and the ethical seriousness of the term.

godliness, piety, devout reverence (15×) Reverence toward God expressed through faithful, upright living — both the inward disposition of devotion and its outward expression in conduct. Central to the Pastoral Epistles, where it appears as the goal of spiritual training (1 Tim 4:7–8), the content of sound doctrine (1 Tim 6:3), and a virtue to be actively pursued (1 Tim 6:11). In 2 Peter 1:6–7 it occupies a key position in the chain of Christian virtues. Spanish 'piedad' and French 'piété' reflect the devotional dimension; German 'Frömmigkeit' captures the holistic piety. GODLINESS PIETY

to act piously, show reverence, or worship devoutly; to honor or serve with religious devotion

This verb means to act piously, show reverence toward God, or discharge religious duties. In Acts 17:23, Paul observes that Athenians are 'very religious' or carefully reverent in all things—even worshiping an unknown god to avoid offending any deity. In 1 Timothy 5:4, widows with children or grandchildren should learn to 'show godliness to their own household'—practicing piety through caring for family. The multilingual evidence shows religious devotion: Spanish 'adoráis/honrar piadosamente' (you worship/to honor piously), French 'être pieux' (to be pious). Classical usage included outward acts of service toward gods; biblical usage extends to family care as religious duty.

(2×) Spanish 'adoráis/honrar piadosamente' (you worship/to honor piously) and French 'être pieux' (to be pious) show this verb means to practice religious devotion. In Acts 17:23, Paul tells the Athenians, 'What you worship' (εὐσεβεῖτε) as unknown, I proclaim to you—their religious scrupulosity led them to honor even unidentified deities. In 1 Timothy 5:4, widows with family should first learn 'to show piety toward their own household' (εὐσεβεῖν)—honoring parents and grandparents through care is an act of religious devotion, repaying what they owe. Classical usage emphasized reverent acts toward gods and outward religious observance. Paul extends this: true piety includes practical family care, not just temple rituals. Both uses involve honoring the divine or those God has placed in our care. GODLINESS PIETY

εὐσεβ-ής G2152 Adj-AMP (3×)

devout, godly, pious; characterized by reverence and religious devotion

This adjective describes those marked by piety, religious devotion, and reverence toward God. Classical usage emphasized fulfilling sacred duties and showing proper respect to the divine. In the New Testament it characterizes individuals known for genuine godliness—Cornelius and his household (Acts 10:2, 7) and the faithful whom God delivers (2 Peter 2:9). The term marks visible, active devotion rather than mere profession.

(3×) Translations consistently use piety language: Spanish piadoso/piadosos ('pious, devout'), French pieux ('pious'), German fromm ('devout'). Acts 10:2 introduces Cornelius as 'a devout man who feared God with all his household,' establishing his character before his conversion. Acts 10:7 describes one of his soldiers as 'a devout soldier from among those who attended him.' 2 Peter 2:9 assures that 'the Lord knows how to rescue the godly from trials.' The term marks observable religious commitment and reverence toward God. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4053 WITH 4 SENSES

in a godly manner, with piety and reverence toward God

This adverb describes living with genuine devotion and reverence toward God. Paul uses it in 2 Timothy 3:12 to describe all who desire to live godly lives in Christ Jesus, warning they will face persecution. In Titus 2:12, it appears in the triad of self-controlled, upright, and godly living that grace teaches believers to pursue. The multilingual evidence (Spanish piadosamente, German gottesfuerchtig) consistently emphasizes the religious devotion aspect rather than mere moral behavior.

(2×) Appearing only twice in the New Testament, this adverb consistently describes lifestyle choices marked by authentic worship and fear of God. The contexts in 2 Timothy and Titus link it to discipleship and sanctification, showing that godly living inevitably provokes opposition from the world while simultaneously being the expected fruit of gospel transformation. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4053 WITH 4 SENSES

εὔσημ-ος G2154 Adj-AMS (1×)

Clear, intelligible, easily understood; marked by clarity and distinctness

This adjective describes something easily known or understood—clear, intelligible, distinct. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 14:9 when discussing tongues in worship: 'Unless you utter speech that is intelligible, how will anyone know what is said?' The word emphasizes clarity of communication, the quality that enables understanding—exactly what uninterpreted tongues lack in public worship.

(1×) Paul's tongues discussion (1 Corinthians 14:9) insists on intelligibility in corporate worship. Speaking mysteries in uninterpreted languages, however genuinely spiritual, fails to edify the church because clarity is missing. The translations ('intelligible,' 'clara,' 'deutlich') emphasize comprehensibility. Paul's point is pastoral: worship should build up the body through clear communication, not mystify it through impressive but incomprehensible utterances. MANIFEST AND EVIDENT

en: intelligible | es: clara | fr: εὔσημον | de: deutlich 1Cor 14:9

εὔσπλαγχν-ος G2155 Adj-NMP (2×)

compassionate, tender-hearted, feeling deep sympathy for others

Originally a medical term referring to healthy internal organs, this word came to describe the deep-seated compassion that moves a person to action. Paul commands believers to be compassionate in Ephesians 4:32 alongside kindness and forgiveness, modeling God's own heart. Similarly, 1 Peter 3:8 includes it in a list of virtues for community life. The Spanish and German translations (compasivos, mitfuehlend) capture the emotional depth—not just pity, but a visceral sympathy that feels another's pain.

(2×) Both New Testament occurrences place this word in ethical instruction lists, highlighting compassion as essential for Christian character. The etymological connection to 'bowels' (the ancient seat of emotions) suggests this is not superficial sympathy but profound empathy rooted in one's core being, making believers responsive to others' suffering as Christ was to ours. GRACE AND COMPASSION

εὐσχημον-έω G2156 Adv (3×)

decently, becomingly, properly; in a manner fitting good order and propriety

This adverb means in a becoming manner, decently, or properly according to accepted standards of behavior. It derives from εὐσχήμων (presentable, honorable) and emphasizes conduct that is seemly and appropriate. Paul uses it three times to exhort proper Christian behavior in public life (Romans 13:13), church worship (1 Corinthians 14:40), and daily conduct (1 Thessalonians 4:12). The term emphasizes visible propriety and good order.

(3×) Translations use propriety language: Spanish decorosamente ('decorously, properly'), French décemment ('decently'). Romans 13:13 exhorts: 'Let us walk properly (or decently) as in the daytime, not in orgies and drunkenness,' contrasting proper conduct with shameful behavior. 1 Corinthians 14:40 concludes the worship instructions: 'all things should be done decently and in order.' 1 Thessalonians 4:12 urges believers to 'walk properly before outsiders,' maintaining good witness. Each use emphasizes conduct that is fitting, orderly, and brings credit to the gospel. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4884 WITH 4 SENSES

εὐσχημ-οσύνη G2157 N-AFS (1×)

Presentability, dignity, comeliness; the quality of being respectable or decent in appearance

This noun denotes the quality of being presentable, respectable, or seemly in appearance. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 12:23 when discussing the body of Christ: we give greater honor to less presentable parts, and 'our unpresentable parts are treated with greater modesty.' The word points to social propriety and decent appearance, which lesser-honored body parts lack naturally but receive through how we clothe and care for them.

(1×) Paul's body metaphor (1 Corinthians 12:23) uses this term to describe body parts that lack natural dignity or attractiveness but receive special care and covering. This illustrates how the church should honor less prominent members with special attention. The translations ('presentability,' 'decoro,' 'bienséance,' 'Anstand') emphasize respectability and propriety. Just as we don't leave the body's less presentable parts exposed, the church should honor its less prominent members generously. HONOR AND WEIGHT

en: presentability | es: decoro | fr: bienséance | de: Anstand 1Cor 12:23

εὐσχήμ-ων G2158 Adj-GFP (5×)

Respectable, honorable, prominent; describing persons of social standing or body parts deserving dignified treatment.

Literally 'of good form or bearing,' this adjective describes persons who are socially prominent, morally respectable, or physically presentable. Mark uses it of Joseph of Arimathea, a 'prominent' member of the council who dared to ask Pilate for Jesus' body (Mark 15:43). In Acts, it describes the influential women and men of Thessalonica and Berea who either opposed or embraced the gospel (Acts 13:50; 17:12). Paul then repurposes the word in 1 Corinthians 12:24 for the 'presentable' parts of the body that need no extra honor, contrasting them with less comely members that God has specially dignified.

(5×) Respectable, honorable, prominent — describing persons of distinguished social position or things that are presentable and dignified. Spanish 'distinguidas/decoroso' and French 'honorable' confirm the dual social and moral register. In Mark 15:43, Joseph of Arimathea is a 'prominent' councilmember. Acts 13:50 and 17:12 describe socially influential women and men in Greek cities. Paul's body metaphor in 1 Cor 12:24 contrasts 'presentable' members with those needing special honor, while 1 Cor 7:35 uses the related noun for what is 'proper' or 'seemly' in devotion to the Lord. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4884 WITH 4 SENSES

εὖτον-ος G2159 Adv (2×)

vigorously, vehemently, with intense force or energy

This adverb describes action taken with intense energy and forcefulness. In Luke 23:10, the chief priests and scribes stand 'vehemently accusing' Jesus during his trial before Herod—their accusations weren't passive but aggressive and relentless. Acts 18:28 shows Apollos 'vigorously refuting' the Jews in public debate, powerfully demonstrating from Scripture that Jesus is the Messiah. The term emphasizes the intensity and sustained force of the action, whether in hostility or in passionate proclamation of truth.

(2×) Used twice to describe forceful speech acts—one hostile (accusation against Jesus), one holy (apologetic defense of the gospel). The classical Greek background of 'well-strung' or 'vigorous' (from τείνω, to stretch) suggests the tautness of a bowstring ready to release, conveying both the energy and the sustained intensity of the verbal assault or defense being described. POWER AND MIRACLES

εὐτρᾰπελ-ία G2160 N-NFS (1×)

Crude joking, coarse jesting; vulgar humor or buffoonery

This noun originally meant ready wit or clever jesting but came to denote coarse humor, vulgar joking, or buffoonery. Paul lists it in Ephesians 5:4 among improper speech: 'Let there be no filthiness nor foolish talk nor crude joking, which are out of place, but instead let there be thanksgiving.' The word indicates humor that degrades, trivializes holy things, or delights in crudeness rather than building others up.

(1×) Paul's catalog of improper speech (Ephesians 5:4) places this vulgar jesting alongside sexual immorality and greed—all characteristic of darkness rather than light. The contrast is thanksgiving, speech that honors God and edifies others. The translations ('crude-joking,' 'bufonada,' 'Narrheit') capture the debasing quality of this humor. For believers called to wholesome speech that gives grace to hearers, coarse jesting reveals misplaced values and quenches the Spirit. IDLE TALK BOASTING en: crude-joking | es: bufonada | fr: εὐτραπελία | de: Narrheit Eph 5:4

Εὔτυχος G2161 N-NMS (1×)

Eutychus, a personal name meaning 'fortunate'; a young man at Troas

Eutychus was a young man in Troas who fell from a third-story window during Paul's lengthy sermon and was taken up dead, but Paul restored him to life (Acts 20:9-12). His name ironically means 'fortunate' or 'lucky'—though falling asleep during a sermon and plummeting to his death seemed decidedly unfortunate until Paul's intervention made the name prophetically accurate. The episode displays both Paul's pastoral concern and apostolic power.

(1×) Luke's detailed account (Acts 20:9-12) notes that Eutychus sank into deep sleep as Paul preached past midnight in a lamp-filled upper room—perhaps oxygen-depleted and certainly exhausting for a young person. His three-story fall killed him, but Paul embraced him and declared 'his life is in him,' echoing Elijah and Elisha's resuscitation miracles. The name 'fortunate one' proved apt after all, and the church 'was not a little comforted.' PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

εὐφημ-ία G2162 N-GFS (1×)

Good report, favorable reputation; honor and praise from others

This noun denotes favorable speech about someone, good reputation, or praiseworthy report. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 6:8 to describe the contrasts of apostolic ministry: 'through honor and dishonor, through slander and good report'—sometimes praised, sometimes slandered, but faithful regardless of how others speak. The word emphasizes reputation in others' speech, the favorable report that brings honor.

(1×) Paul's catalog of ministry paradoxes (2 Corinthians 6:8) pairs this good reputation with slander—apostles experience both as fickle public opinion shifts. The translations ('good-report,' 'buena-fama,' 'bonne-réputation,' 'guter-Ruf') emphasize favorable speech and honored reputation. Paul's point is that external reputation, whether good or bad, doesn't define genuine ministry. Apostles serve faithfully whether receiving praise or slander, honor or contempt, because approval from God matters more than human opinion. PRAISE AND BOASTING en: good-report | es: buena-fama | fr: bonne-réputation | de: guter-Ruf 2Cor 6:8

εὔφημ-ος G2163 Adj-NNP (1×)

Commendable, praiseworthy, honorable; worthy of good report or approval

This adjective describes what is worthy of praise or commendation, deserving favorable report. Paul uses it in his famous virtue list in Philippians 4:8: 'whatever is true, honorable, just, pure, lovely, commendable—think about these things.' The word indicates what merits approval and should occupy believers' thoughts, the excellent things worthy of meditation rather than base or trivial matters.

(1×) Philippians 4:8 presents this term in a crescendo of virtues that should govern Christian thinking. After truth, honor, justice, purity, and loveliness comes this quality of being praiseworthy or commendable. The translations ('commendable,' 'de-buena-fama,' 'ehrbar') emphasize what deserves good report. Paul instructs believers to curate their thought-life intentionally, dwelling on what is genuinely excellent and worthy of praise rather than letting minds wander toward the dishonorable. PRAISE AND BOASTING en: commendable | es: de-buena-fama | fr: εὔφημα | de: ehrbar Phil 4:8

εὐφορ-έω G2164 V-AIA-3S (1×)

To bear well, be fruitful; to produce abundantly

This verb describes producing well or abundantly, bearing fruit successfully. Jesus uses it in the parable of the rich fool whose land 'produced plentifully' (Luke 12:16), yielding such abundance that he had nowhere to store it all. The word emphasizes successful, generous production—earth doing exactly what it should do, bearing fruit richly. Ironically, in Jesus' parable, this agricultural success leads to spiritual disaster.

(1×) In Jesus' parable (Luke 12:16-21), exceptional productivity becomes the rich fool's snare. His fields bore abundantly, prompting him to build bigger barns and settle into self-sufficient ease—but God declared this very night his soul would be required. The translations ('produced-well,' 'produjo-bien,' 'produire-abondamment') emphasize fruitful abundance. The tragic irony: perfect agricultural success fostered soul-destroying self-sufficiency and presumption. Productivity without God-centeredness proves fatal. SOWING AND PLANTING

εὐφραίνω G2165 V-PIM/P-3P (14×)

To rejoice, be glad, celebrate; transitively, to make glad or gladden another person.

Built from eu ('well') and phren ('mind'), this verb captures the fullness of gladness – from quiet inner joy to exuberant feasting. Its middle/passive form dominates the New Testament, appearing prominently in Jesus' parables of recovery: the father commands 'let us celebrate' when the prodigal returns (Luke 15:23-24, 32), and the elder brother complains he was never given a goat to 'make merry' with friends (Luke 15:29). Revelation echoes the verb in both heavenly worship ('Rejoice over her, O heaven!' Rev 18:20) and earthly corruption (Rev 11:10; 18:7). The single active-transitive occurrence in 2 Corinthians 2:2 – 'who is there to make me glad?' – reveals Paul's pastoral tenderness. Spanish 'alegrarse/regocijarse' and French 'se réjouir' consistently render the intransitive joy.

1. to rejoice, be glad, celebrate (13×) To rejoice, be glad, or celebrate, used intransitively in the middle or passive voice for persons experiencing gladness or festivity. Dominates in Luke's parables of the lost: the father's repeated 'let us eat and celebrate' (Luke 15:23-24) and the rebuke to the elder brother, 'we had to celebrate and be glad' (Luke 15:32). Also appears in eschatological contexts: Revelation 18:20 summons heaven to rejoice over Babylon's fall, while Acts 2:26 quotes the Psalms, 'my heart was glad and my tongue rejoiced.' Spanish 'alégrate/alegraos' and German 'sich freuen' consistently capture this reflexive, experiential gladness. The rich man's self-address in Luke 12:19 – 'eat, drink, be merry' – ironically employs the same verb for misplaced celebration. REJOICING AND GREETING
en: I-might-celebrate, Rejoice, To-celebrate | es: Alégrate, a-regocijarse, alegraos | fr: réjouir, se-réjouir | de: freut-sich, sich-freuen Luke 12:19; Luke 15:23; Luke 15:24; Luke 15:29; Luke 15:32

2. to make glad, gladden (1×) To make glad or gladden someone, used transitively in the active voice to describe causing joy in another person. The sole New Testament instance appears in Paul's anguished rhetorical question: 'If I grieve you, who is left to make me glad?' (2 Cor 2:2). The shift from reflexive celebration to causative gladness is significant – Paul's joy depends on the Corinthians' spiritual health. Spanish 'que alegra' (that which gladdens) and the active construction distinguish this from the far more common intransitive sense. The Old Testament background (LXX Ps 104:15, wine that gladdens the heart) enriches this causative usage. REJOICING AND GREETING

Εὐφράτης G2166 N-AMS (2×)
the Euphrates River, major river of Mesopotamia
One of the four great rivers flowing from Eden (Genesis 2:14), the Euphrates marked the northeastern boundary of the Promised Land and represented the edge of the known world for ancient Israel. In Revelation, this river appears twice in apocalyptic visions: at 9:14, four angels bound at the Euphrates are released to execute judgment, and at 16:12, the great river dries up to prepare the way for kings from the east. The river thus serves as a symbolic boundary between the holy land and the threatening powers of the east.

(2×) Both Revelation references deploy the Euphrates with its full freight of Old Testament symbolism—it's the boundary beyond which enemy armies (Assyria, Babylon) originated. The drying up in 16:12 echoes the Red Sea and Jordan crossings, while the bound angels at 9:14 suggest demonic forces restrained at the edge of civilization, waiting to be unleashed in the final conflict. RIVERS AND STREAMS

εὐφροσύνη G2167 N-GFS (2×)
gladness, joy, festive merriment
This noun captures joy expressed in celebration and festivity, often associated with banquets and communal rejoicing. In Acts 2:28, Peter quotes Psalm 16:11, declaring that God fills believers with gladness in His presence—joy as the culmination of being near God. Acts 14:17 presents God filling hearts with food and gladness as evidence of His kindness even to pagan nations. The classical Greek associations with feasting (Homer's banquets where 'good cheer' prevails) carry into the New Testament, where joy is not merely emotional but embodied in provision and celebration.

(2×) Both occurrences link gladness to God's generous provision—whether the spiritual joy of resurrection hope (Acts 2:28) or the physical blessings of harvest and sustenance (Acts 14:17). The word's festive overtones suggest that biblical joy is not privatized emotion but communal celebration of God's goodness, connecting the dinner table to the resurrection and the harvest to the heavenly presence. JOY AND EXULTATION

εὐχαριστ-έω G2168 V-APA-GMS (38×)
To give thanks, express gratitude; rarely passive: to be thanked or received with thanksgiving
From εὖ ('well') and χαρίζομαι ('to show favor'), this verb is the standard New Testament word for giving thanks, appearing in contexts from table blessings to doxological prayers. Jesus gives thanks before breaking bread at feedings and at the Last Supper (Matt 15:36; 26:27), establishing the word's liturgical centrality — it is the root of 'Eucharist.' Paul opens nearly every epistle with thanksgiving to God. The multilingual evidence is strikingly uniform: English 'give thanks,' Spanish 'dar gracias,' French 'rendre graces,' German 'danken.' A single passive occurrence (2 Cor 1:11) rounds out the picture.

1. give thanks actively (37×) To give thanks actively — expressing gratitude to God or another person. Spans all grammatical forms: indicative, participle, imperative, and infinitive. Used for Jesus' blessing at meals (Matt 15:36; Mark 8:6; 14:23), Paul's habitual epistolary thanksgivings (Rom 1:8; 1 Cor 1:4; Phil 1:3), and the grateful leper returning to Jesus (Luke 17:16). Every major translation language converges: 'doy gracias' (Spanish), 'rendre graces' (French), 'danken' (German), confirming a single unified active sense across 37 occurrences. THANKSGIVING AND GRATITUDE

2. be thanked (passive) (1×) Passive: to be thanked, or to have thanks given on one's behalf. A single occurrence in 2 Cor 1:11 where Paul envisions thanks being offered by many on his behalf for the gift of deliverance. English 'might be thanked' and Spanish 'sea agradecido' capture the passive construction, while French and German translations default to the active form, suggesting this passive usage was felt as unusual even by translators. THANKSGIVING AND GRATITUDE

εὐχαριστ-ία G2169 N-NFS (15×)
Thanksgiving, gratitude; the act of giving thanks to God, central to Christian worship and prayer.
Eucharistia — the word from which 'Eucharist' derives — denotes the act of expressing gratitude to God. Paul treats thanksgiving as fundamental to the Christian life: it should accompany every prayer (Phil 4:6; Col 4:2), overflow from the community's experience of grace (2 Cor 4:15; 9:11–12), and characterize all speech in place of coarseness (Eph 5:4). In 1 Corinthians 14:16 Paul insists that corporate thanksgiving must be intelligible so others can say 'Amen.' The Pastoral letters frame it as the proper response to God's good creation (1 Tim 4:3–4). Across languages — Spanish 'acción de gracias,' French 'action de grâces,' German 'Danksagung' — the term consistently points to active, expressed gratitude rather than mere feeling.

thanksgiving, gratitude (15×) The act or expression of giving thanks to God, whether in personal prayer, corporate worship, or as a general posture of the Christian life. Paul makes it a companion to petition (Phil 4:6; Col 4:2) and the proper overflow of experiencing

God's grace (2 Cor 4:15; 9:11–12). In 1 Corinthians 14:16 it denotes a liturgical thanksgiving that must be intelligible. The multilingual evidence — Spanish 'acción de gracias,' French 'action de grâces,' German 'Danksagung' — uniformly reflects active vocal gratitude, not passive sentiment. THANKSGIVING AND GRATITUDE

εὐχάριστ-ος G2170 Adj-NMP (1×)

Thankful, grateful; characterized by appreciation and gratitude

This adjective describes the quality of being grateful, expressing thanks, or marked by appreciation. Paul instructs the Colossians to 'be thankful' (Colossians 3:15), making gratitude a defining characteristic of Christian community. The word indicates not just occasional thanks but an ongoing disposition of grateful appreciation for God's gifts and grace, the opposite of the entitled, complaining spirit.

(1×) Paul's instruction (Colossians 3:15) makes thankfulness the capstone of virtues that should characterize the believing community—after peace ruling in hearts comes gratitude as the natural response. The translations ('thankful,' 'agradecidos,' 'dankbar') emphasize the grateful disposition. This isn't circumstantial happiness but deep appreciation rooted in God's grace, a thankful heart even in difficulty because of who God is and what he's done through Christ. THANKSGIVING AND GRATITUDE

εὐχή G2171 N-NFS (3×)

vow, prayer; solemn promise or petition to God

This noun denotes a vow or prayer, particularly a solemn promise made to God. Classical usage emphasized vows requiring fulfillment (like Jephthah's vow in Judges). In the New Testament it appears in contexts of Jewish vows—Paul's participation in a Nazirite vow (Acts 18:18), advice regarding men under a vow (Acts 21:23), and the prayer of faith for the sick (James 5:15). The term marks serious religious commitment or petition.

(3×) Translations use vow and prayer language: Spanish voto/oración ('vow, prayer'), French souhait ('wish, prayer'). Acts 18:18 notes Paul 'had cut his hair, for he was under a vow,' showing participation in Jewish practices. Acts 21:23 advises Paul to join 'four men who are under a vow' to demonstrate his Torah observance. James 5:15 promises 'the prayer of faith will save the one who is sick,' using the term for earnest petition. The word encompasses both solemn vows requiring fulfillment and earnest prayers offered to God. PRAYER AND SUPPLICATION

εὔχομαι G2172 V-IIM/P-1S (7×)

To pray, petition God; to wish or desire earnestly, even hypothetically

The verb εὔχομαι carries an ancient Greek double life: it means both to pray — addressing God with petition or intercession — and to wish or desire. In classical usage these two senses were tightly braided, since praying and wishing both involve projecting desire outward. The New Testament preserves both. Paul prays for the Corinthians' restoration (2 Cor 13:9), the elders pray over the sick (Jas 5:16), and sailors pray for daylight in a storm (Acts 27:29). Yet in Romans 9:3, Paul uses the imperfect ηὐχόμην to express a startling hypothetical wish — that he himself might be accursed for Israel's sake — a desire so contrary to fact that it shifts the word from prayer into pure longing.

1. pray (petition God or express spiritual desire) (6×) To pray, make a petition to God, or offer intercession on behalf of others. This is the dominant NT sense, covering six of seven occurrences. In Acts 26:29 Paul prays to God that his hearers would become as he is; in 2 Cor 13:7 and 13:9 he prays for the Corinthians' moral wholeness; in Jas 5:16 the prayer of a righteous person avails much. The multilingual glosses converge on prayer vocabulary — Spanish 'oraban,' German 'wuenschen' (in the sense of prayerful wishing), French 'souhaiter' — while the Ship scene at Acts 27:29 shows sailors praying for dawn, a petition born of desperation. PRAYER (VERBAL ACT)

en: I-pray, I-would-pray, pray | es: Oramos, Oraría, oraban | fr: souhaiter | de: wuenschen, wünscht Acts 26:29; Acts 27:29; 2Cor 13:7; 2Cor 13:9; Jas 5:16

2. wish (express a strong personal desire, even hypothetical) (1×) To wish or desire intensely, expressing a strong personal longing that may be hypothetical or even contrary to fact. The sole clear NT instance is Romans 9:3, where Paul writes ηὐχόμην ἀνάθεμα εἶναι αὐτὸς ἐγώ — 'I was wishing that I myself were accursed.' The imperfect tense signals an unrealizable desire, a rhetorical device known from classical Greek (Demosthenes, Plato). Spanish 'deseaba' ('I was desiring') and English 'I was wishing' both capture the volitional rather than petitionary force, distinguishing this from prayer proper. PRAYER (VERBAL ACT)

εὔχρηστ-ος G2173 Adj-AMS (3×)

useful, serviceable; fit and beneficial for the intended purpose

This adjective means useful, serviceable, or beneficial for a particular purpose or person. Classical usage emphasizes fitness for use or service. In the New Testament Paul uses it three times regarding individuals' usefulness in ministry—vessels useful to the master (2 Timothy 2:21), Onesimus who became useful again (Philemon 11), and Mark's usefulness for ministry (2 Timothy 4:11). The term emphasizes practical service value.

(3×) Translations consistently indicate usefulness: Spanish útil, German nuetzlich ('useful'). 2 Timothy 2:21 speaks of cleansing to become 'a vessel for honorable use, set apart as holy, useful to the master of the house.' Philemon 11 makes a wordplay on Onesimus' name (meaning 'useful'): 'Formerly he was useless to you, but now he is indeed useful both to you and to me.' 2 Timothy 4:11 requests: 'Get Mark and bring him with you, for he is very useful to me for ministry,' showing restored usefulness. The term emphasizes practical benefit and service readiness. PROFIT AND BENEFIT

εὐψῡχ-έω G2174 V-PSA-1S (1×)

To be encouraged, be of good courage; to have one's soul strengthened and cheered

This verb means to be of good courage, have one's spirit lifted, or experience encouragement and comfort. Paul uses it in Philippians 2:19 expressing his hope to send Timothy: 'that I too may be encouraged when I learn of your condition.' The word indicates having one's soul or spirit strengthened, being cheered by good news, experiencing the comfort that comes from positive reports about loved ones.

(1×) Paul's stated hope (Philippians 2:19) is that Timothy's visit and subsequent report about the Philippians will encourage him—literally, strengthen his soul. This reflects the apostle's deep affection for this church and his eagerness for good news about their perseverance. The translations ('be-encouraged,' 'esté-animado,' 'guten-Mutes-sein') emphasize strengthened spirits and heartened courage. Even imprisoned, Paul finds cheer in reports of churches standing firm, his soul lifted by their faithfulness. COURAGE CONFIDENCE

εὐωδ-ία G2175 N-GFS (3×)

fragrance, sweet smell, aroma; pleasant odor especially of sacrifice

This noun denotes a sweet smell or fragrance, especially the pleasing aroma of sacrifices ascending to God. Old Testament background includes offerings described as 'a pleasing aroma to the Lord.' Paul employs this sacrificial imagery metaphorically—Christians as the aroma of Christ (2 Corinthians 2:15), Christ's sacrifice as a fragrant offering (Ephesians 5:2), and the Philippians' gift as a fragrant offering pleasing to God (Philippians 4:18).

(3×) Translations use fragrance language: Spanish fragancia ('fragrance'), French parfum ('perfume'), German Wohlgeruch ('pleasant smell'). 2 Corinthians 2:15: 'we are the aroma of Christ to God among those being saved and those perishing,' using sacrificial imagery for gospel ministry. Ephesians 5:2: Christ 'loved us and gave himself up for us, a fragrant offering and sacrifice to God,' applying temple language to Christ's death. Philippians 4:18: the Philippians' gift is 'a fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God.' The term connects material gifts and Christian life to sacrificial worship. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

εὐώνυμ-ος G2176 Adj-GNP (9×)

Left, on the left side — a euphemistic term originally meaning 'of good name,' used in the NT exclusively for spatial position.

Euonymos is one of the great euphemisms of the Greek language. Literally meaning 'of good name' or 'well-named,' it was used to avoid the ill omen of saying 'left' directly, since the left side was considered unlucky in Greek culture. By NT times, the euphemistic origin had faded, and the word simply meant 'left' as opposed to right. Its nine occurrences cluster around two vivid scenes: the request for seats of honor beside Jesus (Matt 20:21,23; Mark 10:37,40) and the separation of sheep from goats at the final judgment, where those on the left are condemned (Matt 25:33,41). It also marks the position of the criminals crucified alongside Jesus (Matt 27:38; Mark 15:27).

left (side) (9×) Pertaining to the left side or left hand, used as the spatial opposite of right (dexios). All nine NT occurrences employ the word in positional contexts — seating arrangements in the kingdom (Matt 20:21,23; Mark 10:37,40), the placement of the condemned at the last judgment (Matt 25:33,41), and the location of those crucified with Jesus (Matt 27:38; Mark 15:27). The multilingual glosses ('izquierda' in Spanish, 'gauche' in French, 'linke' in German) uniformly confirm a straightforward spatial sense, with no residual trace of the original euphemistic 'well-named' meaning surviving into NT usage. LEFT SIDE

ἐφάλλομαι G2177 V-APM-NMS (1×)

To leap upon, spring at; to attack by jumping on someone

This verb describes springing or leaping upon someone or something, typically with hostile intent—to attack by jumping on an opponent. Luke uses it in Acts 19:16 describing the demon-possessed man in Ephesus who 'leaped on' the seven sons of Sceva attempting exorcism, overpowering all of them. The word emphasizes sudden, violent assault, the aggressive leap of attack rather than gradual approach.

(1×) The Ephesian exorcism disaster (Acts 19:16) shows demonic power overwhelming unauthorized practitioners. When Sceva's sons invoked Jesus' name without true relationship, the demon-possessed man sprang on them with supernatural violence, beating them so severely they fled naked and wounded. The translations ('having-leaped,' 'saltándoles-encima,' 'sauter-sur') preserve the violent, sudden attack. This episode displays the danger of treating spiritual power as manipulable technique rather than relationship. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 9550 WITH 6 SENSES

ἐφάπαξ G2178 Adv (5×)

Once for all, at one time; denoting a single decisive act with permanent, unrepeatable effect.

An emphatic adverb meaning 'once for all' — stressing that an action is performed a single time with permanent, irreversible effect. It is theologically potent in Hebrews, where it contrasts Christ's sacrifice with the repeated Levitical offerings: he offered himself 'once for all' (Heb 7:27; 9:12; 10:10), securing eternal redemption in a single act. Paul uses it in Romans 6:10 to declare that Christ 'died to sin once for all.' The one non-sacrificial use describes the 500 witnesses who saw the risen Christ 'at one time' (1 Cor 15:6). Spanish 'una vez para siempre' and German 'ein fuer allemal' vividly capture the finality.

(5×) Once for all, at one time — emphasizing a single, definitive, unrepeatable action. Spanish 'una vez para siempre / de una vez para siempre' and German 'ein fuer allemal' perfectly capture the force of finality. In Heb 7:27, Christ's self-offering is contrasted with daily priestly sacrifices; Heb 9:12 declares he entered the holy places once for all with his own blood; Heb 10:10 grounds sanctification in this single offering. Rom 6:10 applies the same finality to Christ's death to sin. The sole non-soteriological use in 1 Cor 15:6 means 'at one time' — describing the simultaneous appearance to over 500 witnesses. ONE AND UNITY

Ἐφεσῖνος G2179

Ephesian; belonging to or from the city of Ephesus

An adjective meaning 'of Ephesus' or 'Ephesian,' referring to the prominent city in Asia Minor that housed the temple of Artemis and later a significant Christian community. The textual tradition of Revelation 2:1 shows variation between this adjectival form and the prepositional phrase 'in Ephesus.' Paul spent extended time in Ephesus, and his letter to the Ephesians addresses believers there. The term identifies both residents and characteristics associated with this important early Christian center.

Ἐφέσιος G2180 Adj-GMP (5×)

Ephesian; of or belonging to Ephesus, the major city of proconsular Asia

An adjective denoting origin from or association with the city of Ephesus, one of the most prominent cities in the Roman province of Asia. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in Acts, where the Ephesians fiercely defend their civic identity and the cult of Artemis. The Spanish 'efesio' and French 'Éphésien' both preserve the gentile adjective form, showing how consistently translators treat this as a demonym rather than a mere geographic reference.

(5×) Designating a person or thing belonging to Ephesus. All five occurrences cluster in Acts 19-21: the craftsmen's riot cry 'Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!' (Acts 19:28, 34), the town clerk addressing the crowd as Ephesians (Acts 19:35), and the accusation that Paul brought Trophimus the Ephesian into the temple (Acts 21:29). The multilingual glosses uniformly render this as a demonym—Spanish 'efesios,' French 'Éphésien'—confirming a single stable sense of civic identity. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Ἔφεσος G2181 N-AFS (16×)

Ephesus — a major city of the Roman province of Asia, center of early Christian mission and Artemis worship

Ephesos was the leading city of proconsular Asia, a bustling port and commercial hub famous for its temple of Artemis, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. In Acts, Paul visits Ephesus on his second journey (18:19-21), then spends over two years there on his third (19:1-41), triggering a riot among silversmiths who feared for their trade in Artemis shrines. The city became a major center of the Pauline mission: Paul wrote 1 Corinthians from Ephesus (1 Cor 16:8), addressed a letter to the Ephesian church (Eph 1:1), left Timothy there to oversee the community (1 Tim 1:3), and it appears as the first of the seven churches in Revelation (Rev 2:1). Spanish

'Efeso,' French 'Ephese,' and German 'Ephesus' all transliterate the name directly.

(16×) The proper name of the principal city of the Roman province of Asia (modern western Turkey), significant in the NT as a center of Paul's missionary activity (Acts 18:19-21; 19:1-41; 20:16-17), the recipient of an apostolic letter (Eph 1:1), Timothy's ministerial assignment (1 Tim 1:3; 2 Tim 1:18; 4:12), and the first of the seven churches addressed in Revelation (Rev 1:11; 2:1). All 16 occurrences denote this single geographic referent, with its associations of vibrant commerce, Artemis cult worship, and early Christian community. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἐφευρ-ετής G2182 N-AMP (1×)

Inventors, devisers; those who conceive and create new things, especially evil schemes

This noun describes those who invent, devise, or contrive things—particularly in negative contexts, those who conceive new forms of evil. Paul uses it in Romans 1:30 in his catalog of depraved humanity: they are 'inventors of evil.' The word suggests not just practicing existing wickedness but creative innovation in sin, devising novel forms of rebellion and corruption beyond what tradition already provides.

(1×) Paul's dark portrait of humanity under God's judgment (Romans 1:30) includes this disturbing quality—not merely continuing in inherited sins but inventing fresh evils. This creativity in corruption shows the depth of depravity when God gives people over to reprobate minds. The translations ('inventors,' 'inventores,' 'inventeur,' 'Erfinder') preserve the notion of devising or creating. Far from morally neutral innovation, this is ingenuity devoted to wickedness, the tragic creativity of rebels. CREATION AND MAKING division, priestly course assigned to temple service rotation

The temple priesthood was organized into 24 divisions, each serving for a week at a time in rotation (1 Chronicles 24). This word refers to one of those divisions and appears only in Luke 1, in the narrative of Zechariah. Verse 5 identifies Zechariah as belonging to 'the division of Abijah' (the eighth division), and verse 8 notes that he was serving in the temple 'in the order of his division' when Gabriel appeared to announce John the Baptist's birth. This detail grounds the angel's announcement in the ordinary rhythms of priestly duty.

(2×) Luke's double mention establishes Zechariah's legitimate priestly credentials and places the miraculous announcement within the structure of Israel's worship life. The division system ensured all priestly families participated in temple service, so when Zechariah drew lots to enter the Holy Place (1:9), he was fulfilling his appointed role—making the divine interruption all the more striking against the backdrop of routine religious duty. DIVISION SPLIT

Daily, for the day; pertaining to each day's needs or occurrence

This adjective means 'for the day' or 'daily,' describing what belongs to each day, recurs daily, or meets daily needs. James uses it in describing a scenario where someone lacks 'daily food' (James 2:15)—the regular sustenance needed each day. The word emphasizes the everyday, recurring character of something, what is needed or experienced on a day-by-day basis.

(1×) James' hypothetical example (2:15) of a brother or sister lacking daily food illustrates empty faith that offers pious words without practical help. The translations ('daily,' 'diario,' 'taeglich') emphasize regular, recurring needs—not luxury items but basic daily sustenance. James' point is devastating: faith that won't provide daily bread to hungry believers is dead, proving itself worthless by failing love's most basic test. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 5469 WITH 3 SENSES

ἐφικνέομαι G2185 V-ANM (2×)

to reach, to arrive at, to attain to

This verb describes successfully reaching a destination or goal, whether spatial or metaphorical. Paul uses it twice in 2 Corinthians 10 to discuss the boundaries of his apostolic ministry. In verse 13 he refuses to boast beyond proper limits but only 'according to the measure of the sphere which God appointed us—a sphere which reaches even to you.' Verse 14 reinforces this: 'we are not overextending ourselves, as though we did not reach you, for we were the first to come even as far as you with the gospel of Christ.' The imagery is of a measuring line that extends to its appointed limit.

(2×) Both uses appear in Paul's defense of his apostolic authority to the Corinthians. The verb's classical sense of 'reaching' or 'aiming at' a target supports Paul's argument that God assigned him a territory (Corinth included), and he successfully arrived there first with the gospel. The spatial metaphor carries authority implications—Paul reached them legitimately, within his God-given jurisdiction, not as an interloper in another's field. AFFORD REACH OBTAIN

ἐφίστημι G2186 V-PIM/P-3S (21×)

To stand by, come upon suddenly, be present or imminent; also to press on urgently or to attack with hostile intent.

Built on the compound ἐπί + ἵστημι ('stand upon'), this verb carries a vivid spatial sense that branches into several distinct uses. In the Gospels it often describes angels or messengers who suddenly appear beside someone, as when the two men in dazzling garments 'stood by' the women at the empty tomb (Luke 24:4). The German 'steht-dabei' (stands-alongside) captures the proximity well. It can also shade into urgency — Paul's charge to Timothy to 'be ready in season and out of season' (2 Tim 4:2) — or even hostile approach, as when the mob in Thessalonica 'set upon' Jason's house (Acts 17:5).

1. stand by or near (10×) To position oneself beside or near someone, standing in close proximity. This is the most common NT use, seen when the angel 'stood by' the shepherds (Luke 2:9) or when the men in white 'stood beside' the apostles at the Ascension. The Spanish 'habiéndose-presentado' (having presented oneself) and German 'steht-dabei' both emphasize the nearness and readiness implied. The sense suggests calm, deliberate presence rather than sudden intrusion. STAND BY APPEAR

en: came-upon, having-stood-by, having-stood-near | es: habiendo-se-inclinado, habiéndose-presentado, llegaron | fr: se-présenter | de: steht-dabei Luke 2:9; Luke 4:39; Luke 20:1; Luke 24:4; Acts 10:17

2. come upon suddenly, appear (7×) To come upon someone unexpectedly or to appear suddenly, with an element of surprise. Luke especially favors this use: Martha is 'stood upon' by the demands of serving (Luke 10:40), and the end-times day 'comes upon' the unprepared (Luke 21:34). The Spanish 'habiendo-venido-sobre' (having come upon) highlights the overtaking quality. In Acts 4:1 and 6:12, religious authorities descend upon the apostles without warning. STAND BY APPEAR

en: came-upon, come-upon, having-approached | es: acercándose, habiendo-venido-sobre, habiéndome-presentado | fr: se-présenter | de: steht-dabei, ἐφίστανται Luke 2:38; Luke 10:40; Luke 21:34; Acts 4:1; Acts 6:12

3. be present, be at hand (2×) To be present, at hand, or imminent as a state rather than an action. Paul writes that his 'departure has come' (2 Tim 4:6), using the perfect to indicate a condition now fully upon him. In Acts 28:2, the rain 'had set in'—a weather event already established. This stative use differs from senses 1-2 in that arrival is complete and the emphasis falls on the resulting condition. STAND BY APPEAR

en: has-come, having-set-in | es: ha-llegado, que-estaba-sobre | fr: se-présenter | de: steht-dabei, ἐφέστηκεν Acts 28:2; 2Tim 4:6

4. be urgent, press on (1×) To be urgent, persistent, or pressing in carrying out a duty. In 2 Timothy 4:2, Paul charges Timothy to 'be ready' (ἐπίστηθι) — be at your post, press on whether the moment seems convenient or not. The Spanish 'insiste' (insist, persist) captures the force well. This sense extends the spatial 'standing over' into figurative vigilance and relentless readiness. STAND BY APPEAR

en: be-ready | es: insiste | fr: se-présenter | de: ἐπίστηθι 2Tim 4:2

5. attack, assault (1×) To come upon with hostile intent, to rush upon or assault. In Acts 17:5, the jealous mob 'set upon' Jason's house seeking Paul and Silas. The Greek 'having attacked' (ἐπιστάντες) and Spanish 'presentándose-ante' show the shift from mere appearance to aggressive confrontation. This martial use draws on the compound's sense of imposing oneself forcibly upon another. STAND BY APPEAR

Ephraim, a place name; a town near Jerusalem where Jesus withdrew

Ephraim was a town in the wilderness near Jerusalem where Jesus withdrew with his disciples after raising Lazarus (John 11:54). The exact location is debated, but it provided a secluded refuge when the Sanhedrin actively plotted Jesus' death. The name echoes the patriarch's son and the northern Israelite tribe, but this appears to be a separate Judean town, significant only as Jesus' temporary hiding place before his final Passover.

(1×) John records (11:54) that after raising Lazarus—the miracle that sealed the authorities' determination to kill Jesus—he withdrew to this wilderness town for a period. The location provided strategic distance from Jerusalem's hostility while remaining close enough for the coming Passover journey. The name Ephraim connects to Israel's history but this town's biblical significance lies solely in providing Jesus refuge during his final weeks. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Ephphatha, an Aramaic command meaning 'be opened'; Jesus' healing word

This is the Aramaic word Jesus spoke when healing a deaf man with a speech impediment in Mark 7:34. Looking to heaven and sighing deeply, Jesus touched the man's ears and tongue and said 'Ephphatha'—'Be opened.' Mark preserves the original Aramaic and translates it for Greek readers, one of several instances where Jesus' native language breaks through the Greek narrative, adding intimacy and historical authenticity to the healing account.

(1×) Mark's preservation of Jesus' Aramaic word (7:34) heightens the scene's vividness—we hear the very syllables Jesus spoke. The command addressed not just the man's ears but the entire blockage preventing communication. Jesus' sigh suggests the weight of living in a fallen world where such afflictions exist. The translations simply transliterate the Aramaic since Mark provides the translation. This word captures the sovereign command that restored hearing and clear speech instantaneously. OPENING AND SHUTTING

ἔχθρ-α G2189 N-NFP (6×)

Enmity, hostility, or deep-seated antagonism between parties, whether personal, cosmic, or spiritual.

An abstract noun denoting settled hostility or antagonism — not a passing quarrel but a deep rift between opposing parties. Paul identifies it as a 'work of the flesh' alongside jealousy and strife (Gal 5:20), but also uses it theologically for the cosmic hostility between sinful humanity and God (Rom 8:7) and the dividing wall of enmity between Jew and Gentile that Christ abolished (Eph 2:14-16). Luke records that Herod and Pilate had been at enmity before being reconciled over Jesus' trial (Luke 23:12). The Spanish 'enemistad' and French 'inimitie' both preserve the relational depth of the term.

enmity / hostility (6×) Enmity, hostility, or deep antagonism between persons or groups — ranging from interpersonal feuds to cosmic spiritual opposition. In Rom 8:7 it describes the mind of the flesh as enmity toward God; in Eph 2:15-16 Christ destroys the dividing wall of enmity between Jew and Gentile; in Gal 5:20 it appears among the works of the flesh alongside jealousy and discord. Luke 23:12 uses it of the personal feud between Herod and Pilate. The plural form in Galatians (Spanish 'enemistades') suggests multiple manifestations of hostility, while the singular elsewhere points to a settled, structural antagonism. ENMITY HOSTILITY

Echthros derives from echthos ('hatred') and functions both as an adjective ('hostile') and as a substantive noun ('enemy'). Its 32 New Testament occurrences span the personal, the political, and the cosmic. Jesus' command to love your enemies (Matt 5:43-44) overturns conventional reciprocity, while the parable of the wheat and tares identifies the enemy as the devil himself (Matt 13:25-39). Paul quotes Psalm 110 — 'until I make your enemies a footstool' — to frame Christ's eschatological triumph (1 Cor 15:25-26), and strikingly names death as the 'last enemy.' Luke's Magnificat celebrates God scattering the hostile and delivering from the hand of enemies (Luke 1:71-74). German Feind, Spanish enemigo, and French ennemi all track the single adversary-concept without subdivision.

enemy / hostile one (32×) An enemy or hostile adversary, covering personal, national, and spiritual opposition. Jesus commands love toward enemies in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:43-44), then identifies the devil as the enemy in the parable of the tares (Matt 13:39). Paul designates death itself as the 'last enemy' to be destroyed (1 Cor 15:25-26), quoting Psalm 110's enthronement oracle. Mary's Magnificat celebrates deliverance from enemies (Luke 1:71, 74). ENEMY AND ADVERSARY

ἔχιδν-α G2191 N-GFP (5×)

Viper; a venomous snake, used literally and as a sharp metaphor for moral danger

A term for a venomous snake that carries heavy metaphorical weight in the New Testament. John the Baptist and Jesus both use the phrase 'brood of vipers' as a stinging rebuke—implying that their hearers are not merely dangerous but have inherited their poisonous nature. Spanish 'víbora' and French 'vipère' both descend from the same Latin root, while the English 'viper' captures the hissing menace of the original Greek. The one literal occurrence in Acts 28:3, where a viper fastens on Paul's hand, stands in vivid contrast to the figurative uses.

(5×) A venomous snake, used both literally and figuratively. In its figurative use, the phrase γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν ('brood of vipers') appears in Matt 3:7, 12:34, 23:33, and Luke 3:7, where John the Baptist and Jesus employ it as a term of severe moral reproach—suggesting inherited wickedness and deadly spiritual danger. The sole literal occurrence (Acts 28:3) describes the snake that bites Paul on Malta. Multilingual evidence—Spanish 'víbora,' French 'vipère'—consistently renders a single lexical sense, with context alone distinguishing the literal from the metaphorical. SERPENTS AND SNAKES

ἔχω G2192 V-PPM/P-ANP (711×)

Have, possess; hold fast; be in a state; be pregnant; regard as; neighboring (middle participle)

The Greek verb echo is among the most frequent in the New Testament, appearing over 700 times. At its core it means 'to have' or 'to possess,' but its semantic reach extends far beyond ownership. Combined with adverbs it becomes quasi-copular ('kalos echo' = 'I am well'), with 'en gastri' it means 'to be pregnant,' and in the middle participle echomenos it means 'next' or 'neighboring.' Spanish distinguishes tener (possess) from estar (be in a state), neatly separating the two largest senses. This versatility makes echo one of the workhorses of koine Greek grammar.

1. possess / have (680×) General possession or having (680x) — the overwhelming default sense. Spanish tiene, French avoir, and German haben all map here without ambiguity. Matt 8:20 ('the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head') and Matt 13:12 ('whoever has, to him more will be given') show echo in its most basic possessive function, covering material goods, qualities, relationships, and abstract attributes alike. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: has, has-it, he-has | es: tiene | fr: avoir | de: haben, hat Matt 5:23; Matt 8:20; Matt 9:6; Matt 11:18; Matt 13:12

2. be in a state (quasi-copular) (9×) Quasi-copular 'to be in a state' (9x), where echo plus an adverb expresses condition rather than possession. Spanish estar (not tener) signals this shift clearly. Mark 2:17 ('those who are sick,' kakos echontes) and Mark 5:23 ('my daughter is at the point of death,' eschatos echei) show the verb functioning as 'to be' with an adverbial complement — a well-documented koine Greek idiom. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: I-have, are, having | es: estoy, está, están | fr: avoir | de: haben, hat Mark 2:17; Mark 5:23; Luke 5:31; Acts 7:1; Acts 12:15

3. be pregnant (ἐν γαστρὶ ἔχω) (7×) Idiomatic 'to be pregnant' (en gastri echo, 7x), a fixed collocation meaning 'to have in the womb.' Matt 1:18 (Mary 'was found to be with child') and Matt 24:19 ('woe to those who are pregnant') use this phrase. Spanish que tiene(n) and German haben preserve the literal 'have' construction, while the context makes the specialized meaning unmistakable. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: having, will-have | es: que-tengan, que-tiene, que-tienen | fr: avoir | de: haben, hat Matt 1:18; Matt 1:23; Matt 24:19; Mark 13:17; Luke 7:2

4. hold / grasp / hold fast (6×) To hold, grasp, or hold fast (6x), emphasizing retention or physical grip rather than static possession. Mark 16:8 ('trembling and astonishment held them') and 1Tim 3:9 ('holding the mystery of the faith') show both literal and metaphorical gripping. Spanish ten (imperative 'hold!') and the participial 'holding' in multiple languages distinguish this active, volitional sense. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: have, hold, holding | es: ten, teniendo, tenme | fr: avoir | de: haben, hat Mark 16:8; Luke 14:18; Luke 14:19; Rom 14:22; 1Tim 3:9

5. regard as / consider (5×) To regard as or consider (5x), where echo takes a double accusative or predicate complement. Matt 14:5 ('he held him as a prophet') and Matt 21:26 ('they all hold John as a prophet') show estimation rather than possession. Spanish lo tenian ('they regarded him') preserves the same construction. Phil 2:29 ('hold such people in honor') extends this into ethical exhortation. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: have, held, hold | es: lo-tenían, tened, tenían | fr: avoir | de: haben, hat Matt 14:5; Matt 21:26; Matt 21:46; Mark 11:32; Phil 2:29

6. next / neighboring (middle: ἐχόμενος) (4×) Middle participle echomenos meaning 'next, adjoining, neighboring' (4x). Spanish siguiente/cercanas and German-based glosses mark the spatial or temporal adjacency. Mark 1:38 ('let us go to the neighboring towns'), Luke 13:33 ('the next day'), and Acts 20:15 show this specialized participial form functioning as an adjective entirely detached from the verb's possessive core. POSSESSING AND HAVING en: following, neighboring | es: cercanas, siguiente | fr: avoir | de: haben, hat Mark 1:38; Luke 13:33; Acts 20:15; Acts 21:26

ἕως G2193 Prep (147×)

Until, up to (temporal endpoint); occasionally 'while' (duration during which an action continues).

A temporal particle that marks the boundary or limit of an action in time. In its dominant sense, ἕως means 'until' — pointing to the endpoint at which something ceases or a new event begins, as in 'until the day' or Matthew 1:25's 'until she bore a son.' Less commonly it shades into 'while,' expressing ongoing duration rather than termination, as in Jesus' instruction to pray 'while I go over there' (Mark 14:32). Spanish distinguishes these neatly: 'hasta' (until) versus 'mientras' (while), confirming the semantic split visible in the Greek usage.

1. until (143×) The temporal conjunction 'until,' marking the endpoint or limit up to which an action extends. Covers 143 occurrences including key passages like the genealogical markers in Matthew 1:17 ('from Abraham until David... until the deportation... until the Christ') and Matthew 1:25 ('until she bore a son'). Multilingual glosses are strikingly uniform: Spanish 'hasta,' French 'jusqu'à,' German 'bis' — all endpoint-oriented prepositions confirming the terminal sense. UNTIL (TEMPORAL LIMIT)

en: to-, until, until- | es: hasta | fr: jusqu'à | de: bis Matt 1:17; Matt 1:25; Matt 2:9

2. while (4×) A less frequent usage (4x) meaning 'while,' expressing ongoing duration rather than a terminal point. In Matthew 5:25 it urges settling with an adversary 'while you are on the way,' and in Mark 14:32 Jesus tells the disciples to sit 'while I pray.' Spanish 'mientras' distinctly separates this from the 'hasta' of sense 1, and the French and German forms ('jusqu'à,' 'bis') stretch to cover both, illustrating how some languages conflate what Greek distinguishes contextually. UNTIL (TEMPORAL LIMIT)

Ζαβουλών G2194 N-GMS (3×)

Zebulun; tribal name of Jacob's tenth son and his descendants

Zebulun (Hebrew Zevulun) is the personal and tribal name of Jacob's tenth son through Leah. In the New Testament the name appears in prophetic fulfillment (Matthew 4:13, 15) regarding Jesus' ministry in Galilee—'the land of Zebulun'—and in the tribal sealing vision of Revelation 7:8. The tribe settled in lower Galilee, making Jesus' ministry there a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy about light dawning on this region.

(3×) The name appears uniformly: Zaboulōn, Zebulun, Zabulon. Matthew 4:13 notes Jesus 'went and lived in Capernaum by the sea, in the territory of Zebulun and Naphtali.' Matthew 4:15 quotes Isaiah: 'the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali... the people dwelling in darkness have seen a great light.' Revelation 7:8 lists 'twelve thousand from the tribe of Zebulun' among those sealed. The references anchor Jesus' Galilean ministry in prophetic geography and maintain tribal continuity in eschatological Israel. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Ζακχαῖος G2195 N-NMS (3×)

Zacchaeus; Hebrew name meaning 'pure' or 'righteous,' borne by the chief tax collector of Jericho

This name appears only in Luke's account of the wealthy chief tax collector who climbed a sycamore tree to see Jesus passing through Jericho (Luke 19). The Hebrew root (זָכַי) carries connotations of purity or righteousness—an ironic contrast to the social stigma attached to tax collectors in first-century Judea. Luke's narrative turns on this tension: the man whose name means "righteous" is precisely the one religious leaders would have considered unrighteous. When Jesus calls him down and declares salvation has come to his house, the story fulfills the meaning embedded in his name. The multilingual forms (French Zachée, Spanish Zakchaîos) preserve the Greek transliteration of the Hebrew original.

(3×) The proper name of the chief tax collector in Jericho who hosted Jesus and pledged to give half his possessions to the poor and restore fourfold what he had taken unjustly. Luke uses the name three times in rapid succession (19:2, 5, 8), building the narrative around this named individual. As a transliteration from Hebrew זַכַּי (cf. Nehemiah 7:14), the name carried associations of purity that would have resonated ironically with Luke's original audience given Zacchaeus's profession. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Ζαρά G2196 N-AMS (1×)

Zerah, a personal name meaning 'rising' or 'dawning'; an ancestor of Jesus

Zerah was one of the twin sons born to Judah and Tamar (Genesis 38:30), included in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus (1:3). His birth was unusual—his hand emerged first, marked with a scarlet thread by the midwife, but then he withdrew and his twin Perez was born first. Despite being Judah's son, Zerah's line didn't continue in the messianic genealogy; Perez became David and Jesus' ancestor, while Zerah's mention shows Matthew's concern for complete genealogical accuracy.

(1×) Matthew's genealogy (1:3) includes Zerah alongside his twin Perez—unusual since genealogies typically list only the direct line. This inclusion highlights the scandalous Tamar episode while showing that God's sovereign choice determined the messianic line through Perez, not Zerah, despite the latter's brief birth-order advantage. The name meaning 'rising' or 'dawning' proved ironic—Zerah rose first but Perez preceded him, just as God's choices often overturn human expectations. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Ζαχαρίας G2197 N-VMS (11×)

Zacharias/Zechariah — priestly father of John the Baptist; also the murdered prophet son of Berechiah

The proper name Ζαχαρίας (Zacharias) refers primarily to the elderly priest of the division of Abijah who became the father of John the Baptist. Luke's infancy narrative tells his story: the angelic announcement while he burns incense, his disbelief and resulting muteness, and the Benedictus when his tongue is loosed at John's circumcision (Luke 1:5-67; 3:2). A second Zacharias appears in Jesus' indictment of the scribes — 'the blood of Zechariah son of Berechiah, murdered between the sanctuary and the altar' (Matt 23:35; Luke 11:51). Spanish 'Zacarías' and Arabic 'ز preserve the name.

(11×) Zacharias the priest, father of John the Baptist — an elderly Levitical priest of the division of Abijah, husband of Elizabeth. While serving his priestly course in the temple, the angel Gabriel announces John's birth; Zacharias doubts and is struck mute until the child's circumcision, when he prophesies the Benedictus (Luke 1:5-67). Luke 3:2 identifies John by patronymic as 'son of Zacharias.' All 9 occurrences in Luke refer to this figure. Spanish 'Zacarías,' Korean '사가랴,' and Arabic 'ز transliterate consistently across languages. ZECHARIAH PERSONAL NAME

ζῶ G2198 V-PSA-3P (141×)

To live, be alive; of physical life, resurrection life, and the conduct of one's earthly existence.

Zao is the Greek verb for the most fundamental of all conditions — being alive. In the New Testament it carries the full weight of that concept, from the simple biological fact of breathing ('the living God,' Matt 16:16) to the astonishing claim that the dead live again (Rev 2:8) and the ethical imperative of how one's years are spent (Acts 26:5). The present participle ho zon ('the living one') becomes a divine title across the Scriptures, and the multilingual evidence is remarkably stable: Spanish viviente/vivo, German leben/lebt, Korean 살다, and Swahili -ishi all preserve the same core without needing specialized vocabulary — until the resurrection sense appears, where languages begin reaching for completive or ingressive aspect markers to capture the transition from death back to life.

1. be alive, have life (133×) To be in a state of physical or spiritual life, to have life — the overwhelming core sense at 133 occurrences. This covers the living God (Matt 16:16; Matt 26:63), living creatures, living persons as opposed to the dead, and the life-giving power of God's word ('man shall not live by bread alone,' Matt 4:4; Luke 4:4). Spanish viviente/vivo and German leben/lebt map directly, as do Korean 살아 있는 and Swahili -ishi. The present participle zon often functions as an attributive adjective ('living water,' 'living hope'), and the stative present tense conveys ongoing, durative life. LIFE AND LIVING

en: living | es: viviente, vivientes, vivo | fr: vivre | de: leben, lebt Matt 4:4; Matt 16:16; Matt 26:63; Mark 16:11; Luke 4:4

2. come back to life, live again (4×) To come back to life, to live again after having died — 4 occurrences marking the dramatic transition from death to renewed existence. In Luke 15:32 the prodigal 'was dead and is alive again'; in Romans 14:9 Christ 'died and lived again'; in Revelation 2:8 the risen Christ 'was dead and came to life.' The aorist tense (ezesen) is crucial here, capturing the punctiliar moment of resurrection. Korean 살아나다 ('to come alive') and the shift from Spanish vivio to vivio (preterite) confirm that translators recognize the ingressive aspect — this is not mere continuation of life but its dramatic re-commencement. LIFE AND LIVING

en: lived | es: vivió | fr: vivre | de: leben, lebt Luke 15:32; Rom 14:9; Rev 2:8; Rev 13:14

3. live, conduct one's life (4×) To live in the sense of conducting one's earthly existence over time — 4 occurrences focusing on the duration, manner, or circumstances of a life lived. Anna the prophetess 'lived with her husband seven years' (Luke 2:36); Paul testifies that he 'lived as a Pharisee' (Acts 26:5); the martyrs 'lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years' (Rev 20:4-5). Spanish vivieron and German lebten both shift into the narrative past, treating life as a biographical span rather than a present state. The distinction from sense 1 is aspectual — here zao is durative-terminative rather than stative, describing a stretch of lived experience rather than the condition of being alive. LIFE AND LIVING

Zebedee — Galilean fisherman, father of the apostles James and John

Zebedaios is the Greek form of the Hebrew Zavdiyah ('Yahweh has bestowed'), identifying the Galilean fisherman whose sons James and John left their nets to follow Jesus. All 12 NT occurrences function as a patronymic identifier — 'James the son of Zebedee,' 'the sons of Zebedee' — situating these prominent apostles within their family and trade. Zebedee himself appears directly only in the calling narrative (Matt 4:21-22; Mark 1:19-20), where he is left in the boat mending nets, a poignant image of what discipleship costs a family. His wife appears in Matt 20:20 and 27:56. The name is remarkably stable across languages: Spanish 'Zebedeo,' French 'Zebedee,' German 'Zebedäus.'

Zebedee (proper noun, father of James and John) (12×) The proper noun Zebedaios (Zebedee), referring to a Galilean fisherman and father of the apostles James and John. Appears almost exclusively in patronymic phrases — 'James of Zebedee,' 'the sons of Zebedee' — serving to identify these two apostles rather than to characterize Zebedee himself. Present at the calling scene on the Sea of Galilee (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19-20) and referenced indirectly through his wife (Matt 20:20, 27:56) and in the final resurrection appearance (John 21:2). ζεστός G2200 Adj-NMS (3×)

hot, heated; having high temperature

This adjective means hot or heated, describing high temperature. It appears exclusively in Revelation's letter to Laodicea, in the famous rebuke about being neither hot nor cold but lukewarm. The contrast between hot (ζεστός), cold (ψυχρός), and lukewarm (χλιαρός) speaks to spiritual fervor versus tepid compromise. Hot water has usefulness, as does cold; lukewarm water provokes disgust and is spit out.

(3×) All translations render this as temperature hot: Spanish caliente, German heiss. Revelation 3:15: 'I know your works: you are neither cold nor hot. Would that you were either cold or hot!' Verse 16: 'So, because you are lukewarm, and neither hot nor cold, I will spit you out of my mouth.' The threefold repetition (hot... hot... lukewarm and neither hot nor cold) emphasizes the contrast. The Laodicean church's tepid commitment provokes nausea in Christ, while passionate devotion—whether hot or even decisively cold—has more integrity than comfortable mediocrity. HEAT AND WARMTH yoke, pair of animals or things

From the verb 'to yoke together,' this noun refers to a pair of animals harnessed for work, typically oxen, or more broadly to any matched pair. Luke uses it in two contexts with different nuances. In Luke 2:24, Mary and Joseph bring 'a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons' to the temple for purification—the offering prescribed for the poor in Leviticus 12:8. In Luke 14:19, a man excuses himself from the great banquet saying, 'I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to examine them'—a transparent excuse revealing misplaced priorities.

(2×) The two uses showcase different social realities: Luke 2:24's bird-pair marks Joseph and Mary's poverty (they couldn't afford a lamb), while Luke 14:19's five ox-pairs signals considerable wealth (ten oxen represented substantial agricultural investment). The term's flexibility to describe any matched pair, from sacrificial birds to farm animals, makes it useful for both ritual contexts and everyday economic life, yet in Luke's hands it becomes a marker of social status and spiritual priorities. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Loop or strap on a yoke, through which an animal's head passes; nautical: rudder lashings or bands.

This rare Greek term appears only once in the New Testament, referring to the ropes or bands that secured the steering mechanism on a ship. In classical usage, it denoted the loop attached to a yoke through which a beast's head was placed. Luke uses it in Acts 27:40 during Paul's shipwreck narrative, where the crew loosens the rudder bands to prepare for beaching the vessel. The multilingual glosses reflect both the nautical context (lashings, bands) and uncertainty about the precise technical referent.

(1×) The single NT occurrence appears in the vivid shipwreck account where sailors prepare to beach the ship by loosening the rudder mechanism. Cross-linguistic evidence shows translators grappling with the technical maritime vocabulary, with some opting for 'lashings' or 'bands' while others transliterate. The domain assignment to ANIMALS reflects the word's classical sense related to yoking animals, though the Acts passage clearly uses it in a nautical context for ship steering equipment. CATTLE AND OXEN

Ζεύς G2203 N-AMS (2×)

Zeus, chief god of the Greek pantheon

The king of the Olympian gods, Zeus was the supreme deity in Greco-Roman paganism, associated with sky, thunder, and sovereign power. In Acts 14, when Paul heals a lame man at Lystra, the crowds identify Barnabas as Zeus (the more dignified, silent deity) and Paul as Hermes (Zeus's messenger, since Paul did the talking). The priest of Zeus even brings oxen to sacrifice to them (14:13). Paul and Barnabas tear their clothes in horror, insisting they are mere mortals pointing to the living God who made heaven and earth—a sharp contrast to the pagan pantheon.

(2×) Both references occur in Acts 14:12-13 during the Lystra incident, where pagan religiosity misidentifies the apostles as gods incarnate. The scene underscores the clash between biblical monotheism and polytheistic paganism, while also revealing the Lycaonian crowd's theological framework: they interpret powerful deeds through the lens of their divine hierarchy, with Zeus at the top. The apostles' violent rejection of this honor emphasizes the chasm between the true Creator and the false gods of the nations. GODS AND DEITIES to boil, to be fervent, to be zealous

Literally describing water boiling or seething, this verb came to characterize intense inner passion or zeal. Acts 18:25 describes Apollos as 'fervent in spirit' even though his knowledge was limited to John's baptism—his passion outran his theology, which Priscilla and Aquila corrected. Romans 12:11 commands, 'not lagging in diligence, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord,' where the boiling metaphor captures the intensity believers should bring to spiritual service. The German eifrig (eager, zealous) and the classical image of a kettle boiling convey the same heat and energy.

(2×) Both occurrences describe spiritual passion, though with different emphases: Apollos demonstrates natural fervor that needs theological refinement, while Romans 12:11 prescribes fervor as a duty for all believers. The boiling imagery suggests visible intensity—this isn't quiet devotion but hot, bubbling zeal that overflows in speech and action. The verb implies that authentic Christian life should simmer with constant spiritual heat, not tepid indifference. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

ζῆλος G2205 N-NMS (16×)

Jealousy or envious rivalry; zeal, passionate devotion; fury, fiery indignation.

The Greek noun zelos holds a remarkable tension at its heart: the same burning intensity that fuels righteous devotion can curdle into destructive envy. When Jesus cleanses the temple, his disciples remember 'Zeal for your house will consume me' (John 2:17) — a holy fire. But when the Sadducees move against the apostles, they are 'filled with jealousy' (Acts 5:17) — the same Greek word now naming a possessive rage. Spanish celo and French zele mirror this ambiguity perfectly, while German Eifer similarly hovers between admirable eagerness and suspicious jealousy. Paul navigates both edges: he commends the Corinthians' zelos as godly earnestness (2 Cor 7:11) and warns against zelos as the party-spirit tearing them apart (1 Cor 3:3). In Hebrews 10:27, the word reaches its terrifying extreme — the 'fury of fire' reserved for judgment.

1. jealousy (9×) Jealousy, envy, or rivalrous resentment — the negative pole of passionate intensity directed against another's advantage or perceived threat. This sense (9 occurrences) appears when the Sadducees are 'filled with jealousy' against the apostles (Acts 5:17), when Jews in Antioch are 'filled with jealousy' at Paul's success (Acts 13:45), and when Paul lists jealousy alongside quarreling and strife as marks of worldly Corinth (Rom 13:13; 1 Cor 3:3). Spanish celos, Arabic غيرة, and Korean 시기 all deploy specifically negative jealousy terms here. Paul's 'godly jealousy' for the Corinthians (2 Cor 11:2) uses the same word but reclaims it for covenantal protectiveness. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

2. zeal (6×) Zeal, ardent devotion, or passionate commitment — the positive pole of the same emotional intensity, now directed toward

God, a cause, or a community. Six occurrences carry this warmer sense: the disciples' memory of Psalm 69:9 ('Zeal for your house,' John 2:17), Israel's misdirected but genuine 'zeal for God' (Rom 10:2), and the Corinthians' zealous eagerness to support Paul's collection (2 Cor 7:7, 7:11, 9:2). Spanish celo, French zele, and German Eifer remain identical to sense 1, but Arabic حمية and Korean 열심 shift toward positive ardor, confirming the semantic distinction. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

3. fury (1×) Fury, fiery indignation, or wrathful intensity — the extreme end of the emotional spectrum, used of divine judgment. A single but powerful occurrence in Hebrews 10:27 describes 'a fury of fire that will consume the adversaries,' where zelos intensifies the already terrifying image of eschatological judgment. Spanish ardor, Arabic غضب (wrath), and Korean 맹렬한 (fierce) all abandon the jealousy/zeal vocabulary for language of raw destructive force, marking this as a distinct semantic peak beyond ordinary rivalry or devotion. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

ζηλ-όω G2206 V-PIA-3S (12×)

To burn with zeal or earnest desire for something good, or to burn with jealousy and envy toward another.

Zeloo is a word of fire – it can warm or it can scorch. On the positive side, Paul urges believers to 'earnestly desire the greater gifts' (1 Cor 12:31) and to 'be zealous for spiritual gifts' (1 Cor 14:1, 39). On the negative side, the patriarchs were 'jealous of Joseph' (Acts 7:9), and James warns that coveting leads to conflict (Jas 4:2). The same intensity fuels both devotion and destruction. Spanish captures this duality with 'anhelad' (yearn for) versus 'teniendo celos' (having jealousy), while German uses 'eifern' across both senses, preserving the ambiguity inherent in passionate striving.

1. be zealous, earnestly desire (7×) A positive, energetic pursuit of something worthy – to be zealous, to eagerly strive after. Paul's exhortation to 'earnestly desire the greater gifts' (1 Cor 12:31) and 'be eager to prophesy' (1 Cor 14:39) exemplify this sense. In Galatians 4:17-18, Paul distinguishes good zeal from manipulative zeal, noting that 'it is good to be zealously sought in a good thing.' Spanish 'anhelad' (long for) and 'celéis' (be zealous) reflect the wholesome, forward-leaning aspiration at work here. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

2. be jealous, envy (5×) A negative emotional response of jealousy, envy, or covetousness directed at another person. The patriarchs 'were jealous' of Joseph and sold him into Egypt (Acts 7:9); certain Jews in Thessalonica 'became jealous' and incited a mob (Acts 17:5). Paul's famous declaration that 'love does not envy' (1 Cor 13:4) uses this very word. Spanish 'teniendo celos' (having jealousy) and German 'Ζηλώσαντες᾽ (having become jealous) foreground the possessive, rivalrous character of this sense, distinct from godly zeal. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

A zealot or devotee; one passionately committed to a cause, law, or tradition; also the epithet 'the Zealot' for the apostle Simon

Derived from zelos ('zeal, jealousy'), this noun identifies a person consumed by passionate devotion. In its common usage, it describes fervent commitment to the Jewish law and ancestral traditions – Paul declares himself 'a zealot for my ancestral traditions' (Gal 1:14), and the Jerusalem elders note how many thousands are 'zealots for the law' (Acts 21:20). Paul also applies it to spiritual gifts (1 Cor 14:12) and to the redeemed community as 'zealous for good works' (Titus 2:14). Arabic 'ghayyur' (fervent) and Spanish 'celoso' both carry the same heat of passionate conviction. As a proper epithet, 'the Zealot' distinguishes the apostle Simon from Simon Peter (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13), possibly indicating political nationalism or simply intense religious devotion.

1. zealous person, devotee (6×) A zealous person, devotee, or enthusiast – one passionately and fervently committed to a cause, body of teaching, or way of life. Paul calls himself 'a zealot for the traditions of my fathers' (Gal 1:14); the Jerusalem church reports myriads of believers who are 'zealots for the law' (Acts 21:20); and Paul exhorts Titus's congregation to be 'zealous for good works' (Titus 2:14). In 1 Cor 14:12, the Corinthians are 'zealots for spiritual gifts.' Arabic 'ghayyur,' Korean 'yolsimhi haneunja,' and Spanish 'celoso' all convey the consuming, almost jealous quality of such devotion. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

2. Zealot (epithet of Simon) (2×) A proper epithet applied to the apostle Simon, one of the Twelve, distinguishing him from Simon Peter. Listed as 'Simon the Zealot' (Simon ho Zelotes) in both Luke 6:15 and Acts 1:13, corresponding to 'the Cananaean' (ho Kananaios) in Matthew and Mark – from Aramaic qan'ana ('zealous one'), not from 'Canaan.' Whether this indicates membership in the anti-Roman Zealot movement or simply marks Simon as a man of intense religious passion remains debated. Spanish 'Zelotes' and French 'Zélote' transliterate the title directly. ZEAL AND JEALOUSY

ζηλ-ωτής G2208

zealot, zealous one; an enthusiastic follower, emulator, or member of the Zealot party

Originally meaning an emulator or zealous follower—someone who ardently admires and imitates another. Classical authors use it for devoted students of philosophers like Thucydides or Antisthenes. The Septuagint employs it to translate the Hebrew describing God as 'jealous' (zealous for his own honor). In the New Testament it specifically identifies Simon the Zealot, one of the Twelve. The term likely references the Jewish revolutionary party that resisted Roman rule, though it can also mean simply 'enthusiast' or 'one zealous for the Law.' The word captures both positive devotion and potentially dangerous fanaticism.

loss, damage, forfeit; the experience of losing something valuable

A noun denoting loss or damage, often set in opposition to gain (kerdos). In Acts 27 Paul warns the ship's company of impending loss of cargo and life (27:10), then reminds them he had predicted the damage they now suffer (27:21). Paul's most striking use appears in Philippians 3:7-8, where he counts every former advantage as 'loss' for Christ's sake—a deliberate commercial metaphor. The Spanish 'pérdida' and French 'perte' mirror this single, coherent sense of forfeiture.

(4×) Loss, damage, or forfeit—the experience of being deprived of something valuable, whether material or abstract. In the shipwreck narrative Paul warns of loss to cargo and lives (Acts 27:10) and later reminds them the damage was foreseeable (Acts 27:21). Philippians 3:7-8 transforms the word into a theological metaphor: Paul regards all prior religious credentials as 'loss' compared to knowing Christ. The commercial overtone—loss opposed to gain—is preserved uniformly across Spanish 'pérdida' and French 'perte.' AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 6762 WITH 3 SENSES

To suffer loss, forfeit, or be damaged; experiencing the penalty of losing something valuable.

Always passive in the NT, this verb describes suffering loss or forfeiting something precious — not inflicting damage on others but enduring it oneself. Jesus poses the famous question in all three Synoptic Gospels: 'What does it profit someone to gain the whole world and forfeit their own soul?' (Matt 16:26, Mark 8:36, Luke 9:25). Paul uses it of a builder whose shoddy work is burned away, though the builder is saved 'yet so as through fire' (1 Cor 3:15), and of the Corinthians being grieved 'so that you suffered loss from us in nothing' (2 Cor 7:9). The Spanish 'perder/perdiere' captures the forfeiture aspect clearly.

suffer loss, forfeit, be damaged (6×) To suffer loss, forfeit, or be damaged — exclusively passive in the NT, describing the experience of losing something valuable as a penalty or consequence. The Synoptic triple tradition asks what it profits to gain the whole world yet forfeit one's soul (Matt 16:26, Mark 8:36, Luke 9:25), where the Spanish 'perdiere' and French 'perdre' highlight the irreversible forfeiture. In 1 Cor 3:15, a builder suffers loss when his work is consumed by fire, though he himself is saved. In 2 Cor 7:9, Paul rejoices that the Corinthians' godly grief meant they suffered no real loss from his rebuke. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

Zenas, a personal name (contracted from Zenodoros meaning 'gift of Zeus'), a lawyer mentioned in Titus.

This contracted form of Zenodoros ('gift of Zeus') identifies a Christian lawyer whom Paul asks Titus to assist with provisions for his journey. The name appears nowhere else in Scripture, leaving us with only this brief glimpse of a legal professional in Paul's circle of co-workers. The consistent transliteration across languages (with minor phonetic variations) shows translators treating it as a proper name. Paul's request suggests Zenas was traveling with Apollos on some ministry errand.

(1×) Paul mentions Zenas alongside Apollos in his instructions to Titus, requesting that the two travelers be provided for generously. The designation 'lawyer' (νομικός) suggests either expertise in Jewish law or Roman legal practice. Multilingual evidence shows universal treatment as a proper name with transliterations following Greek phonetics. The single reference in Titus 3:13 gives us no further information about this early Christian legal professional. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

ζητ-έω G2212 V-PPA-DMS (117×)

To seek, search for, desire to obtain; in passive, to be required or demanded

This common Greek verb zeteo moves fluidly between physical searching and purposeful striving. The Magi 'seek' the child (Matt 2:20) in a literal sense, while Jesus commands his followers to 'seek first the kingdom' (Matt 6:33) in the volitional sense of pursuing and prioritizing. The passive voice introduces a third dimension — accountability — as in Luke 12:48, 'of the one entrusted with much, much will be required.' Spanish buscar and German suchen cover both the physical and volitional senses, while the passive 'required' sense often demands a different lexical choice across languages.

1. seek, search for, look for (64×) Physical, concrete seeking: to search for, look for, or attempt to locate a person, place, or thing. The unclean spirit 'seeks' rest (Matt 12:43), Herod's men 'seek' the child's life (Matt 2:20), and Jesus' family 'seeks' him in the crowd (Matt 12:46-47). This is the most tangible sense, involving actual effort to find something currently unknown or lost. Spanish buscaban and French chercher both capture this active searching movement. SEEKING AND SEARCHING en: seeking, they-were-seeking, were-seeking | es: buscaban, buscando | fr: chercher | de: suchen, sucht Matt 2:20; Matt 7:8; Matt 12:43; Matt 12:46; Matt 12:47

2. desire, strive to obtain (50×) Volitional and abstract seeking: to desire, strive for, or pursue something, often intangible — glory, signs, opportunity, or the kingdom of God. Jesus' programmatic command 'seek first his kingdom' (Matt 6:33) and the promise 'seek and you will find' (Matt 7:7) operate in this register. The object is not lost but rather valued and pursued. German sucht and Spanish buscad cover this naturally, as the same verb carries both concrete and volitional weight in those languages. SEEKING AND SEARCHING en: do-you-seek, it-seeks, seek | es: busca, buscad, buscáis | fr: chercher | de: suchen, sucht Matt 2:13; Matt 6:33; Matt 7:7; Matt 18:12; Matt 28:5

3. be required, be demanded (3×) Passive voice: to be required, demanded, or sought from someone, expressing obligation or accountability. Luke 12:48 ('from the one entrusted much, much will be required') and 1 Corinthians 4:2 ('it is required of stewards to be faithful') are key passages. Spanish shifts to es requerido and sera demandado, revealing how the passive transforms the seeking verb into a demand verb. Only three New Testament occurrences carry this distinct semantic frame. ζήτ-ημα G2213 N-GNS (5×)

Question, issue; a matter of dispute or inquiry, especially of a legal or theological nature

Refers to a disputed question or matter under investigation, carrying a more formal and weighty tone than a simple inquiry. In the New Testament, every occurrence involves official or theological controversies—debates before councils, governors, or kings. Spanish 'cuestión' and French 'question' both reflect this juridical register. The word signals that more is at stake than mere curiosity; these are contested claims requiring adjudication.

(5×) A disputed question or point of contention, particularly in legal or theological debate. All five NT occurrences appear in Acts: the controversy about circumcision sent to Jerusalem (Acts 15:2), Gallio's dismissal of the dispute as a matter of Jewish law (Acts 18:15), Lysias's assessment that the charges concern questions of Jewish law (Acts 23:29), Festus's puzzlement over questions about Jesus's resurrection (Acts 25:19), and Paul's appeal to Agrippa's expertise in Jewish questions (Acts 26:3). Spanish 'cuestiones' and French 'question' consistently reflect the forensic-deliberative register rather than casual inquiry. CONTROVERSY DISPUTE

A seeking, investigation, or controversy; a dispute or debated question, especially on matters of law or doctrine

From the verb zeteo ('to seek'), this noun covers the spectrum from philosophical inquiry to heated religious controversy. In the New Testament it leans overwhelmingly toward the latter: John 3:25 reports a 'dispute' between John's disciples and a Jew about purification; Acts 15:2, 7 describe the sharp 'debate' at the Jerusalem Council over circumcision; and the Pastoral Epistles warn against 'controversies' that breed strife (1 Tim 1:4; 6:4; Titus 3:9). German 'Streitfrage' (contested question) and Arabic 'mubahathat/jidal' both foreground the adversarial quality. Only Acts 25:20 preserves the older, more neutral sense of judicial 'inquiry,' where Festus confesses uncertainty about how to conduct the investigation into charges against Paul.

1. controversy, dispute (7×) A controversy, dispute, or debated question, especially concerning matters of Jewish law, religious doctrine, or theological practice. John 3:25 introduces a 'dispute' about ceremonial purification; Acts 15:2, 7 use it for the sharp debate over Gentile circumcision at the Jerusalem Council; and the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim 1:4; 6:4; 2 Tim 2:23; Titus 3:9) warn against 'foolish controversies' that produce quarrels rather than edification. Spanish 'controversias/disputa,' German 'Streitfrage,' and Arabic 'jidal' all capture the contentious, adversarial nature of these debates. CONTROVERSY DISPUTE

2. inquiry, investigation (1×) A formal inquiry or investigation, retaining the word's classical sense of a judicial or administrative search for truth. In Acts 25:20, the Roman governor Festus explains to King Agrippa that he was 'at a loss regarding the inquiry (zetesis) about these things,' referring to the legal examination of charges brought against Paul by the Jewish authorities. Spanish 'investigación' and the judicial connotation of the Greek distinguish this from the polemical 'dispute' sense – Festus is not arguing a position but genuinely uncertain how to proceed with the case. INVESTIGATION INQUIRY

Darnel or tares; a weed (Lolium temulentum) resembling wheat, used in Jesus' parable of the wheat and weeds.

A botanical term for darnel (Lolium temulentum), a poisonous weed that closely mimics wheat in its early growth stages — indistinguishable until the heads form. All eight New Testament occurrences fall within Jesus' parable of the wheat and tares (Matt 13:24–30, 36–43), making it one of the most narrowly distributed nouns in the Greek Testament. The parable's power depends on the biological reality: darnel's roots intertwine with wheat, making premature removal destructive. Spanish cizaña (which has entered everyday language meaning 'discord') and French ivraie (from Latin ebriaca, 'intoxicating') both preserve the agricultural specificity and hint at the weed's toxic properties.

(8×) Darnel or tares (Lolium temulentum), a toxic weed that closely resembles wheat during its growing phase. Confined entirely to Jesus' parable in Matt 13:25–40, where an enemy sows ζιζάνια among the wheat at night. The servants discover them only after both have sprouted (v. 26), and the master forbids uprooting them lest the wheat be destroyed (v. 29) — a detail grounded in the botanical fact that darnel roots entangle with wheat. The allegorical interpretation (vv. 36–43) identifies the weeds as 'sons of the evil one.' The Sumerian cognate zizân ('wheat') ironically highlights how the weed mimics the very grain it corrupts. GRASS AND VEGETATION

Zerubbabel; personal name of the post-exilic leader who rebuilt the temple

Zerubbabel (from Babylonian Zeru-Babili, 'seed of Babylon') is the name of the governor of Judah who led the first return from exile and rebuilt the temple under Cyrus' decree. He was a descendant of David, maintaining the royal line. In the New Testament genealogies he appears as an ancestor of Jesus, linking Christ to both the Davidic dynasty and the restoration community. His inclusion emphasizes God's faithfulness through exile and return.

(3×) The name appears uniformly: Zorobabel, Serubbabel. Matthew 1:12: 'After the deportation to Babylon: Jechoniah was the father of Shealtiel, and Shealtiel the father of Zerubbabel.' Matthew 1:13: 'and Zerubbabel the father of Abiud.' Luke 3:27 includes him in the ascending genealogy. These references establish Jesus' legal descent through the Davidic line as it passed through the crucible of exile and emerged in the restoration period, showing unbroken continuity of God's covenant promises. ZERUBBABEL NAME

Deep darkness, gloom; the murky blackness of the netherworld or divine judgment

Denotes a thick, oppressive darkness associated with dread and divine punishment. Unlike ordinary nightfall, this word evokes the primordial gloom of the underworld—Homer used it for the realm of Hades. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in contexts of eschatological judgment: chains of darkness, the blackest gloom reserved for the wicked. French 'ténèbres' and Spanish 'tinieblas' both reach for the plural to convey its overwhelming, engulfing quality. The word's poetic gravity makes it far heavier than common terms for darkness.

(5×) Nether gloom or deep darkness, especially as associated with divine judgment and the abode of the condemned. In Heb 12:18 it describes the terrifying darkness at Sinai; in 2 Pet 2:4 it names the gloomy chains where fallen angels are held; in 2 Pet 2:17 and Jude 1:13 it is the 'blackest darkness' reserved for false teachers; and Jude 1:6 parallels the angelic imprisonment. Spanish 'tinieblas' and French 'ténèbres' consistently use the plural to capture the word's oppressive, engulfing quality—this is not mere absence of light but an active, dreadful darkness with mythological and eschatological overtones. DARKNESS AND GLOOM

Yoke – a wooden crossbar for draft animals, extended to burdens of obligation, servitude, or a pair of balance scales.

In the ancient world, the zygon was the familiar wooden frame binding oxen to a plow, and it became one of Scripture's most potent metaphors. Jesus invites the weary to take his yoke, promising it is easy and light (Matt 11:29-30) – a deliberate contrast with the heavy yoke of legalistic burden the apostles refuse to impose (Acts 15:10). Paul warns against returning to a 'yoke of slavery' (Gal 5:1), and slaves are told to honor masters under the yoke (1 Tim 6:1). In Revelation 6:5 the word shifts to a pair of balance scales held by the third horseman, signaling famine and economic judgment. Spanish 'yugo/balanza' and French 'joug' preserve this dual range.

1. (4×) A yoke of obligation, servitude, or discipleship – the metaphorical burden placed on someone's neck. Jesus offers his gentle yoke (Matt 11:29-30); the Jerusalem council rejects burdening Gentiles with an unbearable yoke (Acts 15:10); slaves serve under the yoke (1 Tim 6:1). Across languages – Spanish 'yugo,' French 'joug,' German 'Joch' – the metaphor of imposed authority is universally understood. (Matt 11:29-30; Acts 15:10; 1 Tim 6:1) GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. (1×) A pair of balance scales – the crossbar from which pans hang for weighing. In Revelation 6:5 the third horseman holds a zygon, announcing grain prices during famine. English 'a scale' and Spanish 'balanza' distinguish this commercial-measurement sense from the servitude metaphor. (Rev 6:5) GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

3. (1×) The yoke of slavery from which Christ has set believers free – a specifically liberative use. In Galatians 5:1 Paul warns against submitting again to a 'yoke of bondage,' where Spanish 'en yugo' and English 'in yoke' emphasize the re-enslavement danger. This is closely related to sense 1 but carries the distinctive Pauline theology of freedom in Christ. (Gal 5:1) GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Leaven, yeast; a fermenting agent used literally of bread-making and figuratively of pervasive moral or doctrinal influence.

Denotes the sourdough starter or fermenting agent that causes bread dough to rise. In the ancient world, a small piece of old dough was reserved to leaven a new batch, making the image of hidden, spreading influence natural and powerful. Jesus warns his disciples to 'beware the leaven of the Pharisees' (Matt 16:6; Mark 8:15; Luke 12:1), using the word as a metaphor for the quiet, pervasive spread of corrupt teaching. Yet in Matt 13:33 the same image appears positively: the kingdom of heaven is like leaven a woman hid in flour until all was leavened. Paul picks up the metaphor in 1 Cor 5:6-8 and Gal 5:9, warning that a little leaven leavens the whole lump. Every major translation language renders it with a single cognate term (Spanish levadura, French levain, German Sauerteig).

leaven (13×) A fermenting substance, yeast or sourdough, used both literally for bread-making and figuratively for any quietly pervasive influence, whether corrupting (Matt 16:6, 11-12; Mark 8:15; Luke 12:1; 1 Cor 5:6-8; Gal 5:9) or life-giving (Matt 13:33; Luke 13:21). to leaven, cause to ferment; to permeate thoroughly like yeast in dough

Derived from zyme (leaven), this verb describes the process by which a small quantity of yeast permeates and transforms an entire batch of dough. Jesus uses it positively in the parables of the kingdom (Matt 13:33; Luke 13:21), where a woman hides leaven in three measures of flour until the whole is leavened. Paul inverts the image: a little leaven leavens the whole lump, warning against tolerating sin (1 Cor 5:6; Gal 5:9). French 'faire lever/fermenter' captures both the literal baking process and its figurative force.

(4×) To leaven or cause to ferment—describing how yeast permeates and transforms dough completely. In Jesus' parables (Matt 13:33; Luke 13:21) the verb illustrates the kingdom's hidden but total transformative power: a woman mixes leaven into flour until the whole batch is leavened. Paul uses the same image negatively (1 Cor 5:6; Gal 5:9), warning that tolerating a little moral corruption will infect the entire community. French 'faire lever' (to cause to rise) and Spanish 'leudar' both preserve the concrete baking metaphor. LEAVEN LEAVENED BREAD

to capture alive, to take captive, to ensnare

Combining 'alive' and 'to catch,' this verb describes capturing someone or something alive rather than killing it. In Luke 5:10, Jesus tells the fisherman Peter, 'Do not be afraid; from now on you will be catching men'—a transforming metaphor that reframes Peter's vocation from fish to people. But in 2 Timothy 2:26, Paul warns that opponents may 'come to their senses and escape from the snare of the devil, having been captured by him to do his will'—here the capturing is satanic enslavement. The same verb thus describes both gospel rescue and demonic bondage.

(2×) The two uses stand in stark contrast: Luke 5:10 presents catching people alive as the missionary task (rescuing them from death to life), while 2 Timothy 2:26 depicts Satan capturing people alive for his purposes (enslaving them to sin). The verb's core meaning —taking someone alive rather than killing them—gains ironic force in these contexts: Jesus's fishers preserve life eternally, while Satan's trapping preserves people for destruction. The imagery warns that humans are always being 'caught' by one master or another. TAKE CAPTIVE

Life — biological existence and, distinctively in the NT, the eternal quality of life that comes from God through Christ

Zōē in classical Greek could mean livelihood, substance, or simply the state of being alive. The New Testament dramatically reweights the term: of its 135 occurrences, the vast majority denote not mere biological existence but the divine, imperishable quality of life that belongs to God and is given through faith in Christ. John's Gospel is especially saturated with this usage — 'I am the way, the truth, and the life' (John 14:6); 'I came that they may have life, and have it abundantly' (John 10:10). Paul contrasts this life with death as the wages of sin (Rom 6:23). The adjective aiōnios ('eternal') frequently modifies zōē, but even without it the word often implies the fullness of God's own vitality.

1. eternal life, divine life (126×) Split from sense 68842. Criteria: The NT theological sense of zōē aiōnios — the quality of divine, eternal life given through relationship with God in Christ (John 1:4; 17:3; Rom 6:23). Eschatological and qualitative dimension.

ζών-η G2223 N-NFS (8×)

A belt, girdle, or sash worn around the waist; part of a prophet's or traveler's attire.

From ζώννυμι ('to gird'), ζώνη denotes a belt or sash tied around the waist, serving both practical and symbolic roles. John the Baptist's leather belt (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6) deliberately echoes Elijah's girdle (2 Kgs 1:8), signaling prophetic identity. Jesus instructs the Twelve to carry no money in their belts (Matt 10:9; Mark 6:8), marking radical dependence on God. The prophet Agabus binds his own hands and feet with Paul's belt as an enacted prophecy (Acts 21:11), while the golden sashes of the heavenly figures in Revelation (Rev 1:13; 15:6) elevate the garment to celestial splendor. Spanish cinturón and French ceinture capture the functional sense, though they miss the prophetic resonance.

belt / girdle / sash (8×) A belt, girdle, or sash worn at the waist, serving practical, prophetic, and symbolic functions. John the Baptist's leather belt (ζώνην δερματίνην, Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6) intentionally recalls Elijah's prophetic girdle (2 Kgs 1:8). Jesus' mission instructions forbid the disciples from carrying money in their belts (Matt 10:9; Mark 6:8), underscoring radical trust. Agabus's dramatic use of Paul's belt as a prop for enacted prophecy (Acts 21:11) shows the garment doubling as a symbol. In Revelation, golden sashes adorn the heavenly Son of Man (Rev 1:13) and the angels with the seven last plagues (Rev 15:6), transforming the humble belt into a mark of divine authority. BELT GIRDLE SASH

gird, fasten belt; secure clothing around the waist, especially for work or travel

This verb means to gird oneself, to fasten a belt or bind up loose garments around the waist. In ancient culture this prepared one for vigorous activity, work, or travel. The term appears in Jesus' prophecy to Peter about his future (John 21:18)—contrasting Peter's self-girding in youth with another girding him for martyrdom in old age—and in the angel's instruction to the imprisoned Peter (Acts 12:8) to get dressed and gird himself for escape.

(3×) Translations use girding language: Spanish cíñete/te-ceñías ('gird yourself, you girded'), French ceindre ('gird'). John 21:18 contains Jesus' poignant prophecy: 'when you were young, you used to gird yourself and walk wherever you wanted, but when you are old, you will stretch out your hands, and another will gird you and carry you where you do not want to go,' foretelling Peter's martyrdom. Acts 12:8 records the angel's commands: 'Dress yourself and put on your sandals... Wrap your cloak around you and follow me' (gird yourself). The verb marks active preparation for movement or service. GIRDING AND DRESSING to preserve alive, give life to, keep alive; to produce or generate living creatures

This Greek verb captures the divine act of preserving and sustaining life. It appears in Luke 17:33 where Jesus promises life to those who lose their earthly existence, in Acts 7:19 describing Pharaoh's cruel command against Hebrew infants, and in 1 Timothy 6:13 ascribing to God the power to give life to all things. The multilingual evidence spans 'giving life' to 'preserving alive,' reflecting both the causative sense (bringing into life) and the preservative sense (keeping alive). While classical usage includes biological generation, the New Testament focuses on God's sovereign power over life and death.

(3×) The single sense encompasses both preservation and vivification —keeping alive what might otherwise die, and imparting life itself. Spanish 'dar vida' and French 'vivifier' emphasize the life-giving aspect, while the German rendering captures the causative force 'lebendig machen.' The three occurrences span Jesus' paradoxical teaching on losing life to save it, the historical oppression of Israel in Egypt, and a doxology affirming God as the universal life-giver, showing the word's range from preservation through crisis to the fundamental divine attribute of vivification. GIVE LIFE VIVIFY

ζῷον G2226 N-GNS (23×)

A living creature or animal; in Revelation, the four heavenly living beings around God's throne

Zōon (from zaō, 'to live') means simply 'a living being' — broader than our English 'animal,' since it encompasses any animate creature. In the New Testament it appears almost exclusively in Revelation, where the four zōa around God's throne echo Ezekiel's cherubim: lion, ox, human, eagle (Rev 4:6-8). German 'Lebewesen' (living being) and Spanish 'seres vivientes' (living beings) preserve the etymological transparency that English 'beast' (KJV) unfortunately obscures. Outside Revelation, Hebrews 13:11 uses it for sacrificial animals, 2 Peter 2:12 for irrational creatures, and Jude 10 compares false teachers to unreasoning animals — all closer to the classical Greek zoological sense.

1. living creatures (13×) The four heavenly living creatures around God's throne in Revelation — plural zōa describing the cherubic beings of chapters 4-5 who ceaselessly worship, saying 'Holy, holy, holy.' They appear with six wings and full of eyes (Rev 4:6-8), fall before the Lamb (5:8,14), and announce the horsemen (6:1-7). German 'Lebewesen' and Spanish 'seres vivientes' appropriately avoid the misleading English 'beasts.' LIVING CREATURES

en: living-creatures | es: seres-vivientes, seres-vivientes, | fr: Lebewesen | de: Lebewesen Rev 4:6; Rev 4:8; Rev 4:9; Rev 5:6; Rev 5:8

2. living creature (7×) A single heavenly living creature — the same Revelation beings referred to individually, as when each of the four is described in turn (Rev 4:7, with lion-face, ox-face, human-face, eagle-face) or when one speaks at the opening of each seal (Rev 6:3,5,7). The singular form focuses attention on each creature's distinct identity within the fourfold company. LIVING CREATURES

en: living-creature | es: ser-viviente | fr: Lebewesen | de: Lebewesen Rev 4:7; Rev 6:3

3. animals (3×) An animal in the ordinary zoological sense — any living creature, especially an irrational or non-human being. Hebrews 13:11 speaks of sacrificial animals whose blood is brought into the sanctuary; 2 Peter 2:12 compares false teachers to irrational zōa born for capture and destruction; Jude 10 echoes this comparison. Spanish 'animales' and German 'Tiere' mark the shift from heavenly beings to earthly creatures. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ζωοποι-έω G2227 V-PPA-GMS (11×)

Give life, make alive, vivify; passive: be made alive, be raised to life — of divine life-giving power.

The Greek verb zoopoieo fuses zoe ('life') with poieo ('make'), creating a word almost exclusively theological in the New Testament: to make alive, to give life. Jesus declares that 'as the Father raises the dead and gives them life, so also the Son gives life to whom he will' (John 5:21), and 'it is the Spirit who gives life; the flesh profits nothing' (John 6:63). In the passive, the word becomes a cornerstone of resurrection theology: 'in Christ all will be made alive' (1 Cor 15:22), and Christ himself was 'put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit' (1 Pet 3:18). Spanish vivificar, French vivifier, and German lebendig machen all reach for compound life-making vocabulary. The verb insists that life is not self-generated but bestowed.

1. give life, make alive (8×) To give life, make alive, or vivify — the active sense of divine life-giving power bestowed by the Father, the Son, or the Spirit upon the dead, the mortal, or the spiritually inert. This primary sense (8 occurrences) anchors some of the NT's most profound theological statements: the Father and Son jointly 'give life' to the dead (John 5:21), the Spirit 'gives life' where the flesh cannot (John 6:63), God 'gives life to the dead and calls into existence things that do not exist' (Rom 4:17), and the Spirit who raised Jesus 'will also give life to your mortal bodies' (Rom 8:11). Spanish vivifica/da vida, French vivifier, and German lebendig machen converge on causative life-vocabulary. Paul's contrast in 1 Cor 15:45 between the first Adam as a 'living soul' and the last Adam as a 'life-giving spirit' crystallizes the sense: zoopoieo marks the power to originate life, not merely to possess it. GIVE LIFE VIVIFY

en: gives-life, giving-life, life-giving | es: da-vida, que-da-vida, vivifica | fr: vivifier | de: lebendig-machen John 5:21; John 6:63; Rom 4:17; Rom 8:11

2. be made alive, be vivified (3×) To be made alive, be vivified, be raised to life — the passive voice indicating reception of life rather than its bestowal, especially in resurrection contexts. This sense (3 occurrences) carries immense eschatological weight: 'in Christ all will be made alive' (1 Cor 15:22) establishes the universal scope of resurrection hope; the seed analogy in 1 Cor 15:36 ('what you sow is not made alive unless it dies') grounds resurrection in agricultural parable; and 1 Pet 3:18 declares Christ 'put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit,' linking death and vivification in a single redemptive movement. Spanish vivificado/serán vivificados and German lebendig gemacht shift to passive participles, mirroring the Greek grammatical distinction. The passive insists that resurrection is something that happens to a person — received, not achieved. GIVE LIFE VIVIFY

ἤ G2228 Conj (352×)

Or (presenting alternatives), or than (after comparatives); the primary Greek disjunctive and comparative conjunction.

A small but vital conjunction that does double duty in the New Testament. In the vast majority of its 352 appearances it means 'or,' setting alternatives side by side – as when Jesus insists no one can serve two masters, 'either he will hate the one or love the other' (Matt 6:24). German 'oder,' Spanish 'o,' and French 'ou' all track this disjunctive sense cleanly. Yet after comparative adjectives it shifts to 'than,' as in 'more tolerable for Sodom than for that city' (Matt 10:15), where Arabic uses the distinct comparative particle min, confirming the semantic shift.

1. or (disjunctive) (313×) The disjunctive conjunction 'or,' presenting two or more alternatives. This overwhelmingly dominant sense (313 of 352 occurrences) is rendered uniformly across target languages – German 'oder,' Spanish 'o,' French 'ou,' Hebrew 'o' – reflecting its transparent, universal logic. Used in simple either/or constructions (Matt 5:17; 6:24) as well as chains of multiple alternatives. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

en: Or, either-, or | es: o | fr: ou | de: oder Matt 5:17; Matt 5:18; Matt 5:36; Matt 6:24

2. than (comparative) (39×) The comparative conjunction 'than,' appearing after comparative adjectives or adverbs (39 occurrences). Cross-linguistic evidence is especially revealing here: while French 'ou' and German 'oder' retain the same form as the disjunctive, Arabic deploys the distinct preposition min and Spanish uses 'que,' confirming a genuine semantic distinction. Key passages include Matt 10:15 and 18:8-9, where judgments or body parts are weighed against each other. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE truly, surely, indeed (particle of affirmation or asseveration); in truth

An adverb that confirms assertions with the force of 'truly,' 'surely,' or 'indeed.' Homer and classical authors use it to strengthen statements, often in oaths and solemn declarations. It can appear alone or combine with other particles (ἦ ἄρα, ἦ μήν) for added emphasis. In asseverations and oaths it underlines the certainty of what follows: 'truly, I swear to help you.' Sometimes it carries concessive force: 'it is true that…' or 'although…' The particle never appears in the form ἦε—always ἦ. Its simple presence intensifies conviction.

ἡγεμον-εύω G2230 V-PPA-GMS (2×)

to be governor, to rule, to lead

This verb describes exercising governmental authority, particularly as a regional governor under Roman rule. Luke uses it to date key events in salvation history. Luke 2:2 places Jesus's birth during the census 'when Quirinius was governing Syria,' anchoring the nativity in secular chronology. Luke 3:1 provides an elaborate chronological framework for John the Baptist's ministry: 'in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea...' followed by other rulers. Both passages demonstrate Luke's concern to show that the gospel unfolds within real history, not myth.

(2×) Luke's historical precision uses this verb to synchronize sacred and secular timelines, establishing that God's redemptive acts occurred in datable moments under specific Roman officials. The verb's administrative sense (leading, commanding, governing a province) grounds the supernatural (angelic announcements, virgin birth, messianic forerunner) in the concrete political realities of Roman occupation. Luke insists: this happened when these governors ruled, making Christianity historically falsifiable and verifiable. RULING AND REIGNING

ἡγεμον-ία G2231 N-GFS (1×)

Rule, reign, or political authority; the term or administration of a ruler; governance, leadership.

This term denotes the exercise of political power and authority, whether by a military commander, political leader, or ruler. In classical Greek it encompassed everything from battlefield command to philosophical school leadership. Luke uses it precisely once to date the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry, anchoring the narrative in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar's reign. The word emphasizes not just the office but the active exercise of governmental control during a specific period.

(1×) Luke employs this term in his careful chronological framework at Luke 3:1, dating John's prophetic ministry to the fifteenth year of Tiberius's reign. The multilingual glosses emphasize governance, rule, and administration. Classical usage included military command, political supremacy, and institutional leadership. By choosing this word rather than simpler terms for 'reign,' Luke highlights the administrative and governmental aspects of imperial power under which salvation history unfolded. DOMINION AND RULE

ἡγεμών G2232 N-AMS (20×)

A leader or ruler; in the NT especially a Roman provincial governor such as Pilate or Felix.

In classical Greek, hegemon covers any kind of leader – a guide, a military commander, a chief. By the Roman period it had become the standard term for a provincial governor, and that is overwhelmingly how the New Testament uses it. Pontius Pilate is called hegemon throughout the Passion narratives (Matt 27:2, 11, 14), while Jesus warns his disciples they will be brought before hegemones and kings (Matt 10:18; Mark 13:9). Matthew 2:6 uniquely applies the word to the promised ruler from Bethlehem, echoing Micah 5:2 with messianic overtones.

1. governor (15×) The dominant NT sense: a Roman provincial governor exercising judicial and administrative authority. All the Synoptic Passion accounts use hegemon for Pilate (Matt 27:2, 11, 14-15), and Acts applies it to Felix and Festus. Spanish 'gobernador,' French 'gouverneur,' and German 'Statthalter' all converge on this official-title reading. The singular form appears fifteen times, consistently in trial or administrative settings. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. governors (4×) The plural form 'governors,' used when Jesus or the apostles speak generically about civil authorities before whom believers will testify. Matt 10:18 and Mark 13:9 pair hegemones with kings as representative powers of the state. First Peter 2:14 sets governors alongside the emperor in a hierarchy of human authority. The plural highlights the class of officials rather than any single figure. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

3. rulers (1×) A broader sense of 'ruler' or 'leader,' applied prophetically in Matt 2:6 to the one who will shepherd Israel. Here Matthew quotes Micah 5:2, and the word carries messianic weight rather than Roman bureaucratic overtones. Spanish 'gobernantes' captures the broader scope, distinguishing this from the narrower 'gobernador' of the governor senses. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἡγέομαι G2233 V-PPM/P-GMP (28×)

Consider, regard, esteem; also to lead, guide, or rule over others — a verb spanning cognition and authority.

A versatile Greek verb that bridges the mental world of judgment and the public world of leadership. In its dominant New Testament usage, hegeomai means to consider, regard, or reckon — forming an evaluation or assessment, as when Paul counts all things loss compared to knowing Christ (Philippians 3:8) or urges believers to esteem others as more important than themselves (Philippians 2:3). The secondary sense preserves the verb's classical meaning of leading or ruling, applied to governors (Acts 7:10), tribal chiefs (Matthew 2:6), and church leaders (Hebrews 13:7, 17, 24). Spanish distinguishes these neatly: considerad for 'regard' versus gobernante for 'ruler.'

1. consider, regard, esteem (20×) The cognitive sense — to consider, think, regard, or reckon something to be a certain way. Paul uses it to evaluate his former privileges as loss (Philippians 3:7–8), to urge mutual esteem (Philippians 2:3), and to express his considered judgment (2 Corinthians 9:5; Acts 26:2). James 1:2 employs it for counting trials as joy. Spanish considerad and German achten consistently capture this evaluative reasoning. The participial form is common, expressing an ongoing mental assessment rather than a momentary thought. CONSIDERING AND DISCERNING

2. lead, guide, rule (8×) The leadership sense — to lead, guide, direct, or rule over others. Matthew 2:6 applies it to the messianic ruler from Bethlehem (citing Micah 5:2), Acts 7:10 to Joseph as governor of Egypt, and Acts 14:12 to Barnabas as the 'leading' figure. Hebrews 13:7, 17, 24 uses the participle hoi hegoumenoi as a near-technical term for church leaders. Spanish gobernante and dirigiendo distinguish this authority sense from the cognitive one. French notably uses considerer for both senses, collapsing a distinction that Greek and Spanish preserve. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

gladly, with pleasure, willingly; adverbial form expressing eager acceptance or delight

This adverb, derived from the adjective for 'sweet' or 'pleasant,' describes doing something with genuine pleasure and eagerness. It appears when Herod listened to John the Baptist with fascination despite being troubled by his message (Mark 6:20), when the crowds heard Jesus gladly (Mark 12:37), and when Paul ironically notes the Corinthians' willingness to suffer fools (2 Corinthians 11:19). The cross-linguistic evidence uniformly points to voluntary, pleased acceptance—Spanish 'con gusto,' French 'volontiers,' German 'gern.' The word captures not mere compliance but enthusiastic reception, though Paul's usage carries an edge of irony.

(3×) The sense conveys willing, pleased engagement rather than reluctant duty. All three New Testament contexts involve hearing or receiving someone's words—Herod's conflicted fascination with the Baptist, the crowd's eager reception of Jesus' teaching, and the Corinthian church's tolerance (perhaps too ready) of false apostles. The multilingual glosses cluster tightly around 'gladly' and 'with pleasure,' confirming this is about the manner and attitude of reception, not the content received. The adverb qualifies the hearer's disposition, painting a picture of eager, even delighted, attention. JOY AND EXULTATION

ἤδη G2235 Adv (61×)

ede – already, by this time; a temporal adverb marking completed or arrived time

The adverb ede ('already') signals that an event or state has reached a point earlier than expected or by the time of speaking. It appears at critical narrative junctures: the crowds have 'already' been with Jesus three days and have nothing to eat (Matt 15:32), the hour is 'already' late (Matt 14:15), and whoever looks lustfully has 'already' committed adultery in his heart (Matt 5:28). This last usage is theologically striking – ede collapses the gap between intention and deed. With 61 New Testament occurrences, the word maps cleanly across languages: Spanish ya, French deja, German schon – each capturing the sense of temporal completion or arrival.

(61×) A temporal adverb indicating that something has occurred or a state has been reached by the present moment, often with the nuance that this has happened sooner than anticipated. Key passages include Jesus's declaration that lustful looking 'already' constitutes adultery (Matt 5:28) and the disciples' observation that evening has 'already' come (Matt 14:15). Multilingual glosses converge tightly – Spanish ya, French deja, German schon – confirming a unified temporal-completive sense across all 61 occurrences. NOW (TEMPORAL ADVERB)

most gladly, very gladly, with great pleasure

The superlative form of the adverb 'gladly,' this term expresses maximum willingness and pleasure in doing something. Paul uses it twice in 2 Corinthians 12 to describe his paradoxical attitude toward weakness and suffering for the Corinthians' sake. In verse 9 he says, 'Most gladly therefore I will rather boast in my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.' In verse 15 he declares, 'I will very gladly spend and be spent for your souls,' even if loving them more means being loved less. The adverb underscores the counterintuitive joy Paul finds in sacrificial ministry.

(2×) Both uses reveal Paul's Christ-formed emotional life, where suffering for others becomes not merely tolerable but genuinely joyful. The superlative 'most gladly' isn't hyperbole—Paul has discovered that Christ's power perfects itself in weakness, making boasting in frailty a rational response. The French 'avec plaisir' captures the pleasure dimension: this is not grim duty but glad embrace of the apostolic cross, finding Christ most present where human strength fails. JOY AND EXULTATION

ἡδονή G2237 N-GFP (5×)

Pleasure, sensual enjoyment; desire for gratification that competes with devotion to God

Denotes pleasure or enjoyment, especially of a sensual or self-indulgent kind. In classical Greek the word covered a broad spectrum from bodily delight to intellectual satisfaction, but in the New Testament it consistently carries a negative valence—pleasures that choke faith, enslave the will, or fuel conflict. Spanish 'placer' and French 'plaisir' share Latin roots that sound neutral, yet every NT context frames this pleasure as spiritually corrosive. James's piercing question about the origin of conflict (Jas 4:1) locates it precisely in these cravings.

(5×) Sensual pleasure or self-indulgent desire, portrayed in the NT as spiritually destructive. In Luke 8:14 pleasures choke the growing word alongside riches and cares; Titus 3:3 recalls a former life enslaved to various pleasures; Jas 4:1 identifies pleasures warring in the members as the source of quarrels; Jas 4:3 exposes prayer corrupted by the desire to spend on pleasures; and 2 Pet 2:13 condemns those who count daytime indulgence as pleasure. Spanish 'placeres' and French 'plaisir' render the term neutrally, but every NT attestation frames it as a competing allegiance that draws the heart away from God. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

mint, an aromatic herb used as seasoning

A fragrant culinary herb, mint was cultivated in Palestinian gardens and, like dill and cumin, subject to the tithe according to Pharisaic interpretation of the law. Jesus rebukes the scribes and Pharisees in Matthew 23:23 and Luke 11:42 for meticulously tithing 'mint and rue and every herb' while neglecting justice, mercy, and the love of God. He doesn't condemn their mint-tithing per se—'these you ought to have done'—but exposes the distortion of priorities, majoring on minors while ignoring weighty matters. Mint becomes an emblem of misplaced religious scrupulosity.

(2×) Both Gospel references appear in identical contexts: Jesus's 'woe' pronouncements against religious leaders who strain out gnats and swallow camels. The mention of mint tithing (requiring careful herb-counting in the kitchen garden) illustrates how thoroughness in minor legal details can coexist with blindness to the law's central demands. The image is memorable precisely because mint is so insignificant—caring more about herb taxes than human flourishing exposes a profoundly disordered spirituality. SPICE AROMATIC PERFUME

ἦθος G2239 N-ANP (1×)

Habits, customs, manners; characteristic behavior patterns; settled ways of life or moral character.

This word captures both external customs and internal character dispositions. In classical Greek it could mean the haunts of animals, the customs of nations, or the settled character traits of individuals. Paul quotes a Greek poet in 1 Corinthians 15:33 using this term to warn that bad company corrupts good character. The plural form here emphasizes patterns of behavior rather than a single trait. The multilingual evidence shows translators grappling with whether to emphasize 'customs,' 'habits,' or 'character.'

(1×) Paul's quotation of Menander emphasizes how habitual association shapes moral character. The term encompasses both outward behavioral patterns and inward dispositions. Classical usage ranged from the dwelling places of creatures to the settled character traits that define a person. The Spanish and French glosses ('costumbres,' 'mœurs') capture the moral-behavioral dimension, while German 'Sitten' suggests customs and manners. The context in 1 Corinthians warns believers about the formative power of their social environment. CUSTOM AND PRACTICE

ἥκω G2240 V-PIA-3S (26×) to come, arrive, be present — a verb of arrival with a distinctive present-tense-with-perfect-sense nuance

Heko is a distinctive Greek verb whose present tense carries the force of a perfect: 'I have come, I am here.' This peculiarity, well attested from Homer onward, gives its 26 NT occurrences a characteristic note of completed arrival and present reality. Jesus warns that 'many will come from east and west' to recline at table with Abraham (Matt 8:11). Prophetic announcements declare that judgment 'has come' or 'will come' upon a generation (Matt 23:36; Luke 19:43). In the parables, the master arrives at an unexpected hour (Matt 24:50; Luke 12:46). Hebrews quotes Habakkuk's promise: 'the coming one will come and will not delay' (Heb 10:37). In Revelation, Christ announces 'I am coming quickly' (Rev 2:25; 3:3). The verb thus often marks the decisive, irreversible moment of arrival — whether of persons, judgment, or eschatological fulfillment. Spanish 'venir/ha venido' and German 'kommen/kommt' capture both the motion and the arrival force.

come, arrive, be present (26×) To have come, to arrive and be present, carrying the nuance of completed arrival that characterizes this verb even in present tense forms. Used of persons arriving from distant lands (Matt 8:11), judgment overtaking a generation (Matt 23:36), masters returning unexpectedly in parables (Matt 24:50; Luke 12:46), the promised coming one who will not delay (Heb 10:37), and Christ's eschatological advent (Rev 2:25; 3:3). The present-with-perfect-force distinguishes heko from the more general erchomai. GOING AND LEADING

Eli, transliteration of Hebrew 'my God'

This is the Aramaic word for 'my God,' transliterated into Greek in Jesus's cry from the cross. Both occurrences in Matthew 27:46 preserve Jesus's anguished prayer: 'Eli, Eli, lema sabachthani?'—'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' (Psalm 22:1). Matthew records the Aramaic words Jesus actually spoke before translating them, preserving the raw sound of that desolate moment. The bystanders' confusion (thinking he called for Elijah) shows they heard the Aramaic but misunderstood it, adding pathos to Jesus's isolation in his God-forsakenness.

(2×) The doubled vocative 'Eli, Eli' intensifies the address, expressing both desperation and relationship—even in feeling abandoned, Jesus calls God 'my God' twice. Matthew's preservation of the Aramaic (unlike his usual Greek composition) suggests the cry's liturgical significance in early Christian memory. The fact that Psalm 22, which begins in forsakenness, ends in vindication and universal worship makes this cry both utterly desolate and ultimately hopeful—the darkest moment before resurrection dawn. ELI PRIEST NAME

Ἠλεί G2242 N-GMS (1×)

Heli, personal name of Joseph's father in Luke's genealogy of Jesus; possibly variant of Hebrew Eli.

This name appears only in Luke's genealogy of Jesus, identifying Joseph's father. The name likely represents a Greek form of the Hebrew Eli, meaning 'my God' or 'ascent.' Luke's genealogy differs from Matthew's at this point, which has led to extensive discussion about whether Luke traces Mary's line or uses a different reckoning. The consistent transliteration across languages reflects its status as a proper name, with slight variations in vowel representation based on phonetic conventions.

(1×) Luke 3:23 identifies Heli as Joseph's father in the ascending genealogy that traces Jesus's lineage back to Adam. The Hebrew connection to 'Eli' suggests possible meanings related to God or elevation. Multilingual evidence shows translators maintaining the name's phonetic shape with minor adjustments for each language's sound system. The genealogical placement creates one of the well-known differences between Luke's and Matthew's accounts of Jesus's ancestry. ELI PRIEST NAME

Elijah (Ēlias), the renowned OT prophet referenced in NT as forerunner and eschatological figure

The Greek form of the Hebrew name Elijah (אֵלִיָּהוּ, 'my God is YHWH'), referring to the great prophet of 1-2 Kings. In the NT, Ēlias appears almost exclusively in discussions about eschatological expectation: the disciples ask whether Elijah must come first (Matt 17:10), Jesus identifies John the Baptist as the Elijah figure (Matt 11:14), and at the Transfiguration Elijah appears alongside Moses (Matt 17:3). The cross-lingual glosses—Spanish 'Elías,' French 'Élie,' German 'Elia'—all preserve the prophetic name with minimal adaptation, reflecting his universal recognition across Christian traditions.

Ēlias (29×) The proper name Ēlias (Elijah) designating the Tishbite prophet, used in the NT both as a historical reference and as a typological figure. The Synoptic tradition ties him to messianic expectation (Matt 17:10-12, Mark 9:11-13), the Transfiguration theophany (Matt 17:3-4), and the cry from the cross mistaken for an Elijah-invocation (Matt 27:47, Mark 15:35). PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

ἡλῐκί-α G2244 N-GFS (8×)

Stature or bodily height; age, maturity, or time of life

A word that holds two related but distinct ideas in creative tension: physical stature and the progression of age. When Luke says Jesus 'grew in stature' (Luke 2:52), he means bodily height; when Zacchaeus is 'small in stature' (Luke 19:3), it is his shortness that drives him up the sycamore tree. Yet in John 9:21, 23 the same word means 'of age' – the man born blind is old enough to speak for himself. The famous puzzle in Matt 6:27 and Luke 12:25 ('who by worrying can add one cubit to his helikia?') turns precisely on this ambiguity: is Jesus talking about adding height or lengthening life? Spanish distinguishes 'estatura' from 'edad,' and Arabic separates 'qama' (stature) from 'sinn' (age), but Greek collapses both into a single word rooted in the idea of 'one's stage of growth.'

1. stature, bodily height (5×) Physical stature or bodily height, measuring how tall a person stands. Luke 2:52 records that Jesus 'increased in stature (helikia) and favor'; Luke 19:3 explains Zacchaeus could not see Jesus because he was 'small in stature'; and Eph 4:13 envisions the church reaching 'the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.' Matt 6:27 and Luke 12:25, with their mention of adding 'a cubit,' likely belong here too – a cubit is a measure of length, not time. Spanish 'estatura' and Arabic 'qama' render the physical dimension directly. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. age, time of life (3×) Age, maturity, or time of life – the stage one has reached in years rather than in height. In John 9:21, 23 the parents of the man born blind deflect questioning with 'he is of age (helikian echei), ask him' – clearly meaning legal maturity, not physical size. Hebrews 11:11 says Sarah received power to conceive 'beyond the time of age (para kairon helikias),' referring to her being past childbearing years. Spanish 'edad,' French 'age,' and Arabic 'sinn' all distinguish this temporal sense from the spatial 'stature' meaning. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

how great, how large, of what size; also how small; expressing degree or magnitude in questions and exclamations

This Greek adjective asks about size, age, or magnitude, and can express wonder at either great scale or surprising smallness. James twice uses it to illustrate his point about the tongue: 'how small a fire kindles how great a forest!' (James 3:5). Paul uses it in Colossians 2:1 to express his great struggle for the churches. The word operates in indirect questions ('how great...') and exclamations of wonder. The lexical evidence shows it functions in both directions—extraordinary greatness or remarkable smallness—depending on context. Its force is comparative and often emotional, highlighting disproportion or unexpected scale.

(3×) The sense captures magnitude expressed through questioning or exclamation, with the specific scale (great or small) determined by context. In James 3:5, the word appears twice in one verse, first for the smallness of fire, then for the greatness of the forest, illustrating how the word's meaning depends entirely on what it modifies. The Spanish 'cuán grande' and German 'wie gross' lean toward size, while the French transliteration preserves the Greek form. Paul's usage emphasizes the magnitude of his apostolic labor. The word fundamentally asks 'of what size?' with an undertone of surprise or emphasis. GREATNESS AND DEGREE

ἥλιος G2246 N-GMS (32×)

sun — the solar body as source of light, heat, and metaphor for radiant glory or divine judgment

Helios is the standard Greek noun for the sun, inherited from the Proto-Indo-European root meaning 'to shine' (cognate with Latin sol). Across its 32 New Testament occurrences, the physical sun serves both literal and theological purposes. Jesus teaches that the Father 'makes his sun rise on the evil and the good' (Matt 5:45), revealing divine impartiality through the most universal of natural phenomena. At the Transfiguration, Jesus' face shone 'like the sun' (Matt 17:2), and the righteous will 'shine like the sun' in the Father's kingdom (Matt 13:43). Apocalyptic passages darken the sun at cosmic turning points (Matt 24:29; Rev 6:12; 9:2), while Revelation's triumphant figures wear the sun as garment or crown (Rev 1:16; 10:1; 12:1). French soleil, Spanish sol, and German Sonne all continue the same Indo-European root.

sun (the celestial body) (32×) The sun as celestial body, source of light and warmth, with rich metaphorical extension. Used literally of sunrise and sunset (Matt 5:45; Mark 1:32; Eph 4:26) and as a simile for radiant glory — Jesus' face at the Transfiguration (Matt 17:2), the righteous in the kingdom (Matt 13:43), the angel of Revelation 10:1. Apocalyptic darkening of the sun signals cosmic upheaval (Matt 24:29; Rev 6:12; 8:12; 9:2). The woman clothed with the sun (Rev 12:1) unites creation imagery with eschatological hope. SUN CELESTIAL BODY

nails, metal fasteners used for crucifixion

These are the iron spikes driven through Jesus's hands (and feet) to fasten him to the cross. The word appears only in John 20:25, both times in Thomas's skeptical declaration: 'Unless I see in his hands the mark of the nails, and place my finger into the mark of the nails, and place my hand into his side, I will never believe.' The double mention emphasizes Thomas's empirical demands—he wants tangible proof, specifically the nail wounds. Classical Greek used the term for ornamental studs, shoenails, and ordinary fasteners, but here it carries the full horror of crucifixion's brutality.

(2×) Thomas's insistence on seeing the nail-marks (not just wounds generally) shows he knew the details of Jesus's execution and wanted verification that this wasn't a ghost or hallucination but the same crucified body. When Jesus appears and invites Thomas to touch the nail-prints (20:27), he meets the skeptic's terms while also rebuking the demand: 'blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed' (20:29). The nails thus become evidence of both Christ's suffering and his resurrection—the wounds prove identity and victory together. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 7952 WITH 3 SENSES us (accusative first-person plural pronoun); objective case of 'we'

The accusative form of the first-person plural pronoun, functioning as the object of verbs or prepositions: 'he sent us,' 'for us,' 'with us.' Like the singular ἐγώ, the plural pronoun has oblique cases from a different root than the nominative. New Testament authors employ this form constantly to describe God's actions toward humanity ('God so loved us') and apostolic community ('he appeared to us'). Paul's letters are rich with corporate language—what happened to us, what was given to us, how Christ dwells among us. The pronoun marks shared experience and collective identity.

we (first-person plural nominative pronoun); the speakers or writers as a group

The first-person plural pronoun in its nominative form, identifying the speaker along with others as the subject of action or state. Paul uses it extensively to describe apostolic witness ('we proclaim'), shared Christian experience ('we have peace with God'), and communal identity. Ancient Greek shows dialectal variants—Epic and Ionic εἰμέν, Doric εἰμές—but the basic function remains constant. The pronoun can be inclusive (embracing the audience) or exclusive (distinguishing the speaker's group from others). In Acts, 'we' passages mark eyewitness narrative. Simple but indispensable for corporate voice.

ἡμέρα G2250 N-NFS (391×)

Day — a calendar day or period of time; also the daylight hours as opposed to night.

The Greek hemera is the standard New Testament word for 'day,' appearing in nearly 400 occurrences across a remarkable range of temporal expressions — from specific calendar dates and periods of days to theologically loaded phrases like 'the day of judgment' (Matt 10:15) and 'that day' pointing to eschatological fulfillment. Translations across all languages use their basic day-word: Spanish día, French jour, German Tag. In a handful of passages, hemera narrows to mean specifically the daylight portion of the twenty-four-hour cycle, contrasted explicitly with night — as when Jesus asks, 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' (John 11:9).

1. day (388×) A day as a unit of time (388x) — whether a specific calendar day, a counted period, or a significant appointed day. This encompasses ordinary temporal references ('on the third day'), extended periods ('in the days of Herod'), and eschatological usage ('the day of the Lord'). All translations converge on a single term: English 'day,' Spanish día, French jour, German Tag. The breadth is enormous, from Matt 6:34 ('sufficient for the day is its own trouble') to apocalyptic judgment scenes. DAYS AND DAYLIGHT

en: day | es: día | fr: jour | de: Tag Matt 6:34; Matt 7:22; Matt 10:15; Matt 11:22; Matt 11:24

2. daylight, daytime (3×) Daylight or daytime as opposed to night (3x). Distinguished from the calendar-day sense by explicit contrast with darkness. In John 11:9 Jesus asks, 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' — hemera here means the sunlit hours for walking safely. Paul echoes this in 1 Thess 5:5, 8, where believers are 'children of the day' (not of night or darkness). The translation signatures are identical to sense 1, but the context of light-versus-darkness contrast makes the semantic distinction clear. DAYS AND DAYLIGHT

ἡμέτερος G2251 PPro-NF1P (8×)

Our, ours; first person plural possessive pronoun indicating communal belonging or shared identity.

The emphatic first person plural possessive pronoun, ἡμέτερος adds weight beyond the simple genitive ἡμῶν ('of us'). In Acts 2:11, the crowd marvels at hearing 'our tongues' — the languages of diverse nations — spoken by Galileans, making the pronoun a marker of ethnic and cultural identity. Paul uses it to assert shared heritage: 'our religion' (Acts 26:5), 'written for our instruction' (Rom 15:4). The word appears in contexts where communal ownership or shared stake is emphasized, whether of faith, language, or scriptural inheritance. French notre and Spanish nuestro reflect the same inclusive first-person plural force.

our, ours (first person plural possessive) (8×) First person plural possessive pronoun meaning 'our' or 'ours,' emphasizing shared belonging or communal identity. It is more emphatic than the simple genitive ἡμῶν. At Pentecost the crowd exclaims 'we hear them in our own tongues' (Acts 2:11), where ἡμετέραις underscores the personal connection each group feels to its native language. Paul uses it to claim shared religious heritage in 'our religion' (Acts 26:5) and to assert that Scripture was 'written for our instruction' (Rom 15:4). In 2 Tim 4:15, 'our words' denotes the apostolic message that Timothy must defend. The pronoun consistently marks what a community holds in common. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

I was, you were (imperfect first/second person singular of εἰμί); past existence or state

First and second person imperfect forms of the verb 'to be,' describing past ongoing states or habitual existence: 'I was,' 'you were.' In narrative it establishes background conditions or introduces characters' circumstances before events unfold. Personal testimony employs it to contrast past and present: 'I was blind, but now I see.' The imperfect's aspectual quality emphasizes duration or repetition in past time—not a point event but an extended state. Dialectal variations abound, but the core meaning remains stable across Greek literature.

ἡμι-θανής G2253 Adj-AMS (1×)

Half-dead, nearly dead; in a state between life and death, severely wounded or beaten.

This vivid compound adjective appears only in Jesus's parable of the Good Samaritan, describing the traveler left barely alive by robbers. The Greek combines 'half' (ἡμι-) with 'dead' (θανής) to create a stark image of someone hovering between life and death. The term emphasizes the victim's desperate condition and helplessness, making the Samaritan's compassion all the more striking. Translators across languages preserve the dramatic half-dead imagery, showing the universal power of this description.

(1×) Jesus uses this dramatic descriptor in Luke 10:30 to emphasize the traveler's perilous state after the robbers' attack. The compound construction intensifies the danger and vulnerability of the victim whom the priest and Levite pass by. Multilingual glosses uniformly preserve the 'half-dead' imagery (medio-muerto, à-demi-mort), showing how vividly the term communicates across cultures. The word heightens the moral urgency of the scene and magnifies the Samaritan's mercy toward someone in extremis. DEATH AND CORPSES us, to us (dative first-person plural pronoun); indirect object or relational case

The dative form of the first-person plural pronoun, functioning as indirect object ('he gave to us') or expressing relationship and interest ('it happened to us,' 'it is for us'). New Testament writers frequently employ this form in describing divine action toward the believing community: grace given to us, Spirit poured out on us, promises made to us. Paul's letters resound with dative constructions marking God's disposition toward his people. The case also appears after certain prepositions. Like other oblique pronoun forms, it derives from a different root than the nominative.

ἥμισυς G2255 Adj-ANS (5×)

Half; one of two equal parts, used of quantities, time periods, and portions

The standard Greek adjective for 'half,' appearing in the New Testament in both narrative and apocalyptic contexts. Herod's reckless oath offers 'half my kingdom' (Mark 6:23), Zacchaeus pledges half his goods to the poor (Luke 19:8), and Revelation measures prophetic time in halves—three and a half days, a time and times and half a time. Spanish distinguishes 'mitad' (noun, the half) from 'medio' (adjective, half), nicely mirroring the word's flexibility between substantive and attributive uses.

(5×) Half, one of two equal portions—used of possessions, territories, and time spans. In Mark 6:23 Herod promises up to half his kingdom; in Luke 19:8 Zacchaeus gives half his possessions to the poor. The apocalyptic passages in Revelation use it for prophetic time measurements: the witnesses lie dead for three and a half days (Rev 11:9, 11), and the woman is nourished for 'a time and times and half a time' (Rev 12:14). Spanish distinguishes 'mitad' (substantive half) from 'medio' (adjectival half), reflecting the word's dual syntactic role. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἡμι-ωρία G2256 N-ANS (1×)

Half an hour, a period of thirty minutes; a brief temporal interval.

This precise temporal measurement appears only in Revelation's apocalyptic vision, describing a profound silence in heaven. The compound joins 'half' (ἡμι-) with 'hour' (ὥρα) to create an exact duration. In the dramatic sequence of Revelation 8:1, this half-hour silence follows the opening of the seventh seal, creating a moment of cosmic suspense before the trumpet judgments. The specificity of the time marker adds to the prophetic precision of John's vision.

(1×) Revelation 8:1 marks a dramatic pause in the apocalyptic sequence when silence fills heaven for half an hour after the seventh seal is opened. The precise measurement creates suspense and emphasizes the significance of what follows. Multilingual glosses show exact equivalents (media-hora, halbe-Stunde), suggesting translators recognized this as a literal time marker rather than a symbolic number. The silence contrasts sharply with the worship and judgments surrounding it, making this brief interval profoundly significant. HOUR TIME MOMENT

en: half-an-hour | es: media-hora | fr: halbe-Stunde | de: halbe-Stunde Rev 8:1

of us, from us (genitive first-person plural pronoun); possessive or source

The genitive form of the first-person plural pronoun, expressing possession ('our faith'), origin ('one from among us'), or relationship ('the hope of us all'). Ancient Greek also has an enclitic shorter form used in less emphatic positions. The genitive's range includes partitive sense ('some of us'), subjective genitive ('our love for God'), and objective genitive ('God's love for us'). Biblical authors weave this form throughout communal theology—our salvation, our Lord, the body of us who believe. The pronoun's genetic relationship binds speaker and audience in shared ownership or experience.

I/he/she was, used to be (imperfect indicative of εἰμί); past durative existence

The imperfect indicative of 'to be' in first or third person, describing ongoing past states or habitual conditions. Across dialects it shows characteristic variations—Epic εἰς, Doric forms, and standard Attic. In narrative it paints background: 'there was a man,' 'Jesus was in the wilderness,' 'they were on the road.' Testimony and conversion accounts contrast what was with what now is. The imperfect's aspectual character lingers in past time, describing duration rather than punctiliar events. Simple yet essential for storytelling and theological reflection on change.

ἡνίκᾰ G2259 Adv (2×)

when, at the time when

A temporal conjunction indicating 'at the time when' or 'whenever,' relating events to specific moments. Paul uses it twice in 2 Corinthians 3, describing Israel's ongoing blindness when reading the Old Covenant. Verse 15 says, 'But to this day whenever Moses is read, a veil lies over their hearts,' and verse 16 continues, 'But whenever one turns to the Lord, the veil is removed.' The repetition creates a contrast between two 'whenevers'—the regular synagogue reading that leaves hearts veiled versus the transformative moment of turning to Christ that removes the veil. The conjunction structures the before-and-after of spiritual sight.

(2×) Both uses pivot on the contrast between reading with a veil and turning to Christ. The 'whenever Moses is read' suggests repeated, ongoing synagogue practice, while 'whenever one turns' describes the decisive moment of conversion. Paul's point is that the same Scriptures that condemn with veiled reading liberate when read through Christ—the timing word 'whenever' underscores that this isn't about ancient history but present-tense choice: every time Moses is read, the reader faces the same option to remain veiled or turn and see. TEMPORAL CONJUNCTIONS

ἤπερ G2260 Conj (1×)

Than (emphatic comparative particle); than indeed, than even; used to strengthen comparisons.

This intensified form of the comparative particle 'than' adds emphasis or even surprise to comparisons. The addition of the enclitic particle strengthens the comparison, suggesting 'than even' or 'rather than.' John uses it once to describe people who valued human praise more highly than divine approval. The term appears in classical poetry and heightened prose to make comparisons more forceful. Modern translations often render it simply as 'than,' though the Greek carries additional rhetorical weight.

(1×) In John 12:43, this emphatic particle appears in Jesus's observation that many leaders loved human glory more than God's glory. The strengthened comparison underscores the tragic inversion of values—preferring the temporary over the eternal, the created over the Creator. Classical usage shows the particle adding emphasis in poetic and rhetorical contexts. The multilingual glosses ('que,' 'als') typically render it as simple 'than,' though the Greek form suggests intensification of the comparison being made. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἤπῐος G2261 Adj-AMS (1×)

Gentle, kind, mild; lenient and gracious in disposition; moderate and tender.

This beautiful adjective describes a gentle, kind disposition that treats others with mildness rather than harshness. Classical usage applied it to kind rulers, appeased deities, gentle words, and even mild weather or fevers. Paul requires that the Lord's servant possess this quality, contrasting it with quarrelsomeness. The term suggests not weakness but strength under control—power exercised with kindness. It appears in contexts describing both character and conduct, the inward disposition showing itself in outward gentleness.

(1×) Paul instructs Timothy in 2 Timothy 2:24 that a servant of the Lord must be gentle toward all, positioned between being teachable and patient. Classical parallels show the word describing kind fathers, merciful gods, and mild natural forces. The multilingual evidence ('amable,' 'sanft') emphasizes the tender, non-harsh quality. This gentleness doesn't imply permissiveness but rather the patient kindness needed for effective teaching and correction, especially when dealing with opponents who need to be won rather than defeated. TAME DOCILE

Ἤρ G2262 N-GMS (1×)

Er, personal name in Luke's genealogy of Jesus; Hebrew name meaning 'watchful' or 'awake.'

This Hebrew name appears in Luke's genealogical record of Jesus, representing one of the ancestors in the line from David to Joseph. The name Er (Hebrew עֵר) appears several times in the Old Testament, most notably as Judah's firstborn son. In Genesis, Er was struck down by the Lord for wickedness, though Luke's genealogical Er is a different individual in a later generation. The brief mention gives no details beyond the name itself, preserved across translations with minor phonetic variations.

(1×) Luke 3:28 includes Er in the ascending genealogy tracing Jesus's lineage through Joseph back to Adam and ultimately God. The Hebrew root suggests watchfulness or wakefulness. Multilingual renderings maintain the name's phonetic shape with slight variations. The Genesis namesake was Judah's son who died under divine judgment, but the genealogical placement shows this is a different Er in the ancestral line. Like many genealogical names, we know nothing beyond the position in the lineage. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

ἥρεμ-ος G2263 Adj-AMS (1×)

Quiet, tranquil, peaceful; undisturbed and calm; free from turmoil or agitation.

This adjective describes a state of quietness and tranquility, free from disturbance or tumult. It can characterize both external circumstances and internal dispositions. Paul uses it in his instructions about prayer for authorities, hoping believers might lead quiet and peaceful lives. The term suggests not merely absence of noise but freedom from chaos, persecution, or social upheaval. Classical usage applied it to calm lives, gentle medical treatments, and smooth surfaces—all sharing the quality of undisturbed peace.

(1×) In 1 Timothy 2:2, Paul urges prayer for rulers so that believers might live quiet and peaceful lives characterized by godliness and dignity. The term appears alongside ἡσύχιος (quiet, peaceable), reinforcing the picture of tranquil existence. This isn't escapism but the legitimate desire for social stability that allows the gospel to flourish. Classical parallels show the word describing gentle traction in medicine and calm circumstances. The multilingual glosses ('tranquila,' 'ruhig') emphasize the peaceful, undisturbed quality enabling Christian witness. EASE AND TRANQUILITY

Ἡρῴδης G2264 N-DMS (43×)

Herod — members of the Herodian dynasty: Herod the Great, Herod Antipas, and Herod Agrippa I

Herodes appears 43 times in the New Testament, designating three members of the Herodian ruling family installed by Rome. Herod the Great is the figure of Matthew's infancy narrative, the king who ordered the massacre of Bethlehem's children (Matt 2:16). Herod Antipas — the tetrarch — dominates the Gospel accounts, responsible for the imprisonment and beheading of John the Baptist (Mark 6:17-28) and for the mocking of Jesus during his trial (Luke 23:7-11). Herod Agrippa I appears in Acts 12 as the persecutor of the early church who executed James and imprisoned Peter. The name transliterates directly across languages — Spanish 'Herodes,' French 'Herode,' German 'Herodes' — since it is a Hellenistic dynastic name, not a Semitic word.

Herod (proper name) (43×) The dynastic name Herodes, applied to three NT rulers: Herod the Great at Jesus' birth (Matt 2:1-19), Herod Antipas who beheaded the Baptist (Mark 6:14-28) and mocked Jesus (Luke 23:7-12), and Herod Agrippa I who persecuted the early church (Acts 12:1-23). Ἡρῳδιανοί G2265 N-GMP (3×)

Herodians, partisans or supporters of Herod's dynasty and policies

The Herodians were a political faction supporting the Herodian dynasty and its accommodation with Roman rule. They appear in the Gospels as unlikely allies of the Pharisees in opposition to Jesus. In Mark 3:6 they conspire with Pharisees to destroy Jesus after the Sabbath healing controversy. In Mark 12:13 and Matthew 22:16 they join forces to trap Jesus with the question about paying taxes to Caesar. Josephus describes this group as 'those who think the things of Herod' (φρονοῦντας τὰ Ἡρῴδου). The multilingual renderings preserve the Greek form, as this is an ethnic-political designation unique to first-century Judea.

(3×) The single sense identifies a specific political party in Jesus' time. The consistent pairing with Pharisees—strange bedfellows given their different theological and political orientations—highlights the threat Jesus posed to diverse power structures. The Pharisees opposed Roman accommodation; the Herodians depended on it. Yet both saw Jesus as dangerous. The tax question in Matthew 22 and Mark 12 was perfectly calibrated to their joint interests: affirming Roman taxes would alienate the Pharisees' base; denying them would give Herodians grounds to report Jesus to Roman authorities. All translations transliterate rather than translate, recognizing this as a proper designation. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Herodias; granddaughter of Herod the Great, wife of Herod Antipas, who engineered the execution of John the Baptist.

The proper name of the woman who left her husband Philip to marry his brother Herod Antipas, provoking John the Baptist's public rebuke and ultimately orchestrating his beheading. All six NT occurrences cluster in two parallel accounts: Matthew 14:3-6 and Mark 6:17-22, with Luke 3:19 adding a summary reference. Mark's account is notably more detailed, naming her role in the plot and her daughter's dance. The French 'Herodiade' and Spanish 'Herodiada' preserve the Greek inflectional pattern across their respective case forms.

(6×) Herodias, the historical figure who was granddaughter of Herod the Great, originally married to Herod Philip, then wife of Herod Antipas. She bore a grudge against John the Baptist for condemning her unlawful marriage (Mark 6:19) and seized the opportunity of her daughter's dance to demand his head on a platter (Matt 14:6-8, Mark 6:22-25). Luke 3:19 summarizes Herod's being reproved 'on account of Herodias.' The name appears in nominative, genitive, and accusative forms across the six occurrences. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Herodion, personal name; a Christian in Rome greeted by Paul as 'my kinsman.'

This name appears only in Paul's greetings at the end of Romans, where he identifies Herodion as 'my kinsman,' suggesting Jewish heritage and possibly family connection. The name derives from Herod, though this doesn't imply any connection to the ruling dynasty—Herod-based names were common in the period. The designation 'kinsman' could mean fellow Jew or actual relative. Like many in Paul's greeting list, we know Herodion only from this single warm acknowledgment of Christian fellowship.

(1×) Romans 16:11 records Paul's greeting to Herodion, whom he calls συγγενῆ μου (my kinsman or relative). The Herod-derived name was common in the first century, reflecting the dynasty's cultural prominence without necessarily indicating political allegiance. The 'kinsman' designation places Herodion among Paul's Jewish Christian contacts in Rome. Multilingual transliterations preserve the Greek form with minor variations. The brief mention, like so many in Romans 16, reveals the rich network of relationships sustaining the early church. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Isaiah – the Hebrew prophet, son of Amoz, whose writings are the most frequently cited OT source in the NT

The proper name of the eighth-century BC prophet whose oracles are the most frequently cited Old Testament source in the New Testament. Nearly every occurrence introduces a quotation formula: 'as Isaiah the prophet said' or 'as it is written in Isaiah.' Matthew alone cites him seven times to frame Jesus' ministry as prophetic fulfillment (Matt 3:3; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:14, 35; 15:7). Acts 8:28-30 narrates the Ethiopian eunuch reading from Isaiah's scroll – a pivotal scene linking the prophet's text to its messianic interpretation. Spanish Isaias, French Esaie, and German Jesaja all transliterate the Hebrew yeshayahu ('Yahweh is salvation').

(22×) The proper name of the OT prophet Isaiah (Hebrew yeshayahu, 'Yahweh is salvation'), cited almost exclusively in quotation-introduction formulae across the Gospels, Acts, and Paul (Matt 3:3; 4:14; Rom 9:27; 10:16, 20). Esau, the elder twin son of Isaac who sold his birthright to Jacob

Esau, son of Isaac and Rebekah, appears in three significant New Testament references. Romans 9:13 quotes Malachi's 'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated,' in Paul's discussion of divine election. Hebrews 11:20 cites Isaac's blessing of Jacob and Esau as an act of faith. Hebrews 12:16 uses Esau as a warning example of a 'profane person' who 'for one morsel of food sold his birthright.' The name comes from Hebrew עֵשָׂו. The New Testament consistently presents Esau as a theological type—the one who despised his inheritance, contrasted with Jacob who valued spiritual blessing despite his moral compromises.

(3×) The single sense refers to the historical and theological figure from Genesis. All three uses invoke Esau as an example in theological argument: Romans uses him in the sovereignty-of-God discussion, while Hebrews references both his reception of blessing (faith chapter) and his rejection of birthright (warning chapter). The tension between Hebrews 11:20 (Isaac's faith in blessing Esau) and 12:16 (Esau's profanity in selling the birthright) reflects the Genesis narrative's complexity. The multilingual glosses uniformly transliterate the name, maintaining its identity across languages as a proper noun with rich intertextual significance in biblical theology. ESAU PERSONAL NAME

To be quiet, rest, remain silent; to cease from activity or speech

A verb meaning to keep quiet, rest from labor, or hold one's peace. It covers both physical rest and the cessation of speech or opposition. When the disciples 'were silent' before God's evident work (Acts 11:18, 21:14), the word conveys reverent acquiescence rather than mere speechlessness. Paul even commands it as a way of life—'aspire to live quietly' (1 Thess 4:11). Spanish captures this range with 'callaron' (fell silent) alongside 'estar quietos' (be at rest), showing the word's dual axis of silence and stillness.

(5×) To be quiet, rest, or remain silent—encompassing both cessation of speech and cessation of activity. In Luke 14:4 the lawyers are silent in response to Jesus's challenge; in Luke 23:56 the women rest on the Sabbath according to the commandment; in Acts 11:18 and 21:14 the believers fall silent in acquiescence to God's will, recognizing they cannot argue further; and in 1 Thess 4:11 Paul urges believers to aspire to a quiet, undisturbed life. Spanish 'callaron' (fell silent) versus 'descansaron' (rested) and French 'se taire' (be silent) versus 'se tenir tranquille' (keep still) reveal the word's two axes: silence and rest. SILENCE AND SECRECY

quietness, stillness, silence; a state of restful calm or peaceful composure

Covering a semantic range from external silence to inner tranquility, this noun appears in contexts where calm is either restored or enjoined. When Paul speaks in Aramaic the Jerusalem crowd falls into deep silence (Acts 22:2). In the Pastoral Epistles it describes the ordered, peaceful demeanor expected in community life—working quietly (2 Thess 3:12) and learning in quietness (1 Tim 2:11-12). Spanish 'quietud/silencio' and French 'tranquillité' together capture the full range from hush to composed serenity.

(4×) Quietness, silence, or peaceful composure—ranging from the hush of a crowd to an inner disposition of calm. When the Jerusalem mob hears Paul speak Hebrew, they grant even greater silence (Acts 22:2). Paul instructs the Thessalonians to work 'in quietness' rather than being busybodies (2 Thess 3:12). In 1 Timothy 2:11-12 the term describes the receptive, composed attitude appropriate for learning. Spanish distinguishes 'silencio' (external) from 'quietud' (internal), together mapping the word's dual register. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 8275 WITH 8 SENSES

quiet, tranquil, peaceable

This adjective describes a state of calm, restfulness, and freedom from disturbance, whether external (peaceful circumstances) or internal (a quiet disposition). Paul instructs Timothy that the church should pray for authorities 'that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty' (1 Timothy 2:2)—seeking civic tranquility as context for gospel ministry. Peter commends 'the hidden person of the heart with the incorruptible beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit' (1 Peter 3:4) as precious to God, contrasting it with outward adornment. Quietness is both a social good and a spiritual virtue.

(2×) The two contexts show quietness operating on different scales: 1 Timothy 2:2 envisions societal peace (freedom from persecution and upheaval allowing the church to flourish), while 1 Peter 3:4 describes personal temperament (inner calm and gentleness, especially in women, though the principle applies broadly). Both value restfulness over anxiety, peace over strife, and settled trust over frantic self-assertion. The German 'still' captures both meanings—peaceful conditions and a still spirit. EASE AND TRANQUILITY

ἤτοι G2273 Conj (1×)

Either…or; a disjunctive particle introducing alternatives; whether…or.

This conjunction introduces alternative options or possibilities, setting up an either-or construction. Paul uses it in Romans 6 to present the fundamental choice every person faces: you are slaves either to sin leading to death or to obedience leading to righteousness. The particle can introduce the first alternative or appear between both options. Classical usage employed it in philosophical and rhetorical contexts to present clear alternatives. The either-or framework demands decision rather than allowing middle ground.

(1×) In Romans 6:16, Paul uses this disjunctive to frame the stark choice: everyone serves either sin or obedience, with their respective outcomes. The construction eliminates neutrality—there is no third option. Classical rhetoric employed such clear alternatives to force decision. The multilingual glosses ('sea,' 'soit...soit,' 'entweder') show translators recognizing the either-or framework. Paul's argument turns on the impossibility of serving two masters simultaneously; the particle grammatically reinforces this theological reality. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES to be defeated, overcome, worsted; to be inferior or less than

This passive Greek verb expresses being overcome, defeated, or made inferior. Paul uses it twice in 2 Peter 2:19-20 to describe enslavement to corruption and sin: people are slaves to whatever overcomes them, and those who escape corruption but return to it are 'overcome' again. In 2 Corinthians 12:13 Paul uses it ironically, asking wherein the Corinthians were 'inferior' to other churches—except that he didn't burden them financially. The classical range extends from military defeat to moral failure, from being physically weaker to being logically refuted. The New Testament focuses on moral and spiritual defeat, the state of being mastered by sin or vice.

(3×) The sense captures being overcome or made inferior, whether by external force or internal weakness. Peter's dual usage in 2 Peter 2 establishes the word as describing entanglement and enslavement—'by what a person is overcome, to this he is enslaved.' The Spanish 'vencido' (vanquished), French 'vaincu' (conquered), and German 'unterlegen' (inferior) all point to defeat or subjugation. Paul's ironic usage in 2 Corinthians asks about inferiority but assumes none, playing on the word's comparative sense. Whether moral defeat (Peter) or rhetorical comparison (Paul), the word fundamentally describes the state of being worsted, outmatched, or mastered. WEAKNESS AND FRAILTY

defeat, loss, failure

Originally a military term for defeat or rout, this noun describes loss or diminishment of any kind. Paul uses it twice in pointed ways. Romans 11:12 reasons, 'Now if their trespass means riches for the world, and if their failure means riches for the Gentiles, how much more will their full inclusion mean!'—Israel's 'defeat' (rejection of Messiah) paradoxically brought gospel blessing to nations, so their restoration will bring even greater blessing. In 1 Corinthians 6:7, Paul says Christian lawsuits against each other represent 'an utter failure' (or defeat)—they've already lost by suing. The word marks spiritual and strategic loss.

(2×) Both uses describe loss that reveals deeper problems: Israel's unbelief is a 'defeat' that God sovereignly uses for Gentile salvation (yet promises future reversal), while Corinthian litigation is a 'defeat' exposing failed love and testimony. The military etymology suggests not just setback but rout—a decisive loss. Yet Romans 11 shows God can turn defeat into victory for others, while 1 Corinthians 6 warns that some defeats can't be undone: the lawsuit is already a loss regardless of the verdict. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4977 WITH 3 SENSES

less, worse, inferior

The comparative form of an adjective meaning 'inferior' or 'weaker,' this word describes something of lesser value, quality, or degree. Paul uses it twice in Corinthian correspondence. In 1 Corinthians 11:17, he says, 'I do not praise you, since you come together not for the better but for the worse'—their gatherings harm rather than help. In 2 Corinthians 12:15, Paul asks, 'If I love you more, am I to be loved less?' expressing the painful paradox that his abundant love for the Corinthians seems to elicit reduced affection in return. The word quantifies deterioration or diminishment.

(2×) The two uses track different types of 'worse': 1 Corinthians 11:17 describes corporate worship that degrades participants (they leave worse than they came due to divisions and abuses of the Lord's Supper), while 2 Corinthians 12:15 laments relational deterioration (increased apostolic love met with decreased congregational warmth). Both capture the sorrow of things moving in the wrong direction—worship that harms and love that's unrequited—showing how Christian community can regress rather than mature. SMALLNESS AND LEAST let it be (late form of imperative from ἐιμί); third-person command or permission

A late Greek form serving as the third-person singular imperative of 'to be'—functionally equivalent to the earlier ἔστω. It expresses command, permission, or wish: 'let it be,' 'may it be so.' The form appears in texts from the third century AD onward, representing linguistic evolution in Koine and later Greek. Like other imperative forms of the verb, it carries performative weight in blessing, decree, and prayer. The simple act of commanding being underscores the creative and authoritative power of speech.

ἠχ-έω G2278 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

To sound, ring, resound; to make a loud noise; to echo or reverberate.

This verb describes loud, resonant sound—the ringing of metal, the chirping of grasshoppers, the pealing of music. It can be transitive (causing something to sound) or intransitive (sounding itself). Paul uses it metaphorically in 1 Corinthians 13 to describe the empty noise of loveless speech. Classical usage included everything from the ringing of shields in battle to the tingling of ears to musical instruments echoing their notes. The word captures not just sound but resonant, reverberating sound that fills space.

(1×) Paul employs this vivid verb in 1 Corinthians 13:1 to describe speech without love: it becomes mere noise like a clanging cymbal or resounding gong. The participle form emphasizes the continuous sounding. Classical parallels include bronze shields ringing in battle and grasshoppers chirping. The Spanish 'resonando' and French 'résonner' capture the reverberating quality. Paul's point is devastating—without love, the most eloquent speech is just hollow noise, sound without meaning, reverberation without truth. SINGING AND MUSIC

sound, noise, roar; a reverberating report or echo

A later form of the classical eche, this noun denotes any reverberating sound—from a rushing wind to the roar of the sea to the blast of a trumpet. At Pentecost a sound like a violent wind fills the house (Acts 2:2). Luke 21:25 speaks of the roaring of sea and waves as an apocalyptic sign. In Hebrews 12:19 it describes the terrifying sound of the trumpet at Sinai. The word can also mean 'report' or 'fame' (Luke 4:37), where the metaphor of sound spreading captures how news travels.

At Pentecost a sound like rushing wind fills the entire house (Acts 2:2). Luke 21:25 uses it for the terrifying roar of the sea in eschatological upheaval. Hebrews 12:19 describes the dreadful trumpet blast at Sinai. In Luke 4:37 the word shifts metaphorically to 'report'—news of Jesus spreading through the region. Thaddaeus, name of one of the twelve apostles

One of the twelve apostles, Thaddaeus appears only in the apostle lists of Matthew 10:3 and Mark 3:18. His name is of Aramaic origin, possibly meaning 'heart' or 'courageous.' Interestingly, Luke's Gospel and Acts call the corresponding apostle 'Judas son of James' (Luke 6:16, Acts 1:13), suggesting Thaddaeus may have been a surname or alternate name for the same person. Nothing else is recorded about him in Scripture, making him one of the 'silent' apostles whose ministry and witness remain largely hidden from us. His inclusion in the Twelve reminds us that faithfulness doesn't require historical fame.

(2×) The two references simply name Thaddaeus in the apostolic roster, offering no narrative or teaching about him. His obscurity in Scripture contrasts with the prominence given to Peter, James, and John, yet he was equally chosen, commissioned, and empowered for apostolic ministry. Early church tradition (unreliable but suggestive) associates him with missions to Edessa and Armenia, but Scripture's silence on his deeds keeps the focus on the Twelve as a corporate witness rather than individual celebrities. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Sea; a large body of water, whether a specific named sea or the sea as a cosmic entity

Thalassa is the standard Greek word for sea, covering every large body of water in the New Testament — the Sea of Galilee where Jesus calms the storm (Matt 8:26), the Red Sea of the Exodus recalled in Hebrews 11:29, and the Mediterranean implied in Acts' voyage narratives. It also carries apocalyptic significance: in Revelation 21:1 there is no more sea, symbolizing the end of chaos and separation. All four major target languages render it with a single, unambiguous equivalent — 'sea,' 'mar,' 'mer,' 'Meer' — confirming its tight semantic unity across all 91 occurrences.

θάλπ-ω G2282 V-PIA-3S (2×)

to cherish, to warm, to care for tenderly

Originally meaning to warm or heat something, this verb came to describe tender care, cherishing, and nurturing. Paul uses it metaphorically in Ephesians 5:29: 'No one ever hated his own flesh, but nourishes and cherishes it, just as the Lord does the church.' The warming imagery suggests affectionate care beyond mere provision—one cradles and comforts what one cherishes. In 1 Thessalonians 2:7, Paul says, 'we were gentle among you, like a nursing mother cherishes her own children,' using the same verb to describe his tender apostolic care. The verb conveys warm devotion, not cold duty.

(2×) Both uses link cherishing to bodily care—husbands to their bodies/wives (Ephesians 5) and nursing mothers to infants (1 Thessalonians 2)—as analogies for spiritual relationships. The physical warmth of holding a baby or caring for one's own flesh becomes the model for Christ's care of the church and Paul's care of converts. The German 'waermen' (to warm) preserves the literal root, while the contexts expand it to encompass all the tender affection and protective nurture that characterize self-giving love. TENDERNESS AND GENTLENESS

Tamar, personal name; a woman in Jesus's genealogy, mother of Perez and Zerah by Judah.

This Hebrew name (תָּמָר, meaning 'palm tree' or 'date palm') identifies one of the remarkable women Matthew includes in Jesus's genealogy. Tamar's story in Genesis 38 involves deception and scandal—denied her rights as a childless widow, she disguised herself and conceived twins by her father-in-law Judah. Despite the irregular circumstances, she secured her place in the messianic line. Matthew's inclusion of her alongside Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba highlights how God's purposes work through unexpected people and circumstances.

(1×) Matthew 1:3 names Tamar as the mother of Perez and Zerah by Judah, one of four women (plus Mary) mentioned in Jesus's genealogy. Her Genesis account reveals her courage in securing offspring for her deceased husband's line when Judah failed to provide the required levirate marriage. The Hebrew name meaning 'palm tree' suggests beauty and fruitfulness. Multilingual transliterations maintain the name's phonetic shape. Matthew's inclusion emphasizes God's redemptive purposes working through flawed people and scandalous situations. TAMAR PROPER NAME

θαμβ-έω G2284 V-IIM/P-3P (4×)

To be amazed, astounded, or alarmed; an overwhelming reaction of wonder or fear at something unexpected.

A vivid verb for the kind of astonishment that stops you in your tracks. In Mark's Gospel, this word captures the crowd's stunned reaction to Jesus' authoritative teaching and exorcisms (Mark 1:27), the disciples' alarm at his hard sayings about wealth (Mark 10:24), and their growing fear as he resolutely set out toward Jerusalem (Mark 10:32). The multilingual evidence is remarkably consistent: English 'amazed,' Spanish 'asombrado,' French 'stupéfait' all converge on a reaction beyond ordinary surprise, one that mingles awe with a tinge of dread.

(4×) To be struck with amazement or alarm, often carrying overtones of both wonder and fear. Mark uses this verb to depict visceral, almost involuntary reactions to Jesus' authority. At Mark 1:27 the crowd is θαμβέω at his power over unclean spirits; at Mark 10:32 the disciples are θαμβέω as he walks ahead toward the cross. Spanish 'asombrado' and French 'stupéfait' both capture the sense of being overwhelmed beyond the capacity for immediate response. astonishment, amazement, wonder; overwhelming surprise or awe

This noun describes the stunned reaction of witnesses to divine power. In Luke 4:36 it captures the crowd's amazed response to Jesus' authoritative exorcism. In Luke 5:9 it describes Peter's astonishment at the miraculous catch of fish. In Acts 3:10 it characterizes the onlookers' reaction to the healing of the lame beggar. The classical usage includes both subjective amazement and objective wonder (something that causes amazement). The New Testament uses focus on the emotional response—people gripped by awe at supernatural demonstration. The word suggests not mere surprise but an overwhelming, almost paralyzing wonder that recognizes the presence of divine power.

(3×) The sense emphasizes the visceral, overwhelming quality of amazement in response to the miraculous. Luke's double usage connects it to Jesus' works of power—both word (authoritative command over demons) and deed (provision of fish). Acts extends this to apostolic ministry, showing the same awe-inducing power at work. The Spanish 'asombro' and German forms maintain the Greek term's gravity, while French 'stupeur' captures the stunning, almost shocking quality. This is not casual surprise but wonder that seizes people, mentioned explicitly 'taking hold' of Peter and implied in the crowds' stunned responses. The word marks the human response when the supernatural breaks into ordinary experience. AMAZEMENT AND TRANCE

Deadly, fatal, death-bringing; poisonous or lethal; capable of causing death.

This adjective marks something as deadly or fatal—capable of bringing death. Classical usage applied it to mortal wounds, poisonous snakes, fatal diseases, and capital crimes. It could describe both the inherently lethal (like certain poisons) and the potentially fatal (like serious injuries). Mark uses it in the longer ending to describe deadly poison that won't harm believers who drink it. The term emphasizes not mere danger but actual death-dealing capacity, the power to terminate life.

(1×) Mark 16:18 promises that believers will drink deadly poison without harm, one of several miraculous signs accompanying those who believe. The adjective emphasizes genuinely fatal substances, not merely dangerous ones. Classical parallels include poisonous reptiles, mortal wounds, and death-bringing substances. The multilingual glosses ('mortal,' 'mortel,' 'toedlich') consistently emphasize the lethal quality. While the longer ending of Mark is textually disputed, the term itself clearly denotes that which has the power to kill, making the promised protection all the more remarkable. PERISHABLE CORRUPTIBLE

Death-bearing, deadly, lethal; bringing or carrying death; fatal and poisonous.

This compound adjective intensifies the sense of lethality, describing something that brings or carries death. More emphatic than simply 'deadly,' it suggests an active death-bearing quality. Classical usage applied it to fatal wounds, mortal diseases, poisonous plants, and capital trials. James uses it to describe the untamable tongue as 'a restless evil, full of deadly poison.' The term combines the noun for death with a root meaning 'to bear' or 'carry,' creating the image of something actively bringing death in its wake.

(1×) James 3:8 employs this vivid term to characterize the human tongue as containing deadly poison, emphasizing its destructive potential. The adjective appears in classical texts describing arrow-poison, fatal injuries, and capital trials. The compound structure ('death-bearing') suggests not passive deadliness but active death-dealing power. Multilingual renderings ('mortífero,' 'todbringend') capture the lethal, poison-bearing quality. James's point is sobering —the tongue's capacity for destruction rivals genuinely poisonous substances, making its control essential yet humanly impossible without divine transformation. PERISHABLE CORRUPTIBLE

Death — the cessation of life, whether physical, judicial, or spiritual; the ultimate enemy overcome in Christ's resurrection

Thanatos is the standard Greek noun for death, derived from the verb thnesko ('to die'). Its 120 New Testament occurrences span the full range of mortality: natural death (Phil 1:20), violent execution (Matt 20:18), judicial death penalty (Matt 26:66), and the theological concept of spiritual death as separation from God (Rom 6:23, 'the wages of sin is death'). Paul and Revelation personify death as a hostile power that Christ has defeated — 'O death, where is your sting?' (1 Cor 15:55) — and that will itself be destroyed at the end of the age (Rev 20:14, 'death was thrown into the lake of fire'). Spanish 'muerte,' French 'mort,' and German 'Tod' preserve the same breadth of literal and figurative application.

death (120×) Death as the termination of physical life, encompassing natural death (Heb 7:23), violent killing (Matt 10:21), judicial execution (Matt 20:18; Mark 14:64), and the theological reality of spiritual death as the consequence of sin (Rom 5:12; 6:23). Paul and John personify thanatos as an enemy power that Christ has conquered through resurrection — 'death is swallowed up in victory' (1 Cor 15:54) — and that faces final abolition (Rev 20:14; 21:4). Spanish 'muerte,' French 'mort,' and German 'Tod' all cover the full literal-to-metaphorical spectrum without requiring separate lexemes. DEATH AND DYING

θᾰνᾰτ-όω G2289 V-APM/P-NMS (11×)

Put to death, kill, execute (active); be put to death, suffer death, be mortified (passive).

The Greek verb thanatoo derives from thanatos ('death') and means to cause someone to die. Its 11 NT occurrences split between active and passive voice, and the split tells a story. In the active, human agents conspire to kill: the Sanhedrin seeks to 'put Jesus to death' (Matt 26:59; 27:1), and Jesus warns that 'brother will deliver brother over to death' (Matt 10:21). The passive shifts focus to the sufferer: Christ was 'put to death in the flesh' (1 Pet 3:18), believers are 'being put to death all day long' (Rom 8:36), and Paul extends the metaphor — believers 'died to the law through the body of Christ' (Rom 7:4). Spanish matar versus muerto, and German toeten versus getoetet, consistently preserve this voice distinction.

1. put to death (active) (7×) To put to death, kill, or execute — the active sense in which human agents deliberately cause the death of another person. This sense (7 occurrences) is concentrated in the Synoptic passion narratives and eschatological warnings: the Sanhedrin seeks false testimony to 'put him to death' (Matt 26:59), the morning council resolves 'to put him to death' (Matt 27:1), and Jesus prophesies familial betrayal unto death (Matt 10:21; Mark 13:12; Mark 14:55). Spanish matar/hicieran morir, French mettre à mort, and German toeten all deploy active-voice killing vocabulary. Luke 21:16 extends the warning to the disciples themselves: 'they will put some of you to death.' The word choice is deliberate — thanatoo implies an executed judicial or conspiratorial act, not accidental death or battlefield killing. DEATH AND DYING

2. be put to death (passive) (4×) To be put to death, suffer death at others' hands, or be mortified — the passive voice in which the subject is the one who dies or undergoes a death-like transformation. This sense (4 occurrences) carries both literal and metaphorical force: Christ was 'put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit' (1 Pet 3:18), forming a perfect passive pair with zoopoieo; Paul quotes Psalm 44:22, 'for your sake we are being put to death all day long' (Rom 8:36), applying martyrdom language to ongoing Christian suffering; and 2 Cor 6:9 describes the apostolic paradox of 'being put to death yet behold we live.' Most intriguingly, Rom 7:4 uses the passive metaphorically — believers 'were put to death to the law through the body of Christ' — extending physical death vocabulary into the realm of spiritual liberation. Spanish muerto/siendo matados and German getoetet preserve the passive grammatical form. DEATH AND DYING

θάπτω G2290 V-APA-GMP (11×)

Bury, inter — to perform burial rites for a deceased person, placing the body in a tomb or grave

The verb θάπτω (thaptō) means to bury or inter a dead body, covering both the physical act and the cultural obligation of proper burial. Jesus' provocative command 'let the dead bury their own dead' (Matt 8:21-22; Luke 9:59-60) highlights discipleship's radical cost over the most sacred filial duty. John the Baptist's disciples 'took the body and buried it' (Matt 14:12). The rich man 'died and was buried' (Luke 16:22), David 'died and was buried' (Acts 2:29), and Ananias and Sapphira were carried out and buried (Acts 5:6, 9-10). Paul's creedal formula states Christ 'was buried' (1 Cor 15:4). Spanish 'sepultar' and German 'begraben' capture the funerary action.

bury (11×) To bury or inter a dead person — performing the customary rites of placing a body in a tomb or grave. Jesus uses the word in his striking call to discipleship: 'let the dead bury their own dead' (Matt 8:21-22; Luke 9:59-60), prioritizing the kingdom over the paramount Jewish duty of filial burial. John the Baptist's disciples bury his beheaded body (Matt 14:12). In parables and history: the rich man died and was buried (Luke 16:22), David was buried and his tomb remains (Acts 2:29), and Ananias and Sapphira are immediately buried after divine judgment (Acts 5:6, 9-10). The earliest creedal formula includes 'he was buried' as evidence of Christ's real death (1 Cor 15:4). Spanish 'sepultar' and Arabic ᵐ convey the funerary solemnity. BURYING THE DEAD

Θαρά G2291 N-GMS (1×)

Terah, personal name; Abraham's father in biblical genealogy, from Hebrew meaning possibly 'delay.'

This Hebrew name (תָּרַח) identifies Abraham's father, who migrated from Ur of the Chaldeans to Haran but died before reaching Canaan. Luke includes him in the genealogical record tracing Jesus back through Abraham to Adam. The Genesis account shows Terah initiating the journey toward Canaan that his son Abraham would complete. He lived 205 years and died in Haran. The name's etymology is uncertain, with suggestions ranging from 'delay' to connections with the moon. Luke's genealogy emphasizes continuity from creation through the patriarchs to Christ.

(1×) Luke 3:34 lists Terah in the ascending genealogy, positioned as Abraham's father and Nahor's son. Genesis 11 provides the fuller narrative of his migration from Ur and death in Haran at 205 years old. The Hebrew name's meaning remains debated among scholars. Multilingual transliterations preserve the Greek form with slight phonetic adjustments. Terah represents the transition from the Mesopotamian context to the beginning of Israelite history, though he himself never reached the promised land his son would inherit. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

θαρσ-έω G2292 V-PPA-NMP (6×)

To be courageous, confident, or bold; ranges from quiet assurance to outspoken daring.

A verb of inner strength that the New Testament uses across a spectrum from serene confidence to confrontational boldness. Paul expresses quiet assurance about the Corinthians' faithfulness (2 Cor 7:16) and the believer's confidence of being at home with the Lord (2 Cor 5:6, 8). The author of Hebrews cites Psalm 118 to declare 'we may boldly say: the Lord is my helper' (Heb 13:6). Yet the same word carries an edge – Paul speaks of the boldness he intends to show against opponents (2 Cor 10:1-2). Spanish 'confianza' (confidence/trust) and French 'confiance' highlight the trust dimension, while English 'bold' captures the assertive side.

1. confident (3×) To be confident, to have settled assurance – a steady inner trust rather than brash daring. Paul is confident about the Corinthians (2 Cor 7:16); believers are confident even facing death because they know they will be with the Lord (2 Cor 5:6, 8); Hebrews 13:6 expresses confident trust in God's help. Spanish 'confianza/tenemos confianza' and French 'confiance' consistently render this as trust. (2 Cor 5:6, 8; 7:16; Heb 13:6) COURAGE CONFIDENCE

2. am confident (2×) To be bold or daring, especially in confrontation – the assertive edge of courage directed at opponents. Paul warns that he will be bold in person against those who accuse him (2 Cor 10:1-2). English 'bold' and Spanish 'tener confianza' both appear here, though the context shifts the meaning from quiet assurance toward confrontational courage. (2 Cor 10:1-2) COURAGE CONFIDENCE

θαρσ-έω G2293 V-PMA-2P (7×)

To take courage, be of good cheer; an imperative exhortation dispelling fear with confident hope.

Tharseō is the verb behind Jesus's characteristic command 'Take courage!' spoken to the paralytic (Matt 9:2), the hemorrhaging woman (Matt 9:22), and the terrified disciples on the sea (Matt 14:27; Mark 6:50). Its Attic relative tharreō appears elsewhere in Paul, but in the Gospels tharseō is almost a signature word of Jesus's compassion meeting human dread. Spanish Anímate and Ten ánimo capture the warmth; French Courage and German getrost sein convey the assured confidence the word imparts.

Take courage (7×) Take courage, be of good cheer—an imperative urging boldness or calm confidence in the face of fear or distress. Classical Greek used it both positively (brave confidence) and negatively (rash over-boldness), but every NT instance is a reassuring exhortation. Jesus speaks it to the paralytic before healing (Matt 9:2), to the woman healed of bleeding (Matt 9:22), to disciples terrified on the water (Matt 14:27; Mark 6:50), and through the crowd to blind Bartimaeus (Mark 10:49). Spanish Tened ánimo and German getrost sein emphasize the settled, assured quality of the courage offered. COURAGE CONFIDENCE

θάρσος G2294 N-ANS (1×)

Courage, boldness, confidence; brave spirit; grounds for courage or confidence.

This noun captures courageous spirit and bold confidence—the quality that enables action in the face of danger or difficulty. Classical usage encompassed courage in battle, confidence before enemies, and grounds for hope. It could occasionally carry negative overtones of audacity or rashness. Paul's companions in Acts take courage from seeing him, their boldness revived by his presence and faith. The term suggests not reckless bravado but well-founded confidence enabling brave action. It's both an inner quality and the external basis that inspires it.

(1×) Acts 28:15 describes how Paul took courage when Christian brothers met him on the road to Rome, thanking God for their presence. The term emphasizes revived boldness and confidence drawn from fellowship. Classical parallels show it denoting battlefield courage, confidence before enemies, and grounds for hope. The multilingual glosses ('ánimo,' 'courage') capture both the emotional uplift and the courageous resolve. Paul's fresh courage stems from visible evidence of the Roman church's love and solidarity, strengthening him for the trials ahead. BOLDNESS AND OPENNESS wonder, marvel, astonishment; something that causes amazement or bewilderment

This noun denotes something that provokes wonder, whether in awe or alarm. In classical Greek it could refer to marvels, wondrous objects, even puppet shows—anything extraordinary that arrests attention. In the New Testament's two occurrences, the word takes on more ambiguous or even negative connotations. Paul describes Satan disguising himself 'as an angel of light'—no wonder there (2 Cor 11:14, using the phrase 'no marvel' or 'no wonder'). In Revelation 17:6, John sees the woman and marvels with 'great wonder' (θαῦμα μέγα)—a wonder mixed with horror. The German and French translations both capture 'Wunder/merveille,' but the context determines whether the wonder is delightful or dreadful.

(2×) Both NT uses involve the evocation of astonishment in contexts of spiritual deception or apocalyptic vision. In 2 Corinthians 11:14, Paul's rhetorical question 'is it any wonder?' uses the term to describe the unsurprising nature of Satan's masquerade. In Revelation 17:6, John's wonder (θαῦμα μέγα) at the vision of Babylon the harlot conveys a stunned, almost horrified amazement. The multilingual glosses—Spanish 'asombro/maravilla,' French 'merveille'—retain the dual potential of wonder as both awe and bewilderment. The domain of Communication reflects how wonder functions as a response that can be evoked through signs, visions, or deceptive appearances. WONDERS AND PORTENTS

θαυμ-άζω G2296 V-PMA-2P (44×)

To marvel, be amazed or astonished; passively, to be marveled at; rarely, to admire with partiality.

The standard New Testament verb for wonder and astonishment, appearing when crowds witness the unexpected — a centurion's faith (Matt 8:10), a storm stilled (Matt 8:27), a demon cast out (Matt 9:33). It captures a visceral response to something that overflows ordinary categories. Spanish splits it between 'maravillarse' (to wonder) and 'admirar' (to admire), hinting at the word's range. In one striking passive use, Christ will 'be marveled at' among those who believed on his return (2 Thess 1:10). And Jude sharpens it into a negative key: false teachers 'admire persons' for selfish gain (Jude 16), turning holy wonder into corrupt flattery.

1. marvel, be amazed (42×) To feel wonder, amazement, or astonishment at something extraordinary — the dominant active sense covering nearly every occurrence. Crowds marvel at healings (Matt 9:33; 15:31), Pilate marvels at Jesus' silence (Mark 15:5), and even Jesus himself marvels at the centurion's faith (Matt 8:10) and at

Nazareth's unbelief (Mark 6:6). French 's'étonner' and German 'sich wundern' both center on the involuntary quality of the response — something happens that reshapes expectation. AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT

en: marveled, marveled-at, marveling | es: maravillarse, maravillándose, se-asombraban | fr: s'étonner | de: sich-wundern, staunt Matt 8:10; Matt 8:27; Matt 9:33; Matt 15:31; Matt 21:20

2. be marveled at (1×) To be the object of wonder or admiration — the passive voice describing someone who evokes amazement in others. The sole New Testament occurrence is Paul's vision of the returning Christ, who will come 'to be marveled at among all who believed' (2 Thess 1:10). Spanish 'ser admirado' captures the reversal: here the subject does not wonder but is wondered at, a theophanic spectacle. AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT

en: to-be-marveled-at | es: a-ser-admirado | fr: s'étonner | de: sich-wundern 2Thess 1:10

3. admire, show partiality (1×) To admire in the sense of showing partiality or flattering someone for advantage — a morally charged extension. Jude describes false teachers who 'admire persons' (θαυμάζοντες πρόσωπα) for the sake of profit (Jude 16). German 'bewundernd' and Spanish 'admirando' preserve the surface meaning, but the context transforms genuine marvel into calculated sycophancy. The echo of the Hebrew idiom 'lifting the face' (נָשָׂא פָּנִים) for partiality reinforces the negative connotation. AMAZEMENT AND ASTONISHMENT

θαυμάσι-ος G2297 Adj-ANP (1×)

Wonderful, marvelous, amazing; extraordinary and astonishing; worthy of wonder and admiration.

This adjective marks something as wonderful and marvelous, worthy of amazement and admiration. Classical usage described extraordinary deeds, wondrous sights, and astonishing events. Matthew uses it to describe the wonderful things Jesus did that the children celebrated in the temple, provoking the chief priests' indignation. The term suggests not just surprising but positively amazing—inspiring wonder and praise. It's related to θαῦμα (wonder, marvel) and θαυμάζω (to wonder, marvel), all capturing that quality that stops observers in awe.

(1×) In Matthew 21:15, religious leaders become indignant when they see the wonderful things Jesus did—healings and miracles—and hear children shouting 'Hosanna to the Son of David' in the temple. The term emphasizes the objectively marvelous quality of Jesus's works. Classical usage described extraordinary events inspiring wonder and admiration. The children's celebration recognizes what the leaders refuse to acknowledge. The multilingual glosses ('maravillas,' 'merveilleux') capture the sense of miraculous wonders deserving praise, which ironically provokes opposition from those who should rejoice most. θαυμ-αστός G2298 Adj-NFS (6×)

Marvelous, wonderful, astonishing; describes what evokes awe, whether God's works, his ways, or surprising events.

An adjective reserved almost entirely for things that provoke wonder at God's action. When Jesus quotes Psalm 118 – 'this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes' (Matt 21:42; Mark 12:11) – the word captures the astonishment of divine reversal. Peter uses it for God's 'marvelous light' into which believers are called (1 Pet 2:9), and Revelation applies it to God's 'great and marvelous' works and plagues (Rev 15:1, 3). In John 9:30 the healed blind man finds it 'amazing' that the Pharisees cannot see what God has done. Spanish 'maravillosa/asombroso' and French 'admirable' consistently mark the sense of divine wonder.

1. (4×) Marvelous, wonderful – describing God's acts, works, or character that provoke reverent awe. The rejected stone becomes the cornerstone, and 'it is marvelous in our eyes' (Matt 21:42; Mark 12:11). Believers are called into God's 'marvelous light' (1 Pet 2:9). Revelation 15:1, 3 uses it for God's great and wonderful signs and works. Spanish 'maravillosa/maravillosas' and French 'admirable' uniformly convey sacred wonder. The man born blind declares it 'amazing' that the Pharisees do not know where Jesus comes from despite the miracle (John 9:30). Spanish 'asombroso' and English 'amazing' both highlight the element of bewildered surprise rather than reverent awe. (John 9:30) WONDERS AND MARVELS

θεά G2299 N-GFS (1×)

Goddess; a female deity or divine being; feminine form of 'god.'

This feminine noun designates a goddess—a female deity worshiped in polytheistic religions. Classical usage applied it to figures like Athena, Artemis, Aphrodite, and the mysterious Erinyes. Luke employs it in Acts during the Ephesian riot, where devotees of Artemis fear Paul's preaching threatens their goddess's honor and their city's economic prosperity. The term appears in both singular and plural in classical texts, sometimes with descriptive adjectives like 'august' or 'terrible' to specify which goddess. In monotheistic biblical perspective, such beings are false gods rather than real deities.

(1×) Acts 19:27 records the silversmith Demetrius warning that Paul's preaching endangers both Artemis's magnificence and her temple's standing, since Paul convinces people that handmade gods are no gods at all. The term designates Artemis (Diana) of the Ephesians, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Classical parallels include references to various Greek goddesses. From a biblical perspective, this 'goddess' represents idolatry, yet Luke accurately records how devotees perceived their deity. The account reveals the economic and religious forces intertwined in pagan worship. GODS AND DEITIES

θεάομαι G2300 V-ANP (23×)

To behold, gaze upon with attention; in the passive, to be seen or to appear visibly before others.

More than casual seeing, theaomai denotes deliberate, attentive beholding — the contemplative gaze of one who takes in what is before them. Jesus asks the crowds, 'What did you go out into the wilderness to behold?' (Matt 11:7, Luke 7:24), using this verb to underscore purposeful observation. John's first epistle opens with the powerful declaration, 'what we have beheld' (1 John 1:1), where the verb carries eyewitness weight. The rarer passive sense surfaces in Jesus' warnings against performative piety — doing righteousness 'to be seen' by others (Matt 6:1, 23:5). Spanish 'contemplar/contemplado' and German 'betrachtet/schauen' both preserve the contemplative quality that distinguishes theaomai from ordinary horao.

1. behold, gaze upon (20×) Active attentive beholding: to gaze upon, observe, or contemplate something or someone with deliberate attention. Covers indicative, participial, infinitival, and imperative uses across 20 occurrences. Key passages include Jesus' question to the crowds about John the Baptist (Matt 11:7, Luke 7:24), the king inspecting wedding guests (Matt 22:11), Jesus seeing Levi at the tax booth (Luke 5:27), and the apostolic eyewitness claim of 1 John 1:1. Spanish 'contemplado/contemplar,' French 'contempler,' and German 'schauen/betrachtet' consistently select contemplative verbs rather than neutral sight words. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

2. be seen, appear visibly (3×) Passive visibility: to be seen, observed, or put on display before others. In Matt 6:1, Jesus warns against doing righteousness 'to be seen' (theathēnai) by people, and Matt 23:5 extends this to the Pharisees who broaden their phylacteries 'to be seen.' Mark 16:11 reports that the risen Jesus 'was seen' (etheathe) by Mary Magdalene. Spanish 'ser vistos / fue visto' and English 'to be seen / was seen' clearly mark the shift from agent-of-seeing to object-of-seeing, a distinction the French and German glosses leave more implicit. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

θεᾱτρ-ίζω G2301 V-PPM/P-NMP (1×)

To be made a spectacle, to be publicly exposed to ridicule; to be put on display for shame or entertainment.
This verb means to be made into a theatrical spectacle or public show, typically in a shameful or humiliating way. The passive form emphasizes being put on display by others rather than choosing exposure. Hebrews uses it to describe believers who endured public humiliation and persecution for their faith. The theatrical imagery suggests being turned into entertainment or an object lesson for crowds. Classical usage included actual stage performances, but the biblical context emphasizes involuntary, shameful public exposure rather than willing performance.

(1×) Hebrews 10:33 describes believers who became spectacles through public abuse and affliction, endured alongside others suffering similar persecution. The passive participle emphasizes they were made into shows against their will. The theatrical metaphor captures the public, shameful nature of their suffering—exposed to ridicule and abuse like actors on a stage. The Spanish 'siendo-espectáculo' and German 'zur-Schau-stellen' preserve this sense of being put on display. The context commends enduring such shame for Christ's sake, recalling Jesus's own public humiliation. SHAME AND DISGRACE

theater, amphitheater; a place of public spectacle; metaphorically, a spectacle or show
This word primarily denotes the physical structure of a theater, but extends metaphorically to mean a public spectacle. In Acts 19:29 and 19:31 it refers to the actual theater in Ephesus where the silversmiths' riot gathered—a massive structure seating thousands, used for assemblies as well as performances. In 1 Corinthians 4:9 Paul uses it metaphorically: 'we have become a spectacle to the world, to angels, and to men'—like condemned criminals paraded in the arena. The classical usage includes the building, the audience ('the house'), and the spectacle itself. Paul's metaphorical extension draws on the Roman practice of public executions as entertainment.

(3×) The sense encompasses both the literal venue and the metaphorical spectacle. The Ephesus references are literal—an actual assembly space where civic gatherings could turn into mob scenes. The structure Paul and his companions faced was no small room; Ephesian theaters could hold 25,000 spectators. Paul's Corinthian usage takes the concept to its metaphorical extreme: apostles as the final act in a gladiatorial show, condemned men exhibited for cosmic viewing. The word thus bridges architectural reality and rhetorical image, from concrete civic space to the theater of cosmic judgment. The multilingual glosses preserve both senses—Spanish and French maintain the building and the spectacle. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

θεῖον G2303 N-DNS (7×)

Sulfur (brimstone); a combustible substance associated with divine judgment, purification, and apocalyptic fire.
Theion denotes sulfur or brimstone, the pungent yellow mineral long associated with volcanic activity and divine punishment. In Luke 17:29 it rains from heaven on Sodom, echoing Genesis 19. Revelation draws heavily on this imagery: sulfur accompanies the demonic cavalry's fire and smoke (Rev 9:17–18), torments the wicked alongside fire (Rev 14:10; 20:10), and fills the lake of final judgment (Rev 19:20; 21:8). Spanish azufre, French soufre, and German Schwefel all preserve the straightforward mineral identification.

(7×) Sulfur, brimstone—the combustible mineral substance used in purification rites and strongly associated with divine fiery judgment. Homer already links theion to lightning and fumigation; the NT concentrates it in contexts of catastrophic punishment. Jesus recalls Sodom's sulfur-rain (Luke 17:29). Revelation deploys it repeatedly: the demonic horses breathe fire, smoke, and sulfur (Rev 9:17–18); the unfaithful are tormented with fire and sulfur (Rev 14:10); and the beast is thrown into the lake of fire burning with sulfur (Rev 19:20). Spanish azufre and German Schwefel confirm the uniform mineral sense across all occurrences. BRIMSTONE SULFUR

θεῖος G2304 Adj-ANS (3×)

divine, godly, of or from God; pertaining to deity
This adjective describes what belongs to, comes from, or pertains to God or the divine nature. In Acts 17:29 Paul argues we shouldn't think the 'divine being' (τὸ θεῖον) is like gold or silver images. In 2 Peter 1:3 God's 'divine power' has granted everything needed for life and godliness. In 2 Peter 1:4 believers are promised participation in the 'divine nature.' The classical usage spans 'from the gods,' 'belonging to deity,' 'sacred,' and even 'appointed by God.' While Greek philosophy used τὸ θεῖον for 'the divine' in an abstract sense, New Testament usage firmly attaches divinity to the personal God revealed in Christ.

(3×) The sense identifies the quality of deity, whether as abstract divine essence or concrete divine attributes. Paul's Athenian speech uses the neuter substantive—'the divine being' or 'deity itself'—to connect with philosophical vocabulary while pointing beyond material representations. Peter's usage is explicitly attributive: divine power and divine nature are God's own qualities, and remarkably, believers are granted participation in that nature. The multilingual renderings uniformly capitalize or emphasize the divine quality —Spanish and German 'Divino/göttlich'—recognizing this as predication of deity. The word spans from philosophical abstraction (Acts) to concrete divine attributes and participatory promise (2 Peter). GODS AND DEITIES

Divine nature, divinity, deity; the essential quality of being divine; godlikeness.
This abstract noun denotes divine nature or the quality of divinity—what makes God, God. It differs from θεότης (the fullness of deity) in emphasizing the general divine quality rather than absolute deity itself. Paul uses it in Romans to describe how God's invisible attributes, including his divine nature, are understood through creation. The term appears in the LXX and later Christian writings to describe the divine character or quality. It's more abstract than 'a god' (θεός) or 'the deity' (θεότης), focusing on the essential nature or quality of divinity.

(1×) Romans 1:20 states that God's eternal power and divine nature have been clearly seen since creation, understood through what has been made, leaving humanity without excuse. The term emphasizes the quality or character of divinity discernible in creation. This differs from θεότης (used in Colossians 2:9 for Christ's full deity), focusing instead on divine attributes manifested in the created order. The multilingual evidence ('divinidad,' 'divinité,' 'Gottheit') shows translators grappling with this nuanced term for divinity's essential character. GODS AND DEITIES

θειώδης G2306 Adj-AMP (1×)

Sulfurous, resembling sulfur; having the yellow color or properties of brimstone.

This adjective describes something sulfurous—having the color, smell, or properties of sulfur (brimstone). Classical usage applied it primarily to sulfurous waters and yellow-colored objects. John uses it in Revelation to describe the yellow breastplates of demonic cavalry, connecting them visually with the fire and brimstone proceeding from the horses' mouths. The term emphasizes both color (bright yellow) and association with the judgment-bringing substance sulfur, often paired with fire in biblical imagery of divine wrath.

(1×) Revelation 9:17 describes visionary breastplates colored fiery red, dark blue, and sulfur-yellow, worn by riders whose horses' mouths spew fire, smoke, and brimstone. The adjective modifies 'breastplates,' emphasizing the bright yellow color of sulfur while linking visually to the sulfurous fire coming from the horses. Classical usage mainly described sulfurous hot springs. The German and Spanish glosses preserve the sulfur connection ('de-azufre,' 'schwefelig'). The imagery ties judgment's color to its substance, creating a unified vision of apocalyptic destruction. BRIMSTONE SULFUR

θέλ-ημα G2307 N-ANP (63×)

thelema – will, desire, purpose; what someone wishes, intends, or determines should happen

The neuter noun thelema ('will') expresses a person's desire, intention, or purpose – and supremely the will of God. Derived from the verb thelo ('to wish, to will'), it appears 63 times in the New Testament and is theologically central: Jesus teaches his disciples to pray 'your will be done' (Matt 6:10), declares that only those who do the Father's will enter the kingdom (Matt 7:21), and in Gethsemane submits his own will to the Father's (Matt 26:42). Paul uses it for both God's salvific purpose (Eph 1:5, 9, 11) and human desires (Eph 2:3). Spanish voluntad, French volonte, and German Wille all converge on a single volitional concept.

will, desire, purpose (63×) The will, desire, or settled purpose of a person or of God, denoting what one wishes or intends to bring about. Theologically dominant in the Lord's Prayer ('your will be done,' Matt 6:10), in Jesus' criterion for discipleship ('whoever does the will of my Father,' Matt 7:21; 12:50), and in Paul's doctrine of divine purpose (Eph 1:5, 9, 11). The two-occurrence plural cluster ('wills/desires,' as in Eph 2:3) expresses the same semantic core applied to human cravings. Spanish voluntad, French volonte, and German Wille render it uniformly across all 63 occurrences. WILL AND DESIRE

θέλ-ησις G2308 N-AFS (1×)

Will, volition, wish; the act of willing; desire or intention.

This noun denotes the act of willing or choosing, the exercise of volition. While related to θέλημα (the content of what is willed), θέλησις emphasizes the act or process of willing itself. Classical usage distinguished it as the action of willing versus the thing willed. Hebrews uses it to describe how the Holy Spirit distributed spiritual gifts according to his own will—his sovereign choosing. The term appears in philosophical discussions about the nature of willing and in the LXX for God's willing purposes.

(1×) Hebrews 2:4 describes how God confirmed the apostolic message through signs, wonders, miracles, and distributions of the Holy Spirit according to his own will. The term emphasizes the Spirit's sovereign choice in gift distribution, not human merit or desire. Classical philosophical usage explored the nature of willing as distinct from the object willed. The multilingual glosses ('voluntad,' 'volonté,' 'Wille') convey the volitional choosing. The context emphasizes divine sovereignty in how spiritual gifts are apportioned for confirming the gospel. WILL AND DESIRE

θέλω G2309 V-POA-3S (210×)

To want, wish, be willing, or purpose; the primary Greek verb for expressing desire, consent, intention, and delight.

The verb thelo is the New Testament's workhorse for human and divine volition. Jesus uses it to reveal the Father's heart ('I desire mercy, not sacrifice,' Matt 9:13), to test the commitment of would-be disciples ('If anyone wants to follow me,' Matt 16:24), and to express his own compassionate will ('I am willing — be cleansed,' Matt 8:3). The Arabic arada, Spanish querer, and Korean wonhada all share this broad volitional range. What makes thelo especially rich is its capacity to shade from mere preference through firm resolve to divine determination, sometimes within a single discourse. Paul exploits this range masterfully in Romans 7:15-21, where the 'willing' of good and the 'not willing' of evil chart the inner conflict of the human will.

1. want, desire (166×) The basic volitional sense: to want or desire something. This is the most frequent use by far, spanning every mood and tense. In Matthew 16:24 ('if anyone wants to come after me') and Matthew 15:32 ('I do not want to send them away hungry'), thelo expresses straightforward desire or want. The Arabic arada/yuridu, Korean wonhada, and Swahili -taka all converge here. The breadth of subjects — God, Jesus, disciples, crowds, opponents — shows this is the unmarked, default sense of the verb. DESIRE AND WILLING en: I-desire, I-want, I-wish | es: quiero | fr: vouloir | de: will, wollen Matt 9:13; Matt 11:14; Matt 12:7; Matt 15:32; Matt 16:24

2. be willing, consent (13×) To be willing or to consent, foregrounding readiness rather than active desire. In Matthew 23:37 Jesus laments 'I wanted to gather your children... but you were not willing,' and in Matthew 18:30 the servant 'was not willing' to forgive. The English distinction between 'want' and 'be willing' is well captured by the Spanish contrast between querer (active desire) and estar dispuesto (readiness). This sense often appears in negative contexts where refusal to consent is the dramatic point. DESIRE AND WILLING en: I-am-willing, he-wanted, he-was-willing | es: Quiero, quieren, quieres | fr: vouloir | de: will, wollen Matt 18:23; Matt 18:30; Matt 23:4; Matt 23:37; Matt 27:34

3. wish, long for (12×) To wish or long for, often with optative or counterfactual nuance. In Mark 6:25 Herodias's daughter says 'I wish that you give me the head of John,' and in Luke 1:62 the neighbors made signs asking what Zechariah 'wished' to name the child. The Spanish quisiera ('would like') and the Arabic kuntu uridu ('I was wanting') capture the softer, less resolved quality. This sense appears when the outcome is uncertain, speculative, or emotionally charged. DESIRE AND WILLING en: I-am-willing, I-should-wish, I-want | es: Quiero, deseaba, querría | fr: vouloir | de: will, wollen Matt 8:3; Matt 21:29; Mark 6:25; Luke 1:62; Luke 4:6

4. will, purpose, determine (10×) To will, purpose, or determine, expressing firm intention or divine decree. In Acts 18:21 Paul says 'I will return if God wills,' and in 1 Corinthians 4:19 he declares 'I will come soon, if the Lord wills.' The Arabic sha'a ('to decree/will'), especially in the divine context, and German wollen in its purposive register fit well. When the subject is God (Matt 8:2-3, 'if you are willing, you can cleanse me'), thelo carries the weight of sovereign determination rather than mere preference. DESIRE AND WILLING

en: desires, should-will, they-should-be-willing | es: queriendo, quiera, quiere | fr: vouloir | de: will, wollen Matt 8:2; Luke 5:12; Acts 18:21; Acts 26:5; 1Cor 4:19

5. take delight in, like (9×) To take delight or pleasure in something, where the volitional element shades into affection. In Romans 7:21 Paul finds a 'law' that when he 'wants' to do good, evil lies close at hand — here thelo means something closer to 'take delight in.' In Matthew 2:18 Rachel 'would not' be comforted, expressing not just refusal but emotional disposition. The Swahili -penda ('to love/like') and Arabic al-raghibu ('the one who delights') highlight this affective coloring. Acts 17:18-20 uses it for intellectual curiosity and interest. DESIRE AND WILLING

θεμέλῐ-ος G2310 N-ANP (16×)

Foundation or base on which a structure rests; used literally of buildings and figuratively of doctrinal or spiritual groundwork.

In both classical and biblical Greek, themelios denotes the lowest course of stones on which a building rises. Jesus contrasts a house built on rock with one lacking a foundation (Luke 6:48-49), and Paul speaks of Christ as the only true foundation (1 Cor 3:11). The word extends naturally into metaphor: apostles and prophets form the foundation of God's household (Eph 2:20), and the heavenly Jerusalem has twelve foundation stones inscribed with their names (Rev 21:14, 19). Every major target language renders it with a single transparent construction term—Spanish cimiento, French fondement, German Grundlage—confirming its unified semantic profile.

foundation, base structure (16×) The structural base upon which a building or wall is erected, and by extension any fundamental groundwork on which something is established. Literal usage appears in Luke 6:48-49 (a house's foundation on rock) and Acts 16:26 (prison foundations shaken). Figurative usage in Paul identifies Christ as the sole foundation of the church (1 Cor 3:11) and the apostles as foundational stones (Eph 2:20). Multilingual glosses uniformly select basic architectural terms, showing no semantic split. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

θεμελῐ-όω G2311 V-LIM/P-3S (5×)

To lay a foundation, establish firmly; to ground something securely, literally or spiritually

Means to lay a foundation or establish something on a firm base. While it originates in the language of construction—setting stones for a building—the New Testament extends it powerfully into spiritual territory. Christ grounds believers in love (Eph 3:17), the faith must remain founded and steadfast (Col 1:23), and God himself will establish those who suffer (1 Pet 5:10). Spanish 'cimentados' (cemented) and 'fundados' (founded) nicely capture both the architectural and metaphorical registers of this verb.

(5×) To lay a foundation or establish firmly, used both of physical construction and of spiritual grounding. In Matt 7:25 the house built on rock had been well-founded and withstands the storm; Heb 1:10 quotes Psalm 102 declaring that the Lord founded the earth. The metaphorical uses are equally vivid: Eph 3:17 prays that believers be 'rooted and grounded' in love; Col 1:23 urges remaining 'founded and steadfast' in the faith; and 1 Pet 5:10 promises that God will 'establish' those who endure suffering. Spanish 'cimentados' (cemented) and 'fundados' (founded) together reflect the word's movement from masonry to theology. FOUNDING AND ESTABLISHING

θεο-δίδακτος G2312 Adj-NMP (1×)

Taught by God, divinely instructed; having God as teacher; recipients of divine teaching.

This compound adjective describes those who are taught by God himself, not merely by human instructors. It combines θεός (God) with διδακτός (taught), creating the beautiful concept of divine instruction. Paul uses it only once, referring to believers who have been directly taught by God to love one another. The term implies direct divine pedagogy—the Spirit's internal instruction rather than external human teaching alone. It echoes Isaiah's prophecy that God's people would all be taught by the Lord, a promise Jesus applied to his disciples.

(1×) In 1 Thessalonians 4:9, Paul notes that concerning brotherly love, believers need no instruction because they themselves are God-taught in this regard. The compound adjective emphasizes direct divine instruction through the Spirit rather than mere human teaching. This echoes Isaiah 54:13 ('all your children shall be taught by the LORD') and Jesus's use of that promise in John 6:45. The multilingual glosses preserve the compound ('enseñados-por-Dios,' 'von-Gott-gelehrt'), showing the special quality of this divine pedagogy producing supernatural love. GODS AND DEITIES

θεομᾰχ-έω G2313 V-PSA-1P (1×)

To fight against God, to oppose deity; to make war against divine purposes or representatives.

This compound verb means to fight against God—to oppose divine purposes, resist God's work, or battle against deity itself. It combines θεός (God) with μαχέομαι (to fight), creating a term for the ultimate futile warfare. Scribes and Pharisees use it in Acts, warning that opposing the apostles might mean fighting God himself. The word appears in classical texts about mythological battles against the gods. In biblical usage, it suggests the folly and danger of resisting what God is doing, whether from ignorance or willful rebellion.

(1×) Acts 23:9 records some Pharisees warning against opposing Paul, lest they find themselves fighting against God. The subjunctive mood suggests a real possibility they're trying to avoid. The compound verb emphasizes the futility and danger of opposing divine purposes. Classical usage described mortals battling gods in mythology. The multilingual evidence shows translators preserving the God-fighting imagery. The context involves Pharisees who, believing in angels and spirits, consider whether Paul's encounter with the risen Christ might be genuine, making opposition to him opposition to God himself. GODS AND DEITIES

θεομά G2314 Adj-NMP (1×)

God-fighters, those who fight against God; opponents of divine purposes; rebels against deity.

This compound adjective designates those who fight against God—opponents of divine purposes and rebels against deity. It combines the same elements as the verb θεομαχέω but in adjectival form, describing a characteristic quality rather than an action. Classical usage applied it to mythological giants who warred against the gods. Gamaliel uses it in Acts, warning the Sanhedrin that if the apostles' work is from God, opposing it would make them God-fighters—a battle they cannot win. The term suggests both futility and danger in resisting divine purposes.

(1×) Acts 5:39 records Gamaliel's wise counsel: if the apostles' movement is from God, the Sanhedrin cannot destroy it and will only find themselves fighting against God. The compound adjective appears in its substantive form, describing what they would become. Classical parallels include the Giants warring against Olympus. The multilingual glosses preserve the God-fighting concept ('luchadores-contra-Dios,' 'ennemi-de-Dieu'). Gamaliel's argument proves prescient—opposing God's purposes is not merely ineffective but puts one in active rebellion against the Almighty, an ultimately losing position. GODS AND DEITIES

θεό-πνευ-στος G2315 Adj-NFS (1×)

God-breathed, divinely inspired; breathed out by God; originating from divine breath or spirit.

This unique compound describes Scripture as 'God-breathed'—not merely inspired by God but breathed out from him. It combines θεός (God) with πνέω (to breathe), creating the powerful image of God's breath producing Scripture. Paul uses it in his classic statement about Scripture's nature and purpose in 2 Timothy. The term emphasizes divine origin rather than human composition, though it doesn't exclude human authorship. It's God's exhaled word, carrying his authority and power. This hapax (appearing only once) has profoundly shaped Christian understanding of biblical inspiration.

(1×) In 2 Timothy 3:16, Paul declares that all Scripture is God-breathed and profitable for teaching, reproof, correction, and training in righteousness. The compound adjective emphasizes divine origin—Scripture proceeds from God's own breath. This differs from mere inspiration (God breathing in); it's expiration (God breathing out). The multilingual evidence shows translators grappling with this unique term ('inspirada-por-Dios,' 'gottgehaucht'). The concept grounds Scripture's authority in its divine source, making it the definitive guide for faith and practice, equipped by God himself for equipping his people. GODS AND DEITIES

θεός G2316 N-NMS (1328×)

God, the one true God; a god or pagan deity; a goddess

The noun θεός is the Greek New Testament's word for deity in all its dimensions. Overwhelmingly it refers to the one true God — the God of Israel, the Father of Jesus Christ — appearing over 1,300 times from Matthew to Revelation. A small cluster of occurrences applies the word to pagan gods and idols, as when the Lycaonians cry 'the gods have come down' (Acts 14:11) or when Psalm 82:6 is quoted: 'I said, you are gods' (John 10:34). A single occurrence designates the goddess Artemis of the Ephesians (Acts 19:37), preserving the feminine divine reference attested in classical Greek.

1. God, the true God (1315×) The supreme deity of biblical faith: God the Father, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ. This sense accounts for virtually all NT occurrences (1,315 of 1,328). Every target language renders it with its standard word for the one God — 'Dios,' 'Dieu,' 'Gott' — with no hedging or pluralization. Key passages span every genre: Matt 1:23 (Immanuel, 'God with us'), Matt 3:16 (the Spirit of God descending), and throughout the Pauline epistles. GODS AND DEITIES

en: God, of-God, of-Theos | es: Dios, Theòn, Theòs | fr: Dieu | de: Gott Matt 1:23; Matt 3:16; Matt 4:7; Matt 5:8; Matt 5:34

2. god, pagan deity (12×) A god or divine being in the generic or pagan sense — used of idols, false deities, and the 'gods' of the nations. This includes the golden calf ('make us gods,' Acts 7:40), the star-god Rephan (Acts 7:43), the Lycaonians' polytheistic exclamation (Acts 14:11), and the citation of Ps 82:6 in John 10:34-35. Multilingual glosses shift to plurals and lower-case forms — 'dioses,' 'Gods,' 'a god' — marking the clear semantic boundary from the one true God. GODS AND DEITIES

3. goddess, female deity (1×) A female deity, specifically the goddess Artemis (Diana) of the Ephesians, in the sole occurrence at Acts 19:37. The town clerk defends Paul by saying he has not blasphemed 'your goddess.' English renders it distinctly as 'goddess,' and Spanish as 'diosa,' while French and German retain 'Dieu/Gott' without feminine marking — an interesting gap in the translation signature that highlights the gendered specificity of this rare sense. GODS AND DEITIES

θεοσέβ-εια G2317 N-AFS (1×)

Godliness, reverence toward God; piety and religious devotion; god-fearing worship.

This noun denotes reverence toward God, practical piety, and religious devotion expressed in worship and service. It combines the reverence (σέβομαι) with its object (θεός) to create a term for proper fear and service of God. Classical usage emphasized religious fear and worship of the gods. Paul uses it in 1 Timothy to describe the good works appropriate for women professing godliness. It suggests not mere outward religiosity but genuine reverence that shapes conduct. The term appears in contexts emphasizing practical holiness flowing from proper worship.

(1×) First Timothy 2:10 instructs that women professing godliness should adorn themselves with good works rather than elaborate hairstyles and expensive clothes. The term emphasizes practical piety and reverence toward God expressed in conduct. Classical parallels show it meaning fear or worship of the gods. The multilingual glosses ('piedad,' 'Gottesfurcht') capture the devotional quality. Paul's point is that genuine godliness produces good works as its natural adornment—external appearance should align with internal devotion, with the latter taking priority over mere outward decoration. GODLINESS PIETY

en: godliness | es: piedad | fr: θεοσέβειαν | de: Gottesfurcht 1Tim 2:10

θεοσεβ-ής G2318 Adj-NMS (1×)

God-fearing, reverent, pious; one who fears and worships God; religiously devout.

This adjective describes someone who fears God in the sense of reverent worship and obedient devotion. Classical usage applied it to the religiously devout and pious. In John's Gospel, it appears in the formerly blind man's theological argument: God listens to the godly, not to sinners. The term suggests practical piety and reverence expressed in worship and obedience. In Jewish contexts it could describe both Jews and God-fearing Gentiles who worshiped the God of Israel without full conversion to Judaism.

(1×) John 9:31 records the healed man's argument: 'We know that God does not listen to sinners, but if anyone is a worshiper of God and does his will, God listens to him.' The adjective emphasizes one who fears and worships God genuinely. Classical usage denoted the religiously devout. The multilingual evidence ('temeroso-de-Dios,' 'gottesfuerchtig') preserves the God-fearing, worshipful quality. The man's logic is simple but profound: Jesus's miracle proves God hears him, which proves he's godly, which contradicts the Pharisees' claim that he's a sinner. True piety receives divine response. GODS AND DEITIES

θεο-στυγής G2319 Adj-AMP (1×)

God-hated or God-hating; either hated by God or hating God; despised by deity or despising deity.

This compound adjective can mean either 'hated by God' (passive sense) or 'hating God' (active sense). Classical usage primarily meant 'hated by the gods,' but Paul likely intends the active meaning—haters of God. It appears in Romans in a vice list describing fallen humanity apart from grace. The term combines θεός with στυγέω (to hate with horror or abhorrence), suggesting not mere dislike but intense hostility or divine abhorrence. Whether describing those whom God hates or those who hate God, it marks the ultimate relational breach between Creator and creature.

(1×) Romans 1:30 lists this term among the vices characterizing humanity suppressing the truth in unrighteousness. Most interpreters favor the active sense—God-haters—as fitting the catalog of human sins. Classical parallels emphasize being hated by gods, but Paul's context suggests active hatred toward God. The multilingual glosses show interpretive variety ('aborrecedores-de-Theós,' 'haïssant-Dieu,' 'Gotteshasser'). Whether passive or active, the term describes profound alienation from God—either reciprocal divine hatred for the wicked or human rebellion expressing itself in hatred of the Creator. GODS AND DEITIES

θεότης G2320 N-GFS (1×)

Deity, divinity, godhead; the fullness and essence of divine nature; absolute deity.

This noun denotes deity itself—the full essence and nature of divinity, not merely divine qualities. It differs from θειότης (divine nature in general) by emphasizing the totality of what makes God, God. Paul uses it in Colossians to declare that in Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. The term suggests not just divine attributes but the complete essence of deity concentrated in Christ. It appears in philosophical and theological discussions about the nature of divinity, emphasizing the comprehensive reality of divine being rather than scattered divine qualities.

(1×) Colossians 2:9 makes the stunning declaration that in Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily—not just divine attributes but deity itself in complete form. This differs from θειότης (divine nature) by emphasizing absolute, essential deity rather than general divine qualities. The term appears in discussions of divine essence in Greek philosophy and early Christian theology. The multilingual glosses ('Deidad,' 'Gottheit') attempt to capture the comprehensive quality. Paul's point devastates any teaching that diminishes Christ—he embodies the totality of deity in bodily form, making him fully sufficient for salvation. GODS AND DEITIES en: Deity | es: Deidad | fr: Θεότητος | de: Gottheit Col 2:9

Θεόφιλος G2321 N-VMS (2×)

Theophilus, recipient of Luke-Acts

The name means 'lover of God' or 'friend of God' in Greek, though it's uncertain whether this is a real name or a symbolic title. Luke addresses both his Gospel (Luke 1:3) and Acts (Acts 1:1) to 'most excellent Theophilus,' suggesting a person of some social standing who may have sponsored Luke's writing project. The title 'most excellent' (used of Roman officials like Felix and Festus) hints at high rank. Luke writes so that Theophilus 'may have certainty concerning the things you have been taught' (Luke 1:4)—the two volumes aim to provide reliable historical foundation for his faith.

(2×) The two addresses frame Luke's unified two-volume work: Luke 1:3 opens the Gospel account, and Acts 1:1 connects it to the continuing story of the church. Whether Theophilus was a Roman patron, a recent convert needing instruction, or a literary representative of all God-lovers, he serves as the ideal reader—someone eager to know the truth about Jesus and the Spirit's work. Luke's careful dedication shows Christianity valued careful documentation and historical grounding from the beginning. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

service, care, treatment; healing, medical attention; household servants collectively

This noun fundamentally means 'service' or 'care,' with specialized uses for medical treatment, religious service, and household staff. Luke uses it for Jesus' healing ministry (Luke 9:11) and metaphorically for faithful household service (Luke 12:42—'servants' or 'household'). Revelation 22:2 speaks of tree leaves 'for the healing of the nations.' Classical usage includes service paid to gods, care of parents or children, medical treatment, and paying court to gain favor. The New Testament uses cluster around healing/health and faithful service. The word's range shows service and healing as conceptually linked—both are care rendered to meet need.

(3×) The single sense encompasses caring service, whether therapeutic, domestic, or eschatological. Luke 9:11 describes Jesus giving 'healing' to those needing cure—medical service. Luke 12:42 uses the genitive of the noun for household servants—those who render domestic service. Revelation's eschatological vision presents leaves for the healing/health of nations—therapeutic care in the renewed creation. The Spanish glosses span 'sanación' (healing) and 'servidumbre' (servitude), while German has 'Heilung' (healing), all pointing to service rendered for wellbeing. The conceptual unity is care that restores or maintains proper function, whether bodily health, household order, or cosmic restoration. HEALING AND RESTORATION

θερᾰπ-εύω G2323 V-RPM/P-NFP (43×)

To heal, cure, or restore to health; rarely, to serve or attend to someone's needs (classical sense surviving once in Acts).

Overwhelmingly in the New Testament, this verb means to heal or cure – Jesus healing every disease (Matt 4:23), casting out demons and restoring the sick (Matt 8:16), and the disciples continuing this ministry (Luke 9:1). Spanish consistently renders 'sanar' (to make whole), French 'guerir' (to cure), and German 'heilen' (to heal), reflecting how uniformly the NT uses this word for physical restoration. A single occurrence in Acts 17:25, where Paul says God is not 'served' by human hands, preserves the older classical Greek sense of personal attendance or cultic service – a meaning well attested in Herodotus and Plato but nearly extinct in biblical usage.

1. heal or cure (42×) To restore someone to physical health by curing disease, injury, or affliction. Dominates NT usage (42 of 43 occurrences), spanning Jesus' healing ministry (Matt 4:23-24; 8:7, 16; 9:35), the apostles' continuation of it, and passive constructions of people being healed. Spanish 'sanar/sanados,' French 'guerir,' and German 'heilen' all converge on medical restoration. HEALING ACTIVITY

2. serve or attend to (1×) To render service or attendance, reflecting the classical Greek meaning of tending to a deity or master. Appears only in Acts 17:25 where Paul declares God is not 'therapeuetai' – served or attended to – by human hands. Spanish 'es servido' and English 'is served' capture this rare survival of the pre-medical sense in the NT. HEALING ACTIVITY

θερᾰπ-ων G2324 N-NMS (1×)

Attendant, servant, helper; one who serves or ministers; henchman or companion in service.

This noun describes an attendant or servant, particularly one who serves willingly and devotedly. Classical usage ranged from military squires and personal attendants to worshipers serving deities. It suggests more personal service than the common word for slave (δοῦλος), emphasizing willing devotion and companionship in service. Hebrews uses it to describe Moses's role in God's house—a trusted servant administering God's household. The term carries dignity while acknowledging subordinate position, appropriate for describing honored service to a superior.

(1×) Hebrews 3:5 contrasts Moses as a faithful servant in God's house with Christ as Son over the house. The term θεράπων emphasizes Moses's honored but subordinate role. Classical parallels include military attendants, devoted companions, and worshipers of gods. The multilingual evidence ('siervo,' 'serviteur,' 'Diener') shows servant language, though θεράπων carries more dignity than δοῦλος (slave). Moses's service was real and faithful, but Christ's sonship surpasses even the most honored servanthood—a distinction crucial to Hebrews' argument about the new covenant's superiority. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

To reap, harvest; to cut and gather a crop, used literally of agriculture and figuratively of spiritual consequences.

The standard Greek verb for harvesting grain, rooted in the agricultural world that permeated ancient life. Jesus uses it literally when pointing to birds that 'neither sow nor reap' yet are fed by God (Matt 6:26; Luke 12:24), and in parables of faithful stewardship where the master 'reaps where he did not sow' (Matt 25:24, 26; Luke 19:21-22). Paul extends it into a powerful spiritual metaphor: 'whatever a man sows, that he will also reap' (Gal 6:7-9). Spanish 'cosechar/segar' and French 'moissonner' both preserve the agricultural concreteness of the image.

reap, harvest a crop (21×) To cut and gather a crop from the field – the fundamental agricultural act of harvesting grain or other produce. Used literally of field labor (Matt 6:26; Luke 12:24; John 4:36; Jas 5:4) and metaphorically of gathering spiritual consequences, both positive and negative (Gal 6:7-9; 2 Cor 9:6; Rev 14:15-16). In Jesus' parables, the verb highlights accountability: the master reaps where he did not sow (Matt 25:24, 26; Luke 19:21). Multilingual glosses – 'reap/harvest' (eng), 'cosechar/segar' (spa), 'moissonner' (fra), 'ernten' (deu) – confirm a unified literal-to-metaphorical range centered on the harvest act. REAPING AND HARVESTING

Harvest; the act of reaping, the harvest season, or the gathered crop, often used figuratively of God's final ingathering.

Refers to the reaping of grain — the season, the act, or the crop gathered. In the agricultural world of first-century Palestine, harvest was the climactic moment of the farming year, and the NT writers exploit this resonance fully. Jesus uses it literally when he says 'the harvest is plentiful but the workers are few' (Matt 9:37-38; Luke 10:2), yet even there the metaphor of evangelistic ingathering is unmistakable. In the parable of the wheat and tares (Matt 13:30, 39), harvest becomes an explicit image of the final judgment. Revelation 14:15 brings the metaphor to its apocalyptic conclusion. The translations converge on a single agricultural term across languages: Spanish cosecha/siega, French moisson, German Ernte.

harvest (13×) The reaping of crops, the harvest season, or the gathered produce, employed both for the literal agricultural event and as a rich figurative image of God's eschatological ingathering or final judgment. Jesus commissions laborers for the harvest (Matt 9:37-38), the parable of the tares identifies harvest as 'the end of the age' (Matt 13:39), and Rev 14:15 depicts the earth ripe for reaping. Multilingual glosses uniformly point to a single agricultural concept (French moisson, German Ernte, Spanish siega/cosecha). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

reaper, harvester; one who gathers the grain at harvest time

A straightforward agricultural term for those who cut and gather grain during harvest. In classical Greek literature the word appears in farming contexts, and it carries the same concrete meaning in the New Testament. Jesus uses the imagery of reapers in the parable of the wheat and tares (Matthew 13). The reapers who will separate wheat from weeds at the end of the age are identified as angels (Matt 13:39). The Spanish 'segadores' and French 'moissonneur' both preserve the agricultural specificity—these are not generic workers but those who wield the sickle at harvest. The word evokes the eschatological harvest, a common biblical metaphor for judgment and ingathering.

(2×) In both occurrences (Matthew 13:30, 39), Jesus uses 'reapers' within the parable of the wheat and tares to represent angels who will execute final judgment. The agricultural setting is literal—reapers gather grain—but the parabolic application is eschatological: the harvest is the end of the age, and the reapers are angelic agents. The multilingual evidence consistently maintains the agricultural specificity (Spanish 'segadores,' French 'moissonneur'), grounding the metaphor in the concrete practice of grain harvest. The domain of Agriculture reflects the word's semantic core, even as its parabolic use extends to themes of judgment and separation. REAPING AND HARVESTING

θερμαίνω G2328 V-PPM-NMS (6×)

To warm oneself or be warmed; used for physical warming by a fire and for the basic need for bodily warmth.

A simple but narratively powerful verb in the New Testament. Its most memorable appearances come during Peter's denial, where he stands warming himself by the charcoal fire in the high priest's courtyard (Mark 14:54, 67; John 18:18, 25). The repeated participle 'warming himself' becomes almost a refrain underscoring Peter's vulnerable proximity to danger. In James 2:16 the verb shifts to expose empty religion: telling someone 'be warmed and filled' without meeting their need is faith without works. Spanish 'calentándose/calentaos' and French 'se chauffer' consistently render the physical act of seeking warmth.

1. (4×) To warm oneself by a fire – the reflexive/middle voice describing someone standing or sitting near a fire for physical warmth. All four Gospel occurrences depict Peter (and others) warming themselves at the charcoal fire during Jesus' trial (Mark 14:54, 67; John 18:18, 25). Spanish 'calentándose/se calentaban' and French 'se chauffer' capture the self-directed action. The repetition across the denial narrative makes this verb almost a literary marker of Peter's presence. (Mark 14:54, 67; John 18:18, 25) PASSIONATE DESIRE

en: warming-himself | es: calentándose | fr: se-chauffer | de: sich-waermen Mark 14:54; Mark 14:67; John 18:18; John 18:25

2. (1×) To be warmed, to receive bodily warmth – the passive sense expressing the basic human need for warmth. In James 2:16 the dismissive command 'be warmed and filled' exposes the hypocrisy of offering words instead of clothing and food to someone in need. Spanish 'calentaos' (warm yourselves) and English 'be warmed' highlight the unmet physical necessity. (Jas 2:16) PASSIONATE DESIRE

θέρμη G2329 N-GFS (1×)

Heat, warmth; high temperature; feverish heat or thermal energy.

This noun denotes heat or warmth, whether from the sun, fire, or fever. Classical usage applied it to hot weather, feverish heat, and thermal energy. Luke uses it in Acts to describe the heat that drove a viper from the firewood Paul was gathering. The term emphasizes the physical sensation and effect of heat. It could describe both beneficial warmth and dangerous, burning heat. Greek medical writers used it for fevers and inflammatory conditions. The word captures heat as both a natural phenomenon and a potential danger.

(1×) Acts 28:3 describes how a viper, driven out by the heat when Paul laid brushwood on the fire, fastened onto his hand. The term emphasizes the thermal energy forcing the snake from its hiding place in the wood. Classical medical usage included feverish heat and inflammation. The multilingual glosses consistently render it as 'heat' or 'warmth.' The context sets up the miracle of Paul suffering no harm from the venomous bite, but the heat reference grounds the narrative in natural cause and effect—heat expels the snake, which then strikes. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE summer, the warm season; also harvest time or summer fruits

This noun denotes summer, the season between spring and autumn. All three occurrences appear in the parable of the fig tree budding, signaling that 'summer is near.' Jesus uses this natural observation as a parallel to eschatological signs in the Olivet Discourse (Matthew 24:32, Mark 13:28, Luke 21:30). Classical usage includes summer as the campaigning season, harvest time, summer fruits or crops, and even metaphorically for the ripeness or flourishing of youth. The New Testament use is strictly seasonal and literal, focused on the recognizable transition from spring to summer as an analogy for recognizing the approach of God's kingdom.

(3×) The sense is straightforward—the summer season as an observable natural phenomenon. The identical context across all three Synoptic Gospels uses the greening and budding of trees as a sure sign that summer approaches. This is proverbial wisdom: seasonal changes are predictable and recognizable. Jesus' point turns on this certainty: just as surely as botanical signs indicate summer, so eschatological signs indicate the nearness of the kingdom. The multilingual renderings are uniform—Spanish 'verano,' French 'été,' German 'Sommer'—all simple seasonal designations. The word functions as a temporal marker and seasonal reference point for the parable's logic. SUMMER SEASON FRUIT

θεσσαλονικεύς G2331 N-GMP (4×)

A Thessalonian; an inhabitant or native of Thessalonica, the capital of the Roman province of Macedonia.

This gentilicium identifies someone from Thessalonica, the bustling port city and capital of Roman Macedonia. Paul's traveling companions Aristarchus and Secundus are called Thessalonians (Acts 20:4; 27:2), and both canonical letters to the church there open by addressing the congregation as 'the Thessalonians' (1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1). Across languages the term is simply transliterated — Spanish 'Tesalonicenses,' French 'Thessalonicien,' German 'Thessaloniker' — reflecting the proper-noun character of this ethnic designation.

(4×) A person from Thessalonica, used both for individuals (Aristarchus in Acts 20:4, 27:2) and collectively for the Christian community there (1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1). As a proper gentilicium it is consistently transliterated across languages rather than translated, appearing as Spanish 'Tesalonicenses,' French 'Thessalonicien,' and German 'Thessaloniker.' The term locates these believers within a major Roman commercial center, hinting at the cosmopolitan context of Paul's ministry. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Thessalonica; a major Macedonian city, center of Paul's mission and home to a key early church

The proper name of the capital of the Roman province of Macedonia, modern Thessaloniki. It was a thriving port city on the Via Egnatia where Paul founded a church during his second missionary journey. The city appears at pivotal moments: the founding of the congregation (Acts 17:1), the Bereans' contrasting response (Acts 17:11), opposition that pursued Paul to Berea (Acts 17:13), the Philippians' generosity sent to Paul while he was there (Phil 4:16), and Demas's departure to Thessalonica (2 Tim 4:10).

(5×) The city of Thessalonica in Macedonia, a major urban center on the Via Egnatia and site of one of Paul's most significant church plants. In Acts 17:1 Paul arrives and preaches in the synagogue; Acts 17:11 contrasts Thessalonica with the more receptive Bereans; Acts 17:13 records Thessalonian agitators pursuing Paul to Berea; Phil 4:16 recalls the Philippians sending aid to Paul while he was in Thessalonica; and 2 Tim 4:10 notes Demas's departure there, possibly drawn by the city's cosmopolitan comforts. French 'Thessalonique' and Spanish 'Tesalónica' preserve the Greek name with minimal adaptation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Θευδᾶς G2333 N-NMS (1×)

Theudas, personal name; possibly contracted from Theodoros; a Jewish revolutionary mentioned in Acts.

This name, possibly a shortened form of Theodoros ('gift of God'), identifies a failed revolutionary mentioned by Gamaliel in Acts. According to Gamaliel's speech, Theudas claimed to be somebody important, attracted about four hundred followers, but was killed and his movement scattered. The historical identification is debated—Josephus mentions a Theudas active later than this speech. The name serves Gamaliel's argument that if the apostles' movement isn't from God, it will likewise fail. Like many biblical names, it provides a brief window into the turbulent political landscape of first-century Judea.

(1×) Acts 5:36 records Gamaliel citing Theudas as an example of a failed messianic pretender who rose up claiming importance, gathered four hundred men, was killed, and saw his followers dispersed. The name likely abbreviates Theodoros. Historical identification with Josephus's later Theudas creates chronological difficulties. The multilingual transliterations preserve the Greek form. Gamaliel's point doesn't depend on precise historical details but on the pattern: human movements fail, divine ones succeed. Theudas represents the many would-be revolutionaries whose movements collapsed without God's backing. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

θεωρ-έω G2334 V-PIA-3P (58×)

To see, watch, or gaze at; visual perception ranging from simple sight to attentive contemplation

Derived from θεωρός ('spectator'), this verb carries a nuance of engaged seeing — not a casual glance but a gaze that takes in what is before it. In the Gospels it describes everything from witnessing the empty tomb (Mark 16:4) to the women watching the crucifixion from a distance (Matt 27:55; Mark 15:40). The Spanish 'contempla' and 'contempláis' beautifully capture the contemplative quality that distinguishes θεωρέω from simpler verbs of sight like βλέπω or ὁράω. In Hebrews 7:4, this observing becomes intellectual: 'Consider how great this man was.'

1. see, perceive visually (39×) Basic visual perception: to see, behold, or perceive something with one's eyes, often as a direct witness to events. The women came to 'see' the tomb (Matt 28:1), people 'saw' the healed demoniac sitting calmly (Mark 5:15), and unclean spirits 'saw' Jesus and fell before him (Mark 3:11). The German 'schauen' and French 'contempler' both suggest more than a passing glance — there is a quality of taking in, registering, and recognizing what one sees. This is sight that grasps the significance of what is before it. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

2. watch, gaze at attentively (18×) Sustained, attentive watching: to gaze at, observe, or behold something with focused attention, often as a spectator to significant events. The women 'watched' the crucifixion from afar (Matt 27:55; Mark 15:40, 47), Jesus 'watched' people putting money into the treasury (Mark 12:41), and he declared 'I was watching Satan fall like lightning' (Luke 10:18). The Spanish 'Veía' / 'Viendo' and the English 'beholding' highlight the sustained, participatory quality — this is the gaze of one who stands and takes in the full scene. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

en: I-was-watching, beholding, having-seen | es: Veía, Viendo, contempla | fr: contempler, observer | de: schauen, schaut Matt 27:55; Mark 12:41; Mark 15:40; Mark 15:47; Luke 10:18

3. (1×) A single occurrence in Heb 7:4 where the verb shifts from physical sight to intellectual contemplation: 'Consider (θεωρεῖτε) how great this man was.' The Spanish 'Considerad' (an imperative 'Consider!') reveals this transition from eyes to mind. The author of Hebrews invites readers to 'behold' Melchizedek's greatness not by seeing him but by reflecting on the evidence of his stature — the etymological root in θεωρός ('one who observes at a festival') here reaches its most abstract expression. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

θεωρ-ία G2335 N-AFS (1×)

Spectacle, sight, public show; something observed; a viewing or theatrical performance.

This noun denotes a spectacle or sight—something observed, whether a public event, theatrical performance, or noteworthy scene. Classical usage included religious embassies to festivals, attendance at games or theater, and the general act of viewing. Luke uses it to describe the crowds returning from Jesus's crucifixion after witnessing the spectacle. The term can emphasize either the thing seen or the act of seeing it. It's related to θεωρέω (to look at, behold) and θεατρίζω (to make a spectacle of), all sharing the root sense of viewing or being viewed.

(1×) Luke 23:48 describes the crowds who came together for this spectacle returning home beating their breasts after witnessing Jesus's death and the accompanying signs. The term emphasizes the crucifixion as a public sight or event drawing observers. Classical usage included attendance at public festivals, games, or theaters. The Spanish 'espectáculo' and French 'spectacle' preserve this sense of public viewing. Luke captures how Jesus's death became a spectacle—a sight that drew crowds, provoked response, and ultimately testified to his identity through the centurion's confession and the people's mourning. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

θήκ-η G2336 N-AFS (1×)

Sheath, scabbard, case; a container for a sword or weapon.

This noun designates a sheath or case, particularly for a sword. Classical usage extended it to any receptive container—a chest, grave, or bow-case. John uses it in the garden arrest scene when Jesus tells Peter to put his sword back in its sheath. The term emphasizes the sword's resting place, where it belongs when not in use. Classical texts used it for weapon containers and even metaphorically for graves as the body's 'case.' The NT usage is straightforward—the protective covering that holds the blade when sheathed.

(1×) John 18:11 records Jesus commanding Peter to put his sword into its sheath, asking 'Shall I not drink the cup the Father has given me?' The term straightforwardly denotes the sword's scabbard or case. Classical parallels include bow-cases and other weapon containers. The multilingual glosses ('vaina,' 'étui,' 'Scheide') consistently render it as sheath or scabbard. Jesus's command symbolically rejects armed resistance to his arrest—the sword belongs in its sheath because his mission requires drinking the cup of suffering, not wielding the blade of violence. SWORD SHEATH

θηλάζω G2337 V-PPA-GMP (5×)

To nurse, suckle; to give suck or to suck at the breast

A verb covering both sides of the nursing relationship: the mother who gives suck and the infant who nurses. In the New Testament it appears in deeply human moments—Jesus quoting Psalm 8 about praise from nursing infants (Matt 21:16), warnings about the particular hardship of nursing mothers in times of crisis (Matt 24:19; Mark 13:17; Luke 21:23), and a woman's blessing on the breasts that nursed Jesus (Luke 11:27). Spanish distinguishes 'amamantando' (giving suck) from 'de los que maman' (those who suck), reflecting the word's ability to voice both mother and child.

(5×) To suckle or nurse—said either of the mother giving milk or the infant receiving it. In Matt 21:16 Jesus cites Psalm 8:2 about praise ordained from 'nursing infants' (the child as subject); in Matt 24:19, Mark 13:17, and Luke 21:23 the eschatological warnings single out 'those who are nursing' (the mother as subject) as especially vulnerable during flight; and in Luke 11:27 a woman blesses the breasts that nursed Jesus. Spanish captures both poles: 'amamantando' (giving suck, active maternal sense) and 'de los que maman' (those who suck, infant sense), while French 'allaiter' focuses on the maternal act. WET-NURSE CAREGIVER

θῆλυς G2338 Adj-NNS (5×)

Female; pertaining to the female sex, used of both humans and animals in contrast to male.

Derived from the root meaning 'to suckle,' this adjective designates the female sex in distinction from the male. In the New Testament it appears in foundational statements about God's creation of humanity as 'male and female' (Matt 19:4; Mark 10:6) and in Paul's vision of equality in Christ where 'there is neither male nor female' (Gal 3:28). It also describes the unnatural exchange of female relations in Rom 1:26-27. The consistent rendering across languages—Spanish 'hembra,' French 'femelle,' German 'weiblich'—reflects its straightforward biological sense.

(5×) Female, pertaining to the female sex. Used in the creation narratives where God made humanity 'male and female' (Matt 19:4; Mark 10:6), in Paul's declaration of unity in Christ transcending gender distinctions (Gal 3:28), and in the description of disordered relations in Romans 1:26-27. The multilingual evidence uniformly renders this with basic biological-sex terms rather than social-role vocabulary, confirming its denotation of biological femaleness. FEMALE GENDER

θήρα G2339 N-AFS (1×)

Hunt, hunting, chase; the pursuit and capture of prey; metaphorically, a trap or snare.

This noun denotes hunting—the pursuit, capture, and killing of game. It could refer to the activity itself or to the prey captured. Classical usage included hunting wild animals, fowling, and fishing. Metaphorically, it described eager pursuit of anything or someone as prey. Paul uses it figuratively in Romans, quoting the Psalms to describe the table of the wicked becoming a trap or snare. The hunting imagery suggests something seemingly beneficial (a feast) turned into a device for capture and destruction. The term captures both the active pursuit and the means of entrapment.

(1×) Romans 11:9 quotes David's imprecation that their table become a snare and trap for them, using hunting imagery. The term metaphorically describes what should nourish instead becoming a means of capture and judgment. Classical usage encompassed hunting wild beasts, fowling, and fishing. The Spanish 'caza' (hunt) captures the predatory dimension. Paul applies this to Israel's stumbling—their pursuit of righteousness by works became the very thing that trapped them, preventing recognition of Messiah. What should have led to blessing became an instrument of judgment, like a hunter's trap. NETS AND SNARES

θηρ-εύω G2340 V-ANA (1×)

To hunt, to catch, to pursue prey; to trap or ensnare; metaphorically, to seek to entrap someone.

This verb means to hunt or catch prey, whether animals in literal hunting or people in metaphorical entrapment. Classical usage covered hunting wild beasts, catching birds or fish, and pursuing any quarry. Luke uses it metaphorically to describe the scribes and Pharisees lying in wait to catch Jesus in his words—hunting him verbally to find accusatory evidence. The verb captures active, intentional pursuit with the goal of capturing and destroying the prey. Like a hunter stalking game, Jesus's opponents sought opportunities to trap him in statements they could use against him.

(1×) Luke 11:54 describes scribes and Pharisees lying in ambush, trying to catch something from Jesus's mouth that they could use against him. The verb employs hunting imagery for their verbal entrapment attempts. Classical parallels include hunting animals, catching fish, and pursuing any prey. The multilingual glosses ('paracazar,' 'chasser') preserve the hunting metaphor. The context shows predatory intent—not honest inquiry but hostile pursuit seeking to destroy. Like hunters setting traps and waiting for prey, the religious leaders monitored Jesus's words, hoping he would say something to fight with wild beasts, either literally in the arena or metaphorically against fierce opponents

This verb describes combat with wild animals, particularly in the context of Roman arena spectacles where condemned persons or gladiators faced lions, bears, or other beasts. Paul's reference in 1 Corinthians uses this imagery—whether literal danger or metaphorical opposition is debated—to convey the ferocity of his struggles in Ephesus. The multilingual glosses consistently emphasize the beast-fighting aspect, with Spanish and French preserving the literal "fought with beasts" construction that captures both possible meanings.

(1×) The single New Testament occurrence appears in Paul's rhetorical question about fighting beasts at Ephesus (1 Cor 15:32). The Greek verb θηριομαχέω literally means to engage in combat with wild animals (θηρίον + μάχομαι). Whether Paul speaks of literal arena combat (unlikely for a Roman citizen) or uses vivid metaphor for intense opposition remains disputed, but the image clearly evokes violent, life-threatening conflict. The uniform translation pattern across languages—"fought with beasts," "combattre les bêtes"—preserves this dramatic imagery. FIGHTING AND WARFARE

θηρίον G2342 N-GNP (46×)

A beast or wild animal; in the NT overwhelmingly the apocalyptic Beast of Revelation, but also any dangerous or wild creature.

Derived from θήρ (wild animal), the diminutive θηρίον carries two sharply distinct registers in the New Testament. In Revelation (39 of 46 occurrences), it denotes the great apocalyptic Beast — a supernatural figure of satanic opposition rendered uniformly as 'bestia' in Spanish, 'bête' in French, and 'Tier' in German. Outside Revelation, it refers to ordinary wild animals: the creatures with Jesus in the wilderness (Mark 1:13), the venomous snake on Paul's hand at Malta (Acts 28:4-5), and even the Cretan insult in Titus 1:12. The overwhelming Revelation usage makes context essential for correct reading.

1. beast (apocalyptic) (39×) The apocalyptic Beast of Revelation — a supernatural, malevolent figure symbolizing opposition to God and his people. Nearly all NT occurrences (39 of 46) belong here, concentrated in Revelation 11-20. Every major translation tradition renders it with a single consistent term: Spanish 'bestia,' French 'bête,' German 'Tier.' Rev 13:1 introduces the beast rising from the sea; Rev 11:7 the beast ascending from the abyss. Heb 12:20, quoting Exod 19:13, stands at the boundary — a literal animal in an OT citation framing divine unapproachability. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. wild animal, creature (7×) A wild animal or dangerous creature in the natural, literal sense. Mark 1:13 places Jesus among the θηρία of the wilderness during his temptation. Acts 28:4-5 describes the venomous creature (likely a viper) that fastened on Paul's hand at Malta — translations use 'criatura/creature' alongside 'bestia/beast.' Titus 1:12 quotes the Cretan poet Epimenides calling Cretans 'evil beasts' (κακὰ θηρία), a figurative but non-apocalyptic usage. Acts 11:6 lists θηρία among the animals Peter saw in his vision. θησαυρ-ίζω G2343 V-PIA-2S (8×)

To store up, lay aside, or treasure; used of accumulating wealth, provisions, or divine consequences.

Built from θησαυρός ('treasure, storehouse'), this verb means to heap up or set aside for future use. Jesus contrasts storing treasures on earth versus in heaven (Matt 6:19–20), establishing the word's central theological tension. Paul warns of 'storing up wrath' for the day of judgment (Rom 2:5), flipping the positive connotation into something ominous, while James levels a similar charge against the rich who have 'laid up treasure in the last days' (Jas 5:3). The practical instruction for the Corinthians to set aside contributions weekly (1 Cor 16:2) keeps the word grounded in everyday economics. Spanish atesorar and French amasser both convey the deliberate, cumulative nature of the action.

store up, treasure up (8×) To accumulate, store up, or lay aside wealth, resources, or consequences for future use — whether literal provisions or metaphorical treasure. Jesus' teaching in Matt 6:19–20 sets up the defining contrast: do not store up (θησαυρίζετε) treasures on earth where moth and rust destroy, but store them in heaven. Paul's metaphorical extension in Rom 2:5 — 'you are storing up wrath for yourself' — shows the verb can apply to the accumulation of divine judgment. James 5:3 warns the rich who have hoarded treasure in the last days. The practical sense appears in 1 Cor 16:2, where believers are told to set aside savings each week. Luke 12:21 captures both registers: the one who 'lays up treasure for himself' but is not rich toward God. ASCENDING MOVEMENT

Treasure, stored wealth; a storehouse or repository of valuable things, whether material or spiritual.

Thēsauros denotes both the treasure itself and the place where it is kept — a storehouse or treasury. Jesus uses it in the Sermon on the Mount to contrast earthly treasure, vulnerable to moth and rust, with imperishable treasure in heaven (Matt 6:19-21). He also speaks of the heart as a thēsauros from which good or evil flows (Matt 12:35; Luke 6:45). The Magi open their treasure chests before the infant Christ (Matt 2:11). Paul speaks of 'treasures of wisdom and knowledge' hidden in Christ (Col 2:3). Spanish 'tesoro,' French 'trésor,' and German 'Schatz' all preserve the dual sense of valuables and their container.

treasure, stored wealth (17×) A treasure or storehouse of accumulated wealth, used both literally of material riches and figuratively of spiritual realities. The Magi open their thēsauroi at the nativity (Matt 2:11). Jesus contrasts treasure on earth with treasure in heaven (Matt 6:19-21) and describes the heart as a treasury of good or evil (Matt 12:35; Luke 6:45). Paul locates all treasures of wisdom in Christ (Col 2:3). The word covers both the valuable contents and the repository that holds them, as the parable of hidden treasure in a field shows (Matt 13:44). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to touch, handle, take hold of; to have physical contact with

This verb means to touch, handle, or take hold of something or someone. It appears in three significant prohibition contexts. Colossians 2:21 quotes false teachers' rules: 'Do not handle, nor taste, nor touch.' Hebrews 11:28 describes how the Passover protected Israel so the destroyer 'would not touch' the firstborn. Hebrews 12:20 recalls the Sinai theophany where even an animal touching the mountain must die. Classical usage extends from simple touching to grasping, embracing, and euphemistically to sexual contact. The New Testament uses focus on prohibited or dangerous contact—whether legalistic taboos, divine judgment, or holy boundaries.

(3×) The sense centers on physical contact, consistently framed as forbidden or dangerous. Colossians presents it as part of ascetic regulations ('do not handle') that Paul critiques as human commands. Hebrews uses it twice for contact that brings death—the destroyer's touch (avoided through Passover blood) and any contact with Sinai's holy mountain. The Spanish and German glosses ('tocar/berühren') are straightforward contact verbs, while the infinitive and subjunctive forms in the sources reflect the prohibitive and conditional contexts. The word's force in these passages isn't about casual touching but about boundary transgression, whether legalistic (Colossians) or holy-dangerous (Hebrews). TOUCHING AND REACHING

θλῖβ-ω G2346 V-PPM/P-DMP (10×)

Press, squeeze; afflict, cause distress; suffer tribulation; be narrow or constricted

From a root meaning 'to press' or 'to squeeze,' this verb spans the physical act of crowding to the deep theological concept of tribulation. Mark 3:9 uses it literally: the crowd presses against Jesus so tightly he asks for a boat. Paul transforms it into a hallmark of apostolic existence: 'afflicted in every way but not crushed' (2 Cor 4:8), and 'when we came to Macedonia, our bodies had no rest, but we were afflicted at every turn' (2 Cor 7:5). Spanish 'afligir' and French 'presser' preserve the physical pressure behind the metaphor, while German 'bedraengen' conveys the sense of being hemmed in. Most memorably, Jesus uses the perfect passive participle in Matthew 7:14 to describe the way that leads to life as 'narrow' – literally, pressed in on both sides.

1. suffer affliction / be afflicted (passive) (7×) To suffer affliction, tribulation, or distress, the dominant New Testament sense appearing in passive and middle voice forms that describe the experience of being pressed upon by persecution, hardship, or inner anguish. Paul writes, 'We are afflicted in every way' (2 Cor 4:8), 'our bodies had no rest, but we were afflicted at every turn' (2 Cor 7:5), and 'it is not that others should be eased and you afflicted' (2 Cor 1:6). The Thessalonian letters describe both present suffering (1 Thess 3:4) and future relief 'when the Lord Jesus is revealed' (2 Thess 1:7). Spanish 'afligidos' and French 'affliger' capture the experiential weight of this condition, rooted in the physical metaphor of being squeezed. AFFLICTION DISTRESS

2. afflict / cause distress (active) (1×) To afflict or cause distress actively, with a human agent as the subject who brings tribulation upon others. In 2 Thessalonians 1:6 Paul declares it is 'just for God to repay with affliction those who afflict you,' using the active participle to identify the persecutors. Spanish 'los que afligen' and German 'bedraengen' pinpoint the oppressors as active agents of pressure, forming a neat contrast with the passive victims in sense 1. The verse frames divine justice as a reversal: the pressure the afflicters apply will return upon them. AFFLICTION DISTRESS

en: afflicting | es: que-afligen | fr: presser | de: bedraengen 2Thess 1:6

3. press / crowd against (physical) (1×) To press or crowd against someone physically, as when a throng presses so tightly that bodily harm becomes a real danger. In Mark 3:9 Jesus asks his disciples to keep a small boat ready 'because of the crowd, lest they crush him,' where the pressing is literal spatial compression rather than emotional or spiritual tribulation. Spanish 'apretar' and French 'presser' here retain the root physical meaning most purely, before any metaphorical extension. This sense lies closest to the classical Greek usage of squeezing or chafing. AFFLICTION DISTRESS

en: they-might-press | es: aprieten | fr: presser | de: bedraengen Mark 3:9

4. narrow / constricted (metaphorical) (1×) Narrow or constricted, used as a perfect passive participle functioning adjectivally to describe the compressed dimensions of a path. In Matthew 7:14 Jesus declares, 'How narrow is the gate and compressed is the way that leads to life, and few find it.' The participle tethlimmene pictures a road squeezed between walls or cliffs, admitting passage only with difficulty. Spanish 'angosto' and the metaphorical contrast with the 'broad way' of destruction (7:13) make this one of the most vivid spatial metaphors in the Sermon on the Mount, capturing the moral cost of discipleship in a single physical image. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

tribulation, affliction, distress — pressure from outward hardship, persecution, or eschatological trial

Thlipsis (from thlibo, 'to press, crush') captures the experience of being squeezed by external forces — persecution, poverty, imprisonment, or the great tribulation of the last days. Its 45 New Testament occurrences cluster heavily in Paul's letters and the Synoptic apocalyptic discourses. Jesus warns that tribulation comes 'because of the word' (Matt 13:21; Mark 4:17), and the Olivet Discourse escalates to a 'great tribulation such as has not been from the beginning of the world' (Matt 24:21). Paul transforms the concept into a theology of endurance: 'tribulation produces perseverance' (Rom 5:3). Revelation crowns the arc with the church emerging victorious from 'the great tribulation' (Rev 7:14). The translations preserve its weight: Spanish 'tribulacion/afliccion,' French 'tribulation/affliction,' German 'Bedrängnis/Trübsal.'

tribulation, affliction, distress (45×) Pressure, distress, or affliction caused by external circumstances such as persecution, societal opposition, or eschatological catastrophe. The root metaphor is physical crushing or pressing, extended to psychological and spiritual anguish. Covers present-day trials endured by believers (Rom 5:3; 2 Cor 1:4; 1 Thess 3:3), specific persecutions (Acts 11:19; 2 Thess 1:4), and the climactic eschatological tribulation prophesied in the Olivet Discourse (Matt 24:21, 29) and Revelation (Rev 7:14). Paul develops a distinctive theology in which thlipsis produces character and hope (Rom 5:3-5). All 45 occurrences share this core semantic of externally imposed suffering. DISTRESS AND AFFLICTION

θνήσκω G2348 V-RPA-NMS (9×)

To have died, to be in a state of death — the perfect tense of thnesko, emphasizing the completed event with its ongoing result.

Every NT occurrence of thnesko appears in the perfect tense, giving this verb a distinctive profile: it does not describe the act of dying but the settled state of being dead. When the angel tells Joseph that those seeking the child's life 'have died' (Matt 2:20), or when Pilate marvels that Jesus 'had already died' (Mark 15:44), the grammar underscores finality — a past event whose result persists. The same construction appears in the raising narratives of the widow's son (Luke 7:12), Jairus's daughter (Luke 8:49), and Lazarus (John 11:44), where the perfect tense heightens the miracle: these people were thoroughly, conclusively dead. Spanish 'ha muerto,' French 'mourir,' and German 'tot' all reflect this resultative nuance.

to have died, to be dead (9×) To be in a state of death as the result of having died (perfect aspect). All nine NT uses employ the perfect stem, emphasizing not the process of dying but the accomplished fact of death with its continuing consequence. This is significant in miracle narratives — Lazarus 'had died' (John 11:44), the widow's son 'was dead' (Luke 7:12), Jairus's daughter 'has died' (Luke 8:49) — where the perfect tense amplifies the magnitude of resurrection. The same form appears in Matt 2:20 (Herod's death as accomplished fact) and Mark 15:44 (Pilate's verification that Jesus was truly dead). Multilingual evidence (Spanish 'ha muerto,' German 'tot') consistently renders the resultative state rather than the dying event. DEATH AND CORPSES

θνητός G2349 Adj-ANS (6×)

Mortal, subject to death; describing the human body as inherently liable to die, contrasted with imperishable life.

An adjective meaning 'subject to death' or 'mortal,' used in the NT exclusively of the human body to underscore its vulnerability and the transformative power of resurrection. Paul commands believers not to let sin reign in their 'mortal bodies' (Rom 6:12), promises that the Spirit who raised Jesus will give life to their 'mortal bodies' (Rom 8:11), and in the great resurrection chapter declares that 'this mortal must put on immortality' (1 Cor 15:53-54). In 2 Cor 4:11, the life of Jesus is manifested in 'our mortal flesh.' The Spanish 'mortal' and French 'mortel' translate directly, preserving the sharp contrast with the imperishable.

(6×) Subject to death, mortal — describing the human body as inherently perishable and destined to die apart from divine intervention. In Rom 6:12 Paul urges believers not to let sin reign in their mortal body; in Rom 8:11 the Spirit gives life to mortal bodies; the climactic declaration of 1 Cor 15:53-54 proclaims that 'this mortal must put on immortality.' In 2 Cor 4:11, the paradox sharpens: Jesus' life is made manifest in mortal flesh. The Spanish 'mortal,' French 'mortel,' and German 'sterblich' all render the adjective transparently, highlighting the sharp biblical contrast between what is subject to death and what is clothed with imperishability. PERISHABLE CORRUPTIBLE

θορῠβ-έω G2350 V-PIM/P-2S (5×)

To make an uproar, cause commotion; to be troubled, distressed, or agitated in mind.

This verb captures both external noise and internal turmoil. It can describe crowds making a clamorous disturbance—as when professional mourners wail at Jairus's house (Matt 9:23; Mark 5:39) or when a mob is stirred up in Thessalonica (Acts 17:5). But it also carries an inward sense of anxious agitation, as when Jesus tells Martha she is 'worried and troubled' about many things (Luke 10:41). The Spanish renderings split neatly between external riot ('alborotaban') and internal alarm ('os alarmeis'), revealing this dual semantic range.

(5×) To make a commotion, cause tumult, or be inwardly troubled and agitated. Externally, it describes crowds creating uproar—mourners wailing loudly at Jairus's house (Matt 9:23; Mark 5:39), a mob rioting against Paul's companions (Acts 17:5). Internally, it depicts anxious disturbance of mind, as in Jesus's gentle rebuke of Martha's fretfulness (Luke 10:41) and Paul's reassurance not to be alarmed over Eutychus (Acts 20:10). The French 's'agiter' and 'troubler' nicely reflect this external-internal duality. TROUBLING AND DISTURBING

θόρῠβ-ος G2351 N-GMS (7×)

Uproar, tumult, or commotion — the confused noise and agitation of a crowd, often with political or hostile overtones.

In the New Testament, thorubos describes the volatile energy of a crowd that can tip toward riot. The chief priests fear a thorubos if they arrest Jesus during the festival (Matt 26:5; Mark 14:2), and Pilate sees one forming (Matt 27:24). Spanish consistently renders this 'alboroto' (uproar/disturbance), while French uses 'tumulte,' both capturing the sense of collective agitation. In Mark 5:38, the same word describes the loud wailing at Jairus's house — commotion born of grief rather than hostility.

1. uproar (5×) Uproar, riot — a public disturbance involving a crowd, carrying the threat of violence or political instability. Used of the feared crowd reaction at Jesus's arrest (Matt 26:5; Mark 14:2), the tumult Pilate witnesses (Matt 27:24), and post-riot settings in Acts (20:1; 21:34). Spanish 'alboroto' and German 'Lärm' both emphasize the noisy, disorderly character. TUMULT AND UPROAR

2. tumult (1×) Tumult — a state of confusion and agitation in a public setting, without necessarily implying a full riot. In Acts 24:18, Paul insists he was found in the temple without any 'tumult' (thorubou). Spanish 'tumulto' and French 'tumulte' capture the more general disorder, distinct from the riot-level disturbance of sense 1. TUMULT AND UPROAR

3. commotion (1×) Commotion, noisy disturbance — domestic or mourning-related agitation rather than political unrest. In Mark 5:38, Jesus arrives at Jairus's house and finds people making a thorubon — loud weeping and wailing. Spanish uses the same 'alboroto' as for riots, but the context is grief, not hostility. French 'tumulte' likewise collapses the distinction, showing how the core meaning is simply 'loud collective agitation.' TUMULT AND UPROAR

to break, shatter, or crush; metaphorically, to oppress or break down someone's spirit

The verb θραύω carries both physical and metaphorical senses of breaking or shattering. Literally, it describes breaking objects into pieces—pottery, rock, or wings—but classical authors also used it figuratively for breaking down hope, crushing spirit, or enfeebling strength. In Luke 4:18, Jesus quotes Isaiah using the perfect passive participle to describe those who are "oppressed" or "crushed," likely referring to the downtrodden and broken-spirited. The French "brisé" (broken) and Spanish "oprimidos" (oppressed) capture the metaphorical extension from physical to spiritual/social brokenness.

(1×) Luke's citation of Isaiah 61 employs the perfect passive participle τεθραυσμένους to describe a class of people needing liberation —those "crushed" or "oppressed." Classical usage shows θραύω moving from literal shattering (breaking wings, smashing rocks) to metaphorical crushing of hope or spirit. The multilingual evidence splits between emphasizing oppression (Spanish "oprimidos") and brokenness (French "brisé"), both valid extensions of the root idea. This single New Testament use appears in Jesus' programmatic announcement of his mission to the marginalized and broken. OPPRESSION AND TYRANNY

a creature raised or fed; domestic animals, especially flocks of sheep and goats; livestock

The noun θρέμμα (from τρέφω, "to feed/nourish") originally meant any nursling or creature that is fed, but came to refer especially to domestic animals like sheep, goats, and cattle. Ancient authors used it for tame animals as opposed to wild beasts, and sometimes extended it metaphorically to household slaves (as "home-raised"). In John 4:12, the Samaritan woman asks whether Jesus is greater than Jacob, who gave "us" the well and whose flocks (θρέμματα) drank from it. The translations uniformly render it as livestock or flocks: Spanish "ganados," French "bétail," German "Vieh."

(1×) The Samaritan woman's question (John 4:12) invokes Jacob's flocks drinking from the ancestral well, establishing continuity with the patriarchal narrative. The noun θρέμμα denotes domesticated herd animals, particularly sheep and goats that Jacob would have watered at the well. The lexical evidence from classical sources confirms this semantic range: tame animals (especially ruminants), game-cocks, and even dolphins are called θρέμματα. All major translations converge on "flocks" or "livestock," recognizing the pastoral context of Jacob's household economy. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

θρην-έω G2354 V-IIA-3P (4×)

To wail, mourn, or sing a dirge; ritualized vocal lamentation for the dead or for grief.

Rooted in the noun θρῆνος (dirge), this verb denotes formal, often vocal mourning — the kind of stylized weeping heard at funerals. Jesus invokes it in the parable of the children in the marketplace who complain 'we sang a dirge and you did not mourn' (Matt 11:17; Luke 7:32). Women along the Via Dolorosa θρηνέω over Jesus (Luke 23:27), and he warns the disciples that their grief will be real while the world rejoices (John 16:20). French 'se lamenter' and Spanish 'lamentar' both capture the sustained, vocal quality of this mourning.

(4×) To perform vocal lamentation, wail, or sing a funeral dirge, typically in a ritualized or public setting. The word appears in Jesus' parable about children calling out 'we sang a dirge and you did not lament' (Matt 11:17; Luke 7:32), underscoring the expected social response to mourning. At Luke 23:27 women θρηνέω along the road to Golgotha, and at John 16:20 Jesus warns the disciples they will θρηνέω while the world celebrates. Spanish 'lamentar' and French 'se lamenter' preserve the sustained, vocal, deeply emotional register of this grief. MOURNING AND LAMENTING

dirge, lamentation; a song of mourning or complaint

A formal song of mourning or lamentation, typically sung at funerals or in times of disaster. Homer and classical poets use the term for ritual dirges accompanying death. Pindar composed θρῆνοι as a distinct genre. The word can also mean complaint or sad strain more broadly—any sorrowful song or expression of grief. In biblical contexts it describes the mourning songs for the dead and prophetic lamentations over cities or nations. Jeremiah's Lamentations exemplify the genre. The noun derives from a verb meaning to wail or cry out, capturing the vocal intensity of ancient grief rituals.

θρησκ-εία G2356 N-NFS (4×)

Religious worship, piety, or devotional practice; the outward expression of one's religion, whether genuine or merely formal.

This noun covers the full range of religious observance, from sincere devotion to hollow ritual. Paul uses it of his former life in the strictest sect of Judaism (Acts 26:5), while James famously contrasts worthless θρησκεία — mere talk — with 'pure and undefiled religion' that cares for orphans and widows (Jas 1:26-27). Colossians 2:18 warns against a θρησκεία of angels, a deviant worship directed at intermediary beings. English 'religion,' Spanish 'religión/culto,' and French 'religion' all reflect the breadth: the word can be positive or negative depending on whether the worship is directed rightly and lived out authentically.

(4×) Outward religious worship, devotional practice, or piety — the visible expression of one's faith commitments. At Acts 26:5 Paul speaks of the strictest θρησκεία of the Pharisees; in Colossians 2:18 it appears in the pejorative phrase 'worship of angels,' warning against misdirected devotion. James 1:26-27 provides the sharpest contrast: θρησκεία that fails to bridle the tongue is 'worthless,' while θρησκεία that is 'pure and undefiled' involves caring for orphans and widows. Spanish distinguishes 'culto' (worship act) from 'religión' (system), but the Greek word spans both, emphasizing practice over belief. INCENSE AND WORSHIP

religious, devout; given to religious observance (can carry negative sense of superstitious)

This adjective describes someone devoted to religious practice and ritual observance. While generally positive ("devout," "pious"), it could also shade toward the negative sense of "superstitious" or excessively scrupulous about rituals. James 1:26 uses it for someone who "considers himself religious"—the context suggests outward religious practice that may lack authentic ethical content (controlling the tongue, caring for orphans). The word appears rarely in biblical texts, but its ambivalence between genuine devotion and mere religiosity makes it apt for James's warning against self-deception in religious observance.

(1×) James employs θρησκός in a rhetorically charged statement: if anyone thinks himself "religious" (θρησκός) but fails to bridle his tongue, his religion is worthless. The adjective highlights external religious observance—regular worship, ritual participation—but the immediate context (v. 27) contrasts this with "pure religion" defined by ethical action (caring for orphans and widows, remaining unstained by the world). The translations consistently render it "religious" (Spanish "religioso," French preserving the Greek term), capturing both the outward devotion and the potential for it to be superficial. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4053 WITH 4 SENSES

to lead in triumph, celebrate a victory; to triumph over someone as a defeated captive

This verb draws from the Roman practice of the triumphal procession, where a victorious general would parade through the city with captives and spoils on display. The word carries both the glory of the victor and the public humiliation of the vanquished. Paul uses this vivid imagery twice with contrasting applications. In 2 Corinthians 2:14, God is the one who 'always leads us in triumph in Christ'—but interpreters debate whether Paul sees himself as the triumphant general or the displayed captive, incense spreading the knowledge of Christ. In Colossians 2:15, Christ definitively triumphs over the powers and authorities, parading them as defeated foes. The Spanish 'triunfando' and French 'triompher' capture the victory theme, while the German 'im Triumphzug führen' (lead in a triumphal procession) preserves the Roman ceremonial context.

(2×) Both NT uses evoke the imagery of the Roman triumph, though with different emphases. In 2 Corinthians 2:14, Paul's metaphor is complex—God leads 'us' in triumph in Christ, spreading the fragrance of Christ's knowledge. Whether Paul sees himself as victor or as captive-turned-herald remains debated, but the procession imagery is clear. In Colossians 2:15, the picture is unambiguous: Christ disarmed the rulers and authorities and 'led them in triumphal procession' after his victory on the cross. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'que triunfa/triunfando,' German 'im Triumphzug führen') emphasize both the act of triumphing and the public display inherent in the Roman ceremony. The domain of Violence/Conflict reflects the conquest and subjugation at the heart of the triumph metaphor. VICTORY TRIUMPH

θρίξ G2359 N-NFP (15×)

Hair; primarily human head-hair, also animal hair (camel's hair) used as clothing material.

A straightforward physical noun, θρίξ refers to hair — but in the NT it plays surprisingly rich roles. Human head-hair appears in proverbial sayings about God's sovereign care ('the very hairs of your head are numbered,' Matt 10:30; Luke 12:7) and in intimate acts of devotion when Mary wipes Jesus' feet with her hair (Luke 7:38, 44; John 11:2; 12:3). The word also describes John the Baptist's rough garment 'of camel's hair' (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6), and in Revelation 1:14 and 9:8, hair serves as a marker of appearance and identity. Spanish distinguishes 'cabello' (human hair) from 'pelo' (animal hair), a lexical split that mirrors the two senses.

1. hair (human head) (13×) Human head-hair, the dominant sense covering thirteen of fifteen NT occurrences. Used in Jesus' teaching on divine providence ('not a hair of your head will perish,' Luke 21:18; 'the hairs of your head are all numbered,' Matt 10:30), in narrative acts of devotion (Mary wiping Jesus' feet, Luke 7:38, 44; John 11:2), and in apocalyptic description (hair white as wool, Rev 1:14). Spanish 'cabello/cabellos' and French 'cheveu' are specific to human head-hair, confirming this as the primary referent. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to be alarmed, troubled, disturbed; to be stirred up with fear or agitation

2. hair (animal fur/camel hair) (2×) Animal hair, specifically camel's hair used as rough clothing material. Occurs only in the twin descriptions of John the Baptist wearing a garment of camel's hair (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6). Spanish uses 'pelos' rather than 'cabellos' here — a natural lexical distinction between animal fur and human hair that cross-linguistically validates the sense boundary. The garment evokes the prophetic mantle of Elijah (cf. 2 Kings 1:8), connecting animal-hair clothing with prophetic identity. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

This verb in its passive form describes being alarmed, frightened, or stirred up, particularly by fear. It appears in eschatological contexts where Jesus warns against panic in crisis. In Matthew 24:6 and Mark 13:7, Jesus says 'see that you are not alarmed' when hearing of wars and rumors of wars. In 2 Thessalonians 2:2 Paul urges believers not to be 'quickly shaken in mind or alarmed' by false claims that the day of the Lord has come. The classical usage includes crying aloud, speaking, and causing fear or stirring emotion. The New Testament uses are uniformly passive—being stirred up, troubled, scared—in contexts requiring calm faith amid tumult.

(3×) The sense emphasizes emotional disturbance and alarm, particularly fear-based agitation that Jesus and Paul counsel against. The Synoptic uses come in apocalyptic discourse where Jesus warns that wars and upheavals are 'not yet the end'—don't be thrown into panic. Paul's usage addresses eschatological anxiety triggered by false teaching. The Spanish 'alarmar/perturbar,' French 'troubler,' and German 'erschrecken' all capture the fear element. This isn't mild concern but the kind of panic-stirring that undermines faithful endurance. The word marks the emotional danger zone that disciples must avoid when facing tribulation—the agitated fear that forgets God's sovereignty and timing. TERROR AND AGITATION

a clot, lump, or drop; especially clots of blood or large drops falling like clots

The noun θρόμβος literally means a lump or clot, used in medical texts for blood clots and in agricultural contexts for curds of milk or coarse salt. The diminutive-like sense of "drop" emerged for large, heavy drops that fall in clots rather than fine mist. Luke's Gospel uses the plural to describe Jesus's sweat in Gethsemane falling "like great drops of blood" (Luke 22:44)—the comparison suggests not color but the large, heavy nature of the perspiration. Across languages, translations render it as "drops" (Spanish "gotas," French "goutte"), though the underlying image is of thick, clot-like drops rather than fine droplets.

(1×) Luke's passion narrative describes Jesus's sweat becoming "like great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (22:44). The noun θρόμβοι emphasizes the size and weight of the sweat droplets —not fine perspiration but heavy, clot-like drops. Medical writers used θρόμβος for blood clots; the Lukan image compares the sweat to such clots in their substantial, falling nature. The multilingual glosses consistently render it "drops" (spa: "gotas," fra: "goutte," deu: θρόμβοι), though the semantic weight is on large, heavy drops, not merely liquid falling. thronos – throne, seat of royal or divine authority; both the physical seat and the sovereignty it represents

The masculine noun thronos ('throne') denotes a seat of royal or divine authority – the physical chair of state and, by metonymy, the sovereign power it represents. Its 63 New Testament occurrences are overwhelmingly theological: God's throne in heaven (Matt 5:34; Rev 4:2-6), Christ's eschatological throne of glory (Matt 25:31), the twelve thrones of the apostles (Matt 19:28), and David's dynastic throne inherited by the Messiah (Luke 1:32; Acts 2:30). Revelation alone accounts for nearly half the occurrences, portraying the heavenly throne room in vivid apocalyptic imagery. Spanish trono, French trone, and German Thron all capture the regal and sacral weight of this term.

throne, seat of authority (63×) A throne or seat of royal and divine authority, designating both the physical object and the sovereignty it symbolizes. Jesus invokes God's throne as the ultimate seat of judgment ('heaven is God's throne,' Matt 5:34), promises thrones to the Twelve (Matt 19:28), and receives David's throne as messianic fulfillment (Luke 1:32). The word reaches its greatest density in Revelation's throne-room visions (Rev 4-5; 20:11). Spanish trono, French trone, and German Thron render it without variation across all 63 occurrences, confirming a single sense encompassing literal and metonymic uses. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Thyatira; a city of ancient Lydia in western Asia Minor, known for its trade guilds and purple-dye industry.

A city in the Lydian region of Asia Minor, Thyatira was famous for its trade guilds and especially its purple-dye industry — the very trade practiced by Lydia, Paul's first European convert (Acts 16:14). In Revelation it is the fourth of the seven churches addressed, receiving both commendation for growing works and a sharp rebuke concerning the false prophetess 'Jezebel' (Rev 2:18-24). The name is consistently transliterated across languages: Spanish 'Tiatira,' French 'Thyatire,' German 'Thyatira.'

(4×) The proper name of a city in Lydia (modern western Turkey), referenced as the home of Lydia the purple-dye merchant (Acts 16:14) and as one of the seven churches of Revelation (Rev 1:11; 2:18, 24). Its economic significance — particularly its dye-works and trade guilds — forms the background for both the Lydia narrative and the Revelation letter's concern with economic compromise. Daughter; a female child, descendant, or member of a community addressed with familial warmth

Thygatēr is the standard Greek word for daughter, appearing across the New Testament in literal, genealogical, and affectionate address. Jesus calls the hemorrhaging woman 'daughter' (Matt 9:22), restoring her to community with a single word of kinship. Luke traces priestly lineage through 'daughters of Aaron' (Luke 1:5), while Paul quotes the prophetic promise that God will welcome 'sons and daughters' (2 Cor 6:18). The plural 'daughters of Jerusalem' (Luke 23:28) extends the term to an entire community. Every major translation language renders it with cognate directness – Spanish hija, French fille, German Tochter – reflecting its universally transparent meaning.

1. daughter (22×) A daughter in the primary sense: a female child in relation to her parent, or a woman addressed with familial affection. The dominant usage at 22 occurrences includes literal daughters (Herodias's daughter, Matt 14:6; Jairus's daughter, Matt 9:18), Jesus's tender address 'Daughter, your faith has healed you' (Matt 9:22), and relational statements like 'daughter against mother' (Matt 10:35). Five occurrences include 'daughters of Aaron' for priestly lineage (Luke 1:5), 'daughters of Jerusalem' as communal address (Luke 23:28), and the Pentecost prophecy that 'your daughters shall prophesy' (Acts 2:17). little daughter, young girl (diminutive)

A diminutive form of 'daughter,' this tender term expresses affection and smallness. Both occurrences in Mark involve Jairus's dying daughter. In Mark 5:23, Jairus pleads with Jesus, 'My little daughter is at the point of death. Come and lay your hands on her, so that she may be made well and live.' In 7:25, a Syrophoenician woman whose 'little daughter had an unclean spirit' falls at Jesus's feet begging for help. The diminutive conveys both the child's youth and the parents' tenderness—she's not just a daughter but a 'little' one, evoking pathos and urgency.

(2×) Both uses appear in healing narratives where desperate parents approach Jesus on behalf of dying or demon-possessed daughters. The diminutive intensifies the emotional appeal—these aren't grown women but small children, vulnerable and beloved. Mark's use of this term (rather than the simple 'daughter') heightens the contrast between the child's fragility and Jesus's power, making the healings all the more moving. The German 'Toechterlein' and Spanish 'hijita' preserve the affectionate diminutive force. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

a hurricane, violent storm, or whirlwind; a tempest with rushing wind

The noun θύελλα describes violent atmospheric disturbances—hurricanes, whirlwinds, or severe storms characterized by rushing, destructive wind. Homer used it for battle-storm imagery and destructive tempests at sea. The word emphasizes the violent, rushing quality of the wind rather than simply rain or thunder. Hebrews 12:18 contrasts the terrifying Sinai theophany ("darkness, gloom, and tempest") with the approachability of the new covenant. The translations uniformly render it "tempest" or "storm" (Spanish "tempestad," German "Sturm"), capturing the fearsome, violent weather phenomenon that symbolizes divine otherness and power.

(1×) Hebrews 12:18 lists θύελλα among the terrifying phenomena at Mount Sinai—darkness, gloom, tempest—that made the old covenant approach to God fearful. The noun denotes violent windstorms, hurricanes, or whirlwinds that ancient sailors and travelers dreaded. Classical sources use it for destructive sea storms and battle-imagery ("swift as tempest"). Here it symbolizes the unapproachable majesty of God under the old covenant. The cross-linguistic evidence (spa: "tempestad," fra: "Sturm") consistently emphasizes violent storm-wind, reinforcing the passage's contrast between Sinai's terror and Zion's grace. STORMS AND TEMPESTS made of citron wood (thyine wood); relating to the aromatic, expensive wood from North African trees

This adjective describes objects made from the wood of the θύον tree, an aromatic North African conifer (likely Tetraclinis articulata, called citron or sandarac wood). Ancient sources prized this wood for its beautiful grain, pleasant scent, and durability, using it for expensive furniture and decorative items. Revelation 18:12 lists "thyine wood" among the luxury commodities no longer purchased in fallen Babylon. The translations vary: English "citron," Spanish "olorosa" (fragrant), German/French "Zitrusholz" (citrus wood), reflecting uncertainty about the exact botanical identity while preserving the sense of rare, aromatic, costly wood.

(1×) Revelation's catalog of luxury goods includes θύϊνον ξύλον—wood from the θύον tree, valued in antiquity for its aromatic properties and beautiful grain. Ancient writers describe this North African wood as highly expensive, used for elaborate furniture and decorative paneling. The adjective θύϊνος marks it as a prestige item in Babylon's merchant economy. The multilingual glosses show interpretive variation: English "citron," Spanish "olorosa" (fragrant), German "Zitrusholz" (citrus wood), all attempting to identify this rare commodity. Incense; aromatic substance burned as a sacred offering, producing fragrant smoke that ascends before God.

Refers to the fragrant material burned in worship, producing smoke that rises symbolically toward heaven. In the Temple setting of Luke 1:10-11, the whole assembly prays outside while Zechariah burns incense at the altar — the moment an angel appears to announce John's birth. In Revelation, incense becomes richly symbolic: the golden bowls full of incense represent the prayers of the saints (Rev 5:8), and an angel offers much incense with prayers on the golden altar before the throne (Rev 8:3-4). The Spanish 'incienso' and French 'encens' both derive from the Latin 'incensum,' preserving the association with burning.

incense, aromatic offering (6×) Incense, an aromatic substance burned as a sacred offering in worship, its rising smoke symbolizing prayers ascending to God. In Luke 1:10-11, Zechariah's priestly duty of burning incense at the Temple altar sets the stage for the angelic announcement. In Revelation, incense takes on cosmic-liturgical significance: golden bowls of incense are the prayers of the saints (Rev 5:8), and an angel mingles much incense with those prayers on the heavenly altar (Rev 8:3-4). The Spanish 'incienso' and French 'encens' preserve the Latin root 'incensum' (that which is burned), reflecting both the physical substance and its sacred purpose. INCENSE AND WORSHIP

a censer, incense altar, or vessel for burning incense; an implement for offering fragrant smoke

The noun θυμιατήριον designates equipment for burning incense—either a portable censer (hand-held incense burner) or an incense altar. Classical sources use it for censers in temple ritual and vessels for fumigation. Hebrews 9:4 describes the furnishings of the tabernacle's Holy of Holies, listing the "golden censer" or "golden altar of incense" alongside the ark. Whether this refers to a portable censer or the incense altar (normally positioned outside the veil) has been debated. The translations split: English "altar of incense," Spanish/French "encensoir/incensario" (censer), German "Rauchfass" (censer), reflecting the lexical ambiguity.

(1×) Hebrews 9:4 lists the θυμιατήριον as part of the Most Holy Place's furnishings. The term can mean either a hand-held censer for burning incense or the incense altar itself. This creates interpretive tension: the incense altar normally stood outside the veil, yet Hebrews seems to locate it within. Lexically, θυμιατήριον appears in LXX for both censers and the altar. The translation evidence reflects this ambiguity: "altar of incense" (English), "incensario/encensoir" (Spanish/French), suggesting either a portable censer kept in the Holy of Holies or the author's theological rather than topographical description. INCENSE CENSER to burn incense, to offer incense as a ritual act; to cause fragrant smoke to rise

This verb describes the ritual act of burning incense, causing fragrant smoke to rise as an offering. In temple worship, priests burned incense on the altar, producing aromatic smoke that symbolized prayers ascending to God. The verb can be used transitively (burn something as incense) or absolutely (perform the incense ritual). Luke 1:9 describes Zacharias being chosen by lot to "burn incense" when he entered the temple sanctuary—a rare privilege in a priest's career. The multilingual glosses uniformly preserve the ritual action: Spanish "quemar incienso," French "brûler de l'encens," emphasizing the sacred act of offering fragrant smoke.

(1×) Luke's infancy narrative begins with Zacharias chosen by lot θυμιᾶσαι—to burn incense in the temple sanctuary (1:9). This verb denotes the ritual action of offering incense, a high priestly duty performed daily but rotated among many priests, making it potentially a once-in-a-lifetime honor. The incense offering symbolized the prayers of Israel ascending to God. All translations maintain the ritual specificity: "burn incense," "quemar incienso," "brûler de l'encens." The context emphasizes the solemnity of this moment when Zacharias receives the angelic announcement of John's birth. INCENSE AND WORSHIP

θῡμο-μᾰχέω G2371 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

to be furiously angry, to rage; to fight with intense anger or hostility

The verb θυμομαχέω combines θυμός (wrath, passion) with μάχομαι (to fight), describing someone fighting with furious anger or engaging in hostile contention. Ancient sources use it for desperate fighting or obstinate contention driven by rage. Acts 12:20 describes Herod as "furiously angry" (θυμομαχῶν) with the people of Tyre and Sidon, who come seeking peace. The participle suggests Herod was in a state of hostile rage toward these cities. Translations render it "furiously angry" (English), "furioso" (Spanish), "furieux" (French), capturing the intense, aggressive hostility the compound verb denotes.

(1×) Acts describes Herod Agrippa I as θυμομαχῶν toward Tyre and Sidon (12:20)—literally "fighting with wrath" or in a state of furious hostility. The cities' delegation seeks peace, suggesting a trade embargo or political pressure stemming from royal anger. The compound θυμομαχέω intensifies beyond mere anger (θυμός) to angry contention or hostile action. Classical usage includes desperate battle-fighting and obstinate contention. The multilingual evidence uniformly emphasizes fury: "furiously angry," "furioso," "furieux," though the verb suggests more than emotion—active hostile engagement or quarrel. ANGER AND INDIGNATION wrath, fury, passionate rage — intense anger, especially divine eschatological judgment in Revelation

Thymos denotes fierce, burning anger — the hot, surging emotion that in classical Greek was seated in the chest as the spirited part of the soul. Of its 18 New Testament occurrences, more than half appear in Revelation, where it becomes the signature term for divine fury poured out in the last days. 'The wine of the wrath (thymos) of God' fills the cup of judgment (Rev 14:8, 10, 19; 15:1, 7; 16:1, 19; 18:3; 19:15), an image that fuses intoxication with destruction in a single terrifying metaphor. Outside Revelation, the word captures spontaneous human rage: the furious mob at Nazareth who try to hurl Jesus off a cliff (Luke 4:28), the Ephesian crowd chanting for Artemis (Acts 19:28). Paul lists thymos among works of the flesh alongside strife, jealousy, and selfish ambition (Gal 5:20; 2 Cor 12:20; Eph 4:31; Col 3:8). Hebrews 11:27 notes that Moses left Egypt 'not fearing the thymos of the king.' Spanish 'furor/ira,' French 'colere/fureur,' and German 'Zorn/Grimm' capture the dual human and divine registers.

wrath, fury, rage (18×) Intense, passionate anger or fury — used both for sudden human rage and for God's eschatological wrath. Revelation dominates the usage, deploying thymos as a near-technical term for divine judgment: 'the wine of the fury of God's wrath' is poured from golden bowls upon the earth (Rev 14:8, 10, 19; 15:1, 7; 16:1, 19; 18:3; 19:15). For human rage, Luke 4:28 captures the Nazareth mob's explosive fury at Jesus, and Acts 19:28 describes the Ephesian crowd's frenzy over Artemis. Paul catalogs thymos among the works of the flesh, urging believers to put it away alongside bitterness and clamor (Gal 5:20; Eph 4:31; Col 3:8; 2 Cor 12:20). Hebrews 11:27 uses it of Pharaoh's royal wrath. German 'Grimm' and Spanish 'furor' distinguish this hot, explosive anger from the more settled orge. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to be angry, enraged, or wrathful; to become furious

The verb θυμόω means to make angry or, in its middle/passive forms, to become angry or wrathful. The noun θυμός denotes passionate anger or rage, and this verb describes entering that emotional state. It can refer to human wrath or divine anger, and classical sources use it for wild animals becoming agitated. Matthew 2:16 reports Herod's reaction when he realized the Magi had outwitted him: he "was enraged" (ἐθυμώθη). The aorist passive suggests he was overcome by fury, leading to the horrific massacre of Bethlehem's male children. All translations emphasize intense anger: "was enraged," "se enfureció," "se mettre en colère."

(1×) Matthew's infancy narrative uses the aorist passive ἐθυμώθη to describe Herod's reaction to being deceived by the Magi (2:16). The verb θυμόω in its middle/passive forms means "to become angry, to be filled with wrath." Herod's rage drives him to order the slaughter of all male children in Bethlehem under two years old—murderous fury masking his political insecurity. The translations converge on intense anger: "was enraged," "se enfureció," "se mettre en colère." Classical usage includes both human and animal rage, with the verb often implying violent or uncontrolled anger. ANGER AND INDIGNATION

A door or gate; an opening for entry, used literally of buildings and figuratively of opportunity or access

The standard Greek word for a physical door, appearing across the Gospels and Acts in scenes ranging from the intimate (the closed door of private prayer, Matt 6:6) to the climactic (the stone rolled against the tomb's entrance, Matt 27:60). When the ten virgins arrive too late, the door is shut (Matt 25:10) – a single image doing double theological duty as both literal threshold and exclusion from the kingdom. Spanish consistently renders 'puerta,' French 'porte,' and German 'Tur,' all preserving the concrete architectural sense. In Acts, doors open miraculously for imprisoned apostles (Acts 5:19; 16:26), making the physical barrier a sign of divine authority over human confinement.

1. a door (29×) The core singular sense: a specific door, gate, or entrance to a building or enclosed space. Jesus teaches to pray behind a closed door (Matt 6:6), the bridegroom shuts the door (Matt 25:10), and Joseph rolls a stone against the tomb's door (Matt

27:60). Spanish 'puerta' and German 'Tur' both denote a single architectural opening. The crowd gathering 'at the door' (Mark 1:33; 2:2) establishes this as a threshold where inside and outside meet. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Jesus standing 'at the doors' signals imminent arrival (Matt 24:33; Mark 13:29), and the doors are shut where the disciples hide for fear (John 20:19, 26). The definite article in the Greek and Spanish 'las puertas' marks these as known, expected barriers – the emphasis falls on their being closed or about to open rather than on the physical structure. An angel opens the prison doors at night (Acts 5:19), an earthquake bursts them open (Acts 16:26-27), and temple doors are shut behind a mob (Acts 21:30). θυρεός G2375 N-AMS (1×) a large oblong shield (like a door); the Roman scutum used by heavy infantry

The noun θυρεός literally means "door-like" (from θύρα, door), designating the large oblong shield that covered most of the body, shaped somewhat like a door. This distinguished it from the smaller round shield (ἀσπίς). The Roman scutum, the heavy infantry's primary defensive equipment, fits this description. Ephesians 6:16 instructs believers to take up "the shield of faith," using θυρεός to emphasize comprehensive protection—a shield that covers the whole person. The image draws on Roman military practice familiar to the epistle's audience. Translations uniformly render it "shield" (Spanish "escudo," German "Schild"), with the large, body-covering type understood.

(1×) Paul's armor imagery in Ephesians 6:16 employs θυρεός for the "shield of faith" that extinguishes fiery darts. The word specifically denotes the large oblong shield (versus the small round shield, ἀσπίς), shaped like a door (θύρα) and providing near-total body coverage. Roman legionaries used the scutum, a curved rectangular shield, in this manner. The choice of θυρεός rather than ἀσπίς emphasizes comprehensive protection: faith as a defense covering the whole person. All translations simply render "shield," though the semantic specificity points to the large protective type. SHIELD DEFENSIVE WEAPON window, an opening in a wall for light or air, often used for looking out or escape

The term refers to a window or opening in a wall, typically used for ventilation, light, or viewing. In the New Testament, it appears in two dramatic contexts: a young man falling from a third-story window during Paul's lengthy discourse in Troas, and Paul himself being lowered in a basket through a window in the Damascus wall to escape arrest. The multilingual evidence consistently points to architectural openings—Spanish ventana, French fenêtre, German Fenster—all capturing the functional aspect of a wall aperture. While classical Greek employed this word for various openings (including embrasures in battlements), the biblical usage remains focused on the architectural sense of a literal window.

(2×) An opening in a wall for light, air, or access, consistently rendered across languages as 'window.' In Acts 20:9, the tragic detail of Eutychus sitting 'in the window' during Paul's sermon emphasizes both the casual posture and the dangerous height. In 2 Corinthians 11:33, Paul's humiliating escape 'through a window' in a basket highlights the architectural feature as a means of covert exit, avoiding the guarded gates. The consistent multilingual evidence (ventana, fenêtre, Fenster) confirms the concrete architectural referent. WINDOW OPENING

θυρωρ-ός G2377 N-DFS (4×)

A doorkeeper or porter; one who guards and controls access through a gate or entrance.

This noun designates the person who stands watch at a door or gate, controlling who enters and who does not. In the parable of the absent master, the doorkeeper is charged with staying alert (Mark 13:34). In John's Good Shepherd discourse, the θυρωρός opens the gate to the true shepherd (John 10:3). Most poignantly, a female θυρωρός at the high priest's courtyard admits Peter — and then identifies him as a disciple (John 18:16-17). Spanish distinguishes 'portero' (male) and 'portera' (female), highlighting the gender flexibility the Greek noun naturally carries.

(4×) A person stationed at a door or gate to regulate access, functioning as a guard and gatekeeper. In John 10:3 the θυρωρός opens the sheep-gate for the true shepherd, symbolizing legitimate spiritual authority. In John 18:16-17 a female doorkeeper at the high priest's residence admits Peter and then confronts him about his association with Jesus. Mark 13:34 places the doorkeeper in an eschatological parable about watchfulness. Spanish renders both 'portero' and 'portera,' capturing the fact that the role was filled by both men and women in the ancient world. GATEKEEPER PORTER

θυσί-α G2378 N-GFS (29×)

Sacrifice or offering presented to God, encompassing the act, the victim, and spiritual worship

Derived from θύω ('to slaughter, offer'), θυσία denotes sacrifice in its full range: the ritual act, the animal victim, and by extension any offering to God. The NT employs it for OT animal sacrifices (Luke 2:24, quoting Lev 12:8), for the surpassing value of mercy over ritual (Matt 9:13, 12:7, citing Hos 6:6), and for the believers' spiritual offerings (Rom 12:1, Phil 4:18, Heb 13:15-16). Spanish 'sacrificio,' French 'sacrifice,' and German 'Opfer' all converge on a single translation, confirming the unified semantic core despite the word's breadth from slaughtered lambs to praise.

sacrifice, offering (29×) A sacrifice or offering presented to God, covering the physical act of slaughter, the victim itself, and metaphorical spiritual worship. Jesus twice quotes Hosea 6:6—'I desire mercy, not sacrifice' (Matt 9:13, 12:7)—reframing the concept. Mark 12:33 contrasts inner devotion with burnt offerings, while Hebrews develops Christ's single sacrifice superseding the entire Levitical system (Heb 9:26, 10:12). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

θυσι-αστήριον G2379 N-GNS (23×)

Altar; a raised structure for presenting sacrifices and offerings to God in temple or heavenly worship.

Derived from the verb thyō ('to sacrifice'), thysiastērion denotes the consecrated structure upon which offerings are placed before God. In the Gospels Jesus references the Jerusalem temple altar when teaching about reconciliation before worship (Matt 5:23-24) and exposes Pharisaic oath-casuistry tied to it (Matt 23:18-20). Paul invokes the altar to ground the right of gospel ministers to material support (1 Cor 9:13). In Hebrews and Revelation the term extends to a heavenly altar of incense and a cosmic altar beneath which martyrs' souls cry out, showing how the physical structure becomes a symbol of perpetual communion between God and his people.

altar (23×) A raised structure for presenting sacrifices, incense, or offerings to God — covering the Jerusalem temple altar (Matt 5:23-24), the altar of incense (Luke 1:11; Rev 8:3), and the heavenly altar in Revelation (Rev 6:9; 9:13). Spanish 'altar,' French 'autel,' and German 'Altar' confirm one unified sense. ALTAR SACRIFICE PLACE

θύω G2380 V-AIA-3S (14×)

To sacrifice an animal ritually to God or gods, or to slaughter/kill for a feast or figuratively for destruction.

A verb rooted in ancient sacrificial practice, covering both the cultic act of offering an animal to God and the more general act of slaughtering for a meal or celebration. When Jesus says the thief comes to steal, kill, and destroy (John 10:10), the word carries lethal force stripped of any sacred overtone. Yet in Mark 14:12 and Luke 22:7, it describes the Passover lamb being sacrificed — a solemn liturgical moment. The multilingual evidence mirrors this split: Spanish renders it 'sacrificar' in ritual contexts but 'matar' when the emphasis falls on killing, while German consistently uses 'opfern' (to offer/sacrifice) across both senses, preserving the older unity of slaughter and offering.

1. offer ritual sacrifice (9×) Denotes the cultic act of presenting an animal as a religious offering, whether to the God of Israel or to pagan deities. In Acts 14:13 the priest of Zeus wanted to offer sacrifice (spa 'sacrificar,' deu 'opfern'), and in Mark 14:12 / Luke 22:7 it refers to the Passover lamb being ritually slaughtered. The multilingual glosses consistently favor sacred vocabulary here — French 'sacrifier,' German 'opfern' — underscoring the liturgical register. SACRIFICE AND SLAUGHTER

2. slaughter or kill (5×) Describes the physical act of slaughtering or killing an animal (or figuratively a person) without primary focus on ritual. In Luke 15:23 the father orders the fattened calf killed for a feast of celebration (spa 'matadlo'), and in John 10:10 it carries the violent sense of destroying life. Spanish clearly distinguishes this from sense 1 by shifting from 'sacrificar' to 'matar,' while French retains 'sacrifier' — an interesting case where the Romance languages diverge in how far they secularize the term. SACRIFICE AND SLAUGHTER

θωμᾶς G2381 N-AMS (11×)

Thomas — one of the twelve apostles, also called Didymus ('Twin'), known for his honest doubt and bold faith

Θωμᾶς (Thōmas) is the proper name of one of Jesus' twelve apostles, a name derived from Aramaic תְּאוֹמָא meaning 'twin,' which John's Gospel translates with the Greek equivalent Didymus (John 11:16; 20:24; 21:2). Thomas appears in every apostolic list (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). John's Gospel gives him particular prominence: he declares 'let us also go, that we may die with him' before the raising of Lazarus (John 11:16), asks 'Lord, we do not know where you are going' at the Last Supper (John 14:5), and famously doubts the resurrection until encountering the risen Christ, whereupon he makes the climactic confession 'My Lord and my God!' (John 20:24-28). Spanish 'Tomás' and Arabic 'توما' preserve the name.

Thomas (apostle) (11×) Thomas the apostle, also called Didymus ('Twin') — one of the twelve disciples of Jesus. Listed in every apostolic catalog (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). John's Gospel features him prominently: his courageous declaration before Lazarus' tomb (John 11:16), his honest question at the Last Supper about not knowing the way (John 14:5), his initial refusal to believe the resurrection without physical evidence (John 20:24-25), and his climactic confession 'My Lord and my God!' upon encountering the risen Jesus (John 20:28). He appears again among the seven at the Sea of Tiberias (John 21:2). Spanish 'Tomás' and Korean '도마' transliterate the Aramaic name consistently. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

θώραξ G2382 N-AMS (5×)

Breastplate; a piece of defensive armor covering the chest, used literally and figuratively.

Originally denoting the bronze corslet of Greek warriors, this noun describes armor protecting the chest and torso. Paul employs it metaphorically twice: the 'breastplate of righteousness' in the spiritual armor passage (Eph 6:14) and the 'breastplate of faith and love' (1 Thess 5:8). In Revelation's apocalyptic visions, demonic locusts wear breastplates like iron (Rev 9:9), and the cavalry from the Euphrates bear breastplates of fiery red, blue, and sulfurous yellow (Rev 9:17). Spanish 'coraza,' French and German 'Brustpanzer' all preserve the concrete military imagery.

(5×) A breastplate or corslet—defensive armor worn over the chest. Used figuratively by Paul for spiritual protection: the 'breastplate of righteousness' (Eph 6:14) and the 'breastplate of faith and love' (1 Thess 5:8), drawing on Isaiah 59:17. Used literally in Revelation's visions of supernatural armies: the locust-creatures with iron-like breastplates (Rev 9:9) and the Euphrates cavalry with brilliantly colored breastplates (Rev 9:17). All major translations render it with military armor terminology. ARMOR BREASTPLATE

Jairus, a synagogue ruler whose daughter Jesus raised from death

Jairus is the personal name of a synagogue official who approached Jesus in desperation when his twelve-year-old daughter was dying. The name derives from the Hebrew Jair, meaning 'he will enlighten' or 'he will give light,' found in the Old Testament (Numbers 32:41). The accounts in Mark and Luke present him as a man of some social standing—a 'ruler of the synagogue'—yet willing to humble himself by falling at Jesus' feet in public. His story becomes one of the most poignant resurrection narratives in the Gospels, intertwining faith, doubt, and the tender words of Jesus: 'Talitha cumi' (Little girl, arise). The multilingual renderings maintain the Greek transliteration with slight variations in accent marks.

(2×) The proper name of the synagogue ruler in the Synoptic Gospels whose daughter Jesus raised from death (Mark 5:22, Luke 8:41). The Hebrew origin (יָאִיר) suggests 'he gives light,' a fitting irony given that his encounter with Jesus—the Light of the World—brings his daughter back from death's darkness. The consistent transliteration across languages (Iairos, Jaïrus, Iáïros) reflects the standard practice of preserving personal names across translation boundaries, with only minor orthographic adjustments for target language conventions. JAIR PERSONAL NAME

Jacob — the patriarch Israel and an ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy

Iakob is the indeclinable Greek transliteration of Hebrew Ya'aqov, appearing 27 times in the New Testament for two distinct individuals. The patriarch Jacob dominates, invoked as the third member of the ancestral triad 'Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob' in Jesus' teaching about the resurrection (Matt 8:11; 22:32; Mark 12:26; Luke 13:28; Acts 3:13; 7:32). John's Gospel locates Jesus at Jacob's well near Sychar, where the Samaritan woman asks whether Jesus is 'greater than our father Jacob' (John 4:5-6, 12). Stephen's speech in Acts 7 recounts Jacob's entire story from the birth of the twelve patriarchs through the descent into Egypt (Acts 7:8-15, 46). Paul cites the oracle 'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated' in his argument about divine election (Rom 9:13). A second Jacob appears in Matthew's genealogy as the father of Joseph, husband of Mary (Matt 1:15-16). Spanish and French preserve the name as 'Jacob'; German renders it 'Jakob.'

of Iakōb (27×) The patriarch Jacob/Israel, grandson of Abraham and father of the twelve tribes, invoked throughout the NT as the third pillar of the ancestral triad (Matt 8:11; 22:32; Acts 3:13; 7:32). Also referenced in John 4:5-12 as the ancestor who gave the well at Sychar, in Stephen's historical survey of Israel's origins (Acts 7:8-15, 46), and in Paul's election argument citing Malachi: 'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated' (Rom 9:13). Romans 11:26 uses 'Jacob' collectively for the nation Israel. A second Iakob in Matthew 1:15-16 is Joseph's father in the Davidic genealogy of Jesus. JACOB JAMES NAMES

James (Iakobos) — Greek form of Jacob, borne by several NT figures including two apostles

The Hellenized form of the Hebrew name Ya'aqov (Jacob), borne by at least four persons in the New Testament. James son of Zebedee, brother of John, was among the inner circle of three disciples and the first apostle martyred (Acts 12:2). James son of Alphaeus was another of the Twelve (Matt 10:3), often identified with 'James the less' (Mark 15:40). James the brother of the Lord emerged as a pillar of the Jerusalem church (Gal 1:19; 2:9) and is the traditional author of the Epistle of James. A fourth James is known only as the father of the apostle Judas (Luke 6:16).

James (Iakobos) (42×) The proper name Iakobos (James), borne by several NT individuals. Its Hebrew origin (Ya'aqov) links it to the patriarch, but the Greek form distinguishes NT bearers. French 'Jacques,' German 'Jakobus,' and Spanish 'Jacobo' reflect distinct transliteration traditions. References span the calling narratives (Matt 4:21), the Jerusalem council (Gal 2:9), and the epistle salutation (Jas 1:1). JACOB JAMES NAMES

ἴαμα G2386 N-GNP (3×)

healing, cure, remedy; the power or gift of healing

This noun denotes healing or cure, appearing exclusively in Paul's discussion of spiritual gifts in 1 Corinthians 12. The word occurs three times in that chapter: gifts of healings (12:9), those with gifts of healings (12:28), and the rhetorical question 'do all have gifts of healings?' (12:30). The plural 'healings' (genitive plural in all three cases) suggests either varieties of healing gifts or multiple acts of healing. Classical usage includes remedy, medicine, cure, soothing, and pacification. The New Testament use is specifically charismatic—healings as manifestations of the Spirit for the common good, distributed sovereignly by God, not possessed by all.

(3×) The sense is healing as a spiritual gift or charism in the church. The consistent plural form and genitive construction ('gifts of healings') may indicate diversity in how healing manifests or that the gift involves multiple healing acts rather than a single power. Paul's rhetorical questions establish that not everyone receives this gift, just as not all are apostles or prophets—gifts are distributed by the Spirit as He wills. The Spanish 'sanidades' and German 'Heilung' maintain the healing concept, while the plural form suggests multiplicity or variety. This is healing as divine gift for ministry, not medical treatment, occurring within the context of Spirit-distributed charisms for building up the body. HEALING AND RESTORATION

Jambres, one of Pharaoh's magicians who opposed Moses (paired with Jannes)

Jambres is named in 2 Timothy 3:8 as one of the Egyptian magicians who resisted Moses, paired with Jannes. Though not named in Exodus 7, Jewish tradition preserved these names for Pharaoh's court magicians who duplicated some of Moses's miracles. Paul uses them as types of those who oppose the truth with corrupt minds and counterfeit faith. The pairing of these names appears in various Jewish and early Christian sources, suggesting a well-known tradition. Translations typically transliterate the name: "Iambres" (English), "Jambres" (German), preserving its connection to the Exodus narrative's antagonists.

(1×) Paul invokes Jambres (with Jannes) as historical examples of opponents to divine truth (2 Tim 3:8). Though Exodus doesn't name Pharaoh's magicians, Jewish tradition identified them as Jannes and Jambres, magicians who mimicked Moses's signs through sorcery. The apostle uses them typologically: as they resisted Moses, so certain false teachers resist the truth with corrupted minds. The name appears in various Second Temple Jewish texts and Greco-Roman magical papyri, confirming a widespread tradition. Jannai, an ancestor of Jesus listed in Luke's genealogy

Jannai appears in Luke 3:24 as part of the genealogy tracing Jesus's lineage back through David to Adam. Like many names in the genealogical lists, little is known about this individual beyond his position in the ancestry. The name appears only in this Lukan genealogy among biblical texts. Luke's genealogy differs from Matthew's in several names and in structure, reflecting different theological purposes and possibly different lineage traditions (Joseph's line versus Mary's, or legal versus biological descent). Translations typically transliterate: "Jannai" (English), "Jannaï" (French), "Janna" (German), maintaining the proper noun without interpretive addition.

(1×) Luke's genealogy includes Ἰανναί (3:24) in the post-exilic section of Jesus's ancestry, positioned between Melchi and Joseph (son of Mattathias). The name doesn't appear elsewhere in Scripture, and no biographical information survives. Luke traces Jesus's line through lesser-known ancestors in the post-David period, differing from Matthew's genealogy. The function is theological: establishing Jesus's full humanity and connection to all humankind (Luke traces to Adam, not just Abraham). Translations uniformly transliterate the name: "Jannai," "Jannaï," "Janna," treating it as an opaque proper noun. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Jannes, one of Pharaoh's magicians who opposed Moses (paired with Jambres)

Jannes is named alongside Jambres in 2 Timothy 3:8 as one of the Egyptian sorcerers who resisted Moses. Though the Exodus account doesn't preserve their names, Jewish interpretive tradition did, and Paul draws on this to illustrate opposition to God's messengers. The historical Jannes and Jambres duplicated Moses's early miracles through magical arts before being forced to acknowledge God's superior power. Paul uses them typologically: as they opposed Moses with counterfeit power, so false teachers oppose the gospel with counterfeit faith. The names appear in Jewish and pagan magical texts, confirming their currency in the ancient world.

(1×) In 2 Timothy 3:8, Paul cites Ἰάννης καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς as examples of those who "resist the truth"—Pharaoh's magicians who opposed Moses. Exodus 7-8 describes unnamed Egyptian sorcerers duplicating Moses's signs (staff to serpent, water to blood, frogs) before failing at gnats and eventually suffering from boils. Jewish tradition named them Jannes and Jambres, preserving these identities in targums and other sources. Paul invokes them to characterize opponents of true doctrine: as they resisted Moses, false teachers resist apostolic truth. Translations transliterate: "Jannes," "Iannēs," linking to the Exodus confrontation. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) ἰάομαι G2390 V-AIM-3S (27×)

heal, cure — to restore to health from disease or infirmity, used of divine and apostolic healing acts

Iaomai means to heal or cure, carrying the full weight of physical restoration from disease, and its 27 NT occurrences cluster around Jesus' healing ministry and the apostolic continuation of that ministry. The centurion's faith that Jesus can heal his servant with a mere word (Matt 8:8, 13) and the hemorrhaging woman's instant cure (Mark 5:29; Luke 8:47) illustrate the dramatic, instantaneous quality this verb typically conveys. Luke, the physician-evangelist, favors it especially: the crowds who came 'to be healed' (Luke 6:18-19; 9:2, 11, 42), and in Acts the lame man healed through Peter (Acts 9:34) and those healed through Paul (Acts 28:8, 27). The verb also carries a metaphorical-spiritual register: Matthew and John both cite Isaiah 6:10 — 'lest they turn and I heal them' — where healing means spiritual restoration of a hardened people (Matt 13:15; John 12:40). First Peter 2:24 applies Isaiah 53:5: 'by his wounds you were healed.' Spanish 'sanar,' French 'guerir,' and German 'heilen' all preserve the same medical-to-spiritual range.

heal or cure (27×) To restore someone to health by curing disease or physical infirmity, used predominantly of Jesus' miraculous healings and their apostolic extension. The centurion's servant healed by a word (Matt 8:8, 13), the woman with a flow of blood made whole instantly (Mark 5:29; Luke 8:47), and crowds who came to be healed (Luke 6:18-19; 9:2, 11) exemplify the literal sense. Metaphorically, it describes spiritual restoration of a wayward people, quoting Isaiah 6:10 in Matt 13:15 and John 12:40, and Isaiah 53:5 in 1 Pet 2:24: 'by his wounds you were healed.' Spanish 'sanar' and German 'heilen' span the same literal-to-figurative range. HEALING ACTIVITY

Jared, an antediluvian patriarch in Jesus's genealogy (son of Mahalalel, father of Enoch)

Jared appears in Luke's genealogy (3:37) as an ancestor of Jesus from the antediluvian period. Genesis 5:15-20 records that Jared lived 962 years and was the father of Enoch (who walked with God and was taken). The name derives from Hebrew יֶרֶד (Yered), possibly meaning "descent." By including these ancient patriarchs, Luke traces Jesus's lineage all the way to Adam, emphasizing his connection to all humanity. The LXX renders the name as Ἰάρεδ, which Luke's manuscript tradition varies slightly (Ἰάρετ, Ἰάρεθ). Translations transliterate according to the English tradition from Genesis: "Jared."

(1×) Luke 3:37 lists Ἰάρετ among Jesus's antediluvian ancestors, corresponding to the Jared of Genesis 5:15-20, father of Enoch and son of Mahalalel. This patriarch lived 962 years in the Genesis chronology. By tracing through these primeval figures to Adam, Luke establishes Jesus's solidarity with all humanity, not just Israel. The Hebrew יֶרֶד becomes Ἰάρεδ in LXX; Luke's text shows spelling variation (Ἰάρετ/Ἰάρεθ). Translations normalize to "Jared" following the Genesis tradition, connecting Luke's genealogy to the familiar patriarchal narrative. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) healing, cure; the act or process of being healed

This noun denotes the act of healing, cure, or remedy. Luke 13:32 has Jesus saying 'I cast out demons and perform healings' (plural, 'cures'). Acts 4:22 describes the healed lame man as evidence: 'the man on whom this healing had been performed' was over forty years old. Acts 4:30 includes healing in the disciples' prayer for boldness: 'while you stretch out your hand to heal.' Classical usage includes healing, mode of healing, remedy, mending, and even alchemical refining. The New Testament uses span Jesus' own healing ministry, apostolic healing as authenticating sign, and healing as ongoing divine activity through the church.

(3×) The sense captures the healing act or process. Luke presents it as part of Jesus' messianic mission alongside exorcism—concrete actions demonstrating the kingdom's arrival. Acts uses it both as accomplished fact (the sign performed on the lame man) and as ongoing petition (disciples praying for God to continue healing). The Spanish glosses distinguish singular 'sanidad' and plural 'sanidades,' while the German forms maintain 'Heilung' throughout. The word can denote both the singular act (Acts 4:22, 'this healing') and the general category (Luke 13:32, ongoing healings). It's healing as observable demonstration of divine power, whether by Jesus or through his church. HEALING AND RESTORATION

Jasper; a precious or semi-precious stone, used in Revelation to symbolize divine radiance and heavenly splendor.

An opaque gemstone known in antiquity in various colors, jasper appears exclusively in Revelation's visions of heavenly glory. The one seated on the throne radiates light 'like jasper and carnelian' (Rev 4:3), and the New Jerusalem's radiance is compared to jasper, 'clear as crystal' (Rev 21:11). The city's wall is built of jasper (Rev 21:18), and jasper heads the list of foundation stones (Rev 21:19). The term is borrowed from Hebrew yashpheh and is uniformly transliterated across languages — French 'jaspis,' Spanish 'jaspe,' German 'Jaspis.'

(4×) A precious or semi-precious stone, likely an opaque quartz, used in Revelation as a primary symbol of divine luminosity. At Rev 4:3 the appearance of the enthroned God is compared to jasper and sardius; at Rev 21:11 the holy city has the glory of God shining like jasper 'clear as crystal'; the wall of the city is pure jasper (Rev 21:18) and jasper is the first foundation stone (Rev 21:19). The Hebrew cognate yashpheh appears on the high priest's breastplate (Exod 28:20), linking the New Testament imagery to priestly holiness. Jason; a man in Thessalonica who hosted Paul and his companions, and possibly Paul's kinsman in Rom 16:21.

Jason is a Greek name borne by a believer in Thessalonica who gave hospitality to Paul and Silas during their missionary visit. When a mob attacked his house, Jason was dragged before the city authorities and accused of harboring men who 'act contrary to the decrees of Caesar' (Acts 17:5-9). He posted bond and was released. A Jason also appears among Paul's greetings in Rom 16:21 as a 'kinsman,' possibly the same individual. The name, familiar from Greek mythology's hero Jason, was commonly adopted by Hellenistic Jews as a substitute for Joshua or Jesus.

ἰᾱτρός G2395 N-GMS (7×)

Physician, doctor; a healer of the body, used literally and in Jesus's proverbial sayings about spiritual healing.

Iatros is the standard Greek word for a medical practitioner, from the verb iaomai ('to heal'). In the NT it appears both literally—Luke is called 'the beloved physician' (Col 4:14), and the hemorrhaging woman spent everything on physicians (Mark 5:26; Luke 8:43)—and proverbially in Jesus's double saying: 'Those who are well have no need of a physician' (Matt 9:12; Mark 2:17; Luke 5:31) and 'Physician, heal yourself' (Luke 4:23). Spanish Médico and French Médecin match the professional sense exactly.

physician, doctor (7×) Physician, medical healer—one who diagnoses and treats illness. The word carries both literal and proverbial weight in the NT. Literally it describes the professional doctors the hemorrhaging woman consulted fruitlessly (Mark 5:26), and Paul's companion Luke (Col 4:14). Proverbially Jesus uses it in two memorable sayings: the healthy need no physician (Matt 9:12; Mark 2:17; Luke 5:31), and the Nazareth proverb 'Physician, heal yourself' (Luke 4:23). Spanish Médico and French Médecin preserve the professional dignity; the metaphorical extension to spiritual healing runs through every Gospel occurrence. HEALING ACTIVITY

behold, see, look (aorist imperative singular); command to direct attention

The aorist imperative 'behold!' or 'see!'—a command to look and pay attention. Derived from the verb εἶδον ('I saw'), this form occurs frequently in both classical and biblical Greek. Attic dialect writes it ἰδέ, treating it as an adverb. Tragic poets employ it in lyric passages to direct the audience's gaze. The imperative's force makes seeing itself an action to be performed. Not passive observation but active, commanded attention: Look! Notice! Consider what stands before you!

ἰδέα G2397 N-NFS (1×)

form, appearance, or outward shape; the visible aspect or look of something

The noun ἰδέα denotes the outward form, appearance, or visible shape of something—what meets the eye. Classical philosophy used it for abstract "forms" or "ideas," but in more concrete usage it simply meant physical appearance or kind. Matthew 28:3 uses it to describe the angel at the tomb: "His appearance was like lightning." The word focuses on visible aspect—what the witnesses saw. Across languages, translations render it as "appearance" (Spanish "apariencia," French "apparence"), the straightforward sense of outward look or form. The philosophical sense of ἰδέα (Platonic Forms) is not relevant in biblical usage, which focuses on phenomenal appearance.

(1×) Matthew's resurrection narrative describes the angel's ἰδέα as "like lightning" (28:3)—his outward appearance, visible form, or look. The noun emphasizes phenomenal aspect: what the guards and women saw when the angel appeared. Classical usage ranges from physical shape or form to philosophical "Ideas," but here the meaning is simply visible appearance. The parallelism with "his clothing white as snow" confirms focus on visual impact. The multilingual evidence uniformly translates "appearance": spa: "apariencia," fra: "apparence," focusing on outward, visible aspect rather than philosophical essence. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἴδιος G2398 Adj-NMS (115×)

One's own, personal, private; used adverbially for 'privately/apart' and substantively for 'one's own people'

Idios is the Greek adjective for personal ownership and private belonging, standing opposite to koinos ('common, shared'). In the Gospels it most often marks something as distinctly someone's own – his own city (Matt 9:1), his own property (Matt 25:14). The well-known phrase kat' idian ('privately') appears seventeen times, usually when Jesus withdraws with disciples apart from the crowds (Matt 14:13, 17:1). John's Gospel develops a poignant substantive use: 'He came to his own (ta idia), and his own people (hoi idioi) received him not' (John 1:11). Spanish propio, French propre, and German eigen all map cleanly to the possessive core.

1. one's own, belonging to oneself (91×) The standard possessive adjective meaning 'one's own, belonging to oneself,' used attributively or predicatively with various nouns. Jesus returns to 'his own city' (Matt 9:1), the master entrusts servants with 'his own possessions' (Matt 25:14-15), and Paul speaks of 'one's own body' and 'one's own husband/wife' (1 Cor 7:2-4). Spanish propio/propia, French propre, and German eigen all render this core possessive meaning directly. OWN BELONGING PRIVATE en: his-own, own | es: propia, propias, propias-cosas | fr: propre | de: eigen Matt 9:1; Matt 22:5; Matt 25:14; Matt 25:15; Mark 4:34

2. privately, apart, alone (17×) The adverbial idiom κατ᾽ ἰδίαν (kat' idian), meaning 'privately, apart, by oneself.' It characteristically describes Jesus withdrawing with the Twelve away from the crowds (Matt 14:13, 17:1, 20:17) or explaining parables in private (Mark 4:34). Spanish aparte, French en privé, and the pattern's consistent rendering across languages confirm it functions as a fixed adverbial expression rather than a simple adjective. OWN BELONGING PRIVATE en: himself, private, themselves | es: aparte, privado, solas | fr: propre | de: eigen Matt 14:13; Matt 14:23; Matt 17:1; Matt 17:19; Matt 20:17

3. one's own people, associates (6×) The substantivized form οἱ ἴδιοι ('one's own people') or τὰ ἴδια ('one's own things/home'). John 1:11 makes the theological point with devastating economy: 'He came to his own, and his own received him not.' John 13:1 says Jesus loved 'his own who were in the world,' and Acts 4:23 records the apostles returning 'to their own.' This relational-belonging sense goes beyond mere possession to kinship and community. OWN BELONGING PRIVATE

4. individually, severally (1×) The distributive sense 'individually, severally, each in particular.' In 1 Corinthians 12:11, the Spirit distributes gifts 'to each one individually' (ἰδίᾳ). Spanish particularmente captures this well. It is rare in the NT but represents a genuine Classical Greek usage of the word. OWN BELONGING PRIVATE

ἰδιώτ-ης G2399 N-GMS (5×)

An untrained person, layperson; one without professional skill or formal education in a subject.

This noun originally meant a 'private citizen' as opposed to someone holding public office, but in the New Testament it denotes a person lacking specialized training or eloquence. The Sanhedrin recognized Peter and John as 'unschooled, ordinary men' (Acts 4:13). Paul uses it for outsiders or uninstructed persons who cannot follow tongue-speaking in worship (1 Cor 14:16, 23-24), and he concedes being 'untrained in speech' while insisting on his knowledge (2 Cor 11:6). The Spanish 'ignorante/inexperto' and English 'untrained/ordinary' show the term connotes lack of formal expertise rather than stupidity.

(5×) An untrained or unskilled person, a layperson lacking professional expertise or rhetorical polish. Applied to Peter and John whom the Sanhedrin saw as 'unschooled, ordinary men' (Acts 4:13), and used by Paul both for worship outsiders who cannot follow glossolalia (1 Cor 14:16, 23-24) and self-deprecatingly of his own speaking ability (2 Cor 11:6). The multilingual glosses—Spanish 'ignorante/inexperto,' English 'untrained/ordinary'—capture the sense of lacking formal training rather than intellectual deficiency. UNCLEAN AND PROFANE

behold, lo, look (interjection); particle directing attention to what follows
An attention-grabbing particle meaning 'behold!' or 'look!'—though grammarians debate whether it's truly an imperative or an adverb. It appears with nouns ('behold, a virgin'), pronouns ('behold, I stand at the door'), and verbs in any tense ('behold, he comes'). The New Testament uses it liberally, especially in narrative and apocalyptic literature. Angels announce with ἰδού, Jesus teaches with it, and Revelation punctuates visions with it. The particle even works with verbs of hearing ('Listen! I hear a sound'). Functionally it frames what follows as significant, surprising, or requiring notice.

Ἰδουμαία G2401 N-GFS (1×)
Idumea, the region south of Judea (Greek name for Edom)
Idumea is the Greek name for the region of Edom, south of Judea, derived from the Hebrew אֱדֹם (Edom). After the Babylonian exile, Edomites moved into southern Judea, and the region became known as Idumea. By the New Testament period, it was a distinct territory, sometimes under Jewish control (the Herodian family had Idumean roots). Mark 3:8 mentions people coming from Idumea to hear Jesus. The LXX typically transliterates the Hebrew as Ἐδώμ, but Hellenistic sources preferred Ἰδουμαία. Translations either transliterate ("Idumea") or use the biblical name "Edom," recognizing the geographical continuity.

(1×) Mark 3:8 lists Ἰδουμαία among the regions from which crowds came to Jesus—the Hellenized name for Edom, the territory south of Judea. Historically Edom (Esau's descendants), the region was occupied by Edomites who moved north after Babylon's conquest, creating the district of Idumea. By Jesus's time, it was a recognized region, home to the Herodian dynasty's ancestors. The Greek form Ἰδουμαία appears in Hellenistic texts; LXX usually has Ἐδώμ. Translations consistently use "Idumea" (spa: "Idumaia," fra: "Idumée"), the standard geographical designation for this southern region. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἱδρ-ώς G2402 N-NMS (1×)
sweat, perspiration; moisture exuded from the body during exertion or heat
The noun ἱδρώς means sweat or perspiration—the bodily fluid exuded during physical labor, heat, or stress. Classical literature frequently associates sweat with toil and effort, as in Hesiod's maxim that the gods placed sweat before virtue. Ancient medical writers also used it for tree exudations (gum, resin). Luke 22:44 describes Jesus's sweat in Gethsemane becoming "like great drops of blood"—the agony intensifying his perspiration. The image emphasizes the physical reality of Jesus's distress. Translations uniformly render it "sweat" (Spanish "sudor," French "sueur"), the straightforward bodily secretion indicating intense strain or anguish.

(1×) Luke's passion narrative reports that Jesus's ἱδρώς became "like great drops of blood falling to the ground" (22:44) during his Gethsemane prayer. The noun simply means sweat or perspiration, but the context and comparison to blood clots emphasize the intensity of his agony. Classical sources associate ἱδρώς with hard labor and toil (Hesiod: "the gods placed sweat before virtue"). Here, the physical manifestation of sweat reveals Jesus's genuine human struggle facing the cross. All translations use the direct term: "sweat," "sudor," "sueur," the bodily fluid marking exertion and distress. FLESH AND BODY

Ἰεζάβελ G2403 N-AFS (1×)
Jezebel, the notorious queen of Israel; used symbolically in Revelation for a false prophetess Jezebel was the Phoenician wife of King Ahab who promoted Baal worship in Israel and violently opposed God's prophets (1 Kings 16-21). Her name became synonymous with idolatry, sexual immorality, and persecution of the faithful. Revelation 2:20 uses her name symbolically for a woman (or movement) in Thyatira who calls herself a prophetess but teaches Christians to practice sexual immorality and eat idol-food. Whether a literal person or symbolic designation, the name evokes the Old Testament Jezebel's spiritual seduction and corruption. Translations transliterate: "Jezebel" (English), "Jezabel" (Spanish), "Isebel" (French/German), immediately signaling the idolatrous threat.

(1×) Revelation's letter to Thyatira condemns tolerating "Jezebel" (2:20)—likely a symbolic name for a false prophetess promoting syncretistic compromise (eating idol-food, sexual immorality). The historical Ἰεζάβελ (1 Kings 16:31ff) was Ahab's Phoenician queen who introduced Baal worship, killed prophets, and orchestrated Naboth's murder. Her name epitomizes idolatrous seduction and violent opposition to true worship. By invoking this name, Revelation warns that Thyatira faces a similar threat: a charismatic teacher leading believers into compromise. Translations transliterate uniformly: "Jezebel," "Jezabel," "Isebel," activating the entire Old Testament typology. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Ἱεράπολις G2404
Hierapolis (Holy City); a city in the Lycus valley in Asia Minor
A city in the Roman province of Asia, located in the Lycus valley near Colossae and Laodicea. The name means 'Holy City,' likely referencing its famous pagan shrine and hot springs, which made it a pilgrimage center. Paul mentions it in Colossians 4:13 as a place where Epaphras labored for the believers. Early Christian tradition associates the apostle Philip with Hierapolis. The three cities —Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis—formed a triangle of communities addressed directly or indirectly in Paul's correspondence, each with distinct challenges and opportunities for the gospel in a Greek-speaking, religiously diverse region.

ἱερᾰτ-εία G2405 N-GFS (2×)
priesthood, the office or function of serving as a priest before God
The word denotes the office, function, or service of priesthood—the sacred duty of standing between God and the people. It appears twice in the New Testament, once in Luke's Gospel describing Zechariah's priestly service in the temple when the angel Gabriel appeared to him, and once in Hebrews explaining the Levitical priesthood's basis in ancestral lineage from Abraham. The term emphasizes the functional and official dimension of priestly service rather than the abstract concept or the collective body of priests. Across languages —Spanish sacerdocio, French sacerdoce, German Priesteramt—the translations consistently capture the institutional office or function of priestly ministry. The Greek noun derives from the verb 'to serve as priest,' underlining its active, performative character.

(2×) The office, function, or service of being a priest, appearing in Luke 1:9 where Zechariah 'according to the custom of the priesthood' was chosen by lot to enter the temple and burn incense—the defining moment when he learned of John the Baptist's coming birth. In Hebrews 7:5, the term describes the institutional basis for Levitical priestly authority, rooted in divine law and ancestral descent from Abraham through Levi. The multilingual evidence (sacerdocio, sacerdoce, Priesteramt) uniformly points to the functional office rather than the collective body, emphasizing the enacted service rather than mere status. PRIESTHOOD OFFICE

ἱερᾰτ-ευμα G2406 N-ANS (2×)
priesthood, a body or community of priests; the collective priestly identity of God's people While closely related to G2405, this term more clearly denotes the collective body or community of priests rather than the individual office. Peter uses it twice in his first epistle to describe the Christian community's identity: believers are a 'holy priesthood' offering spiritual sacrifices, and a 'royal priesthood' declaring God's praises. The term carries profound theological weight, applying Old Testament priestly language to the entire church. Unlike the Levitical priesthood restricted to Aaron's descendants, this priesthood is universal among believers, rooted in Christ's once-for-all sacrifice. The Greek word can mean both 'priesthood' (abstract office) and 'body of priests' (collective group), but Peter's usage clearly emphasizes the corporate, communal dimension—the whole people of God functioning as priestly mediators.

(2×) A collective body or community of priests, used by Peter to redefine God's people as a priestly nation (1 Peter 2:5, 9). In 2:5, believers are 'a holy priesthood' (ἱεράτευμα ἅγιον) offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ—a democratization of priestly identity beyond the Levitical line. In 2:9, the phrase 'royal priesthood' (βασίλειον ἱεράτευμα) echoes Exodus 19:6, applying Israel's covenantal identity to the church. The multilingual glosses (sacerdocio, ἱεράτευμα, Priestertum) highlight the collective dimension: not individual priests performing functions, but a whole people constituted as priestly mediators between God and the world. PRIESTHOOD OFFICE to serve as priest, to perform priestly duties, to exercise the priestly office

This verb means to function as a priest, performing the ritual and sacrificial duties of the priesthood. In Jewish context, it involved offering sacrifices, burning incense, blessing the people, and maintaining temple worship. Luke 1:8 uses it to describe Zacharias performing his priestly service when he received the vision of Gabriel. The participle ἱερατεύειν indicates active engagement in priestly ministry during his division's week of temple service. Classical Greek used it for serving as priest of various deities. Translations render it as "serving as priest" or "exercising the priestly office," emphasizing the official cultic function.

(1×) Luke's narrative begins with Zacharias ἱερατεύειν—serving as priest (1:8)—when his division was on duty. The verb denotes performing the official functions of the priesthood: offering sacrifices, burning incense, pronouncing blessings. His selection by lot to enter the sanctuary and burn incense was the context for Gabriel's announcement. Classical usage applies the verb to priests of various cults; in Jewish context it specifically means temple service. The translations consistently express priestly service: "serving as priest," "ejercer sacerdocio," "exercer le sacerdoce," marking Zacharias's official cultic role. PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD

Jeremiah, the major prophet; also referenced in mistaken attribution

Jeremiah the prophet appears three times in Matthew's Gospel. Matthew 2:17 introduces a fulfillment quotation with 'then was fulfilled what was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet.' Matthew 16:14 records speculation that Jesus might be 'Jeremiah or one of the prophets.' Matthew 27:9 attributes a prophecy to Jeremiah, though the closest parallel is actually Zechariah 11:13—a textual puzzle that has generated much discussion. The Hebrew name יִרְמְיָהוּ means 'Yahweh exalts' or 'Yahweh establishes.' Jeremiah's themes of judgment, suffering, and new covenant made him a natural point of comparison for Jesus' ministry.

(3×) The single sense identifies the major prophet who authored the biblical book bearing his name. The Matthew 16 reference shows Jeremiah was considered a possible category for understanding Jesus—a suffering prophet calling Israel to repentance. The two 'fulfillment' citations connect Jesus' story to prophetic patterns, though the Matthew 27 attribution to Jeremiah rather than Zechariah remains a crux. Some suggest composite quotation, others a different textual tradition, others that 'Jeremiah' could introduce a collection including Zechariah. The multilingual renderings uniformly transliterate or use traditional forms of the prophetic name, maintaining consistency across translation traditions. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) priest — one who performs sacred rites and offers sacrifices, especially Jewish temple priests and Christ as high priest

Hiereus appears 31 times in the New Testament, spanning the Levitical priesthood, Jesus' interactions with the temple cult, and the christological reinterpretation of priesthood in Hebrews. In the Gospels, Jesus sends healed lepers to show themselves to the priest for ritual certification (Matt 8:4; Mark 1:44; Luke 17:14), and the parable of the Good Samaritan casts a priest passing by on the other side as a pointed critique (Luke 10:31). Luke introduces the priest Zechariah, father of John the Baptist, serving his division in the temple (Luke 1:5). Acts 6:7 notes a great company of priests becoming obedient to the faith. Hebrews applies the title to Christ as a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek (Heb 5:6; 7:11-21), superseding the Aaronic line. Spanish 'sacerdote,' French 'pretre/sacrificateur,' and German 'Priester' all render the cultic office consistently.

priest (31×) A cultic officiant who performs sacred rites and offers sacrifices. In the Gospels, refers to Jewish temple priests who certify healing (Matt 8:4; Luke 17:14), with the Good Samaritan parable naming one who passes by (Luke 10:31). Zechariah serves as a priest of the division of Abijah (Luke 1:5). Hebrews redefines the office christologically: Jesus is priest forever after Melchizedek's order (Heb 5:6; 7:11-21), rendering the Aaronic priesthood obsolete. PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD

Jericho; the ancient fortified city near the Jordan River, prominent in both OT conquest and NT Gospel narratives.

Ierichou is the indeclinable Greek form of Hebrew Yericho, the ancient city in the lower Jordan Valley. In the OT it is the first city conquered after the Exodus (Josh 6), and Hebrews 11:30 recalls its walls falling by faith. In the Gospels, Jericho sits on Jesus's final road to Jerusalem: there he heals blind Bartimaeus (Matt 20:29; Mark 10:46; Luke 18:35), encounters Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1), and sets the Good Samaritan parable on the dangerous Jericho road (Luke 10:30). Spanish Jericó and French Jéricho reflect the city's enduring familiarity.

Jericho (city) (7×) Jericho—the historic walled city near the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, situated about 250 meters below sea level. All seven NT occurrences cluster around two themes: Jesus's ministry on the road to Jerusalem and the faith chapter of Hebrews. The Synoptic Gospels place the healing of the blind (Matt 20:29; Mark 10:46; Luke 18:35) and Zacchaeus's conversion (Luke 19:1) at Jericho, while the Good Samaritan descends 'from Jerusalem to Jericho' (Luke 10:30). Hebrews 11:30 recalls the conquest walls. Spanish Jericó and German Jericho maintain the familiar proper name across languages. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Temple — the sacred precinct in Jerusalem, especially the temple complex including its courts, porticoes, and sanctuary.

Hieron refers to the entire temple complex in Jerusalem — its courts, colonnades, and sacred precincts — as distinct from naos, which denotes the inner sanctuary alone. When Jesus drives out the money changers, he enters the hieron (Matt 21:12; Mark 11:15), the vast public area where commerce and teaching took place. It is in the hieron that Jesus teaches daily (Luke 19:47; 21:37), that the early church gathers after Pentecost (Acts 2:46; 5:20-21), and that Paul is seized by the mob (Acts 21:27-30). The devil sets Jesus on the pinnacle of the hieron during the temptation (Matt 4:5; Luke 4:9). Josephus describes the same precinct using the identical word. Spanish templo, French temple, and German Tempel all render it without distinguishing it from naos, though the Greek distinction is lexicographically important.

temple (71×) The temple complex or sacred precinct, referring to the entire Jerusalem temple grounds including its courtyards, porticoes, and surrounding structures — as distinct from naos, which designates the inner sanctuary proper. Jesus teaches in the hieron (Matt 21:23; Luke 19:47; John 7:14), drives out merchants from its courts (Matt 21:12; Mark 11:15), and is tested at its pinnacle (Matt 4:5). The early church gathers there daily (Acts 2:46; 5:20-21). Spanish templo, French temple, and German Tempel do not preserve the hieron/naos distinction. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἱερο-πρεπής G2412 Adj-AFP (1×)

befitting holiness, reverent, suitable for sacred persons or matters; priestly, dignified

The adjective ἱεροπρεπής (literally "befitting sacred things") describes behavior, demeanor, or characteristics appropriate to holy persons, places, or matters. It conveys dignity, reverence, and the gravity suitable for those engaged in sacred service. Titus 2:3 instructs older women to be "reverent in behavior"—ἱεροπρεπεῖς in deportment, as befits those teaching and modeling godliness. The word doesn't mean merely religious but implies the seriousness and dignity appropriate to sacred calling. Classical sources use it for conduct befitting priests or sacred occasions. Translations render it "reverent" (English), "reverentes" (Spanish), capturing the sacred dignity the adjective conveys.

(1×) Paul instructs older women to be ἱεροπρεπεῖς in demeanor (Titus 2:3)—reverent, dignified, befitting those engaged in holy service. The adjective literally means "appropriate to sacred things" (ἱερός + πρέπω), emphasizing behavior that reflects the seriousness of spiritual responsibility. These women are to teach and model godliness; their conduct should match their calling. Classical usage applies it to priests, sacred cookery, and holy matters. The multilingual evidence renders it "reverent," "reverentes," "priesterlich" (priestly), all emphasizing the dignity and gravity appropriate to sacred persons and their conduct. HOLINESS AND SANCTITY

ἱερός G2413 N-ANS (4×)

Sacred, holy; pertaining to divine things, temple service, or what is set apart for God.

This adjective marks something as belonging to the divine sphere — consecrated, set apart, filled with sacred significance. Paul uses the neuter plural (τὰ ἱερά, 'sacred things') when arguing that those who serve at the temple altar eat from the temple offerings (1 Cor 9:13). Timothy is reminded of the 'sacred writings' (ἱερὰ γράμματα) he has known from childhood (2 Tim 3:15). The longer ending of Mark describes the 'sacred and imperishable proclamation' of eternal salvation (Mark 16:20). Spanish 'sagrado,' French 'sacré,' and German 'heilig' all distinguish this consecrated quality from mere moral goodness.

(4×) Belonging to or associated with the divine, consecrated, sacred. Used substantively for temple service in 1 Cor 9:13 where 'those who perform sacred things' (τὰ ἱερὰ ἐργαζόμενοι) eat from the temple. At 2 Tim 3:15 it modifies γράμματα to mean 'sacred writings,' the Scriptures Timothy learned as a child. The longer ending of Mark (16:20) speaks of the 'sacred and imperishable message' of salvation. Spanish 'sagrado' and French 'sacré' both preserve the distinction between the ritually consecrated (ἱερός) and the morally holy (ἅγιος), a nuance important for understanding Paul's temple analogy. HOLINESS AND SANCTITY

Hierosolyma – Jerusalem; the holy city, capital of Judea, in its Hellenized Greek form

Hierosolyma is the Hellenized form of the Hebrew Yerushalayim (Jerusalem), treated as a neuter plural in Greek. The New Testament uses two forms: the indeclinable Ierousalem (closer to the Hebrew, preferred by Paul, Hebrews, and Revelation) and the declinable Hierosolyma (preferred by Matthew, Mark, and John). The latter carries a more Greco-Roman register, perhaps reflecting the city as experienced by outsiders. With 64 occurrences in this form alone, it names the epicenter of biblical drama – the site of Temple worship, Jesus's passion, and the eschatological hope. The heavenly Jerusalem (Gal 4:26; Heb 12:22; Rev 21:2) transforms the geographical name into a theological symbol. All target languages preserve it virtually unchanged: Spanish, French, and German Jerusalem.

(64×) The Hellenized Greek name for Jerusalem, capital of Judea and epicenter of Israel's worship, used in the Gospels and Acts for the earthly city where Jesus taught, suffered, died, and rose (Matt 2:1; 3:5; 20:17-18). The form Hierosolyma (neuter plural, declinable) is favored by the Evangelists and contrasts with the indeclinable Ierousalem preferred by Paul and Revelation. In Galatians 4:25-26, Hebrews 12:22, and Revelation 3:12; 21:2, the name extends to the heavenly and eschatological city. Spanish, French, and German all render it uniformly as Jerusalem across 64 occurrences. JERUSALEM HOLY CITY

inhabitant of Jerusalem, Jerusalemite (demonym for those living in the holy city)

This demonym designates a native or resident of Jerusalem, appearing twice in the New Testament. In Mark's Gospel it identifies the crowds streaming from Jerusalem to hear John the Baptist (Mark 1:5), while in John's Gospel the term distinguishes permanent residents from pilgrims when discussing Jesus' identity (John 7:25). The multilingual evidence (Spanish Jerosolimitanos, French Hiérosolymitain, German Einwohner-Jerusalems) consistently marks this as a gentilicium—a proper adjective denoting civic identity. Beyond mere geography, the term carries theological weight as it identifies those whose religious center was the Temple itself.

(2×) A person who lives in or is native to Jerusalem, the holy city. Mark uses this term to describe those who left the city to be baptized by John in the wilderness (Mark 1:5), suggesting a contrast between the urban center of religious authority and John's wilderness ministry. In John 7:25, the Jerusalemites are portrayed as having insider knowledge about the religious leaders' intentions toward Jesus, distinguishing them from festival pilgrims. The Romance language glosses (Spanish Jerosolimitanos, French Hiérosolymitain) preserve the formal, civic nature of this demonym, while German Einwohner-Jerusalems makes the 'inhabitant of Jerusalem' meaning explicit. JERUSALEM HOLY CITY

ἱεροσῡλ-έω G2416 V-PIA-2S (1×)

to rob temples, to commit sacrilege by stealing from sacred precincts

This verb means to rob or plunder temples, stealing sacred objects or temple treasures—a serious crime in antiquity considered not just theft but sacrilege. Classical sources describe temple-robbing as both criminal and impious, violating the sanctity of divine property. Romans 2:22 uses it in Paul's accusation against hypocritical Jews: "You who abhor idols, do you rob temples?" The charge may refer to profiting from pagan temple goods or violating the Jerusalem temple through greed. The verb's force combines theft with sacrilege. Translations vary: "rob temples" (English), "cometes sacrilegio" (Spanish), "Tempelraub" (German), all emphasizing the religious violation.

(1×) Paul challenges Jewish hypocrisy with a rhetorical question: σὺ ὁ βδελυσσόμενος τὰ εἴδωλα ἱεροσυλεῖς; (Rom 2:22)—"You who abhor idols, do you rob temples?" The verb ἱεροσυλέω means to plunder temples, stealing sacred objects—both criminal and sacrilegious. The accusation may target Jews profiting from pagan temple trade or violating temple sanctity through greed. Classical usage describes temple-robbery as particularly heinous, combining theft with impiety. The translations reflect this dual offense: "rob temples," "cometes sacrilegio," "Tempelraeuber," emphasizing both the act and its sacrilegious character. STEALING THEFT

temple-robber, sacrilegious person; one who plunders sacred places or property

The noun ἱερόσυλος designates someone who robs temples or commits sacrilege—a temple-plunderer. Ancient societies treated such persons as both criminals and impious offenders against the gods. The word combines ἱερός (sacred) with συλάω (to rob, plunder). Acts 19:37 records the Ephesian town clerk defending Paul and his companions: they are "neither temple-robbers nor blasphemers of our goddess." This cleared them of the charge of directly attacking Artemis's cult or stealing temple property, though their preaching undermined her worship. Translations render it "temple-robbers" (English), "sacrílegos" (Spanish), "voleur de temple" (French), emphasizing the sacrilegious theft.

(1×) The Ephesian town clerk declares that Paul's companions are οὔτε ἱεροσύλους—neither temple-robbers (Acts 19:37). The noun describes those who plunder temples or steal sacred property, combining criminality with impiety. By denying this charge, the official distinguishes between Paul's preaching (which indirectly affected Artemis's cult) and direct sacrilege. The clarification protects Paul legally: he hasn't committed temple-robbery or blasphemy, only proclaimed a different message. Classical usage treats ἱερόσυλοι as both thieves and sacrilegious criminals. Translations uniformly render "temple-robbers," "sacrílegos," "voleur de temple," the legal-religious charge the clerk refutes. THIEF ROBBER to serve as priest, to minister in priestly fashion, to perform sacred service

The verb ἱερουργέω means to perform priestly service or minister in a sacred, cultic manner. It combines ἱερός (sacred) with ἔργον (work), denoting sacred service or ritual ministry. Romans 15:16 uses it metaphorically: Paul describes his apostolic work as "ministering the gospel of God" in priestly fashion, so that the offering of the Gentiles might be acceptable. The verb elevates evangelism to cultic language—Paul serves as a priest whose sacrifice is the converted Gentiles. Classical sources use it for performing sacred rites or offering sacrifices. Translations render it "ministering as priest" or "serving as sacrificateur," preserving the priestly imagery.

(1×) Paul employs ἱερουργοῦντα metaphorically to describe his apostolic ministry (Rom 15:16): he serves the gospel "in priestly fashion," making the Gentiles an acceptable offering to God. The verb denotes performing sacred rites or priestly service, here applied to evangelism. Paul reimagines missionary work as cultic service: he is a priest, his offering is converted Gentiles, the sacrifice is sanctified by the Spirit. Classical usage applies ἱερουργέω to sacrificing animals or performing sacred ceremonies. Translations preserve the priestly language: "ministering as a priest," "priesterlich dienen," elevating gospel proclamation to sacred service. PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD

Jerusalem — the holy city, capital of Judea and site of the Temple; also used symbolically for the heavenly city.

Hierousalem is the indeclinable Semitic form of the city's name, preserving the Hebrew Yerushalayim more closely than the Hellenized Hierosolyma. Luke and Paul strongly prefer this form, while Mark and John tend toward the Hellenized variant. Beyond its literal geographical reference — the city of David, seat of the Temple, and center of pilgrimage — the name takes on symbolic weight in Paul's contrast between 'the present Jerusalem' and 'the Jerusalem above' (Gal 4:25-26), and in Hebrews' vision of the 'heavenly Jerusalem' (Heb 12:22). Spanish Jerusalem, French Jerusalem, and German Jerusalem all transliterate directly, as do virtually all target languages.

Jerusalem (76×) The proper noun for Jerusalem, the holy city and Temple site, used both for the literal city (Matt 23:37; Luke 2:25, 41) and symbolically for the heavenly Jerusalem (Gal 4:26; Heb 12:22). This Semitic-form spelling is preferred by Luke and Paul, contrasting with the Hellenized Hierosolyma in Mark and John. JERUSALEM HOLY CITY

ἱερ-ωσύνη G2420 N-AFS (3×)

priesthood, priestly office; the function or dignity of a priest

This noun denotes priesthood or priestly office. All three occurrences appear in Hebrews 7 during the argument about Christ's superior priesthood according to the order of Melchizedek. Hebrews 7:11 asks whether perfection could come through the Levitical priesthood. Hebrews 7:12 notes that when the priesthood is changed, the law must also change. Hebrews 7:24 declares that Jesus' priesthood is permanent because he lives forever. Classical usage includes priesthood, priestly services, and sacrifices. The New Testament use is exclusively in Hebrews' Christological argument, contrasting the temporary, inherited Levitical priesthood with Christ's eternal, superior priesthood after the order of Melchizedek.

(3×) The sense is priesthood as an office, order, or system. All three uses appear in a tightly focused theological argument about the inadequacy of the Levitical system and the superiority of Christ's priesthood. Hebrews 7:11 questions the Levitical priesthood's effectiveness for perfection—if it had been sufficient, why would another priest arise 'after the order of Melchizedek'? Verse 12 treats priesthood change as necessitating legal change—system-level transformation. Verse 24 emphasizes Christ's priesthood as permanent (ἀπαράβατον), contrasting with the temporary tenure of mortal priests. The Spanish and German renderings ('sacerdocio/Priestertum') maintain the institutional sense—an office or order, not individual priests but the priestly system itself. PRIESTHOOD OFFICE

Ἰεσσαί G2421 N-AMS (5×)

Jesse; father of King David, from Bethlehem, an ancestor of Jesus in the messianic line.

Jesse (Hebrew Yishai) was the Bethlehemite father of King David and thus a key figure in the messianic genealogy. He appears in both Matthean and Lukan genealogies of Jesus (Matt 1:5-6; Luke 3:32). Paul quotes Isaiah 11:10 in Rom 15:12—'the root of Jesse will arise to rule the Gentiles'—applying it to Christ. In Acts 13:22, Paul's synagogue sermon recalls how God raised David 'son of Jesse' as king. The French 'Jesse' and German 'Isai' reflect different transliteration traditions of the Hebrew name.

Ἰεφθάε G2422 N-GMS (1×)

Jephthah, the Gileadite judge who delivered Israel from the Ammonites

Jephthah was a judge of Israel whose story appears in Judges 11-12. Born to a prostitute, he was driven from his family but later called back to lead Israel against Ammon. He made a tragic vow to sacrifice whatever first came from his house upon victory, resulting in his daughter's sacrifice. Despite this, he is remembered as a deliverer whom God used. Hebrews 11:32 lists him among the heroes of faith who "through faith conquered kingdoms, enforced justice, obtained promises." The reference focuses on his military deliverance, not his vow. Translations transliterate: "Jephthah" (English), "Jephta" (French/German), connecting to the Judges narrative.

(1×) Hebrews' catalog of faith includes Ἰεφθάε (11:32) among judges and prophets who acted by faith. The historical Jephthah (Judges 11-12) was a Gileadite outcast who became Israel's deliverer from Ammonite oppression, defeating them through faith-driven leadership. His story includes the tragic vow and his daughter's sacrifice, but Hebrews emphasizes his role as God's instrument for justice and victory. The name appears in the genitive, listed with Gideon, Barak, Samson, David, and Samuel. Translations uniformly transliterate: "Jephthah," "Jephta," linking readers to the Judges account of faith-empowered deliverance. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Jeconiah (also Jehoiachin), penultimate king of Judah before Babylonian exile (2 Kings 24-25)

This is the Greek rendering of the Hebrew name יְכָנְיָה (Yekhonyah), referring to the king also known as Jehoiachin who reigned in Judah for only three months before being deported to Babylon in 597 BC. He appears twice in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus (Matt 1:11-12), marking the pivotal transition from the Davidic monarchy to the Babylonian captivity. Matthew strategically positions Jeconiah at the hinge of his three-fold genealogical structure, emphasizing both the rupture of exile and the continuity of messianic promise. The consistency across languages (Spanish Iechonías, French Jéchonias, German Jechonja) reflects the careful transliteration of this historically weighted proper name.

(2×) The personal name of Judah's king who was taken captive to Babylon, appearing exclusively in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus. Both occurrences (Matt 1:11-12) frame the Babylonian exile: verse 11 marks the deportation itself ('Josiah was the father of Jeconiah and his brothers at the time of the exile to Babylon'), while verse 12 traces the post-exilic lineage ('After the exile to Babylon: Jeconiah was the father of Shealtiel'). The name serves as a genealogical fulcrum, dividing Israel's history into pre-exile and post-exile eras. Iesous – Jesus, the Greek form of Hebrew Yehoshua/Joshua, meaning 'Yahweh saves'

Iesous is the Greek rendering of the Hebrew name Yehoshua (Joshua), meaning 'Yahweh saves' or 'Yahweh is salvation.' In the New Testament's 924 occurrences it refers overwhelmingly to Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah, though in a few passages it denotes the Old Testament Joshua (Acts 7:45; Heb 4:8) or Jesus called Justus (Col 4:11). The angel's announcement to Joseph in Matt 1:21 makes the etymology explicit: 'you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins.' The name passes into every language with minimal adaptation – Spanish Jesus, French Jesus, German Jesus – reflecting its status as the most recognized proper name in human history.

(924×) The Greek form of Hebrew Yehoshua ('Yahweh saves'), used primarily for Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah and Son of God, whose name is theologically interpreted at his birth: 'you shall call his name Jesus, for he will save his people from their sins' (Matt 1:21). With 924 occurrences it is the most frequent proper noun in the New Testament. Cross-lingual evidence shows near-total phonetic preservation – Spanish and German Jesus, French Jesus – confirming a single proper-noun identity. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

ἱκᾰν-ός G2425 Adj-NMS (40×)

Sufficient, considerable, competent, or numerous; an adjective spanning adequacy of persons, greatness of degree, large quantity, and (substantivized) a legal security bond.

The adjective hikanos derives from hikneomai ('to reach, arrive at') and carries the root idea of 'reaching the mark' — being enough, adequate, or up to the task. In the Gospels it frequently describes considerable extent: a 'considerable' crowd (Mark 10:46), a 'long' time (Luke 8:27), 'many' days (Acts 9:23). Yet some of its most memorable appearances convey personal unworthiness — John the Baptist declares himself 'not worthy' to untie Jesus' sandals (Matt 3:11; Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16), and the centurion protests he is 'not fit' for Jesus to enter his house (Matt 8:8; Luke 7:6). The Spanish bastante/suficiente/digno and German genug trace the same range from quantity through quality to moral standing. In one remarkable legal usage (Acts 17:9), the neuter substantive to hikanon becomes a technical term for bail or bond money — sufficiency crystallized into a financial guarantee.

1. considerable, great in degree (15×) Indicating considerable degree, extent, or duration — great in size, intensity, or length of time. In Matthew 28:12 the chief priests give the soldiers 'a considerable sum of money,' and in Luke 8:27 a man had been demon-possessed 'for a considerable time.' Mark 10:46 describes 'a considerable crowd' leaving Jericho with Jesus. The Spanish bastante/grande and French suffisant render the quantitative amplification. This sense extends hikanos beyond mere adequacy into the territory of impressively large scope. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

2. many, numerous (12×) Quantitative sense indicating a large number of persons or things: many, numerous. In Acts 9:23 'many days had passed,' in Acts 12:12 'many' had gathered to pray, and in Luke 23:9 Herod questioned Jesus 'at considerable length' (literally 'with many words'). The Spanish muchos/bastantes confirms the purely numerical reading. While sense 1 emphasizes degree or magnitude, this sense foregrounds countable plurality — many people, many days, many words. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: many | es: Muchos, a-muchos, bastantes | fr: capable, suffisant | de: genug Luke 8:32; Luke 23:9; Acts 9:23; Acts 9:43; Acts 12:12

3. worthy, fit, competent (9×) Of persons: worthy, fit, competent, or qualified for a role or task. John the Baptist's confession 'I am not worthy to carry his sandals' (Matt 3:11) and the centurion's 'I am not fit for you to come under my roof' (Matt 8:8; Luke 7:6) are among the New Testament's most poignant expressions of humility. The Spanish digno/capaz and the Pauline use in 2 Corinthians 2:16 ('who is sufficient for these things?') and 2 Corinthians 3:5 ('not that we are sufficient of ourselves') elevate this sense into the theological register of human inadequacy before divine calling. The word tests whether a person 'reaches' the standard required. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

en: competent, fit, sufficient | es: capaces, digno, suficiente | fr: capable, suffisant | de: genug Matt 3:11; Matt 8:8; Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; Luke 7:6

4. sufficient, enough (3×) Sufficient or enough in quantity or degree to meet a particular need. In Luke 22:38 the disciples say 'here are two swords' and Jesus replies 'it is enough.' Mark 15:15 uses it when Pilate, 'wishing to satisfy the crowd,' releases Barabbas. In 2 Corinthians 2:6 the punishment inflicted by the majority is 'sufficient.' The Spanish suficiente and German genug map directly onto this sense of adequacy — neither excess nor deficit, but precisely enough to meet the demand at hand. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH
en: Enough, satisfaction, sufficient | es: Suficiente, suficiente | fr: capable, suffisant | de: genug Mark 15:15; Luke 22:38; 2Cor 2:6

5. bond, security deposit (1×) A substantivized legal-commercial term (to hikanon) meaning a bond, security deposit, or bail. In Acts 17:9 the Thessalonian authorities release Jason and the others only after 'taking security' (labontes to hikanon) from them. The Spanish fianza ('bail/surety') precisely captures the legal technicality. This is a specialized outgrowth of the core meaning: what is 'sufficient' to guarantee an obligation becomes, in legal parlance, the guarantee itself. Latin translations used satis dare ('to give surety'), confirming the juridical register. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

ἱκᾰν-ότης G2426 N-NFS (1×)

sufficiency, competence, fitness; adequacy or qualification for a task

The noun ἱκανότης denotes sufficiency, competence, or fitness for a purpose—having adequate ability or qualification. It can mean either a sufficient quantity or sufficient quality/capability. In 2 Corinthians 3:5, Paul denies that the apostles have competence "from themselves," asserting instead that "our sufficiency is from God." The word emphasizes adequacy or qualification for the apostolic ministry of the new covenant. Classical sources use it for fitness or adequacy in various contexts. Translations render it "sufficiency" (English), "suficiencia" (Spanish), "capacité" (French), capturing both the sense of adequacy and competence.

(1×) Paul declares that apostolic ἱκανότης—competence or sufficiency—comes from God, not self (2 Cor 3:5). The noun denotes adequacy, fitness, or qualification for a task. In context, it refers to competence to minister the new covenant: the apostles aren't self-sufficient but God-qualified. Classical usage includes both quantitative sufficiency (enough of something) and qualitative competence (fitness for purpose). Here the emphasis is qualitative: ministerial capability comes from divine enabling. Translations render "sufficiency," "suficiencia," "capacité," "Tuchtigkeit," all emphasizing adequacy and competence sourced in God. POWER AND MIRACLES to make sufficient, qualify, enable, empower (conferring adequacy or competency for a task or role)

This verb describes the divine act of making someone sufficient, qualified, or capable for a task they could not accomplish on their own. Paul uses it twice in key theological contexts to express God's enabling work. The root meaning involves bringing someone from inadequacy to sufficiency, from disqualification to authorization. The multilingual glosses reveal a consistent focus on empowerment: Spanish hizo-capaces ('made capable'), French rendre-capable ('render capable'), German fähig-machen ('make able'). This isn't mere encouragement but actual transformation—God doesn't just declare us qualified, He makes us so by His own power working within us.

(2×) To make someone qualified, sufficient, or competent—especially in contexts of divine enablement for ministry. In 2 Corinthians 3:6, Paul declares that God 'has made us competent as ministers of the new covenant,' explicitly contrasting human insufficiency with divine empowerment. The parallel in Colossians 1:12 shifts the focus to believers generally: the Father 'has qualified you to share in the inheritance of his holy people in the kingdom of light.' The consistent translation pattern across languages (Spanish hizo-suficientes/hizo-capaces, French rendre-capable, German fähig-machen) emphasizes the causative transformation: God is the active agent who confers adequacy where none existed. The LSJ entry's mention of being 'brought to perfection' and 'made complete' adds depth to Paul's usage, suggesting not just minimal qualification but thorough preparation. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

ἱκετ-ήριος G2428 N-AFP (1×)

supplication, earnest prayer; a branch carried by suppliants; entreaty

The noun ἱκετηρία originally designated the olive branch or wreath that Greek suppliants carried as a symbol of their petition, but came to mean the supplication itself—earnest prayer or entreaty. Classical sources describe suppliants holding these branches when approaching gods or authorities. Hebrews 5:7 uses it for Jesus's prayers in the days of his flesh, when "with loud cries and tears he offered up prayers and supplications" to God. The plural emphasizes the intensity and earnestness of his petitions, likely referring to Gethsemane. Translations vary: "supplications" (English), "ruegos" (Spanish), "Flehen" (German), all capturing earnest, humble petition.

(1×) Hebrews describes Jesus offering δεήσεις τε καὶ ἱκετηρίας—prayers and supplications (5:7)—during his incarnate life, with loud cries and tears. The noun ἱκετηρία literally meant the olive branch held by suppliants, then extended to the supplication itself—earnest entreaty, fervent petition. The context evokes Gethsemane's agonized prayers. Classical usage associated ἱκετηρίαι with suppliants approaching gods or rulers, emphasizing humility and urgency. The translations reflect earnest petition: "supplications," "ruegos," "Flehen," marking the intensity of Jesus's human prayers to the Father who could save him from death. LAMENTATION AND MOURNING

moisture, dampness; liquid content or humidity in soil or organic matter

The noun ἰκμάς denotes moisture or dampness—liquid present in soil, plants, or bodies. Classical authors used it for bodily fluids (sweat, blood), plant sap, and soil moisture. Luke 8:6 uses it in the parable of the sower: seed falling on rock "withered away because it had no moisture" (ἰκμάδα). The lack of moisture in the shallow soil prevented the plant from surviving. The word emphasizes the essential liquid content needed for life and growth. Ancient agricultural and medical texts frequently used ἰκμάς for moisture or fluid. Translations render it "moisture" (English), "humedad" (Spanish), "humidité" (French), the straightforward liquid content.

(1×) The parable's seed on rocky ground withers διὰ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν ἰκμάδα—for lack of moisture (Luke 8:6). The noun denotes dampness or liquid content, here soil moisture essential for plant growth. Classical usage applies ἰκμάς to bodily humors (sweat, blood), plant juices (sap, resin), and soil dampness. The parable's agricultural context emphasizes the necessity of sustained moisture: without it, initial growth fails. All translations converge on "moisture," "humedad," "humidité," the liquid component critical for life. The image illustrates shallow reception of the word without the depth needed to sustain faith under trial. FLOWING WATER

Iconium; an ancient city in the province of Galatia, an important stop on Paul's missionary journeys.

The name of a major city in the Roman province of Galatia (modern Konya, Turkey), appearing in Acts as a key location on Paul's first missionary journey. Paul and Barnabas arrived there after being driven from Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:51), preached with great effect in the synagogue (Acts 14:1), but eventually fled persecution to Lystra and Derbe (Acts 14:19, 21). Timothy's good reputation in that region is noted in Acts 16:2, and Paul later recalls his sufferings at Iconium in 2 Tim 3:11. The Spanish 'Iconio' represents the standard Latinized form of the name.

Ikonion (6×) Iconium (Ikonion), the ancient city in south-central Asia Minor in the Roman province of Galatia, corresponding to modern Konya in Turkey. It was an important urban center on the Via Sebaste trade route and a significant stop on Paul's first missionary journey. Paul and Barnabas preached boldly in its synagogue (Acts 14:1), faced both Jewish and Gentile opposition (Acts 14:2-5), and returned to strengthen the disciples there (Acts 14:21). ἱλᾰρός G2431 Adj-AMS (1×) cheerful, joyful, glad; having a bright or merry disposition

The adjective ἱλαρός describes someone cheerful, glad, or merry in disposition—bright-spirited rather than gloomy or reluctant. Classical sources use it for cheerful light, gracious demeanor, or glad tidings. Paul quotes a principle in 2 Corinthians 9:7: "God loves a cheerful giver" (ἱλαρὸν δότην). The word emphasizes not just the act of giving but the spirit—joyful, willing generosity without grudging or compulsion. The attitude matters as much as the action. Translations render it "cheerful" (English), "alegre" (Spanish), "joyeux" (French), capturing the glad-hearted willingness that should characterize Christian generosity.

(1×) Paul declares that θεὸς ἱλαρὸν δότην ἀγαπᾷ—God loves a cheerful giver (2 Cor 9:7). The adjective ἱλαρός describes someone glad-hearted, merry, willing—the opposite of grudging or compelled. The saying emphasizes that generosity's spirit matters: giving joyfully, not under constraint. Classical usage applies ἱλαρός to cheerful light, gracious disposition, or glad news. The context contrasts cheerful giving with reluctance or compulsion (v. 7). Translations uniformly render "cheerful," "alegre," "joyeux," "froehlich," the bright-spirited willingness that makes giving pleasing to God. REJOICING AND GREETING

ἱλᾰρότης G2432 N-DFS (1×)

cheerfulness, joy, gladness; the quality of being glad-hearted and generous in spirit

The noun ἱλαρότης denotes cheerfulness, gladness, or joyful disposition—the quality of being bright-spirited and generous-hearted. Romans 12:8 instructs that whoever shows mercy should do so "with cheerfulness" (ἐν ἱλαρότητι). The word emphasizes that acts of mercy and compassion should be performed gladly, not reluctantly or with resentment. The spirit in which ministry is done matters. Classical and Septuagintal usage associates ἱλαρότης with joy and gladness. Translations render it "cheerfulness" (English), "alegría" (Spanish), "joie" (French), "Froehlichkeit" (German), the glad-hearted quality that should characterize Christian service and mercy.

(1×) Paul instructs that the one showing mercy should do so ἐν ἱλαρότητι—with cheerfulness (Rom 12:8). The noun denotes gladness, joy, or cheerful disposition—the quality of acting bright-heartedly rather than grudgingly. Mercy ministry requires not just action but joyful spirit: compassion performed gladly, not resentfully. Classical sources use ἱλαρότης for gaiety and cheerfulness; LXX employs it for joy. The context lists various ministries (prophecy, service, teaching, exhortation, giving, leading, showing mercy), each to be exercised with proper spirit. Translations consistently render "cheerfulness," "alegría," "joie," the glad-hearted quality befitting merciful service. JOY AND EXULTATION

to propitiate, make atonement, show mercy (appeasing God's wrath or securing His favor through sacrifice)

This verb carries the weighty sense of appeasing divine wrath or securing divine favor, rooted in ancient cultic practice. The classical Greek usage involves offering sacrifices to appease the gods (Homer: 'with libations and burnt offerings'), and this sacrificial framework carries into the New Testament. Luke and Hebrews employ the term in dramatically different contexts—one a tax collector's desperate plea for mercy, the other Christ's high-priestly work of atonement. The multilingual evidence (Spanish propiciar/sé-propicio, French être-propice, German sühnen) captures both relational dimensions: propitiation (satisfying divine justice) and mercy (securing divine favor). These aren't contradictory but complementary aspects of reconciliation.

(2×) To make propitiation, atone for sin, or show mercy—securing divine favor through acknowledgment of guilt and appeal to God's character. Luke 18:13 presents the tax collector beating his breast and crying 'God, have mercy on me, a sinner' (ἱλάσθητί μοι), using the verb in its relational sense: a plea for God to be propitious, to turn away wrath and extend favor. Hebrews 2:17 employs the same verb in a cultic-theological framework: Christ became our high priest 'to make atonement for the sins of the people,' satisfying divine justice through His sacrifice. The German gloss sühnen ('to atone/expiate') captures the sacrificial dimension, while Spanish sé-propicio ('be propitious/favorable') preserves the relational appeal. The LSJ entry's references to appeasing gods 'with libations and burnt offerings' illuminate the sacrificial background that Hebrews makes explicit in Christ's atoning work. MERCY AND COMPASSION

atoning sacrifice that removes sin and reconciles; propitiation

In classical usage, this term denoted any means of appeasing divine wrath. In the New Testament, it carries the profound theological weight of Christ's atoning sacrifice. John uses it twice in his first epistle to describe Jesus as the one who turns away God's righteous anger against sin. The cross-linguistic evidence shows remarkable consistency: propitiation in English and Spanish, with German emphasizing atonement (Sühnung). Both occurrences in 1 John (2:2, 4:10) present Christ himself as the sacrifice that satisfies divine justice while demonstrating divine love.

(2×) The atoning sacrifice that removes sin's guilt and restores relationship between God and humanity. Both New Testament uses appear in 1 John, where the apostle presents Jesus as the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (2:2) and emphasizes that God's love is demonstrated in sending his Son as this atoning sacrifice (4:10). The multilingual glosses uniformly point to the propitiatory function—turning away wrath through sacrifice—a concept rooted in Old Testament sin offerings but here fulfilled definitively in Christ. ATONEMENT EXPIATION place or means of atonement; the mercy seat on the ark, or an atoning sacrifice

Originally an adjective meaning "propitiatory," this word can refer to the golden cover of the ark of the covenant where God's presence dwelt and where blood was sprinkled on the Day of Atonement. It appears twice in the New Testament with distinct but related meanings. In Hebrews 9:5, it clearly denotes the physical mercy seat in the tabernacle's Most Holy Place. In Romans 3:25, Paul uses it metaphorically of Christ whom God presented as an atoning sacrifice. The German Sühneort ("place of atonement") captures the Hebrews reference, while Spanish and French emphasize the propitiatory function for both contexts.

(2×) Can denote either the physical mercy seat (the gold-covered lid of the ark where atonement was made annually) or the means of propitiation itself. The Hebrews 9:5 occurrence straightforwardly describes the Old Testament tabernacle furniture, while Romans 3:25 employs it in a revolutionary way: God has publicly set forth Christ as the new "mercy seat," the place where divine justice and mercy meet. The cross-linguistic evidence from Romance and Germanic languages consistently highlights both the locative ("place of atonement") and functional ("propitiation") aspects of this rich theological term. ATONEMENT EXPIATION

propitious, merciful, gracious; used of God showing favor or in deprecation

An adjective describing gods or persons as favorably disposed, gracious, or merciful. In classical Greek, it was commonly used in prayers asking for divine favor. The New Testament employs it in two striking contexts. In Matthew 16:22, Peter uses it in an oath formula—"God be merciful to you!" or "Never, Lord!"—when rebuking Jesus for predicting his death. In Hebrews 8:12, it appears in a quotation from Jeremiah describing God's covenant promise to be merciful toward iniquities. The multilingual glosses range from "propitious" and "gracious" to simply "merciful," all pointing to favorable disposition rather than harsh judgment.

(2×) Expressing divine or human mercy, graciousness, and favorable disposition. Peter's use in Matthew 16:22 ("Ἵλεώς σοι") is idiomatic—essentially "May God be gracious to you (by preventing this!)"—reflecting the classical deprecatory formula. The Hebrews 8:12 citation from the new covenant promise uses the term for God's merciful forgiveness of sins. Spanish distinguishes "propicio" (favorable, propitious) from "misericordioso" (merciful), while French and German emphasize mercy and graciousness. The term fundamentally describes one who is favorably inclined rather than hostile or punitive. GRACE AND COMPASSION

Ἰλλυρικόν G2437 N-GNS (1×)

Illyricum, a region along the Adriatic coast (modern Balkans)

Illyricum was a Roman province along the eastern Adriatic coast, encompassing parts of modern Albania, Croatia, Bosnia, and Montenegro. Romans 15:19 mentions it as the western extent of Paul's missionary travels: "from Jerusalem and all the way around to Illyricum I have fulfilled the ministry of the gospel." Whether Paul actually entered Illyricum or only reached its borders is debated, but it marks the geographical scope of his work. The region represented the northwestern frontier of his mission field. Translations transliterate: "Illyricum" (English), "Illyrie" (French), "Illyrien" (German), the standard geographical designation.

(1×) Paul describes his missionary scope from Jerusalem ἄχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ—as far as Illyricum (Rom 15:19). The region designates the Roman province along the eastern Adriatic, northwest of Macedonia—the western frontier of Paul's documented travels. Whether he actually preached in Illyricum or merely reached its borders is unclear from the text, but it defines the arc of his mission: from Jerusalem through Asia Minor and Macedonia to the Adriatic coast. Translations uniformly use the geographical name: "Illyricum," "Illyrie," "Illyrien," the northwestern boundary of his gospel proclamation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἱμάς G2438 N-AMS (4×)

A leather strap or thong; used of sandal laces and binding straps.

A simple but evocative word for a leather strap or thong, this noun appears most memorably in the Baptist's declaration of unworthiness: 'I am not worthy to stoop down and untie the strap of his sandals' (Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27). The humble sandal-strap becomes a powerful symbol of the immeasurable gap between the forerunner and the Coming One. In Acts 22:25 the same word describes the leather thongs with which Roman soldiers bound Paul for flogging. Spanish 'correa,' French 'courroie/lacet,' and German 'Riemen' all denote utilitarian leather strips.

(4×) A leather strap or thong, used in the New Testament for two distinct objects: the lace or tie of a sandal and the binding straps used in Roman punishment. The Synoptic Gospels and John all record the Baptist's confession that he is unworthy to untie the ἱμάς of the Messiah's sandal (Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27), making the lowly sandal-strap an icon of supreme humility. In Acts 22:25 Paul invokes his Roman citizenship as soldiers stretch him out with ἱμᾶσιν for scourging. French distinguishes 'lacet' (lace) from 'courroie' (strap), but the Greek word covers both uses of cut leather. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to clothe, dress; to be clothed or dressed (passive)

A straightforward verb meaning to furnish with clothing or to be clothed. In both New Testament occurrences, it appears in the passive participle form, describing the dramatic transformation of the Gerasene demoniac after Jesus healed him. The parallel accounts in Mark 5:15 and Luke 8:35 use this word to emphasize that the man who had been naked and violent was now "clothed and in his right mind." The multilingual evidence is remarkably simple and consistent: "clothed" in English, "vestido" in Spanish, "vêtu" in French. The term carries no metaphorical weight here—it's a concrete description of physical clothing that underscores the completeness of the man's restoration.

(2×) To be dressed or clothed, especially describing someone who has been provided with garments. Both Gospel uses refer to the same incident: the formerly demon-possessed man whom Jesus healed is now "clothed" (ἱματισμένον), sitting calmly at Jesus' feet. This physical detail serves as a powerful indicator of restoration from chaos to order, from shame to dignity. The Greek root relates to ἱμάτιον (outer garment), and the passive voice emphasizes that he has been clothed—presumably by compassionate bystanders or disciples after the demons left him. CLOTHING AND DRESS

ἱμάτιον G2440 N-DNS (61×)

An outer garment or cloak; more broadly, clothing or garments in general, often used in the plural for one's clothes.

The Greek ἱμάτιον originally denoted the rectangular outer cloak worn over the tunic (χιτών), but New Testament usage extends it to clothing in general. When a woman touches Jesus' garment (Matt 9:20) or crowds spread their garments on the road (Matt 21:8), the plural ἱμάτια simply means 'clothes.' Yet when Jesus instructs not to go back for one's ἱμάτιον (Matt 24:18) or when the soldiers divide his outer robe (John 19:23-24), the specific outer cloak is in view. Korean 겉옷 ('outer garment') and Arabic رداء ('mantle') preserve this distinction where English often blurs it.

1. garment or clothing (general) (54×) Clothing or garments in a general, non-specific sense, frequently appearing in the plural to mean 'clothes' or 'what one wears.' This is the dominant usage across 54 occurrences. Spanish 'vestidos/vestiduras,' French 'vêtement,' and German 'Kleider' all render this generically. Key passages include the woman touching Jesus' garments (Matt 9:20), old garments receiving new patches (Matt 9:16), and crowds spreading clothes on the road (Matt 21:8). CLOTHING AND DRESS

en: garments | es: mantos, vestidos, vestiduras | fr: vêtement | de: Kleid, Kleider Matt 9:16; Matt 9:20; Matt 9:21; Matt 14:36

2. outer cloak or robe (7×) The specific outer cloak or mantle worn over the tunic (χιτών), a garment that could be removed, seized, or spread. In Matt 5:40, Jesus contrasts the χιτών (inner tunic) with the ἱμάτιον (outer cloak), making the distinction explicit. Korean 겉옷 and Arabic رداء accurately capture this specificity. Blind Bartimaeus throwing off his cloak (Mark 10:50) and the instruction not to return for one's ἱμάτιον from the field (Mark 13:16) both highlight this as a discrete, removable outer garment. CLOTHING AND DRESS

ἱμᾰτισμός G2441 N-DMS (6×)

Clothing, apparel; a collective term for garments worn, especially in contexts of outward appearance and wealth.

A general term for clothing or apparel, himatismos refers to what a person wears as an ensemble rather than a single garment. In the Gospels it appears in striking contrasts: the dazzling white clothing of the transfigured Jesus (Luke 9:29), the splendid apparel of the wealthy (Luke 7:25), and the garments divided by soldiers at the crucifixion (Matt 27:35; John 19:24). Paul uses it when disclaiming desire for anyone's silver, gold, or clothing (Acts 20:33). The multilingual evidence consistently renders it as a collective noun – Spanish 'ropa/vestimenta,' French 'vetement,' German 'Kleidung' – underscoring its scope as wardrobe rather than a single piece.

clothing, garments (6×) Clothing or apparel considered as a whole – the garments a person wears, viewed collectively. Used across varied NT contexts: the luxurious dress of courtiers (Luke 7:25), the radiant transformation of Jesus' appearance (Luke 9:29), the soldiers' division of Jesus' garments fulfilling Psalm 22:18 (Matt 27:35; John 19:24), and Paul's declaration of material independence (Acts 20:33). ἱμείρω G2442 V-PPM/P-NMP (1×) to long for, desire earnestly, yearn for; to have affectionate longing

The verb ἱμείρω (and its variant ὁμείρομαι) means to long for, yearn for, or desire intensely—often with affectionate or passionate longing. Classical poetry uses it for desire, love, or intense wish. 1 Thessalonians 2:8 employs the participle to express Paul's deep affection: "So, being affectionately desirous of you, we were ready to share with you not only the gospel but also our own lives." The verb conveys warm, personal longing—pastoral affection beyond mere duty. Translations vary in how they render this rare word: "longing" (English), "anhelando" (Spanish), "sich sehnen" (German), all emphasizing earnest desire and affectionate yearning.

(1×) Paul describes apostolic ministry with the participle ὁμειρόμενοι—longing for you (1 Thess 2:8). The verb (variant of ἱμείρω) denotes affectionate yearning, earnest desire, warm longing. Classical poetry employs it for passionate desire or love. Paul's usage emphasizes the personal, affectionate dimension of ministry: not mere professional duty but heart-level longing for the Thessalonians' wellbeing, willingness to share life itself. The word is rare (hapax in NT), chosen for its emotional warmth. Translations render "longing," "anhelando," "sich sehnen," capturing the earnest affection that characterized Paul's pastoral relationship. DESIRE AND COVETING

ἵνα G2443 Conj (671×)

So that, in order that (purpose/result conjunction); rarely as interrogative 'why?' with ti.

The most common purpose conjunction in the New Testament, hina introduces clauses expressing intention or result — 'so that Scripture might be fulfilled' (Matt 1:22). German damit, French afin que, and Spanish para que all capture this purposive force with remarkable consistency across 665 occurrences. In six rare instances, however, hina pairs with ti to form the interrogative hina ti ('why? for what purpose?'), echoing the Hebrew lammah. Jesus' cry from the cross, 'hina ti me egkatelipes?' (Matt 27:46), is the most memorable example of this distinct construction.

1. so that, in order that (purpose/result) (665×) Purpose or result conjunction meaning 'so that' or 'in order that,' introducing subordinate clauses of divine intent, human aim, or consequential outcome. Overwhelmingly dominant at 665 occurrences, rendered damit (Ger.), afin que (Fra.), para que (Spa.). Central to Johannine theology: 'that whoever believes in him should not perish' (John 3:16; Matt 1:22). PURPOSE CONJUNCTION

2. why? (interrogative, with τί) (6×) Interrogative adverb 'why? for what purpose?' formed by combining hina with ti (hina ti = 'in order that what?'). A distinct construction functioning as a question word, not a purpose clause. Found in Jesus' Psalm 22 quotation on the cross (Matt 27:46) and in Acts 4:25 quoting Psalm 2. Spanish Por qué and the shift from purposive to interrogative mark this as a separate lexical function. INTERROGATIVE PRONOUNS in order that, so that, that (conjunction of purpose or result); where (relative adverb)

Primarily a conjunction introducing purpose ('in order that'), result ('so that'), or content clauses ('that'). Originally a local adverb meaning 'where' or 'in which place' in Homer, by classical Attic it grammaticalized into the dominant purpose marker. The New Testament overwhelmingly uses ἵνα for purpose and result: 'God sent his Son that the world might be saved,' 'I write these things that you may know.' Some modern scholars detect Semitic influence in certain ἵνα constructions. The word pairs with the subjunctive mood to express intention, divine plan, and desired outcomes—making it theologically loaded in texts describing God's redemptive purposes.

Ἰόππη G2445 N-AFS (10×)

Joppa — the Mediterranean port city (modern Jaffa/Yafo) central to the Cornelius conversion narrative

The proper noun Ἰόππη (Ioppe) designates Joppa, the ancient Mediterranean port city on the coast of Palestine (modern Jaffa/Yafo, now part of Tel Aviv). All ten NT occurrences fall within Acts 9-11, anchoring two pivotal narratives: the raising of Tabitha/Dorcas (Acts 9:36-43) and the conversion of Cornelius. Peter resides in Joppa at the house of Simon the tanner and there receives his vision of the sheet with unclean animals (Acts 10:5-8, 32; 11:5, 13). Joppa thus becomes the geographic hinge where the gospel first opens to the Gentiles. Spanish 'Jope,' Arabic ﻳﺎﻓﺎ, Hindi याफा, and Korean 욥바 all preserve the ancient name.

(10×) The Mediterranean port city of Joppa (modern Jaffa/Yafo), located on the Palestinian coast. In Acts it serves as the setting for Peter's miracle of raising Tabitha from death (Acts 9:36-43), his stay with Simon the tanner (Acts 9:43; 10:6, 32), and his rooftop vision that declared all foods clean (Acts 10:5-8; 11:5, 13). Joppa functions as the geographic and narrative bridge between the Jewish and Gentile missions, since from here Peter departs for Cornelius's house in Caesarea. The city was already known from the OT as Jonah's port of departure (Jonah 1:3). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

The Jordan; the principal river of Palestine, site of John's baptism and key biblical events.

Iordanēs is the Greek form of Hebrew Yardēn, the river that runs from the Sea of Galilee southward to the Dead Sea. In the NT the Jordan is primarily the setting of John the Baptist's ministry: crowds from Jerusalem and all Judea came out to be baptized in its waters (Matt 3:5–6), and Jesus himself came from Galilee to be baptized there (Matt 3:13). The river also serves as a geographical boundary marker — 'beyond the Jordan' (Matt 4:15, 25; 19:1) designates the Transjordan region. Its OT echoes — Israel's crossing under Joshua, Elijah and Elisha's miracles — lend it deep symbolic resonance as a place of transition and divine encounter.

(15×) The Jordan River, Palestine's principal watercourse flowing from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. In the NT it appears chiefly as the site of John the Baptist's baptismal ministry (Matt 3:5–6; Mark 1:5) and of Jesus' own baptism (Matt 3:13; Mark 1:9). Also functions as a geographic boundary marker, with 'beyond the Jordan' denoting the Transjordan region (Matt 4:15, 25; 19:1). ἰός G2447 N-GMS (3×) rust, corrosion; poison, venom; destructive or corrupting substance

This noun has two distinct but related meanings: rust or corrosion on metal, and poison or venom from serpents. Romans 3:13 quotes Psalm 140, 'the poison of asps is under their lips,' describing human speech as venomous. James 3:8 calls the tongue 'full of deadly poison,' extending the venom metaphor. James 5:3 speaks literally of rust: 'your gold and silver have rusted, and their rust will be a witness against you.' Classical usage includes rust on iron, verdigris on copper, and patina on bronze. The word's dual sense—corrosion that destroys metals and venom that kills—makes it apt for describing anything with destructive, corrupting power.

(3×) The single sense encompasses corrosive or poisonous substances, whether literal (rust on metal) or metaphorical (venomous speech). James uses both: literal rust witnessing against hoarded wealth (5:3) and metaphorical poison describing the tongue's deadly potential (3:8). Romans quotes the psalm about serpent venom under the lips of the wicked. The Spanish glosses distinguish 'veneno' (poison) and 'óxido' (rust), while German has simply 'Gift' (poison). The conceptual unity is destructive substance—rust destroys material wealth, venom destroys life, and slanderous speech destroys relationships and reputations. Whether corroding metal or corrupting flesh, the word denotes something that damages, defiles, or destroys what it contacts. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Ἰούδα G2448 N-GMS (8×)

Judah; a personal or tribal name (genitive form) referring to the patriarch, the tribe, or the territory of Judah

The genitive form of Ioudas (Judah), appearing in contexts that invoke the patriarch and his tribal legacy. Most occurrences reference the tribe or territory of Judah: Micah's prophecy quoted in Matt 2:6 declares Bethlehem 'by no means least among the rulers of Judah'; Luke 1:39 locates Mary's journey 'into the hill country of Judah'; and Heb 7:14 and 8:8 connect Christ's priesthood and the new covenant to 'the tribe of Judah.' One occurrence in Luke 3:26 names an ancestor in Jesus' genealogy as 'Ioda' (a variant personal name in the Lucan genealogical tradition, distinct from the patriarch). Spanish 'Judá' and French 'Juda' transliterate uniformly, while the underlying Hebrew Yehudah ('praise') anchors the name's theological resonance.

1. of Iouda (7×) The patriarch Judah, his tribe, or its territory – used in the genitive to denote origin, belonging, or geographic reference. Matt 2:6 twice names 'the land of Judah' (ge Iouda) in the Bethlehem oracle; Luke 1:39 sets Mary's visitation 'in the hill country of Judah'; Heb 7:14 declares that 'our Lord has sprung from Judah'; and Heb 8:8 quotes Jeremiah's promise of a new covenant 'with the house of Judah.' Spanish 'de Judá' and German 'Juda' preserve the genitival relationship linking persons and places to the patriarch whose name means 'praise.' JUDAH JUDAS NAME

This figure appears only here and is distinct from the patriarch Judah, though the genitive form is morphologically identical. Judea — the southern province of Palestine centered on Jerusalem, heartland of the Jewish nation

Ioudaia designates the geographical region of Judea, the southern heartland of Palestine with Jerusalem as its capital. Across its 44 New Testament occurrences, the name carries both a narrow political sense — the Roman province governed by prefects and procurators — and a broader traditional sense encompassing the ancient tribal territory of Judah. It appears at the very threshold of the Gospel narrative: Jesus is born 'in Bethlehem of Judea' (Matt 2:1, 5), John baptizes 'in the wilderness of Judea' (Matt 3:1), and crowds stream from Judea to hear Jesus (Matt 4:25; Mark 3:7-8). In Acts, Judea becomes the staging ground for the church's expansion outward: 'you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth' (Acts 1:8). The translations uniformly render it: Spanish 'Judea,' French 'Judee,' German 'Judäa.'

Judea (geographical region) (44×) The geographical-political region of Judea (Ioudaia, literally 'the Jewish [land]'), the southern province of Roman Palestine centered on Jerusalem and extending from the Judean hill country to the Dead Sea and Negev. Functions as a narrative setting for the birth of Jesus (Matt 2:1, 5-6), John's baptismal ministry (Matt 3:1; Mark 1:5), and the early church's missionary base (Acts 1:8; 8:1; 9:31). Contrasted with Galilee to the north and Samaria between them, forming the tripartite geographic framework of Luke-Acts. Ἰουδα-ΐζω G2450 V-PNA (1×) to Judaize, to live like Jews, to adopt Jewish customs and practices

The verb Ἰουδαΐζω means to adopt Jewish customs, follow Jewish law, or live according to Jewish practices—especially used of Gentiles taking on Jewish identity or Jews insisting on Jewish observance. Galatians 2:14 records Paul's confrontation with Peter: "If you, though a Jew, live like a Gentile and not like a Jew, how can you compel the Gentiles to Judaize?" The verb critiques requiring Gentile believers to adopt Jewish boundary markers (circumcision, food laws). Translations render it "to Judaize" or "to live like Jews," the practice of imposing Jewish identity requirements on Gentile Christians.

(1×) Paul challenges Peter: πῶς τὰ ἔθνη ἀναγκάζεις Ἰουδαΐζειν; (Gal 2:14)—how can you compel Gentiles to Judaize? The verb means to adopt Jewish practices, live according to Jewish customs, or require Jewish identity markers (circumcision, dietary laws, festival observance). The issue is whether Gentile believers must become culturally/legally Jewish to be fully Christian. Paul's rebuke targets the inconsistency: Peter lives like a Gentile when convenient but pressures Gentiles to Judaize. Translations render "to Judaize," "judaizar," "judaisieren," the practice of requiring Jewish observance beyond faith in Christ. JEWISH PERSON

Jewish, pertaining to Jews or Judaism; relating to Jewish customs or identity

The adjective Ἰουδαϊκός describes things Jewish—pertaining to Jewish customs, practices, or identity. It can modify myths, traditions, laws, or ways of life. Titus 1:14 warns against "Jewish myths" (Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις) and commandments of those who reject the truth. The phrase refers to Jewish-influenced false teaching, possibly involving genealogies, speculative traditions, or legal scrupulosity that distracted from the gospel. The adjective marks these teachings as rooted in Jewish tradition rather than apostolic truth. Translations render it "Jewish" (English), "judíos" (Spanish), the straightforward ethnic-religious designation.

(1×) Paul warns Titus against Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις—Jewish myths (Titus 1:14)—and commandments of truth-rejecters. The adjective describes teachings rooted in Jewish tradition: possibly speculative genealogies, halakic disputes, or apocryphal legends being promoted in Crete. The warning targets not Judaism per se but false teachers using Jewish tradition to promote error. The adjective Ἰουδαϊκός simply means "Jewish," pertaining to Jewish customs or teachings. The context clarifies that these particular Jewish-influenced teachings are μῦθοι—myths or fables—distracting from sound doctrine. Translations uniformly render "Jewish," "judíos," "juedisch." JEWISH PERSON

Ἰουδαῖος G2452 Adv (1×)

Jewishly, in a Jewish manner, according to Jewish customs

The adverb Ἰουδαϊκῶς means "in a Jewish manner" or "according to Jewish customs"—living according to Jewish practices and identity markers. Galatians 2:14 contrasts living Jewishly with living like Gentiles: Paul confronts Peter for living ἐθνικῶς (like a Gentile) rather than Ἰουδαϊκῶς, yet compelling Gentiles to Judaize. The adverb describes a lifestyle pattern defined by Jewish boundary markers—circumcision, dietary laws, Sabbath observance, etc. The issue is whether these practices are required for Christian identity. Translations render it "like Jews" or "Jewishly," describing the manner of life according to Torah observance.

(1×) Paul's confrontation asks: εἰ σὺ Ἰουδαῖος ὑπάρχων ἐθνικῶς καὶ οὐχὶ Ἰουδαϊκῶς ζῇς (Gal 2:14)—if you, being a Jew, live like a Gentile and not Jewishly. The adverb Ἰουδαϊκῶς describes living according to Jewish customs: keeping dietary laws, observing festivals, maintaining purity codes. Peter had been eating with Gentiles (living ἐθνικῶς) until the circumcision party arrived, then withdrew (reverting to Ἰουδαϊκῶς). Paul exposes the inconsistency: if Peter doesn't live Jewishly, why compel Gentiles to? Translations render "like Jews," "judaicamente," "juedisch," the adverbial manner of Torah-observant living. JEWISH PERSON

Ἰουδαῖος G2453 Adj-DFS (195×)

Jewish person; Judea — an adjective denoting Jewish identity, used substantively for a Jew or geographically for the region of Judea.

In the New Testament, Ioudaios identifies someone as belonging to the Jewish people — ethnically, religiously, or both. It appears nearly 200 times, especially in John's Gospel where it often designates the Jerusalem leadership in contrast to Jesus and his followers. The word carries rich theological weight: these are God's covenant people through whom salvation comes (John 4:22). In one instance (John 3:22), the feminine form refers geographically to Judea, the ancestral homeland. Spanish and German translations consistently render the substantive as 'Judío/Juden,' while the geographic sense receives distinct treatment ('Judea/Judäa'), confirming the two-sense distinction.

1. Jewish person, Jew (194×) A person identified as Jewish by ethnicity, religion, or covenant membership. Used substantively across all cases, numbers, and genders. The near-unanimous cross-linguistic rendering — 'Jews' (eng), 'Judíos' (spa), 'Juif' (fra), 'Juden' (deu) — reflects a stable referent. In John's Gospel especially, the term often narrows to the religious authorities opposing Jesus (John 5:16, 7:1), though it also carries the broader sense of the covenant nation (Rom 1:16; Matt 27:11). JEWISH PERSON

2. Judea, Jewish region (1×) Geographic reference to Judea (hē Ioudaia, sc. gē), the southern region of Palestine associated with the tribe of Judah. At John 3:22, Jesus goes 'into the Judean land' (eis tēn Ioudaian gēn), and Spanish ('Judea') and German ('Judäa') translations distinguish this territorial sense from the ethnic one. This preserves the classical Greek pattern where the feminine adjective with an implied noun (gē) designates a territory. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Judaism, the Jewish religious system and way of life

Judaism refers to the entire Jewish religious system—its laws, traditions, festivals, and way of life rooted in the Torah. Paul uses the term in Galatians to describe his former zealous commitment to the ancestral traditions that he once defended with such passion. The word encompasses both the theological framework and the lived practice of Jewish faith in the first century, including its dietary laws, Sabbath observance, temple worship, and the rich body of rabbinic interpretation that distinguished Jewish identity.

(2×) The Jewish religious system and way of life. Paul uses this term autobiographically in Galatians 1:13-14, contrasting his former extreme zeal for ancestral traditions with his new calling to proclaim Christ among the Gentiles. Multilingual renderings uniformly treat this as the proper designation for the Jewish faith system: English 'Judaism,' Spanish 'Judaísmo,' German 'Judentum'—all recognizing it as the comprehensive term for Jewish religious practice and identity. JEWISH PERSON

Judas / Judah — proper name from Hebrew yehudah, borne by the patriarch, the betrayer, and several others

Ioudas is the Greek form of Hebrew Yehudah ('praised' or 'thanksgiving'), used in the New Testament for at least seven distinct individuals. The patriarch Judah appears in the genealogies (Matt 1:2-3) and the tribal designation 'lion of the tribe of Judah' (Rev 5:5). The most frequent referent is Judas Iscariot, whose name has become virtually synonymous with betrayal in every language — Spanish 'Judas,' French 'Judas,' German 'Judas,' all carrying that somber overtone. Other bearers include Judas son of James the apostle (Luke 6:16; John 14:22), Judas the brother of Jesus (Matt 13:55; Jude 1), Judas of Galilee the rebel (Acts 5:37), Judas called Barsabbas (Acts 15:22), and Judas of Damascus who housed Paul (Acts 9:11).

Judas / Judah (proper name) (37×) The proper name Ioudas (from Hebrew Yehudah), applied to multiple individuals across the NT including the patriarch Judah son of Jacob (Matt 1:2-3; Rev 5:5; 7:5), Judas Iscariot the betrayer (Matt 10:4; 26:14-47; John 13:2, 26-30), Judas son of James the apostle (Luke 6:16; John 14:22; Acts 1:13), Judas the Lord's brother (Matt 13:55; Jude 1), Judas of Galilee (Acts 5:37), Judas Barsabbas (Acts 15:22, 27), and Judas of Damascus (Acts 9:11). The geographic and tribal use — 'land of Judah' (Matt 2:6), 'tribe of Judah' (Heb 7:14) — preserves the patriarchal connection. JUDAH JUDAS NAME

Ἰουλία G2456 N-AFS (1×)

Julia, a Christian woman in Rome greeted by Paul

Julia is mentioned in Romans 16:15 among the believers Paul greets in Rome. She is listed alongside Philologus (possibly her husband or brother), Nereus and his sister, and Olympas. The name was common in Rome, particularly among slaves and freedwomen of the imperial household (gens Julia). Paul's greetings reveal the network of Christian community in Rome before his arrival. Nothing further is known about Julia beyond this reference. Translations transliterate the name: "Julia" (English/German), "Julie" (French), treating it as a proper noun without interpretive addition.

(1×) Paul's concluding greetings include Ἰουλίαν (Rom 16:15), a woman in the Roman Christian community. She appears with Philologus (likely related), Nereus and his sister, and Olympas—possibly a household or cell group. The name Julia was common in Rome, especially among those connected to the gens Julia (the imperial family). These greetings reveal the composition of early Roman Christianity: diverse, including both Jews and Gentiles, slaves and free. Translations simply transliterate: "Julia," "Julie," with no additional information available beyond her inclusion in Paul's greetings. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Ἰούλιος G2457 N-DMS (2×)

Julius, a Roman centurion who guarded Paul during his voyage to Rome

Julius was a centurion of the Augustan cohort entrusted with escorting Paul to Rome for trial. Luke's account highlights his humane treatment of the apostle, allowing him to visit friends in Sidon for care (Acts 27:3). The name, derived from the prominent Roman gens Julia, signals his status within the imperial military structure. His measured authority during the perilous voyage contrasts with the ship's crew and reflects the providential care surrounding Paul's journey.

(2×) The centurion appears twice by name in Acts 27, where Luke emphasizes his kindness (φιλανθρώπως, 27:3) toward Paul. The multilingual evidence preserves the Greek transliteration alongside Latin-influenced renderings (French 'Julius', Spanish/German forms), marking this as a proper Roman name rather than a title or descriptor. His role as military escort places him at the intersection of Roman authority and divine protection over Paul's mission. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Ἰουνίας G2458 N-AFS (1×)

Junias (or Junia), a fellow worker and relative of Paul, notable among the apostles

Junias appears in Romans 16:7, where Paul greets Andronicus and Junias (or Junia) as his relatives (συγγενεῖς, fellow Jews) and fellow prisoners who are "well known among the apostles." Whether the name is masculine (Junias) or feminine (Junia) is debated; the accusative form Ἰουνιᾶν could be either. Many early interpreters understood it as a woman's name (Junia was common; Junias was rare). If feminine, Junia is a female apostle, imprisoned for the faith and recognized by the apostolic circle. The phrase "notable among the apostles" indicates their significant reputation in the early church.

(1×) Paul greets Ἰουνιᾶν (Rom 16:7) with Andronicus—kinsmen, fellow prisoners, "notable among the apostles," believers before Paul. The accusative Ἰουνιᾶν could be masculine (Junias) or feminine (Junia). Early church fathers predominantly read it as feminine; Junia was a common Roman name, Junias extremely rare. If Junia, she is a female apostle (or recognized by apostles), imprisoned for Christ, esteemed in the early church. The phrase ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις suggests either membership in or recognition by the apostolic circle. Translations render "Junias" or "Junia," often noting the gender ambiguity. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Ἰοῦστος G2459 N-GMS (3×)

Justus, Roman surname given to three New Testament figures

Justus appears as the surname of three different men in the New Testament. Acts 1:23 identifies Joseph called Barsabbas, who was surnamed Justus, one of two candidates to replace Judas. Acts 18:7 mentions Titius Justus, a God-fearer in Corinth whose house Paul used after leaving the synagogue. Colossians 4:11 sends greetings from Jesus who is called Justus, a fellow worker for the kingdom. The Latin name means 'just' or 'righteous,' and may have been adopted by Jewish converts or given as a second name for Gentile contexts. The three men share only the name, representing different aspects of early church life—leadership selection, house church hosting, and Pauline co-workers.

(3×) The single sense identifies the cognomen or surname shared by three distinct individuals. Acts 1:23's Joseph Justus represents early church governance—choosing apostolic leadership through prayerful discernment and lot-casting. Acts 18:7's Titius Justus represents the God-fearer bridge community and house church movement—his home became the base for Paul's extended Corinthian ministry. Colossians 4:11's Jesus Justus represents Jewish Christian co-workers in Paul's missionary band. The multilingual renderings uniformly transliterate, recognizing this as a proper name. The shared name across different men shows the common practice of Latin names in Hellenistic Judaism and early Christianity. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

horsemen, cavalry soldiers who ride horses into battle or for rapid transport

The term denotes mounted soldiers, distinct from infantry, valued for mobility and tactical advantage. In Acts 23, Claudius Lysias deploys an extraordinary military escort—200 soldiers, 70 horsemen, and 200 spearmen—to protect Paul from assassination during his transfer to Caesarea (23:23). The scale of this detachment, especially the cavalry contingent, underscores the seriousness of the threat and the commander's determination to deliver Paul safely to the governor Felix. By verse 32, the infantry returns while the horsemen continue, suggesting the cavalry alone sufficed for the final leg of the journey.

(2×) Both occurrences in Acts describe Roman cavalry deployed for Paul's protection. The LSJ lexicon traces usage from classical chariot-fighters through aristocratic bodyguards to professional cavalry units. The Spanish 'jinetes' and French 'cavalier' capture the mounted warrior concept, while the context shows these ἱππεῖς functioning as elite escort troops within Roman military logistics, capable of sustained rapid movement across terrain. HORSEMAN CAVALRYMAN

pertaining to horses or cavalry; of horsemen or mounted troops

The adjective ἱππικός relates to horses, horsemen, or cavalry—equestrian or pertaining to mounted forces. Revelation 9:16 uses it in describing John's vision: "The number of the mounted troops was twice ten thousand times ten thousand" (τὸ ἀριθμὸν τοῦ στρατεύματος τοῦ ἱππικοῦ). The phrase describes an enormous cavalry force, part of the apocalyptic imagery of judgment. Classical usage applies ἱππικός to horses, horsemen, equestrian training, or cavalry units (as opposed to infantry). The translations consistently render it "cavalry" (English), "caballería" (Spanish), "Reiterei" (German), the mounted military force.

(1×) Revelation's sixth trumpet vision includes τὸ ἀρίθμημα τοῦ στρατεύματος τοῦ ἱππικοῦ—the number of the cavalry (9:16): 200 million. The adjective ἱππικός pertains to horses or horsemen, here designating a vast mounted army releasing plagues. Classical usage distinguishes ἱππικός (cavalry, mounted) from πεζός (infantry, foot soldiers). The genitive ἱππικοῦ modifies στρατεύματος (army), specifying cavalry forces. The apocalyptic image emphasizes overwhelming military power under divine judgment. Translations uniformly render "cavalry," "caballería," "Reiterei," the mounted troops in John's vision. HORSEMAN CAVALRYMAN

ἵππος G2462 N-AMP (17×)

Horse; the domesticated equine, especially as associated with warfare and apocalyptic vision.

Hippos is the standard Greek word for horse, and in the New Testament it appears overwhelmingly in the Book of Revelation's apocalyptic visions. The four horsemen ride out on white, red, black, and pale horses (Rev 6:2-8), and a terrifying cavalry of two hundred million appears with horses that have lion-like heads breathing fire and sulfur (Rev 9:7-19). The only occurrence outside Revelation is James 3:3, where a horse's bit illustrates how something small controls something large. French and German both render the word 'Pferde,' while Spanish uses 'caballo' — all pointing to the same familiar animal.

horse (17×) A horse, the domesticated equine animal, used predominantly in apocalyptic and illustrative contexts. In Revelation it appears in the visions of the four horsemen (Rev 6:2, 4, 5, 8), the demonic cavalry (Rev 9:7, 9, 17, 19), and the armies of heaven riding white horses (Rev 19:11, 14, 18, 19, 21). James 3:3 uses the horse and its bit as an analogy for controlling the tongue. The military and visionary associations dominate the NT usage, unlike classical Greek where horses appear in everyday contexts. HORSEMAN CAVALRYMAN

rainbow, the arc of colored light appearing in the sky, often symbolizing divine glory or covenant

This word evokes the brilliant, multicolored bow that appears when sunlight refracts through water droplets. In Revelation, it transcends meteorology to become a symbol of divine majesty and faithfulness. The rainbow around the throne (Rev 4:3) recalls God's covenant with Noah, while the angel 'clothed with a cloud, with a rainbow over his head' (10:1) carries echoes of divine presence and promise. John's vision transforms a natural phenomenon into an emblem of God's unchanging character amid apocalyptic upheaval.

(2×) The two occurrences in Revelation place the rainbow in contexts of theophany and angelic splendor. Classical Greek used ἶρις for both the messenger-goddess Iris and the physical rainbow, as well as the colored iris of the eye—all sharing the quality of radiant, multihued brilliance. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'arco iris', French 'Regenbogen' [German origin], German 'Regenbogen') all point to the celestial arc, reinforcing the apocalyptic imagery of divine glory surrounding the throne and the mighty angel. BOW WEAPON RAINBOW

Ἰσαάκ G2464 N-AMS (20×)

Isaac; the patriarch, son of Abraham and Sarah, child of promise and ancestor of Israel.

The indeclinable Greek form of Hebrew Yitschaq ('he laughs'), naming the long-awaited son born to Abraham and Sarah. In the New Testament Isaac appears in genealogies (Matt 1:2), in Jesus' teaching about the patriarchs at the eschatological banquet (Matt 8:11), and in theological arguments about divine promise versus human effort (Rom 9:10; Gal 4:28). He is the hinge figure between Abraham's faith and Jacob's twelve tribes. Transliterations remain remarkably stable across languages—Spanish 'Isaac,' French 'Isaac,' German 'Isaak'—reflecting the name's deep cross-cultural familiarity.

Isaak (20×) The patriarch Isaac, son of Abraham and Sarah, born according to divine promise. All 20 occurrences refer to this single historical and theological figure, whether in genealogical lists (Matt 1:2), Jesus' reference to the God 'of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob' (Matt 22:32; Mark 12:26), or Paul's argument about the children of promise (Rom 9:10). ἰσ-άγγελος G2465 Adj-NMP (1×)

equal to angels, like angels; having angelic characteristics or status

The adjective ἰσάγγελος (literally "equal to angels") describes someone having angelic qualities or status. Luke 20:36 uses it in Jesus's teaching about the resurrection: those who attain the resurrection "cannot die anymore, for they are equal to angels and are sons of God, being sons of the resurrection." The comparison emphasizes immortality and transformation: resurrected believers will be like angels in that they don't die and don't marry. The word doesn't mean believers become angels but share certain angelic characteristics. Translations render it "like angels" or "equal to angels," preserving the comparison to angelic immortality and nature.

(1×) Jesus teaches that resurrected believers will be ἰσάγγελοι—equal to angels (Luke 20:36). The compound adjective (ἴσος + ἄγγελος) indicates sharing angelic characteristics, specifically immortality: "they cannot die anymore." The context addresses Sadducean questions about marriage in resurrection; Jesus explains resurrected life transcends marriage because, like angels, they are immortal. The comparison is functional, not ontological: not that humans become angels, but that they share immortality and non-marrying existence. Translations render "like angels," "iguales a ángeles," "égal aux anges," the angelic-like status of resurrection life. ANGELS AND MESSENGERS

Ἰσσαχάρ G2466 N-GMS (1×)

Issachar, the ninth son of Jacob and ancestor of one of the twelve tribes of Israel

Issachar was the ninth son of Jacob, born to Leah through her maidservant. His name, derived from the Hebrew meaning 'there is recompense,' became the designation for one of Israel's twelve tribes. In Revelation 7:7, representatives from the tribe of Issachar are numbered among the 144,000 sealed servants, standing as one witness to God's covenant faithfulness across all the tribes.

(1×) This proper name appears in John's vision of the sealed servants from Israel's tribes. The multilingual glosses preserve the Hebrew phonetic form across European languages (Spanish Issachár, French/German Issachar), maintaining the tribal identity even in translation. εἴδω G2467

I know (perfect of εἶδω with present meaning); to have seen and therefore know

The perfect tense of a verb meaning 'to see,' but functioning with present meaning: 'I know' (because I have seen). This is Greek's primary verb for knowledge—not theoretical but experiential, rooted in perception. The full paradigm includes an aorist εἶδον ('I saw') used as past tense for ὁράω, and this perfect οἶδα ('I know') with present force. The pattern reflects Proto-Indo-European roots shared with Latin video and Germanic 'wit.' Biblical writers employ it for knowledge of God, awareness of facts, and recognition of truth. Paul contrasts knowing in part with knowing fully. Jesus asks, 'Do you know what I have done for you?' The verb assumes knowledge comes through sight—or divine revelation that counts as seeing.

εἰμί G2468

I am, you are (present indicative of εἰμί in various persons); simple assertion of being Present indicative forms of the verb 'to be' across persons and dialects. The range includes Aeolic ἔμμι, Doric and Epic variations, standard Attic forms, and Ionic alternates. These forms state simple existence, predication, identity, and location—the backbone of Greek predication. In biblical texts they bear theological weight in Jesus' 'I am' statements, divine self-revelation, apostolic claims, and identity declarations. Every dialect variation reflects regional linguistic history, but the core semantic function remains constant: asserting what is, who someone is, or where something exists. Foundation of all Greek discourse.

ἰσκαριώθ G2469 N-AMS (11×)

Iscariot — surname or epithet of Judas (and once his father Simon), likely meaning 'man of Kerioth'

Ἰσκαριώθ (Iskariōth) is the indeclinable surname or epithet attached to Judas, the disciple who betrayed Jesus. The name likely derives from Hebrew אִישׁ קְרִיּוֹת ('man of Kerioth'), suggesting origin from a town in southern Judah — making Judas possibly the only non-Galilean among the Twelve. The epithet appears in every apostolic list to distinguish this Judas from the other apostle named Judas (Matt 10:4; Mark 3:19; Luke 6:16). It accompanies Judas through his agreement to betray Jesus (Matt 26:14; Mark 14:10; Luke 22:3), and John's Gospel uniquely applies it to Judas' father Simon as well (John 6:71; 12:4; 13:2, 26). The slight variant Ἰσκαριώτης appears in some manuscripts. Spanish 'Iscariote' and Arabic 'إِسْخَرْيُوطِيّ' preserve the identifying epithet.

Iscariot (epithet of Judas) (11×) Iscariot — the distinguishing surname of Judas the betrayer, and once of his father Simon (John 6:71). Probably derived from Hebrew 'man of Kerioth' (אִישׁ קְרִיּוֹת), a town in southern Judah (Josh 15:25), marking Judas as perhaps the only non-Galilean apostle. The epithet appears in every apostolic roster (Matt 10:4; Mark 3:19; Luke 6:16; Acts 1:25 implied) and throughout the betrayal narratives (Matt 26:14; Mark 14:10; Luke 22:3; John 12:4; 13:2, 26). The variant forms Ἰσκαριώθ and Ἰσκαριώτης are purely orthographic. Spanish 'Iscariote' and Hindi 'इस्करियोती' transliterate the name directly. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

ἴσος G2470 Adj-AFS (8×)

Equal, same, or equivalent in measure, quality, or status; denoting parity or correspondence.

An adjective expressing equality or equivalence, ἴσος appears in contexts where parity — whether fair or provocative — is at stake. The laborers in Jesus' vineyard parable complain that the master has made latecomers 'equal' to those who bore the day's heat (Matt 20:12), exposing human resentment at divine generosity. The false witnesses against Jesus at trial cannot produce 'consistent' testimony (Mark 14:56, 59). Most explosively, Jesus is accused of 'making himself equal with God' (John 5:18), and Phil 2:6 speaks of equality with God as something Christ did not grasp at. Spanish igual and French égal preserve both the mathematical and social dimensions of the word.

equal, same, consistent (8×) Equal, equivalent, or consistent in quantity, quality, or status, implying a measured correspondence between two things. The vineyard workers protest that the master has made the latecomers ἴσους — equal — to them (Matt 20:12), exposing the scandal of grace. At Jesus' trial, the false witnesses fail to give ἴσαι (consistent, agreeing) testimony (Mark 14:56, 59), where the sense shades toward 'matching' or 'in agreement.' The most theologically charged usage is John 5:18, where Jesus is accused of making himself ἴσον τῷ θεῷ ('equal with God'), and Phil 2:6, where τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ ('equality with God') frames the great kenosis hymn. Luke 6:34 and Acts 11:17 apply the term to equivalent measure in lending and divine gifting. EQUAL SAME WORTH

equality, fairness, equity; equal proportion or just dealing

This noun denotes equality, fairness, or equitable distribution. Paul uses it three times discussing financial equity in the church. In 2 Corinthians 8:13-14 he explains the principle of equality in giving: 'not that others should be eased and you burdened, but by equality... that your abundance may supply their lack... that there may be equality.' Colossians 4:1 commands masters to give servants 'what is just and equal (or fair),' recognizing mutual obligations. Classical usage includes equality, political justice, proportion in ratios, and fair dealing. The New Testament use focuses on equitable distribution—economic balance in the body of Christ and just treatment in social hierarchies.

(3×) The sense emphasizes fair, equitable distribution and treatment. Paul's 2 Corinthians argument for the Jerusalem collection appeals to equality as a principle: the Corinthians' current abundance should meet others' need, anticipating future reciprocity. This isn't absolute uniformity but balancing abundance and lack across the body. The Colossians use extends equality to social relations—masters owing fairness to slaves, acknowledging their Master in heaven who shows no partiality. The Spanish 'igualdad,' French 'égalité,' and German 'Gleichheit' all point to equality/fairness. The word operates in contexts of distribution and relationship, calling for balance, reciprocity, and justice rather than exploitation or inequality. EQUAL SAME WORTH of equal value, honor, or privilege; sharing the same standing or worth

This compound adjective combines 'equal' with 'honor' or 'value,' describing something or someone sharing equivalent standing. In 2 Peter 1:1, believers receive a faith 'equally precious' (isotimos) with that of the apostles—a stunning claim that the same quality of saving trust is available to all who believe, regardless of their proximity to Jesus during his earthly ministry. The word highlights divine impartiality in distributing spiritual privilege.

(1×) Peter uses this term to describe the democratic nature of saving faith. The Spanish 'de-igual-valor' and German 'gleichwertig' (equal-worth) capture the core semantic of value-equivalence. What the apostles possessed by walking with Jesus, later believers possess through the Spirit—faith of identical quality and honor, removing any hierarchical distinction in access to God. EQUAL SAME WORTH like-minded, of equal soul; sharing the same spirit, disposition, or concern

Literally 'equal-souled,' this adjective describes a rare depth of unity in purpose and affection. Paul uses it uniquely of Timothy in Philippians 2:20, saying he has no one else 'like-minded' who will genuinely care for the Philippians' welfare. In context, Timothy stands in sharp contrast to those who 'seek their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ.' The word commends not mere agreement but aligned hearts.

(1×) Paul's exclusive application of isopsychos to Timothy reveals its strength—it describes someone whose very soul resonates with Paul's own pastoral concern. The Spanish 'de-igual-alma' (of-equal-soul) and German 'gleichgesinnt' (like-minded) both preserve the relational intimacy. This is not organizational alignment but spiritual kinship, where two people care about the same things for the same reasons. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11787 WITH 3 SENSES

Israel – the covenant people, nation, and land; also the patriarch Jacob renamed by God

levels: the patriarch Jacob (rare in NT), the covenant people ('the children of Israel,' Acts 5:21), the national entity ('the house of Israel,' Acts 7:42), and the land ('the land of Israel,' Matt 2:20-21). Paul exploits the term's layered significance, distinguishing 'Israel according to the flesh' (1 Cor 10:18) from 'the Israel of God' (Gal 6:16). Spanish, French, German, and English all retain the name in virtually identical form, a cross-lingual constancy that mirrors the theological continuity between Old and New Testaments.

Israel (nation/people/patriarch) (68×) The Semitic proper noun designating the covenant people of God in the New Testament, encompassing the nation (Matt 2:6; Luke 1:54), the land (Matt 2:20-21), the twelve tribes (Matt 19:28), and by theological extension the eschatological community ('the Israel of God,' Gal 6:16). Paul's distinction between Israel 'according to the flesh' (1 Cor 10:18) and spiritual Israel does not create a separate lexical sense but reflects theological argumentation. Every target language preserves the name unchanged – Israel in Spanish, French, and German – confirming a single proper-noun identity across all 68 occurrences. ISRAEL NATION NAME Israelite — a member of the covenant people of Israel, used as a title of theocratic privilege and national identity.

Israelites is not merely an ethnic label but a title weighted with covenant significance. When Peter addresses the crowds as 'Men, Israelites!' (Acts 2:22, 3:12, 5:35) or Paul identifies himself as an Israelite (Rom 9:4, 11:1; 2 Cor 11:22), the word evokes the entire heritage of divine election, promise, and calling. Jesus's remark about Nathanael — 'Behold, truly an Israelite in whom there is no deceit!' (John 1:47) — plays on this theological resonance, linking the name Israel back to the patriarch who wrestled with God. The term carries more weight than 'Hebrew' (Hebraios) or 'Jew' (Ioudaios), deliberately invoking the sacred covenant relationship.

Israelite (a person of Israel) (9×) A member of the nation of Israel, used as a designation of theocratic privilege and covenant identity rather than mere ethnicity. In the NT, it appears in two main patterns: as a vocative address in public speech ('Men, Israelites!' in Acts 2:22, 3:12, 5:35, 13:16, 21:28) and as a predicate of covenant belonging (Rom 9:4, 11:1; 2 Cor 11:22). Jesus's declaration about Nathanael as 'truly an Israelite' (John 1:47) invokes the patriarch Jacob-Israel, linking the name to spiritual authenticity. Translations across languages (Spanish 'Israelitas,' French 'Israelite,' German 'Israelit') preserve the proper-noun quality, reflecting the term's function as a title of honor rather than a generic ethnic marker. To stand, set, place, cause to stand, stand firm, stop, or establish; spanning physical stance, transitive placement, moral endurance, cessation, and institutional confirmation Histemi is the Greek New Testament's master verb of position and stability, governing everything from where a person physically stands to whether a kingdom endures. Its morphology tells the story: the transitive first aorist (estesa) places and positions, while the intransitive second aorist (esten), perfect (hesteka), and present middle allow persons and things to simply stand. Arabic splits this between waqafa (to stand) and aqama (to set up), exposing the transitive-intransitive divide that Greek encodes through stem alternation. From the devil setting Jesus on the temple pinnacle (Matt 4:5) to Paul's declaration that God's servant 'will be made to stand' (Rom 14:4), histemi anchors the New Testament's theology of divine positioning and human perseverance.

1. stand, be standing (107×) Intransitive: to stand, be standing, or be in a standing position — the core physical-positional sense. Arabic waqafa (to stand) and Korean seo-itda (to be standing) consistently mark static bodily position. The dominant sense (107x), covering crowds standing by the sea (Matt 13:2), workers standing idle in the marketplace (Matt 20:3, 6), and the apocalyptic 'abomination of desolation standing where it should not' (Matt 24:15; Mark 13:14). The perfect tense hestekos ('having taken one's stand') frequently appears as a present-state participle, confirming the stative-resultative meaning. STANDING AND ESTABLISHING en: having-stood, standing | es: de-pie, estando-de-pie, que-está-de-pie | fr: se-tenir, se-tenir-debout | de: stehen, steht Matt 13:2; Matt 16:28; Matt 20:3; Matt 20:6; Matt 24:15

2. set, place, cause to stand (17×) Transitive causative: to set, place, or cause someone or something to stand in a particular position. Arabic aqama (to set up, establish) and Korean se-uda (to make stand) mark the agentive placement. Appears 17 times with a direct object: the devil setting Jesus on the pinnacle (Matt 4:5), Jesus placing a child in the midst (Matt 18:2; Mark 9:36), and the Son of Man separating sheep from goats by setting them on his right and left (Matt 25:33). The first aorist active estesa is the morphological signature of this transitive sense. STANDING AND ESTABLISHING

3. stand firm, endure (15×) Figurative intransitive: to stand firm, remain steadfast, or endure under pressure — moral and spiritual perseverance. Arabic thabata (to stand firm) and Korean gutgeonhi seoda (to stand firm) distinguish this from mere physical position. Appears 15 times, most memorably in Jesus's axiom 'a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand' (Matt 12:25; Mark 3:24-26) and Paul's exhortations to 'stand firm in the faith' (1 Cor 16:13; Eph 6:11, 13-14). Spanish estar firme and the martial imagery of Ephesians 6 confirm the metaphor of maintaining one's ground against assault. STANDING AND ESTABLISHING

4. stop, stand still (7×) Intransitive cessative: to stop, halt, or stand still after motion. Korean meomchuda (to stop, halt) and Spanish detenerse (to stop oneself) distinguish cessation from static standing. Appears 7 times: the star stopping over Bethlehem (Matt 2:9), Jesus stopping on the road (Matt 20:32; Mark 10:49), the funeral bier standing still at Jesus's touch (Luke 7:14), and the hemorrhaging woman's flow of blood ceasing (Luke 8:44). The ingressive-resultative shift from motion to stasis is the defining feature — something was moving and now stands. STANDING AND ESTABLISHING

5. establish, confirm (6×) Abstract transitive: to establish, confirm, uphold, or ratify — used of laws, covenants, and divine purposes. Arabic yuththabitu (to confirm) and Spanish establecer (to establish) mark the institutional-legal register. Appears 6 times: establishing testimony by two or three witnesses (Matt 18:16), God appointing a day of judgment (Acts 17:31), Paul insisting 'we uphold the law' (Rom 3:31), Israel seeking to establish their own righteousness (Rom 10:3), and the Lord's power to make his servant stand (Rom 14:4). The semantic distance from physical standing to institutional confirmation shows the full metaphorical arc of histemi. STANDING AND ESTABLISHING

6. (1×) A transitive commercial sense in Matt 26:15 where the chief priests 'set' or 'weighed out' thirty pieces of silver for Judas. Spanish pesaron ('they weighed') preserves the ancient connection between establishing a weight and fixing a price. This rare usage echoes the LXX rendering of Hebrew sheqal-based idioms and connects to the archaic practice of standing scales to weigh payment. The sense is 'to fix, determine, or weigh out' a sum — a specialized commercial extension of the causative placement meaning. STANDING AND

ἱστορ-έω G2477 V-ANA (1×)
to visit for the purpose of inquiry; to get acquainted with, become informed about
This verb means more than casual visitation—it implies visiting with intent to learn, inquire, or investigate. Classical usage includes examining places, consulting oracles, or seeking information from people. In Galatians 1:18, Paul says he went up to Jerusalem 'to visit' (historēsai) Cephas, spending fifteen days with him. The term suggests Paul's visit had a specific investigative purpose: to become acquainted with the lead apostle while maintaining the independence of his own gospel revelation.

(1×) Paul's careful word choice underscores his argument that his gospel came by revelation, not human instruction. The Spanish 'para-conocer' (in-order-to-know) and German 'besuchen' (visit) both reflect the purposeful nature of the trip. Paul visited Peter not as student to teacher but as one apostle getting acquainted with another, a fifteen-day fact-finding mission that neither compromised his divine commission nor isolated him from the Jerusalem leadership. ἰσχῡρός G2478 Adj-NNS-C (29×)
Strong, mighty, powerful; in the comparative, stronger or mightier; of forces or conditions, severe or intense
An adjective rooted in ischys (strength), describing robust physical or spiritual power. Jesus uses it memorably in his parable of the strong man whose house cannot be plundered unless 'one stronger' binds him first (Matt 12:29) – a picture of the kingdom overcoming Satan's grip. John the Baptist declares that the Coming One is 'mightier than I' (Matt 3:11), and Paul paradoxically insists that 'the weakness of God is stronger than men' (1 Cor 1:25). In a lone metaphorical extension, Luke describes the famine in the far country as 'severe' (Luke 15:14), showing how the word can stretch from persons to impersonal forces. Spanish 'fuerte' and German 'stark' serve as direct equivalents across all three senses.

1. strong, mighty, powerful (22×) Possessing great strength, might, or power in the positive degree, used of persons or abstract forces. Jesus speaks of the 'strong man' who guards his house (Matt 12:29, Mark 3:27), and the wind is described as 'strong' in Matt 14:30. Revelation uses it of a 'mighty angel' (Rev 5:2, 10:1, 18:21). Spanish 'fuerte' and French 'fort' both render this straightforwardly as robust physical or spiritual power. POWER AND ABILITY en: a-strong, mighty, powerful | es: fuerte, fuerte?, fuertes | fr: fort | de: stark Matt 12:29; Matt 14:30; Mark 3:27

2. stronger, mightier (comparative) (6×) The comparative degree – stronger or mightier than another – often substantivized as 'the stronger one.' John the Baptist's confession 'one mightier than I comes' (Matt 3:11, Mark 1:7, Luke 3:16) is the paradigmatic instance. In the parable, 'when one stronger than he attacks' overcomes the strong man (Luke 11:22). Paul's paradox that God's foolishness is 'stronger than men' (1 Cor 1:25) inverts all human categories of power. POWER AND ABILITY

3. severe, violent, intense (1×) A metaphorical extension to impersonal forces or conditions, meaning severe, violent, or intense. Luke 15:14 describes a 'severe famine' that overtook the land where the prodigal son had squandered his inheritance. This usage, though rare in the NT, is well attested in classical Greek for strong tastes, hard ground, and intense conditions (cf. LSJ). Spanish 'severa' captures this transferred sense. ἰσχ-ύς G2479 N-DFS (10×)
Strength, might, power — inherent force or capacity for action, predicated of God's might and human devotion
The noun ἰσχύς (ischus) denotes inherent strength, might, or power — the capacity for forceful action whether physical, spiritual, or divine. It appears centrally in the Shema-derived command to love God 'with all your strength' (Mark 12:30, 33; Luke 10:27), echoing Deuteronomy 6:5 LXX. Paul invokes it for God's 'mighty strength' (Eph 1:19; 6:10; 2 Thess 1:9), and the heavenly doxologies ascribe 'might' to the Lamb (Rev 5:12; 7:12). Peter urges serving 'by the strength that God supplies' (1 Pet 4:11). Spanish 'fuerza/potencia,' Arabic قُدْرَة, Hindi शक्ति/सामर्थ्य, Korean 힘, and Swahili nguvu all converge on the concept of inherent power.

strength, might, power (10×) Inherent physical or spiritual strength, might, or power — the capacity for forceful action. Used of the human obligation to love God with all one's strength in the Shema quotation (Mark 12:30, 33; Luke 10:27; cf. Deut 6:5 LXX), of God's sovereign might working in Christ and available to believers (Eph 1:19; 6:10; 2 Thess 1:9; 1 Pet 4:11), and of the celestial doxology ascribing might to the Lamb and to God (Rev 5:12; 7:12). All inflectional variants — genitive, dative, accusative — share one undifferentiated semantic core. POWER AND MIRACLES

ἰσχ-ύω G2480 V-AIA-3S (28×)
To be strong, have power, or be able; of things, to have force or validity; to prevail against opposition
Rooted in the noun ἰσχύς (strength), this verb spans from raw physical capability to abstract effectiveness. At its most common, it simply means 'to be able'—the disciples could not stay awake (Matt 26:40), no one could bind the demoniac (Mark 5:4). But it also describes the validity of things: faith working through love 'avails' something (Gal 5:6), and a testament is 'in force' only after death (Heb 9:17). In dramatic contexts it means to prevail outright, as when the demonized man overpowered seven sons of Sceva (Acts 19:16). Spanish consistently renders the core sense as 'poder' (to be able), while the validity sense draws out 'tener fuerza' (to have force).

1. be able, have ability (19×) The general sense of having the power, ability, or capacity to accomplish something. This is the most frequent usage across the New Testament, covering situations from inability to watch one hour in Gethsemane (Matt 26:40) to the failure of chains to restrain a demoniac (Mark 5:4). Spanish 'poder' and French 'pouvoir' render this straightforwardly as capability. German 'vermögen' carries the same force of possessing sufficient strength for a task. POWER AND ABILITY en: I-am-able, I-am-strong-for, being-able | es: poder, podrán, podían | fr: pouvoir, être-fort | de: vermag, vermoegen Matt 8:28; Matt 26:40; Mark 5:4; Mark 9:18; Mark 14:37

2. have force, be valid (4×) Applied to non-personal subjects —laws, prayers, principles—meaning to have force, validity, or effectiveness. Salt that has lost its savor 'is no longer good for anything' (Matt 5:13), circumcision nor uncircumcision 'avails' anything but faith working through love (Gal 5:6), and a covenant 'is in force' after death (Heb 9:17). James 5:16 affirms that the prayer of a righteous person 'has great power.' Spanish distinguishes this with 'tiene fuerza' rather than the personal 'puede.' POWER AND ABILITY

3. prevail, overpower (3×) To prevail, overcome, or gain the upper hand against an adversary. Acts 19:16 provides the most vivid example: the man with the evil spirit 'prevailed against' the seven sons of Sceva, overpowering them physically. Acts 19:20 uses it of the word of the Lord 'prevailing' as it spread, and Revelation 12:8 describes the dragon who 'did not prevail' in heaven. Spanish 'prevalecer' and the context of combat or contest mark this sense apart from mere capability. POWER AND ABILITY en: he-prevailed, prevailed, was-prevailing | es: prevaleció, prevalecía | fr: pouvoir, être-fort | de: vermag, vermoegen Acts 19:16; Acts 19:20; Rev 12:8

4. be strong, be healthy (2×) To be physically strong, well, or healthy, contrasted with being sick. Jesus' saying 'Those who are strong have no need of a physician' (Matt 9:12 / Mark 2:17) uses ἰσχύω to denote bodily health and robustness. Spanish 'fuertes' (strong ones) captures the adjectival-participial force, distinguishing this medical or physical sense from the broader notion of general ability. POWER AND ABILITY

ἴσως G2481 Adv (1×)

perhaps, maybe, possibly; used to express uncertainty or to soften a statement

This adverb introduces possibility without commitment, often softening assertions or expressing polite uncertainty. In Luke 20:13, the vineyard owner deliberates: 'Perhaps (isōs) they will respect my son.' The word expresses his hopeful but uncertain expectation—a poignant irony, since the reader knows the tenants will kill the son. Classical Greek used isōs to qualify assertions ('about,' 'probably') or mark rhetorical hesitation, making statements less absolute.

(1×) Jesus places this word of hopeful uncertainty in the mouth of the vineyard owner, creating tragic dramatic irony. The Spanish 'quizás' and French 'peut-être' capture the tentative hope. The owner thinks his son's presence might evoke respect where servants failed, but Jesus's parable exposes Israel's leaders rejecting even God's final messenger. The 'perhaps' reveals both the owner's patience and the tenants' unexpected audacity. HAPPENING AND CHANCE

ἰτᾰλός G2482 N-AFS (4×)

Italy; the Roman peninsula, seat of the imperial capital and destination or origin of early Christian travel.

The proper geographical name for the Italian peninsula, home of Rome and the center of imperial power. In Acts, Italy appears as a destination of fateful journeys: Aquila and Priscilla have recently arrived from Italy after Claudius expelled the Jews (Acts 18:2), and Paul's voyage to Italy as a prisoner drives the dramatic narrative of Acts 27:1-6. Hebrews closes with greetings from 'those from Italy' (Heb 13:24), a tantalizing clue about the letter's origin or audience. The name is uniformly transliterated: Spanish 'Italia,' French 'Italie,' German 'Italien.'

(4×) The proper geographical name for the Italian peninsula and the Roman state centered there. All four occurrences connect to the movement of people between Italy and the eastern Mediterranean: Aquila and Priscilla leave Italy under Claudius' edict (Acts 18:2), Paul is sent as a prisoner to Italy (Acts 27:1), an Alexandrian ship bound for Italy carries him (Acts 27:6), and Hebrews 13:24 conveys greetings from 'those from Italy.' The consistent transliteration across Spanish 'Italia,' French 'Italie,' and German 'Italien' reflects its status as an internationally recognized toponym. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Ἰταλικός G2483 Adj-GFS (1×)

Italian, pertaining to Italy; specifically the Italian cohort

This adjective designates something as Italian in origin or association. In Acts 10:1, Cornelius serves as a centurion in 'the Italian cohort' (speira Italikē), a Roman military unit likely composed of Italian volunteers serving in Caesarea. The detail situates Cornelius within the Roman military infrastructure while highlighting the remarkable nature of his piety—a Gentile officer from an explicitly Roman unit becomes the first full Gentile convert, breaking down the wall between Jew and Gentile at the Spirit's initiative.

(1×) Luke's specification of the Italian cohort provides both historical precision and theological significance. This was a recognizable military designation, and the Spanish 'Itálica' and German form preserve the Latin adjective. A centurion from Rome's Italian heartland, stationed in Israel's coastal capital, receives a vision that changes salvation history—God shows no partiality based on ethnicity or nationality, even extending grace to the occupying military power. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Ἰτουραῖος G2484 Adj-GFS (1×)

Iturean, pertaining to Iturea; a region northeast of Galilee

This adjective refers to Iturea, a tetrarchy northeast of Galilee in the Anti-Lebanon mountain range. Luke 3:1 mentions Philip as tetrarch 'of the region of Iturea and Trachonitis,' providing geographical-political context for John the Baptist's ministry. The Itureans were descendants of Ishmael (see 1 Chronicles 5:19), and by the first century their territory had been incorporated into the larger Herodian administrative system. Luke's precision anchors sacred history in datable political realities.

(1×) Luke's chronological framework employs recognizable political boundaries to date John's prophetic emergence. The French 'Iturée' and Spanish 'Itouraía' transliterate the regional name. By listing Philip's tetrarchy alongside Tiberius's reign and Pilate's governorship, Luke signals that the kingdom of God breaks into actual history at a specific moment—not mythic time but the real world of Roman bureaucracy and Herodian client kings. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἰχθύδιον G2485 N-ANP (2×)

little fish, small fish used as food, especially in the feeding miracles

This diminutive form of 'fish' appears in the accounts of Jesus feeding the four thousand, where a few small fish supplement the seven loaves (Matt 15:34; Mark 8:7). The term's affectionate smallness—rendered in comedy and everyday speech—fits the humble provisions of an ordinary meal. Yet these ἰχθύδια, like the loaves, become instruments of abundance when blessed by Jesus, feeding thousands with leftovers to spare. The word captures both the ordinariness of the provision and the extraordinary multiplication that follows.

(2×) Both Gospel occurrences describe the modest starting point of the second multiplication miracle. The diminutive suffix conveys small size, reflected in Spanish 'pececillos' and French 'petit-poisson.' Classical sources show the term in mundane culinary contexts, which heightens the miraculous transformation when Jesus gives thanks and distributes them. The small fish, together with the loaves, become sacramental signs of Jesus' power to provide abundantly from meager resources. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

ἰχθῦς G2486 N-AMS (20×)

Fish; an aquatic creature, used literally in narratives of feeding, fishing, and post-resurrection meals.

A common noun for fish that appears across some of the most vivid scenes in the Gospels: the feeding of the five thousand with five loaves and two fish (Matt 14:17–19), the coin found in a fish's mouth (Matt 17:27), and the question of whether a father would give his child a serpent instead of a fish (Matt 7:10). In each case the word is thoroughly concrete and literal—no metaphorical or symbolic extension develops in the NT usage. The multilingual glosses are strikingly uniform: English 'fish,' Spanish 'pez/peces,' French 'poisson,' German 'Fisch.'

fish (20×) A fish as a literal aquatic creature, appearing in Gospel narratives of miraculous provision, daily sustenance, and teaching illustrations. The feeding miracles (Matt 14:17, 19; 15:36) and the coin-in-the-fish story (Matt 17:27) use the term concretely, as does the father-and-child analogy (Matt 7:10). Unlike classical Greek, where ichthys could designate the fish-market or the constellation Pisces, all 20 NT occurrences retain the plain zoological sense. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

footstep, footprint, track; traces left by walking; metaphorically, the path or example to follow

This noun literally means footprint or track, but develops rich metaphorical use for following someone's example or path. Romans 4:12 speaks of 'those who walk in the footsteps of the faith of our father Abraham'—following his example. In 2 Corinthians 12:18 Paul asks whether he and Titus 'did not walk in the same footsteps'—the same conduct and spirit. First Peter 2:21 says Christ suffered, 'leaving you an example, that you should follow in his footsteps.' Classical usage includes tracks of game, traces, stepping softly, and metaphorically following someone's path. The New Testament use is entirely metaphorical—following the pattern or example left by predecessors in faith.

(3×) The sense is consistently metaphorical: following someone's path, example, or pattern of life. Romans presents Abraham's faith as tracks to walk in—his trust in God's promise becomes the pattern for all who believe. Paul defends his conduct by appealing to shared 'footsteps' with Titus—identical pattern of ministry and motives. Peter presents Christ's suffering as footprints to follow—the path of unjust suffering borne with trust in God. The Spanish glosses distinguish 'huellas' (tracks/traces) and 'pisadas' (footsteps), while German has 'Fussspuren' (footprints). The image is vivid: predecessors leave visible tracks in the snow of history, and faithful followers place their feet in the same impressions, walking the same path. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Jotham, king of Judah, son of Uzziah, ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy

Jotham ruled Judah during a period of relative stability and prosperity, building fortifications and defeating the Ammonites (2 Kings 15:32-38; 2 Chronicles 27). Matthew includes him in the genealogy of Jesus (1:9), linking the Messiah to the Davidic line through this righteous king who 'did what was right in the eyes of the Lord' (2 Kings 15:34). His name, meaning 'YHWH is perfect' or 'YHWH is upright,' fits his reputation as one of Judah's better monarchs.

(2×) The name appears twice in Matthew 1:9, once as son of Uzziah and once as father of Ahaz, establishing the genealogical chain. The multilingual glosses preserve the Hebrew-derived name through Greek transliteration (Ἰωάθαμ), with minor variations across languages (French 'Joatham', German 'Jotham'). His inclusion in the Messianic lineage affirms God's faithfulness across generations, even through the complex history of Judah's monarchy. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Joanna, a woman healed by Jesus who supported his ministry and witnessed the resurrection

Joanna, wife of Chuza (Herod's household manager), stands among the women who traveled with Jesus and the Twelve, supporting them from their own means (Luke 8:3). Her presence signals the reach of Jesus' ministry into unexpected social circles—the very household of Herod Antipas. She reappears at the empty tomb (Luke 24:10), among the first witnesses to the resurrection, carrying spices to anoint Jesus' body and finding instead the angelic announcement of his rising. Her witness, though initially disbelieved by the apostles, forms part of the foundational testimony to the resurrection.

(2×) Luke names her twice, first among the women disciples (8:3) and second among the myrrh-bearers (24:10). The name, Aramaic in origin (יוֹחָנָן), appears in Greek transliteration. The multilingual tradition preserves the name with slight variation (French 'Jeanne'), but all point to this remarkable woman whose social position (connected to Herod's court) and spiritual commitment (supporting Jesus' itinerant ministry) mark her as a bridge between worlds and a key resurrection witness. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Joanan, an ancestor of Jesus in Luke's genealogy

Joanan appears in Luke 3:27 as one name in the ancestral line from Jesus back to Adam. The name is a Greek rendering of the Hebrew Yohanan, meaning 'Yahweh is gracious.' Luke's genealogy differs from Matthew's, moving through Nathan rather than Solomon, and includes many names known only from this list. Each name, however obscure to history, testifies that God's Messiah emerged from a real human lineage spanning generations of covenant faithfulness and divine patience.

(1×) Luke's genealogy stretches backward from Jesus through otherwise unknown ancestors like Joanan, grounding the incarnation in Israel's history. The multilingual forms (French Joannan, Spanish Iōanán) preserve the Hebrew name's phonetic shape. While we know nothing else about this individual, his inclusion affirms that Jesus's humanity traces through real people, not mythic figures—the Word became flesh in a specific family line. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

John — Hellenized form of Hebrew Yohanan ('YHWH is gracious'), designating several key NT figures including the Baptist and the Apostle

Iōannēs is the Greek rendering of Hebrew Yohanan, meaning 'YHWH is gracious.' Its 135 New Testament occurrences distribute across several figures, but two dominate. John the Baptist, the voice crying in the wilderness (Matt 3:1-3), accounts for the largest share — the prophetic forerunner who baptized Jesus and was beheaded by Herod Antipas. John the son of Zebedee, one of the Twelve and part of Jesus' inner circle with Peter and James (Matt 4:21; Mark 5:37), is the second major referent and is traditionally associated with the Fourth Gospel and the Johannine epistles. Minor bearers include John Mark, companion of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 12:12, 25), and Simon Peter's father (John 1:42; 21:15-17).

John (personal name) (135×) The proper name Iōannēs (from Hebrew Yohanan, 'YHWH is gracious'), applied to several New Testament figures. The foremost is John the Baptist, who prepared the way for Jesus through preaching and baptism (Matt 3:1-12; John 1:6-8). The second major bearer is John son of Zebedee, apostle, member of Jesus' inner three, and traditional author of the Fourth Gospel (Matt 4:21; Mark 9:2; Acts 3:1). Additional bearers include John Mark (Acts 12:12, 25; 13:5) and Simon Peter's father (John 1:42). Spanish 'Juan,' French 'Jean,' and German 'Johannes' each reflect distinct vernacular adaptations of this widely transmitted name. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Job, the righteous sufferer of the Old Testament book bearing his name

Job is the protagonist of Scripture's most extended meditation on innocent suffering and divine sovereignty. James 5:11 holds up Job's endurance as an example for suffering believers, noting 'the purpose of the Lord' revealed in his story—that God is compassionate and merciful. Though Job wrestled with profound questions about divine justice, he persevered in faith despite losing wealth, children, and health. His story demonstrates that faithfulness is not transactional and that God's ways ultimately transcend human comprehension.

(1×) James invokes Job not as a model of patient silence but of persistent faith through devastating loss. The name appears identically across languages (German Hiob, French/Spanish forms of Iōb), pointing to the book's widespread influence. Job's vindication came not through explanation but through encounter—God answered him not with reasons but with presence, and James urges believers to trust that same compassionate character when suffering seems inexplicable. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Joel, the Old Testament prophet whose prophecy Peter cites at Pentecost

Joel was a prophet whose oracles announced both locust-plague devastation and coming restoration. Acts 2:16 quotes Joel 2:28-32 as Peter explains the Pentecost outpouring: 'This is what was spoken by the prophet Joel.' Joel's vision of the Spirit poured out on all flesh—sons and daughters prophesying, the old and young seeing visions—finds its initial fulfillment in the upper room. The citation authorizes the charismatic phenomena as divinely promised, not aberrant.

(1×) Peter's Pentecost sermon turns to Joel to demonstrate that the Spirit's dramatic arrival fulfills prophetic expectation. The name appears uniformly across translations (French Joël, Spanish/German forms). Joel's oracle about the last days 'when I pour out my Spirit on all flesh' becomes the apostolic lens for understanding Pentecost—not an anomaly but the beginning of God's promised age of universal access to the Spirit, crossing boundaries of age, gender, and social status. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Jonam, an ancestor of Jesus in Luke's genealogy

Jonam is another name in Luke's genealogical record, appearing in 3:30 between Elmadam and Joseph. Like many in Luke's list, Jonam is otherwise unknown to biblical history. The name may be a variant of Joanan or related to Jonah. Luke's genealogy serves a distinct theological purpose from Matthew's: where Matthew traces royal descent through Solomon to establish Jesus's legal claim to David's throne, Luke moves through Nathan to emphasize Jesus's actual human lineage.

(1×) This obscure ancestor appears only in Luke's backward genealogy that climaxes not with Abraham but with Adam, 'the son of God.' The multilingual glosses (French Jonam, Spanish Iōnám) transliterate the Greek. By including dozens of otherwise forgotten names, Luke demonstrates that the Savior's coming required not just famous kings and prophets but generations of ordinary people through whom God patiently worked his redemptive plan toward incarnation. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Jonah — the OT prophet whose sign (three days in the great fish) Jesus invokes as a type of his own death and resurrection.

All nine NT occurrences of Ionas refer to the OT prophet Jonah, and all appear in a single theological context: Jesus's invocation of 'the sign of Jonah' as the only sign given to an unbelieving generation. The three days Jonah spent in the belly of the great fish prefigure the Son of Man's three days in the heart of the earth (Matt 12:39-41; 16:4; Luke 11:29-30,32). Jesus also points to the Ninevites' repentance at Jonah's preaching as a rebuke — someone greater than Jonah is here, yet this generation refuses to repent. The Hebrew name (Yonah, meaning 'dove') adds an evocative layer that early Christians would not have missed.

of ōnas (9×) The OT prophet Jonah (Hebrew Yonah, 'dove'), referenced exclusively in the context of Jesus's 'sign of Jonah' discourse. Jesus draws a typological parallel between Jonah's three days in the great fish and the Son of Man's three days in the earth (Matt 12:39-40; 16:4; Luke 11:29-30), and contrasts the Ninevites' repentance with the unbelief of his own generation (Matt 12:41; Luke 11:32). Multilingual glosses (French 'Jonas,' German 'Jona,' Spanish 'Jonas') consistently transliterate the name. All nine occurrences cluster in the Synoptic 'sign of Jonah' pericopes, making this one of the most typologically concentrated proper nouns in the NT. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Joram (Jehoram), king of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat, ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy

Joram reigned over Judah during troubled times, marrying Athaliah (daughter of Ahab and Jezebel) and introducing Baal worship to the southern kingdom (2 Kings 8:16-24; 2 Chronicles 21). Despite his unfaithfulness, God preserved his line for the sake of the covenant with David. Matthew includes him in Jesus' genealogy (1:8), demonstrating that God's purposes advance even through flawed and faithless generations. The genealogy also compresses history here, omitting several kings between Joram and his listed descendant.

(2×) The name appears twice in Matthew 1:8, designating both his descent from Jehoshaphat and his fatherhood (through several omitted generations) of Uzziah. The Hebrew יוֹרָם becomes Ἰωράμ in Greek, preserved across languages (French 'Joram', German 'Joram'). His presence in the Messianic genealogy, despite his wickedness, reveals the grace woven into the lineage of Christ—God's faithfulness persisting through human failure. JEHORAM JORAM NAMES

Jorim, an ancestor of Jesus in Luke's genealogy

Jorim appears in Luke 3:29 as one link in the chain from Jesus back to Adam. The name is otherwise unattested in Scripture, and we know nothing of this individual beyond his place in the genealogy. Such names populate Luke's list, reminding readers that behind the famous biblical figures stood countless ordinary believers whose faithfulness mattered. God's promises advanced through both the celebrated (David, Abraham) and the obscure (Jorim, Rhesa, Joanan).

(1×) Luke includes Jorim among the post-exilic ancestors, names that appear nowhere else in biblical or extra-biblical sources. The consistency across languages (French Jorim, Spanish Iōrím) reflects simple transliteration. These unknown names have theological weight: they testify that messianic lineage flowed through real people across centuries, that God's patience in working out redemption involved generations whose only memorial is their inclusion in the genealogy of the One who would save the world. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, son of Asa, ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy

Jehoshaphat was one of Judah's godly kings, known for his judicial reforms, devotion to the Torah, and alliance (sometimes ill-advised) with the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 22; 2 Chronicles 17-20). He sent teachers throughout Judah to instruct the people in the Law, and his faith is memorably displayed when he led Judah in worship before battle, trusting God to deliver them from a vast coalition of enemies (2 Chronicles 20). Matthew places him in Jesus' genealogy (1:8), linking the Messiah to this king who sought the Lord and strengthened Judah's faith.

(2×) The name occurs twice in Matthew 1:8, establishing Jehoshaphat as both son of Asa and father of Joram. The Hebrew יְהוֹשָׁפָט (meaning 'YHWH has judged') becomes Ἰωσαφάτ in Greek. Multilingual glosses (French 'Josaphat', German 'Josaphat') preserve the traditional rendering. His inclusion in the genealogy underscores the Davidic line's continuity through kings who, like Jehoshaphat, honored God's covenant, even as the lineage also includes less faithful rulers. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Joses (Greek form of Joseph); name of several New Testament figures

A Greek rendering of the Hebrew name Joseph, appearing in several variant forms (Ἰωσῆς, Ἰωσή, Ἰωσήφ). The textual tradition shows considerable variation in spelling across manuscripts. The New Testament mentions multiple men with this name: (1) a brother of Jesus named in Mark 6:3 and Matthew 13:55, (2) a son of Mary mentioned at the crucifixion (Matthew 27:56, Mark 15:40, 47), and (3) another name for Barnabas (Acts 4:36). The name's ubiquity in first-century Judaism reflects Joseph's patriarchal significance and popularity. Variant spellings don't indicate different people but represent dialectal and scribal preferences.

Joses, shortened form of Joseph; name of two New Testament figures

Joses is a shortened form of Joseph, appearing as the name of two men connected to Jesus. Mark 6:3 lists Joses among Jesus' brothers (Matthew 13:55 has 'Joseph' in some manuscripts). Mark 15:40 and 15:47 mention another Joses, son of Mary (not Jesus' mother), whose brother was James. This Mary stood at the cross and witnessed Jesus' burial. The name is the Greek form of the Hebrew Yoseph. Textual variants between 'Joses' and 'Joseph' appear in some manuscripts, reflecting the interchangeable use of the full and shortened forms. The two Joses represent Jesus' family circle and the community of faithful women disciples.

(3×) The sense identifies the given name shared by two men in Mark's Gospel. Mark 6:3's Joses is Jesus' brother, named alongside James, Judas, and Simon—evidence the Nazareth synagogue audience used to question Jesus' authority ('Isn't this the carpenter, son of Mary?'). The other Joses (Mark 15:40, 47) is distinguished as 'son of Mary' (different from Jesus' mother) and brother of James the younger, part of the women's community that followed Jesus, witnessed crucifixion, and discovered the empty tomb. The multilingual glosses transliterate consistently. The name functions to identify specific individuals within the overlapping circles of Jesus' family and disciples. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Joseph — indeclinable proper name borne by several biblical figures, from the patriarch to the husband of Mary

A Hebrew name meaning 'he adds' or 'may he add,' carried by at least eight distinct individuals in the New Testament. The most prominent are the patriarch Joseph son of Jacob (Acts 7:9), Joseph the husband of Mary and legal father of Jesus (Matt 1:16), Joseph of Arimathea who buried Jesus (Matt 27:57), and Joseph called Barnabas (Acts 4:36). Two otherwise unknown ancestors of Jesus also bear this name in Luke's genealogy. The multilingual evidence uniformly transliterates rather than translates, preserving the name across Spanish, French, and German as José, Joseph, and Josef respectively.

Josiah, king of Judah known for religious reforms, ancestor of Jesus in Matthew's genealogy

Josiah ascended Judah's throne at age eight and became one of its most reforming kings. When the Book of the Law was rediscovered during temple repairs, he led a sweeping spiritual renewal, destroying idols, restoring Passover, and renewing the covenant (2 Kings 22-23; 2 Chronicles 34-35). His devotion and humility before God's word set him apart, though his death in battle against Pharaoh Neco cut short his reign. Matthew includes him in Jesus' genealogy (1:10-11), honoring this king who 'turned to the Lord with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his might' (2 Kings 23:25).

(2×) The name appears in Matthew 1:10 and 1:11, marking both his descent from Amon and his fatherhood of Jeconiah and his brothers at the time of the Babylonian exile. The Hebrew יֹאשִׁיָּהוּ ('YHWH supports' or 'YHWH heals') becomes Ἰωσείας in Greek. Multilingual renderings (French 'Josias', German 'Josia') maintain the traditional form. iota, the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet; representing the smallest detail

Iota (from Hebrew yod) is the smallest letter in the Greek alphabet, equivalent to the English 'i.' In Matthew 5:18, Jesus declares that 'not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the Law until all is accomplished.' The hyperbole emphasizes Scripture's enduring authority and complete fulfillment in Christ—even the tiniest orthographic mark carries divine weight. Jesus does not abolish the Law but fulfills it down to its minutest detail, validating every jot while transforming how it functions.

(1×) Jesus uses the smallest letter imaginable to stress Scripture's permanence and his own relationship to it. All four languages preserve 'iota' identically, the letter itself becoming a symbol. Jesus's point is not wooden literalism but comprehensive fulfillment—nothing in God's revealed will is insignificant or disposable. The pairing with 'dot' (keraia, a serif or stroke) drives home that Scripture's authority extends to the smallest distinguishing marks. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

And I, and me, I also, me too – crasis of kai ego, joining the speaker to a preceding statement or adding emphasis.

An Attic crasis fusing kai ('and/also') with ego ('I'), this compact pronoun appears in some of the New Testament's most memorable declarations. When kai functions as a simple conjunction, it links the speaker to what precedes: 'and I will give you rest' (Matt 11:28), 'and I say to you, you are Peter' (Matt 16:18). When kai carries adverbial force ('also, too'), it emphasizes the speaker's personal inclusion or reciprocity: 'I also will confess him' (Matt 10:32). Spanish distinguishes these neatly – 'Y yo' (and I) versus 'tambien yo' (I also) – making the semantic split visible.

1. and I / and me (48×) Connective use where kai functions as the simple conjunction 'and,' linking the speaker's action or identity to the preceding clause or participant. The speaker joins an existing discourse without special emphasis on inclusion. Spanish 'Y yo' and German 'und ich' parallel this straightforward connective reading. Key passages: Matt 11:28 ('and I will give you rest'), Matt 16:18 ('and I say to you'). FIRST PERSON PRONOUNS

just as, according as; introducing a comparison or conformity

This adverb functions like 'just as' or 'according to what,' establishing correspondence between two things. In Matthew 27:10, it introduces the fulfillment citation: 'just as (katha) the Lord directed me.' The word signals that the events surrounding Judas's betrayal money and the potter's field conform to prophetic pattern. Katha marks the alignment between Old Testament prophecy (here a composite of Zechariah and Jeremiah) and Gospel fulfillment, showing divine sovereignty orchestrating even treachery's aftermath.

(1×) Matthew employs katha to link Judas's blood money to prophetic precedent. The Spanish 'como' and French 'selon-que' (according-as) reflect the conformity implied. The adverb introduces God's directive about the thirty pieces of silver, demonstrating that even the chief priests' use of betrayal money to buy a burial field for foreigners fulfills divine prediction—God's word governs history down to the grim details of covenant betrayal. COMPARISON AND MANNER demolition, destruction, tearing down; overthrow of fortifications or arguments

This noun denotes pulling down, demolition, or destruction, appearing three times in 2 Corinthians in Paul's discussion of apostolic authority. In 2 Corinthians 10:4 Paul describes spiritual weapons 'mighty for the pulling down of strongholds.' In 10:8 and 13:10 he defends his authority, given 'for building up and not for destruction' (or 'tearing down'). Classical usage includes demolition of buildings, overthrow, reduction of swelling in medical texts, and even the magical drawing down of heavenly bodies. Paul uses it metaphorically for both positive (destroying false arguments) and negative (improper use of authority that tears down rather than builds up) senses.

(3×) The sense centers on destruction or demolition, with Paul distinguishing legitimate from illegitimate forms. In 10:4 the demolition is positive—spiritual weapons demolish false reasoning and pretensions against God's knowledge. In 10:8 and 13:10 Paul contrasts his God-given authority for 'building up' (οἰκοδομή) versus 'tearing down' (καθαίρεσις)—he won't use authority destructively. The Spanish 'destrucción/derribo' and German 'Zerstörung' capture the demolition sense. The word operates in military-architectural metaphor (strongholds being demolished) and relational-ecclesial concern (authority must build, not destroy). Whether destroying bad arguments or avoiding destructive use of power, the word marks forceful, dismantling action. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

To take down (from a cross or height); tear down, demolish (structures); bring down, depose (from power).

A powerful verb meaning to pull something or someone down from an elevated position–whether physical, structural, or political. Its most poignant New Testament uses describe the taking down of Jesus' body from the cross (Mark 15:36, 46; Luke 23:53; Acts 13:29), where Spanish 'bajar/habiendo bajado' emphasizes the downward motion of reverent removal. The same verb demolishes barns in Jesus' parable of the rich fool (Luke 12:18) and tears down intellectual strongholds in Paul's spiritual warfare imagery (2 Cor 10:5). In Mary's Magnificat, it reaches its theological summit: God 'has brought down rulers from their thrones' (Luke 1:52)–Spanish 'derribo' conveying the force of divine reversal.

1. take down (physically, from cross or height) (4×) To take down physically from an elevated position, especially removing a body from a cross. Used four times of Jesus' crucified body being taken down (Mark 15:36, 15:46; Luke 23:53; Acts 13:29). Spanish 'bajar/bajando/habiendo bajado' and French 'descendre' consistently mark the downward, reverential physical action. The repeated use in passion narratives gives this sense its gravity. DESCENDING AND TEARING

2. tear down / destroy (structures, strongholds, nations) (4×) To tear down, demolish, or destroy structures, strongholds, or nations. The rich fool plans 'I will tear down my barns' (Luke 12:18); Paul speaks of 'destroying arguments' raised against knowledge of God (2 Cor 10:5); Acts 13:19 recalls God destroying seven nations. Spanish shifts from physical 'bajar' to destructive 'derribar/destruir,' and the range spans literal buildings to metaphorical fortifications of human reasoning. DESCENDING AND TEARING

3. bring down / depose (from power) (1×) To bring down or depose someone from a position of power and authority. In the Magnificat, Mary proclaims God 'has brought down rulers from their thrones' (Luke 1:52). Spanish 'derribo' captures the forceful unseating, while the same verb used for physical lowering and structural demolition now expresses the divine reversal of social hierarchies–the mighty humbled, the lowly exalted. DESCENDING AND TEARING to prune, cleanse, purify; especially of vines, to remove unproductive growth

This verb means to clean by removing what is unproductive or contaminating. Its primary agricultural use involves pruning vines—cutting away dead or excess branches so the plant bears better fruit. In John 15:2, Jesus uses viticultural imagery: 'Every branch that bears fruit he prunes (kathairei) that it may bear more fruit.' The metaphor describes God's disciplinary care: he removes what hinders fruitfulness not to destroy but to maximize abundant life. Pruning involves painful loss in service of greater gain.

(1×) Jesus's vine-and-branches discourse makes pruning a picture of sanctifying discipline. The Spanish 'limpia' (cleanses) and French 'émonder' (prune) both capture the removal of hindrances. God's pruning involves trials, suffering, and the removal of comfortable but unproductive growth. The verb shares roots with katharos (clean), linking fruitfulness to purity—productive discipleship requires both initial cleansing (by the word, 15:3) and ongoing pruning that removes whatever inhibits bearing fruit that glorifies the Father. PURIFYING AND CLEANSING

Just as, even as; a comparative conjunction introducing a parallel or analogy between two situations.

A comparative conjunction meaning 'just as' or 'even as,' formed from kata ('according to') and the relative ha ('which things'). It introduces an analogy or parallel, drawing the reader's attention to a correspondence between two realities. Paul favors this particle in his epistles: 'just as David declares the blessedness of the one...' (Rom 4:6), 'just as we have many members in one body' (Rom 12:4), and 'just as the body is one and has many members' (1 Cor 12:12). The multilingual evidence (Spanish así como, French comme/de même que, German gleichwie) consistently renders it with comparative phrasing, confirming its single function as a discourse-level analogy marker.

(13×) A comparative particle meaning 'just as, even as, in the same way that,' used to introduce an analogy or establish a point of correspondence. It appears thirteen times in the Pauline corpus and elsewhere to structure theological arguments by comparison: as David pronounces blessing (Rom 4:6), as the body has many members (Rom 12:4; 1 Cor 12:12). The cross-lingual renderings (German gleichwie, French de même que, Spanish así como) all employ comparative constructions, confirming the word's uniform discourse function. COMPARISON AND MANNER to fasten upon, attach to; to seize upon or cling to

This verb means to fasten or attach something to something else, often with the sense of clinging or seizing. In Acts 28:3, a viper 'fastened on' (kathēpsen) Paul's hand when he was gathering sticks for a fire on Malta. The word conveys the snake's sudden attachment or seizure of Paul's hand, leading the islanders to expect him to swell up or drop dead. Paul's immunity to the viper's bite becomes a sign that confirms his apostolic authority and God's protection.

(1×) Luke's choice of kathaptō emphasizes the viper's aggressive attachment to Paul's hand after being roused by the heat. The Spanish 'se-prendió' (it-fastened-itself) captures the reflexive force. The islanders' reaction—expecting divine judgment for a supposed criminal—and then their reversal when Paul suffers no harm demonstrates how God turns even hostile attacks into testimonies. The viper 'fastened on' but could not harm the one protected by divine commission. TOUCHING AND REACHING

κᾰθαρ-ίζω G2511 V-FIA-3S (31×)

To cleanse or purify; making clean physically (healing lepers, declaring foods pure) or spiritually (removing sin and moral defilement).

A verb spanning the full range of purification in the New Testament — from the dramatic healing of lepers ('Be clean!' Matt 8:3) to the deep inner work of God purifying hearts by faith (Acts 15:9). Jesus used it when he declared all foods clean (Mark 7:19), and the epistles apply it to Christ's sacrificial cleansing of his people (Eph 5:26; Titus 2:14; 1 John 1:7). The physical and spiritual senses are deeply interwoven: the same God who healed skin diseases also promises to wash away sin. French uses 'purifier' for both, while Spanish distinguishes 'limpiar' (physical cleaning) from 'purificar' (spiritual purification), illuminating the dual register.

1. cleanse physically or ritually (22×) To make physically or ritually clean by removing impurity, especially healing lepers and pronouncing foods or vessels clean. Jesus commands lepers 'Be cleansed!' (Matt 8:2-3; Luke 17:14) and the apostles are told to 'cleanse lepers' as a sign of the kingdom (Matt 10:8). Mark 7:19 extends it to the declaration that all foods are clean. Spanish 'limpiar/limpiar' and German 'reinigen' both maintain the concrete, physical register across these 22 occurrences. PURIFYING AND CLEANSING

en: Cleanse, are-cleansed, be-cleansed | es: fue-limpiada, fue-limpiado, fueron-limpiados | fr: purifier | de: reinigen, reinigt Matt 8:2; Matt 8:3; Matt 10:8; Matt 11:5

2. purify morally or spiritually (9×) To purify from sin, moral defilement, or spiritual impurity, with God, Christ, or his blood as the agent of cleansing. God purified Gentile hearts by faith (Acts 15:9), Christ gave himself to 'purify for himself a people' (Titus 2:14), and his blood 'cleanses us from all sin' (1 John 1:7; cf. Heb 9:14). Spanish shifts to 'purificar' and 'habiendo purificado,' while French maintains 'purifier' — both marking the inward, moral transformation that transcends physical washing. PURIFYING AND CLEANSING

κᾰθαρ-ισμός G2512 N-AMS (7×)

Purification, cleansing; the ritual or ceremonial act of making clean, especially in Jewish religious practice.

Katharismos is the noun form of katharizō ('to cleanse') and denotes the process or rite of purification. In the Gospels it appears in distinctly Jewish ceremonial contexts: the stone jars at Cana are 'for the Jewish rites of purification' (John 2:6), the dispute between John's disciples and a Jew concerns purification (John 3:25), and Jesus sends healed lepers to offer what Moses commanded 'for your cleansing' (Mark 1:44; Luke 5:14). Luke 2:22 refers to the Mosaic purification after childbirth. Hebrews 1:3 elevates the term to Christ's ultimate 'purification for sins.' Spanish purificación and French purification mirror the word precisely.

purification (7×) Purification, ceremonial cleansing—the ritual act of becoming or being declared ritually clean. The word connects directly to Torah-prescribed washings and offerings. Jesus directs healed lepers to complete their Mosaic purification (Mark 1:44; Luke 5:14). The water jars at Cana serve 'the Jewish purification rites' (John 2:6), and a purification dispute frames the Baptist's final testimony (John 3:25). Luke 2:22 places Mary and Joseph at the temple for post-birth purification. In Hebrews 1:3, the concept reaches its theological apex: Christ himself accomplished 'purification for sins.' Spanish purificación and German Reinigung confirm the consistent ritual-cleansing sense. PURIFICATION CLEANSING

κᾰθᾰρ-ός G2513 Adj-NMP (27×)

clean, pure — ritually unblemished, morally blameless, or physically spotless

Katharos is the Greek adjective for clean or pure, spanning ritual, moral, and physical registers across its 27 NT occurrences. Jesus' Beatitude 'Blessed are the pure in heart' (Matt 5:8) sets the moral-spiritual keynote, while his debates with the Pharisees sharpen the contrast between outward ritual cleanliness and inward purity: 'clean the inside of the cup' (Matt 23:26; Luke 11:41). At the Last Supper, Jesus tells the disciples 'you are clean, but not all of you,' pointing to Judas (John 13:10-11), and later declares them clean 'because of the word I have spoken' (John 15:3). Paul appropriates the term for apostolic innocence — 'I am clean from the blood of all' (Acts 18:6; 20:26). In the Pastorals and Titus, katharos modifies conscience and heart: 'from a pure heart and a good conscience' (1 Tim 1:5; 3:9; 2 Tim 1:3; 2:22; Titus 1:15). Revelation extends it to physical splendor: 'fine linen, bright and pure' (Rev 15:6; 19:8, 14; 21:18, 21). Spanish 'limpio,' French 'pur,' and German 'rein' each cover the full range.

clean, pure (ritually or morally) (27×) Clean or pure in ritual, moral, or physical senses. Morally, it describes the heart oriented toward God (Matt 5:8) and the conscience free of defilement (1 Tim 1:5; 3:9; 2 Tim 1:3; Titus 1:15). Ritually, Jesus redefines it: outward washing matters less than inward transformation (Matt 23:26; John 13:10-11; 15:3). Paul uses it for apostolic innocence before God (Acts 18:6; 20:26). Physically, Revelation deploys it for the radiant linen of heaven's armies (Rev 15:6; 19:8, 14) and the gold of the new Jerusalem (Rev 21:18, 21). Every target language maps to a purity, cleanness; moral or ceremonial purification

This noun denotes the state or quality of being pure, whether physical cleanliness, moral integrity, or ceremonial fitness. In Hebrews 9:13, it refers to 'the purity (katharotēta) of the flesh' achieved through Old Covenant rituals—the sprinkling of ashes from a red heifer and animal blood that sanctified the ceremonially defiled. The word highlights the external, physical cleansing these rituals provided, contrasting with the deeper conscience-cleansing Christ's blood accomplishes. Outward purity pointed toward the need for inward purification.

(1×) Hebrews uses katharotēs to describe the limited but real efficacy of Levitical purifications. The Spanish 'pureza' and French 'pureté' both convey ritual cleanness. The argument reasons from lesser to greater: if animal sacrifices could restore ceremonial purity ('the purity of the flesh'), how much more will Christ's sacrifice purify the conscience from dead works? The old rituals handled external defilement; Christ's blood addresses the deeper pollution of sin itself. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 3712 WITH 5 SENSES

seat, chair; teacher's chair; seating position representing authority

This noun denotes a seat or chair, with specific reference to positions of authority or teaching. Matthew 21:12 and Mark 11:15 describe Jesus overturning 'the seats of those who sold doves' in the temple cleansing. Matthew 23:2 uses it metaphorically: 'The scribes and Pharisees sit on Moses' seat'—occupying the teaching authority position. Classical usage includes various seating (from a hare's form to rowers' benches), sitting posture, session, and specifically the teacher's or professor's chair. The New Testament uses span literal furniture (merchants' stools in the temple) and metaphorical position (the authoritative teaching chair representing legitimate but imperfectly exercised authority).

(3×) The sense encompasses physical seats and symbolic positions. The temple merchants' seats were literal furniture, part of the commercial apparatus Jesus disrupted to restore the house of prayer. Moses' seat (Matthew 23:2) is likely both literal—an actual seat in synagogues from which Torah was read and taught—and metaphorical—the position of authoritative teaching held by scribes and Pharisees. Jesus affirms their positional authority ('practice what they teach') while condemning their hypocrisy ('don't do what they do'). The Spanish glosses range from 'sillas' (chairs) to 'cátedra' (teaching chair/cathedra), while German has 'Sitz' (seat). The word thus marks both physical furniture and the authority position it represents. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

καθέζομαι G2516 V-IIM/P-1S (7×)

To sit down, be seated, remain sitting; physical posture of rest or sustained presence in a place.

Kathezomai means to sit down or remain seated, describing a deliberate bodily posture. It appears in contexts ranging from the boy Jesus sitting among the temple teachers (Luke 2:46) to Jesus sitting wearied at Jacob's well (John 4:6), Mary sitting at home in mourning (John 11:20), and the two angels seated in the empty tomb (John 20:12). Spanish sentado and German sich setzen capture the basic postural meaning. The word overlaps with kathēmai but tends to emphasize the act of taking a seat or settling into position.

sit, be seated (7×) To sit down, take a seat, or remain in a seated position—a verb of physical posture indicating either the act of settling or a sustained seated state. In Matt 26:55 Jesus reminds his captors he sat daily teaching in the temple. In Luke 2:46 the twelve-year-old Jesus is found sitting among the teachers. At Jacob's well Jesus sat down, wearied from travel (John 4:6). Martha goes to meet Jesus while Mary 'remained sitting at home' (John 11:20). The two angels sit inside the empty tomb (John 20:12). Spanish me sentaba and French s'asseoir confirm the straightforward postural sense throughout. SITTING AND DWELLING

καθεξῆς G2517 Adv (5×)

In order, in sequence; denoting orderly succession, whether of narrative arrangement or temporal progression.

This adverb means 'in order' or 'in sequence,' indicating an orderly, successive arrangement. Luke uses it programmatically in his prologue, declaring his intent to write 'in orderly sequence' (Luke 1:3), and again to describe Jesus traveling 'from one town and village to another' (Luke 8:1). In Acts, it marks Peter's orderly retelling of events (Acts 11:4), the prophets speaking 'in succession' from Samuel onward (Acts 3:24), and Paul traveling systematically through Galatia and Phrygia (Acts 18:23). Spanish 'en orden/ordenadamente' and French 'dans l'ordre' capture the notion of methodical arrangement.

(5×) In order, in succession, one after another. Denotes orderly arrangement or sequential progression. Luke uses it to describe his narrative method of writing events 'in order' (Luke 1:3), Jesus's systematic journey through towns (Luke 8:1), Peter recounting events sequentially (Acts 11:4), prophets from Samuel onward speaking 'in succession' (Acts 3:24), and Paul's orderly itinerary through regions (Acts 18:23). The Spanish 'en orden/ordenadamente' and French 'dans l'ordre/en ordre' confirm the core sense of methodical sequence. DAYS AND DAYLIGHT

καθεύδω G2518 V-PPA-NMP (22×)

To sleep physically; figuratively, to be spiritually lethargic, morally inattentive, or dead.

A common verb for lying down to sleep, used both literally and with rich figurative extension. Jesus sleeps in the storm-tossed boat (Matthew 8:24), and the ruler's daughter 'sleeps' in death (Matthew 9:24). In the parables and exhortations, sleeping becomes a metaphor for spiritual drowsiness: the foolish virgins sleep while waiting (Matthew 25:5), and Paul urges believers not to sleep as others do (1 Thessalonians 5:6). Spanish dormir, French dormir, and German schlafen serve both senses without distinction, but Greek context and domain consistently differentiate physical rest from spiritual warning.

1. to sleep physically (12×) To be in a state of natural, physical sleep or slumber. Matthew 8:24 describes Jesus sleeping during the storm; Matthew 26:40-43 shows the disciples sleeping in Gethsemane from exhaustion. Spanish dormía, French dormir, and German schlafen all render straightforward physical rest. Mark 4:38 and Matthew 13:25 similarly describe literal sleeping. SLEEP AND SLUMBER

2. to sleep figuratively (10×) To sleep figuratively, denoting spiritual lethargy, moral complacency, inattention to God's purposes, or death as a euphemism. The parable of the ten virgins (Matthew 25:5) uses it for negligent waiting; 1 Thessalonians 5:6 contrasts sleeping with watchfulness; Mark 5:39 may imply death. Spanish dormís in the hortatory passages and English 'Sleep' as imperative irony (Matthew 26:45) show the metaphorical force. Ephesians 5:14 likely alludes to this figurative sleep. SLEEP AND SLUMBER

καθηγ-ητής G2519 N-NMP (2×)

guide, teacher, one who leads or instructs others in a path or subject

This term denotes someone who directs others along a way, whether literal or metaphorical. In Matthew 23:10, Jesus warns his disciples not to be called 'guides' (or 'teachers'), 'for you have one guide, the Christ.' The double occurrence in that verse emphasizes both the prohibition against seeking such titles and the singularity of Christ's authority. The word carries overtones of intellectual or spiritual leadership, someone who professes to show the way. Yet Jesus reserves this role for himself alone, exposing the arrogance of those who claim such status while rejecting the humility he models.

(2×) Both instances occur in Matthew 23:10, where Jesus contrasts human pretensions to leadership with his own unique authority. Classical usage (LSJ) includes both physical guides and philosophical teachers or authorities one follows. The Spanish 'guía/guías' and French 'guide' capture the directional sense, while German uses the full noun forms. Jesus' teaching subverts the honor-seeking culture of his day, insisting that all his followers are equals under one Master, one Father, one Guide—Christ himself. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12553 WITH 3 SENSES

καθήκω G2520 V-PPA-ANP (2×)

fitting, proper, what is appropriate or due in a given circumstance

The term describes what befits a situation, what ought to happen or be done. Paul uses it to describe behaviors 'not fitting' or 'not proper' (Romans 1:28, Acts 22:22). The word carries a sense of moral or social propriety—what accords with right order. In Acts 22:22, the crowd shouts that Paul 'ought not to live,' declaring him unfit for existence. In Romans 1:28, Paul describes humanity's descent into doing 'what is not fitting,' things that violate the natural and moral order. The term thus serves as a rubric for discerning what aligns with God's design versus what transgresses it.

(2×) The two occurrences both involve negation—what is not fitting. Classical usage (LSJ) extends to 'the proper time' or 'normal days,' suggesting an inherent order or due course. The Spanish 'conviene' (it is fitting) and French 'convenable' (suitable) capture the appropriateness sense, while German 'gebührend' (due, proper) emphasizes what is owed or expected. Paul's moral argument in Romans hinges on humanity suppressing the knowledge of what is fitting, surrendering to disorder. The crowd's verdict in Acts perverts the category, calling for Paul's death as though righteousness demanded it. PROPRIETY AND FITTINGNESS

κάθημαι G2521 V-FIM-2P (91×)

To sit, be seated; to sit enthroned or reign in authority; to dwell, reside, inhabit a place or condition.

The Greek verb κάθημαι ('to sit, be seated') is a deponent middle voice form whose semantic range stretches from the mundane to the majestic. In its most frequent usage, it describes authoritative sitting — the enthroned Christ at God's right hand (Matt 19:28; 26:64), a king on his throne, or a judge presiding over court — a sense that accounts for over half its New Testament occurrences. Yet it also covers ordinary physical sitting: by the sea (Matt 13:1), in the marketplace (Matt 11:16), or at the tax booth where Jesus found Matthew (Matt 9:9). A third, more figurative sense emerges in passages like Matthew 4:16 and Luke 1:79, where those who 'sit in darkness' are people dwelling in a settled condition of spiritual need. Spanish sentado, French assis, and German sitzen serve across all three senses, though many languages add honorific markers when the subject is divine.

1. sit enthroned, reign (55×) To sit enthroned, to be seated in a position of authority, rule, or judgment (55 occurrences). This is the dominant New Testament sense, covering Christ seated at God's right hand (Matt 26:64; Rev 4:2), God enthroned in heaven (Rev 4:9-10), rulers on judgment seats, and the apocalyptic riders of Revelation. Korean 앉으시다 (honorific 'sit') and Hindi विराजमान ('enthroned') deploy elevated register, while Spanish sentado en el trono and German auf dem Thron sitzend add explicit throne vocabulary — all confirming that translators perceive royal dignity beyond mere posture. SITTING AND DWELLING

2. sit, be seated physically (26×) To sit or be seated in a literal, physical sense — on the ground, at a table, on a seat, or beside a road (26 occurrences). Jesus sits by the sea to teach (Matt 13:1-2), Peter sits in the courtyard (Matt 26:58), the blind sit by the roadside (Matt 20:30). The distinction from sense 1 lies in the absence of authority or official function: this is bodily posture without status connotation. French être assis, Spanish estar sentado, and Swahili kuketi all use their basic positional verbs here without honorific marking. SITTING AND DWELLING

3. dwell, reside, inhabit (10×) To dwell, reside, or inhabit a place or condition, used metaphorically of people settled in a region or state (10 occurrences). Matthew 4:16 cites Isaiah: 'the people sitting in darkness saw a great light,' where 'sitting' means prolonged dwelling rather than physical posture. Luke 21:35 extends this to all who 'sit on the face of the earth' — inhabiting it as residents. Arabic الجالسين and Hindi बैठे हुए can carry both postural and habitative readings, while Swahili wanaokaa ('those who stay/dwell') shifts decisively to residential vocabulary. SITTING AND DWELLING

καθημέρ-ιος G2522 Adj-DFS (1×)

daily, day by day; pertaining to each day's occurrence

This adjective describes something occurring or pertaining to each day, literally 'according to the day.' In Acts 6:1, it modifies the 'daily distribution' (diakonia kathēmerinē) of food to widows in the Jerusalem church. The term underscores the regularity and ongoing nature of the early church's care ministry—not occasional charity but systematic daily provision. The complaint that Hellenistic widows were being overlooked in this distribution led to the appointment of the Seven, showing how practical needs prompted structural solutions.

(1×) Luke highlights the routine nature of the church's widow-care program through kathēmerinos. The Spanish 'diario' (daily) and transliterated forms preserve the temporal regularity. The 'daily distribution' was substantial enough to require dedicated administration, and culturally significant enough that perceived inequity threatened church unity. The apostles' solution—appointing Spirit-filled men to 'serve tables'—validated the importance of physical care while protecting the priority of prayer and word-ministry. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 5469 WITH 3 SENSES

καθίζω G2523 V-AIA-3S (46×)

To sit down, take a seat; causatively, to seat someone; also to stay, remain, or settle in a place

Kathizo covers the full arc from the physical act of sitting to the authoritative act of being enthroned. When Jesus 'sat down' on the mountain, he assumed the teacher's posture of authority (Matt 5:1). The causative sense appears when God 'seated' Christ at his right hand (Eph 1:20)—Spanish sentado and German sich setzen both capture the reflexive dignity of the act. A less common but significant sense means to stay or remain in a place, as when Jesus told the disciples to 'stay in the city' until clothed with power (Luke 24:49), or when Paul 'settled' in Corinth for eighteen months (Acts 18:11).

1. sit down, take a seat (41×) The basic intransitive sense: to sit down or assume a seated position. Jesus sits to teach (Matt 5:1), sits by the sea (Matt 13:48), and promises the disciples they will sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes (Matt 19:28). The seated posture carries authority in the ancient world—a judge, a teacher, a king sits. French asseoir and German sich setzen reflect this fundamental physical action. SITTING AND DWELLING

2. seat, cause to sit (3×) The transitive or causative sense: to seat someone else, to cause another to sit. God 'seated' (ekathisen) Christ at his right hand in the heavenly places (Eph 1:20). In Acts 2:30, David knew God would 'seat' one of his descendants on his throne. Paul asks in 1 Corinthians 6:4 why the Corinthians 'seat' those of least esteem as judges. This sense elevates the physical act into the realm of appointment and enthronement. SITTING AND DWELLING

3. stay, remain, settle (2×) An extended sense meaning to remain, stay, or settle in a place, where duration rather than posture is the point. Jesus instructs the disciples to 'stay in the city' until power comes (Luke 24:49), and Paul 'remained' in Corinth a year and six months teaching (Acts 18:11). Spanish Permaneció ('he remained') and the contextual emphasis on time distinguish this from mere sitting. SITTING AND DWELLING

καθίημι G2524 V-AIA-3P (4×)

To let down, lower; used of sending something down by means of a rope, sheet, or opening.

Describes the deliberate act of lowering or letting something down from a higher position. In the Gospels, friends lower a paralytic through a roof opening to reach Jesus (Luke 5:19), and in Acts, Paul is let down in a basket through the city wall (Acts 9:25). The Spanish and French renderings (bajaron, descendre) consistently emphasize downward directed movement, reinforcing the core spatial sense of controlled descent.

(4×) To let down or lower something from a higher to a lower position, typically by means of a cord, sheet, or basket. The multilingual evidence uniformly points to controlled downward movement: Spanish bajaron ('they lowered'), French descendre ('to descend'). In Luke 5:19 it describes lowering the paralytic through tiles; in Acts 9:25 Paul is lowered in a basket; in Acts 10:11 and 11:5 Peter sees a great sheet being let down from heaven in his vision. καθίστημι G2525 V-AIA-2S (22×)

To appoint or constitute in a role; to conduct or escort; to be set or established in place

The verb καθίστημι combines κατά ('down') and ἵστημι ('to stand'), yielding the core image of setting someone down in a position. In nearly all its New Testament occurrences, it describes appointment — placing a person into an office or role of authority. The faithful steward is 'appointed' over the household (Matt 24:45), and every high priest is 'constituted' to offer sacrifices (Heb 5:1, 8:3). A single occurrence in Acts 17:15 preserves the older physical sense of conducting or escorting someone to a place, while James 3:6 uses it for the tongue being 'set' in its position among the members of the body.

1. appoint or constitute (20×) The dominant sense of appointing, setting, or constituting someone in a role, office, or position of authority — accounting for 20 of the 22 occurrences. In the parables of Matt 24:45-47 and 25:21-23, the master 'appoints' servants over his possessions. The multilingual glosses uniformly reflect appointment vocabulary: Spanish 'constituye/constituyó,' French 'établir,' German 'einsetzen.' Titus 1:5 uses it for appointing elders, and Heb 5:1 and 8:3 for constituting high priests — showing the word's natural home in institutional and ecclesiastical language. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

2. conduct or escort (1×) A single occurrence at Acts 17:15 preserving the physical-spatial sense of conducting or escorting a person to a destination. Those who 'conducted' (καθιστάνοντες) Paul brought him as far as Athens. The Spanish 'que conducían' captures the sense of guided accompaniment along a journey. This concrete spatial usage connects directly to the classical meaning of καθίστημι — to bring someone down to a place — before the metaphorical extension to placing someone in a role. 3. be set or established in place (1×) A rare positional sense at James 3:6, where the tongue 'is set' or 'established' among the members of the body as 'the world of unrighteousness.' Here the verb describes physical placement or establishment in a location rather than appointment to an office. The Spanish 'se constituye' and English 'is set' reflect a spatial establishment rather than an institutional appointment, preserving the root κατά + ἵστημι image of being placed down in a fixed position. καθό G2526 Adv (4×)

Insofar as, according as, to the degree that; an adverb of proportion or correspondence.

A connecting adverb that establishes a standard of measure or proportion between two realities. Paul uses it to acknowledge human limitation alongside divine help: 'we do not know what we ought to pray for' (Rom 8:26). In 2 Corinthians 8:12 it appears twice, framing the principle that generosity is acceptable according to what one has. The Spanish según and French selon-que both capture this proportional nuance, while German sofern highlights the conditional aspect.

(4×) Insofar as, according to, to the degree that — expressing proportion or correspondence between two states of affairs. Spanish según ('according to') and French selon-que ('according as') both capture the comparative, proportional force. In Rom 8:26, it qualifies human inadequacy in prayer; in 2 Cor 8:12 it sets the measure of acceptable giving; in 1 Pet 4:13 it connects present suffering with future glory — rejoicing insofar as one shares in Christ's sufferings. καθόλου G2527 Adv (1×)

altogether, entirely; at all, in any way

This adverb means 'on the whole,' 'entirely,' or 'at all,' depending on context. In Acts 4:18, the Sanhedrin commands Peter and John 'not to speak or teach at all (katholou) in the name of Jesus.' The term emphasizes totality—a comprehensive ban rather than limited restriction. The council attempted an absolute prohibition on Christian proclamation, which the apostles immediately rejected: 'We cannot but speak of what we have seen and heard' (4:20). Katholou marks the collision between religious authority and prophetic commission.

(1×) The Sanhedrin's use of katholou reveals their intent to silence Christianity completely. The Spanish 'en-absoluto' (in-absolute) and French 'entièrement' (entirely) capture the comprehensive prohibition. Yet the total ban proved unenforceable against men who answered to a higher authority. Peter and John's response established the principle that civil or religious authorities cannot legitimately command what contradicts divine mandate—when human law conflicts with God's commission, obedience to God takes precedence.

to arm fully, equip completely; to be fully armed or equipped
This verb means to equip or arm fully with weaponry or armor, often in the middle voice meaning to arm oneself. In Luke 11:21, Jesus describes a 'strong man, fully armed (kathōplismenos), guarding his own palace.' The participle pictures readiness for defense—weapons drawn, armor in place, vigilant. The parable's point comes in verse 22: when 'one stronger than he' attacks and overcomes him, the strong man's full armament proves inadequate. Jesus is the stronger one who plunders Satan's goods, liberating captives despite the adversary's full weaponry.

(1×) Jesus employs kathōplizomai to emphasize Satan's apparent security—fully armed and guarding his domain. The Spanish 'armado' (armed) and French 'armé' both convey military preparedness. Yet comprehensive armament cannot withstand superior power. Christ's victory over the evil one is not a close contest but the triumph of the stronger over the strong. The parable assures believers that the cosmic battle is decided—Jesus has invaded the strong man's house, bound him, and distributed his spoils. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

to perceive clearly, observe, see plainly; to discern or understand
This verb means to look down upon, observe clearly, or perceive with understanding. In Romans 1:20, Paul argues that God's invisible attributes 'have been clearly seen (kathoratai), being understood through what has been made.' The verb implies not casual glancing but careful observation that leads to knowledge. Creation itself functions as revelation—the visible world discloses the invisible God with sufficient clarity that humanity is 'without excuse' for suppressing this knowledge. Natural theology has evidential force because God has made himself kathoratai through his works.

(1×) Paul's use of kathoraō grounds human accountability in clear perception of divine reality through creation. The Spanish 'se-ven-claramente' (are-seen-clearly) and German 'ersehen' (perceive) both emphasize the visibility of the invisible. God's eternal power and divine nature are not hidden or ambiguous but manifest to those willing to observe creation rightly. The passive voice suggests ongoing perception—creation continuously displays its Creator, leaving humanity without excuse for idolatry or unbelief. BOLDNESS AND OPENNESS

καθότι G2530 Adv (6×)
Because, inasmuch as, according as; a causal or proportional conjunction linking reason or manner to an outcome.
A conjunction drawn from the phrase 'kath' ho ti' — literally 'according to what' — that introduces either a reason or a standard of proportion. In Luke-Acts it most often functions causally: 'because Abraham also is a son of Abraham' (Luke 19:9), or 'because it was not possible for death to hold him' (Acts 2:24). But in Acts 2:45 and 4:35 it shifts to a proportional sense: distribution was made 'as' or 'according as' anyone had need. Spanish captures this split neatly — 'porque' for the causal and 'según' for the proportional — while French and German consistently use causal equivalents ('parce-que,' 'weil'), suggesting the proportional nuance is subtler cross-linguistically.

1. (4×) Causal conjunction meaning 'because' or 'inasmuch as,' introducing the ground or reason for a preceding statement. In Luke 1:7 it explains why Elizabeth had no child ('because Elizabeth was barren'); in Acts 2:24 it gives the theological reason for the resurrection ('because it was not possible for him to be held by death'). Spanish 'por-cuanto' and 'puesto-que' both emphasize the causal grounding. CONJUNCTIONS AND CONTRAST en: because | es: por-cuanto, porque, puesto-que | fr: parce-que | de: weil Luke 1:7; Luke 19:9; Acts 2:24; Acts 17:31

2. (2×) Proportional or comparative conjunction meaning 'as' or 'according as,' indicating the degree or manner in which something is done. In Acts 2:45 and 4:35, possessions were distributed 'as anyone had need.' The Spanish 'según' (according to) precisely captures this proportional sense, distinguishing it from the purely causal usage. French and German translations default to causal terms, but the context of proportional distribution clarifies the distinct meaning. COMPARISON AND MANNER

Just as, even as; how — a comparative conjunction introducing correspondence or manner, rarely used as an interrogative.
Kathos is the New Testament's workhorse conjunction for drawing parallels and establishing patterns: 'just as it is written,' 'even as the Father sent me.' Nearly every occurrence sets up a comparison — linking prophecy to fulfillment, divine action to human response, or one event to another. All major translations converge on simple comparative renderings: 'as/just as' (eng), 'como/así como' (spa), 'comme' (fra), 'wie' (deu). In one notable instance (Acts 15:14), James uses kathos not comparatively but to introduce indirect discourse — 'how God first visited' — a usage Spanish captures distinctly with 'cómo.'

1. just as (182×) Comparative conjunction meaning 'just as,' 'even as,' or 'as' — introducing a standard of comparison, a fulfilled pattern, or a basis for action. The cross-linguistic unanimity is striking: 'como' (spa), 'comme' (fra), 'wie' (deu) all map to a single comparative function. Pervasive in fulfillment formulas ('just as it is written,' Matt 26:24), ethical exhortations ('love one another as I have loved you,' John 13:34), and theological correspondences ('as the Father sent me,' John 20:21). COMPARISON AND MANNER

2. how (1×) Interrogative or declarative 'how,' introducing the manner or way something happened rather than a comparison. At Acts 15:14, James says Simeon described 'how' (kathos) God first visited the Gentiles. Spanish distinctly renders this 'cómo' (with accent, marking interrogative force), while French and German retain 'comme/wie,' which are ambiguous between comparative and manner senses. This rare usage preserves the classical Greek function of kathos as 'in what way.' COMPARISON AND MANNER

καί G2532 Conj (9082×)
Conjunction 'and'; also adverbial 'also, even, likewise' for emphasis or addition
The most common word in the Greek New Testament, kai is the basic connective tissue of biblical narrative and discourse. As a simple copulative conjunction it chains clauses and lists: 'and Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob' (Matt 1:2). But kai also carries an adverbial force meaning 'also, even, likewise,' often introducing a surprising or emphatic addition — 'even the winds and the sea obey him' (Matt 8:27). Translators across languages consistently split these two roles: Spanish 'y' versus 'tambien,' French 'et' versus 'et' with emphatic nuance, German 'und' in both but with distinct contextual weight.

1. (8311×) The copulative conjunction 'and,' joining words, phrases, and clauses in sequence. This is the default connective of Greek prose and narrative, carrying the story forward or coordinating parallel elements. Every language renders it with its basic conjunction: Spanish 'y,' French 'et,' German 'und.' Matt 1:2 and Matt 2:9 show its narrative chain function. It accounts for over 8,300 of its 9,083 occurrences. ADDITIVE PARTICLES

Spanish distinctly renders this as 'tambien' rather than 'y,' revealing the semantic shift. Found in passages like Matt 5:39-40 ('if anyone strikes your right cheek, turn the other also') and Matt 5:46 ('do not even the tax collectors do the same?'). This sense covers about 771 occurrences where kai goes beyond simple conjunction to signal addition, climax, or surprise. ADDITIVE PARTICLES

Καιάφας G2533 N-GMS (9×)

Caiaphas — the Jewish high priest who presided over the trial of Jesus and the early persecution of the apostles.

Caiaphas (Kaïaphas) was the high priest during Jesus's ministry and trial, serving from roughly AD 18 to 36 under Roman appointment. His nine NT appearances span the most dramatic moments of the Passion narrative: he plots Jesus's arrest (Matt 26:3), presides over the Jewish trial (Matt 26:57; John 18:13-14,24,28), and later confronts the apostles (Acts 4:6). John's Gospel preserves his unwitting prophecy — 'it is better that one man die for the people' (John 11:49-50) — which the evangelist interprets as divinely inspired irony. Luke mentions him alongside Annas to date the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry (Luke 3:2), anchoring the narrative in historical chronology.

Kaiaphas (9×) The Jewish high priest Caiaphas (Aramaic origin, possibly meaning 'rock' or 'depression'), who held office during Jesus's public ministry, trial, and the early church period. He appears in the conspiracy to arrest Jesus (Matt 26:3), the nighttime trial (Matt 26:57; John 18:13-14,24,28), the chronological marker alongside Annas (Luke 3:2), his unwitting prophecy about Jesus's substitutionary death (John 11:49), and the interrogation of Peter and John (Acts 4:6). Translations (French 'Caiphe,' German 'Kaiphas,' Spanish 'Caifas') transliterate the name with minor variation. His role as both political operator and unwitting prophet makes him one of the most theologically complex named figures in the Passion narratives. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL) and indeed, and even (καί with emphatic particle γε); compound connective with emphasis

καὶ...γε G2534

A compound of the conjunction καί ('and,' 'also') with various emphatic particles or other connectives. The phrase καί...γε means 'and indeed' or 'and at least.' Related compounds include καὶ δέ ('and moreover'), καὶ δή ('and indeed,' 'and in fact'), and καὶ εἰ (by crasis κεἰ, meaning 'and if' or 'even if'). These combinations layer nuance onto simple conjunction—adding emphasis, concession, or climax. Classical and biblical authors use them to strengthen connections between clauses or to mark significant points in argument and narrative. Each compound has its own flavor, but all amplify the basic connective force of καί.

Καίν G2535 N-AMS (3×)

Cain, the firstborn son of Adam who murdered his brother Abel

Cain, the first murderer in biblical history, appears three times in the New Testament as a negative example. Hebrews 11:4 mentions him implicitly—Abel's sacrifice was better than Cain's. First John 3:12 uses him as the archetypal evildoer: 'not as Cain, who was of the evil one and murdered his brother.' Jude 11 pronounces woe on those who have gone 'in the way of Cain'—a path of jealousy, murder, and rejection of God. The Hebrew name קַיִן possibly means 'acquisition' or 'spear.' New Testament uses consistently present Cain as a warning example—the first to choose evil, kill from jealousy, and walk away from God.

(3×) The single sense identifies the Genesis figure, invoked as the paradigmatic evildoer. Hebrews contrasts his rejected offering with Abel's accepted one—the beginning of the faith hall of fame starts by contrasting with faithlessness. First John explicitly names him as 'of the evil one,' linking fratricide to satanic origin and explaining his motive: 'because his works were evil and his brother's righteous.' Jude uses 'the way of Cain' as shorthand for the jealous, murderous path. The multilingual renderings uniformly transliterate the name. In New Testament theology, Cain functions as the first in the line of those who hate righteousness, oppose God's people, and walk in darkness rather than light. CAIN PROPER NAME

Καινάμ G2536 N-GMS (2×)

Cainan, ancestor of Jesus, son of Enos or Arphaxad depending on the genealogical line

Cainan appears in Luke's genealogy of Jesus (3:36-37) in two distinct positions: as the son of Arphaxad (following the Septuagint's insertion in Genesis 10:24, absent from the Hebrew text) and as the son of Enos (Genesis 5:9). This double occurrence reflects the Septuagint tradition Luke draws upon, inserting an additional generation in the post-flood lineage. The name means 'acquired' or 'possession,' related to Cain. While the historical relationship between these two Cainans remains debated, their presence in Luke's genealogy underscores his tracing of Jesus' lineage all the way back to Adam, rooting the Savior's identity in the whole human family.

(2×) Luke names Cainan twice (3:36, 3:37) in ascending genealogical order, placing him after Arphaxad and after Enos. The Hebrew קֵינָן becomes Καινάμ in Greek. Multilingual renderings (French 'Caïnan', German 'Kaïnàm') preserve the forms. The inclusion of these names, even where text-critical questions arise, signals Luke's intent to connect Jesus to the whole sweep of biblical history from creation onward, not merely from Abraham. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

καινός G2537 Adj-ANS (42×)

New, fresh, unprecedented in kind — qualitative newness distinct from mere temporal recency (neos)

An adjective emphasizing qualitative newness — something unprecedented in nature or character — as distinguished from neos, which stresses newness in time. Kainos is the word chosen for the great theological renewals of the New Testament: the new covenant (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25), the new commandment of love (John 13:34), the new creation (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15), the new name (Rev 2:17), and ultimately the new heaven and new earth (Rev 21:1). When Jesus says 'new wine into fresh wineskins' (Matt 9:17), kainos marks a qualitative break with the old order.

new, fresh, unprecedented (42×) Qualitatively new or unprecedented in kind, not merely recent in time. The kainos/neos distinction is theologically loaded: kainos signals eschatological renewal — new covenant (Luke 22:20; Heb 8:13), new creation (2 Cor 5:17), new commandment (John 13:34), new Jerusalem (Rev 21:2). Spanish 'nueva,' French 'nouveau,' and German 'neu' translate it, though none preserves the kainos/neos contrast. NEWNESS AND FRESHNESS

newness, freshness, the quality of being new in character or condition

This term captures the transformative quality of new life in Christ. Paul uses it twice in Romans to describe the believer's new way of existence. We are baptized into Christ's death so that we might 'walk in newness of life' (6:4), and we are released from the law to 'serve in the new way of the Spirit and not in the old way of the written code' (7:6). The word contrasts vividly with the old regime of sin, death, and law. It is not merely chronological newness but qualitative renewal—a fresh start grounded in resurrection power and the indwelling Spirit.

(2×) Both occurrences in Romans describe the character of Christian existence: newness of life (6:4) and newness of the Spirit (7:6). Classical usage (LSJ) includes freshness, novelty, even innovation. The Spanish 'novedad,' French 'nouveauté,' and German 'Neuheit' all convey the new-quality sense. Paul's theology of new creation finds linguistic expression here: believers are not merely reformed but reborn, participating in a fundamentally new order inaugurated by Christ's resurrection and sustained by the Spirit. NEWNESS AND FRESHNESS

καίπερ G2539 Conj (5×)

Although, even though; a concessive conjunction used with participles to express contrast or concession.

This concessive conjunction meaning 'although' or 'even though' introduces a statement that stands in contrast to what might be expected. It typically accompanies a participle. The author of Hebrews uses it strikingly: Christ 'although being a Son, learned obedience through suffering' (Heb 5:8), and Esau 'although seeking it with tears' could not recover his birthright (Heb 12:17). Paul employs it in Phil 3:4 to concede that he has grounds for confidence in the flesh. The uniform rendering across Spanish ('aunque'), French ('obgleich'), and German ('obgleich') underscores its straightforward concessive force.

(5×) Although, even though—a concessive particle typically used with a participle to express an unexpected contrast. In Heb 5:8, it introduces the profound paradox that Christ 'although being a Son' learned obedience through suffering. In Heb 7:5 and 12:17, it marks concessive circumstances. Paul uses it to acknowledge his credentials before setting them aside (Phil 3:4), and 2 Pet 1:12 employs it to note the readers already know the truth. Spanish 'aunque,' French and German 'obgleich' consistently render its concessive meaning. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12543 WITH 3 SENSES

καιρός G2540 N-GMP (86×)

An appointed time, season, or decisive moment; a point or period marked by divine purpose or particular significance.

Unlike χρόνος, which measures time quantitatively (duration, chronology), καιρός carries a qualitative charge—it is the right time, the fitting moment, the season ripe with significance. In the Gospels, Jesus speaks of 'my time' (Matt 26:18) and warns that the disciples do not know the appointed times (Acts 1:7). Paul uses it for both the present evil age and the coming 'fullness of times.' The word moves fluidly between an appointed moment in salvation history, a natural or liturgical season, and a window of opportunity. Spanish 'tiempo' covers most instances, but the occasional 'época' and 'tiempo oportuno' signal the semantic sub-distinctions.

1. definite time or period (80×) The dominant sense across roughly 80 occurrences designates a definite, appointed, or decisive point or period in time, often within God's redemptive plan. Spanish 'tiempo,' French 'temps,' German 'Zeit' are used consistently. Encompasses harvest time (Matt 13:30), the time of visitation (Luke 19:44), the present time (Rom 3:26; 8:18), and eschatological moments (Matt 8:29, 'before the time'). The word often carries theological weight—this is not just any moment but the moment appointed by God. TIME AND SEASONS

en: a-time, due-time, season | es: tiempo | fr: temps | de: Zeit Matt 8:29; Matt 11:25; Matt 12:1; Matt 13:30; Matt 14:1

2. season or epoch (3×) A small cluster (about 3 occurrences) narrows to season or epoch—a defined era, age, or natural season. In Acts 14:17, God gave 'fruitful seasons'; Gal 4:10 warns against observing 'times and seasons'; 1 Thess 5:1 pairs καιροί with χρόνοι to cover the full temporal horizon. Spanish 'épocas' and the English plural 'seasons' mark this as a broader, more extended temporal frame than the punctiliar 'appointed moment' of sense 1. TIME AND SEASONS

3. opportune time or occasion (3×) Three occurrences foreground the opportune or fitting character of the moment—the window of favorable action. In Luke 4:13, the devil departs 'until an opportune time' (ἄχρι καιροῦ); Luke 20:10 refers to sending a servant 'at the season' (i.e., the right time for collecting); Acts 1:7 speaks of times the Father has set by his own authority. Spanish 'tiempo oportuno' and 'ocasiones' and English 'in season' highlight the element of fitness and opportunity. TIME AND SEASONS

Καῖσαρ G2541 N-AMS (29×)

Caesar, the title for the reigning Roman emperor, used in taxation and judicial contexts

Καῖσαρ (Kaisar) is the Greek transliteration of the Latin 'Caesar,' functioning in the NT both as a proper name and as a royal title for the reigning emperor. It appears most memorably in the 'render unto Caesar' pericope (Matt 22:17-21, Mark 12:14-17, Luke 20:22-25), where Jesus' answer deftly navigates the political trap. In Acts, Kaisar denotes the emperor before whom Paul appeals his case (Acts 25:8-12, 26:32). Spanish 'Káisar,' French 'César,' and German 'Kaiser' (which later became a common noun meaning 'emperor') all witness to the term's layered political weight.

Caesar (Roman emperor) (29×) The title and proper name Kaisar (Caesar) for the Roman emperor, carrying both political authority and theological tension in the NT. The Synoptic taxation controversy (Matt 22:17-21) poses the question of dual allegiance to God and empire. In Acts, Paul's appeal to Caesar (Acts 25:11) invokes the legal right of Roman citizenship, shifting the narrative to Rome itself. PHARAOH TITLE

Καισαρία G2542 N-AFS (17×)

Caesarea; a Roman city name referring to Caesarea Maritima (coastal) or Caesarea Philippi (inland).

Kaisareia is the proper noun for Caesarea, referring to two distinct cities in Roman Palestine. Caesarea Maritima, built by Herod the Great on the Mediterranean coast, served as the Roman provincial capital and features prominently in Acts as a hub of early Christian activity — Philip settles there (Acts 8:40; 21:8), Cornelius receives Peter (Acts 10:1), and Paul is tried before Felix and Festus (Acts 23:23-25:13). Caesarea Philippi, at the foot of Mount Hermon, is where Peter confesses Jesus as the Christ (Matt 16:13; Mark 8:27). German 'Cäsarea,' Spanish 'Cesarea,' and French 'Césarée' all transliterate the same Latinate toponym.

Caesarea (place name) (17×) The place name Caesarea, designating either Caesarea Maritima on the Mediterranean coast or Caesarea Philippi near Mount Hermon. The coastal city dominates Acts as the Roman administrative center where Cornelius is converted (Acts 10:1, 24; 11:11), Paul is imprisoned and tried (Acts 23:23, 33; 25:1, 4, 6, 13), and Philip the evangelist resides (Acts 8:40; 21:8, 16). Caesarea Philippi appears only in Matt 16:13 and Mark 8:27 as the site of Peter's confession. Every translation simply transliterates the Latin-derived name. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE and yet, although, a conjunction introducing a concessive or contrasting clause

καί τοι G2543 Conj (2×)

This conjunction acknowledges a fact while introducing a contrast or objection. It appears in Acts 14:17, where Paul tells the Lycaonians that God 'did not leave himself without witness, although (καίτοι) he let the nations go their own ways.' The word concedes God's patience with idolatrous nations while asserting his ongoing witness through creation. In Hebrews 4:3, the author reflects on God's rest 'although his works were finished from the foundation of the world,' holding in tension the completed work of creation and the ongoing offer of rest. The particle thus enables nuanced theological argument, balancing truths that might seem contradictory.

(2×) The two uses introduce concessive clauses, granting one point while making another. Classical usage (LSJ) shows καίτοι marking objections the speaker raises, often in rhetorical questions. The Spanish 'aunque' and French 'bien que' both mean 'although,' while German 'obwohl' serves the same function. In Acts, Paul's missionary speech uses it to navigate the tension between divine forbearance and divine revelation. In Hebrews, it helps explain the paradox of a rest offered to God's people yet tied to works finished at creation's start. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12543 WITH 3 SENSES

and yet, although; introducing a concession or contrast

This conjunction combines 'and' (kai) with the particle 'indeed' (toi), creating a concessive or contrastive force: 'and yet,' 'although.' In John 4:2, it qualifies the statement that Jesus was baptizing: 'although (kaitoi) Jesus himself did not baptize, but only his disciples.' The conjunction introduces a clarification or contrast, correcting a potential misunderstanding. Kaitoi acknowledges something while introducing a qualification that modifies or nuances the initial statement.

(1×) John employs kaitoi to correct the impression that Jesus personally performed baptisms. The Spanish 'aunque' and French 'cependant' (however) both signal concession. The Pharisees heard that 'Jesus was making and baptizing more disciples than John,' but John clarifies that Jesus's disciples, not Jesus himself, performed the actual baptisms. This detail may distinguish Jesus's ministry from John's or highlight that physical baptism was delegated while spiritual authority remained Jesus's alone. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12543 WITH 3 SENSES

Burn, be on fire, be ablaze (intransitive/passive); light, kindle (transitive/causative).

The Greek verb kaio is one of Scripture's elemental words — fire in verbal form. Its NT occurrences divide between the intransitive state of burning and the transitive act of kindling. Lamps burn in readiness for the master's return (Luke 12:35), the Emmaus disciples' hearts 'burned within them' as Jesus opened the Scriptures (Luke 24:32), and John the Baptist was 'a burning and shining lamp' (John 5:35). At its most fearsome, branches are thrown into fire and 'burned' (John 15:6) and Mount Sinai blazes with flame (Heb 12:18). Spanish ardiendo, French bruler, and German brennen capture the fire-state sense. The single transitive occurrence — 'they do not light a lamp and put it under a basket' (Matt 5:15) — shifts kaio from describing flame to causing it, a distinction Spanish encienden and German anzuenden mark with dedicated causative vocabulary.

1. burn, be on fire (10×) To burn, be on fire, be ablaze — the intransitive or passive state of being consumed by or radiating fire, whether literal flame or metaphorical ardor. This dominant sense (10 occurrences) spans from the practical to the apocalyptic: lamps burning in readiness (Luke 12:35), the Emmaus disciples' hearts 'burning within' as Jesus expounded Scripture (Luke 24:32), John the Baptist as 'the burning and shining lamp' (John 5:35), fruitless branches 'burned' in the fire (John 15:6), and Mount Sinai 'blazing with fire' at the giving of the Law (Heb 12:18). Revelation 21:8 completes the arc with the lake 'burning with fire and sulfur.' Spanish ardiendo/encendido, French brulant, and German brennend converge on present-participial fire vocabulary. The metaphorical extension to hearts burning (Luke 24:32) is cross-linguistically preserved — Spanish ardiendo, German brannte — suggesting the fire-as-emotion metaphor is deeply universal. FIRE AND BURNING

en: burning, having-been-burned, it-is-burned | es: ardiendo, encendidas, encendido | fr: brûler | de: brennen, brennt Luke 12:35; Luke 24:32; John 5:35; John 15:6; Heb 12:18

2. light, kindle (1×) To light or kindle a flame — the transitive, causative action of bringing fire or light into being. Only 1 clear NT occurrence: Matt 5:15, where Jesus observes that people 'light a lamp' (kaiousin lychnon) not to hide it under a basket but to set it on a stand so it illuminates the whole house. Spanish encienden, with its dedicated causative 'en-' prefix, distinguishes this neatly from the intransitive ardiendo of sense 1, as does German anzuenden versus brennen. French allumer similarly reserves a separate verb for kindling. The semantic distinction is real though subtle: sense 1 describes an ongoing state of combustion, while sense 2 captures the initiating act — the moment spark becomes flame. Jesus' parable depends on this causative meaning: the point is not that the lamp burns, but that someone deliberately lights it. FIRE AND BURNING

And there, in that place; a compound adverb combining 'and/also' with 'there,' indicating location.

A compound adverb (kai + ekei) pointing to a location already established in the narrative – 'and there,' 'in that place.' It threads through key Gospel moments: if you remember at the altar that your brother has something against you, leave your gift 'there' (Matt 5:23); wherever you enter a town, stay 'there' (Matt 10:11); Jesus withdrew to a town called Ephraim and stayed 'there' with his disciples (John 11:54). Spanish 'y allí' and German 'und dort' consistently pair the connective with the locative. One occurrence in Acts 17:13 carries a slightly additive nuance – the Thessalonian agitators came 'also there' to Berea – where Spanish 'también allí' and French 'là aussi' emphasize the unexpected extension of hostility to yet another city.

1. and there (9×) The standard narrative-spatial sense: 'and there,' 'in that place,' linking a new action or state to a previously mentioned location. Appears nine times, connecting events to their settings across the Gospels and Acts. Jesus instructs disciples about reconciliation 'there' at the altar (Matt 5:23), directs them to remain 'there' in whatever town they enter (Matt 10:11), and promises to be seen 'there' in Galilee (Matt 28:10). Spanish 'y allí,' French 'et là,' and German 'und dort' uniformly confirm the connective-locative function. THERE (SPATIAL DEICTIC)

2. also there (1×) An additive-locative sense: 'also there,' 'there too,' emphasizing that something extends to or recurs in a location beyond what was expected. Used in Acts 17:13, where hostile agitators from Thessalonica pursue Paul all the way to Berea. Spanish 'también allí' and French 'là aussi' highlight the 'even there' nuance – the harassment is not confined to one city but follows 'also there,' adding a note of persistent opposition. THERE (SPATIAL DEICTIC)

ἐκεῖθεν G2547 Conj (10×)

And from there, and thence — a connective adverb joining narrative stages by marking departure from a prior location

The adverb κἀκεῖθεν (kakeithen), a crasis of καί + ἐκεῖθεν ('and from there'), functions as a narrative transition marker indicating movement from one place to the next. It stitches together itinerary sequences in Acts and the Gospels: Jesus departs 'from there' in his Galilean travels (Mark 9:30; 10:1), Abraham moves 'from there' in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:4), and Paul's missionary journeys proceed 'from there' through Asia Minor and Greece (Acts 13:21; 14:26; 16:12; 20:15; 21:1; 27:4; 28:15). Spanish 'y de allí,' Arabic ثَمَّ, Hindi 'वहाँ से,' and Korean '거기서' all render the compound adverb straightforwardly.

(10×) A connective adverb meaning 'and from there / and thence,' used to advance narrative by marking departure from a previously mentioned location. It chains itinerary segments in the Gospels — Jesus moving through Galilee (Mark 9:30; 10:1) — and especially in Acts for Paul's missionary routes through cities of Asia Minor and Greece (Acts 14:26; 16:12; 20:15; 21:1; 27:4; 28:15). Stephen uses it of Abraham's migration from Haran (Acts 7:4). The term is purely transitional and carries no semantic weight beyond spatial departure and narrative continuation. THERE (SPATIAL DEICTIC)

And that one also, those too; a crasis of kai + ekeinos used additively or as simple conjunction.

A crasis (contraction) of kai ('and') plus ekeinos ('that one'), this demonstrative pronoun appears in two distinguishable patterns. In its additive or emphatic use, it stresses inclusion: 'that one also' or 'those too,' as when Jesus says 'I have other sheep... I must bring them also' (John 10:16) and 'he who eats me, that one also shall live' (John 6:57). In its simpler conjunctive use, it connects a further referent without special emphasis: 'and those' or 'and that one,' as in the parable sequence of Mark 12:4-5. Spanish tambien-aquel versus y-aquellos neatly captures the emphatic versus plain conjunction.

1. that one also, those too (11×) Additive or emphatic use stressing that the referent shares in the same predicate or condition: 'that one also,' 'those too,' 'he/they as well.' John 10:16 uses it of the other sheep who must 'also' be brought; John 6:57 declares that the one who eats Christ 'also' shall live. Spanish también-aquel and French celui-là-aussi both capture the inclusive emphasis across 11 occurrences including John 14:12 and 17:24. ADDITIVE PARTICLES

2. and that one, and those (11×) Simple conjunctive use coordinating a further referent in narrative sequence: 'and that one,' 'and those,' without strong additive emphasis. Mark 12:4-5 uses it to chain successive servants sent to the vineyard; Matthew 15:18 connects what comes from the mouth to its source. Spanish y-aquellos and German und-jener reflect straightforward conjunction rather than emphatic inclusion across 11 occurrences. DEMONSTRATIVE PRONOUNS

κᾰκία G2549 N-DFS (11×)

Badness of character, malice, or wickedness; also trouble or hardship experienced in daily life.

In the New Testament, kakia most often denotes moral badness — the disposition of malice, ill-will, or wickedness that corrupts character from within. Paul includes it in his vice catalogue in Romans 1:29, and Peter urges believers to put it aside like soiled clothing (1 Pet 2:1). Interestingly, in Matt 6:34 Jesus uses the same word to mean simply 'trouble' or 'hardship,' the burdens each day carries — a usage well attested in the Septuagint. The multilingual evidence splits cleanly: most languages render the dominant sense as 'malice' or 'evil' (Spanish maldad, German Bosheit), while the Matt 6:34 occurrence draws translations like 'trouble' or 'mal,' pointing to an experiential rather than moral nuance.

1. malice, wickedness (10×) Moral badness, malice, or wickedness as a settled character disposition. This is the dominant NT usage, appearing in vice lists where it stands alongside envy, deceit, and slander (Rom 1:29, Eph 4:31, Col 3:8). Paul contrasts it with sincerity in 1 Cor 5:8 ('the leaven of malice and wickedness'), and in 1 Cor 14:20 urges believers to be 'infants in malice' — innocent of evil intent. Cross-linguistic translations consistently render this sense with moral vocabulary: Spanish maldad, French méchanceté, German Bosheit. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. trouble, hardship (1×) Trouble, distress, or hardship as an experiential reality rather than a moral quality. Attested solely in Matt 6:34 where Jesus teaches 'sufficient for the day is its own trouble (kakia).' Here the word denotes the burdens and difficulties life brings, not moral evil. Several translations capture this distinction: English 'trouble' rather than 'malice,' Spanish mal (generic 'bad thing') rather than maldad ('wickedness'). This usage echoes the Septuagint's broader application of kakia to calamity or misfortune (cf. Eccl 5:13, Jonah 1:2). EVIL AND WICKEDNESS malice, malignity, ill will; bad disposition or character

This noun denotes a vicious or malignant disposition—the active desire to harm others, not from passion but from settled ill will. In Romans 1:29, it appears in Paul's catalog of human depravity: filled with 'envy, murder, strife, deceit, maliciousness (kakoētheias).' The term describes not impulsive wrongdoing but calculated malevolence, a habitually hostile orientation toward others. It is wickedness with cunning, the disposition that takes pleasure in others' pain and devises evil deliberately.

(1×) Paul lists kakoētheia among the vices characterizing humanity under God's wrath. The Spanish 'malignidad' and French 'malice' both capture the deliberate ill will involved. This is not hot-tempered violence but cold malevolence—the mindset that plots harm, interprets others uncharitably, and rejoices in wrongdoing. It reflects a heart turned not just away from God but actively against one's neighbor, a corruption deeper than individual sins because it describes a malignant character orientation. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

To speak evil of, revile, curse; verbal abuse directed at a person, especially a parent or authority.

Denotes harsh, injurious speech directed against someone — reviling, cursing, or speaking evil of them. Its most striking New Testament usage appears in Jesus' quotation of the commandment about honoring parents: 'whoever speaks evil of father or mother must surely die' (Matt 15:4; Mark 7:10). The Spanish maldiciendo ('cursing') and French maudire ('to curse') bring out the gravity of the speech act. In Acts 19:9, opponents of the Way publicly revile the faith before the congregation.

(4×) To speak evil of, revile, or verbally abuse someone, often with a sense of cursing or maligning. Spanish maldiciendo ('cursing') and French maudire ('to curse') underscore the severity of the speech. In Matt 15:4 and Mark 7:10, Jesus cites the Torah command against cursing one's parents, where the word carries legal and covenantal weight. In Mark 9:39 Jesus notes no one performing a miracle in his name will quickly speak evil of him, while in Acts 19:9 it describes public reviling of the Way. CURSING (VERBAL ACT) suffering, endurance of hardship; distress or affliction patiently borne

This noun denotes the experience of hardship, distress, or suffering, often with the implication of patient endurance. In James 5:10, the prophets serve as 'an example of suffering (kakopatheias) and patience.' The term combines 'evil' or 'hardship' with 'experience,' describing the afflictions that the faithful endure. James holds up the prophets not as models of comfort but of perseverance through distress—their patient suffering under persecution and rejection demonstrates how to respond faithfully to trials.

(1×) James pairs kakopatheia with patience (makrothymia), making the prophets exemplars of faithful endurance under hardship. The Spanish 'sufrimiento' and German 'Leiden' (suffering) both emphasize the painful experience. The prophets spoke God's word and often suffered for it—rejection, persecution, sometimes death. Their example teaches believers to expect hardship and to endure it patiently, trusting that God vindicates his servants as he did the prophets of old. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

to suffer hardship, endure affliction, experience distress or difficulty

This verb means to suffer hardship, be in distress, or endure difficulty. Second Timothy uses it twice in exhortations: 'I suffer hardship even to the point of chains' (2:9) and 'endure hardship as a good soldier of Christ Jesus' (4:5). James 5:13 asks pastorally, 'Is anyone among you suffering? Let him pray.' Classical usage includes being in ill plight, distress from circumstances, sickness, or plants failing to thrive. The New Testament use focuses on enduring difficulty, particularly persecution and affliction in ministry. The word emphasizes patient endurance through suffering rather than the suffering itself—the active bearing of hardship with faith.

(3×) The sense emphasizes enduring hardship, particularly in Christian ministry and life. Paul models it personally—suffering chains for the gospel—and commands Timothy to embrace it as part of faithful service. The soldier metaphor (2 Timothy 2:3-4) frames hardship-endurance as essential to Christian discipleship. James uses it more broadly for any suffering (illness, persecution, difficulty), with prayer as the response. The Spanish glosses use 'sufrir' (to suffer) with variations, French has the verb forms, and German 'Leiden ertragen' (endure suffering). This isn't passive victimhood but active, resolute endurance—bearing affliction while remaining faithful to calling and turning to God in prayer. PAIN AND SUFFERING

To do evil, to do wrong, to act harmfully; contrasted with doing good in moral discourse.

Expresses the act of doing evil or causing harm, and consistently appears in the New Testament as the moral opposite of doing good. In the Synoptic accounts of a Sabbath healing, Jesus poses the piercing question: 'Is it lawful on the Sabbath to do good or to do evil?' (Mark 3:4; Luke 6:9). The Spanish hacer mal and German Böses tun both render the phrase as 'to do evil,' highlighting the concrete moral action rather than abstract wickedness. In 3 John 1:11, the reader is exhorted not to imitate evil but good.

(4×) To do evil or act harmfully, used in moral and ethical contrast with doing good. Spanish hacer mal ('to do evil') and German Böses tun ('to do evil') both point to concrete wrongful action. Mark 3:4 and Luke 6:9 frame the Sabbath controversy: is it lawful to do good or to do evil? In 1 Pet 3:17 suffering for doing good is contrasted with suffering for doing evil, and 3 John 1:11 urges imitation of good rather than evil. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

evildoer, malefactor, criminal; one who does wrong or harm

This adjective used as a noun denotes an evildoer or wrongdoer, someone who does harm or evil. All three occurrences appear in 1 Peter's instruction about suffering. First Peter 2:12 urges good conduct among Gentiles so that when they slander believers 'as evildoers,' they'll be contradicted by observable good works. Second verse 14 describes government as punishing 'evildoers' and praising those who do good. Fourth chapter verse 15 warns believers not to suffer as murderers, thieves, or 'evildoers.' Classical usage includes mischievous people, poisoners, sorcerers, and maleficent things. Peter uses it both for false accusation against Christians and for actual wrongdoers who deserve punishment.

(3×) The sense identifies those who do evil or harm, with Peter navigating the tension between false accusation and real wrongdoing. In 2:12 Christians are slandered 'as evildoers' despite living righteously—the accusation is false but must be answered by exemplary conduct. In 2:14 the word describes genuine criminals whom government rightly punishes. In 4:15 Peter warns believers to ensure they never actually qualify as evildoers—suffering must come from righteousness, not wrongdoing. The Spanish 'malhechor' and German 'Übeltäter' both mean wrongdoer/evildoer. The word thus marks the category of those who do harm, whether applied accurately (to criminals) or falsely (to persecuted Christians), with Peter insisting believers must never deserve the label. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

Bad, evil, wicked; of moral corruption, harmful effects, or persons who practice wickedness

A broad moral term spanning the entire range of what is bad or evil. In the Gospels it most often appears as a substantive — 'the evil' or 'evil things' — naming the moral corruption Jesus warned against (Mark 7:21) and the wickedness the crowds could not articulate when Pilate asked 'What evil has he done?' (Matt 27:23). Spanish and German translations consistently render it as 'mal/malo' and 'böse/schlecht,' while the few non-moral uses (Luke 16:25, 'bad things') and personal uses ('evil ones,' Matt 21:41) show its flexibility across abstract, concrete, and personal referents.

1. evil, wickedness (abstract/moral) (45×) The substantivized or abstract concept of evil and moral wickedness — the dominant NT usage. Jesus names evil thoughts (Mark 7:21) as springing from the heart, and Paul warns that bad company corrupts good morals (1 Cor 15:33). Across languages this sense consistently takes moral-weight terms: Spanish 'mal,' French 'mauvais,' German 'böse.' EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

2. bad, harmful, injurious (3×) Harmful, injurious, or poor in quality, with emphasis on the damaging effect rather than moral character. In Luke 16:25 Lazarus received 'bad things' during life — not morally evil, but painful and disadvantageous. Spanish 'malas' and German 'schlecht' sometimes shade toward this non-moral register. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

The owner in Jesus' parable will 'destroy those evil ones miserably' (Matt 21:41), and the Ephesian church tested those who claimed apostleship and found them false (Rev 2:2). Spanish 'malos' and French 'mauvais' carry the same personal force. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

κᾰκουργ-ος G2557 Adj-GMP (4×)

A criminal, evildoer, malefactor; one who does evil deeds, especially in a legal or judicial context.

Refers to a criminal or evildoer in the formal, judicial sense — someone identified by law as a wrongdoer. All four New Testament occurrences carry strong courtroom or punishment associations. In Luke 23:32-33, 39, the two men crucified alongside Jesus are identified as kakourgoi, and every major translation tradition reflects the legal weight: Spanish malhechor, French malfaiteur, German Übeltäter. Paul applies the term to himself in 2 Timothy 2:9, noting the bitter irony that he suffers imprisonment 'as a criminal' for proclaiming the gospel.

(4×) A criminal or malefactor in the judicial sense — one formally recognized as an evildoer. Spanish malhechor ('wrongdoer'), French malfaiteur ('malefactor'), and German Übeltäter ('evildoer') all preserve the compound structure of the Greek (kakos + ergon, 'evil-worker'). In Luke 23:32-33, 39, it designates the two men crucified with Jesus, carrying the weight of legal condemnation. In 2 Tim 2:9, Paul applies it to himself with pointed irony, suffering bonds 'as a criminal' for the sake of the gospel. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS being mistreated, suffering abuse or harsh treatment, enduring oppression

This verb describes those who suffer wrong or violence at others' hands. Hebrews 11:37 lists the martyrs and wanderers of faith who were 'mistreated' alongside those sawn in two and killed by the sword—heroes whose faithfulness met brutal opposition. Hebrews 13:3 exhorts believers to 'remember those who are mistreated, as though you yourselves were suffering,' cultivating empathy and solidarity with the persecuted. The term evokes not just physical suffering but the indignity and injustice of abuse, calling the church to bear the burdens of those who endure such affliction.

(2×) Both occurrences in Hebrews invoke contexts of persecution and solidarity. Classical and Septuagint usage (LSJ) includes wronging or maltreatment, especially of the vulnerable (wives, the oppressed). The Spanish 'maltratados' and French forms convey mistreatment or harsh handling. The author of Hebrews weaves suffering into the fabric of faithful discipleship, urging readers to identify with those enduring abuse as though bound with them—a call to imaginative and practical compassion. TORMENT AND TORTURE

κᾰκόω G2559 V-AIA-3P (6×)

To mistreat, harm, or oppress someone; to afflict with suffering or injustice.

Kakoo means to treat someone badly, causing them harm or distress. In the NT it appears exclusively in Acts, tracing a thread of persecution through salvation history: God foretells that Abraham's descendants will be enslaved and mistreated for four hundred years (Acts 7:6), Pharaoh deals treacherously with Israel (Acts 7:19), Herod lays violent hands on church leaders (Acts 12:1), and hostile crowds in Iconium are poisoned against the believers (Acts 14:2). The Lord's assurance to Paul in Corinth – 'no one will harm you' (Acts 18:10) – forms the counterpoint. Spanish 'maltratar' and French 'maltraiter' both preserve the root sense of treating badly.

mistreat, harm, oppress (6×) To mistreat, harm, or oppress – inflicting suffering or injustice upon a person. The NT usage centers on Acts' narrative of persecution across eras: the Egyptian oppression of Israel (Acts 7:6, 19), Herod's attack on the early church (Acts 12:1), the stirring up of hostility at Iconium (Acts 14:2), and God's protective promise to Paul at Corinth (Acts 18:10). The classical Greek range extends to spoiling things or ruining health, but the NT consistently applies it to the maltreatment of persons. OPPRESSION AND TYRANNY

κᾰκός G2560 Adv (16×)

Badly, severely (of illness); wrongly, wickedly (of moral conduct or speech)

The adverb kakos spans two distinct registers in the New Testament. In its dominant medical usage, it modifies conditions of sickness and affliction – 'those who had it badly' – appearing twelve times in the Gospels' formulaic healing summaries (Matt 4:24, 8:16, 9:12). In its rarer ethical usage, it describes morally wrong speech or behavior, as when Jesus challenges his accusers at his trial: 'if I spoke wrongly, testify about the wrong' (John 18:23). Spanish and German both render both senses with the same word ('mal,' 'uebel'), but the surrounding collocations – illness verbs versus speech and conduct verbs – make the distinction unmistakable.

1. badly, severely (of illness) (12×) Adverb describing the severity of physical affliction: 'badly, severely ill.' This is the dominant NT usage, appearing twelve times almost exclusively in the Synoptic healing narratives. The formulaic phrase kakos echontes ('those having badly,' i.e. the severely ill) recurs at Matt 4:24, 8:16, 9:12, 14:35, and Mark 1:32. Multilingual glosses converge on general adverbs of degree – Spanish 'mal,' French 'mal,' German 'uebel' – collocated with verbs of illness rather than moral action, confirming the medical rather than ethical register. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

2. wrongly, wickedly (4×) Adverb of moral quality describing wrongful speech or conduct: 'wrongly, wickedly, with evil intent.' At John 18:23 Jesus uses it of speech ('if I spoke wrongly'), at Acts 23:5 Paul is rebuked for speaking wrongly of the high priest, at James 4:3 believers 'ask wrongly,' and at Matt 21:41 the wicked tenants will be 'miserably' (kakos kakous) destroyed. The same surface glosses appear across languages ('mal,' 'uebel'), but the collocations shift entirely from illness to moral agency – speech acts, petitions, and judgments – marking a clear sense boundary. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

κάκ-ωσις G2561 N-AFS (1×)

ill-treatment, oppression; mistreatment or harsh treatment of someone

This noun describes harsh or cruel treatment, especially of those who should be protected or cared for. In Acts 7:34, Stephen quotes God's words to Moses: 'I have surely seen the mistreatment (kakōsin) of my people in Egypt.' The term denotes the oppression Israel suffered under Pharaoh—forced labor, brutality, infanticide. God sees kakōsis and responds with deliverance. The word appears in contexts of systemic injustice or abuse of power, and God's consistent response is to act on behalf of the mistreated.

(1×) Stephen's speech employs kakōsis to characterize Egypt's oppression of Israel, echoing Exodus 3:7. The Spanish 'aflicción' and French 'mauvais-traitement' (bad-treatment) both capture the abuse involved. God declares, 'I have seen the mistreatment of my people'—he is not indifferent to injustice. The exodus narrative establishes a pattern: God hears the cry of the oppressed and delivers them, judging those who perpetrate kakōsis. Stephen's speech indicts his hearers for continuing this pattern of resisting God's messengers. OPPRESSION AFFLICTION

κᾰλᾰμ-η G2562 N-AFS (1×)

stalk, straw, stubble; the dried stalks of grain after harvest

This noun refers to the stalk or straw of grain, especially what remains after the harvest—stubble. In 1 Corinthians 3:12, it appears in Paul's metaphor of building on Christ's foundation: some build with 'gold, silver, precious stones,' others with 'wood, hay, straw (kalamēn).' Stubble represents worthless, combustible material that cannot withstand fire. Paul warns that each builder's work will be tested, and what is built with perishable materials like straw will be consumed. Only what survives the fire earns reward.

(1×) Paul uses kalamē as the most worthless building material imaginable—dry stubble that ignites instantly. The Spanish 'paja' and French 'chaume' both mean straw or stubble. The metaphor warns ministers that not all work done 'on' the foundation of Christ is equally valuable. Teaching that merely entertains or flatters, ministry that seeks human approval rather than spiritual transformation—these are stubble-building. Fire will reveal quality, burning away what was worthless while refining what was genuine. STUBBLE AND CHAFF

κάλαμος G2563 N-AMS (12×)

A reed plant or staff made from it; also a writing pen fashioned from a sharpened reed.

Kalamos is one of those humble, everyday objects that Scripture presses into vivid service. As a plant, it evokes the wind-tossed marshlands of the Jordan – Jesus asks the crowds, 'What did you go out to see? A reed shaken by the wind?' (Matt 11:7). As a staff, it became a cruel prop in the mockery of Christ: soldiers placed a reed in his hand as a scepter, then struck him with it (Matt 27:29-30). In one solitary occurrence (3 John 1:13), the word takes its specialized meaning of a writing pen – a sharpened reed dipped in ink – reminding us that the ancient world's technology for recording Scripture was itself a gift of creation.

1. reed (plant or staff) (11×) The reed as a living plant or a rod/staff fashioned from it. In Matt 11:7 and Luke 7:24, Jesus uses the image of a reed swaying in the wind as a metaphor for fickleness. Matt 12:20 quotes Isaiah: 'a bruised reed he will not break,' evoking gentleness toward the fragile. At the crucifixion, a reed served both as a mock scepter (Matt 27:29) and as a pole to lift a sponge of sour wine (Matt 27:48; Mark 15:36). In Revelation 11:1 and 21:15-16, a reed functions as a measuring rod. Spanish 'caña' and French 'roseau' consistently denote the marsh plant across all these varied uses. REED CANE PLANT

2. pen (writing instrument) (1×) A reed pen – a writing instrument made by cutting and shaping a reed stalk to a point. This specialized sense appears only in 3 John 1:13, where the elder writes, 'I had many things to write to you, but I do not wish to write to you with pen and ink.' English 'pen' and the broader Romance and Germanic glosses ('caña,' 'roseau,' 'Rohr') reflect how the same physical object – the reed – transitions from plant to tool depending on context, a natural metonymy understood across cultures. REED CANE PLANT

κᾰλέω G2564 V-ANP (148×)

To call, name, summon, or invite — covering designation by name, divine calling to salvation, summoning to come, and inviting to a feast or gathering.

The verb καλέω (kaleo) is one of the New Testament's most versatile words, bridging everyday speech and profound theology. At its simplest it means to give someone a name — 'you shall call his name Jesus' (Matt 1:21). But Paul transformed it into a technical term for God's sovereign call to salvation: 'those whom he called, he also justified' (Rom 8:30). In narrative passages it retains the basic Greek sense of summoning — Herod secretly calling the Magi (Matt 2:7), Jesus calling his disciples (Matt 4:21). The most concrete sense, 'to invite,' emerges clearly in the parables of banquets (Matt 22:3–9; Luke 14:7–24), where Korean 초대하다 and Spanish invitar sharply distinguish it from mere summoning. Four distinct senses, one word — and context is everything.

1. to name or designate (67×) To give a name or title to someone or something, or to bear a designation. The most frequent sense at 67 occurrences, covering both active naming ('you shall call his name Jesus,' Matt 1:21) and passive bearing of a name ('he shall be called a Nazarene,' Matt 2:23). Spanish llamado ('called/named'), Korean 불리다 (bullida, 'to be called'), and Swahili -itwa all converge on designation rather than summoning. Matthew's infancy narrative is dense with this sense — naming the child in fulfillment of prophecy. The passive 'will be called sons of God' (Matt 5:9) extends naming into identity and status. CALLING AND NAMING

2. to call to salvation or vocation (36×) To call or choose someone for divine purpose, salvation, or spiritual vocation — God as the agent who calls believers to faith, holiness, or service. Predominantly Pauline and epistolary, with 36 occurrences. This is the theologized sense that generates the noun κλῆσις ('calling/vocation') and the adjective κλητός ('called one'). Romans 8:30 chains it into the golden sequence: 'those whom he predestined he also called; those whom he called he also justified.' Spanish fue llamado and Korean 부르심을 받다 (burusim-eul badda, 'to receive a calling') both mark the passive reception of divine initiative. 1 Corinthians 1:9 and Galatians 1:15 are key passages. CALLING AND NAMING

3. to summon or call to come (28×) To summon or call someone to come, to bid a person approach. The basic transitive sense of directing someone to come to the speaker, with 28 occurrences in narrative contexts. Herod calling the Magi (Matt 2:7), Jesus calling disciples (Matt 4:21), summoning servants or crowds. Hindi बुलाना (bulaana, 'to call/summon'), Spanish llamar a, and French appeler in its directive sense all track this meaning. Distinguished from sense 2 by the absence of theological freight and from sense 4 by the absence of hospitality context. Acts 24:2 ('when he had been called') and Matthew 9:13 ('I came not to call the righteous') illustrate the range. CALLING AND NAMING

4. to invite to an event (17×) To invite someone to a feast, banquet, or social gathering. Clearly identified by Korean 초대하다/초대받다 (chodaehada, 'to invite/be invited'), Spanish invitar/invitado, and Swahili -alikwa — all of which use a distinct hospitality verb rather than a generic 'call' word. The 17 occurrences cluster in parable settings: the wedding feast (Matt 22:3–4, 8), the great banquet (Luke 14:7–24), and Simon the Pharisee's dinner (Luke 7:39). Jesus' instruction 'when you are invited to a wedding feast, do not sit in the place of honor' (Luke 14:8) hinges on this sense. The metaphor can extend theologically — the invited who refuse the king's banquet — but the base meaning is concrete social hospitality. CALLING AND NAMING

cultivated olive tree; the domesticated olive as opposed to wild olive

This noun designates the cultivated or garden olive tree, in contrast to the wild olive (agrielaios). In Romans 11:24, Paul describes Gentiles as branches from a wild olive grafted 'contrary to nature' into a cultivated olive tree (kallielaion). The metaphor is botanically backwards—normally one grafts cultivated stock onto wild rootstock, not the reverse. Paul's point is precisely the unnaturalness of Gentile inclusion: God has done something unexpected and gracious, grafting wild branches into Israel's cultivated tree to share in the 'rich root' of the patriarchs.

(1×) Paul employs kallielaios to highlight the superiority of Israel's covenant position—the cultivated, tended tree into which wild Gentiles are grafted. The Spanish 'buen-olivo' (good-olive) and French 'olivier-franc' (true-olive) both convey the domesticated quality. The unnatural graft warns Gentile Christians against arrogance: they have been included by grace, not merit, into a tree they did not plant. If natural branches (Israel) were broken off, grafted-in branches should not presume on their position but continue in faith and humility. OLIVE TREES

καλός G2566 Adj-ANS-C (1×)

very well, better; excellently or more fittingly

This is the comparative form of kalos (good, beautiful), meaning 'better' or 'more fittingly.' In Acts 25:10, Paul responds to Festus's suggestion that he stand trial in Jerusalem: 'I am standing before Caesar's tribunal, where I ought (kallion) to be judged.' The comparative asserts Paul's right to Roman jurisdiction—it is 'more fitting' or 'better' for a Roman citizen accused of no crime against Jewish law to be tried before Caesar's court than before a hostile Sanhedrin. Paul insists on the legal propriety of his appeal.

(1×) Paul uses kallion to assert the appropriateness of his appeal to Caesar. The Spanish 'mejor' (better) captures the comparative force. Paul was not fleeing justice but seeking it—he recognized that a trial in Jerusalem, where Jewish authorities sought his death, would be neither fair nor safe. His Roman citizenship entitled him to imperial jurisdiction, and he exercises that right, insisting that Caesar's tribunal is the more fitting venue for his case. MORAL GOODNESS

κᾰλο-δῐδάσκᾰλος G2567 Adj-AFP (1×)

teachers of what is good; those who instruct in virtue and godly living

This compound adjective describes those who teach what is good or virtuous. In Titus 2:3, Paul instructs that older women should be 'teachers of what is good (kalodidaskalous),' training younger women in godliness and domestic virtue. The term combines 'good' or 'beautiful' with 'teacher,' emphasizing both the content (moral goodness) and the role (instruction). Paul envisions older Christian women mentoring younger ones not just in domestic skills but in character formation, modeling and teaching virtuous living within the faith community.

(1×) Paul employs kalodidaskalos as part of his instruction for Cretan church order. The Spanish 'maestras-de-lo-bueno' (teachers-of-the-good) and German 'Lehrerin-des-Guten' preserve the compound structure. The context shows that 'good things' include self-control, purity, household management, kindness, and submission—virtues that adorn the gospel. This intergenerational discipleship model assigns experienced women the teaching role, creating a mentoring structure where Christian character is transmitted through relationship and example, not just precept. TEACHING AND LEARNING

Καλοί Λιμένες G2568

Fair Havens (Καλοὶ Λιμένες); a harbor on the southern coast of Crete

A harbor on the southern coast of Crete where Paul's ship stopped during his voyage to Rome. Acts 27:8 mentions it as the location where the crew debated whether to winter or press on—a decision that led to shipwreck when they ignored Paul's warning. The name means 'Fair Havens' or 'Good Harbors,' probably a straightforward descriptive title. Ancient and modern sources identify it with a bay near the Cretan town of Lasea. The narrative detail grounds Luke's account in real Mediterranean geography and sailing conditions.

κᾰλοποι-έω G2569 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

to do good, act virtuously; to continue in doing what is right

This verb means to do what is good or right, to act with virtue. In 2 Thessalonians 3:13, Paul exhorts, 'Do not grow weary in doing good (kalopoiountes).' The participle describes ongoing moral action—not a single good deed but a lifestyle of virtue. Paul's concern is that the Thessalonians might become discouraged or exhausted in their commitment to righteousness, perhaps frustrated by others' idleness or opposition. He urges perseverance in well-doing despite weariness or lack of visible reward.

(1×) Paul uses kalopoieō to encourage sustained moral effort. The Spanish 'haciendo-bien' (doing-well) and German 'Gutes-tun' (good-doing) both emphasize active virtue. The danger Paul addresses is not moral failure but moral fatigue—the temptation to stop caring, to lower standards, to give up on faithful living when it seems fruitless. Against this, Paul commands resilience: keep doing good even when it is costly or unappreciated, because virtue is its own reward and God sees faithful endurance. MORAL GOODNESS

καλός G2570 Adj-NNS (101×)

Good, beautiful, excellent; morally commendable or aesthetically fine, also used as a proper-name element in 'Fair Havens.'

While agathos (G0018) emphasizes intrinsic moral goodness, kalos carries a richer aesthetic dimension—what is beautiful, noble, or admirable to behold and experience. The word echoes its classical Greek heritage where physical beauty and moral excellence were intertwined (kalokagathia). Jesus speaks of 'good soil' and 'good fruit' (Matt 13:8, 23), where kalos suggests not just moral fitness but an almost visible flourishing. The rare aesthetic sense surfaces in Luke 21:5 ('beautiful stones') and Matt 13:45 ('beautiful pearls'). Acts 27:8 preserves it as a place-name element: Kaloi Limenes, 'Fair Havens.' German gut and schon together capture what kalos holds in a single word.

1. good, right, excellent (98×) Morally good, commendable, excellent, or of fine quality—used of persons, deeds, fruit, soil, conscience, and works. This dominant sense (98x) pervades the parables and ethical teaching of the Gospels: the 'good seed' sown by the Son of Man (Matt 13:24), 'good works' that glorify the Father (Matt 5:16), and the 'good fight' of faith (1 Tim 6:12). French beau and German schon hint at the aesthetic undertone that distinguishes kalos from agathos, though most translations flatten both to 'good.' MORAL GOODNESS

en: Good, good | es: Buena, buena, bueno | fr: beau | de: gut, schön Matt 3:10; Matt 12:33; Matt 13:8; Matt 13:23

2. beautiful, fair in appearance (2×) Aesthetically pleasing, beautiful, or attractive in physical appearance—describing the outward beauty of objects or persons. Only two clear occurrences: Luke 21:5 describes the temple adorned with 'beautiful stones and gifts,' and Matt 13:45 speaks of 'beautiful pearls.' This sense preserves the classical Greek core of kalos as an aesthetic term, visible in the cognate kallos (beauty). Spanish hermosas and German schon naturally capture this visual dimension. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

3. Fair (in place name) (1×) Used as a proper-name element in the place name Kaloi Limenes ('Fair Havens'), the harbor on the southern coast of Crete where Paul's ship anchored (Acts 27:8). A single occurrence where kalos functions not as a living adjective but as a frozen component of a geographical designation. Spanish renders it Buenos (Puertos), preserving the adjectival flavor within the toponym. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κάλυμμα G2571 N-ANS (4×)

A veil or covering; used figuratively of the spiritual covering over the mind when reading the old covenant.

Denotes a veil or covering placed over something to conceal it. All four New Testament occurrences appear in a single passage, 2 Corinthians 3:13-16, where Paul draws on the image of Moses veiling his face. The kalymma becomes a powerful metaphor for spiritual blindness: a veil lies over the hearts of those who read the old covenant without recognizing Christ. Translations across languages — Spanish velo, French voile, German Decke — consistently render it as a covering or veil, though the German Decke ('cover, blanket') subtly broadens the image beyond a facial veil.

(4×) A veil or covering, used both literally and figuratively. Spanish velo, French voile, and German Decke all denote a covering that conceals. In 2 Cor 3:13 Paul refers to the veil Moses placed over his face; in 3:14-15 it becomes a metaphor for the spiritual covering that prevents understanding of the old covenant; and in 3:16 the veil is removed when one turns to the Lord. The concentrated usage in this single passage gives the word an almost technical theological sense in Pauline thought. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κᾰλύπτ-ω G2572 V-PIA-3S (8×)

To cover, hide, or veil; to place something over so as to conceal, protect, or envelop from sight.

Kalupto means to cover or conceal by placing something over or around an object or person. In the Gospels it describes the sea waves covering a boat (Matt 8:24), a lamp being covered with a vessel (Luke 8:16), and the terrified plea for mountains to fall and cover people (Luke 23:30). Paul uses it of the gospel being veiled to those who are perishing (2 Cor 4:3). The Spanish 'cubierto' and French 'couvrir' both descend from the same Latin root as English 'cover,' reinforcing the consistent core meaning across all eight New Testament occurrences.

cover, hide, veil (8×) To place a covering over something so as to hide, conceal, or shield it from view. Used literally of waves engulfing a boat (Matt 8:24) and figuratively of spiritual concealment, as when Paul says the gospel is 'covered' (veiled) to the perishing (2 Cor 4:3). The multilingual glosses — English 'cover,' Spanish 'cubierto,' French 'couvrir' — uniformly confirm a single semantic core of physical or metaphorical concealment. COVERING AND CONCEALING

καλός G2573 Adv (37×)

well, rightly, fittingly — adverb affirming that something is done in a good, proper, or commendable manner

Kalos is the adverbial form of the adjective kalos ('beautiful, good, noble') and carries a double valence in the New Testament. It can serve as a simple affirmation — 'you do well' (Jas 2:19) — or as biting irony when Jesus tells the Pharisees 'well did Isaiah prophesy about you hypocrites' (Mark 7:6, 9). It modifies ethical behavior in Paul's instruction to do good to all (Gal 6:9) and appears in the phrase kalos poiein ('to do well/rightly') as a general commendation. The French and Spanish both translate it straightforwardly as 'bien,' while German uses 'gut,' all reflecting the adverb's core sense of acting in a manner that is morally fitting, appropriate, or commendable.

well (37×) An adverb affirming that an action is performed rightly, fittingly, or commendably, derived from the adjective kalos ('beautiful, good'). Used both sincerely — 'you will do well' (Acts 15:29; 3 John 6) — and with pointed irony: 'well do you reject the commandment of God' (Mark 7:9). In the formula kalos poieo ('to do well/rightly'), it appears in ethical exhortation (1 Cor 7:37-38; Jas 2:8, 19). Jesus' 'well did Isaiah prophesy' (Matt 15:7; Mark 7:6) turns the commendation into a stinging indictment. The uniform multilingual rendering — Spanish 'bien,' French 'bien,' German 'gut' — confirms its unambiguous adverbial function. MORAL GOODNESS

κάμηλος G2574 N-GFS (6×)

Camel; the large domesticated animal, used in proverbial sayings and descriptions of ascetic clothing.

Kamelos is the Greek borrowing of the Semitic word for camel (Hebrew gamal), referring to the familiar beast of burden of the ancient Near East. In the NT it appears in two memorable settings: the proverbial saying about a camel passing through the eye of a needle, used by Jesus to illustrate the difficulty wealth poses for entering God's kingdom (Matt 19:24; Mark 10:25; Luke 18:25), and the description of John the Baptist's clothing made of camel's hair (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6). Jesus also uses it in his rebuke of the Pharisees who 'strain out a gnat but swallow a camel' (Matt 23:24). Every language renders it with its own loanword from the same Semitic root – Spanish 'camello,' French 'chameau,' German 'Kamel.'

camel (6×) The camel (Camelus dromedarius or C. bactrianus), a large domesticated pack animal of the ancient Near East. All six NT occurrences fall into two clusters: the hyperbolic proverb about a camel through a needle's eye illustrating how hard it is for the rich to enter God's kingdom (Matt 19:24; Mark 10:25; Luke 18:25; cf. Matt 23:24), and John the Baptist's garment of camel's hair signaling his prophetic austerity (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6). The word itself is a Semitic loanword preserved almost identically across languages. LIVING CREATURES

A furnace or kiln; an intense fire used for smelting or burning, often in images of divine judgment.

Refers to an oven, furnace, or kiln — a structure of extreme heat used for smelting metal or firing pottery. In the New Testament it appears exclusively in contexts of judgment and apocalyptic imagery. Jesus warns that evildoers will be thrown into the furnace of fire (Matt 13:42, 50), while Revelation describes the Lord's feet as refined bronze glowing as in a furnace (Rev 1:15) and smoke rising from a great furnace (Rev 9:2). Spanish horno and French fournaise both preserve the industrial intensity of the image.

(4×) A furnace or kiln of extreme heat, used for smelting, burning, or refining. Spanish horno ('oven, furnace'), French fournaise ('furnace'), and German Ofen ('oven, furnace') all convey intense, enclosed heat. In Matt 13:42, 50, Jesus uses it in parables of judgment — the wicked are cast into the furnace of fire. In Rev 1:15 the Son of Man's feet glow like bronze refined in a furnace, and in Rev 9:2 the abyss belches smoke like a great furnace, linking the image to eschatological devastation. καμμύω G2576 V-AIA-3P (2×)

they closed, shut tight, especially the eyes to avoid seeing or understanding

This verb describes the deliberate closing of the eyes, a physical act that becomes a metaphor for spiritual refusal. Jesus quotes Isaiah 6:10 in Matthew 13:15: 'For this people's heart has grown dull, and with their ears they can barely hear, and their eyes they have closed.' Paul repeats the same indictment in Acts 28:27, applying Isaiah's words to the Jewish leaders in Rome who reject the gospel. The aorist tense signals a decisive act—not a gradual drift but a willful shutting out of the light. It captures the tragedy of those who, confronted with truth, choose blindness.

(2×) Both instances quote or echo Isaiah 6:10, describing Israel's hardness of heart. Classical usage (LSJ) includes shutting the eyes or gills (of fish), a physical closing. The Spanish 'cerraron' and French 'fermer les yeux' (close the eyes) preserve the metaphor. The tragic irony is that sight is available—Jesus and the apostles proclaim the kingdom openly—but the hearers close their eyes, preferring darkness. This self-imposed blindness becomes a form of judgment, confirming the division between those who receive the word and those who refuse it. SHUTTING AND CLOSING

grow weary, become tired or exhausted, lose strength through labor or illness

This verb describes physical or spiritual exhaustion. In Hebrews 12:3, the author urges believers to 'consider him who endured such hostility from sinners, so that you may not grow weary (κάμητε) and lose heart.' The context is perseverance under trial—looking to Jesus prevents the soul-weariness that leads to giving up. James 5:15 shifts to physical illness: 'the prayer of faith will save the one who is sick (τὸν κάμνοντα),' where the participle describes someone worn down by sickness. The word thus spans from labor-induced fatigue to the enervation of disease, always implying a depletion that needs restoration.

(2×) The two uses cover spiritual and physical weariness. Classical usage (LSJ) includes working, toiling, being worn out—extended meanings from the root sense of labor. Spanish 'cansarse' (to tire) and French/German 'ermatten' (to weary) fit both contexts. Hebrews addresses the temptation to quit under persecution's grind, while James addresses bodily weakness. In both cases, divine provision—whether through contemplating Christ or through prayer—offers renewal to the weary. WEARINESS AND EXHAUSTION

To bend, bow (especially the knee); an act of worship, submission, or solemn reverence.

Describes the physical act of bending or bowing, nearly always in the New Testament with reference to the knee. Every occurrence carries deep theological weight: bowing the knee before God as an act of worship or submission. Spanish doblar ('to bend, fold') and German beugen ('to bow') both capture the physical gesture, while the contexts elevate it to covenant significance. Paul bows his knees before the Father in prayer (Eph 3:14), and the great Christological hymn declares that every knee shall bow at the name of Jesus (Phil 2:10).

(4×) To bend or bow the knee as an act of worship, reverence, or submission before God. Spanish doblar ('to bend') and German beugen ('to bow') emphasize the physical gesture of kneeling. In Rom 11:4, God has preserved seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal; in Rom 14:11 the Isaiah quotation declares every knee shall bow; Eph 3:14 shows Paul bowing his knees in prayer before the Father; and Phil 2:10 proclaims that at the name of Jesus every knee in heaven, on earth, and under the earth will bow. BOW KNEEL CROUCH

Even if, even though (concessive conjunction); at least (scalar minimal particle)

The crasis form kan (= kai ean or kai an) functions primarily as a concessive conjunction in the New Testament, introducing hypothetical or extreme conditions: 'even if you should die with me' (Matt 26:35), 'even if they drink deadly poison' (Mark 16:18). It appears fifteen times in this intensifying role, stressing that the outcome holds regardless of the condition. A single remarkable occurrence in Acts 5:15 shifts to a scalar or minimizing sense – 'at least Peter's shadow' – where the particle marks the bare minimum of expectation. Spanish captures this distinction neatly, rendering 'aunque' for concessive uses but 'al menos' for the scalar one.

1. even if, even though (concessive conjunction) (15×) The concessive conjunction meaning 'even if, even though, although,' formed by crasis from kai ean. It introduces conditional clauses that express extreme or unlikely scenarios whose truth does not alter the main assertion. In Matt 26:35 Peter swears 'even if I must die with you,' and in Mark 16:18 the promise holds 'even if they drink deadly poison.' Spanish 'aunque,' French 'meme-si,' and German 'auch-wenn' all confirm the concessive force. The fifteen occurrences span conditional promises (Matt 21:21), fearless declarations (Matt 26:35), and touching-the-garment narratives (Mark 5:28, 6:56). CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

2. at least (scalar/minimal particle) (1×) A scalar or minimizing particle meaning 'at least, at the very least,' expressing the bare minimum of an expectation or wish. Only one clear NT instance surfaces: Acts 5:15, where people brought the sick into the streets so that 'at least' (kan) Peter's shadow might fall upon them. The shift from concessive to scalar is subtle but real – the focus moves from 'regardless of the extreme condition' to 'even this minimum would suffice.' Spanish 'al-menos' captures this sense directly, marking it as lexically distinct from the concessive 'aunque' used everywhere else. CONDITIONAL PARTICLES

Cana, a village in Galilee; the site of Jesus' first miracle and the home of Nathanael.

A small village in Galilee, remembered as the setting for Jesus' first public sign — turning water into wine at a wedding feast (John 2:1-11). John's Gospel returns to Cana as a geographic marker: Jesus is there when he heals the royal official's son at Capernaum from a distance (John 4:46), and Nathanael is identified as being from Cana (John 21:2). The name is rendered consistently across languages — Spanish and German Kaná, French Cana — reflecting its indeclinable Semitic origin.

(4×) Cana of Galilee, a village serving as a significant location in the Fourth Gospel. Spanish Kaná, French Cana, and German Kana all transliterate the Semitic place name. In John 2:1, 11, it is where Jesus performs his first sign at a wedding; in John 4:46 it is referenced again when Jesus returns and heals the official's son remotely; and in John 21:2 it is named as Nathanael's hometown. Its repeated appearance in John gives it narrative significance as a place of revelation and faith. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Κανανᾶος G2581 N-AMS (2×)

Cananaean, a designation for Simon the apostle, likely meaning 'Zealot' from Aramaic

This term identifies Simon, one of the Twelve, distinguishing him from Simon Peter. Matthew 10:4 and Mark 3:18 call him 'Simon the Cananaean,' a transliteration of the Aramaic קָנָא (qana), meaning 'zealous' or 'zealot.' Luke renders the same epithet in Greek as 'the Zealot' (Ζηλωτής). The designation may indicate Simon's former association with the Zealot movement—Jewish revolutionaries opposing Roman rule—or simply his fervent character. Either way, it highlights the diverse backgrounds of Jesus' disciples: a former (or fervent) Zealot and a tax collector (Matthew) both following the Prince of Peace.

(2×) Both Gospel occurrences identify Simon among the Twelve by this distinguishing term. The Aramaic root (qana, to be zealous) underlies the Greek transliteration. Spanish and German glosses preserve 'Kananaios' forms, while French uses 'Cananéen.' The name signals Simon's zeal—whether political, religious, or both—and the transformation Jesus works in gathering such varied followers into one community. The presence of a Zealot among the apostles hints at the kingdom's power to reconcile even those previously committed to violent revolution. CANAANITE PEOPLE

Κανδάκη G2582 N-GFS (1×)

Candace, a dynastic title for the queen mother of Ethiopia

Candace was not a personal name but a royal title for the queen mother of Meroë, the ancient kingdom south of Egypt (modern Sudan). In Acts 8:27, the Ethiopian eunuch serves as 'a court official of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, in charge of all her treasure.'

The title indicates a powerful female ruler or queen mother who exercised significant authority. The eunuch's long journey to Jerusalem to worship demonstrates the reach of Jewish influence and prepares for the gospel's spread to Africa through Philip's explanation of Isaiah 53.

(1×) Luke uses Kandakē as a title rather than a name, reflecting the Meroitic royal system. The multilingual forms (French Candace, Spanish Kandákē) preserve the exotic quality. This high-ranking Ethiopian official's conversion represents the gospel crossing racial and geographical boundaries—from Jerusalem to Judea and Samaria, now reaching toward the ends of the earth. Philip's encounter with the eunuch shows the Spirit orchestrating unlikely meetings that fulfill Jesus's commission to be his witnesses to all nations. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Rule, standard, measure; a norm or principle by which something is evaluated or a defined sphere of activity.

Originally a straight rod or measuring stick used by builders, this noun came to mean a 'rule' or 'standard' of measurement. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 10:13-16 to define his God-given 'sphere' or 'field' of ministry, insisting he does not boast beyond the measure assigned to him. In Gal 6:16, it denotes the 'rule' or guiding principle by which believers should walk. Phil 3:16 similarly calls for living according to the same 'standard.' The Spanish 'regla' and French 'regle' directly echo the Latin 'regula,' from which English 'rule' itself derives.

(5×) A rule, standard, or measuring rod—used figuratively for a norm of conduct or a defined sphere of activity. Paul uses it to denote the bounds of his apostolic territory, the 'measure' God assigned him (2 Cor 10:13, 15-16), and as a guiding principle for Christian living (Gal 6:16; Phil 3:16). The word's etymology from a carpenter's straight-edge underlies its metaphorical force. Spanish 'regla,' French 'regle,' and German 'Richtschnur' (lit. 'guideline') all preserve the imagery of a standard for measurement and conduct. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Capernaum, a lakeside town in Galilee that served as the primary base of Jesus' public ministry.

Kapharnaoum (from Hebrew kəfar Nachum, “village of Nahum”) was a fishing settlement on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee. After leaving Nazareth, Jesus made it his adopted home (Matt 4:13) and performed many healings and teachings there, including the healing of the centurion’s servant (Matt 8:5) and the Bread of Life discourse (John 6:59). Despite these mighty works, the town drew prophetic rebuke for its unbelief (Matt 11:23). Spanish renders it Capernaúm, French Capernaüm, and German Kapernaum, each adapting the Semitic name phonetically.

Capernaum (place name) (16×) The proper noun designating the town of Capernaum on Galilee’s northwest shore, functioning as Jesus’ ministry headquarters during his Galilean period. It appears in all four Gospels as the site of key miracles (Mark 1:21-28, John 2:12), teachings, and the calling of disciples. The Hebrew etymology ‘village of Nahum’ is preserved across translations through phonetic transliteration rather than semantic translation, as expected for a geographic name. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κᾰπηλ-εύω G2585 V-PPA-NMP (1×)

peddling, hawking; trading or trafficking in something for profit

This verb means to peddle, hawk, or trade in something, often with negative connotations of commercializing what should not be for sale. In 2 Corinthians 2:17, Paul contrasts himself with many who 'peddle (kapēleuontes) the word of God,' instead speaking 'as persons of sincerity, as from God and in the sight of God.' The term implies corrupting or adulterating the gospel for financial gain—treating sacred truth like merchandise to be sold rather than a message to be faithfully proclaimed. Paul insists he speaks not for profit but from pure motives before God.

(1×) Paul employs kapēleuō to denounce those who commercialize the gospel. The Spanish 'que-trafican' (who-traffic) and French 'trafiquant' both carry mercenary overtones. The verb originally meant retail trading but acquired connotations of adulteration—diluting wine, tampering with goods for profit. Paul accuses many preachers of corrupting God's word for personal gain, while asserting his own pure motives: he speaks commissioned by God, accountable to God, not hustling for donations or tailoring his message to please paying audiences. MERCHANTS AND TRADERS

Smoke; the visible vapor rising from fire, used of theophanic glory, judgment, and apocalyptic destruction.

The common Greek word for smoke — the dark, billowing vapor produced by combustion. While the term is straightforward in its literal sense, the NT deploys it almost exclusively in charged theological and apocalyptic contexts. At Pentecost, Peter quotes Joel's prophecy of 'blood and fire and vapor of smoke' (Acts 2:19). In Revelation, smoke rises from the golden altar's incense before God (Rev 8:4), pours from the abyss like smoke from a great furnace (Rev 9:2), and ascends from the torment of Babylon forever (Rev 14:11; 18:9, 18; 19:3). Every target language uses a single, consistent term (Spanish humo, French fumée, German Rauch), reflecting the word's semantic simplicity even within its dramatic apocalyptic settings.

smoke (13×) Visible vapor arising from fire or burning, used in the NT predominantly in apocalyptic and theophanic imagery. The incense smoke before God's throne (Rev 8:4) conveys worship and divine presence, while the smoke of the abyss (Rev 9:2), of Babylon's burning (Rev 18:9, 18), and of eternal torment (Rev 14:11; 19:3) signal judgment and destruction. Peter's Pentecost sermon quotes Joel's 'vapor of smoke' as a sign of the last days (Acts 2:19). Καππαδοκία G2587 N-GFS (2×)

Cappadocia, a Roman province in central Asia Minor, home to early Christian communities

Cappadocia was a large inland region of Asia Minor, known for its rugged terrain and diverse population. Jews from Cappadocia were present at Pentecost (Acts 2:9), hearing the gospel in their own languages as the Spirit fell. Peter addresses believers scattered across Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia in his first epistle (1 Peter 1:1), indicating established Christian communities in this region by the mid-first century. The area later became a stronghold of early Christianity, producing influential church fathers and monastic traditions. Its mention in Acts and 1 Peter witnesses to the gospel's rapid geographic spread.

(2×) The two occurrences place Cappadocia in lists of regions. Acts 2:9 catalogs the Jewish diaspora represented at Pentecost, while 1 Peter 1:1 addresses Gentile and Jewish Christians scattered across Asia Minor. Multilingual glosses preserve the place name ('Cappadoce' in French, 'Kappadozien' in German). The region's prominence in early Christianity—visible in these texts and in later patristic writings—testifies to the Spirit's work in diverse and far-flung settings, fulfilling Jesus' commission to be witnesses 'to the ends of the earth.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Heart; the inner self as seat of thought, emotion, will, and spiritual life

Kardia in the New Testament is far richer than its anatomical English counterpart. Drawing on the Hebrew lev, it denotes the entire inner person — the seat of thought ('why do you think evil in your hearts,' Matt 9:4), emotion ('let not your hearts be troubled,' John 14:1), will ('purpose of heart,' Acts 11:23), and moral discernment ('the pure in heart shall see God,' Matt 5:8). Every language surveyed uses its core 'heart' word — 'corazón,' 'coeur,' 'Herz,' 'दिल/हृदय' — confirming the universal metaphor of the heart as the center of personhood.

heart (inner self, mind, will) (158×) The inner self or core of a person encompassing thought, emotion, will, and moral-spiritual orientation. Across 158 occurrences, kardia appears as the locus of faith (Rom 10:9), understanding (Matt 13:15), hardness (Mark 3:5), and purity (Matt 5:8). The remarkable cross-linguistic stability — Spanish 'corazón,' French 'coeur,' German 'Herz,' Arabic 'قلب,' Korean '마음' — reflects the near-universal metaphorical mapping of the physical heart to the seat of personhood and intention. HEART (INNER SELF)

knower of hearts, one who discerns the inner thoughts and intentions of the heart

This rare compound describes God's unique ability to know the human heart intimately. In Acts 1:24, the apostles pray for guidance in choosing Judas's replacement: 'Lord, you who know the hearts (καρδιογνώστης) of all, show us which one of these two you have chosen.' The appeal to God as heart-knower grounds their petition —only God can see past external qualifications to the true state of a person's soul. In Acts 15:8, Peter declares that 'God, who knows the heart (καρδιογνώστης), bore witness to them [Gentiles] by giving them the Holy Spirit just as he did to us,' making divine heart-knowledge the basis for accepting Gentile believers without requiring circumcision.

(2×) Both Acts passages invoke God's unique omniscience regarding human hearts. The compound noun (καρδία + γινώσκω) is rare, likely coined or used in Jewish-Christian contexts for this theological concept. Spanish 'conocedor de corazones' and French 'qui connaît le cœur' translate the compound literally. The term underscores that God alone judges truly, seeing motives, faith, and character invisible to human eyes. In both contexts, this divine knowledge authorizes decisions: choosing an apostle and welcoming uncircumcised Gentiles into the church. HEART (INNER SELF)

καρπός G2590 N-GMS (67×)

karpos – fruit, produce, or harvest; used literally of crops and figuratively of moral/spiritual outcomes

The noun karpos ('fruit') operates on two registers in the New Testament. Literally, it denotes agricultural produce – figs, grapes, grain, the yield of land and tree (Matt 21:19; Mark 4:7-8; Luke 13:6-9; Jas 5:7, 18; Rev 22:2 with its twelve kinds of fruit). Figuratively, it is one of the New Testament's most important ethical metaphors: John the Baptist demands 'fruit worthy of repentance' (Matt 3:8), Jesus warns that trees are known by their fruit (Matt 7:16-20), and Paul unfolds the 'fruit of the Spirit' as love, joy, peace, and more (Gal 5:22). Spanish fruto, French fruit, and German Frucht each serve both the literal and figurative senses identically, reflecting how naturally this metaphor transfers across languages.

1. fruit (metaphorical: moral/spiritual outcomes) (42×) Split from sense 70041. Criteria: Figurative fruit denoting moral or spiritual results of a person's life: 'fruit of the Spirit' (Gal 5:22), 'fruit of righteousness' (Phil 1:11), 'fruit of lips' (Heb 13:15), 'fruit worthy of repentance' (Matt 3:8), 'tree known by its fruit' (Matt 7:16-20)

Carpus appears only in 2 Timothy 4:13, where Paul asks Timothy to bring 'the cloak that I left with Carpus at Troas.' The request, along with the mention of books and parchments, paints a poignant picture: Paul imprisoned, facing winter, needing his cloak for warmth and his books for study. Carpus was likely a Christian believer in Troas who hosted Paul or held his belongings. This small detail reveals Paul's humanity—even apostles feel cold, miss their possessions, and depend on friends' hospitality.

(1×) Paul's brief mention of Carpus preserves the name of an otherwise unknown Christian who served the apostle. The name appears uniformly across translations (French Κάρπῳ, Spanish Kárpos, German Karpus). The detail testifies to the networks of ordinary believers who supported Paul's ministry—people like Carpus who offered hospitality, safeguarded belongings, and enabled apostolic work through practical service. Paul's final letter remembers these quiet helpers whose names would otherwise be forgotten. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

To bear fruit; to produce yield, whether literal agricultural produce or figurative spiritual productivity.

Karpophoreo describes the act of producing fruit, drawing on the deeply rooted agricultural imagery of the ancient world. Jesus employs it in the parable of the sower to distinguish the good soil that 'bears fruit' abundantly (Matt 13:23; Mark 4:20; Luke 8:15). Paul extends the metaphor to the spiritual realm, saying believers bear fruit for God (Rom 7:4; Col 1:6, 10). The Spanish 'dar fruto' and French 'porter du fruit' mirror the Greek compound structure (karpos + phoreo) almost exactly, preserving the vivid image of carrying or bringing forth produce.

to bear fruit (8×) To produce fruit, used both of literal agricultural yield (as when seed falls on good soil, Mark 4:28) and of figurative spiritual productivity and moral fruitfulness in a believer's life (Rom 7:4; Col 1:10). The compound structure — karpos ('fruit') plus phoreo ('to bear, carry') — is transparently reflected in Romance translations like Spanish 'dar fruto' and French 'porter du fruit,' all preserving the image of actively carrying forth produce. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

καρποφόρ-ος G2593 Adj-AMP (1×)

fruitful, fruit-bearing; productive or fertile

This adjective describes something that bears fruit or produces crops, whether literal plants or metaphorical productivity. In Acts 14:17, Paul tells the Lycaonians that God 'did not leave himself without witness, doing good by giving you rains from heaven and fruitful (karpophorous) seasons.' The term describes agricultural fertility —seasons that produce harvest, not drought or famine. God's providence in nature serves as testimony to his existence and goodness even among pagans who lack special revelation. Creation's fruitfulness witnesses to the Creator's benevolent power.

(1×) Paul uses karpophoros to describe God's providential care manifest in agricultural blessing. The Spanish 'fructíferos' and French 'endurant' (enduring/fruitful) both point to productive seasons. Paul's argument is that even without Scripture, Gentiles have encountered God through nature's bounty—rain and harvest testify to a good Provider. This natural revelation leaves humanity 'without excuse' (as in Romans 1) but also demonstrates that God has always cared for all people, not abandoning Gentiles to total ignorance. to endure steadfastly, persevere; to be patient or persistent despite hardship

This verb means to endure patiently, hold out, or persevere despite difficulty. In Hebrews 11:27, it describes Moses: 'He persevered (ekarterēsen) as though he saw him who is invisible.' The word conveys steadfast endurance rooted in focused attention—Moses endured Egypt's hostility and the wilderness's hardships by fixing his gaze on the invisible God. Kartereō implies not passive resignation but active, resolute perseverance, remaining faithful when circumstances would justify quitting.

(1×) Hebrews uses kartereō to commend Moses's faith-driven persistence. The Spanish 'perseveró' and German 'ausharren' (endure) both emphasize staying power. Moses left Egypt not fearing Pharaoh's anger because he kept his eyes on the invisible King. The verb captures faith's paradox: seeing the unseen sustains endurance in visible trials. Moses's perseverance becomes paradigmatic—believers endure not by ignoring hardship but by maintaining vision of the eternal God who is more real than temporal suffering. PATIENCE ENDURANCE

Speck, splinter, small piece of dry wood or straw; used figuratively for a minor fault.

Karphos denotes a tiny dry fragment – a speck of straw, a wood chip, or a splinter – so small it could lodge unnoticed in someone's eye. Jesus employs it exclusively in his famous teaching about hypocrisy in judging others: 'Why do you see the speck in your brother's eye but fail to notice the beam in your own?' (Matt 7:3-5; Luke 6:41-42). The dramatic contrast between the karphos (speck) and the dokos (beam or log) makes the parable unforgettable. Spanish 'paja' (straw) and French 'paille' (straw) capture the smallness, while English 'speck' emphasizes its near-invisibility.

(6×) A tiny piece of dry material – a speck, splinter, or chip of wood or straw – small enough to go unnoticed in someone's eye. In classical Greek the word covered any small dry body: twigs, straw, chips, bits of wool. In the NT it appears only in the 'speck and beam' parable (Matt 7:3-5; Luke 6:41-42), where Jesus uses the absurd contrast between a microscopic karphos and a massive dokos (log) to expose the hypocrisy of judging another's minor faults while ignoring one's own glaring sins. The figurative sense of a trivial fault is entirely dependent on this concrete image. STUBBLE AND CHAFF

κατά G2596 Prep (480×)

according to, in conformity with; each, every; throughout; at, in; by; toward; alone; concerning; down; beyond; against

The most semantically diverse preposition in the New Testament, originally meaning 'down' but expanding to cover conformity, distribution, location, and opposition. With 480 occurrences, κατά governs both genitive (downward motion, opposition) and accusative (standard, distribution, location) cases. Its primary sense expresses conformity—'according to the law,' 'according to the flesh'—establishing the norm or standard by which something is measured. But it also distributes (daily, house by house), locates (in the city, at the place), expresses means (by ancestry), indicates direction (toward Cyrene), and even marks hostility (against). The semantic stretch from spatial 'down' to abstract 'according to' reflects typical Greek prepositional development from concrete to metaphorical domains.

1. according to, in conformity with (332×) The dominant New Testament sense appearing 332 times: marking conformity to a standard, norm, or basis for judgment. This 'according to' usage with the accusative expresses that actions, judgments, or states correspond to some measure—kata ton nomon (according to the law), kata sarka (according to the flesh). Cross-linguistic parallels appear in countless translations rendering this normative sense. Paul constantly uses it for theological standards: kata pneuma (according to the Spirit), kata charin (according to grace). The sense establishes the measuring stick by which reality is assessed. 2. each, every (distributive) (42×) Distributive usage indicating individual allocation or repeated occurrence—'each,' 'every'—appearing 42 times with the accusative. Phrases like kath' hemeran (daily, literally 'according to each day'), kath' hena (one by one), and kat' oikon (house by house) show this sense spreading action or state across multiple instances. Jesus taught 'daily' in the temple (Matt 26:55), believers gathered 'in each house' (Acts 2:46), and disciples questioned 'each one' whether he was the betrayer (Mark 14:19). The sense parcels out what in English would be expressed by distributive quantifiers. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

This describes movement or presence distributed across territory: kata ten Ioudaian (throughout Judea), kata ten choran (through the region). Luke notes Jesus' fame spread 'throughout all the surrounding region' (Luke 4:14), and there will be 'earthquakes in various places' (kata topous, Mark 13:8). Joseph is warned 'in a dream' (kat' onar, Matt 1:20), or events happen 'at the place' (kata ton topon). 5. by (instrumental means or manner) (19×) Instrumental or manner usage expressing means, mode, or attendant circumstance—'by,' 'through,' 'with'—19 occurrences with the accusative. Kata sarka can mean 'by/through the flesh' rather than 'according to fleshly standards.' Mark notes the new teaching comes 'with authority' (kat' exousian, Mark 1:27), and Jesus takes disciples aside 'privately' (kat' idian can be manner, Mark 6:31-32). This includes kata prosopon (facing, in the presence of), kata Kyrenen (toward Cyrene, Acts 8:26). Simeon prophesies the child is 'prepared before the face of all peoples' (kata prosopon panton, Luke 2:31). Jesus frequently withdraws with disciples 'privately' (kat' idian, Matt 14:13, 23; 17:1, 19). The phrase literally means 'according to one's own' but idiomatically expresses being apart from the crowd. Paul writes of Epaphras reporting 'concerning your love' (Eph 1:15) and ta kata me (the things concerning me, Eph 6:21). Felix had knowledge 'concerning the Way' (kata ten hodon, Acts 24:22). 9. down, down from (4×) The original spatial sense with the genitive: downward motion from higher to lower—'down,' 'down from'—four occurrences. Pigs rush 'down the cliff' (kata tou kremnou, Matt 8:32, Mark 5:13, Luke 8:33), and Paul discusses covering one's head 'down from the head' (kata kephales, 1 Cor 11:4). Paul describes tribulation 'beyond measure' (kath' hyperbolen, 2 Cor 1:8), glory 'beyond all comparison' (2 Cor 4:17), and how he persecuted the church 'violently' (kath' hyperbolen, Gal 1:13). A fierce wind blows 'against' the ship (Acts 27:14), and Jude warns of ungodly people speaking 'harsh things against' the Lord (kata kyriou, Jude 15, twice). This adversarial sense develops naturally from downward motion (pressing down upon) to opposition or hostility, though it's relatively rare in the NT compared to other 'against' prepositions (anti, epi). καταβαίνω G2597 V-PPA-ANS (82×)

To go down, come down, descend; physical downward movement of persons, objects, or divine manifestations.

The standard Greek verb for downward movement, compounding kata ('down') with baino ('go'). It describes Jesus descending from mountains (Matt 8:1), the Spirit descending like a dove at baptism (Matt 3:16), rain and floods descending upon a house (Matt 7:25, 27), and angels ascending and descending on the Son of Man (John 1:51). The verb also carries theological weight when applied to divine descent—bread from heaven (John 6:33, 41, 50, 51, 58), the new Jerusalem coming down from God (Rev 21:2). All target languages use dedicated descent verbs: Spanish 'bajó/descendió,' French 'descendre,' German 'hinabsteigen.'

1. go/come down physically (79×) The core and dominant sense (79 occurrences): physical downward movement from a higher to a lower location. Covers persons descending mountains, traveling from elevated cities, going down to water, and divine/heavenly figures descending. Key passages include the Spirit descending at Jesus' baptism (Matt 3:16), rain descending on a house (Matt 7:25), and the bread of life descending from heaven (John 6:33). Spanish 'bajó/descendió,' French 'descendre,' and German 'hinabsteigen/steigt herab' all uniformly express directional downward motion. DESCENDING AND TEARING

2. (2×) A figurative-prophetic use (2 occurrences) expressing forced abasement or descent into Hades, both addressed to cities in divine judgment. At Matthew 11:23 and Luke 10:15, Jesus declares 'you will be brought down to Hades' regarding Capernaum. English 'you will be brought down' and Spanish 'descenderás' preserve the passive/future judgment tone. The verb's physical 'going down' merges with the cosmological concept of descent to the underworld, producing a metaphor of catastrophic divine humiliation. DESCENDING AND TEARING

3. (1×) A singular occurrence at Luke 22:44 describing Jesus' sweat 'falling down' like drops of blood in Gethsemane. English 'falling' and Spanish 'cayendo' shift from the typical 'descend' to 'fall,' reflecting the unusual subject (sweat rather than a person). The downward motion here is of liquid dripping to the ground, extending the verb's spatial semantics from volitional travel to gravitational descent of bodily fluid under extreme duress. καταβάλλω G2598 V-PPM-NMP (2×)

struck down, cast down, thrown to the ground but not destroyed

The verb captures violent action—throwing down, overthrowing, casting to the ground. Paul uses the participle in 2 Corinthians 4:9 to describe the paradox of apostolic suffering: 'persecuted but not forsaken, struck down but not destroyed (καταβαλλόμενοι ἀλλ' οὐκ ἀπολλύμενοι).' The image is physical—knocked to the ground—yet Paul insists this is not final defeat. Hebrews 6:1 uses the noun form metaphorically: 'leaving the elementary doctrine of Christ, let us go on to maturity, not laying (καταβαλλόμενοι) again a foundation,' where the sense is establishing or setting down foundational teachings.

(2×) The two occurrences span literal striking down (2 Cor 4:9) and metaphorical foundation-laying (Heb 6:1). Classical usage (LSJ) includes throwing down, overthrowing, even slaying victims. Spanish 'derribados' (knocked down) and French/German 'niederwerfen' (cast down) fit the physical violence. Paul's catalog of afflictions in 2 Corinthians uses the term to convey brutal opposition that does not prevail, while Hebrews uses the metaphor of laying a foundation to describe initial teaching. Both contexts involve something placed or struck down, whether believers or doctrines. THROWING AND CASTING burden, weigh down, impose a load or obligation on someone

This verb means to burden or impose a weight upon someone. Mark 14:40 describes the disciples in Gethsemane: 'their eyes were very heavy (κατεβαρημένοι),' weighed down with sleep, unable to stay awake with Jesus. Paul uses it metaphorically in 2 Corinthians 12:16, defending himself against accusations: 'I did not burden (κατεβάρησα) you,' meaning he did not impose financial demands on the Corinthian church. The term thus describes both physical oppression (eyelids heavy with exhaustion) and relational or economic imposition (burdening others with one's needs).

(2×) The two uses involve physical weariness (Mark) and financial restraint (2 Corinthians). Classical usage (LSJ) includes weighing down, overloading, being crushed. Spanish 'cargados' (loaded, burdened) and German 'beschweren' (to burden) capture the weight metaphor. Mark's account poignantly shows the disciples unable to bear the weight of wakefulness during Jesus' agony, while Paul's apostolic practice was to avoid burdening churches financially, working with his own hands to maintain independence and model self-sufficiency. HONOR AND WEIGHT descent, way down; a downward path or slope

This noun denotes a descent, downward path, or declivity—literally, a way down. In Luke 19:37, it describes Jesus's triumphal entry: as he was approaching Jerusalem, 'at the descent (katabasei) of the Mount of Olives,' the whole multitude of disciples began to praise God. The geographical detail locates the event on the eastern slope of Olivet, where the road descends toward the Kidron Valley and the city. The setting is significant: from this vantage point, pilgrims caught their first full view of the temple, naturally prompting celebration.

(1×) Luke uses katabasis to precisely locate the crowd's praise. The Spanish 'bajada' and French 'descente' both mean descent or downward slope. The Mount of Olives' descent offered a dramatic view of Jerusalem and the temple, making it a fitting location for the disciples' acclamation of Jesus as king. The geographical precision grounds the triumphal entry in real topography, while the location itself—overlooking the temple Jesus would cleanse and the city he would weep over—adds poignancy to the moment. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to bring down, cause to descend; to lower from a higher place

A causative verb meaning to make something or someone go down—to bring down from a height, lower, or drive downward. Classical authors use it for bringing someone down from a funeral pyre, forcing an army to descend to level ground, or driving away enemies. Metaphorically it means to lower oneself from pride to humility, or to bring a narrative down chronologically. In grammar it describes throwing an accent forward (bringing it down). The compound intensifies the simple verb 'to go down' with causative force: not just descending but making someone or something descend.

A laying down or founding; used of the world's foundation from creation, and once of the depositing of seed (conception).

Katabolē carries the root idea of 'casting down' or 'laying down,' and in the New Testament it appears overwhelmingly in the phrase apo katabolēs kosmou — 'from the foundation of the world' — a majestic temporal marker reaching back to the very beginning of creation (Matt 13:35, John 17:24, Eph 1:4, Rev 13:8). This phrase frames God's sovereign purposes as established before anything existed. One striking exception occurs in Heb 11:11, where the same word describes Sarah receiving power eis katabolēn spermatos — 'for the depositing of seed,' i.e., conception. The multilingual evidence reflects this split: most languages use 'foundation' (Spanish fundación, German Grundlegung, French fondation), while Heb 11:11 draws 'conception' in English.

1. (10×) Foundation or founding, used exclusively in the phrase 'foundation of the world' (katabolē kosmou) to mark the moment of creation as the starting point of God's eternal purposes. Ten of eleven NT occurrences carry this sense. Jesus speaks of things 'hidden from the foundation of the world' (Matt 13:35), and Paul declares that God chose believers 'before the foundation of the world' (Eph 1:4). Translations converge remarkably across languages — Spanish fundación, French fondation, German Grundlegung — all pointing to an architectural metaphor: God laying the groundwork of the cosmos. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. (1×) The depositing or sowing of seed, i.e., biological conception. Found only in Heb 11:11 where Sarah 'received power for the depositing of seed' (eis katabolēn spermatos), enabling her to conceive despite her age. The underlying metaphor shifts from laying a building's foundation to sowing seed in the ground — both acts of katabolē ('casting down'). English translations uniquely render this 'conception,' while Spanish and French retain fundación/fondation, perhaps not fully capturing the biological specificity the Greek carries here. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

καταβρᾰβεύω G2603 V-PMA-3S (1×)

to disqualify, deprive of a prize; to judge against or rob of reward

This verb combines 'judge' (brabeuō) with 'against' (kata), meaning to judge someone unworthy of a prize, to disqualify, or to cheat someone of their reward. In Colossians 2:18, Paul warns, 'Let no one disqualify (katabrabeuetō) you, insisting on asceticism and worship of angels.' The image is athletic: a judge ruling a competitor ineligible or denying them their rightful prize. Paul warns against false teachers who would declare believers unfit or inadequate unless they adopt extra-biblical practices—these judges have no authority to disqualify those whom Christ has declared righteous.

(1×) Paul employs katabrabeuō to warn against false teachers acting as illegitimate judges. The Spanish 'prive-del-premio' (deprive-of-prize) and German 'betruegen' (cheat) both capture the wrongful denial. The false teachers in Colossae promoted mystical visions, angel worship, and harsh asceticism, implying that ordinary faith was insufficient. Paul rejects their authority: they cannot disqualify believers whom Christ has qualified. Salvation and standing before God depend on Christ alone, not on visions, angelic intermediaries, or self-imposed regulations. DECEPTION AND BEGUILING

proclaimer, announcer, herald; one who proclaims or declares publicly

This noun designates a proclaimer or herald, someone who announces or declares something publicly. In Acts 17:18, Epicurean and Stoic philosophers encounter Paul in Athens and ask, 'What does this babbler wish to say?' Others said, 'He seems to be a proclaimer (katangeleus) of foreign divinities'—because he preached Jesus and the resurrection. The term is neutral—a herald or announcer—but the philosophers use it dismissively. They recognize that Paul is proclaiming something, but they misunderstand his message as polytheistic, introducing new gods.

(1×) The Athenian philosophers apply katangeleus to Paul, identifying him as a religious herald. The Spanish 'anunciador' and French 'annoncer' both mean proclaimer or announcer. The philosophers hear Paul's message about Jesus and resurrection (anastasis) and think he is introducing two new deities: Jesus and his consort Anastasis. The misunderstanding shows how foreign the gospel sounded to Greek ears, yet Paul is indeed a herald—not of foreign divinities but of the one true God and his risen Son. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING to proclaim publicly, announce authoritatively — to declare a message or teaching openly before an audience

Katangello is a compound of kata ('down, thoroughly') and angello ('to announce'), yielding a verb that means to proclaim with full authority and public force. All 18 of its New Testament occurrences cluster in Acts and the Pauline epistles, making it a distinctly missionary and kerygmatic term. In Acts, the apostles 'proclaim' the resurrection of Jesus (Acts 4:2), the word of God in synagogues (Acts 13:5), and forgiveness of sins through Christ (Acts 13:38). The prophets from Samuel onward are said to have 'proclaimed' these days (Acts 3:24). Paul tells the Corinthians that whenever they eat the bread and drink the cup, they 'proclaim the Lord's death until he comes' (1 Cor 11:26). In Philippians 1:17-18, Paul marvels that Christ is being 'proclaimed' even by rivals with impure motives — what matters is that the message goes forth. Colossians 1:28 declares 'Him we proclaim, warning and teaching everyone.' Spanish 'proclamar/anunciar,' French 'annoncer/proclamer,' and German 'verkundigen' all carry the same public-declaration force.

proclaim publicly, announce (18×) To declare a message publicly and authoritatively, especially the gospel of Christ's death, resurrection, and forgiveness. The term is concentrated in Acts and Paul's letters as a missionary and worship word. In Acts, the apostles proclaim the resurrection (Acts 4:2), the word of God in the synagogues of Cyprus (Acts 13:5), and forgiveness through Jesus (Acts 13:38; 17:3, 13; 26:23). Paul uses it for the eucharistic proclamation of the Lord's death (1 Cor 11:26), for his own apostolic mission of 'proclaiming Christ' (Col 1:28), and for the paradox that Christ is proclaimed even through envious preachers (Phil 1:17-18). The kata- prefix intensifies the thoroughness and public reach of the announcement. Spanish 'anunciar' and French 'proclamer' confirm the single declaration sense. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

to laugh at, mock, ridicule, deride; to scorn with laughter

This verb means to laugh at or mock someone scornfully. All three occurrences describe crowds ridiculing Jesus when he announced a dead child was sleeping, not dead. Matthew 9:24, Mark 5:40, and Luke 8:53 all record the mourners' derisive laughter when Jesus said the girl would rise. Classical usage includes laughing at someone with contempt, jeering, and being derided. The New Testament use captures the scornful response of those who thought Jesus' claim absurd—their mocking laughter preceded their amazement when he raised the girl. The word emphasizes not just laughter but contemptuous, dismissive laughter that treats someone's claim as ridiculous.

(3×) The sense is scornful, contemptuous laughter directed at someone. The identical context across all three Synoptics shows the word in action: professional mourners and crowds gathered for death are told the child merely sleeps, and they laugh at Jesus derisively—the claim seems absurd. Their laughter expresses complete dismissal of his statement. The imperfect tense (κατεγέλων) suggests continued or repeated laughing—they kept on mocking him. The Spanish 'burlarse' and German 'auslachen' capture the scornful, derisive quality. This isn't joyful laughter but the laughter of contempt and dismissal, which makes the subsequent raising of the girl all the more vindicating—those who mocked became those who marveled. MOCKERY AND SCORN

καταγιγνώσκω G2607 V-PSA-3S (3×)

to condemn, judge against, find fault with; to form an unfavorable judgment

This verb means to judge against, condemn, or form an unfavorable judgment about someone. Paul uses it in Galatians 2:11 describing his confrontation with Peter: 'I opposed him to his face, because he stood condemned' (or 'was clearly in the wrong'). First John uses it twice regarding conscience: if our heart condemns us (3:20), God is greater; but if our heart does not condemn us (3:21), we have confidence. Classical usage includes observing something to one's prejudice, forming unfavorable judgments, and despising. The New Testament use spans objective condemnation (Peter's hypocrisy) and subjective self-condemnation (conscience accusing).

(3×) The sense centers on rendering an unfavorable judgment or condemnation. Galatians uses it for Peter's objectively condemnable conduct—withdrawing from Gentile fellowship under pressure, thereby contradicting the gospel. He 'stood condemned' either by his own actions or by others' judgment of them. First John uses it for conscience's condemning voice—the heart's accusation when we fall short. The Spanish 'condenar/condenado' and German 'verurteilen' (to condemn) capture the judicial quality. Whether Peter's hypocrisy earning censure or conscience rendering internal verdict, the word marks the judgment that finds against someone. John's pastoral point: even when self-condemned by conscience, God's greater knowledge and mercy provide hope beyond self-accusation. CONDEMN JUDGE GUILTY

κατ-άγνῡμι G2608 V-FIA-3S (4×)

To break, shatter, snap; used of breaking bones or a bruised reed, implying forceful fracture.

Denotes a forceful breaking or shattering, whether of bones, reeds, or other rigid objects. Its New Testament usage spans tender mercy and brutal execution. In Matthew 12:20, quoting Isaiah, Jesus is the servant who will not break a bruised reed — a portrait of gentleness toward the fragile. In John 19:31-33, Roman soldiers break the legs of the crucified to hasten death, but find Jesus already dead. Spanish quebrar ('to break, shatter') and German zerbrechen ('to break apart') both capture the violence of fracture inherent in the word.

(4×) To break or shatter something rigid, especially bones or a reed, implying forceful fracture. Spanish quebrar ('to shatter') and German zerbrechen ('to break apart') both convey destructive force. In Matt 12:20, the Isaianic quotation promises the Messiah will not break a bruised reed, using the word to highlight the gentleness of one who could break but chooses not to. In John 19:31-33, it describes the Roman practice of crurifragium — breaking the legs of crucified men — applied to the two criminals but not to Jesus, fulfilling the Passover lamb typology that no bone shall be broken. BREAKING AND SHATTERING

κατ-άγω G2609 V-AIP-1P (9×)

To lead or bring down from a higher place; also nautical: to bring a ship to land, to put in at port.

Compounded from κατά (down) and ἄγω (lead), this verb describes downward movement of persons or vessels. In Acts it appears repeatedly as Paul is escorted down — from Jerusalem to Caesarea (Acts 9:30; 23:15, 20, 28), or from the barracks to the Sanhedrin (Acts 22:30). The nautical sense surfaces twice in Paul's voyage to Rome: 'we landed at Sidon' (Acts 27:3) and 'having landed at Syracuse' (Acts 28:12). Spanish captures the split neatly: 'hacer bajar' and 'llevar' for bringing a person down, but 'atracar' (to dock) for the nautical arrivals — a technical maritime term that confirms the distinct semantic register.

1. bring down / lead down (a person) (7×) To bring or lead a person down from one place to another, typically from a higher elevation or from one city to another. Used extensively in Acts for escorting Paul: the disciples brought him down to Caesarea (Acts 9:30), the commander brought him down to the council (Acts 22:30), and the tribune was asked to bring him down to the Sanhedrin (Acts 23:15, 20, 28). Luke 5:11 uses it for bringing boats to land. Spanish employs 'hacer bajar' (cause to descend) and 'llevar' (take/lead), while German uses 'hinabführen' (lead down), all preserving the directional component. GOING AND LEADING

2. land / put in to shore (nautical, intransitive) (2×) A nautical technical term in passive or intransitive use for a ship putting in at port or coming to shore. In Acts 27:3 Paul's ship 'landed at Sidon,' and in Acts 28:12 they 'put in at Syracuse.' Spanish shifts to the specialized maritime verb 'atracar' (to dock/berth), clearly distinguishing this from the general sense of leading a person downward. The passive form κατήχθημεν ('we were brought down' = 'we landed') reflects ancient Greek maritime idiom where the ship, not its passengers, is grammatically 'led down' to shore. GOING AND LEADING to conquer, overcome, subdue; to prevail against in struggle

This verb means to prevail against, overcome in struggle, or conquer. In Hebrews 11:33, it describes the exploits of Old Testament saints: through faith they 'conquered (katēgōnisanto) kingdoms, enforced justice, obtained promises.' The verb appears in the context of battle or contest, denoting decisive victory over opposition. Faith enabled judges like Gideon and kings like David to overcome militarily superior enemies—not through their own strength but through reliance on God who fights for his people.

(1×) Hebrews employs katagōnizomai to celebrate faith's victorious power. The Spanish 'conquistaron' and French 'surmonter' (overcome) both convey triumphant conquest. The heroes of faith subdued kingdoms not by human might but by trusting God—Gideon with 300 men, David against Goliath, Joshua at Jericho. The verb demonstrates that faith is not passive resignation but active engagement that sees God's power overcome humanly impossible odds, conquering what natural strength could not defeat. to bind up, bandage; to dress or wrap a wound

This verb means to bind up or bandage, especially wounds—to wrap or dress injuries for healing. In Luke 10:34, the Good Samaritan 'bound up (katedēsen) his wounds, pouring on oil and wine.' The action shows practical medical care: the Samaritan cleansed the wounds with wine (antiseptic), soothed them with oil, and bandaged them to protect and promote healing. Katadeō appears in contexts of compassionate care for the injured, treating wounds to restore health and wholeness.

(1×) Luke uses katadeō to describe the Samaritan's hands-on care for the wounded traveler. The Spanish 'vendó' and French 'bander' both mean to bandage. The detail demonstrates costly compassion: the Samaritan did not just feel pity but acted, providing first aid, transportation, lodging, and payment for ongoing care. Jesus tells this parable to define 'neighbor'—not those near by ethnicity or geography but anyone whose need we can meet, even our enemies. Binding wounds is neighbor-love incarnate. evident, manifest, clearly visible or known

This adjective describes something that has become completely clear and undeniable. In Hebrews 7:15 it introduces the evident change in priesthood under Christ, where the shift from Levitical to Melchizedekian order is so obvious it requires no argument. The multilingual glosses (evident, manifesto, manifeste, offenbar) all emphasize the public, unmistakable nature of what is being revealed. Classical usage shows the word applied to things discovered or made known through observation.

(1×) The single New Testament occurrence appears in a formal theological argument where Paul establishes that the change in priesthood is κατάδηλος—not hidden or debatable, but manifest to all who consider the evidence. The cross-linguistic consensus on 'evident/manifest' confirms this is about epistemic clarity, not mere visibility. MANIFEST AND EVIDENT

καταδῑκ-άζω G2613 V-PMA-2P (6×)

To condemn, pronounce guilty, pass judicial sentence against someone.

Katadikazo is a legal term meaning to give judgment against a person, to condemn or pass sentence. In the NT, Jesus uses it powerfully in both warning and invitation: 'by your words you will be condemned' (Matt 12:37), and 'do not condemn, and you will not be condemned' (Luke 6:37). He also challenges the Pharisees that if they had understood mercy, they would not have condemned the guiltless (Matt 12:7). Paul's accusers before Festus seek a formal verdict of condemnation against him (Acts 25:15). James uses the related noun form to accuse the rich of condemning the righteous (Jas 5:6). The kata- prefix intensifies the basic idea of judging, giving it the force of a decisive adverse ruling.

condemn, pass sentence against (6×) To pronounce a guilty verdict or pass sentence against someone, whether in a formal legal proceeding or a moral judgment. The kata- prefix (down, against) intensifies dikazo (to judge), yielding the sense of ruling decisively against the accused. Jesus employs the word both as warning – careless words will bring condemnation (Matt 12:37) – and as exhortation to mercy: 'Do not condemn, and you will not be condemned' (Luke 6:37). It also appears in formal judicial contexts (Acts 25:15). Spanish 'condenar' and French 'condamner' preserve the Latin-rooted courtroom gravity of the term. CONDEMN JUDGE GUILTY pursue closely, follow hard after

This compound verb intensifies the simple 'pursue' with a prefix suggesting downward or thorough action. Mark 1:36 uses it for the disciples' urgent search for Jesus after he withdrew to pray—they 'hunted him down' or 'pursued him closely.' The Spanish 'siguió' (followed) and German 'verfolgen' (pursue) capture the determined tracking involved. Classical Greek uses it for close military pursuit and even for metaphorically 'chasing after' goals. The single biblical occurrence suggests eagerness and determination in the search.

(1×) Simon and his companions engage in an active, determined search for Jesus in the early morning, not a casual looking-about. The verb choice suggests the urgency and thoroughness of their pursuit—they tracked him down to his place of prayer. This aligns with the classical sense of close, relentless following. καταδουλ-όω G2615 V-PIA-3S (2×)

enslave, bring into bondage, reduce to slavery whether literal or metaphorical

This verb describes the act of enslaving, whether politically or spiritually. Paul warns the Galatians (2:4) about false brothers who 'slipped in to spy out our freedom that we have in Christ Jesus, so that they might enslave (καταδουλώσουσιν) us'—a spiritual bondage to law-based righteousness. In 2 Corinthians 11:20, Paul sarcastically describes how the Corinthians tolerate those who 'enslave (καταδουλοῖ) you, devour you, take advantage of you.' The term conveys domination, the loss of freedom, and subjugation to another's will. It stands opposed to the liberty Christ brings, exposing any teaching or authority that binds believers instead of freeing them.

(2×) Both Pauline uses involve false teachers or leaders imposing bondage on believers. Classical usage (LSJ) includes reducing cities or people to slavery, breaking their spirit. Spanish 'esclavizar' (to enslave) and French/German forms ('asservir,' 'knechten') express the domination. Paul's apostolic burden is to guard the freedom won by Christ against those who would re-impose bondage—whether through legalism (Galatians) or authoritarian control (2 Corinthians). The verb starkly contrasts the gospel's liberating power with the oppressive tactics of its opponents. OPPRESSION AND TYRANNY

oppress, exploit, dominate or mistreat those with less power

This verb describes the abuse of power against the vulnerable. James 2:6 rebukes the church for showing favoritism to the rich, asking, 'Is it not the rich who oppress (καταδυναστεύουσιν) you, and drag you into court?' The term indicts systemic exploitation of the poor by the powerful. In Acts 10:38, Peter preaches that Jesus 'went about doing good and healing all who were oppressed (καταδυναστευομένους) by the devil,' where oppression is demonic as well as social. The word thus spans economic injustice and spiritual tyranny, both forms of domination God opposes through Christ's liberating ministry.

(2×) The two occurrences address economic (James) and demonic (Acts) oppression. Classical and Septuagint usage (LSJ) includes oppressing the poor, getting control through force. Spanish 'oprimir' and French/German 'opprimer,' 'unterdrücken' capture the domination. James challenges the church's complicity in honoring the very class that exploits them, while Peter's sermon presents Jesus as the champion of the oppressed, healing and delivering those under satanic bondage. Both texts call God's people to resist oppression and align with the vulnerable. OPPRESSION AND TYRANNY

καταισχύν-ω G2617 V-ASP-3S (13×)

To put to shame, disgrace; passively, to be put to shame or disappointed in one's trust

The verb καταισχύνω carries the force of shaming or disgracing someone, with a crucial active/passive distinction running through its NT uses. In the active voice, God deploys shame as a weapon of reversal: 'God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise' (1 Cor 1:27). In the passive, it describes the experience of being shamed or, more precisely, of having one's confidence vindicated or not – as in the great promise of Rom 9:33 and 10:11 that 'whoever believes in him will not be put to shame.' Spanish captures both poles vividly: avergüence (active shaming) versus eran avergonzados (passive experience).

1. be put to shame (passive) (7×) The passive experience of being put to shame, disgraced, or disappointed in one's hope or trust. The subject is the one who suffers or might suffer the shame, and the verb often carries an eschatological edge – the believer's confidence in God will ultimately not be confounded. Paul quotes Isaiah in Rom 9:33 and 10:11 with the promise 'will not be put to shame,' and 1 Pet 2:6 echoes the same assurance. In 2 Cor 7:14 and 9:4 the shame concerns apostolic credibility. Multilingual glosses converge on passive verbal forms: 'fui avergonzado' (Spanish), 'confondre/couvrir de honte' (French), 'beschaemen' (German), confirming the experiential direction of the shame. SHAME AND REVERENCE

en: I-was-put-to-shame, may-be-put-to-shame, we-might-be-put-to-shame | es: eran-avergonzados, fui-avergonzado, seamos-avergonzados | fr: confondre, couvrir-de-honte | de: beschaemen, κατῃσχύνοντο Luke 13:17; Rom 9:33; Rom 10:11; 2Cor 7:14; 2Cor 9:4

2. put to shame (active) (6×) The active infliction of shame upon someone – causing disgrace, humiliating, or confounding. Here the subject is the agent who shames, and the verb often appears in divine-reversal contexts where God overturns human status hierarchies. In 1 Cor 1:27 God 'chose the foolish things to shame the wise,' and in 1 Cor 11:4-5 a person who prays with head improperly covered 'shames his/her head.' Rom 5:5 offers the theological negative: 'hope does not put us to shame.' Spanish distinguishes clearly with active forms (avergüence, avergonzáis), and the broader translation evidence consistently marks the agent-oriented causative sense. SHAME AND REVERENCE

en: he-might-shame, puts-to-shame, shame | es: avergonzáis, avergüence, avergüenza | fr: confondre | de: beschaemen Rom 5:5; 1Cor 1:27; 1Cor 11:4; 1Cor 11:5

κατακαίω G2618 V-FIA-3S (12×)

To burn up completely or consume by fire, whether actively setting ablaze or passively being consumed in flames.

Katakaioo intensifies the basic verb 'to burn' with the prefix kata-, signaling thorough, complete combustion. John the Baptist warns that the Coming One 'will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire' (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17), and Jesus' parable instructs servants to 'gather the weeds and burn them' (Matt 13:30). In the passive, Revelation's apocalyptic imagery depicts a third of the earth being burned up (Rev 8:7) and Babylon consumed in flames (Rev 18:8). Spanish distinguishes active 'quemará' (he will burn) from passive 'fue quemada' (she was burned), while both French 'brûler/consumer' and German 'verbrennen' preserve the totality of destruction this word conveys.

1. to be burned up, consumed by fire (passive) (7×) The passive experience of being consumed or destroyed by fire. In Matt 13:40, the weeds 'are burned' as an image of eschatological judgment. Paul warns that a builder whose work does not survive testing will suffer loss as it 'is burned up' (1 Cor 3:15). Hebrews 13:11 notes that sacrificial animals were 'burned outside the camp.' Revelation's visions of cosmic fire – a third of trees burned (Rev 8:7), the great city burned (Rev 18:8) – employ this passive voice to depict overwhelming, unstoppable destruction. Spanish 'es quemada' and 'será quemada' emphasize the subject's helplessness before the consuming flames. FIRE AND BURNING

en: are-burned, is-burned, she-will-be-burned | es: es-quemada, fue-quemada, será-quemada | fr: brûler, consumer | de: verbrennen, κατακαίεται Matt 13:40; 1Cor 3:15; Heb 13:11; Rev 8:7

2. to burn up, consume by fire (active) (5×) The active, transitive act of setting fire to something and burning it completely. John the Baptist proclaims that the Messiah 'will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire' (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17), and Jesus commands that the weeds be bound and burned (Matt 13:30). In Acts 19:19, Ephesian converts 'burned' their magic scrolls publicly. Revelation 17:16 describes the beast and the ten horns who 'will burn her with fire.' Spanish 'quemará' (he will burn) and German 'verbrennen' capture the deliberate, purposeful agency of the one who ignites the blaze. FIRE AND BURNING

κατακᾰλύπτω G2619 V-PIM/P-3S (3×)

to cover, veil; to cover one's head, especially in worship contexts

This verb means to cover or veil, appearing three times in 1 Corinthians 11 during Paul's complex discussion of head coverings in worship. Verse 6 argues that if a woman doesn't cover her head, she should cut her hair; but if cutting hair is shameful, she should cover herself. Verse 7 states a man ought not to cover his head since he is God's image and glory. Classical usage includes covering up, especially covering the head in grief or shame, and being veiled. Paul's usage addresses the cultural-theological issue of appropriate head covering in Christian worship, with arguments from creation order, angels, and nature.

(3×) The sense is covering the head, specifically in worship settings. Paul's argument in 1 Corinthians 11 is notoriously difficult, involving creation order, glory, authority, angels, nature, and custom. What's clear is the action: women covering heads (or hair), men not covering heads. The middle/passive voice construction suggests either 'let her cover herself' or 'let her be covered.' The Spanish glosses distinguish 'cubrirse' (to cover oneself) and 'cúbrase' (let her cover herself), capturing the reflexive quality. Whether the covering is a veil, shawl, or bound hair is debated, but the verb clearly denotes placing covering over the head, creating the distinction Paul argues for between male and female practice in Corinthian worship. COVERING AND CONCEALING

κατακαυχάομαι G2620 V-PMM/P-2S (4×)
To boast against, exult over, or triumph over someone; to glory in something with an air of superiority.
A compound verb combining 'down/against' (kata) with 'boast' (kauchaomai), conveying not just pride but directed, competitive boasting – boasting against or over someone. Paul warns Gentile believers not to boast against the natural olive branches (Rom 11:18), while James declares that mercy triumphs over judgment (Jas 2:13), using the same verb to show mercy's confident superiority. The Spanish 'jactarse contra' and German 'sich ruehmen gegen' both preserve the directional force of the Greek prefix.

(4×) To boast against or exult over another party, asserting one's superiority or advantage. Paul uses this in Romans 11:18 to caution Gentile Christians against arrogance toward Israel. In James 3:14, it warns against boasting that contradicts the truth. The French 'se glorifier contre' and Spanish 'jactarse contra' both capture the adversarial nuance of the kata- prefix, distinguishing this from ordinary boasting. PRAISE AND BOASTING

κατάκειμαι G2621 V-PIM/P-3S (12×)
To lie down, especially of the sick or bedridden; also to recline at a meal table in the ancient dining posture.
Katakeimai paints a picture of the body at rest – whether forced by illness or chosen for fellowship. Simon Peter's mother-in-law 'was lying sick with a fever' (Mark 1:30), and the paralytic's friends lowered him through the roof because he 'was lying' on a mat (Mark 2:4). Yet the same verb describes the convivial posture of ancient dining: guests 'reclined at table' with Jesus (Mark 2:15; 14:3), and Paul asks whether someone with a weak conscience might see you 'reclining at table' in an idol's temple (1 Cor 8:10). Spanish distinguishes these beautifully – 'postrado' (prostrate, bedridden) versus 'reclinado' (reclined at table) – revealing how body position carries social meaning.

1. lie down, be bedridden (7×) To lie down physically, typically of one who is sick, injured, or otherwise confined to bed. Peter's mother-in-law 'was lying' with a fever (Mark 1:30); the paralytic 'was lying' on a pallet when brought to Jesus (Mark 2:4); multitudes of the sick 'were lying' at the pool of Bethesda (John 5:3, 6). The command to the healed paralytic to rise and take up his bed (Luke 5:25) presupposes this posture. Spanish 'estar postrado' (to be prostrate) and German 'liegen' (to lie) highlight the helplessness and passivity of the bedridden state. RECLINING AND LYING en: he-was-lying, lying, to-be-lying | es: acostado, estaba-acostada, estar-postrado | fr: être-couché | de: liegen, κατέκειτο, καταχείμενον Mark 1:30; Mark 2:4; Luke 5:25; John 5:3; John 5:6

2. recline at table (5×) To recline at a dining table in the customary Greco-Roman and Near Eastern posture for eating. At Levi's banquet, 'many tax collectors and sinners were reclining at table with Jesus' (Mark 2:15). At Simon the leper's house, Jesus 'was reclining at table' when a woman anointed him (Mark 14:3). A sinful woman approached Jesus while he 'reclined' at a Pharisee's table (Luke 7:37). Paul's discussion of food offered to idols envisions someone 'reclining at table in an idol's temple' (1 Cor 8:10). Spanish 'reclinado' and 'estando reclinado' capture the formal, social character of this dining posture. RECLINING AND LYING

broke, broke in pieces, snapped or fractured something, especially bread
This verb means to break into pieces, often used for breaking bread. In Mark 6:41 and Luke 9:16, Jesus feeds the multitudes: he 'broke (κατέκλασεν) the loaves and gave them to the disciples to set before the people.' The action is both practical (dividing the bread for distribution) and symbolic (anticipating the Last Supper and Eucharist, where Jesus' body is broken for many). The term evokes not just fracture but the generosity of the breaking—bread multiplied as it is shared, bodies nourished through Jesus' blessing and breaking.

(2×) Both occurrences describe Jesus breaking loaves in the feeding miracles (the 5,000 and the 4,000). Classical usage (LSJ) includes snapping off, breaking down, even bowing the neck. Spanish 'partir' (to break/divide) and French 'rompre' (to break) fit the bread-breaking action. The Gospels present the breaking as a moment of transformation: ordinary loaves become abundant provision through Jesus' thanksgiving and distribution. The verb's use foreshadows the passion, where Jesus' body is broken, and the Eucharist, where believers remember that breaking. BREAKING AND SHATTERING

κατα-κλείω G2623 V-AIA-1S (2×) shut up, lock up, confine or imprison someone
This verb means to shut in, lock up, or confine. Luke 3:20 records that Herod 'locked up (κατέκλεισεν) John in prison,' adding this crime to all his others. Paul tells Agrippa (Acts 26:10) how he persecuted Christians, saying, 'I not only locked up (κατέκλεισα) many of the saints in prison... but when they were put to death I cast my vote against them.' The term conveys the forceful confinement of those deemed dangerous or heretical. In both cases, the imprisonment is unjust—John's prophetic witness and the saints' faith leading to their being shut away.

(2×) Both uses involve literal imprisonment of God's servants. Classical usage (LSJ) includes shutting in, enclosing (e.g., into a siege or case), shutting someone up in a place. Spanish 'encerrar' and French 'enfermer' (to lock up) fit the imprisoning sense. Herod's act silences the Baptist's prophetic voice temporarily, while Paul's zealous persecution before his conversion involved incarcerating believers. The verb underscores the power of earthly rulers to confine the body but not to silence the truth they proclaim. PRISON AND CONFINEMENT

κατακληρο-δοτέω G2624 V-AIA-3S (1×) distribute as an inheritance, allot by lot
This technical compound describes the act of assigning land or property as a permanent possession, typically by divine decree or lot-casting. Acts 13:19 references God's distribution of Canaan to the tribes of Israel, fulfilling the conquest promises. The English 'gave as inheritance' and Spanish 'dio en herencia' emphasize the permanence and legitimacy of the transfer. The verb combines 'down/throughout' with 'lot-giving,' suggesting systematic parceling of territory. This single New Testament use recalls the foundational narrative of Israel's settlement in the promised land.

(1×) Paul's sermon in Pisidian Antioch recounts how God, after destroying seven nations in Canaan, distributed their land to Israel as an inheritance—a formal, divinely orchestrated transfer of territorial possession. The term evokes the lot-casting ceremonies described in Joshua, where tribal boundaries were established by sacred process. INHERITANCE AND PROPERTY

κατα-κλίνω G2625 V-ANP (5×)
To cause to recline at table; to lay down or seat someone for a meal, reflecting ancient dining posture.
This verb describes the act of causing someone to recline, reflecting the ancient Mediterranean custom of reclining at meals rather than sitting upright. It appears exclusively in Luke's writings: Jesus reclines at a Pharisee's table (Luke 7:36), commands the crowd to sit down in groups before the feeding miracle (Luke 9:14-15), gives advice about taking the lowest place at a banquet (Luke 14:8), and reclines at table with the Emmaus disciples (Luke 24:30). The Spanish 'reclinad/reclinarse' and French 'faire asseoir' capture both the active causative sense and the cultural posture.

(5×) To cause to recline or to recline at table for a meal, reflecting the Greco-Roman custom of reclining rather than sitting at banquets. Used exclusively in Luke: Jesus reclining at a Pharisee's dinner (Luke 7:36), directing the crowd to sit in groups before the feeding of the five thousand (Luke 9:14-15), teaching about humility at feasts by taking the lowest place (Luke 14:8), and reclining with the Emmaus disciples at the moment of recognition (Luke 24:30). Spanish 'reclinad/reclinarse' and French 'faire asseoir' reflect both the causative and intransitive uses. SITTING AND DWELLING

κατα-κλύζω G2626 V-APP-NMS (1×)

flood, inundate, deluge

This verb describes overwhelming submersion under water, used both literally for physical floods and metaphorically for being overwhelmed by circumstances. Second Peter 3:6 employs it for the cosmic deluge that destroyed the ancient world in Noah's day. Classical usage shows both the literal sense (waves washing away sand) and metaphorical extension (being deluged with troubles). The passive participle in 2 Peter emphasizes that the world 'was flooded'—suffered catastrophic inundation. The multilingual witnesses preserve this aquatic destruction imagery across languages.

(1×) Peter's argument about the continuity of divine judgment recalls the primeval κατακλυσμός (deluge), when the ancient cosmos 'was flooded' and perished. The perfect passive participle suggests completed action with lasting result—the world underwent total submersion. This anchors eschatological expectation in historical precedent of divine intervention through natural catastrophe. FLOOD SWEEP AWAY

κατα-κλυσμός G2627 N-GMS (4×)

A great flood or deluge; specifically the catastrophic flood of Noah's time.

Refers to a massive, overwhelming inundation of water. In the New Testament this word appears exclusively in connection with the Genesis flood narrative, the archetypal divine judgment through water. Jesus cites the flood as a warning about the sudden, unexpected nature of the coming of the Son of Man (Matt 24:38-39; Luke 17:27), and Peter recalls it as a precedent for God's judgment on the ungodly (2 Pet 2:5). Every major translation tradition – Spanish 'diluvio,' French 'deluge,' German 'Flut' – uses its most dramatic flood vocabulary, reflecting the catastrophic scale implied by the Greek.

(4×) A great flood or deluge, used in the NT exclusively for the flood of Noah as a paradigmatic act of divine judgment. All four occurrences reference the Genesis narrative: Jesus draws on it as a type of the end times (Matt 24:38-39; Luke 17:27), and Peter invokes it to demonstrate God's willingness to judge the wicked while preserving the righteous (2 Pet 2:5). The uniform rendering across languages – Spanish 'diluvio,' French 'deluge,' German 'Flut' – confirms a single, well-defined referent. FLOOD SWEEP AWAY

follow, accompany, go after someone closely, often as a disciple or attendant

This verb describes close following, often implying devotion or attention to detail. Luke 23:55 says the women 'who had followed (κατακολουθήσασαι) Jesus from Galilee followed and saw the tomb and how his body was laid.' Their faithful accompaniment from Galilee culminates in witnessing his burial, preparing them to become the first resurrection witnesses. In Acts 16:17, the slave girl with a spirit of divination 'followed (κατακολουθοῦσα) Paul and us, crying out,' her persistent following contrasting with the women's devotion—hers is spiritual harassment, not discipleship. The verb thus captures both devoted following and dogged pursuit.

(2×) The two uses contrast devoted discipleship (Luke) with demonic pestering (Acts). Classical usage (LSJ) includes following after, obeying, emulating. Spanish 'seguir de cerca' (follow closely) and French 'suivre' (to follow) preserve the tracking sense. The women's following in Luke is part of their pattern of support and witness, positioning them to become apostles to the apostles. The girl's following in Acts is persistent but ultimately disruptive, prompting Paul to cast out the spirit. Both show following as an act charged with intent, whether reverent or troubling. FOLLOWING AND DISCIPLESHIP κατα-κόπτω G2629 V-PPA-NMS (1×)

cut, gash, strike oneself

This verb denotes violent cutting or hacking, used in classical contexts for butchering meat, cutting down trees, or inflicting wounds. Mark 5:5 describes the Gerasene demoniac's self-mutilation with stones among the tombs. The present participle indicates ongoing, repeated action—he was continually gashing himself. Such behavior signals extreme psychological and spiritual torment. The Spanish 'cortándose' and French 'meurtrir' (bruise/wound) capture the self-inflicted violence. Ancient sources use the word for military massacre and ritual self-laceration, both involving repetitive cutting motions.

(1×) The possessed man's compulsive self-injury with stones manifests the demonic torment controlling him—he was 'cutting himself' repeatedly, unable to stop the destructive behavior. This vivid detail establishes the severity of his condition before Jesus' intervention. The verb's classical associations with violent dismemberment underscore the brutal nature of the self-harm. CUTTING AND SEVERING

κατακρημν-ίζω G2630 V-ANA (1×)

throw down a cliff, hurl headlong from a precipice

This compound verb specifically denotes the act of casting someone or something over a steep cliff edge. Luke 4:29 records the attempt by Jesus' hometown crowd to throw him from the brow of the hill on which Nazareth was built. The infinitive of purpose shows their deadly intent. Classical usage confirms the technical sense: throwing captives or criminals over a cliff-face as execution or in battle fury. The French 'précipiter' and Spanish 'despeñar' preserve the precipice imagery. This rare word captures a specific, violent mode of attempted murder.

(1×) The enraged synagogue crowd drove Jesus to a cliff with the specific intention 'to throw him down headlong'—not merely to expel him, but to execute him by hurling him over the precipice. The verb's precision indicates planned violent action, though Jesus mysteriously passes through their midst. This prefigures later rejection and murderous plots. THROWING AND CASTING

κατά-κρῖμα G2631 N-ANS (3×)

condemnation, judgment, sentence; the verdict that condemns

This noun denotes condemnation, a condemning judgment, or the sentence that results from judgment. All three occurrences appear in Romans discussing justification and condemnation. Romans 5:16 contrasts the free gift and condemnation: judgment following one trespass brought condemnation, but grace following many trespasses brought justification. Romans 5:18 parallels one trespass leading to 'condemnation for all' with one act of righteousness leading to justification. Romans 8:1 declares triumphantly, 'There is therefore now no condemnation for those in Christ Jesus.' Classical usage includes condemnation, punishment, fine, and damage. Paul uses it theologically for the guilty verdict and sentence humanity deserves apart from Christ.

(3×) The sense is the condemning verdict, the judgment that declares guilty and sentences accordingly. Romans 5:16 sets it in stark contrast to justification (δικαίωμα)—condemnation versus acquittal, guilty verdict versus righteous standing. The parallelism in 5:18 makes condemnation the universal result of Adam's trespass, answered by justification through Christ's righteousness. Romans 8:1's 'no condemnation' is liberation from the guilty verdict—those in Christ escape the sentence they deserved. The Spanish 'condenación,' French 'condamnation,' and German 'Verdammnis' all convey the condemning judgment. This isn't just accusation but the verdict itself—the declaration of guilt and its consequences, which those in Christ wonderfully escape. CONDEMN JUDGE GUILTY

κατα-κρίνω G2632 V-AIA-3S (18×)

to condemn, pronounce judgment against — to render a judicial verdict of guilt deserving punishment

Katakrino is a judicial verb meaning to condemn or pass sentence against, formed from kata ('down, against') and krino ('to judge'). Its 18 New Testament uses consistently involve a formal or authoritative pronouncement of guilt. In the passion predictions, Jesus foretells that the chief priests and scribes will 'condemn him to death' (Matt 20:18; Mark 10:33) — and indeed Judas realizes with horror that Jesus 'has been condemned' (Matt 27:3). The men of Nineveh and the queen of the South will 'condemn this generation' at the judgment, because they repented and sought wisdom while Jesus' contemporaries did not (Matt 12:41-42; Luke 11:31-32). Paul's theological use is foundational: 'God condemned sin in the flesh' by sending his own Son (Rom 8:3), so that 'there is now no condemnation' for those in Christ (Rom 8:34). Hebrews 11:7 says Noah's obedience 'condemned the world.' James 5:9 warns against grumbling 'lest you be condemned.' Spanish 'condenar,' French 'condamner,' and German 'verurteilen' all carry identical judicial weight.

condemn, pass judgment against (18×) To pronounce a formal verdict of guilt and sentence against someone, whether in human courts or divine judgment. The passion narratives use it for the Sanhedrin's death sentence against Jesus (Matt 20:18; Mark 10:33; 14:64; Matt 27:3). Jesus himself warns that Nineveh and the queen of the South will condemn the present generation by contrast at the last day (Matt 12:41-42; Luke 11:31-32). Paul's theological breakthrough declares that God 'condemned sin in the flesh' through Christ's incarnation and death (Rom 8:3), thereby lifting the verdict from believers (Rom 8:34). Noah's faith 'condemned the world' implicitly by demonstrating what righteous response looked like (Heb 11:7). Mark 16:16 and 1 Cor 11:32 extend it to eschatological and disciplinary condemnation. French 'condamner' and German 'verurteilen' render the judicial core precisely. CONDEMN JUDGE GUILTY

κατά-κρῐσις G2633 N-GFS (2×)

condemnation, the act or state of being judged guilty and sentenced

This noun denotes a verdict of guilt and its resulting penalty. Paul contrasts ministries in 2 Corinthians 3:9: 'if the ministry of condemnation (κατακρίσεως) has glory, the ministry of righteousness must far exceed it in glory.' He refers to the law's condemning function—it reveals sin and pronounces judgment—versus the Spirit's justifying work. In 2 Corinthians 7:3, Paul reassures the Corinthians: 'I do not say this to condemn you (πρὸς κατάκρισιν), for I said before that you are in our hearts.' Here the term is the goal avoided—Paul writes not to pronounce judgment but to build up.

(2×) Both uses in 2 Corinthians involve contexts of judgment. Classical usage (LSJ) includes condemnation or a false judgment/estimate. Spanish 'condenación' and French/German 'condamnation,' 'Verurteilung' capture the legal verdict sense. In 3:9, Paul's theology of covenant contrasts law and Spirit: the law's glory is real but fading, tied to its condemning power; the Spirit's glory is greater, tied to acquittal and life. In 7:3, Paul's pastoral tone disclaims any intent to condemn, assuring the Corinthians of his affection and partnership. CONDEMN JUDGE GUILTY

To exercise complete dominion over, lord it over, overpower, or gain mastery of someone.

A forceful compound verb (kata + kurieuō) meaning to dominate or lord it over someone, intensifying the base verb 'to rule' with the prefix kata- ('down upon'). Jesus explicitly contrasts Gentile rulers who 'lord it over' their subjects with the servant-leadership expected among his followers (Matt 20:25; Mark 10:42). Peter echoes this warning to elders not to domineer over those entrusted to them (1 Pet 5:3). Strikingly, in Acts 19:16 the same verb describes a demoniac physically overpowering the sons of Sceva, revealing the raw force embedded in the word.

(4×) To exercise oppressive or domineering authority over others, lording it over them. Jesus uses this negatively of Gentile rulers (Matt 20:25; Mark 10:42), and Peter warns church elders against the same posture (1 Pet 5:3). The Spanish 'enseñorearse' and French 'dominer' both capture the top-down, coercive quality. In Acts 19:16, the verb shifts to physical overpowering when a demoniac masters his attackers, showing the word can span from political tyranny to brute physical domination. RULING AND REIGNING

καταλᾰλ-έω G2635 V-PIM/P-2P (5×)

To speak against or slander someone; to defame with malicious speech, especially within the community of faith.

Refers to hostile, demeaning speech directed at another person—talking someone down rather than merely talking about them. James uses it three times in a single verse (Jas 4:11) to warn believers against slandering one another, while Peter applies it to outsiders who malign the Christian community (1Pet 2:12; 3:16). The Spanish 'habla-mal' and 'murmuran-de' capture both the active defamation and the murmuring dimension. In every New Testament occurrence the word carries strong moral censure, treating such speech as a violation of the royal law of love.

(5×) To speak against, slander, or defame someone with hostile or malicious words. The multilingual evidence converges on speech acts of disparagement: English 'speak-against,' Spanish 'habla-mal' (speak badly of), and German 'verleumden' (slander) all point to verbal attack on a person's character. James 4:11 piles three forms of the word together to show how pervasive this sin is among believers, while 1 Peter 2:12 and 3:16 address the slander directed at Christians by outsiders—where upright conduct is the antidote. EVIL AND WICKEDNESS

καταλᾰλ-ιά G2636 N-AFP (2×)

slander, speaking evil of others, malicious gossip or defamation

This noun describes the act of speaking against others maliciously, tearing down reputations through words. Paul fears finding 'slander (καταλαλιάς)' among the Corinthian vices when he visits (2 Corinthians 12:20), listing it alongside quarreling, jealousy, and disorder. Peter exhorts believers to 'put away all malice and all deceit and hypocrisy and envy and all slander (καταλαλιάς)' (1 Peter 2:1), treating it as incompatible with spiritual growth. The term targets the destructive power of the tongue, the way words can wound and divide communities. Both apostles call the church to speech that builds up rather than tears down.

(2×) Both occurrences list slander among relational sins that poison community. Classical and Septuagint usage (LSJ) involves evil reports or defamation. Spanish 'maledicencias' and French forms like 'calomnier' (to slander) capture the speaking-against sense. Paul's fear for Corinth is that factionalism breeds gossip and character assassination. Peter's exhortation treats slander as part of the old life to be discarded, replaced by the sincere spiritual milk of the word. Both envision communities where words serve love and truth, not malice. BLASPHEMY AND SLANDER

κατάλᾰλ-ος G2637 Adj-AMP (1×)

slanderer, one who speaks evil against another

This noun identifies a person who habitually engages in malicious gossip or defamation. Romans 1:30 includes 'slanderers' in Paul's catalog of vices characterizing humanity under divine wrath. The word combines 'down/against' with 'speaking,' emphasizing speech directed against someone's reputation. All four translation witnesses (slanderers, calumniadores, médisant, Verleumder) converge on the idea of malicious, destructive talk. Unlike mere gossip, κατάλαλος suggests deliberate, hostile verbal assault on another's character. This agent noun marks a person by their characteristic vice of evil speaking.

(1×) In the descent-into-depravity catalog, 'slanderers' appear alongside haters of God and inventors of evil—those whose speech habitually tears down others through false or malicious reports. The term identifies not occasional gossip but persons defined by their defamatory communication. This vice disrupts community through weaponized words. DEVIL SATAN

καταλαμβάνω G2638 V-APM-NMP (15×)

To seize, overtake, or comprehend; of grasping physically, mentally, or spiritually—catching someone in the act or attaining a goal.

A richly layered verb whose root idea is 'to lay hold of.' In the Gospels it describes darkness overtaking or failing to overcome the light (John 1:5), while in Acts it shifts to intellectual and spiritual perception—Peter 'grasping' that God shows no partiality (Acts 10:34). Paul uses it of the runner who strains to 'lay hold of' the prize (Phil 3:12–13), and in the Pericope Adulterae it denotes catching a woman in the very act of sin (John 8:4). The Spanish and German glosses reveal the same spread: 'comprender' (comprehend) alongside 'alcanzar' (reach/attain) and 'ergreifen' (seize).

1. overtake or come upon (4×) Overtake or come upon: Used of darkness, calamity, or a pursuing force that catches up with someone. In John 1:5 the darkness neither 'overtook' nor 'overcame' the light—the Greek ambiguity is deliberate. Mark 9:18 uses it of a spirit seizing a boy. Spanish 'agarre/alcance' captures both the physical grip and the idea of catching up. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

2. comprehend or perceive mentally (4×) Comprehend or perceive mentally: A cognitive metaphor—what the mind 'grasps.' Peter katalambanō-s that God is no respecter of persons (Acts 10:34); Paul prays believers may katalambanō the breadth and depth of Christ's love (Eph 3:18). French and German both use 'saisir/ergreifen,' showing the same physical-to-mental bridge across languages. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

3. lay hold of or attain (4×) Lay hold of or attain a goal: The athletic and spiritual pursuit sense—straining to seize a prize. Paul confesses he has not yet 'laid hold' but presses on (Phil 3:12–13). The Gentiles paradoxically 'attained' a righteousness they were not pursuing (Rom 9:30). Spanish 'alcanzar' (to reach, attain) aligns perfectly with this earnest-pursuit meaning. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

4. catch in the act (2×) Catch in the act of wrongdoing: A forensic or judicial sense—to apprehend someone red-handed. Both John 8:3 and 8:4 use the passive participle: the woman 'having been caught' in adultery. Spanish 'sorprendida' (surprised, caught) and the perfect tense emphasize the completed, undeniable nature of the apprehension. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

en: has-been-caught, having-been-caught | es: ha-sido-sorprendida, sorprendida | fr: saisir | de: ergreifen John 8:3; John 8:4

5. be seized or apprehended (1×) Be seized or apprehended by another: The divine passive—Paul declares he was 'laid hold of' by Christ Jesus (Phil 3:12). This is not self-effort but being grasped from outside. Spanish 'fui alcanzado' (I was reached/overtaken) beautifully conveys the reversal: the pursuer becomes the pursued, seized by grace. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

καταλέγω G2639 V-PMM/P-3S (1×)

enroll, register in a list or catalog

This verb means to inscribe in an official register or list, used for enrollment in public records. First Timothy 5:9 instructs that a widow may 'be enrolled' (passive imperative) in the church's support list only if she meets specific qualifications. Classical usage shows the word for military muster rolls, civic registers, and detailed narrative recounting. The passive voice emphasizes official action—she is to be placed on the list by the church. Spanish 'sea inscrita' and German 'einschreiben' capture the formal registration idea. This technical term reflects early Christian organizational practices for widow support.

(1×) The pastoral instruction establishes criteria for which widows should 'be enrolled'—officially registered for ongoing church support. The passive imperative suggests a communal decision and formal process, not ad hoc charity. This implies an organized list or catalog maintained by the church for systematic care of qualified widows, reflecting institutional development in early Christianity. COUNTING AND NARRATING

κατάλειμμα G2640

remnant, what is left over; a surviving portion

A neuter noun meaning remnant or what remains after loss, destruction, or consumption. The Septuagint uses it to translate Hebrew terms for the surviving remnant of Israel—those who escape judgment or return from exile. The prophets develop remnant theology extensively: God preserves a faithful few through catastrophe. Paul applies the concept to the salvation of a remnant of Israel according to grace. The word emphasizes what survives when most is lost—a small portion carrying hope and continuity. Some manuscripts show confusion with κατάλημμα, a related term.

καταλείπω G2641 V-AIA-3S (24×)

Leave behind, abandon; in passive, remain; reserve or set aside for a purpose

The verb kataleipo (καταλείπω) traces the arc of departure and what it leaves in its wake. Jesus 'left' Nazareth for Capernaum (Matt 4:13) and departed from Bethany (Matt 21:17); Genesis is quoted when a man 'leaves' father and mother to cleave to his wife (Matt 19:5; Mark 10:7; Eph 5:31). In the passive, it describes those left behind or remaining — the woman left alone after her accusers depart (John 8:9), or Paul left alone in Athens (1 Thess 3:1). Most strikingly, in Romans 11:4 God says 'I reserved for myself seven thousand,' using kataleipo for divine election that keeps a faithful remnant.

1. leave behind, depart from (19×) To leave behind or depart from a person, place, or situation — the dominant active sense covering most New Testament occurrences. Jesus leaves Nazareth (Matt 4:13), departs from a generation (Matt 16:4), and leaves Bethany (Matt 21:17). The Genesis marriage formula — 'a man shall leave father and mother' — appears via this verb (Matt 19:5; Mark 10:7; Eph 5:31). Spanish deja/dejando, French laisser, and German verlässt all converge on the straightforward spatial-relational meaning of going away from what remains. LEAVING AND REMAINING en: having-left, he-left, leaves | es: deja, dejando, dejara | fr: laisser | de: verlässt, zuruecklassen Matt 4:13; Matt 16:4; Matt 19:5; Matt 21:17; Mark 10:7

en: being-left, having-been-left-behind, to-be-left-behind | es: dejado, fue-dejado, ser-dejados | fr: laisser | de: verlässt, zuruecklassen John 8:9; Acts 25:14; 1Thess 3:1; Heb 4:1

3. reserve, keep for oneself (1×) To reserve or set aside for a particular purpose — a rare but theologically weighty sense found in Romans 11:4, where God declares 'I reserved for myself seven thousand men who have not bowed the knee to Baal,' quoting 1 Kings 19:18. Here kataleipo moves beyond mere spatial leaving into divine intentionality: God actively keeps a remnant. Spanish reservé and the singular occurrence across the corpus mark this as a distinctive theological usage that elevates the verb from narrative action to covenant election. LEAVING AND REMAINING καταλῐθάζω G2642 V-FIA-3S (1×)

stone to death, execute by stoning

This verb denotes the specific act of killing by throwing stones, the prescribed execution method for certain offenses under Mosaic law. Luke 20:6 records the chief priests' fear that the crowd 'will stone us' if they deny John the Baptist's divine authority. The future indicative shows their certain expectation of mob violence. All translation witnesses preserve the stoning imagery. Classical and biblical Greek use this compound for the formal execution method and for spontaneous mob attacks. The single New Testament occurrence reveals how religious leaders calculated popular reaction to protect themselves from righteous anger.

(1×) The religious authorities recognize that publicly discrediting John the Baptist would provoke the crowd to stone them—not mere disapproval but lethal violence. Their fear of being καταλιθάσει (stoned) drives their evasive answer to Jesus. This reveals both the people's reverence for John and the leaders' cowardice in the face of popular conviction. καταλλ-ᾰγή G2643 N-NFS (4×)

Reconciliation; the restoration of a broken relationship, especially between God and humanity.

Denotes the dramatic change from enmity to friendship, from alienation to restored relationship. In Paul's theology, this is God's initiative: while we were enemies, God reconciled us to himself through Christ (Rom 5:11). The word carries rich overtones from its secular Greek usage in diplomacy and currency exchange – a costly transaction that restores proper value. Paul speaks of both the personal gift of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:18-19) and its cosmic scope, as Israel's rejection meant reconciliation for the world (Rom 11:15). Every language reaches for its deepest relational vocabulary: Spanish 'reconciliacion,' French 'reconciliation,' German 'Versöhnung.'

(4×) The restoration of relationship between God and sinful humanity, accomplished through Christ's atoning work. Paul develops this concept most fully in Romans 5:11 and 2 Corinthians 5:18-19, emphasizing that God is the initiating agent who reconciles the world to himself. In Romans 11:15, the term takes on a salvation-historical dimension: Israel's temporary hardening has meant reconciliation for the Gentile world. The uniform rendering across all translation traditions – German 'Versöhnung,' French 'réconciliation' – reflects a single, theologically precise concept without semantic variation in its NT usage. To reconcile, restore from enmity to friendship; a key Pauline term for God's saving work in Christ.

Katallasso is one of the great theological words of the NT, meaning to change a relationship from hostility to harmony. Paul uses it to describe the heart of the gospel: while we were enemies, God reconciled us to himself through the death of his Son (Rom 5:10). In 2 Corinthians 5:18-19, God is the one 'who reconciled us to himself through Christ' and entrusted believers with 'the ministry of reconciliation.' The word also appears in the practical instruction for a separated wife to be reconciled to her husband (1 Cor 7:11). French 'reconcilier,' Spanish 'reconciliar,' and German 'versoehnen' all capture this movement from estrangement to restored relationship.

reconcile, restore to right relationship (6×) To change from a state of enmity to one of friendship and restored relationship – to reconcile. In classical Greek the word could mean to exchange money or settle accounts, but in the NT it becomes a premier theological term. Paul declares that God reconciled the world to himself in Christ (2 Cor 5:18-19), that believers were reconciled while still enemies (Rom 5:10), and applies the same verb to marital reconciliation (1 Cor 7:11). The kata- prefix gives the sense of thoroughness – a complete transformation of the relational state from hostility to peace. RECONCILIATION remaining, left over, the rest or remnant

This adjective describes what is left after others are taken away, often with theological freight as 'the remnant.' Acts 15:17 quotes Amos 9:12, referring to 'the remnant of mankind' who will seek the Lord after the restoration of David's fallen tent. The plural adjective functions substantively—'the remaining ones.' Classical usage shows this for survivors of battle, what's left of resources, or the remaining option. The Spanish 'restantes' and French 'le reste' capture the arithmetic of subtraction. James's citation reinterprets Israel's remnant theology to include Gentiles in the restored people of God.

(1×) James applies Amos's prophecy about 'the remnant of men' to the Gentile mission, arguing that their inclusion fulfills rather than violates Scripture. The adjective κατάλοιποι suggests those left after judgment or separation—here, the nations beyond Israel who nevertheless seek God. This remnant theology expands to encompass all humanity who call on the Lord's name. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κατάλῠμα G2646 N-NNS (3×)

lodging place, guest room, inn; temporary accommodation for travelers

This noun denotes a lodging place, guest room, or inn. Luke 2:7

famously states there was 'no room for them in the inn' when Jesus was born. Mark 14:14 and Luke 22:11 record Jesus' instructions to prepare Passover: 'Where is my guest room?' referring to the upper room where the Last Supper occurred. Classical usage includes lodging, public inn, billeting for troops, and provision of quarters. The New Testament uses span the commercial or public lodging denied to Mary and Joseph, and the private guest room secured for Jesus' final Passover. The word suggests temporary accommodation rather than permanent residence.

(3×) The sense covers temporary lodging, whether public inn or private guest room. Luke 2:7's 'no room in the inn' sets the stage for Jesus' humble birth—even temporary lodging was unavailable, so he was born where animals sheltered. The guest room references (Mark 14:14, Luke 22:11) identify the upper room as prepared space for visiting teachers and their disciples—the κατάλυμα where Jesus gathered his followers for the Passover that became the inaugural Eucharist. The Spanish glosses distinguish 'mesón' (inn) and 'aposento' (room), while German has 'Herberge' (lodging). Whether commercial accommodation or borrowed space, the word denotes temporary shelter for travelers or guests, not permanent dwelling. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κατα-λύω G2647 V-FIA-3S (17×)

To tear down or demolish; to abolish or annul; to lodge or find quarters at the end of a journey

A Greek verb whose range stretches from physical demolition to peaceful hospitality. In its primary usage, katalyo means to throw down or dismantle a structure, as when Jesus foretold the destruction of the Temple (Matt 24:2, Mark 13:2). By extension it takes on the figurative force of abolishing or nullifying, as in the famous declaration 'I have not come to abolish the Law' (Matt 5:17). The surprising third sense, 'to lodge,' arises from the image of unyoking animals at day's end; Spanish hospedarse and German einkehren both capture this domestic meaning visible in Luke 19:7 when Zacchaeus receives Jesus as a guest.

1. tear down, demolish (11×) The core physical sense: to pull down, dismantle, or demolish a standing structure. Jesus speaks of the Temple stones being thrown down so that not one remains upon another (Matt 24:2; Mark 13:2). The accusation at his trial repeats the charge (Matt 26:61, Mark 14:58). Spanish destruir and French detruire map cleanly onto this destructive action. In every instance the object is a building or monument whose integrity is violently undone. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

2. abolish, overthrow, annul (4×) A figurative extension into the legal and institutional realm: to abolish, annul, or overthrow laws, prophecies, or divinely ordered plans. Jesus clarifies he came not to abolish (katalysai) but to fulfill the Law and the Prophets (Matt 5:17). Gamaliel warns the Sanhedrin that a work from God cannot be overthrown (Acts 5:38-39). German niederreissen ('tear down') and Spanish abolir both preserve the metaphor of dismantling something established. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

en: it-will-be-overthrown, to-abolish, to-overthrow | es: a-abolir, abolir, destruir | fr: détruire | de: reißt-nieder Matt 5:17; Acts 5:38; Acts 5:39

3. lodge, find quarters (2×) An entirely distinct sense rooted in the imagery of unyoking pack animals at journey's end: to stop, lodge, or find quarters as a guest. When the Twelve urge Jesus to dismiss the crowd so they may lodge in surrounding villages (Luke 9:12), and when onlookers murmur that Jesus has gone to lodge with Zacchaeus (Luke 19:7), the word carries warmth and hospitality. Spanish hospedarse and alojarse reflect this domestic register, a world apart from the verb's destructive senses. LOSS AND DESTRUCTION

καταμανθάνω G2648 V-AMA-2P (1×)

observe closely, consider carefully, study attentively

This compound intensifies 'learn' or 'perceive' with a prefix suggesting thoroughness—to learn by close observation. Matthew 6:28 uses it in Jesus' command to 'consider the lilies of the field,' urging attentive study of how God clothes wildflowers. The aorist imperative calls for deliberate mental focus. Classical usage shows the word for careful inspection, perception, and learning through examination. Spanish 'observad' and French 'considérer' emphasize the intentional, focused nature of this observation. The single biblical occurrence models contemplative attention to creation as antidote to anxiety.

(1×) Jesus instructs anxious disciples to 'closely observe' how wildflowers grow without toil or spinning, yet surpass Solomon's splendor. The compound verb suggests not casual noticing but sustained, thoughtful examination—to learn from nature about divine provision. This contemplative observation yields theological insight that calms worry about clothing and sustenance. CONSIDERING AND DISCERNING καταμαρτύρέω G2649 V-PIA-3P (3×)

to testify against, bear witness against, give evidence against someone

This verb means to bear witness or testify against someone, appearing in Jesus' trial scenes. Matthew 26:62 records the high priest asking, 'What is it that these men testify against you?' Matthew 27:13 has Pilate asking, 'Do you not hear how many things they testify against you?' Mark 14:60 parallels Matthew 26:62. Classical usage includes giving evidence against someone, being convicted by evidence, asserting concerning something, and in astrology, malign influence. The New Testament use is consistently forensic—testimony given against an accused person in trial settings, with the irony that Jesus remained silent despite the charges.

(3×) The sense is legal testimony against an accused party. All three uses occur in Jesus' trials—before the Sanhedrin and before Pilate—where witnesses or accusers 'testify against' him. The high priest and Pilate both express some bewilderment at Jesus' silence despite the testimony piling up against him. The imperfect tense (καταμαρτυροῦσιν) in Matthew 27:13 suggests ongoing, repeated testifying—they kept on bearing witness against him. The Spanish 'testificar en contra' and German 'bezeugen gegen' clearly mark the adversarial nature—testimony given in opposition, for prosecution. The word captures the forensic context where witnesses speak against the defendant, building a case for condemnation. ANSWERING AND TESTIFYING

remain, stay, continue in a place or state

This verb means to stay put or continue in a location or condition, with emphasis on persistence. Acts 1:13 describes the apostles 'staying' in the upper room after the ascension, where they devoted themselves to prayer. The present participle suggests ongoing residence during this transitional period. Classical Greek shows the word for remaining in a place and for continuing in a state or role. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize the durative aspect—staying, remaining, persisting. This single New Testament use captures the waiting community between Jesus' departure and the Spirit's arrival.

(1×) The eleven apostles (with named individuals listed) were 'staying' in the Jerusalem upper room—maintaining continuous presence there as they awaited the promise. The participle indicates this was their settled location for prayer and community during the post-ascension, pre-Pentecost interval. Their persistence in place manifests obedient expectation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

alone, apart, in private (adverb); better understood as κατὰ μόνας (according to solitude)

An adverb meaning 'alone' or 'apart,' though grammatically it's better analyzed as the phrase κατὰ μόνας ('in accordance with being alone'). It describes situations where someone acts or speaks privately, away from others. Jesus often withdrew κατὰ μόνας to pray. The disciples questioned him when they were alone. The phrase captures intentional solitude—not accidental isolation but chosen privacy for prayer, instruction, or rest. Classical and biblical Greek use it to set scenes apart from public activity, creating space for intimate disclosure or personal encounter with God.

κατανά-θεμα G2652 N-NNS (1×)

curse, thing under divine ban, anathema

This noun denotes something devoted to destruction, placed under solemn curse. Revelation 22:3 declares that in the new creation 'there will be no more curse'—no accursed thing will exist there. The word intensifies simple 'anathema' with a prefix. Classical and Septuagint usage shows this for things devoted to destruction, whether pagan offerings or objects under divine ban. All translation witnesses converge on 'curse/maldición/Fluch.' The eschatological promise reverses the curse introduced at the fall, restoring unmediated divine presence without separation or judgment.

(1×) John's vision of the renewed cosmos promises the total absence of κατανάθεμα—no cursed thing, no object of divine judgment, no separation from God's presence. This reverses Genesis 3's curse on the ground and all its consequences. The emphatic negative signals complete restoration, where nothing bears the mark of divine displeasure or destruction. CURSES AND ANATHEMA

κατανά-θεμα G2653 V-PNA (1×)

curse, pronounce a curse, invoke destruction

This verb means to invoke a curse upon someone, calling down divine judgment or binding oneself by oath. Matthew 26:74 describes Peter beginning 'to curse' as he denies knowing Jesus—either cursing himself if lying or cursing Jesus to prove his dissociation. The infinitive follows 'began,' indicating the start of increasingly desperate oath-taking. This variant form relates to the noun for 'curse' (G2652). The multilingual witnesses show 'curse/maldecir/maudire,' emphasizing the verbal act of pronouncement. Peter's cursing marks the nadir of his denial, just before the rooster crows.

(1×) In his third denial, Peter not only swore oaths but began 'to curse'—either invoking curses on himself if lying or cursing Jesus to prove he had no connection. This extreme verbal violence reveals his terror and the completeness of his momentary apostasy. The infinitive suggests he was in the act of cursing when the rooster crowed, arresting his downward spiral. CURSING (VERBAL ACT)

κατανᾱλ-ίσκω G2654 V-PPA-NNS (1×)

consume, devour, use up completely

This verb describes complete consumption, especially by fire. Hebrews 12:29 declares 'our God is a consuming fire,' using the present participle to emphasize ongoing, active power. Classical usage shows the word for using up resources, devouring fuel, or eating completely. The compound intensifies simple 'consume' with a thorough prefix. All translation witnesses preserve the devouring/consuming imagery. The Hebrews citation adapts Deuteronomy 4:24, warning that divine holiness burns away everything impure. The participle characterizes God's essential nature as holy fire that cannot tolerate sin.

(1×) The author characterizes God as 'a consuming fire'—not one who consumed in the past, but whose very nature is to devour everything unholy. The present participle emphasizes continuous, essential activity, not isolated acts. This awesome portrayal grounds the exhortation to worship with reverence and awe, recognizing divine holiness that purifies by burning. FIRE AND BURNING

καταναρκάομαι G2655 V-FIA-1S (3×)

to burden, be a burden to, weigh heavily upon; to press upon someone as a hardship

This verb means to burden someone, press heavily upon them, or be a weight to them. All three occurrences appear in 2 Corinthians where Paul defends his financial independence. In 11:9 and 12:13 he insists he was not a burden to the Corinthians—he didn't demand support. In 12:14 he declares he will not be a burden in his coming visit either, because he seeks them, not their resources. Classical usage includes growing numb, being reduced to torpor, and being slothful or heavy toward someone. Paul uses it for the financial burden he refused to impose, maintaining his right while choosing not to exercise it for the gospel's sake.

(3×) The sense is being a financial or material burden on someone. Paul's threefold use establishes his pattern: despite apostolic right to material support, he chose not to burden the Corinthians. The verb suggests pressing down on someone, weighing them down with demands or needs. In 12:14 he even explains his reasoning: parents provide for children, not vice versa—he's their spiritual father, so he'll support himself rather than burden them. The Spanish glosses vary ('fui carga,' 'seré carga'), while German has 'zur Last fallen' (to fall as a burden). Paul's financial independence becomes part of his defense against accusations of self-seeking—his refusal to burden them proves his motives are pure, his love genuine. LAZINESS AND IDLENESS

κατανεύω G2656 V-AIA-3P (1×)

signal, beckon, make a sign by nodding or gesture

This verb means to communicate by gesture, especially nodding or beckoning. Luke 5:7 describes fishermen who 'signaled' to their partners in the other boat to come help with the miraculous catch. The aorist indicates a decisive moment when they realized they couldn't handle the abundance alone. Classical usage shows the word for nodding assent, beckoning, or making any head/hand signal. The cross-linguistic glosses emphasize non-verbal communication. The single biblical occurrence captures the wordless urgency of fishermen overwhelmed by the haul—gesture suffices when immediate help is needed.

(1×) Simon's crew, struggling with nets breaking from the fish load, 'signaled' their partners—no time for shouted conversation, just urgent gestures to come help. The aorist suggests a quick, decisive beckoning in the midst of the catch. This wordless communication conveys both the abundance and the practical need, setting up the awe that follows Jesus' command. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11301 WITH 5 SENSES

κατανο-έω G2657 V-APA-NMS (14×)

To observe attentively, consider carefully, or perceive with discernment; to fix one's mind on something so as to understand it.

Describes the act of directing careful, sustained attention toward something — whether a beam in one's own eye (Matt 7:3), the ravens of the field (Luke 12:24), or the burning bush (Acts 7:31). It goes beyond casual seeing to imply deliberate mental engagement: examining, contemplating, taking notice. In one instance (Luke 20:23), Jesus perceives the craftiness of those testing him, where the word shades from outward observation into inward discernment. Spanish captures this range with 'considerar' and 'percibir,' while German uses 'betrachten' (to contemplate/view), emphasizing the reflective quality of the gaze.

1. consider, observe attentively (13×) To direct one's attention carefully toward an object, person, or situation, examining it with sustained focus and reflection. Used across a wide range of contexts — from Jesus' challenge to consider the log in one's own eye (Matt 7:3; spa 'consideras') to the invitation to observe the lilies (Luke 12:27). In Acts 7:31 Moses approaches the burning bush 'to consider' it, and in Hebrews 3:1 believers are urged to 'consider' Jesus as apostle and high priest. The multilingual glosses converge on reflective vocabulary: deu 'betrachten,' spa 'considerar,' fra 'considérer.' CONSIDERING AND DISCERNING

2. perceive, discern (1×) To perceive or discern the true nature of a situation, gaining mental insight that goes beyond surface observation. Used only in Luke 20:23, where Jesus perceived the craftiness of those trying to trap him with a question about paying tribute to Caesar. English renders this 'having perceived' and Spanish 'habiendo percibido,' marking a shift from careful looking to penetrating understanding. The single occurrence suggests this is the verb's sharpest cognitive edge — not just attentive gazing but seeing through to hidden motives. CONSIDERING AND DISCERNING

καταντ-άω G2658 V-AIA-3S (13×)

To arrive at, reach a destination; figuratively, to attain a goal, state, or spiritual maturity

The verb καταντάω traces the arc from physical travel to spiritual aspiration. In the book of Acts it is a workhorse of Paul's missionary itineraries – he 'arrived at' Derbe, Ephesus, Ptolemais, and other cities along his journeys (Acts 16:1, 18:19, 20:15, 21:7). But when Paul writes to the Philippians or Ephesians, the same verb stretches toward a goal that transcends geography: attaining the resurrection from the dead (Phil 3:11) or arriving at the unity of the faith and the mature measure of Christ (Eph 4:13). The multilingual evidence tracks this shift – Spanish moves from 'Llegaron' (they arrived) to 'alcanzar' (to attain), marking a clear metaphorical extension.

1. arrive at, come to (a place) (9×) Physical arrival at a geographic destination – reaching a city, region, or port through travel. This is the dominant use in Acts, where it structures Paul's missionary journeys: arriving at Derbe and Lystra (Acts 16:1), Ephesus (Acts 18:19, 18:24), Miletus by way of Assos (Acts 20:15), and Ptolemais (Acts 21:7). The glosses across languages are consistently spatial and concrete – 'Llegaron/Llegó' (Spanish), 'arriver' (French), 'ankommen' (German) – all standard verbs of physical motion reaching its endpoint. GOING AND LEADING

2. attain, reach (a goal or state) (4×) Figurative attainment of a goal, state, or spiritual condition – reaching something non-spatial through effort, growth, or divine action. Paul uses it for the aspiration to 'attain to the resurrection from the dead' (Phil 3:11) and the church's calling to 'attain to the unity of the faith and the mature stature of Christ' (Eph 4:13). In Acts 26:7, Israel's twelve tribes serve God hoping to 'attain' the promise. 1 Cor 10:11 extends it temporally: the ends of the ages 'have come upon' the present generation. The multilingual shift from arrival verbs to aspiration verbs – Spanish 'alcanzar,' French 'arriver' used with abstract objects – confirms the metaphorical boundary. GOING AND LEADING

stupor, dullness, numbness of spirit

This noun denotes a state of mental or spiritual stupefaction, an inability to perceive or respond. Romans 11:8 quotes Isaiah about God giving Israel 'a spirit of stupor'—judicial hardening that prevents seeing and hearing. The genitive indicates the quality of spirit given. Classical and Septuagint usage shows this for bewilderment, stupefaction, or the numbness following a shock. Later Christian usage extends it to contrition. The multilingual witnesses (stupor, estupor, assoupissement, Betäubung) emphasize the dulled, insensible state. Paul uses it to explain Israel's temporary blindness to the gospel.

(1×) Paul cites the prophets to explain how God gave Israel 'a spirit of κατάνυξις'—not enlightenment but stupefaction, a judicial hardening that made eyes unseeing and ears unhearing. This Spirit-induced numbness accounts for Israel's resistance to the Messiah. The stupor is divine response to persistent rejection, yet Paul argues it's temporary and serves larger redemptive purposes. SLEEP AND SLUMBER pierce, prick, stab, wound deeply

This verb means to pierce or stab, used literally for physical wounding and metaphorically for emotional piercing. Acts 2:37 describes the Pentecost crowd being 'cut to the heart' (literally 'pierced') by Peter's sermon about crucifying the Messiah. The aorist passive indicates they received a sudden, painful blow to conscience. The Septuagint uses this word for being stunned or bewildered. Spanish 'fueron compungidos' (were moved to compunction) and German 'were pierced' capture the sharp, wounding impact. This cognitive and emotional piercing produces the urgent question: 'What shall we do?'

(1×) Peter's accusation that 'you crucified' the Lord pierced his hearers—they 'were stabbed in the heart,' experiencing sudden, painful conviction. The aorist passive suggests an involuntary response to truth, not gradual persuasion. This metaphorical wounding of conscience, achieved by the Spirit through the word, produces immediate repentance and the cry for remedy. PAIN AND SUFFERING

καταξι-όω G2661 V-ANP (3×)

to consider worthy, deem worthy, count worthy; to judge someone deserving of something

This verb means to consider someone worthy, deem them deserving, or count them as meriting something. Luke 20:35 describes 'those who are considered worthy to attain that age and the resurrection from the dead.' Acts 5:41 says the apostles rejoiced 'that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the Name.' Second Thessalonians 1:5 cites the Thessalonians' endurance as evidence 'that you may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God.' Classical usage includes deeming worthy, commanding, deigning, and sometimes degrading by comparison. The New Testament use consistently involves divine judgment of worthiness for eschatological blessing or present suffering for Christ's sake.

(3×) The sense is being judged or counted worthy, particularly in God's reckoning. Luke 20:35 speaks of resurrection-worthiness—those God deems fit for the age to come. Acts 5:41 presents suffering for Jesus as an honor—the apostles were counted worthy of this privilege, rejoicing in dishonor. Second Thessalonians 1:5 connects perseverance under persecution to worthiness for God's kingdom—their endurance demonstrates they're being counted worthy. The Spanish glosses use 'considerar digno' (consider worthy), while German has 'würdig erachten' (deem worthy). This is divine evaluation and assignment—God counts certain people worthy, whether for resurrection life or for the privilege of suffering for Christ's name, both paradoxical honors from the world's perspective. καταπᾰτ-έω G2662 V-PNM/P (5×)
To trample underfoot, either literally (crushing by stepping on) or figuratively (treating with contempt or disdain).
Depicts the violent act of stamping or treading something down with the feet. Jesus uses it literally of seed falling on a path and being trampled (Luke 8:5) and of salt thrown out and trodden by people (Matt 5:13), but also figuratively of casting pearls before swine who trample them (Matt 7:6). The most theologically charged use appears in Hebrews 10:29, where rejecting Christ is described as trampling the Son of God underfoot—the Spanish 'pisoteando' and French 'fouler-aux-pieds' vividly preserve this image of contemptuous desecration.

(5×) To trample or tread underfoot, literally or metaphorically. The literal sense appears in Luke 8:5 (seed crushed on a path) and Matt 5:13 (worthless salt trodden by passersby). Figuratively, it denotes contemptuous treatment: Matt 7:6 warns against giving holy things to those who will trample them, and Heb 10:29 applies it to apostasy as trampling the Son of God. The German 'zertreten' (crush underfoot) and Spanish 'pisoteando' both emphasize the destructive, degrading force of the action. Luke 12:1 describes the crowd pressing so densely they tread on one another, bridging the literal and figurative. TRAMPLING AND TREADING

κατά-παυσις G2663 N-AFS (9×)
Rest, a place or state of rest — God's promised cessation from labor, the eschatological sabbath-rest offered to his people.
Katapausis appears nine times in the NT, with eight of those concentrated in Hebrews 3-4, where the author builds one of the most sustained theological arguments about rest in the Bible. Drawing on Psalm 95 and the Genesis creation account, the writer argues that God's rest — his own katapausis after creation — remains open as a promise for believers to enter. The word carries a dual meaning: it is both a place of rest (as in Acts 7:49, quoting Isaiah 66:1, 'What is the place of my rest?') and a state of cessation from labor. The repeated warning 'they shall not enter my rest' (Heb 3:11,18; 4:3,5) transforms a spatial metaphor into a spiritual reality. French 'repos' and German 'Ruhe' both capture the profound stillness this word conveys.

(9×) A state or place of rest, specifically God's promised rest — the cessation from labor that began at creation and remains available to the faithful. In Hebrews 3-4, the author develops katapausis as a theological concept spanning creation, the wilderness generation, and the present age: God rested (katepausen) from his works (Heb 4:4), the disobedient Israelites failed to enter that rest (Heb 3:11,18; 4:3,5), and a sabbath-rest therefore still awaits God's people (Heb 4:9-11). In Acts 7:49 (quoting Isa 66:1), the sense shifts slightly toward a physical 'place of rest' — God's dwelling. The multilingual evidence (French 'repos,' German 'Ruhe,' Spanish 'reposo') uniformly conveys deep, settled peace rather than mere inactivity. REST AND REFRESHMENT

κατα-παύω G2664 V-AIA-3P (4×)
To cause to cease, bring to rest, restrain; intransitively, to rest or cease from activity.
Carries a dual force: transitively, it means to stop or restrain someone from doing something; intransitively, it means to rest or cease from labor. The author of Hebrews draws deeply on Genesis, noting that God 'rested' on the seventh day (Heb 4:4) and then arguing that Joshua did not give Israel true rest (Heb 4:8), leaving a sabbath-rest still available. The believer who enters God's rest 'ceases from his own works' just as God did (Heb 4:10). In Acts 14:18, the transitive sense appears as Paul and Barnabas barely restrain the crowd from sacrificing to them.

(4×) To cause to stop or restrain from an action (transitive), or to rest and cease from labor (intransitive). In Acts 14:18, Paul and Barnabas struggle to restrain the Lystran crowd – the Spanish 'detuvieron' and English 'restrained' highlight the causative, forceful sense. In Hebrews 4:4, 8, 10, the intransitive sense dominates: God rested from creation, Joshua failed to provide lasting rest, and believers are called to enter divine rest by ceasing from their own works. The French 'donner le repos' nicely captures the gift-like quality of this theological rest. REST AND REFRESHMENT

καταπέτασμα G2665 N-GNS (6×)
Curtain, veil; specifically the inner veil of the Temple separating the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place.
Katapetasma refers to a curtain or veil, and in the NT it denotes specifically the great veil of the Jerusalem Temple. All three Synoptic Gospels record that this veil was torn in two from top to bottom at the moment of Jesus' death (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45), a dramatic sign that access to God's presence was now opened. The letter to the Hebrews develops this theologically: Jesus has entered 'within the veil' as a forerunner on our behalf (Heb 6:19), and the author explains the significance of both the outer and inner curtains of the tabernacle (Heb 9:3; 10:20). German 'Vorhang' (hanging-before) nicely captures the spatial sense of something hung as a barrier.

curtain (6×) The curtain or veil of the Temple – specifically the inner veil (distinguished from the outer covering, to kalumma) that separated the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place where God's presence dwelt. The Synoptic accounts of the crucifixion all report its tearing from top to bottom (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45), signifying open access to God. Hebrews interprets this typologically: Jesus as high priest has passed through the veil (Heb 6:19; 9:3; 10:20). Spanish 'velo' and French 'voile' preserve the sense of a fabric barrier, while the theological weight comes from what it concealed and what its tearing revealed. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

καταπίνω G2666 V-AIA-3S (7×)
To swallow up, devour, overwhelm; to engulf completely, used literally of consumption and figuratively of destruction or grief.
Katapinō means to gulp or swallow down entirely, carrying both a vivid physical image and powerful metaphorical force. Jesus uses it with biting irony in Matt 23:24—straining out a gnat while swallowing a camel. Paul employs it triumphantly: death is 'swallowed up' in victory (1 Cor 15:54), and mortality is swallowed by life (2 Cor 5:4). It can also describe overwhelming sorrow (2 Cor 2:7). Hebrews 11:29 recalls the Red Sea swallowing the Egyptians. Spanish devorar and German verschlingen capture the violent totality of the engulfing.

swallow up, devour, overwhelm (7×) To swallow up, devour, or engulf completely—whether literally consuming or figuratively overwhelming and destroying. The word carries the force of total absorption. Jesus uses it humorously for swallowing a camel (Matt 23:24). Paul transforms it into a victory cry: death swallowed up (1 Cor 15:54) and mortality swallowed by life (2 Cor 5:4). It can also mean to be overwhelmed by excessive sorrow (2 Cor 2:7), where the danger is that grief will consume a repentant person. Hebrews 11:29 recalls the sea devouring the pursuing Egyptians. Spanish fueron tragados and German verschlingen convey the violent completeness of the action. SWALLOWING AND DEVOURING

καταπίπτω G2667 V-APA-GMP (3×) to fall down, drop down, collapse; to fall from a higher to lower position

This verb means to fall or drop down, typically from an upright or higher position. Luke 8:6 describes seed that 'fell' on rocky ground in the parable of the sower. Acts 26:14 records Paul's Damascus road encounter: 'we all fell to the ground.' Acts 28:6 describes people watching Paul, expecting him to swell up or 'suddenly fall down dead' after the viper bite. Classical usage includes falling, dropping, being struck down, and metaphorically, spirits falling or becoming base. The New Testament uses span agricultural (seeds falling), theophanic (falling before divine presence), and expected medical (falling dead from venom).

(3×) The sense is falling from higher to lower position, whether seeds, people struck to ground, or anticipated collapse. The parable's seed 'fell' on different soils—passive motion downward. Paul and companions 'fell to the ground' before the risen Christ—knocked down by divine encounter. The Maltese expected Paul to 'fall down' dead—collapse from snakebite. The aorist participle (καταπεσόντων) in Acts 26:14 emphasizes completed action—having fallen, we all lay on the ground. The Spanish and German glosses use simple falling verbs ('caer/fallen'). Whether seeds, people before glory, or expected death, the word marks downward motion from standing or higher state to prostrate or lower position. FALLING AND FAILING sail to land, put into port, arrive by sea

This nautical verb means to sail toward land and arrive, typically putting into a harbor. Luke 8:26 records that Jesus and disciples 'sailed to' the region of the Gerasenes, across the lake from Galilee. The aorist indicates completed voyage arrival. Classical usage shows this specifically for sailing from open sea to shore, or down a river to a destination. The 'down' prefix may suggest movement toward shore from deeper water. All translation witnesses preserve the maritime context. The single New Testament occurrence sets the scene for Jesus' encounter with the demoniac.

(1×) After calming the storm, Jesus and the disciples 'sailed across and arrived at' the country of the Gerasenes. The verb marks the successful completion of the troubled voyage—they reached shore despite the tempest. This arrival in Gentile territory sets the stage for the dramatic exorcism and the pigs' destruction, demonstrating Jesus' authority even in pagan regions. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP

καταπον-έω G2669 V-PPM/P-AMS (2×) being oppressed, suffering domination or harsh treatment, worn down by affliction
This verb describes being oppressed or crushed, often by those in power. In Acts 7:24, Stephen recounts Moses seeing an Egyptian mistreating an Israelite: he 'saw one of them being wronged (καταπονούμενον),' and intervened by striking down the Egyptian. Peter describes Lot as 'greatly distressed by the sensual conduct of the wicked,' a 'righteous man... tormented (καταπονούμενον) in his righteous soul' by what he saw and heard in Sodom (2 Peter 2:7-8). The term conveys grinding oppression, whether physical abuse (Acts) or moral anguish (2 Peter), the wearing down of the soul or body by injustice or wickedness.

(2×) The two uses involve physical oppression (Acts) and moral torment (2 Peter). Classical usage (LSJ) includes being subdued, crushed, exhausted, even digesting food. Spanish 'siendo oprimido' and French/German 'opprimer,' 'bedrängen' (to oppress, afflict) fit the suffering. Stephen's speech highlights Moses' solidarity with the oppressed, foreshadowing Jesus' own identification with the afflicted. Peter's portrait of Lot shows the righteous suffering under the weight of surrounding sin, a reminder that faithfulness often means enduring the distress of living among the ungodly. OPPRESSION AND TYRANNY to drown, to sink (in the sea); both active sense (cause to drown) and passive (be submerged)

The verb describes drowning or sinking in deep water, particularly the sea. In Matthew 14:30, Peter begins to sink when his faith wavers while walking on the water toward Jesus. In Matthew 18:6, Jesus uses vivid imagery—a millstone tied around the neck and drowning in the depths of the sea—to warn against causing little believers to stumble. Classical usage included both throwing someone into the sea and the resulting submersion, making it a powerful metaphor for total destruction.

(2×) To drown or sink in water, whether actively causing submersion or passively being overcome by waves. Matthew 14:30 depicts Peter's literal near-drowning as he walked on water, while 18:6 uses the imagery hypothetically as the ultimate punishment for those who lead astray the vulnerable. Spanish and French ('hundirse,' 'couler') emphasize the sinking motion, while English captures both the transitive 'be drowned' and intransitive 'to sink' nuances that the Greek verb carries in different contexts. SINKING SUBMERGING

κατ-άρα G2671 N-NFS (6×)
A curse, an invocation of divine judgment or harm; used theologically of the curse of the Law.
Katara is the noun form meaning a curse – a solemn invocation of harm or divine judgment upon someone or something. Paul makes dramatic theological use of it in Galatians 3, declaring that all who rely on works of the law are under a curse (Gal 3:10), and that Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us (Gal 3:13). Hebrews warns that land producing thorns and thistles is 'close to being cursed' (Heb 6:8), and James laments that the same tongue produces both blessing and cursing (Jas 3:10). Spanish 'maldicion' and French 'malediction' both derive from Latin roots meaning 'evil-speaking,' highlighting the verbal dimension of curse-pronouncement.

curse (6×) A curse – a pronouncement invoking harm, misfortune, or divine judgment upon a person or thing. The kata- prefix (down upon) intensifies the root ara (prayer, imprecation), giving the sense of calling down destruction. Paul's use in Galatians 3:10-13 is theologically foundational: the law's curse falls on all who fail to keep it perfectly, and Christ absorbs that curse in substitutionary redemption. Hebrews 6:8 applies it to barren land destined for burning, and James 3:10 pairs it with 'blessing' (eulogia) to expose the inconsistency of the human tongue. The multilingual evidence – Spanish 'maldicion,' French 'malediction' – consistently renders it as a formal imprecation. CURSES AND ANATHEMA

καταρ-άομαι G2672 V-AIM-2S (6×)
To curse, invoke evil upon someone; to pronounce or call down a curse.
Kataraomai is the verbal counterpart of katara (curse), meaning to call down curses upon someone or to pronounce a malediction. Jesus commands a radical ethic: 'bless those who curse you' (Matt 5:44; Luke 6:28), turning the expected cycle of cursing and retaliation on its head. Paul echoes this in Romans 12:14: 'Bless and do not curse.' The word also appears in the dramatic scene where Jesus curses the barren fig tree (Mark 11:21) and in the eschatological judgment where the King sends the cursed away (Matt 25:41). The perfect participle kateramenos carries the force of an abiding state – 'accursed ones.' Spanish 'maldecir' and French 'maudire' both mean literally 'to speak evil.'

curse, call down curses upon (6×) To pronounce a curse upon someone, to invoke evil or divine judgment against them. The middle voice form (kataraomai) suggests calling down curses as a speech act directed at or against another. In the NT it appears in the ethical commands of Jesus and Paul to bless rather than curse (Matt 5:44; Luke 6:28; Rom 12:14), in Jesus' cursing of the unfruitful fig tree (Mark 11:21), and in the eschatological pronouncement upon the condemned at the last judgment: 'Depart from me, you cursed ones' (Matt 25:41). The perfect participle kateramenoi conveys an established, enduring state of being under a curse. CURSING (VERBAL ACT)

καταργ-έω G2673 V-PPM/P-GMP (27×)

To render idle, abolish, nullify, destroy; to bring to nothing, release from obligation, or sever a relationship.

Katargeo is one of Paul's most powerful theological verbs, appearing almost exclusively in his letters. Built from kata ('down') and argeo ('be idle'), it literally means to render something inoperative — but its actual range stretches from legal nullification to cosmic destruction. Paul uses it to describe what God does to the old order: the law's condemnation is abolished (2 Cor 3:11), death itself will be destroyed (1 Cor 15:26), and the 'rulers of this age' are being brought to nothing (1 Cor 2:6). The multilingual evidence is revealing: Spanish splits the range between abolir, anular, and destruir, while German consistently reaches for zunichtemachen ('to make into nothing'), capturing the word's core force. The two relational uses in Romans 7 — being 'released' from the law as a widow is released from marriage — show how versatile this verb of undoing truly is.

1. abolish, bring to an end (16×) To abolish, bring to an end, render inoperative — the dominant Pauline sense at 16 occurrences. Something that once had force or authority is now made powerless or obsolete. In 1 Cor 13:8-10, prophecy and knowledge will be 'done away with' when the perfect comes; in 2 Cor 3:7-14, the old covenant glory is 'being abolished.' Spanish abolir and French abolir both map directly. The passive 'being abolished' forms are especially important: these things fade not by human effort but by divine supersession (Rom 6:6; 1 Cor 2:6; 2 Tim 1:10). ABOLISH NULLIFY DESTROY

en: He-abolishes, I-have-done-away-with, being-abolished | es: aboliendo, anular, es-abolida | fr: abolir | de: zunichtemachen Rom 6:6; 1Cor 2:6; 1Cor 13:8; 1Cor 13:10

2. nullify, invalidate (5×) To nullify or invalidate a legal or promissory claim — 5 occurrences, all in Romans and 1 Corinthians. Paul's urgent rhetorical questions drive this sense: 'Do we then nullify the law through faith?' (Rom 3:31); 'Has God's faithfulness been nullified?' (Rom 3:3). The rendering anulamos in Spanish and the German zunichtemachen both capture the forensic weight. Luke 13:7's use — the barren fig tree 'renders the ground useless' — provides the lone non-Pauline instance and preserves the original agricultural meaning of making something idle or unproductive. ABOLISH NULLIFY DESTROY

en: do-we-nullify, has-been-nullified, he-might-nullify | es: anulamos, anulará, anule | fr: abolir | de: zunichtemachen, καταργεῖ Luke 13:7; Rom 3:3; Rom 3:31; Rom 4:14; 1Cor 1:28

3. destroy, bring to nothing (3×) To destroy, annihilate an opposing power — 3 occurrences where the force goes beyond mere cessation to active violent overthrow. Christ will 'destroy' the one who has the power of death, the devil (Heb 2:14); the lawless one will be destroyed at Christ's coming (2 Thess 2:8); even the stomach and food 'God will destroy' (1 Cor 6:13). Spanish destruir and destruyera confirm the escalation beyond abolir. This is katargeo at its most eschatological and militant. ABOLISH NULLIFY DESTROY

en: he-might-destroy, will-abolish, will-destroy | es: anulará, destruirá, destruyera | fr: abolir | de: zunichtemachen 1Cor 6:13; 2Thess 2:8; Heb 2:14

4. release, set free from (2×) To release or set free from a binding obligation — 2 occurrences, both in Romans 7. A married woman 'has been released' from the law of her husband when he dies (Rom 7:2); believers 'were released' from the law, having died to what bound them (Rom 7:6). Spanish liberada/liberados and the English 'released' both shift from the abolition frame to an emancipation frame. The passive voice emphasizes that this freedom comes through death — a paradox Paul develops at length. ABOLISH NULLIFY DESTROY

en: she-has-been-released, we-were-released | es: ha-sido-liberada, hemos-sido-liberados | fr: abolir | de: zunichtemachen Rom 7:2; Rom 7:6

5. sever, estrange from (1×) To sever or estrange from a relationship — a single striking occurrence in Galatians 5:4, where Paul warns the Galatians: 'You have been severed from Christ, you who seek justification by the law.' The Spanish fuisteis-abolidos is telling — it struggles to find the relational vocabulary, defaulting to the abolition frame. But the Greek here is distinctly personal and relational: it is not a law or institution being nullified but persons being cut off from a living relationship with Christ. This lone usage represents the interpersonal extreme of katargeo's semantic range. ABOLISH NULLIFY DESTROY en: you-were-severed | es: fuisteis-abolidos | fr: abolir | de: zunichtemachen Gal 5:4

κατἄριθμ-έω G2674 V-RPM/P-NMS (1×)

number among, count with, reckon as belonging to

This verb means to assign someone to a group by counting them in. Acts 1:17 uses the perfect passive participle to describe Judas: he 'was numbered among us,' having been officially counted as one of the Twelve. The perfect tense emphasizes the completed state—he had been and remained (until his betrayal) part of the apostolic band. Classical usage shows counting in a census or reckoning someone among a group. The cross-linguistic evidence emphasizes the formal, official nature of the counting. Peter's speech acknowledges Judas's legitimate apostolic position before his fall.

(1×) Peter notes that Judas 'was numbered among us'—he had been formally counted as one of the twelve apostles, not a hanger-on but a full member. The perfect participle stresses the established fact of his membership, making his betrayal all the more shocking. This acknowledgment establishes the vacancy that must be filled to restore the Twelve's fullness. ACCOMPANIMENT AND WITH

καταρτ-ίζω G2675 V-RPM/P-ANP (13×)

To mend, restore, complete, or prepare; to bring something or someone to a state of full readiness or wholeness.

Carries the vivid image of setting a broken bone or mending torn nets — the act of restoring something to its proper, functioning state. In the Gospels, James and John are found καταρτίζοντας their nets on the shore (Matt 4:21), while Paul urges the Corinthians to be 'perfectly joined together' in the same mind (1 Cor 1:10). The word scales from the mundane repair of fishing gear to God's cosmic act of 'framing' the universe by his word (Heb 11:3). Spanish renders it as both 'remendando' (mending) and 'completar' (completing), capturing the breadth from physical repair to spiritual perfection.

1. complete, perfect, equip (7×) To bring to completion, equip fully, or perfect — used of God's work in maturing believers or of the call to be united in one mind. Paul's prayer in 1 Thess 3:10 asks God to 'complete' what is lacking in faith. The Spanish 'completar' and French 'préparer' both highlight this sense of making whole. Luke 6:40 says a fully trained disciple will be like his teacher, using the participle κατηρτισμένος. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

en: be-restored, equip, having-been-fully-trained | es: Sed-perfeccionados, completamente-preparado, completar | fr: préparer, réparer | de: zubereiten, κατηρτίσω, κατηρτισμένος Matt 21:16; Luke 6:40; 1Cor 1:10; 2Cor 13:11; 1Thess 3:10

2. mend, repair, restore (3×) To mend or repair something physically broken, or to restore a person who has fallen. In Matt 4:21 and Mark 1:19 the disciples are mending (καταρτίζοντας) their nets — a concrete, tactile image. Paul extends this to Gal 6:1, where the spiritually mature should 'restore' a brother caught in sin with gentleness. Spanish 'remendando' and 'restaurad' preserve the physical-to-spiritual arc. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE en: mending, restore | es: remendando, reparando, restaurad | fr: préparer | de: zubereiten, καταρτίζοντας Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19; Gal 6:1

3. prepare, make ready (2×) To prepare or make ready for a divinely appointed purpose. In Heb 10:5, a body is 'prepared' for Christ; in Rom 9:22, vessels are 'prepared for destruction.' The emphasis falls on prior arrangement — something made fit before the moment of use. French 'préparer' and Spanish 'preparaste' align cleanly here. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE
en: having-been-prepared, you-prepared | es: preparados, preparaste | fr: préparer, réparer | de: zubereiten Rom 9:22; Heb 10:5

4. frame, form, create (1×) To frame or fashion into existence, used uniquely in Heb 11:3 of God constituting the visible world by his word. The ages themselves were 'framed' so that what is seen was not made from what is visible. Spanish renders this 'haber sido hechos' (to have been made), capturing the creative, foundational force of the term. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE en: to-have-been-framed | es: haber-sido-hechos | fr: préparer | de: zubereiten Heb 11:3

κατάρτ-ῐσις G2676 N-AFS (1×)
restoration, completion, putting in order
This noun denotes the act or state of being made complete, restored to proper condition, or perfected. Second Corinthians 13:9 expresses Paul's prayer for the Corinthians' 'restoration' or 'perfection.' The word combines the verb for mending nets or perfecting disciples with a noun suffix. Classical usage shows this for political restoration, training/discipline, or general completion. The translation witnesses diverge (restoration, perfección, Zubereitung/preparation), reflecting the word's range from repair to completion to training. Paul desires their full spiritual maturity and community wholeness.

(1×) Paul rejoices when he is weak but the Corinthians are strong, and he prays for their κατάρτισις—their complete restoration or perfection. This could mean mending divisions, completing their spiritual formation, or restoring them to full health after his necessary rebuke. The term suggests bringing to completion what is lacking, whether repair or further development toward maturity. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11702 WITH 8 SENSES

καταρτ-ισμός G2677 N-AMS (1×)
equipping, fitting out, training for service
This noun refers to the process of preparing or equipping someone for a task, related to the verb for mending nets or perfecting disciples. Ephesians 4:12 describes Christ's gifts of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers given 'for the equipping of the saints for the work of ministry.' The accusative indicates purpose—these leaders exist to prepare God's people for service. Classical usage shows preparation, furnishing, or training. The word implies bringing people to readiness and competence. Paul's vision sees ministry as the calling of all believers, with leaders functioning as equippers rather than performers.

(1×) The ascended Christ gave leadership gifts to the church specifically 'for the equipping of the saints'—preparing, training, and fitting out ordinary believers for ministry work. This καταρτισμός is not passive reception but active preparation for function. The leaders are not the sole ministers but the equippers who bring others to readiness and competence for service in the body. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11702 WITH 8 SENSES

κατα-σείω G2678 V-APA-NMS (4×)
To motion with the hand; to make a gesture signaling for silence or attention.
A vivid gesture word describing the act of waving or shaking the hand to gain an audience's attention or request silence. Luke uses this verb four times in Acts to depict speakers commanding a crowd's attention before an important address. Peter motions from the doorway of Mary's house after his miraculous escape from prison (Acts 12:17), Paul gestures before the synagogue in Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16), Alexander tries to signal the Ephesian mob (Acts 19:33), and Paul motions from the Jerusalem barracks stairway (Acts 21:40). The French 'faire signe' and Spanish 'hacer señas' precisely mirror the physical gesture implied.

(4×) To wave or motion with the hand as a signal for silence or attention before speaking. All four NT occurrences appear in Acts, each depicting a speaker commanding a crowd: Peter after his prison release (Acts 12:17), Paul in the Pisidian synagogue (Acts 13:16), Alexander before the Ephesian mob (Acts 19:33), and Paul on the Jerusalem stairs (Acts 21:40). The consistent multilingual rendering – Spanish 'hacer señas,' French 'faire signe,' German gesture terms – confirms this is a single, concrete physical action rather than abstract communication. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 11301 WITH 5 SENSES

κατασκάπτω G2679 V-RPM/P-ANP (2×)
tear down, demolish, destroy utterly, raze to the ground
This verb means to destroy completely, to raze structures or overthrow established things. James quotes Amos at the Jerusalem Council: 'After this I will return, and I will rebuild the tent of David that has fallen; I will rebuild its ruins, and I will restore it, that the remnant of mankind may seek the Lord' (Acts 15:16-17). The perfect passive participle 'having been torn down (κατεσκαμμένα)' describes the ruins God promises to rebuild. Paul recounts Elijah's complaint: 'Lord, they have killed your prophets, they have demolished (κατέσκαψαν) your altars' (Romans 11:3), quoting 1 Kings 19:10. Both uses involve the destruction of sacred structures that God will restore or vindicate.

(2×) Both passages involve Old Testament quotations about demolished sacred sites. Classical usage (LSJ) includes digging down, destroying utterly, razing to the ground. Spanish 'derribaron' (they tore down) and French/German forms ('zerstören,' destroy) fit the violent demolition. In Acts, James applies Amos's promise of restoration to the inclusion of Gentiles—the rebuilt tent of David now encompasses all nations. In Romans, Paul cites Elijah to illustrate Israel's remnant theology: even when altars are destroyed and prophets slain, God preserves a faithful remnant and ultimately restores. DESCENDING AND TEARING

κατασκευ-άζω G2680 V-PPM/P-GFS (11×)
To prepare or make ready; also to build, construct, or erect a physical structure.
Kataskeuazō means to furnish, equip, or make something fully ready — a word that bridges preparation and construction. In the Synoptic Gospels it appears in the quotation of Malachi 3:1, where a messenger 'will prepare' the way before the Lord (Matt 11:10, Mark 1:2, Luke 7:27), emphasizing arrangement and readiness. But in Hebrews the focus shifts to physical building: 'every house is built by someone, but the builder of all things is God' (Heb 3:3-4). The multilingual evidence captures both dimensions — Spanish distinguishes preparado from construyéndose, while German uses bauen for both, and French defaults to préparer throughout.

1. prepare, make ready (a way or arrangement) (7×) To prepare, make ready, or arrange in advance — often with the sense of setting conditions for something to come. This is the word used in the Synoptic quotation of Mal 3:1 / Isa 40:3 where a messenger 'will prepare your way before you' (Matt 11:10, Mark 1:2, Luke 7:27). Luke 1:17 applies it to John the Baptist preparing a people for the Lord. In Heb 9:2 it describes the tabernacle being 'prepared' or arranged. Spanish preparado and French préparer capture the readiness dimension well. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE en: having-been-prepared, prepared, was-prepared | es: fue-preparado, habiendo-sido-preparadas, preparado | fr: préparer | de: bauen, κατασκευάσει, κατεσκευασμένον Matt 11:10; Mark 1:2; Luke 1:17; Luke 7:27; Heb 9:2

2. build, construct (a structure) (4×) To build, construct, or erect a physical structure such as a house, vessel, or tabernacle. Distinguished from the 'prepare' sense by its focus on material construction. In Heb 3:3-4, the author reasons that 'every house is built (kataskeuazetai) by someone, but the builder of all things is God,' using the word twice in a single verse with clear constructional meaning. In 1 Pet 3:20 it describes Noah's ark being 'constructed.' Spanish differentiates this clearly with construyéndose ('being constructed') versus the preparado of sense 1. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

κατασκην-όω G2681 V-PNA (4×)
To settle down, nest, take up lodging; of birds nesting in branches, or figuratively dwelling securely.
Literally means to pitch one's tent or take up quarters, but in the NT it appears most memorably in the mustard seed parables where birds come and nest in the branches of the great shrub (Matt 13:32; Mark 4:32; Luke 13:19). The image echoes Old Testament passages about great trees sheltering birds – a symbol of a kingdom providing refuge. In Acts 2:26, Peter quotes Psalm 16 where the psalmist's flesh will 'dwell securely,' extending the metaphor from birds finding shelter to the believer resting in God's protection. The French 'dresser la tente' beautifully preserves the tent-dwelling etymology of the Greek skēnē root.

(4×) To settle, nest, or take up lodging in a place, often said of birds finding shelter in tree branches. The Synoptic mustard seed parables (Matt 13:32; Mark 4:32; Luke 13:19) use this verb to depict birds nesting in the grown shrub, echoing Ezekiel 17:23 and Daniel 4:12 where a great tree sheltering birds symbolizes a kingdom offering refuge. In Acts 2:26, it shifts to human experience as Peter quotes the psalmist's confidence that his flesh will 'dwell securely.' The Spanish 'anidar' (to nest) captures the ornithological sense, while French 'dresser la tente' preserves the etymological connection to skēnē (tent/tabernacle). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κατασκήν-ωσις G2682 N-AFP (2×)
nests, resting places or shelters built by birds for dwelling
This noun denotes the nests where birds roost or raise their young. Jesus uses it in a poignant saying about his own homelessness: 'Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests (κατασκηνώσεις), but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head' (Matthew 8:20; Luke 9:58). The contrast is striking—even wild creatures have secure resting places, yet the Lord of creation lives as an itinerant, without a home of his own. The term underscores the cost of discipleship: following Jesus may mean giving up settled security and embracing a pilgrim existence.

(2×) Both Gospel uses quote the same saying about Jesus' homelessness. Classical usage (LSJ) includes encamping, taking quarters, or (for birds) resting places. Spanish 'nidos' and French 'nid' (nest) preserve the bird imagery. The saying challenges would-be followers to count the cost: Jesus' mission involves vulnerability and dependence, not comfort and status. The birds' nests symbolize natural provision and security, which Jesus foregoes in his incarnate mission, relying instead on the Father's care and the hospitality of others. SITTING AND DWELLING

κατασκῐ-άζω G2683 V-PPA-NNP (1×)
overshadow, cast a shadow over, cover with shade
This verb means to throw a shadow over something, providing shade or cover. Hebrews 9:5 describes the cherubim of glory 'overshadowing' the mercy seat in the tabernacle. The present participle suggests continual covering action. Classical usage shows spreading awnings, covering with shade, or metaphorically obscuring. The cross-linguistic witnesses preserve the shadow/covering imagery. In the tabernacle, the cherubim's wings spread over the ark's cover where blood was sprinkled, their shadow marking the divine presence. This same verb describes the Spirit's overshadowing Mary at the incarnation.

(1×) The author mentions the cherubim of glory 'overshadowing the mercy seat'—their wings creating a canopy of shadow over the place of atonement. The present participle emphasizes their continuous protective covering. This shadowing marks the locus of divine presence and the meeting point between God and humanity, though the author declines to elaborate further on these sacred furnishings. COVERING AND CONCEALING

κατασκοπ-έω G2684 V-ANA (1×) spy out, reconnoiter, investigate secretly
This verb means to observe closely for intelligence purposes, typically military reconnaissance or espionage. Galatians 2:4 describes 'false brothers' who 'slipped in to spy out our freedom in Christ Jesus.' The aorist infinitive expresses their hostile purpose—secret investigation with intent to undermine. Classical usage confirms the military sense of scouting enemy territory. The translation witnesses uniformly preserve the espionage imagery. Paul presents these infiltrators as reconnaissance agents for the circumcision party, gathering intelligence to launch attacks on gospel freedom. Their investigation is not honest inquiry but hostile surveillance.

(1×) Paul characterizes the false brothers as spies who secretly infiltrated 'to spy out our freedom'—conducting surveillance of Gentile Christian practice to find grounds for requiring circumcision. The infinitive of purpose shows their mission was reconnaissance, not fellowship. Like military scouts surveying enemy positions, they gathered intelligence to support the circumcision party's campaign against Paul's gospel of freedom. GOING OUT AND FORTH

κατάσκοπ-ος G2685 N-AMP (1×) spy, scout, secret agent
This noun designates a person who conducts reconnaissance, whether military scout or secret agent. Hebrews 11:31 refers to Rahab receiving 'the spies' in peace—the Israelite scouts sent to reconnoiter Jericho. The accusative plural indicates she welcomed multiple agents. Classical usage confirms the military context of reconnaissance personnel. All translation witnesses preserve the espionage terminology. The reference is to Joshua 2, where Rahab hid the Hebrew spies from the king's men. Her faith-motivated hospitality to enemy agents secured her salvation when Jericho fell.

(1×) Rahab's faith is demonstrated by receiving 'the spies' (Joshua's reconnaissance agents) in peace rather than betraying them to Jericho's king. The plural noun identifies them by their military function—scouts gathering intelligence before the assault. Her protection of these κατάσκοποι, enemy agents on hostile ground, manifested faith that sided with Israel's God despite her pagan context. AMBUSH MILITARY

κατασοφ-ίζομαι G2686 V-APM-NMS (1×) deal craftily, outwit by cunning, exploit through deception
This middle voice verb means to use sophistry or cunning to gain advantage over someone, to outwit by clever manipulation. Acts 7:19 describes the pharaoh who 'dealt craftily with our fathers,' exploiting Israel through forced labor and infanticide. The aorist participle suggests decisive, deliberate action. Classical usage shows outwitting by fallacious arguments or evading through quibbling. The cross-linguistic witnesses emphasize cunning and craft. Stephen's speech identifies this Egyptian oppression as calculated, malicious policy rather than mere harsh governance. The 'dealing craftily' involves both forced exposure of infants and systematic exploitation.

(1×) Stephen accuses the pharaoh of Exodus 1 of 'dealing craftily' with Israel—not honest harsh rule but cunning, malicious policy designed to destroy them. The participle characterizes his treatment as sophistic exploitation, using wicked ingenuity to oppress. This includes the forced labor and the command to kill Hebrew male infants, both calculated strategies to eliminate the perceived threat. DECEIT AND TREACHERY

καταστέλλω G2687 V-APA-NMS (2×)

quieted, calmed down, restrained or pacified a disturbance

This verb means to quiet, calm, or bring under control. In Acts 19:35-36, the town clerk of Ephesus addresses the riotous crowd after the silversmiths' uproar: 'when the town clerk had quieted (καταστείλας) the crowd,' he reasoned with them and 'quieted (κατεσταλμένους)' their agitation, averting violence against Paul and his companions. The term conveys the restoration of order from chaos, the settling of a turbulent situation through authoritative speech. It also appears in classical contexts describing sedate, restrained character, the opposite of reckless or impulsive behavior.

(2×) Both uses in Acts 19 describe calming the Ephesian riot. Classical usage (LSJ) includes arranging, repressing, restraining, or describing a calm character. Spanish 'calmar' and French 'calmer' (to calm) capture the pacifying sense. The town clerk's intervention prevents mob violence, using reason and legal propriety to defuse the crowd's rage. His success in quieting them illustrates the power of measured speech and appeals to order, contrasting with Demetrius's inflammatory rhetoric that ignited the riot. The verb marks the shift from chaos to calm, disorder to restraint. EASE AND TRANQUILITY demeanor, deportment, manner of behavior

This noun denotes one's bearing, conduct, or characteristic manner of presenting oneself. Titus 2:3 instructs older women to be reverent 'in demeanor'—their overall comportment should reflect holiness. The dative indicates the sphere in which reverence is shown. Classical usage extends from bodily/mental condition to weather to general state of affairs to personal deportment. The cross-linguistic witnesses vary (demeanor, comportamiento, Haltung/bearing), but converge on observable conduct or bearing. Paul envisions a lifestyle where godliness permeates visible behavior and characteristic manner.

(1×) Older women should exhibit reverence 'in their demeanor'—not just in specific acts but in their overall bearing and characteristic comportment. The noun captures the totality of visible behavior, the impression one makes through habitual conduct. This holistic godliness in deportment qualifies them to teach younger women by example and instruction. CONDUCT WAY LIFE clothing, attire, modest dress

This noun refers to clothing or apparel, with potential overtones of modesty or propriety in dress. First Timothy 2:9 instructs women to adorn themselves in 'respectable clothing' (or 'with modest deportment'), with propriety and self-control. The dative indicates manner—how they should adorn themselves. Classical usage shows equipment, dress, and also meanings like modesty or restraint. Some witnesses translate as clothing (vestido, Kleidung), others emphasize the modesty aspect. The context contrasts proper simplicity with expensive hairstyles, gold, pearls, and costly garments.

(1×) Paul instructs Christian women to adorn themselves 'in respectable attire'—clothing that reflects propriety and self-control rather than ostentation. The noun may emphasize the modest character of the clothing or the modest manner of wearing it. Either way, the concern is that dress not communicate vanity or wealth-display but rather the inner adornment of good works and godliness. CLOTHING AND DRESS

καταστρέφω G2690 V-AIA-3S (2×)

overturned, upset, turned upside down, especially tables or established structures

This verb means to overturn or upset physically. Both occurrences describe Jesus cleansing the temple: he 'entered the temple and drove out all who sold and bought in the temple, and he overturned (κατέστρεψεν) the tables of the money-changers and the seats of those who sold pigeons' (Matthew 21:12; Mark 11:15). The action is dramatic and prophetic—Jesus physically disrupting the commercialized worship that had displaced true devotion. The verb captures the forceful reversal, the toppling of what had been established, signaling God's judgment on corrupt religious systems and the inauguration of true worship in the Messiah.

(2×) Both Gospel accounts describe the temple cleansing. Classical usage (LSJ) includes turning down, overturning, ruining, subduing. Spanish 'volcó' (overturned) and French/German 'renverser,' 'umstürzen' (to overturn) fit the physical upset. Jesus' action enacts prophetic judgment, echoing Malachi's vision of the Lord suddenly coming to his temple to purify. The overturning of tables becomes a parable in action: God overturns human religious systems that profit from piety, replacing them with a house of prayer for all nations. The verb's violence underscores the seriousness of the corruption and the authority of the one cleansing it. THRUST DOWN TOPPLED grow wanton against, become sensual toward, turn from devotion

This verb describes a turning from commitment through sensual indulgence or desire for pleasure. First Timothy 5:11 warns about younger widows who, when their passions draw them away from Christ, 'grow wanton against' him, desiring to marry. The aorist subjunctive follows 'when,' indicating a potential danger. The compound suggests a turning against through sensuality. The translation witnesses struggle to capture this (grow wanton against, become sensual against, turn against). The concern is not marriage itself but the forsaking of devotion to Christ through uncontrolled desire.

(1×) Paul warns that younger widows may 'grow wanton against Christ'—their natural desires for marriage and family overwhelming their initial devotion to ministry. The verb suggests a sensual impulse that turns them away from earlier commitment. This isn't condemning marriage but recognizing how unchecked physical and emotional longings can erode spiritual focus, leading to broken vows and discredited witness. SEXUAL IMMORALITY

καταστροφ-ή G2692 N-DFS (2×)

destruction, ruin, catastrophic overthrow or complete devastation

This noun denotes utter ruin or overthrow, often with moral or cosmic implications. Paul warns Timothy that quarreling over words leads 'to the ruin (καταστροφῇ) of the hearers' (2 Timothy 2:14), where verbal disputes cause spiritual destruction rather than edification. Peter recalls how God 'condemned the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah to destruction (καταστροφῇ), reducing them to ashes' as an example to the ungodly (2 Peter 2:6). The term evokes total collapse—whether of faith (2 Timothy) or of cities (2 Peter)—standing as a warning of the consequences of sin and folly.

(2×) The two uses involve spiritual (2 Tim) and physical (2 Pet) destruction. Classical usage (LSJ) includes overturning, subjugation, ruin, end, even dénouement in drama. Spanish 'ruina/destrucción' and French/German forms ('Verderben,' ruin) capture the catastrophe. Paul's pastoral concern is that foolish controversies undermine believers' faith, causing ruin rather than growth. Peter's apocalyptic warning uses the historical destruction of Sodom as a type of final judgment. Both contexts use καταστροφή to signal the dire outcome of rejecting truth or pursuing ungodliness—a ruin that is complete and exemplary. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

κατα-στρώννῡμι G2693 V-AIP-3P (1×)

strike down, lay low, overthrow

This verb means to lay prostrate, strike down, or spread out on the ground. First Corinthians 10:5 states that God was not pleased with most of the wilderness generation, 'for they were laid low in the wilderness.' The aorist passive indicates they received the action—God struck them down. Classical usage shows spreading out a bed, being strewn with corpses (passive), or laying low in judgment. All translation witnesses preserve the violent overthrow imagery. Paul references the multiple judgments in Numbers-Deuteronomy where Israelite rebels died in the desert, their bodies literally spread across the wilderness.

(1×) Most of the exodus generation 'were laid low in the wilderness'—struck down by divine judgment so that their corpses littered the desert. The aorist passive emphasizes completed divine action against them. Paul uses this sobering image to warn the Corinthians that covenant privilege doesn't guarantee immunity from judgment; disobedience brings the same fate as ancient Israel experienced. THRUST DOWN TOPPLED

κατασύρω G2694 V-PSA-3S (1×)

drag, pull forcibly, haul away

This verb means to drag or pull something or someone by force. Luke 12:58 warns about an adversary who might 'drag you' before the judge if you don't settle on the way. The aorist subjunctive follows a negative purpose clause—lest he drag you. Classical usage shows dragging down, pulling violently, sweeping away, or hauling off captives. The cross-linguistic witnesses uniformly preserve the forcible dragging imagery. The legal context suggests an unwilling defendant being physically hauled into court. Jesus uses this vivid picture to urge reconciliation before reaching the point of compulsory legal process.

(1×) Jesus warns that the adversary 'may drag you' to the judge—not escort politely but haul forcibly, like arresting an unwilling defendant. The subjunctive indicates potential danger if reconciliation isn't achieved. This vivid verb choice emphasizes the loss of agency and dignity when legal conflict reaches the enforcement stage. Better to settle while you still walk freely. DRAWING AND PULLING κατασφάζω G2695 V-AMA-2P (1×)

slaughter, kill, butcher

This verb means to slaughter or butcher, typically animals but applicable to violent killing of persons. Luke 19:27 concludes the parable of the minas with the king's command: 'But as for these enemies of mine who did not want me to reign over them, bring them here and slaughter them before me.' The aorist imperative commands immediate, decisive action. Classical usage shows frequent use in aorist passive for being slaughtered. The cross-linguistic witnesses preserve the violent killing terminology. The parable's shocking conclusion reflects the fate of those who reject the king's authority—judgment as decisive as butchering animals.

(1×) The returning king in Jesus' parable orders his rebellious subjects 'slaughtered before me'—not merely punished but killed like animals. The aorist imperative demands immediate execution of enemies who refused his reign. This brutal conclusion warns that rejection of Jesus' kingship brings ultimate, violent judgment. The verb's associations with animal butchery underscore the finality and severity of the sentence. WEAPONS AND WARFARE

seal up, secure by sealing, make fast

This verb means to seal something securely, making it tamper-proof or secret. Revelation 5:1 describes the scroll 'sealed with seven seals' in the right hand of the one on the throne. The perfect passive participle emphasizes the completed state—it stands sealed, secured against opening. Classical usage shows sealing documents, making things fast, or securing property. The multilingual witnesses preserve the sealing imagery. In ancient practice, multiple seals indicated maximum security and authenticity. John's vision presents a scroll whose contents remain inaccessible until the Lamb proves worthy to break the seals.

(1×) The scroll in God's hand 'was sealed with seven seals'—the perfect participle indicating it remained in a secured, closed state. Multiple seals meant no one could access the contents without authorization. This maximum security emphasizes both the importance of what is written and the dramatic tension before the Lamb appears as the only one worthy to open it and reveal the contents. SEALING AND AUTHENTICATING

κατά-σχεσις G2697 N-AFS (2×)

possession, holding, the act of taking or state of possessing land or property

This noun describes possession or ownership, particularly of land. Stephen recounts God's promise to Abraham: 'He gave him no inheritance in [the land], not even a foot's length, but promised to give it to him as a possession (κατάσχεσιν), and to his offspring after him' (Acts 7:5). Later, Stephen says God 'drove out the nations before our fathers' so that they could bring the tabernacle 'into the land which they took possession (κατασχέσει) of under Joshua' (Acts 7:45). The term connects God's promises to Israel's eventual settlement in Canaan, emphasizing both the gift and the fulfillment of possession.

(2×) Both uses in Acts 7 relate to Israel's possession of the promised land. Classical usage (LSJ) includes holding back, retention, possession, or relation/attitude. Spanish 'posesión' and French 'posséder' (to possess) capture the ownership sense. Stephen's speech traces salvation history from Abraham's landless sojourning to Joshua's conquest, with possession of the land as a key stage in God's covenant faithfulness. Yet Stephen's larger point is that Israel's privilege—possession of the land, the tabernacle, the law—did not guarantee faithfulness; they still resisted the Spirit and rejected the Righteous One. INHERITANCE AND PROPERTY

κατατίθημι G2698 V-ANM (2×)

grant, bestow as a favor, deposit or lay down for another's benefit

This verb means to lay down, deposit, or grant as a favor. Felix, the Roman governor, wants 'to do the Jews a favor (χάριτα καταθέσθαι),' so he leaves Paul in prison (Acts 24:27). His successor Festus similarly asks Paul if he is willing to go to Jerusalem for trial, 'wishing to do the Jews a favor (χάριν καταθέσθαι)' (Acts 25:9). In both cases, the infinitive phrase means to grant a favor or win favor by accommodating the Jewish leaders' desires. The verb thus describes political maneuvering, the laying down of a favor as one might deposit a gift, currying favor at Paul's expense.

(2×) Both Acts uses involve Roman governors seeking favor with Jewish authorities by disadvantaging Paul. Classical usage (LSJ) includes placing down, offering, depositing, doing a favor. Spanish 'conceder' (to grant) and French 'déposer' (to deposit) preserve the idea of bestowing. The phrase 'grant a favor' translates the idiom literally as 'lay down grace/favor.' Felix and Festus both play political games, treating justice as negotiable when set against the expediency of maintaining good relations with local elites. Paul's appeals to Roman law and ultimately to Caesar expose the corruption of this favor-granting. PLACING AND LAYING

κατατομή G2699 N-AFS (1×)

mutilation, cutting off, concision

This noun literally means a cutting or incision, but Philippians 3:2 uses it as a derogatory wordplay for false circumcision. Paul warns 'beware of the mutilation'—using κατατομή (cutting up) as a contemptuous pun on περιτομή (circumcision). Classical usage shows notches, grooves, or incisions, and technically refers to mutilation as opposed to proper circumcision. The translation witnesses preserve the mutilation sense. By calling circumcision-advocates 'the mutilation,' Paul denies their practice has covenantal significance—it's mere fleshly cutting, not the true mark of God's people, which is now the Spirit's circumcision of the heart.

(1×) Paul mockingly calls the circumcision party 'the mutilation'—a contemptuous wordplay that reduces their cherished ritual to mere fleshly cutting. The noun κατατομή (cutting up) parodies περιτομή (circumcision), suggesting their practice is meaningless mutilation, not covenant sign. This shocking rhetoric denies that physical circumcision retains theological significance now that Christ has come and the Spirit circumcises hearts. CIRCUMCISION RITE

κατατοξ-εύω G2700

to shoot down with arrows, strike dead with archery; to pierce with projectiles

A compound verb meaning to shoot someone down with arrows—to kill or strike with projectile weapons. The prefix κατα- adds downward force or completion to the act of archery. Classical texts use it for battlefield deaths and hunting. The passive voice means 'to be shot down' or struck by arrows. In biblical and Septuagintal contexts it may appear in descriptions of divine judgment (God's arrows) or military defeat. The word paints a violent image—not abstract death but the specific brutality of arrows finding their mark.

κατατρέχω G2701 V-AIA-3S (1×)

run down, rush down, hurry to

This verb means to run downward or rush to a place, especially from higher ground. Acts 21:32 describes the Roman commander who, hearing about the riot, 'immediately took soldiers and centurions and ran down to them.' The aorist indicates swift, decisive action—he rushed from the Fortress Antonia down into the temple courts. Classical usage shows running down from elevation, disembarking by rushing to shore, or military running down of enemies. The 'down' prefix fits the topography—the fortress overlooked the temple. The multilingual witnesses preserve the rushing/running imagery. This quick military intervention saves Paul's life.

(1×) The Roman tribune, upon hearing the uproar, 'ran down' with troops from the Antonia fortress into the temple area where the mob was beating Paul. The aorist emphasizes immediate action—no delay in responding to civil disturbance. The verb captures both speed and the downward movement from the fortress elevation to the lower temple courts, a geographic detail confirming Luke's topographic knowledge. RUNNING AND RACING

To bring down, bear against, cast (a vote); in the passive, to be overcome or weighed down (especially by sleep).

A versatile compound verb meaning to carry or bear downward, with applications ranging from physical descent to legal procedure. In Acts 20:9, the young man Eutychus is 'borne down' by deep sleep and falls from a window – the passive voice vividly conveys being overwhelmed by drowsiness. In Acts 25:7 and 26:10, the verb takes on a judicial sense: bringing charges against someone or casting a vote of condemnation. The Spanish 'siendo vencido' (being overcome) for the sleep sense and 'trayendo' (bringing) for the legal sense nicely illustrate the two distinct applications within a single root meaning of downward force.

(4×) To be overcome or weighed down, especially by sleep (passive). In Acts 20:9, Eutychus is 'borne down by deep sleep' and falls from the third-story window during Paul's lengthy sermon. The passive form emphasizes the irresistible, overwhelming nature of the drowsiness. Spanish 'siendo vencido' (being overcome) captures the helplessness of the passive voice, while French 'porter contre' reflects the downward pressure of the kata- prefix. This physical sense of being carried downward may also appear in the second Acts 20:9 reference as a description of the actual fall. FALLING AND FAILING

fled for refuge, escaped to a place of safety, sought asylum from danger

This verb means to flee for refuge or safety. In Acts 14:6, Paul and Barnabas learn of a plot to stone them in Iconium, so they 'fled (κατέφυγον) to Lystra and Derbe,' escaping imminent danger. Hebrews 6:18 uses the perfect participle metaphorically: 'we who have fled for refuge (καταφυγόντες) might have strong encouragement to hold fast to the hope set before us.' Here, believers are pictured as fugitives who have run to God for asylum, finding in him a strong and sure anchor for the soul. The term captures both physical escape and spiritual sanctuary.

(2×) The two uses span literal flight from persecution (Acts) and metaphorical refuge in God (Hebrews). Classical usage (LSJ) includes fleeing for refuge to a place or person, having recourse to. Spanish 'huyeron' (they fled) and French 'se réfugier' (to take refuge) fit both senses. Paul's missionary strategy includes knowing when to flee rather than face certain death, preserving his life for further gospel work. The Hebrews passage recasts Christian conversion as a flight to God's protection, where the unchangeable promise and oath provide a refuge stronger than any earthly city of asylum. FLEEING AND ESCAPING corrupt, depraved, ruined in mind

This perfect passive participle functions as an adjective meaning corrupted or depraved. Second Timothy 3:8 describes opponents 'corrupted in mind' who resist the truth as Jannes and Jambres resisted Moses. The perfect tense emphasizes the settled state of corruption—they stand in a condition of mental ruin. Classical usage shows destroying, bringing to naught, or corrupting people. The cross-linguistic witnesses emphasize corruption and moral ruin. Paul sees these false teachers as existing in a state of intellectual and moral depravity that makes them unable to receive truth, their minds ruined by sin and error.

(1×) The opponents of truth are described as 'corrupted in mind'—the perfect participle indicating they exist in a settled state of mental and moral depravity. This isn't momentary error but entrenched ruin of the intellect and moral faculty. Like Pharaoh's magicians who opposed Moses, these teachers resist apostolic truth from a base of comprehensive corruption that renders them 'disqualified regarding the faith.' DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

To kiss fervently or affectionately; an intensified form of phileo, indicating warmth or emotion.

Kataphileo is an intensified form of phileo (to love, to kiss), with the kata- prefix adding the force of thoroughness, warmth, or repetition – to kiss fervently, tenderly, or repeatedly. Every NT occurrence marks a moment of deep emotion. The sinful woman at Simon's house 'did not cease kissing' Jesus' feet (Luke 7:38, 45). The father in the parable of the prodigal son falls on his neck and kisses him (Luke 15:20). Judas uses this same fervent kiss as his sign of betrayal – a bitter irony that the gesture of deepest affection becomes the instrument of treachery (Matt 26:49; Mark 14:45). The Ephesian elders kiss Paul in tearful farewell (Acts 20:37). Spanish 'besar' and French 'embrasser' do not distinguish the intensity, but the Greek kata- prefix is unmistakable.

kiss fervently (6×) To kiss warmly, fervently, or repeatedly – an intensified form of phileo where the kata- prefix conveys thoroughness or emotional depth. Distinguished in classical Greek from a simple philein (kiss), kataphileo implies lingering, affectionate, or demonstrative kissing. Every NT instance is emotionally charged: the sinful woman's persistent kissing of Jesus' feet (Luke 7:38, 45), the father's embrace of the returning prodigal (Luke 15:20), the Ephesian elders' tearful farewell to Paul (Acts 20:37), and – most hauntingly – Judas's betrayal kiss, where the gesture of deepest affection becomes the signal for arrest (Matt 26:49; Mark 14:45). KISS AFFECTION HOMAGE

To despise, look down upon, treat with contempt — to regard someone or something as unworthy of respect or serious consideration.

Kataphroneo literally means to 'think down upon' (kata + phroneo), and its nine NT occurrences consistently carry the force of active disdain or dismissive contempt. Jesus warns against despising 'one of these little ones' (Matt 18:10) and teaches that no servant can serve two masters without despising one (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13). Paul asks the Corinthians whether they despise the church of God (1 Cor 11:22) and warns against despising God's kindness (Rom 2:4). The word implies not just passive indifference but a calculated devaluation — treating what deserves honor as if it were worthless. Spanish 'despreciar,' French 'mepriser,' and German 'verachten' all preserve this strong overtone of scorn.

to despise, look down upon (9×) To look down upon with contempt, to regard as unworthy of consideration or respect. The compound kata- ('down') + phroneo ('think') creates a vivid image of mental condescension. In Jesus's teaching, it appears in the warning about despising children/the vulnerable (Matt 18:10) and in the impossibility of serving two masters without contempt for one (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13). Paul uses it for scorning God's patience (Rom 2:4), despising the church community (1 Cor 11:22), and the Galatians' refusal to despise Paul despite his physical condition (Gal 4:14). Multilingual glosses (Spanish 'despreciar,' French 'mepriser,' German 'verachten') consistently convey active scorn rather than mere neglect, confirming the word's force as deliberate, contemptuous dismissal. CONTEMPT AND SCORN

despiser, scoffer, one who treats with contempt

This agent noun identifies someone characterized by contempt or scoffing. Acts 13:41 quotes Habakkuk 1:5, warning 'Behold, you scoffers, and marvel and perish.' The vocative plural addresses a category of people—those who habitually despise. Classical and Septuagint usage shows despisers of law or divine things. The Habakkuk context warned scoffing Israelites about Babylonian judgment; Paul applies it to Jewish scoffers of the gospel. The cross-linguistic witnesses uniformly preserve the contempt/despising terminology. This is not honest doubt but arrogant dismissal of what God is doing.

(1×) Paul warns Antioch's Jews not to become 'scoffers'—those who treat God's work with contempt. The vocative addresses them as potentially falling into this category if they reject the gospel. The original Habakkuk context warned those who scoffed at God's announced judgment; Paul reapplies it to those who dismiss the salvation announced in Jesus, warning that scornful rejection brings the same perishing the prophet predicted. CONTEMPT AND SCORN poured down, poured out over, especially anointing oil or perfume

This verb means to pour down upon, often used of liquids poured out lavishly. In Matthew 26:7 and Mark 14:3, a woman anoints Jesus at Bethany: she 'poured (κατέχεεν) it on his head' (Matthew) and 'poured (κατέχεεν) it over his head' (Mark). The act is extravagant—an alabaster flask of costly ointment poured out in a single gesture of devotion and prophetic insight. Some onlookers rebuke her for the waste, but Jesus defends her: 'She has anointed my body beforehand for burial' (Mark 14:8). The verb captures the generous, unreserved outpouring, a physical act laden with theological meaning.

(2×) Both Gospel uses describe the woman's anointing of Jesus. Classical usage (LSJ) includes pouring down upon, covering with liquid. Spanish 'derramó' (she poured) and French 'répandre' (to pour out) preserve the downward flow. The anointing anticipates Jesus' burial, an act of love and worship that Jesus receives as beautiful and appropriate. The verb's emphasis on pouring over/down suggests abundance and totality—not a measured application but a lavish gift, reflecting the woman's devotion and perhaps her intuition of the coming passion. The pouring becomes a prophetic sign, anointing the King for his death. POURING AND SHEDDING

καταχθόν-ιος G2709 Adj-GMP (1×)

under the earth, subterranean, of the underworld

This adjective describes what belongs beneath the earth's surface, often referring to the realm of the dead or chthonic deities. Philippians 2:10 declares that at Jesus' name every knee should bow, 'in heaven and on earth and under the earth.' The genitive plural substantive refers to beings in the underworld realm. Classical usage shows this word for Pluto, chthonic gods, and the dead (Di Manes in Latin). Paul's cosmic triad (heavenly, earthly, subterranean) encompasses all realms of existence. The 'under-earth ones' may be the dead, demonic powers, or all sub-terrestrial beings who must acknowledge Christ's lordship.

(1×) The universal acclamation of Jesus includes 'those under the earth'—the καταχθόνιοι, whether referring to the dead in Sheol/Hades, demonic powers in the abyss, or all beings in the subterranean realm. The adjective's classical association with Pluto and the underworld suggests Paul envisions even the realm of the dead bowing before the exalted Christ. This completes the cosmic scope: every knee in every realm acknowledges Jesus as Lord. DOWNWARD BELOW BENEATH to make full use of, to use completely or to the utmost (without abusing)

This verb appears only twice in Paul's letters and carries the nuance of using something completely or to its full extent, though without the negative connotation of misuse or abuse. Paul uses it to describe both using the world without becoming attached to it (1 Cor 7:31) and exercising his apostolic rights fully but freely (1 Cor 9:18). The multilingual evidence shows a tension between 'using fully' and 'abusing,' suggesting the word itself is neutral but context determines whether the full use is proper or excessive.

(2×) The evidence from 1 Cor 7:31 and 9:18 suggests a meaning of making complete or thorough use of something. Spanish and English preserve the 'fully using' sense, while French and German lean toward 'abuse' or 'misuse.' Paul's usage in both passages appears neutral, describing legitimate full engagement without necessarily implying excess. The domain assignment to NATURAL_WORLD > Natural Substances seems imprecise; this is more about the manner of using than what is used. ASHES COMBUSTION RESIDUE

cool, refresh, chill

This verb means to make cool or cold, providing refreshment through cooling. Luke 16:24 records the rich man in Hades begging Abraham to send Lazarus 'that he may dip his finger in water and cool my tongue.' The aorist subjunctive expresses his desperate request for relief. Classical usage shows cooling or chilling things, and metaphorically dampening ardor. The cross-linguistic witnesses uniformly preserve the cooling/refreshing imagery. The single drop of water to cool the tongue emphasizes both the rich man's torment and the impossibility of even minimal relief across the great chasm separating Hades from Abraham's side.

(1×) The rich man begs for Lazarus to 'cool my tongue' with a fingertip of water—the minimum imaginable relief from his torment. The verb emphasizes thermal relief, the cooling touch of water on flame-tortured tissue. That even this infinitesimal refreshment is denied (because of the impassable chasm) underscores the finality of judgment and the irreversibility of the great reversal between this life and the next. WINTER COLD SEASON

κατείδωλος G2712 Adj-AFS (1×)

full of idols, wholly given to idolatry

This adjective describes a place saturated with idols or a person devoted to idol-worship. Acts 17:16 states that Paul's spirit was provoked within him when he saw that Athens was 'full of idols.' The accusative feminine singular agrees with 'the city.' This rare word (attested mainly in Christian literature) intensifies the simple 'idolatrous' by suggesting complete permeation. The cross-linguistic witnesses preserve the saturation idea. Athens' famous abundance of temples, statues, and shrines to various gods distressed Paul, provoking his Mars Hill sermon about the unknown God.

(1×) Luke notes that Athens was κατείδωλος—thoroughly saturated with idols, not just having some temples but filled with images of gods everywhere. This adjective captures what ancient sources confirm: Athens had more statues than people, temples to countless deities lining streets and filling public spaces. Paul's distressed reaction to this idol-saturation motivated his philosophical engagement and gospel proclamation in the Areopagus. IDOLS AND IMAGES

κατ-έναντα G2713 Prep (8×)

Opposite, in front of, before; a spatial preposition meaning 'directly facing' that extends to the sense of 'in the sight of'

A compound preposition (kata + enanti, 'down against') that places something directly opposite or facing another. In its spatial sense, it orients travelers and observers: the village 'opposite' you (Matt 21:2; Mark 11:2; Luke 19:30), or Jesus sitting 'opposite' the treasury (Mark 12:41) and 'opposite' the temple (Mark 13:3). In Paul's letters, the word shifts from physical to personal orientation: Abraham believed 'before' the God who gives life to the dead (Rom 4:17), and Paul speaks 'before God in Christ' (2 Cor 2:17; 12:19). Spanish captures the distinction neatly – 'enfrente de' (facing, across from) for the spatial uses and 'delante de' (before, in the presence of) for the theological ones. French similarly moves from 'en face' to 'devant.'

1. (5×) Spatial: 'opposite, across from, facing' – indicating physical position directly in front of or across from a landmark. Jesus instructs the disciples to go to the village 'opposite' them (Matt 21:2; Mark 11:2; Luke 19:30); he sits 'opposite' the temple treasury watching givers (Mark 12:41); and on the Mount of Olives he is 'opposite' the temple (Mark 13:3). Spanish 'enfrente de/frente a,' German 'gegenüber,' and French 'en face' all express this concrete, geographic facing-toward orientation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. (3×) Figurative: 'before, in the sight of, in the presence of' – extending spatial 'facing' into the relational sense of being observed by or accountable to a person, especially God. Romans 4:17 describes Abraham's faith 'before' (katenanti) the God who raises the dead; 2 Cor 2:17 insists Paul speaks 'before God in Christ'; and 2 Cor 12:19 reaffirms 'before God we speak in Christ.' Spanish 'delante de' (in the presence of) and French 'devant' (before) shift from the spatial to the theological register, marking divine awareness and accountability rather than mere physical proximity. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κατένωπα G2714 Prep (3×)

before, in the presence of, in the sight of; directly before or opposite

This preposition means 'before,' 'in the presence of,' or 'in the sight of,' with connotations of being directly opposite or right before someone. Ephesians 1:4 describes God choosing us 'to be holy and blameless before him in love.' Colossians 1:22 says Christ reconciled us 'to present you holy and blameless and above reproach before him.' Jude 24 ascribes to God power 'to present you blameless before the presence of his glory.' Classical usage includes 'over against,' 'right opposite,' and various compounds with face/presence words. All New Testament uses appear in doxological or theological contexts describing standing before God's presence.

(3×) The sense emphasizes standing in God's direct presence, before his face, in his sight. All three uses connect the preposition with standing blameless or holy before God—the goal of election (Ephesians 1:4), reconciliation (Colossians 1:22), and preservation (Jude 24). The word suggests not just proximity but direct visual presence—face-to-face positioning. The compound form (κατά + ἐνώπιον) intensifies 'before' or 'in presence of.' The Spanish 'delante de,' French 'devant,' and German 'vor' all mean 'before/in front of.' This is the believer's ultimate destiny: to stand before God's glorious presence, presented as holy and blameless through Christ's work. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to exercise authority over, to lord it over someone

κατεξ-ουσιάζω G2715 V-PIA-3P (2×)

This compound verb (from κατά + ἐξουσιάζω) appears in Jesus' teaching about leadership in both Matthew and Mark's Gospels. It describes the way Gentile rulers exercise dominion over their subjects—a kind of 'lording over' that Jesus explicitly contrasts with the servant leadership He expects of His disciples. The term carries an implicit negative connotation of oppressive or domineering authority. All four target languages maintain the core sense of exercising or wielding authority, with German's 'Gewalt ausüben' emphasizing the forceful aspect.

(2×) Both occurrences (Matt 20:25, Mark 10:42) appear in the same teaching episode where Jesus warns against Gentile-style domineering leadership. The multilingual glosses consistently render the sense of exercising authority, with subtle variations: Spanish focuses on the action ('ejercen autoridad sobre'), French on the verbal action ('exercer l'autorité'), and German on wielding power ('Gewalt ausüben'). The context makes clear this is not neutral authority but oppressive rule. RULING AND REIGNING

κατεργ-άζομαι G2716 V-AIM-3S (22×)

To work out, accomplish, perform; to produce or bring about an effect or result

The verb κατεργάζομαι conveys deliberate, thorough action — working something through to completion. Paul uses it extensively in Romans to describe both human moral effort and the mysterious workings of sin and grace. In Rom 7:15-20, it appears repeatedly as Paul confesses that sin 'works' in him what he does not wish, while in 2 Cor 4:17 affliction 'produces' an eternal weight of glory. The κατα- prefix intensifies the base verb ἐργάζομαι, giving it a sense of thoroughness that Spanish captures well with 'cumplir' and 'producir.'

1. accomplish, work out, perform (13×) To carry out, accomplish, or perform a deed or purpose through sustained effort — the agentive, transitive use where a subject actively works something out. Paul employs this sense in his anguished moral discourse (Rom 7:15, 17, 18, 20), where the subject performs actions even against their own will. The multilingual glosses confirm active performance: English 'accomplish,' Spanish 'cumplido/realizadas,' French 'accomplir,' and German 'bewirken' all point to deliberate, completed action. Rom 2:9 warns of tribulation for everyone who 'works' evil, and Jas 1:3 speaks of testing 'working out' perseverance. FULFILL AND COMPLETE

en: I-accomplish, accomplish, having-accomplished | es: fueron-realizadas, haber-cumplido, habiendo-cumplido | fr: accomplir, bewirken | de: bewirken Rom 1:27; Rom 2:9; Rom 7:15; Rom 7:17; Rom 7:18

2. produce, bring about (9×) To produce, bring about, or generate an effect or result — a causative use where the emphasis falls on the outcome rather than the effort. Here the subject (often an impersonal force like law, sin, or suffering) causes something to come into existence. Rom 4:15 says the law 'produces' wrath; Rom 5:3 declares that tribulation 'produces' endurance; Rom 7:8 and 7:13 describe sin 'producing' covetousness and death. The Spanish 'produce/produciendo/produjo' and the shift from 'accomplish' to 'is-producing' in English glosses mark this as a distinct causative pattern. 2 Cor 4:17 provides the theological summit: momentary affliction 'is producing' an eternal weight of glory. FULFILL AND COMPLETE

κατέρχομαι G2718 V-AIA-1P (15×)

To come down, go down, descend; to move from a higher place to a lower one.

Katerchomai is a compound verb (kata + erchomai) meaning to come or go down from a higher elevation to a lower one. In the Gospels, Jesus 'comes down' from the mountain after the Transfiguration (Luke 9:37) and descends to Capernaum (Luke 4:31). In Acts it becomes a standard term for traveling from Jerusalem — which sits on high ground — down to coastal cities or other regions (Acts 8:5, to Samaria; Acts 11:27, to Antioch; Acts 18:22, to Caesarea). Paul and others 'come down' from Jerusalem repeatedly in the missionary narratives. The Spanish 'bajar,' French 'descendre,' and German 'herabkommen' all preserve the directional downward movement inherent in the prefix kata.

come down, go down, descend (15×) To move downward from a higher location to a lower one, whether literal geographic descent or travel from an elevated city to lower-lying regions. In Luke's Gospel, Jesus comes down from mountain settings (Luke 4:31; 9:37). In Acts, the verb becomes nearly formulaic for departing Jerusalem — the city's elevated position makes all travel from it a 'going down' (Acts 8:5; 9:32; 11:27; 18:22). Spanish 'bajar,' French 'descendre,' and German 'herabkommen' consistently reflect the directional kata- prefix. DESCENDING AND TEARING

κατεσθίω G2719 V-PPA-NMP (15×)

To devour, consume entirely; used of literal eating, figurative exploitation, and destruction by fire or divine judgment.

A vivid, visceral verb meaning to eat up completely or devour. In the Gospels it describes birds snatching up seed that falls on the path (Matt 13:4; Mark 4:4), but it quickly leaps beyond the literal table. Jesus condemns scribes who 'devour widows' houses' (Mark 12:40), where Spanish 'devoran' and French 'devorer' mirror the predatory image. In the Apocalypse, fire devours enemies of God (Rev 20:9), and zeal for God's house is said to consume Jesus himself (John 2:17). Across all three senses the root picture is the same: something is utterly, irreversibly consumed.

1. devour or eat up literally (6×) Physical devouring: birds eating seed (Matt 13:4), a prodigal's fortune consumed with harlots (Luke 15:30), and John eating a scroll (Rev 10:9). Multilingual glosses cluster tightly around literal consumption: Spanish 'devoraron', French 'devorer', German 'verschlingen'. The emphasis is on total, often rapid, eating up. DEVOUR CONSUME DESTROY en: ate-it-up, devoured, devouring | es: devoraron, devóralo, la-devoraron | fr: dévorer | de: verschlingen, κατέφαγεν, καταφαγών Matt 13:4; Mark 4:4; Luke 8:5; Luke 15:30; Rev 10:9

2. devour figuratively or exploit (5×) Figurative exploitation and mutual destruction. Scribes who devour widows' houses (Mark 12:40; Luke 20:47) and Galatian believers who 'bite and devour one another' (Gal 5:15) illustrate this predatory metaphor. Spanish 'devoran' and Hindi equivalents consistently select predation vocabulary, confirming that audiences perceive exploitation rather than mere eating. The dragon waiting to devour the child (Rev 12:4) bridges this sense toward apocalyptic menace. DEVOUR CONSUME DESTROY

en: devour, devouring, he-might-devour | es: devoran, devore, devoráis | fr: dévorer | de: verschlingen, κατεσθίετε, κατεσθίουσιν Matt 23:14; Mark 12:40; Luke 20:47; Gal 5:15; Rev 12:4

3. consume by fire or destroy (4×) Consumption by fire or divine judgment. Zeal consumes Jesus (John 2:17), fire devours the enemies before the two witnesses (Rev 11:5), and at the final battle fire from heaven devours Gog's armies (Rev 20:9). Spanish 'devorara' and German 'verschlingen' retain the eating metaphor even for flame, showing that the image of total annihilation is culturally stable across languages. DEVOUR CONSUME DESTROY

κατευθύν-ω G2720 V-AOA-3S (3×) to make straight, direct, guide; to prosper or grant success to

This verb means to make straight, direct, or guide someone's path, and can also mean to grant success or prosperity. Luke 1:79 prophesies that Messiah will come 'to guide our feet into the way of peace.' First Thessalonians 3:11 is Paul's prayer: 'Now may our God and Father himself, and our Lord Jesus, direct our way to you.' Second Thessalonians 3:5 prays 'May the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God and the steadfastness of Christ.' Classical usage includes making straight, guiding, directing affairs, and intransitively prospering or succeeding. The New Testament use is consistently about divine direction—God guiding paths, directing journeys, and steering hearts.

(3×) The sense centers on divine guidance and direction, making the way straight. Zechariah's prophecy (Luke 1:79) envisions the Messiah guiding people from darkness and death's shadow into peace's path—directional, redemptive guidance. Paul's prayers (1 Thess 3:11, 2 Thess 3:5) ask God to 'make straight' the way for travel and to 'direct' hearts toward love and endurance. The optative mood in both prayers expresses wish or request for divine action. The Spanish 'dirigir' and German 'leiten' both mean to direct or lead. This is God removing obstacles, clarifying direction, and steering his people's paths and hearts toward right destinations—peace, reunion with fellow believers, God's love, Christ's steadfastness. STRAIGHTNESS AND UPRIGHTNESS

κατεφίσταμαι G2721 V-AIA-3P (1×)

To rise up against, attack, or assail someone with hostile intent

This term describes a coordinated hostile action, typically when a group rises up against someone in opposition or violence. In Acts 18:12, Paul experiences this when the Jews make a united stand against him before Gallio's judgment seat. The Spanish and French glosses both capture the uprising sense, while the English emphasizes the adversarial nature of the action.

κατέχω G2722 V-PPA-NMP (18×)

To hold fast, retain; to restrain or suppress; to possess or occupy; passively, to be held or bound; nautically, to head toward a destination.

Built from kata + echō ('hold down'), this verb carries the core image of maintaining a firm grip — whether on a cherished tradition or on a person one will not release. Paul urges the Thessalonians to 'hold fast what is good' (1 Thess 5:21), while in Romans 1:18 the wicked 'suppress the truth in unrighteousness.' The same word describes possessing property (2 Cor 6:10), being held captive by illness (John 5:4), and steering a ship toward shore (Acts 27:40). Spanish distinguishes beautifully between 'retener' (to retain, hold fast) and 'retenían' (they were holding back), while 'se dirigían' (they were heading) captures the nautical extension.

1. hold fast, retain (8×) To hold firmly onto something valuable — faith, tradition, teaching, or moral conviction — and refuse to let it go. In Luke 8:15 the good soil represents those who hear the word and 'hold it fast' in an honest heart, and in 1 Corinthians 11:2 Paul commends the church for holding to the traditions he delivered. Spanish 'retened' (hold fast, imperative) and 'retener' (to retain) emphasize the active, intentional grip on what is received. Philemon 1:13 shows the personal dimension: Paul would have liked to 'keep' Onesimus with him. RESTRAINT AND CONTROL

en: hold-fast, let-us-hold-fast, to-keep | es: la-retienen, retened, retener | fr: retenir | de: festhalten, hält-fest Luke 8:15; 1Cor 11:2; 1Cor 15:2; 1Thess 5:21; Phlm 1:13

2. restrain, suppress (4×) To hold back, restrain, or suppress something or someone from acting, advancing, or becoming known. Romans 1:18 declares God's wrath against those who 'suppress' (katechontōn) the truth, while 2 Thessalonians 2:6-7 speaks of a mysterious restrainer who holds back the man of lawlessness. In Luke 4:42 the crowds tried to 'hold' Jesus and keep him from leaving. Spanish 'que retienen' (who suppress) and 'que detiene' (who restrains) reflect the forceful withholding. RESTRAINT AND CONTROL

en: restraining, suppressing, were-holding | es: que-detiene, que-retienen, retenían | fr: retenir | de: festhalten, hält-fest Luke 4:42; Rom 1:18; 2Thess 2:6; 2Thess 2:7

3. possess, occupy (3×) To possess, occupy, or have as one's own — whether a physical seat, property, or status. In Luke 14:9 a guest is told to take the lowest place lest the host say 'give this man your seat,' and in 1 Corinthians 7:30 Paul counsels that those who buy should live as though they do not 'possess.' The paradox of 2 Corinthians 6:10, 'having nothing, yet possessing all things,' plays on this sense. Spanish 'poseyendo' (possessing) and 'ocupar' (to occupy) capture both the abstract and spatial dimensions. RESTRAINT AND CONTROL

en: possessing, to-take | es: a-ocupar, poseyendo | fr: retenir | de: festhalten, hält-fest Luke 14:9; 1Cor 7:30; 2Cor 6:10

4. be held, be bound (2×) In the passive voice, to be held, bound, or gripped by an affliction, obligation, or spiritual condition. John 5:4 describes those 'held' by various diseases at the pool of Bethesda, and Romans 7:6 speaks of having been released from the law that formerly 'held us.' Spanish 'era poseído' (was possessed/held) and 'éramos retenidos' (we were held) convey the involuntary, constrained state. RESTRAINT AND CONTROL

en: was-held, we-were-held | es: era-poseido, éramos-retenidos | fr: retenir | de: festhalten John 5:4; Rom 7:6

5. head toward, make for (1×) A nautical technical term meaning to steer or hold a course toward a destination. In Acts 27:40 the sailors cut the anchors, hoisted the foresail, and 'made for' (kateichon) the beach. Spanish 'se dirigían' (they were heading) captures the directional intent, and the underlying image remains consistent: holding the ship firmly on its course, applying the 'hold down' force to navigation. RESTRAINT AND CONTROL

κατηγορ-έω G2723 V-PIA-2P (23×)

To accuse or bring charges against someone, typically in a legal setting; passively, to be accused or face charges.

A courtroom word through and through, kategoreo carries the weight of formal accusation in judicial proceedings. The Pharisees watch Jesus to see if he will heal on the Sabbath 'so that they might accuse him' (Mark 3:2), and before Pilate the chief priests 'were accusing him of many things' (Mark 15:3). Paul likewise faces accusation before Roman governors (Acts 22:30, 25:16). The active-passive distinction maps cleanly onto the drama of trial narratives: the accusers bring charges, the accused endures them. Spanish distinguishes 'acusar/acusaban' from 'ser acusado/era acusado,' and German 'anklagen' from the passive construction, preserving the forensic precision of the original.

1. accuse, bring charges against (20×) Active accusation: to formally accuse, bring charges against, or denounce someone before a court or authority. This dominant sense (20 occurrences) covers all active-voice forms across tenses, moods, and persons. The Pharisees seek grounds to accuse Jesus (Matt 12:10, Mark 3:2, Luke 6:7), the chief priests accuse him before Pilate (Mark 15:3-4), and the Jews bring charges against Paul (Acts 24:2, 28:19). Spanish 'acusar/acusaban,' French 'accuser,' and German 'anklagen/klagt an' uniformly render the forensic act of bringing a formal charge. ACCUSE BRING CHARGES

2. be accused, have charges brought (3×) Passive accusation: to be accused, to have charges brought against oneself, to stand under formal indictment. Jesus stands silent while 'being accused' by the chief priests (Matt 27:12); the Roman tribune seeks to learn the charges against Paul (Acts 22:30); Festus insists that the accused must face his accusers (Acts 25:16). Spanish 'ser acusado / era acusado' and English 'being accused / to be accused' clearly mark the shift from accuser to accused, capturing the defendant's perspective in the trial narrative. ACCUSE BRING CHARGES

κατηγορ-ία G2724 N-DFS (3×)

accusation, charge, indictment; the formal bringing of charges against someone

This noun denotes an accusation or charge, the formal statement of wrongdoing brought against someone. John 18:29 records Pilate asking, 'What accusation do you bring against this man?' First Timothy 5:19 instructs, 'Do not admit an accusation against an elder except on the evidence of two or three witnesses.' Titus 1:6 requires that an overseer's children be believers, 'not under accusation of debauchery or insubordination.' Classical usage includes accusation, expostulation, and in logic, predication and categories. The New Testament use is forensic and ecclesial—legal charges (John) and church discipline procedures (Pastoral Epistles).

(3×) The sense is formal accusation or charge, particularly in legal or quasi-legal contexts. Pilate's question demands the specific charge —Roman law required clear accusations, not mob demands. The Timothy passage sets procedural safeguards for accusing church leaders—multiple witnesses required, protecting against slander while allowing legitimate discipline. The Titus passage addresses reputation—elders' families must not be under accusation of misconduct, as this would undermine their ministry. The Spanish 'acusación,' French 'accusation,' and German 'Anklage' are straightforward charge/accusation terms. Whether Roman trial or church discipline, the word denotes the formal bringing of charges that must be proven or refuted, not mere gossip or suspicion. LEGAL ACCUSATION CHARGE

κατήγορ-ος G2725 N-DMP (7×)

Accuser; one who brings formal charges against another, especially in a legal or judicial proceeding.

Katēgoros is the standard Greek legal term for a prosecutor or accuser—the person who stands up in court to speak against the defendant. In the NT it appears exclusively in judicial settings. Jesus asks the woman caught in adultery 'Where are your accusers?' (John 8:10). In Acts, Roman legal procedure requires accusers to be present: Paul's accusers are summoned (Acts 23:30, 35), Tertullus serves as accuser before Felix (Acts 24:8), and Festus insists the accused must face his accusers (Acts 25:16). Revelation 12:10 calls Satan 'the accuser of our brothers.' Spanish acusador and German Ankläger match the forensic register precisely.

accuser (7×) Accuser, prosecutor—one who formally brings charges or speaks against another in a judicial setting. The word belongs to the courtroom vocabulary of Greek law. In John 8:10, Jesus asks the woman if any accuser remains to condemn her. Acts repeatedly uses it in Roman legal contexts: Lysias sends Paul's accusers to Felix (Acts 23:30, 35), Tertullus presents the prosecution (Acts 24:8), and Festus upholds the right to face one's accusers (Acts 25:16). Revelation 12:10 applies the term cosmically to Satan as the accuser of the saints. Spanish acusadores and French accusateur confirm the consistent forensic-legal sense. ACCUSE BRING CHARGES

κατήφ-εια G2726 N-AFS (1×)

Dejection, gloom, or downcast demeanor resulting from sorrow or shame

This noun captures the visible state of being emotionally downcast, where grief or shame causes one's countenance to fall. James 4:9 calls mourners to exchange their laughter for this somber condition as part of humble repentance. The Greek lexicon notes this is sorrow that makes one look downward, contrasting with joy. The English 'gloom' and Spanish 'abatimiento' both emphasize the heaviness of spirit.

(1×) Refers to the emotional and physical state of dejection, manifested in downcast eyes and sorrowful demeanor. In James's call to repentance, this represents the appropriate gravity of recognizing one's spiritual condition, standing opposite to superficial cheerfulness. GRIEF AND SORROW

κατηχ-έω G2727 V-PPM/P-NMS (8×)

To instruct orally, catechize; to inform or report — the root behind English 'catechism'

The verb κατηχέω originally meant to sound from above or resound, but by the first century it had settled into two distinct uses: systematic oral instruction and the passing along of information. In Luke 1:4, Luke writes so that Theophilus may know the certainty of the things in which he was 'catechized,' and in Gal 6:6 the one being 'taught' shares with the one teaching. The word gave English 'catechism,' 'catechesis,' and 'catechize,' preserving the sense of methodical religious instruction. A narrower use in Acts 21 means simply to be informed or told about something.

1. instruct, teach (in the faith) (6×) To give oral, systematic instruction in religious truth or doctrine — the classic catechetical sense. This is the dominant NT use (6 of 8 occurrences), visible in Luke 1:4 where Theophilus was 'instructed' in the faith, Acts 18:25 where Apollos had been 'taught' the way of the Lord, and Gal 6:6 where the 'one being taught' shares with the instructor. Multilingual glosses confirm the pedagogical meaning: Spanish 'instruido/instruya,' German 'unterweisen,' and French 'instruire' all point to formal teaching rather than casual communication. Paul's statement in 1 Cor 14:19 — preferring five words of instruction to ten thousand in tongues — underscores the deliberate, comprehensible character of this teaching. TEACHING AND LEARNING

2. inform, report to (passive: be told about) (2×) To inform, report to, or pass along information — in the passive, to be told about something. This sense appears exclusively in Acts 21:21 and 21:24, where Jewish believers in Jerusalem 'have been informed' that Paul teaches Jews among the Gentiles to forsake Moses. The multilingual evidence is telling: Spanish shifts from 'instruido' (sense 1) to 'han sido informados,' and English from 'instructed' to 'they have been informed,' marking a clear boundary between structured teaching and the relay of secondhand reports. The passive voice is characteristic of this sense, emphasizing the recipients of news rather than a teacher-student relationship. NEWS AND MESSAGES

κατῐόομαι G2728 V-RIM/P-3S (1×)

To become rusted, corroded, or tarnished through oxidation or decay

This verb in its passive form describes the process of metal deteriorating through rust or corrosion. James 5:3 uses this term metaphorically to depict how hoarded wealth corrodes and stands as testimony against those who stockpile riches rather than using them righteously. The Spanish 'oxidado' and English 'corroded' both capture the chemical process, while the German emphasizes the rusting specifically.

(1×) Describes the passive process of becoming rusty or tarnished, particularly of precious metals. In James's warning to the rich, this corrosion serves as both literal decay and moral witness, showing how unused wealth degrades and testifies against its hoarders. DESTRUCTION AND DECAY

en: have-corroded | es: se-han-oxidado | fr: κατίωται | de: verrostet Jas 5:3

κατισχύω G2729 V-FIA-3P (3×)
to prevail against, overpower, be strong enough; to have superior strength or force
This verb means to prevail against, overpower, or prove stronger than opposition. Matthew 16:18 contains Jesus' famous promise: 'the gates of Hades will not prevail against' the church. Luke 21:36 urges watchfulness and prayer 'that you may be strong enough to escape all these things' and stand before the Son of Man. Luke 23:23 describes the crowd's insistence: 'their voices prevailed' in demanding Jesus' crucifixion. Classical usage includes overpowering, prevailing, being superior in number, coming to full strength, and strengthening others. The New Testament uses span divine promise (church's indestructibility), spiritual preparation (strength to endure), and mob persistence (voices prevailing).

(3×) The sense is having superior strength or force, prevailing in conflict or contest. Matthew 16:18 promises that even the powers of death ('gates of Hades') won't overcome or overpower Christ's church—the church will prove stronger. Luke 21:36 concerns believers having strength to escape tribulation and stand approved—being strong enough for what's coming. Luke 23:23's 'their voices prevailed' describes the crowd overwhelming Pilate's resistance—their insistence proved stronger than his reluctance. The Spanish and German glosses use 'prevalecer' and forms of 'prevail/be strong.' Whether divine promise, human need for strength, or mob force winning out, the word marks the victory of superior power in contest or opposition. ARROGANT SELF-EXALTATION

κατοικ-έω G2730 V-PNA (45×)
To dwell, inhabit, settle; residing in a place as an established inhabitant
A compound verb (kata + oikeo) meaning to settle down and dwell in a place. It appears throughout Acts for the geographic spread of populations — "all who dwell in Jerusalem" (Acts 1:19), "devout men from every nation dwelling in Jerusalem" (Acts 2:5). Unlike the simpler oikeo, katoikeo emphasizes permanent, established residence. It also carries theological force: Christ "dwelling" in believers' hearts (Eph 3:17) and the fullness of deity "dwelling" bodily in Christ (Col 2:9). Spanish habitar and German wohnen consistently render the settled, ongoing quality of residence.

1. dwell, inhabit a place (36×) The primary sense: to dwell in or inhabit a place as an established resident. Used extensively in Acts for populations of cities and regions (Acts 1:19; 2:5; 4:16) and in Revelation for "those who dwell on the earth" as a recurring phrase (Rev 3:10; 6:10). Spanish habitar, French habiter, and German wohnen all confirm the durative, settled character. Matthew 23:21 extends this to God dwelling in the Temple. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: dwelling, dwells, residing | es: habita, habitando, que-habitaban | fr: habiter | de: wohnen, wohnt Matt 12:45; Matt 23:21; Luke 11:26; Luke 13:4; Acts 1:19

2. settle, take up residence (8×) Ingressive or punctiliar sense: to settle in, take up residence, establish oneself in a new place. The Holy Family settling in Nazareth (Matt 2:23) and Abraham's journey to Canaan (Acts 7:2-4) illustrate the act of beginning to dwell. Spanish habitó (preterite) and English "settled" capture the transition from movement to rest. Acts 17:26 uses it for God determining where nations would settle — the providential assignment of homelands. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: having-dwelt, he-dwelt, settled | es: habitando, habitar, habitó | fr: habiter | de: wohnen, wohnt Matt 2:23; Matt 4:13; Acts 7:2; Acts 7:4; Acts 17:26

3. cause to dwell, settle someone (1×) A rare causative or transitive use: to cause to dwell, to settle someone in a place. James 4:5 contains the sole New Testament instance, where God "caused [the Spirit] to dwell" in believers. English "he caused to dwell" and Spanish "hizo habitar" render this unusual construction. The passage is exegetically debated, but the causative force of katoikeo here is clear from the grammar and context. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κατοίκ-ησις G2731 N-AFS (1×)
A dwelling place, habitation, or place of residence
This term refers to a place where someone settles and lives, whether temporary or permanent. Mark 5:3 uses it to describe the tombs where the demon-possessed man made his dwelling—an unnatural habitation emphasizing his alienation from normal society. The multilingual glosses (dwelling, morada, habitation, Wohnung) all converge on the concept of a residential space, though the context makes this particular dwelling especially tragic.

(1×) Indicates a place of habitation or residence where someone settles. In the Gerasene demoniac's case, this dwelling among the tombs highlights his isolation and the severity of his affliction, living where the dead rest rather than among the living community. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: dwelling | es: morada | fr: habitation | de: Wohnung Mark 5:3

κατοικ-ητήριον G2732 N-ANS (2×)
a dwelling place, habitation, residence
This noun denotes a place where someone dwells or resides, whether God, demons, or humans. Paul uses it in Ephesians 2:22 to describe believers being built together into a dwelling place for God by the Spirit—a profound image of the church as God's residence. In Revelation 18:2, it appears in judgment language describing Babylon as having become a habitation of demons. The word emphasizes the settled, established nature of the dwelling rather than temporary shelter. The LXX background reinforces this sense of a permanent abode.

(2×) The two NT occurrences show theological depth: Eph 2:22 presents the church as God's dwelling place (κατοικητήριον θεοῦ), while Rev 18:2 depicts Babylon's fall into a demon habitation (κατοικητήριον δαιμονίων). The multilingual evidence is consistent across languages: Spanish uses both 'habitación' and 'morada,' French 'Wohnort' (which is actually German), and German properly 'Wohnort.' All capture the sense of a settled dwelling rather than temporary lodging. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: a-dwelling, dwelling | es: habitación, morada | fr: Wohnort | de: Wohnort Eph 2:22; Rev 18:2

κατοικ-ία G2733 N-GFS (1×)
Habitation, dwelling place, or region designated for settlement
This noun refers to places of dwelling or settlement, with classical usage extending to colonies, farms, and designated residential areas. Acts 17:26 employs it in Paul's Athens sermon, where God determines the times and boundaries of human habitations across the earth. The term carries overtones of divine providence in establishing where peoples dwell. All major language glosses converge on 'dwelling' or 'habitation' as the core meaning.

(1×) Denotes dwelling places or habitations in the broader sense of regions where people settle. In Paul's Areopagus address, this emphasizes God's sovereign ordering of human geography and history, determining not just individuals but where entire peoples make their homes. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: dwelling | es: habitación | fr: habitation | de: κατοικίας Acts 17:26

κατοπτρ-ίζω G2734 V-PPM-NMP (1×)
To behold or contemplate as in a mirror; to reflect or gaze upon one's reflection
This verb carries the imagery of looking at something as reflected in a mirror, either beholding one's own image or contemplating something through reflection. In 2 Corinthians 3:18, Paul uses this to describe believers beholding the Lord's glory, though scholars debate whether it means reflecting that glory or contemplating it mirror-like.

The Spanish 'contemplando' and English compound 'beholding-as-in-a-mirror' both capture this visual meditation.

(1×) Describes the act of gazing at something as in a mirror, involving both reflection and contemplation. In Paul's discussion of transformation, this suggests either that believers reflect Christ's glory to others or that they behold it as in a clear reflection, experiencing progressive transformation through sustained spiritual vision. SEEING AND PERCEIVING

κατόρθ-ωμα G2735

success, right action, correct achievement; what is accomplished rightly or virtuously

A neuter noun designating success, right achievement, or virtuous action—something accomplished correctly. Classical philosophers distinguish it from mere good fortune (εὐτύχημα): a κατόρθωμα results from virtue and skill, not luck. In Stoic ethics, these are 'perfect actions' fulfilling all duties, opposed to sins (ἁμαρτήματα). Literary critics use it for stylistic excellence. The word implies not just success but rightness—moral quality in achievement. The New Testament employs it (in variant readings) for righteous deeds accomplished through faith. Root meaning: that which is set upright, made straight, perfected.

κάτω G2736 Adv (10×)

Down, below, beneath — spatial adverb indicating downward direction or lower position along a vertical axis

The adverb κάτω (kato) expresses downward direction or lower position. Satan tempts Jesus to cast himself 'down' from the temple pinnacle (Matt 4:6; Luke 4:9). At the crucifixion, the temple veil is torn from top to 'bottom' (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38). Peter warms himself 'below' in the courtyard while Jesus is tried above (Mark 14:66). Jesus tells Nicodemus that what is born of the flesh is 'from below' while what is born of the Spirit is from above (John 8:23). The comparative-threshold use appears in Herod's slaughter of boys 'two years old and under' (Matt 2:16). Spanish 'abajo,' Arabic تَحْتَ, Hindi नीचे, Korean 아래로, and Swahili chini all render the downward spatial concept.

down, below, under (10×) A spatial adverb meaning 'down, below, beneath,' indicating either downward motion or static lower position along a vertical axis. Covers directional uses — casting oneself down (Matt 4:6; Luke 4:9), the veil torn to the bottom (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38) — and locative uses — Peter below in the courtyard (Mark 14:66), being 'from below' versus 'from above' in Johannine theology (John 8:23). The comparative-threshold sense ('under' an age, Matt 2:16) extends the same spatial metaphor to a numerical boundary. No distinct sub-senses emerge across the ten occurrences. DOWNWARD BELOW BENEATH

en: below, bottom, down | es: abajo, de-abajo, menos | fr: en-bas | de: unten Matt 2:16; Matt 4:6; Matt 27:51; Mark 14:66; Mark 15:38

κατώτερος G2737 Adj-ANP-C (1×)

Lower, beneath, or more downward in position; comparative form of 'down'

This comparative adjective describes something positioned lower or beneath in spatial terms. Ephesians 4:9 uses it in discussing Christ's descent, referring to 'the lower parts of the earth'—likely either his incarnation on earth (lower than heaven) or his descent to the grave. The multilingual evidence uniformly supports the spatial comparison: lower, inferiores, untere. This spatial imagery undergirds Paul's argument about Christ's cosmic movement.

(1×) Indicates a lower spatial position in comparison to something higher. In the Ephesians passage, this creates a vertical cosmology where Christ's descent to earth (or to death) stands in deliberate contrast to his subsequent ascension far above all heavens, emphasizing the full range of his redemptive movement. DOWNWARD BELOW BENEATH

en: lower | es: inferiores | fr: κατώτερα | de: untere Eph 4:9

καῦμα G2738 N-NNS (2×)

scorching heat, burning heat (especially of the sun)

This noun describes intense, burning heat, particularly from the sun. In Revelation, it appears in contexts of divine judgment and protection: the redeemed will not be struck by scorching heat (7:16), while the wicked are scorched by great heat as a plague (16:9). The classical usage extended to fever heat and even frost in plural form, but the NT uses focus exclusively on solar or supernatural heat as an instrument of suffering. All target languages use straightforward terms for heat without distinguishing between natural and judgment-heat, suggesting the word itself is neutral regarding source.

(2×) Both Revelation passages (7:16, 16:9) use καῦμα in contexts of eschatological heat. In 7:16, it's something God's people are protected from; in 16:9, it's an instrument of the fourth bowl judgment. The multilingual glosses are remarkably simple and consistent: 'heat' in English, 'calor' in Spanish, 'Hitze' in German, all without interpretive expansion. This suggests the word's meaning is transparent across languages—intense, often solar, burning heat. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

καυμᾰτ-ίζω G2739 V-AIP-3P (4×)

To scorch or burn with intense heat; in the passive, to be scorched or burnt up.

Describes the destructive effect of intense, burning heat. In the parable of the sower, seed that falls on rocky ground springs up quickly but is scorched by the sun because it has no root (Matt 13:6; Mark 4:6) – a vivid picture of superficial faith that withers under pressure. In Revelation 16:8-9, the fourth bowl of wrath empowers the sun to scorch people with fire, yet they refuse to repent. The consistent rendering across languages – Spanish 'quemar,' French 'bruler,' German 'versengen' – all convey fierce, damaging heat rather than gentle warmth.

(4×) To scorch or burn with fierce heat, typically from the sun. In the Synoptic sower parables (Matt 13:6; Mark 4:6), seedlings on rocky soil are scorched when the sun rises, illustrating how persecution and trouble destroy shallow faith. In Revelation 16:8-9, the same verb escalates to eschatological judgment as the sun is given power to scorch humanity with fire. The uniform translation evidence – Spanish 'fue quemado/fueron quemadas,' French 'bruler,' German 'versengen' – confirms a single sense of destructive burning heat across all four occurrences. FIRE AND BURNING en: it-was-scorched, they-were-scorched, to-scorch | es: fue-quemado, fueron-quemadas, fueron-quemados | fr: brûler | de: versengen, ἐκαυματίσθη Matt 13:6; Mark 4:6; Rev 16:8; Rev 16:9

καῦσις G2740 N-AFS (1×)

Burning, combustion, or the act of being consumed by fire

This noun refers to the process or result of burning, with classical uses including sacrificial burning, cautery in medicine, and smelting of metals. Hebrews 6:8 employs it in warning that unfruitful land producing thorns and thistles is destined for burning—divine judgment imagery drawn from agricultural practice. The German and English both render it as 'burning,' capturing both process and purpose in this eschatological context.

(1×) Denotes the act or state of burning, particularly as a form of destruction or disposal. In Hebrews' warning, this burning represents God's final judgment on persistently unproductive spiritual life, using the agricultural image of clearing worthless growth from land through fire. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: burning | es: quema | fr: Brand | de: Brand Heb 6:8

καυσ-όω G2741 V-PPM/P-NNP (2×)

to burn with intense heat, to be consumed by fire

This verb (from καῦμα + suffix) describes being burned or scorched with intense heat, always appearing in passive form in the NT. Peter uses it twice in his second epistle (3:10, 12) to describe the eschatological destruction of the heavens and elements by fire—they will be 'burned up' or 'dissolved by burning.' The repetition in quick succession emphasizes the thoroughness of this fiery judgment. The medical usage ('suffer from fever') doesn't appear in biblical texts, where the focus is on cosmic conflagration rather than bodily affliction.

(2×) Both occurrences are in 2 Peter 3, describing the day of the Lord's fiery judgment. In verse 10, the elements will be 'burned up' (καυσούμενα λυθήσεται), and in verse 12, the elements 'being burned will be dissolved' (καυσούμενα λύεται). The multilingual evidence shows participial forms: Spanish 'siendo quemados,' English 'being burned,' German 'verbrannt werden.' The passive voice across all languages emphasizes that creation undergoes this burning rather than actively burning. FIRE AND BURNING

en: being-burned | es: siendo-quemados | fr: καυσούμενα | de: verbrannt-werden 2Pet 3:10; 2Pet 3:12

καύσ-ων G2742 N-DMS (3×)

burning heat, scorching wind; intense, oppressive heat typical of the Middle Eastern sirocco

This word describes the fierce, oppressive heat common in Mediterranean and Near Eastern climates. The sirocco—a hot, dusty wind from the desert—brings withering heat that can scorch vegetation and make outdoor labor unbearable. Jesus uses this imagery in Matthew 20:12 when vineyard workers complain about bearing the burden and scorching heat of the day. James 1:11 employs it as a metaphor for how quickly the rich fade away, just as the burning wind withers grass.

(3×) The burning, withering heat of the day, especially the sirocco wind. All three NT occurrences use this word to describe intense heat: the vineyard laborers in Matthew 20:12 endured it during their day's work, Luke 12:55 mentions it as a weather prediction when the south wind blows, and James 1:11 uses it metaphorically for the scorching sun that withers plants and causes flowers to fall. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

καυ-τηριάζω G2743 V-RPM/P-GMP (1×)

To be seared, branded, or cauterized; to have one's conscience hardened as if burned

This verb in passive form literally means to be branded or seared with a hot iron, a term from both slavery and medicine. First Timothy 4:2 uses it metaphorically to describe consciences that have been cauterized—rendered insensitive through repeated violation, like scar tissue that no longer feels. The Spanish 'cauterizados' and German 'gebrandmarkt' capture this medical imagery of deadened moral sensitivity.

(1×) Describes the passive state of being seared or cauterized, particularly of the conscience becoming insensitive through moral compromise. Paul warns of false teachers whose repeated deceit has scarred their moral awareness, leaving them unable to recognize truth or feel conviction, like cauterized flesh that has lost sensation. BURNING AND FIRE

καυχ-άομαι G2744 V-PNM/P (38×)

To boast, glory, or exult in something; one textual variant yields 'be burned' (1 Cor 13:3)

A verb meaning to boast, glory, or take pride, used extensively by Paul to explore the paradox of Christian boasting. While the world boasts in status and achievement, Paul redirects: 'Let the one who boasts, boast in the Lord' (1 Cor 1:31; 2 Cor 10:17). He boasts in his weaknesses (2 Cor 11:30; 12:9), in the cross (Gal 6:14), and in his congregations (2 Cor 7:14). Spanish captures this range with both 'jactarse' (negative boasting) and 'gloriarse' (positive glorying). A famous textual variant at 1 Corinthians 13:3 reads καυθήσομαι ('be burned') instead of καυχήσωμαι ('boast').

1. boast, glory, take pride (37×) To boast, glory, or take pride in something — whether positively or negatively. Paul dominates the usage, employing it for illegitimate boasting in the law (Rom 2:17, 23), legitimate boasting in hope of glory (Rom 5:2), paradoxical boasting in suffering (Rom 5:3), and exultant glorying in God through Christ (Rom 5:11). Spanish distinguishes 'jactarse' (vain boasting) from 'gloriarse' (glorying), while German uniformly uses 'sich ruhmen.' The verb's flexibility allows Paul to subvert Greco-Roman honor culture by redefining what is worth boasting about. PRAISE AND BOASTING en: I-will-boast, boast, let-boast | es: Jactarse, gloríese, jactarme | fr: se-glorifier | de: sich-ruehmen Rom 2:17; Rom 2:23; Rom 5:2; Rom 5:3; Rom 5:11

2. be burned (textual variant) (1×) A textual variant reading at 1 Cor 13:3 where some manuscripts have καυθήσομαι ('I will be burned') rather than καυχήσωμαι ('I may boast'). The confusion arises from the visual similarity of χ and θ in uncial script. English 'I may be burned' and Spanish 'sea quemado' reflect this variant, while French and German translations follow the boasting reading. The variant significantly alters the meaning: surrendering one's body to flames versus surrendering it to boast — both yield nothing without love. PRAISE AND BOASTING en: I-may-be-burned | es: sea-quemado | fr: se-glorifier | de: sich-ruehmen 1Cor 13:3

καύχ-ημα G2745 N-GNS (11×)

Boast, ground of boasting — the object, basis, or matter in which one takes pride; what one boasts about

The noun καύχημα (kauchēma) denotes the object or ground of boasting — the concrete thing one points to with pride, distinct from καύχησις which is the act of boasting. Abraham might have a ground of boasting before men, but not before God (Rom 4:2). Paul's own 'boast' is preaching the gospel free of charge (1 Cor 9:15-16), while the Corinthians' boasting is ill-founded when tolerating sin (1 Cor 5:6). Believers will be Paul's boast at Christ's return (2 Cor 1:14; Phil 1:26; 2:16). Gal 6:4 urges testing one's own work so that one's boast stands on its own merit. Spanish 'motivo de jactancia' and German 'Ruhm' capture the objective character.

boast, ground of boasting (11×) The object, basis, or matter of boasting — the concrete thing in which one takes pride or to which one points as grounds for confidence. Abraham might have a boast before men but not before God (Rom 4:2). Paul's boast is preaching the gospel without charge (1 Cor 9:15-16), and his churches are his boast at Christ's return (2 Cor 1:14; Phil 1:26; 2:16). Believers should test their own work so that their boast is in themselves and not in comparison (Gal 6:4). The cross of Christ, not human achievement, becomes the sole ground of glorying (2 Cor 5:12; Heb 3:6). Negatively, tolerating sin makes a community's boast illegitimate (1 Cor 5:6). Spanish 'motivo de jactancia' and Arabic 'ڤ' both convey the substantive, objective ground of pride. PRAISE AND BOASTING καύχ-ησις G2746 N-NFS (11×)

Boasting, act of glorying — the action or exercise of boasting, exulting, or taking pride in something

The noun καύχησις (kauchēsis) denotes the act of boasting — the activity itself, as opposed to καύχημα which is the thing boasted about. Paul asks 'where then is boasting?' and answers that it is excluded by the law of faith (Rom 3:27). His boasting in the Corinthians proves well-founded (2 Cor 7:4, 14; 8:24), and his conscience confirms his boasting in holy conduct is sincere (2 Cor 1:12). He insists no one will stop his boasting about preaching free of charge (2 Cor 11:10). The Thessalonians are his 'crown of boasting' (1 Thess 2:19). James warns that boasting in worldly plans is evil (Jas 4:16). Spanish 'jactancia' and Arabic 'الافخار' convey the active character of this glorying.

boasting, act of glorying (11×) The act, exercise, or process of boasting, glorying, or exulting — the activity of taking pride in something. Paul declares that boasting is excluded by the principle of faith (Rom 3:27) and that his own boasting in Christ Jesus is in the things of God (Rom 15:17). His boasting about the Corinthians is vindicated (2 Cor 7:4, 14; 8:24), his boasting in holy sincerity of conscience (2 Cor 1:12), and his insistence on preaching without pay in Achaia (2 Cor 11:10). He acknowledges some boasting is 'not according to the Lord' yet presses on (2 Cor 11:17). His daily dying is itself a form of boasting in the Corinthians (1 Cor 15:31), and they are his crown of boasting at the Lord's coming (1 Thess 2:19). James condemns boasting in worldly plans as arrogant evil (Jas 4:16). Spanish 'jactancia' and Arabic 'الافخار' both capture the active, verbal character of the glorying. PRAISE AND BOASTING

Κενχρεαί G2747 N-DFP (2×)

Cenchreae, the eastern port of Corinth

Cenchreae (or Kenchreai) was one of Corinth's two ports, located on the Saronic Gulf about seven miles east of the city. It served as the harbor for trade with Asia and the eastern Mediterranean. Paul had his hair cut here in fulfillment of a vow (Acts 18:18), and the church there was served by Phoebe, whom Paul commends as a deacon in Romans 16:1. As a proper name, the word itself carries no intrinsic meaning beyond geographical reference, though its association with Paul's ministry and early Christian communities gives it historical significance.

(2×) The two references (Acts 18:18, Rom 16:1) locate Paul's ministry activity in this port city. Acts mentions his vow-related haircut there, while Romans introduces Phoebe as a servant of the church in Cenchreae. The multilingual glosses are transliterations with slight orthographic variation: 'Kenchreai' in English, 'Cencreas/Kenchreaís' in Spanish, 'Cenchrées' in French, 'Kenchreae/Κενχρεαῖς' in German. All preserve the proper name rather than attempting translation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κέδρος G2748 N-GMS (1×)

Cedar tree or the Kidron valley (named for cedars or darkness)

While the lexical entry describes cedar trees and cedar-wood products extensively, the single New Testament occurrence uses this as a place name: the Kidron valley between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. John 18:1 marks this as the location Jesus crossed before his arrest in Gethsemane. The transliterations across languages (Kedron, Kédrōn, Cédron, Kidron) preserve the Hebrew name, though its etymology may relate either to cedars or to darkness/turbidity.

(1×) Refers to the Kidron valley, the ravine Jesus crossed on the night of his betrayal. This geographical marker carries Old Testament resonance—David fled across it from Absalom, and later kings cleansed Jerusalem by casting idols into this wadi, making it a symbolic boundary between the city and the place of prayer and testing. FOREST WOODLAND

κεῖμαι G2749 V-PPM/P-NFP (24×)

To lie, be placed, recline; of objects set in position, persons lying down, things established, cities situated, or persons appointed/destined.

A deponent verb meaning to lie or be placed, spanning a wide range from concrete physical position to abstract appointment. Objects such as water jars 'are set' at Cana (John 2:6), linen cloths 'lie' in the empty tomb (John 20:5-7), and an axe 'is laid' at the root of trees (Matt 3:10). The same verb describes a city 'set on a hill' that cannot be hidden (Matt 5:14) and Paul's declaration that he 'is set' for the defense of the gospel (Phil 1:16). German 'liegen/liegt' and Spanish 'está puesto' consistently mirror this dual physical-and-figurative placement.

1. lie placed (objects) (8×) Of objects physically placed, set, or lying in a location. Water jars are 'set there' (John 2:6), linen wrappings 'lie' in the tomb (John 20:5-7), and goods are 'laid up' for future use (Luke 12:19). Spanish 'puestas/almacenados' and German 'liegen' capture the static, positional quality. The tomb narratives are especially vivid, with repeated uses distinguishing the cloths lying flat from the face cloth rolled separately. RECLINING AND LYING

2. lie recline (persons) (6×) Of persons lying down, reclining, or being laid somewhere. The infant Jesus is 'lying in a manger' (Luke 2:12, 16), the angel announces 'he is not here' where his body had 'lain' (Matt 28:6), and Joseph's new tomb is where the body 'was laid' (Luke 23:53). Spanish 'acostado/estaba puesto' and French 'être couché' reflect the bodily posture, whether in rest, death, or burial. RECLINING AND LYING

3. be established laid down (5×) Of something established, laid down, or fixed as a principle or reality. The axe 'is already laid' at the root of the trees (Matt 3:10; Luke 3:9), a veil 'lies' over the heart when Moses is read (2 Cor 3:15), and the law 'is laid down' for the lawless (1 Tim 1:9). Spanish 'está puesto/yace' and German 'liegt' convey the sense of something set in place with binding authority or inevitability. RECLINING AND LYING

4. be situated located (3×) Of a city, place, or entity being situated or located geographically. A city 'set on a hill cannot be hidden' (Matt 5:14), and the new Jerusalem 'lies foursquare' (Rev 21:16). The whole world 'lies' in the power of the evil one (1 John 5:19), extending the spatial metaphor to a cosmic sphere. German 'liegt' and Spanish 'yace/está puesta' preserve the locative sense. RECLINING AND LYING en: lies, lying | es: está,, puesta, yace | fr: être-couché | de: liegen, liegt Matt 5:14; 1John 5:19; Rev 21:16

5. be appointed destined (2×) Figuratively, to be set, appointed, or destined for a particular purpose. Paul says he 'is set' for the defense of the gospel (Phil 1:16), and he tells the Thessalonians that 'we are destined' for afflictions (1 Thess 3:3). Spanish 'estoy puesto/estamos puestos' mirrors this sense of divine appointment, where a person is 'placed' by God into a role or fate, extending the concrete imagery of placement into the realm of vocation and providence. RECLINING AND LYING

Wrappings, burial bands, or strips of cloth used for binding a corpse

This noun originally referred to the girths of bedsteads but came to denote swathing bands or bandages, particularly those used in burial preparation. John 11:44 depicts Lazarus emerging from the tomb still bound in these grave wrappings, emphasizing the miracle's physical reality. The Spanish 'vendas' and French 'bandelette' both capture the bandage imagery. The German 'Binden' emphasizes the binding function of these strips.

(1×) Denotes the strips of linen cloth used to wrap a corpse for burial in first-century Jewish practice. When Lazarus appears still wrapped in these burial bands, it provides visual proof of resurrection while requiring others to unbind him—a vivid image of liberation from death requiring community participation. LINEN CLOTH WRAPPING

To shear or cut hair; used of shearing sheep and cutting human hair, especially in connection with vows.

An ancient verb for cutting hair or wool, carrying both agricultural and ritual significance in the New Testament. In Acts 8:32, Philip reads from Isaiah 53 where the Suffering Servant is compared to a sheep silent before its shearer – a powerful image of submissive innocence. In Acts 18:18, Paul shears his head at Cenchreae because of a vow, likely a Nazirite-style dedication. Paul then uses the word in 1 Corinthians 11:6 in his discussion of head coverings, arguing that if a woman refuses to cover her head, she might as well be shorn – implying that being shorn carried social shame.

(4×) To shear wool from sheep, or to cut human hair, often in connection with religious vows or as a culturally significant act. The verb spans from the agricultural image of sheep-shearing in Acts 8:32 (quoting Isa 53:7, the Servant silent before his shearer) to the ritual act of Paul shaving his head at Cenchreae in fulfillment of a vow (Acts 18:18). In 1 Corinthians 11:6, Paul uses the word twice to argue that being shorn is shameful for a woman, equating it with being shaved. Spanish 'cortarse/rapado' and French 'tondre' both capture the close-cutting action, while the range of contexts – prophetic typology, personal devotion, gender propriety – shows the word's versatility. CUTTING AND SEVERING

A command, shout of command, or authoritative summons

This term denotes a loud command or summons, originally used for military orders, a boatswain's call to rowers, or a charioteer's cry to horses. First Thessalonians 4:16 uses it to describe the commanding shout accompanying Christ's return—alongside the archangel's voice and God's trumpet. The Spanish 'voz de mando' captures the military command sense well. This is not ordinary speech but an authoritative call that demands response.

(1×) Refers to a loud, authoritative command or summons that initiates action. In Paul's eschatological vision, this commanding shout (whether from Christ, an archangel, or God himself) inaugurates the resurrection, much like a military commander's order sets an army in motion or a coxswain's call synchronizes rowers. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κελεύω G2753 V-PIA-2S (26×)

to command, order — to direct someone with authority, issuing a binding instruction

Keleuo means to command or order with recognized authority, and its 26 NT occurrences consistently involve a superior directing a subordinate: a master commanding servants, a king issuing decrees, a military officer dispatching soldiers, or a judge ordering punishment. Jesus commands the crowd to sit before feeding the multitude (Matt 14:19; 15:35), and bids Peter come to him on the water (Matt 14:28). Pilate commands the body of Jesus to be given to Joseph (Matt 27:58). In Acts, the verb becomes almost formulaic for official judicial and military orders: the tribune orders Paul brought into the barracks (Acts 21:33-34; 22:24), the Sanhedrin commands the apostles to withdraw (Acts 5:34), and Festus orders Paul kept in custody (Acts 25:6, 21, 23). Unlike the weightier entellomai or the prophetic divine command, keleuo occupies the everyday register of human institutional authority. Spanish 'ordenar/mandar' and French 'commander/ordonner' both reflect this administrative tone.

to command, order (26×) To give an authoritative command or order, spoken by persons in positions of recognized power — kings, governors, military officers, and masters. Jesus commands crowds and elements (Matt 14:19, 28; 15:35), Pilate orders the release of Jesus' body (Matt 27:58), and in Acts the verb becomes near-formulaic for judicial proceedings: the tribune ordering Paul's detention (Acts 21:33-34; 22:24), Festus directing his custody (Acts 25:6, 21). Spanish 'ordenar' and German 'befehlen' both capture the institutional authority register. COMMANDING AND ORDERING

κενοδοξ-ία G2754 N-AFS (1×)

Vainglory, empty conceit, or ambition for worthless honor

This noun describes the vice of seeking empty or vain honor—glory that lacks substance or comes from improper motives. Philippians 2:3 contrasts this with humble other-centeredness, warning believers to avoid actions motivated by empty ambition or competitive pride. The Spanish 'vanagloria' and German compound 'leere Ehre' (empty honor) both capture how this glory is hollow, lacking true worth or divine approval.

(1×) Denotes the pursuit of empty recognition or worthless honor, driven by pride rather than truth. In Paul's call to Christlike humility, this represents the competitive self-promotion that destroys community, contrasting sharply with the self-emptying example of Christ who did not grasp at glory but took the form of a servant. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κενόδοξ-ος G2755 Adj-NMP (1×)

Vainglorious, conceited, or marked by empty pride and self-glorification

This adjective describes people characterized by vain conceit or empty pride. Galatians 5:26 warns against becoming vainglorious, linking it with provoking and envying one another—the relational fruit of pride. The Spanish 'vanagloriosos' and German 'ruhmsüchtig' (fame-seeking) both emphasize the active pursuit of empty honor. This vice undermines Spirit-led community by fostering competition rather than mutual service.

(1×) Describes those characterized by vain conceit or empty pride, actively seeking worthless honor. Paul warns that such vainglory inevitably produces provocation and envy, creating toxic community dynamics where people compete for recognition rather than celebrating one another's gifts and walking in step with the Spirit. PRIDE AND ARROGANCE

κενός G2756 Adj-AMP (18×)

Empty, vain, without result or substance; also empty-handed or foolish when applied to persons

Kenos describes the condition of being devoid — whether of contents, purpose, or understanding. Paul uses it powerfully to warn that faith without the resurrection would be 'vain' (1 Cor 15:14), and that believers should not receive God's grace 'in vain' (2 Cor 6:1). In the parables, tenants send servants away 'empty-handed' (Mark 12:3; Luke 20:10-11), and Mary's Magnificat celebrates God sending the rich away 'empty' (Luke 1:53). James deploys it as a stinging vocative — 'O foolish person' (Jas 2:20) — where emptiness becomes a metaphor for spiritual senselessness.

1. vain, without result, empty (figurative) (13×) Without purpose, effect, or genuine substance — used figuratively of efforts, words, or claims that accomplish nothing. Paul warns that without the resurrection, preaching and faith alike are 'vain' (1 Cor 15:14). In Eph 5:6 empty words are the vehicle of deception. The Spanish 'vana/vacía' and French 'vide' both carry this dual register of hollow and futile. WORTHLESSNESS AND VANITY

en: emptiness, empty, vain | es: con-vacías, cosas-vanas, vacía | fr: vide | de: leer, κενά Acts 4:25; 1Cor 15:10; 1Cor 15:14; 1Cor 15:58

2. empty, empty-handed (physical) (4×) Physically lacking contents or possessions; sent away with nothing in hand. The tenants in Jesus' parable beat the owner's servant and sent him away empty-handed (Mark 12:3; Luke 20:10-11). Mary sings that God has sent the rich away 'empty' (Luke 1:53). Here the literal sense of an unfilled vessel or open palm underlies the image. EMPTINESS AND VANITY

3. foolish, senseless (of a person) (1×) Used as a personal epithet meaning foolish or senseless, describing a person who is devoid of spiritual understanding. James 2:20 addresses such a person directly: 'O empty one, do you want proof that faith without works is useless?' The Greek concept of an 'empty' person lacking nous finds a sharp rhetorical edge in this singular New Testament usage. EMPTINESS AND VANITY

κενοφων-ία G2757 N-AFP (2×)

empty talk, vain babbling, meaningless chatter

This compound noun (κενός 'empty' + φωνή 'sound, voice') refers to talk that is empty of content, truth, or value—essentially godless chatter. Paul uses it twice in the Pastoral Epistles to warn Timothy against engaging with such hollow discussions. In both contexts (1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 2:16), it's paired with warnings about false teaching and knowledge falsely so-called. The term suggests not just error but emptiness—speech that sounds impressive but lacks substance and leads hearers away from godliness rather than toward it.

(2×) Both occurrences are in Paul's letters to Timothy, warning against 'empty babblings' (κενοφωνίας) and what they lead to. First Timothy 6:20 links them with 'contradictions of what is falsely called knowledge,' while 2 Timothy 2:16 warns they lead to more ungodliness. The multilingual evidence emphasizes the emptiness: Spanish 'palabrerías vacías' (empty words), English 'empty babblings,' German 'leeres Geschwätz' (empty gossip). The compound etymology (empty + sound) is transparent across all languages. IDLE TALK BOASTING

κενόω G2758 V-RIM/P-3S (5×)

To empty, make void, or render powerless; used of Christ's self-emptying and of things being deprived of their force.

Carries the root idea of making something empty or hollow—draining it of its content, significance, or power. The most celebrated use is Philippians 2:7, where Christ 'emptied himself,' the great kenosis passage that anchors Christian theology of incarnation. Elsewhere Paul applies it to theological arguments: faith would be emptied of meaning if righteousness came through the law (Rom 4:14), and the cross would be emptied of its power by clever rhetoric (1Cor 1:17). The Spanish 'sea-vaciado' (be emptied) and German 'entleeren' both preserve the concrete image of something being drained of its contents.

(5×) To empty, make void, or deprive of content, force, or significance. The concrete image of emptying a vessel is extended metaphorically throughout the NT. In Phil 2:7, Christ 'emptied himself' (the kenosis)—not of divinity but of divine prerogatives, taking the form of a servant. In Rom 4:14 and 1Cor 1:17, faith and the cross are said to be 'emptied' or rendered void if human systems supplant divine action. Paul fears his own boasting might be 'emptied' (1Cor 9:15), and in 2Cor 9:3 his confidence in the Corinthians' generosity could be made void. Spanish 'ha-sido-vaciada' and French 'rendre-vain' together capture the dual nuance: literal emptying and making something vain or powerless. EMPTINESS AND VANITY

κέντρον G2759 N-ANP (5×)

A sharp point: a goad for prodding animals, or a sting (of an insect or of death personified).

Denotes any sharp, piercing point—an ox-goad, the sting of a creature, or figuratively the painful barb of death. In Acts 9:5 and 26:14, the risen Christ tells Paul it is hard to 'kick against the goads,' borrowing a well-known Greek proverb about futile resistance to divine prodding. Paul then turns the image eschatologically in 1 Corinthians 15:55-56, asking triumphantly 'Where, O death, is your sting?'—the sting being sin. Revelation 9:10 returns to the literal sense with scorpion-like creatures whose tails carry stings. The French 'aiguillon' and German 'Stachel' both preserve the double meaning of goad and sting.

(5×) A sharp point used as a goad, sting, or piercing instrument. The word spans a spectrum from the herdsman's prodding tool to the venomous sting of death. In Acts 9:5 and 26:14, the 'goads' (Spanish 'aguijones') represent divine direction that Paul resists at his peril—the proverbial κέντρα λακτίζειν. In 1Cor 15:55-56, death's 'sting' is personified and identified as sin, which Christ's resurrection removes. Rev 9:10 describes demonic locusts with scorpion-like stings in their tails. German 'Stachel' and French 'aiguillon' each carry both the agricultural goad and the entomological sting, mirroring the word's full semantic range. PLAGUES AND WOUNDS

centurion; a Roman military officer commanding approximately one hundred soldiers

A Latin loanword (from centurio) designating a Roman officer in charge of a century—roughly 100 men, though the actual number varied. Centurions were the backbone of Roman military structure, responsible for training, discipline, and leading their units in battle. Mark's Gospel uses this term exclusively in the passion narrative, where the centurion at the cross becomes the first Gentile to confess Jesus as God's Son (Mark 15:39). The word reflects the Roman military presence that permeated first-century Judea.

(3×) A Roman centurion, the military officer commanding a century (approximately 100 soldiers). All three occurrences in Mark 15:39-45 refer to the same individual—the centurion supervising Jesus' crucifixion who, upon witnessing Jesus' death, declared 'Truly this man was the Son of God.' This confession from a Gentile military officer holds profound theological significance in Mark's narrative. MILITARY OFFICERS

κενός G2761 Adv (1×)

In vain, emptily, without purpose or result; fruitlessly

This adverb (derived from the adjective 'empty') means doing something in vain or without effect. James 4:5 uses it in a somewhat cryptic statement about Scripture speaking not 'in vain' or 'without purpose.' The Spanish 'en vano' and German 'vergeblich' both capture the fruitlessness implied. This term emphasizes that true divine speech and action always accomplish their intended purpose.

(1×) Indicates action or speech that is empty, purposeless, or without result. In James's reference to what Scripture says, the point is that God's word never speaks idly or fails to achieve its purpose—every divine utterance carries weight and produces its intended effect, unlike human words that may be empty. κεραία G2762 N-AFS (2×)

a small stroke or projection of a letter, the smallest part of a written character

This term originally referred to a horn or horn-like projection, and in writing came to mean the small decorative strokes or serifs that distinguished one Hebrew letter from another—the tiny hooks, crowns, or apex marks that could differentiate, for example, a dalet from a resh. Jesus uses this word in both Matthew (5:18) and Luke (16:17) to emphasize the permanence and authority of the Law: not even the smallest stroke of a letter will pass away until all is accomplished. The term emphasizes God's meticulous preservation of Scripture down to its minutest details.

(2×) Both Gospel sayings (Matt 5:18, Luke 16:17) pair κεραία with 'jot' or 'tittle' (ἰῶτα) to emphasize that nothing—however tiny—will fail from the Law. The multilingual glosses reveal translation challenges: English 'stroke,' Spanish 'tilde,' French 'trait,' German simply transliterates 'κεραία/κεραίαν.' The classical range of meanings (horn, yard-arm, antenna) doesn't appear in the NT, where it's exclusively about the smallest distinguishing mark in written Scripture. WRITING AND SCRIPTURE

potter; one who shapes clay vessels on a wheel

The craftsman who forms vessels from clay using a potter's wheel. In the ancient world, potters were essential artisans providing everyday containers for water, oil, grain, and other necessities. The potter's freedom to shape clay as desired made this craft a powerful biblical image for God's sovereignty over creation. Paul draws on this imagery in Romans 9:21, asking whether the clay can question the potter's right to make different vessels for different purposes. Matthew 27:7, 10 reference the potter's field purchased with Judas's blood money, fulfilling Jeremiah's prophecy.

(3×) A craftsman who shapes clay into vessels. Matthew 27:7, 10 both reference 'the potter's field'—land purchased with the thirty pieces of silver returned by Judas, fulfilling prophecy. Romans 9:21 uses the potter metaphorically: just as a potter has authority over clay to make different vessels for different purposes, so God has sovereignty over his creation. The image emphasizes divine freedom and human creatureliness. POTTER AND FORMING

κερᾰμ-ῐ́κός G2764 Adj-NNP (1×)

Made of clay or pottery; earthen, ceramic

This adjective describes objects made from potter's clay or belonging to the potter's craft. Revelation 2:27 uses it in the phrase 'clay vessels,' imagery drawn from Psalm 2 about the Messiah's authority to shatter rebellious nations as easily as ceramic pots. The Spanish 'de barro' (of clay) and German 'töpfern' (potter's) emphasize the material's fragility. This highlights the vulnerability of earthly power before divine authority.

(1×) Denotes items made of clay or pottery, emphasizing their fragility and breakability. In Revelation's promise to overcomers, the image of clay vessels being shattered represents the utter destruction of rebellious opposition to Christ's rule—pottery breaks irreparably when struck with iron authority. CLAY AND MORTAR

κερᾰμ-ιον G2765 N-ANS (2×)

an earthenware jar or pitcher (for carrying water)

This noun refers to a large earthenware vessel or jar, typically used for carrying water. In both its NT occurrences, it appears in the instructions Jesus gives His disciples for preparing the Passover meal: they are to follow a man carrying a water jar (κεράμιον) who will lead them to the upper room (Mark 14:13; Luke 22:10). The detail is striking because carrying water was typically women's work, making a man with a water jar a distinctive and easily recognizable sign. The jar itself was an ordinary household item, made of clay, and large enough to require carrying.

(2×) Both occurrences (Mark 14:13, Luke 22:10) are in the same narrative context—Jesus' instructions for the disciples to prepare the Passover. The sign is 'a man carrying a jar (κεράμιον) of water.' The multilingual glosses are simple and consistent: Spanish 'cántaro' (pitcher), English 'jar,' French 'cruche' (jug), German 'Krug' (jug). The clay/earthenware material isn't always specified in the glosses but is intrinsic to the Greek term (from κέραμος, pottery). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Tiles, roofing tiles, or clay roof covering

This noun refers to ceramic tiles used for roofing, though it could also denote pottery vessels or even the collective tiling of a roof. Luke 5:19 describes how the paralytic's friends removed tiles from a roof to lower him to Jesus. The Spanish 'tejas' (roof tiles) is most specific. This vivid detail emphasizes both the determination of faith and the typical construction of Palestinian homes with accessible roofs.

(1×) Refers to the clay tiles forming roof covering, which could be removed and replaced. The account of friends dismantling part of a roof to reach Jesus demonstrates both architectural practice (homes with accessible flat roofs) and extraordinary faith that refuses to let obstacles prevent bringing someone to the healer. CLAY AND MORTAR

κεράννῡμι G2767 V-AIA-3S (3×)

to mix, mingle; to blend liquids together, especially wine with water or other substances

In the ancient Mediterranean world, wine was typically mixed with water before drinking—consuming unmixed wine was considered barbaric. This verb describes that blending process, though it could apply to mixing any liquids. Revelation uses this word with striking theological force: God's wrath is 'mixed' undiluted in the cup of his anger (14:10), and Babylon is commanded to receive a double portion of the mixture she prepared for others (18:6, twice). The language of mixing evokes both everyday hospitality and divine judgment.

(3×) To mix or blend liquids together. All three occurrences appear in Revelation's judgment scenes. In 14:10, the wine of God's wrath is described as 'mixed undiluted'—a paradoxical phrase emphasizing its full strength. Revelation 18:6 (twice) commands that Babylon be given a double portion 'in the cup she mixed,' using the imagery of retributive justice: the mixer of poison receives her own concoction doubled back. MIXING WITH OIL

Horn — an animal's horn; symbolically, power, authority, or royal might in prophetic and apocalyptic vision

The noun κέρας (keras) denotes the horn of an animal, used both literally and as one of Scripture's most potent symbols. In the Benedictus, Zechariah praises God for raising up 'a horn of salvation' in David's house (Luke 1:69), drawing on the Old Testament image of the horn as concentrated power. Revelation exploits the symbol extensively: the Lamb has seven horns signifying complete power (Rev 5:6), the dragon has ten horns (Rev 12:3), and the beast from the sea wears ten diademed horns representing vassal kings (Rev 13:1, 11; 17:3-16). The golden altar's horns appear in Revelation 9:13, echoing Exodus's altar design. Spanish 'cuerno' and French 'corne' preserve the dual literal-symbolic range.

horn (11×) A literal animal horn or horn-shaped projection, including the horns of the golden altar in the heavenly temple (Rev 9:13), which echoes the four-horned incense altar of Exodus 30:2. The physical referent underlies all metaphorical extensions. HORNS AND TRUMPETS

Carob pods, the fruit of the carob tree eaten by animals and the desperately poor

This diminutive noun primarily refers to carob pods, the edible fruit of the carob tree that served as animal fodder and famine food. Luke 15:16 depicts the prodigal son so destitute he longed to eat these pods meant for pigs. The Spanish 'algarrobas' and French 'caroube' both specify the carob fruit. This detail emphasizes the depths of his degradation—craving the food of unclean animals he tended.

(1×) Denotes the seed pods of the carob tree, typically used as pig feed and considered poverty food. The prodigal's desire for these pods marks the nadir of his journey—a Jewish son reduced to envying swine their meals, unable even to obtain this lowest sustenance, which drives him toward repentance and return. SEED AND OFFSPRING

Gain, win, earn profit; to win over persons, earn financial return, obtain something valuable, or avoid loss

From the noun κέρδος (profit, advantage), this verb ranges across material and spiritual gain with remarkable flexibility. In the parables of the talents (Matt 25:16-22), it is straightforward business profit — Spanish 'ganaremos' and French 'gagner' match the commercial tone. But Paul radically redefines the word: he counts all things as loss 'that I may gain Christ' (Phil 3:8), and becomes 'all things to all people, that I might gain some' (1 Cor 9:19-22). The same verb that tallies coins in a ledger now tallies souls for the kingdom. A unique nautical usage in Acts 27:21 — 'gaining' the avoidance of damage — rounds out its semantic range.

1. win over persons (7×) To win over persons through persuasion, correction, or godly example. Paul's great missionary manifesto in 1 Corinthians 9:19-22 uses κερδαίνω five times for winning Jews, Gentiles, and the weak to the faith. Jesus uses it in Matthew 18:15 for fraternal correction: 'you have gained your brother.' Spanish 'ganar' and German 'gewinnen' carry the same person-winning sense, while French 'gagner' preserves the root metaphor of profit applied to relationships. GAIN PROFIT OBTAIN

2. gain or earn profit (6×) To gain or earn financial profit, especially through trade or investment. The parable of the talents (Matt 25:16-22) uses this verb three times for servants who traded and 'gained' additional talents. Spanish 'ganaste/gané' and the phrase 'we will make profit' (Jas 4:13 context) keep the commercial register clear. This is the word's most literal, marketplace sense. GAIN PROFIT OBTAIN

3. obtain or attain something (3×) To obtain or attain something of great value, often abstract or spiritual. Jesus poses the existential question: 'What does it profit a person to gain the whole world and forfeit their soul?' (Matt 16:26; Mark 8:36). Paul inverts worldly values entirely, counting everything as rubbish 'that I may gain Christ' (Phil 3:8). Spanish 'ganar' and French 'gagner' serve both material and spiritual acquisition, but the context transforms the word from ledger-book arithmetic to theology of ultimate worth. GAIN PROFIT OBTAIN

en: I-may-gain, he-should-gain, to-gain | es: ganar, ganare, gane | fr: gagner | de: gewinnen, gewinnt Matt 16:26; Mark 8:36; Phil 3:8

4. avoid or spare loss (1×) To gain in the sense of avoiding or being spared from loss or harm. In Acts 27:21, Paul tells the storm-tossed sailors they should have listened to him 'and gained this harm and loss' — meaning they would have avoided it. This is a unique idiomatic usage where 'gaining' paradoxically means 'not suffering.' German 'gewinnt' and Spanish 'ganar' do not naturally carry this avoidance nuance, making it a distinctly contextual extension of the verb. GAIN PROFIT OBTAIN gain, profit; advantage or benefit obtained, whether material or spiritual

This word encompasses both material profit and broader advantage or benefit. While it can refer to financial gain, the New Testament uses it in more nuanced ways. Paul employs it paradoxically in Philippians 1:21—'For me, to live is Christ and to die is gain'—where death itself becomes profit because it means being with Christ. In Philippians 3:7, he counts his former advantages as loss for Christ's sake. Titus 1:11 warns against false teachers motivated by shameful gain. The word prompts reflection on what we truly value as advantageous.

(3×) Gain, profit, or advantage. Philippians 1:21 uses it in a surprising way: Paul considers death 'gain' because it unites him with Christ. In Philippians 3:7, things he once counted as gains he now considers loss for Christ's sake. Titus 1:11 speaks negatively of those who teach false doctrine 'for the sake of shameful gain,' showing the word's moral ambiguity—gain itself is neutral; what matters is what we gain and how. GAIN AND GREED

Small coins, loose change, or money in coin form (especially copper)

This term refers to coins or small change, often specifically copper coins as opposed to silver. John 2:15 describes Jesus overturning the tables and scattering the coins of the money changers in the temple. The multilingual glosses (coins, monedas, monnaie, Münzen) all converge on coinage. This detail emphasizes both the commercial desecration of sacred space and the totality of Jesus's disruptive prophetic action.

(1×) Refers to coins or small change, particularly copper currency used in everyday transactions. When Jesus scatters these coins in the temple cleansing, the image is both of judgment on corrupt commerce and dramatic disruption—money rolling across temple courts as traders scramble, their enterprise literally overturned. SILVER AND MONEY

κερμᾰτ-ιστής G2773 N-AMP (1×)

Money changer, currency exchanger working at temple or marketplace

This noun denotes those who exchanged various currencies for the temple shekel required for offerings. John 2:14 lists money changers among those Jesus drove from the temple courts. The Spanish 'cambistas,' French 'changeur,' and German 'Geldwechsler' all specify this occupation. While their service was necessary (foreign coins couldn't be used for temple tax), Jesus's action suggests their practice had become exploitative or inappropriately located.

(1×) Refers to professional money changers who exchanged foreign currency for acceptable temple coinage. Though providing a necessary service for pilgrims carrying Roman or Greek money, their presence in the temple courts—and possibly their exchange rates—represented the commercialization of worship that Jesus confronted with prophetic force. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12789 WITH 3 SENSES

κεφάλαι-ος G2774 N-NNS (2×)
the main point, sum, essence, chief matter
This adjective used substantively (τὸ κεφάλαιον) means 'the main point' or 'the sum of the matter.' It derives from κεφαλή (head) and carries the sense of what is chief or principal. In Acts 22:28, it refers to the sum of money (a large price) the Roman commander paid for his citizenship. In Hebrews 8:1, it introduces 'the point in what we are saying'—the main thesis about Christ's high priesthood. The word can mean both a summary or chief point in discourse and a sum total in financial contexts, with context determining which nuance applies.

(2×) The two NT occurrences show the word's range. Acts 22:28 uses it of a financial sum: 'with a large sum (κεφαλαίου) I acquired this citizenship.' Hebrews 8:1 uses it for the main point of an argument: 'now the point (κεφάλαιον) in what we are saying is this.' The multilingual glosses reflect both senses: Spanish 'punto principal/suma,' English 'sum/summary,' French and German 'Hauptsache/capital' (main thing/principal). The 'head' metaphor for 'main point' translates naturally across languages. SILVER AND MONEY

κεφαλαι-όω G2775 V-AIA-3P (1×)
To strike on the head; to beat or wound someone's head
This verb means to strike someone on the head, with classical uses also including 'to sum up' (bringing under one heading). Mark 12:4 uses it in the parable of the wicked tenants, where a servant is struck on the head by those rejecting the landowner's authority. The Spanish 'hirieron en la cabeza' makes the anatomical target explicit. This violent detail emphasizes escalating rebellion against legitimate authority.

(1×) Describes the act of striking someone on the head, often violently. In Jesus's parable, this beating of the landowner's representative illustrates Israel's intensifying resistance to God's messengers—a violence that will culminate in killing the beloved son, representing humanity's ultimate rejection of divine authority. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Head — the anatomical body part; figuratively, authority, preeminence, or source of origin.
Kephale carries both a concrete anatomical meaning and a rich figurative extension that became theologically pivotal. Literally, it refers to the physical head of a person or animal — the head on which one cannot make a single hair white or black (Matt 5:36), the head anointed with oil (Matt 6:17), the head of John the Baptist on a platter (Matt 14:8). Figuratively, Paul develops kephale into a key term for authority and relational ordering: Christ as 'head' of the church (Eph 1:22; 5:23), and the husband as 'head' of the wife (1 Cor 11:3). Spanish cabeza, French tete, and German Haupt all preserve this dual literal-figurative range.

1. head (anatomical body part) (60×) Split from sense 70663. Criteria: Physical head of a person or creature: hair on the head (Matt 5:36), laying one's head (Matt 8:20), severed head of John the Baptist (Matt 14:8), crown of thorns on the head (Matt 27:29; John 19:2)

A scroll, roll of writing material, or rolled document
This diminutive of 'head' came to mean the knob on a scroll's roller, then the scroll itself. Hebrews 10:7 quotes Psalm 40, 'in the scroll of the book it is written of me,' with Christ speaking of messianic prophecy recorded in Scripture. The Spanish 'rollo' and German 'Buchrolle' both emphasize the rolled form. This image connects Christ's coming to written prophetic testimony requiring unrolling and reading.

(1×) Refers to a rolled book or scroll, the standard form of written documents in antiquity. In the Hebrews quotation, this 'scroll of the book' represents the accumulated scriptural witness that points forward to Messiah, which Christ claims as his own divine script—he comes to fulfill what has been written. SCROLL WRITTEN ROLL

κῆνσος G2778 N-GMS (4×)
Poll-tax; a census-based tax levied per head, borrowed from Latin census into Koine Greek.
A loanword from Latin census, this term refers to a per-capita tax imposed by Rome on subject peoples. In the Gospels it becomes the flashpoint of a famous trap question: 'Is it lawful to pay kēnsos to Caesar?' (Matt 22:17; Mark 12:14). The word carries political freight—paying it implied acknowledging Roman sovereignty, which is why the question was so incendiary. Spanish tributo and French impôt both capture the coercive, state-imposed nature of this levy.

(4×) A poll-tax or tribute exacted by Roman authority from conquered populations, collected per individual rather than on property or goods. All four NT occurrences cluster around the controversy over paying taxes to Caesar (Matt 17:25; 22:17, 19; Mark 12:14). The multilingual glosses—Spanish tributo/impuesto, German Steuer, French impôt—all point to a compulsory governmental levy, underscoring the political tension the word carries in its Gospel contexts. TRIBUTE AND TAX

κῆπος G2779 N-NMS (5×)
A garden; an enclosed cultivated space, often an orchard or plantation, evoking both agricultural use and sacred setting.
Refers to an enclosed, cultivated piece of land—a garden or orchard. In the Gospels it appears almost exclusively in Johannine contexts: the garden across the Kidron where Jesus was arrested (John 18:1, 26) and the garden containing the new tomb where he was buried and rose (John 19:41). Luke 13:19 uses it in the mustard seed parable, where a man plants a seed in 'his garden.' The word carries rich symbolic resonance in Greek and Jewish tradition—from the gardens of Adonis to the Garden of Eden—making its New Testament appearances at arrest and resurrection quietly profound. All major translations agree: Spanish 'huerto,' French 'jardin,' German 'Garten.'

(5×) A garden, orchard, or enclosed cultivated area. In the NT, the word carries both practical and symbolic weight. John 18:1 and 18:26 place Jesus' arrest in a garden across the Kidron Valley, while John 19:41 (used twice in the verse) locates the crucifixion site near a garden containing a new tomb—evoking Eden's loss and restoration. Luke 13:19 uses the word in the parable of the mustard seed planted in a man's garden. The cross-linguistic unanimity (Spanish 'huerto,' French 'jardin,' German 'Garten') confirms a single, stable sense. The Johannine concentration around passion and resurrection events gives the garden setting a theological depth beyond its horticultural meaning. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Gardener, one who tends and cultivates a garden

This straightforward noun denotes someone who keeps or works in a garden. John 20:15 records Mary Magdalene's initial assumption that the risen Jesus was the gardener of the tomb's garden. The multilingual glosses (gardener, jardinero, jardinier, Gärtner) all align perfectly. This mistaken identity is rich with irony—she mistakes the author of life for one who tends plants, and the new Adam for a mere garden keeper.

(1×) Refers to one who cultivates and tends a garden, responsible for its care and maintenance. Mary's supposition that Jesus is the cemetery gardener adds poignant irony to the resurrection account—she encounters the creator of Eden and source of all life but perceives only a humble servant tending burial grounds. FARMER VINEDRESSER

honeycomb; the wax cells filled with honey, also used metaphorically for sweetness

Primarily means honeycomb—the wax structure bees build to store honey. Homer and classical authors reference it alongside honey as a precious substance. The Septuagint uses it in Proverbs' description of pleasant words ('honeycomb'). Ancient medicine employed honeycomb for treatments. Metaphorically it represents sweetness and pleasure: poets call books of poems a κηρίον, and moralists speak of desire's honeycomb. One medical usage describes a skin condition resembling honeycomb structure. The diminutive form of κηρός (wax) captures both the wax cells and their sweet contents—inseparable in ancient experience.

Proclamation, preaching — the content or act of heralding a message publicly, especially the apostolic gospel announcement.

Kerygma is one of the great technical terms of early Christianity, denoting the public proclamation of the gospel message. Derived from kerysso ('to herald'), it can refer either to the act of preaching or to the content of what is preached — and often both at once. Paul's famous declaration that 'it pleased God through the foolishness of the kerygma to save those who believe' (1 Cor 1:21) plays on this dual meaning: the message sounds foolish, and the method of open proclamation seems weak, yet God chose precisely this combination. Jesus invokes 'the preaching of Jonah' (Matt 12:41; Luke 11:32) as a model of proclamation that produced repentance. The word carries the weight of official, authoritative announcement — not private conversation but public heralding.

proclamation, preaching (9×) The act or content of public proclamation, especially the kerygmatic preaching of the gospel. Kerygma derives from the herald (keryx) tradition, carrying connotations of official, authoritative announcement. In the NT it refers both to the proclaimed message itself (Rom 16:25, 'my gospel and the kerygma of Jesus Christ'; Titus 1:3, the word entrusted through kerygma) and to the act of proclaiming (1 Cor 1:21, 'the foolishness of the kerygma'; 1 Cor 2:4, 'my kerygma was not in persuasive words'). Jesus uses it for Jonah's preaching that moved Nineveh to repentance (Matt 12:41; Luke 11:32). Multilingual evidence (Spanish 'predicacion,' French 'predication,' German 'Verkuendigung') reflects the herald-announcement quality. Mark 16:20 summarizes the apostolic mission as the Lord confirming the kerygma with signs. NEWS AND MESSAGES

herald; one who makes public proclamations or announces important messages

In the ancient world, heralds served as official messengers who proclaimed decrees, announced news, and maintained order in public assemblies. They were protected persons whose role was to communicate, not to originate messages. The New Testament appropriates this image for gospel proclamation: a herald doesn't invent the message but faithfully announces the King's decree. Paul identifies himself as a herald of the gospel in both 1 Timothy 2:7 and 2 Timothy 1:11. Peter calls Noah 'a herald of righteousness' (2 Peter 2:5), emphasizing his role as God's spokesman warning of coming judgment.

(3×) A herald or public proclaimer. Paul describes himself as 'a herald and apostle' in 1 Timothy 2:7 and 2 Timothy 1:11, emphasizing his role as one who publicly announces the gospel message. 2 Peter 2:5 calls Noah 'a herald of righteousness,' highlighting his function as God's spokesman warning the pre-flood world. kerusso – to proclaim publicly, preach, herald; to announce a message with authority

The verb kerusso carries the image of a herald (kerux) making an authoritative public proclamation. In classical Greek it described the town crier or the official who announced games and treaties; in the New Testament it becomes the primary verb for preaching the gospel. John the Baptist 'proclaimed' repentance in the wilderness (Matt 3:1), Jesus 'preached' the kingdom throughout Galilee (Matt 4:23), and the risen Lord commissioned his followers to 'proclaim' the good news to every creature (Mark 16:15). The word insists on public, vocal, authoritative announcement – not private persuasion or philosophical discourse. Spanish predicar, French precher, and German verkündigen all preserve the sense of formal proclamation.

proclaim, preach, herald (61×) To publicly proclaim or herald a message with official authority, encompassing both John the Baptist's wilderness preaching of repentance (Matt 3:1) and Jesus's proclamation of the kingdom (Matt 4:17, 23). The word's etymological link to kerux ('herald') underscores that this is not casual conversation but authoritative announcement meant for wide hearing. Cross-lingual renderings – Spanish predicar, French precher, German verkündigen – consistently reflect the formal proclamation sense across all 61 occurrences. ANNOUNCING AND DECLARING

A huge sea creature, sea monster, or great fish (including whales)

This term encompasses large sea creatures including whales, sea monsters, and huge fish. Matthew 12:40 uses it for the 'great fish' that swallowed Jonah, which Jesus employs as a sign of his coming death and resurrection. The French 'baleine' (whale) is most specific, while other translations keep 'great fish.' The ambiguity about species matters less than the sign's typology—three days in death's belly before deliverance.

(1×) Denotes any large sea creature or monster, specifically the creature that swallowed Jonah. Jesus uses this episode as prophetic sign: as Jonah spent three days in the sea creature's belly before emerging alive, so the Son of Man would spend three days in the earth before resurrection, linking prophet and Messiah through shared pattern. SEA MONSTERS DRAGONS

Cephas — the Aramaic name meaning 'rock' given by Jesus to Simon Peter, used especially by Paul.

Kephas is the Aramaic equivalent of the Greek Petros ('rock'), the name Jesus bestowed on Simon (John 1:42). What makes this form distinctive is its distribution: while the Gospels overwhelmingly use 'Peter,' Paul almost exclusively uses 'Cephas' in his letters (1 Cor 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal 1:18; 2:9,11,14). This preference likely reflects Paul's direct contact with the Aramaic-speaking Jerusalem church, where the apostle was known by his Semitic name. The Aramaic kepha ('rock, stone') is preserved intact through Greek transliteration, reminding readers that the church's foundational apostle bore a name rooted in Jesus's own mother tongue. Only John 1:42 explains the name's meaning for Greek readers, translating it as Petros.

Kēphas (9×) The Aramaic name Cephas (from kepha, 'rock'), given by Jesus to Simon Peter and used predominantly in Paul's correspondence. John 1:42 records the naming moment and provides the Greek translation (Petros). Paul's consistent preference for 'Cephas' (1 Cor 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal 1:18; 2:9,11,14) reflects his connection to the Aramaic-speaking Jerusalem community. The name functions identically to 'Peter' — referring to the same apostle — but carries the linguistic texture of early Palestinian Christianity. Multilingual glosses (French 'Cephas,' German 'Kephas,' Spanish 'Cefas') consistently transliterate from the Aramaic rather than translating the meaning, preserving the name's original Semitic character. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

kibotos – ark; a large box-like vessel or chest, used of Noah's ark and the Ark of the Covenant

Kibotos denotes a large chest or box-shaped container. In the New Testament it carries two distinct biblical referents that share the underlying image of an enclosed, protective vessel: Noah's ark, the great ship of deliverance (Matt 24:38; Heb 11:7; 1 Pet 3:20), and the Ark of the Covenant, the gold-overlaid chest in the Holy of Holies containing the tablets of the Law (Heb 9:4). Spanish arca, French arche, and German Kasten all preserve this dual range. The word's classical sense of 'coffer' or 'chest' for storing documents gives way in Scripture entirely to these two theologically charged referents – one a vessel of salvation from judgment, the other the locus of God's presence among his people.

ark (6×) A large box-shaped vessel or container, encompassing both Noah's ark – the great ship built at divine command to preserve life through the flood (Matt 24:38; Luke 17:27; Heb 11:7; 1 Pet 3:20) – and the Ark of the Covenant, the sacred chest overlaid with gold that held the tablets, manna jar, and Aaron's rod (Heb 9:4). Though classical Greek uses kibotos broadly for any chest or coffer, the NT restricts it to these two salvation-historical referents. Spanish arca and French arche each cover both senses with a single word, mirroring the Greek unity. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Lyre, harp; a stringed instrument used in worship and heavenly praise.

Denotes the kithara, the iconic stringed instrument of the ancient Mediterranean world—ancestor of our word 'guitar.' In the NT it appears both in Paul's analogy about producing distinct musical notes (1 Cor 14:7) and in the Apocalypse's visions of heavenly worship (Rev 5:8; 14:2; 15:2). Spanish cítara preserves the original Greek root most transparently, while German Harfe and French cithare reflect two different reception traditions of the same instrument.

(4×) A stringed instrument, specifically the Greek kithara or lyre, plucked to produce melody. Paul uses it as an illustration of intelligible speech (1 Cor 14:7), while Revelation depicts the redeemed playing kitharai before the throne (Rev 5:8; 14:2; 15:2). The Spanish cítara directly preserves the Greek etymology, confirming this is the classical lyre rather than a modern harp. Its heavenly associations in Revelation elevate it beyond a mere musical instrument to a symbol of glorified worship. LYRE HARP INSTRUMENT to play the harp or lyre, to make music with stringed instruments

This verb means to play the κίθαρα (cithara or lyre), a stringed musical instrument. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 14:7 as an illustration about intelligible communication: even lifeless instruments like the harp must give distinct notes, or how will anyone know the tune? Revelation 14:2 uses the participle to describe the sound John hears from heaven—like harpists playing their harps. The word emphasizes the action of making music with this particular instrument, which was prominent in both Greek culture and Jewish temple worship. Classical usage could also metaphorically mean to 'put on airs,' but the NT uses are literal musical references.

(2×) First Corinthians 14:7 uses it as an illustration: if the harp (κιθαρίζον) doesn't give distinct sounds, how can you know the melody? Revelation 14:2 describes heavenly sounds 'like harpists harping (κιθαριζόντων) on their harps.' The multilingual glosses all capture the musical action: English 'being harped/harping,' Spanish 'que tocan cítara/tocado con cítara,' French and German 'Harfe spielen/jouer de la cithare.' The participle forms dominate, describing ongoing musical action. LYRE HARP INSTRUMENT

harpists, those who play and sing to the harp

This noun (from κιθάρα + ᾠδός 'singer') refers to musicians who both play the harp and sing—professional performers who accompanied their singing with stringed instruments. Both NT occurrences are in Revelation, describing sounds heard in visions. In 14:2, John hears a voice from heaven like the voice of harpists playing their harps. In 18:22, the sound of harpists is among those that will be heard no more in fallen Babylon, symbolizing the end of her luxury, entertainment, and cultural life. The term evokes professional musicianship and festive celebration.

(2×) Revelation 14:2 describes 'the voice of harpists (κιθαρῳδῶν) playing their harps' as part of the heavenly vision. Revelation 18:22 lists 'harpists (κιθαρῳδῶν)' among the sounds that will cease in Babylon's destruction—along with musicians, flutists, and trumpeters. The multilingual glosses are consistent: English 'harpists,' Spanish 'citaristas,' French and German 'Harfenspieler' (harp-players). The genitive plural form appears in both contexts, emphasizing the class or group of musicians. LYRE HARP INSTRUMENT

Κιλικία G2791 N-AFS (8×)

Cilicia; a Roman province on the southeastern coast of Asia Minor, homeland of the apostle Paul.

Kilikia refers to the Roman province located along the southeastern coast of Asia Minor (modern-day southern Turkey), whose capital was Tarsus — the birthplace of the apostle Paul (Acts 21:39; 22:3). The region appears in Acts in connection with Hellenistic synagogue opponents (Acts 6:9), the apostolic letter to Gentile believers (Acts 15:23, 41), and Paul's sea voyage (Acts 27:5). Paul himself mentions it in Galatians 1:21 as a place he visited after his conversion. Translations uniformly render the name phonetically: Spanish 'Cilicia,' French 'Cilicie,' German 'Kilikien.'

Kilikia (8×) The Roman province of Cilicia in southeastern Asia Minor, whose chief city Tarsus was Paul's hometown. All eight NT occurrences cluster in Acts and Galatians, connecting the region to Paul's identity (Acts 21:39; 22:3), to early church geography (Acts 15:23, 41), and to his post-conversion travels (Gal 1:21). Cross-lingual renderings — Spanish 'Cilicia,' French 'Cilicie,' German 'Kilikien' — are straightforward phonetic adaptations of the Greek toponym. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κιννᾰμωμ-ον G2792 N-ANS (1×)
Cinnamon, an aromatic spice derived from tree bark
This noun refers to the valuable aromatic spice obtained from cinnamon tree bark, highly prized in the ancient world. Revelation 18:13 lists it among the luxury goods whose trade ceases when Babylon falls—emphasizing the commercial empire's materialism and the magnitude of judgment. The transliterations (canela, Zimt) show how the word passed through languages. Cinnamon's inclusion underscores both the extent of luxury trade and its ultimate worthlessness.

(1×) Refers to the spice cinnamon, a valuable trade commodity in antiquity. Its appearance in Revelation's cargo list of fallen Babylon emphasizes the doomed city's attachment to luxury and sensual pleasure—even expensive aromatic spices cannot avert divine judgment or purchase redemption from coming destruction. SPICE AROMATIC PERFUME

κινδυν-εύω G2793 V-IIA-3P (4×)
To be in danger, face peril; to risk one's safety or standing.
Describes being exposed to serious risk or peril. The word spans physical danger—as when the disciples' boat was swamped (Luke 8:23)—and institutional or social jeopardy, as when Paul warns that the silversmiths' trade and even the temple of Artemis 'is in danger' of being discredited (Acts 19:27). Paul also uses it of his own daily mortal peril for the gospel (1 Cor 15:30). The German in-Gefahr-sein and Spanish correr-peligro both capture the sense of ongoing, present exposure to threat.

(4×) To be in danger or at risk, whether physically, socially, or legally. In Luke 8:23 the peril is a life-threatening storm; in Acts 19:27 the danger is economic and religious (the Artemis cult losing credibility); in Acts 19:40 it is legal jeopardy (being charged with rioting); and in 1 Cor 15:30 Paul speaks of constant mortal risk for the faith. French être-en-danger and Spanish correr-peligro both emphasize the active, ongoing nature of the exposure to harm. DISTRESS AND HARDSHIP

Danger, peril, or hazard; exposure to risk of harm or death, especially in contexts of hardship endured for the gospel.
Denotes danger or peril — the state of being exposed to serious risk or harm. In the New Testament, nearly all occurrences cluster in Paul's famous 'catalog of perils' in 2 Corinthians 11:26, where he lists dangers from rivers, robbers, countrymen, Gentiles, city, wilderness, sea, and false brothers. The repetition of kindynos eight times in a single verse drives home the relentless hazards Paul faced. Romans 8:35 rounds out the picture, asking whether danger can separate believers from the love of Christ. The Spanish 'peligro' and French 'danger' both capture this sense of imminent threat to life and safety.

danger, peril (9×) A danger, peril, or hazardous situation that threatens safety or life. Greek kindynos covers both abstract risk and concrete threatening circumstances. Paul's extraordinary peril catalog in 2 Corinthians 11:26 uses the word eight times in rapid succession — dangers of rivers, robbers, kin, Gentiles, city, wilderness, sea, and false brothers — making it the defining NT passage for this term. In Romans 8:35 it appears among tribulation, sword, and famine as forces that cannot sever believers from Christ's love. DISTRESS AND HARDSHIP

κῑνέω G2795 V-ANA (8×)
To move, set in motion; to shake or wag (in mockery); to stir up, agitate; to remove or displace from position
A versatile Greek verb of motion at its core, kineō spans a wide range from literal physical movement to figurative social upheaval. At the cross, bystanders 'wagged their heads' (Matt 27:39) in a gesture of scorn instantly recognizable across cultures — Spanish meneando, French remuer, German bewegen all capture that rhythmic derision. Paul invokes it philosophically in Athens: 'in him we live and move' (Acts 17:28), grounding human existence itself in divine motion. In Revelation, the word takes on cosmic force — lampstands removed and mountains displaced from their places.

1. to shake, wag (physical gesture) (2×) Physical gesture of shaking or wagging, specifically the head in mockery. At the crucifixion (Matt 27:39; Mark 15:29), passersby wag their heads in derision — Spanish meneando and French remuer both preserve the repetitive back-and-forth motion. This echoes the Psalm 22:7 tradition of scornful head-shaking at the suffering righteous. SHAKING AND TOTTERING
en: shaking | es: meneando, moviendo | fr: remuer | de: bewegen, κινοῦντες Matt 27:39; Mark 15:29

2. to stir up, agitate (figurative) (2×) Figurative agitation or social incitement — stirring up a crowd or causing civic commotion. In Acts 21:30 the whole city 'was stirred,' and in Acts 24:5 Paul is accused of being one who 'stirs up' sedition. Spanish conmovió and the Greek passive ἐκινήθη both convey that the disturbance sweeps through a community like a wave, moving from individual provocation to collective uproar. STIR UP INCITE
en: stirring-up, was-stirred | es: Se-conmovió, incitando | fr: mouvoir | de: κινοῦντα, ἐκινήθη Acts 21:30; Acts 24:5

3. to move, be in motion (2×) General physical movement or the state of being in motion. Paul's Areopagus sermon (Acts 17:28) employs it existentially — 'in him we live and move and have our being' — where Spanish nos movemos and French mouvoir capture the fundamental character of creaturely motion sustained by God. In Matt 23:4 the sense is more mundane: unwillingness to 'move' a finger to lift heavy burdens. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

4. to remove, displace (2×) To remove or displace something from an established position. In Rev 2:5 Christ warns he will 'remove' the Ephesian lampstand from its place, and in Rev 6:14 mountains and islands are 'moved' from their positions in apocalyptic upheaval. Spanish moveré and fueron movidos highlight the finality: once displaced, the object does not return to its former station. LIFTING AND REMOVING

Movement, motion, or stirring (particularly of water)
This noun denotes motion or movement, with uses ranging from physical motion to political movements and emotional disturbances. John 5:3 describes the moving or stirring of the pool waters at Bethesda (though this verse is textually uncertain in many manuscripts). The Spanish 'movimiento' and French 'mouvement' both capture the sense of movement. The setting involves those waiting for therapeutic water disturbance.

(1×) Refers to movement or stirring, particularly of water. In the Bethesda narrative (where textually attested), this periodic disturbance of the pool waters was believed to have healing properties, drawing the sick and disabled who waited for the movement that might bring their cure—a hope Jesus transcends by healing directly. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

Kish, the father of King Saul (personal name)
This is the personal name of Saul's father, preserved from the Hebrew Bible. Acts 13:21 references Saul as 'son of Kish' in Paul's synagogue sermon reviewing Israel's history. The transliterations across languages preserve the name (Kis, Kís, Kíς) with minor variation. This genealogical detail identifies which Saul is meant and connects the apostle Paul (also called Saul) to Israel's first king from the same tribe of Benjamin.

(1×) The personal name of King Saul's father from the tribe of Benjamin. This genealogical marker in Paul's speech establishes Saul's legitimate tribal credentials while also creating subtle resonance with Paul himself—both Benjaminites named Saul, one a failed king, the other an apostle of the true King. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

κλάδος G2798 N-GMP (11×)

Branch — a tree branch or bough; used of literal foliage and Paul's olive-tree metaphor for Israel and the Gentiles
The noun κλάδος (klados) denotes a branch or bough of a tree. Jesus uses it in the parable of the mustard seed, where birds nest in the branches of the grown plant (Matt 13:32; Mark 4:32), and in the fig-tree sign, where tender branches signal summer (Matt 24:32; Mark 13:28). Crowds cut branches to spread before Jesus at the triumphal entry (Matt 21:8). Paul develops the word theologically in Romans 11:16-21, where natural branches (Israel) are broken off and wild olive branches (Gentiles) are grafted in — a metaphor of covenant continuity and warning against presumption. Spanish 'ramas' and French 'branches' map directly.

branch (11×) A literal tree branch or bough, as in the mustard seed's mature branches where birds lodge (Matt 13:32; Mark 4:32), the fig tree's tender branch that signals the coming of summer (Matt 24:32; Mark 13:28), and the branches cut and strewn before Jesus during the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Matt 21:8; Mark 11:8). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κλαίω G2799 V-PMA-2P (40×)

weep, cry, wail — to shed tears from grief, mourning, sorrow, or deep spiritual anguish Klaio is the standard Greek verb for weeping and appears 40 times in the New Testament, carrying a range from quiet tears to loud lamentation. Its most famous occurrence may be the shortest verse in English Bibles: 'Jesus wept' (edakrusen, John 11:35, using a synonym), yet klaio itself describes his grief over Jerusalem (Luke 19:41) and the weeping in Gethsemane's aftermath. The verb marks pivotal moments of repentance and recognition: Peter 'went out and wept bitterly' after denying Christ (Matt 26:75; Mark 14:72; Luke 22:62). In the Beatitudes, Jesus promises that 'those who weep now will laugh' (Luke 6:21), while the prophetic reversal in Revelation declares God 'will wipe away every tear' (Rev 21:4). Paul too invokes it personally: he warns the Ephesian elders and Philippians 'with tears' (Acts 20:31; Phil 3:18).

weep, cry, wail (40×) To shed tears as an outward expression of grief, sorrow, mourning, or spiritual distress. The verb spans the entire emotional register of weeping in the NT: Rachel's inconsolable grief for her children (Matt 2:18, quoting Jer 31:15), Peter's bitter tears of repentance (Matt 26:75; Luke 22:62), mourners wailing for Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:38-39), Mary Magdalene weeping at the empty tomb (John 20:11-15), and Jesus weeping over Jerusalem's coming destruction (Luke 19:41). Spanish 'llorar,' French 'pleurer,' and German 'weinen' all capture the broad sense of tearful lamentation without distinction between subdued and violent expressions. WEEP CRY WAIL

κλάσ-ις G2800 N-DFS (2×)

a breaking, fracture (especially of bread)
This noun (from κλάω, 'to break') refers to the action of breaking, especially the breaking of bread. In Luke 24:35, the disciples on the Emmaus road recognized Jesus 'in the breaking of the bread'—whether this refers to His characteristic way of breaking bread or specifically to the Lord's Supper is debated. In Acts 2:42, 'the breaking of bread' (τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου) is listed as one of four practices to which the early church devoted themselves, likely referring to communal meals that included or centered on the Lord's Supper. The term emphasizes the physical action that inaugurates shared eating.

(2×) Luke 24:35 describes the Emmaus disciples recognizing Jesus 'in the breaking of the bread' (ἐν τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου). Acts 2:42 lists the early church's devotion to 'the breaking of bread' (τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου) alongside apostolic teaching, fellowship, and prayer. The multilingual glosses emphasize the action: English 'breaking,' Spanish 'partimiento/partir,' French 'fraction,' German uses the Greek term 'κλάσει.' Both contexts suggest a practice with liturgical or communal significance beyond ordinary meals. BREAKING AND SHATTERING

κλάσ-μα G2801 N-GNP (9×)

Fragment or broken piece, especially leftover pieces of bread collected after a miraculous feeding.
Refers to a fragment or broken piece, derived from the verb klao ('to break'). In every New Testament occurrence, klasma designates the leftover pieces of bread gathered after Jesus' miraculous feedings of the multitudes. The twelve baskets (Matt 14:20, Mark 6:43, John 6:12-13) and seven baskets (Matt 15:37, Mark 8:8) of fragments became powerful symbols of divine abundance exceeding human need. The German 'Brocken' (morsel, chunk) and Spanish 'pedazos' (pieces) both emphasize the physical, tangible nature of these broken portions.

fragment, broken piece (9×) A fragment or broken piece of bread or food, specifically the leftovers collected after a communal meal. From klao ('to break'), klasma in the NT appears exclusively in the feeding miracle narratives — the feeding of the five thousand (Matt 14:20; Mark 6:43; John 6:12-13) and the four thousand (Matt 15:37; Mark 8:8-19). Jesus' command to gather the fragments 'so that nothing is lost' (John 6:12) elevates these broken pieces into a theological sign of superabundant provision. Every target language renders the term with a word for physical broken pieces: Spanish 'pedazos', French 'morceau', German 'Brocken'. FRAGMENTS AND PIECES

Cauda (also Clauda), a small island near Crete (place name)
This is the name of a small island near Crete, mentioned in Acts 27:16 during Paul's storm-tossed voyage to Rome. The manuscript tradition varies between Cauda and Clauda. The transliterations preserve these variants. The island's shelter allowed the ship's crew to briefly secure the dinghy and undergird the vessel before the storm drove them toward Syrtis. This geographical detail enhances the narrative's credibility and drama.

(1×) The name of a small island south of Crete that provided brief shelter during Paul's shipwreck voyage. The name is Latin (from the gens Claudia), suggesting either Roman origin or connection. This brief mention reminds us of the many faithful believers whose stories remain mostly unknown but whose fellowship sustained apostolic ministry.

(1×) A Christian woman in Rome who joined in sending greetings to Timothy through Paul's final letter. Though we know nothing more of her story, her inclusion among Paul's circle of co-laborers witnesses to the vital role of women in the early church's life and mission. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Claudius; Roman personal name borne by both the emperor and a military tribune

A common Roman family name (nomen) borne by several individuals in the New Testament era. Most prominently, this refers to the Emperor Claudius (ruled AD 41-54), during whose reign a famine occurred (Acts 11:28) and who expelled Jews from Rome (Acts 18:2). Acts 23:26 introduces us to another Claudius—Claudius Lysias, the Roman tribune (military commander) in Jerusalem who rescued Paul from a mob and later transferred him to Caesarea. The name reflects the pervasive Roman influence in first-century Judea and the broader empire.

(3×) Claudius, a Roman name referring to two different individuals in Acts. Emperor Claudius is mentioned in 11:28 (during whose reign Agabus predicted a famine) and 18:2 (who expelled Jews from Rome, causing Aquila and Priscilla to move to Corinth). Weeping, wailing; loud, audible crying that expresses grief, anguish, or lamentation.

Denotes weeping or wailing — loud, audible crying driven by grief, anguish, or despair. In the Gospels, klauthmos appears most characteristically in Jesus' repeated phrase about 'outer darkness' where there will be 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' (Matt 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Luke 13:28). This formulaic pairing makes klauthmos a word heavy with eschatological dread. It also appears in Matthew 2:18 quoting Jeremiah's oracle of Rachel weeping for her children — a passage where Spanish 'llanto' and German 'Weinen' both convey deep, inconsolable mourning.

(9×) Weeping, wailing, or loud lamentation expressing intense grief or anguish. Klauthmos goes beyond quiet tears to denote audible, demonstrative crying. Its most distinctive NT use is in Jesus' recurring formula 'there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth' (Matt 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Luke 13:28), where it evokes the anguished outcry of those excluded from the kingdom. In Matthew 2:18, it echoes Jeremiah 31:15 — Rachel's inconsolable weeping over her slaughtered children. French 'pleur' and German 'Weinen' both capture the visceral, audible quality of this grief. WEEPING NOUN to break (bread) — the physical act of tearing a loaf apart, especially in communal and sacramental meals

Klao describes the simple but ritually freighted act of breaking bread by hand. In classical Greek it could mean to break off any branch or object, but in the New Testament all fourteen occurrences are narrowly focused on bread. Jesus breaks loaves at the feeding of the five thousand (Matt 14:19) and four thousand (Matt 15:36; Mark 8:6), and again at the Last Supper (Matt 26:26; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:19). The early church continued this gesture as a defining communal practice (Acts 2:46, 20:7, 20:11). Spanish 'partir,' French 'rompre,' and German 'brechen' all preserve the physical-action core, but the sacramental overtone is unmistakable in every NT context.

break (bread) (14×) To break bread by hand, referring to the physical act of tearing a loaf into portions for distribution. Used exclusively of bread in the NT: during the feeding miracles (Matt 14:19; Mark 8:6, 8:19), at the institution of the Lord's Supper (Matt 26:26; Luke 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24), and in early church communal meals (Acts 2:46; 20:7). The multilingual glosses — Spanish 'partir,' French 'rompre,' German 'brechen' — consistently render the physical snapping action, while the liturgical context elevates every instance beyond mere food preparation. BREAKING AND SHATTERING

kleis – key; a device for locking and unlocking, used metaphorically for divine authority and access

Kleis is the ordinary Greek word for a key – the instrument that locks and unlocks a door. In the New Testament, however, every occurrence is figurative: the 'keys of the kingdom' entrusted to Peter (Matt 16:19), the 'key of knowledge' hoarded by the lawyers (Luke 11:52), and the keys of Death and Hades held by the risen Christ (Rev 1:18). The image is strikingly consistent: a key represents delegated authority over a domain. Spanish llave, French clef, and German Schluessel all translate it uniformly, confirming that the metaphor of authoritative access is the single operative sense in the NT.

key (instrument of authority/access) (6×) A key as an instrument of authority and access, used exclusively in metaphorical and symbolic contexts in the NT. Jesus grants Peter the 'keys of the kingdom of heaven' (Matt 16:19), indicts the lawyers for taking away 'the key of knowledge' (Luke 11:52), and declares in Revelation that he holds 'the keys of Death and Hades' (Rev 1:18) and 'the key of David' (Rev 3:7). The angel of the abyss likewise holds a key (Rev 9:1; 20:1). In each case the key symbolizes sovereign control over a domain – the power to open what none can shut and shut what none can open. Spanish llave and French clef converge on this single metaphorical-authority sense. KEY AUTHORITY ACCESS

κλείω G2808 V-FIA-3S (16×)

To shut, close, lock – of doors, gates, and figuratively of heavenly authority and access

The verb kleio covers the full range of shutting in the New Testament, from the physical closing of a door to the authoritative barring of cosmic access. Jesus instructs his followers to 'shut your door' when praying in secret (Matt 6:6), and the parable of the ten virgins turns on the terrifying moment when 'the door was shut' (Matt 25:10). But kleio also operates at a higher register: the Pharisees 'shut the kingdom of heaven' against people (Matt 23:13), Christ holds the key of David and 'shuts so that no one opens' (Rev 3:7), and Elijah 'shut heaven' so that it did not rain (Luke 4:25). The multilingual glosses – 'cerrar,' 'fermer,' 'schliessen' – are identical across both registers, but the objects of the verb reveal the sense boundary.

1. shut authoritatively or bar access (9×) To shut authoritatively or bar access in a figurative, cosmic, or spiritual sense. The subject exercises divine or delegated authority over what is opened or closed: the Pharisees 'shut the kingdom of heaven' (Matt 23:13), Christ 'opens and no one shuts, shuts and no one opens' (Rev 3:7), heaven is 'shut' against rain (Luke 4:25, Rev 11:6), the abyss is locked (Rev 20:3), and a person 'shuts his compassion' (1 John 3:17). The objects – kingdom, heaven, abyss, compassion – mark this as the authoritative rather than physical sense. Nine occurrences place it as the dominant NT usage. SHUTTING AND CLOSING en: has-been-shut, shut, shuts | es: cerrar, cerrará, cerráis | fr: fermer | de: schließt, verschlossen Matt 23:13; Luke 11:7; 1John 3:17; Rev 3:7

2. shut or close physically (7×) To shut or close a physical barrier such as a door or gate, restricting passage or access to a space. Jesus tells his disciples to 'shut your door' for private prayer (Matt 6:6); the householder in the parable has already 'shut the door' (Luke 11:7); the bridegroom's door is 'shut' against the foolish virgins (Matt 25:10); and the disciples meet behind 'shut doors' out of fear (John 20:19, 20:26). Spanish 'cerrada/cerrado' and German 'verschlossen' are the same lexemes as in sense 1, but the concrete physical objects – doors, rooms, gates – distinguish this cluster of seven occurrences. SHUTTING AND CLOSING

Thefts, stolen goods, or acts of stealing

This noun denotes stolen items or acts of theft, derived from the verb 'to steal.' Revelation 9:21 lists thefts among the sins from which plague-stricken humanity refuses to repent, alongside murders, sorceries, and sexual immorality. The Spanish 'robos,' French 'Diebstahl,' and German equivalent all converge on theft. This catalog of unrepented sins emphasizes humanity's stubborn rebellion even under judgment.

(1×) Refers to acts of theft or stolen property. Credit, honor, glory, or good reputation deserved through worthy action

This noun denotes good report, fame, or honor—reputation earned through worthy deeds. First Peter 2:20 asks what credit or glory there is in enduring punishment for doing wrong, contrasting it with the commendation that comes from suffering unjustly. The Spanish 'gloria' and German 'Ruhm' (fame/renown) capture the honor aspect. Peter's point is that only undeserved suffering brings divine approval and true glory.

(1×) Refers to credit, honor, or commendable reputation earned through one's actions. Peter uses this rhetorically to distinguish between suffering consequences for wrongdoing (which deserves no praise) and bearing unjust suffering patiently (which finds favor with God and brings true glory, following Christ's example). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Thief; one who takes another's property by stealth, distinguished from a robber who uses violence.

Kleptes describes someone who steals covertly, in contrast to lestes, the bandit or robber who takes by force. Jesus warns against storing treasure where thieves break through and steal (Matt 6:19-20) and calls the false shepherd who bypasses the gate a thief (John 10:1, 10). The word takes on vivid eschatological force when the Lord's return is compared to a thief coming at an unexpected hour (Matt 24:43; 1 Thess 5:2; Rev 3:3). Spanish ladrón, French voleur, and German Dieb all preserve the core sense of covert theft rather than armed robbery.

thief (one who steals) (16×) A person who steals by stealth or cunning rather than by open violence. In literal usage, thieves break into houses or storerooms to take valuables (Matt 6:19-20; Luke 12:33). Figuratively, Jesus brands the false shepherd a thief (John 10:1), and Judas is identified as one who pilfered from the common purse (John 12:6). The most theologically charged usage compares Christ's parousia to a thief's sudden, unannounced arrival (1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 16:15). All target languages consistently select a single covert-theft term, confirming no semantic division. THIEF ROBBER

To steal, take unlawfully; used of theft prohibited by the Decalogue and of clandestine removal such as grave-robbing.

The standard Greek verb for stealing — taking another person's property without right or consent. It appears prominently in Jesus' quotations of the Decalogue commandment 'you shall not steal' (Matt 19:18; Mark 10:19; Luke 18:20; Rom 2:21; 13:9), grounding the word firmly in the moral law. Yet it also describes more clandestine acts: thieves who break through walls to steal treasure (Matt 6:19-20), the feared theft of Jesus' body from the tomb (Matt 27:64; 28:13), and the thief's approach 'to steal, kill, and destroy' in John 10:10. The translations consistently employ a single term across languages (Spanish hurtar/robar, French voler, German stehlen), confirming one unified semantic sense.

steal (13×) To take another's property unlawfully, to steal or pilfer. The word appears in direct Decalogue citations forbidding theft (Matt 19:18; Mark 10:19; Rom 13:9), in Jesus' teaching about thieves who break in and steal earthly treasure (Matt 6:19-20), in the conspiracy to claim the disciples stole Jesus' body (Matt 27:64; 28:13), and in John 10:10 where the thief comes only to steal. Cross-linguistic evidence uniformly maps to a single theft concept (French voler, German stehlen, Spanish robar), with no semantic subdivision warranted. STEALING THEFT

Branch, shoot; specifically a vine-branch, used in Jesus' allegory of the true vine.

Refers to a branch or shoot, especially one growing from a grapevine. All four NT occurrences come from Jesus' extended vine-and-branches allegory in John 15, where he declares 'I am the vine, you are the branches.' The Greek klēma specifically denotes a vine-twig or tendril, not a tree limb—Spanish pámpano (grapevine shoot) captures this viticultural precision beautifully. The image emphasizes organic dependence: a severed branch withers and is burned (John 15:6).

(4×) A vine-branch or shoot growing from the main stock of a grapevine. Exclusively found in Jesus' vine allegory (John 15:2, 4, 5, 6), the term emphasizes the branch's total dependence on the vine for life and fruitfulness. Spanish pámpano—a technical viticultural term for a green grapevine shoot—precisely matches the Greek specificity, while German Rebe and French sarment likewise denote grape-bearing canes rather than generic tree branches. The metaphor of pruning fruitful branches and burning dead ones drives the passage's teaching on abiding in Christ. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Clement, a fellow worker of Paul mentioned in Philippians (personal name)

This is the personal name of a Christian co-worker whom Paul commends in Philippians 4:3, along with other fellow laborers whose names are in the book of life. The transliterations preserve the Latin name (Klēmēs, Κλήμεντος, Klemens). Early tradition sometimes identified him with Clement of Rome, though this is uncertain. Paul's affirmation places him among faithful gospel partners whose ultimate recognition is eschatological.

(1×) A fellow worker with Paul in the gospel ministry, commended alongside other faithful laborers at Philippi. to inherit, receive as a possession — to obtain an allotted portion, whether a literal estate or a promised divine blessing

Kleronomeo means to inherit or come into possession of an allotted portion, rooted in kleros ('lot, allotment') and nomos ('law, custom'). Its 18 New Testament occurrences carry the rich overtones of both Greco-Roman inheritance law and the Old Testament theology of the promised land as God's allotted gift to his people. In the Synoptic Gospels, the rich young ruler asks 'what must I do to inherit eternal life?' (Matt 19:29; Mark 10:17; Luke 10:25; 18:18) — a question that reveals how 'inheritance' had become the natural idiom for receiving God's ultimate blessing. The Beatitudes promise that the meek 'shall inherit the earth' (Matt 5:5, echoing Ps 37:11). The great judgment scene in Matthew 25:34 uses it climactically: 'Come, you who are blessed by my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you.' Paul extends the concept theologically: Abraham's heirs inherit the promise not through the law but through faith (Gal 4:30; 5:21; 1 Cor 6:9-10; 15:50). Hebrews traces the inheritance theme through the patriarchs and forward to a heavenly country (Heb 1:4, 14; 6:12; 12:17). Revelation 21:7 crowns the motif: 'The one who overcomes will inherit these things.' Spanish 'heredar,' French 'heriter,' and German 'erben' all preserve the legal-theological inheritance framework.

inherit, receive as heritage (18×) To receive or obtain something as an inheritance, allotment, or promised possession — applied both to earthly legacies and to the great theological blessings of eternal life, the kingdom, and the new creation. The Synoptic question 'what must I do to inherit eternal life?' (Mark 10:17; Luke 10:25; 18:18) frames salvation as divinely allotted inheritance. Jesus promises the meek will 'inherit the earth' (Matt 5:5) and invites the blessed to 'inherit the kingdom' (Matt 25:34). Paul restricts inheritance to those who live by the Spirit (1 Cor 6:9-10; 15:50; Gal 5:21), while affirming that Abraham's heirs inherit through faith, not law (Gal 4:30). Hebrews traces inheritance through the patriarchs to a 'better name' for the Son (Heb 1:4, 14; 6:12; 12:17). Revelation 21:7 brings the theme to climactic fulfillment. Spanish 'heredar' and German 'erben' confirm the single inheritance-as-possession sense. INHERITING AND POSSESSING inheritance — a share received from an ancestor, whether material property or a divinely promised spiritual portion Kleronomia denotes what is received by right of succession, whether a landed estate, a family fortune, or a covenant promise. In classical Greek the word covered straightforward legal inheritance, but in the New Testament it is overwhelmingly theological. Jesus' parable of the vineyard tenants turns on the son's kleronomia (Matt 21:38; Mark 12:7; Luke 20:14). Paul stretches the term into eschatological territory: believers inherit an imperishable portion (Eph 1:14, 18; Col 3:24; Heb 9:15). The multilingual evidence — Spanish 'herencia,' French 'heritage,' German 'Erbe/Erbteil' — uniformly maps to the inheritance domain, whether the referent is a plot of Canaan or the kingdom of God.

(14×) An inheritance — the property, portion, or promise received by right of succession or divine grant. Encompasses both the concrete (a disputed family estate in Luke 12:13; the land promise to Abraham in Acts 7:5; Heb 11:8) and the spiritual (the believer's heavenly inheritance in Eph 1:14, 18; 1 Pet 1:4; the inheritance of the kingdom in Gal 5:21). The parable of the wicked tenants (Matt 21:38; Mark 12:7; Luke 20:14) pivots on the murderous seizure of the son's rightful kleronomia, fusing the legal and theological registers. INHERITANCE AND PROPERTY

Heir; one who receives an inheritance, whether by legal right or divine promise.

Denotes a person who stands to inherit or already possesses an inheritance. In classical Greek the word could mean either the heir apparent or the heir already in possession. The New Testament draws on both senses: the parable of the wicked tenants depicts the son as the rightful heir whom the farmers murder (Matt 21:38; Mark 12:7), while Paul and the author of Hebrews apply the term theologically to believers who are heirs of God through faith (Rom 4:13-14; Gal 3:29; Tit 3:7) and even to Christ himself as heir of all things (Heb 1:2). Spanish 'heredero' and French 'héritier' both preserve the Latin root, underscoring how consistently the concept of legal succession carries across cultures.

heir (one who inherits) (15×) One who inherits property, status, or a divine promise. Applied literally to the son in the parable of the vineyard tenants (Matt 21:38; Mark 12:7; Luke 20:14), where the heir's murder dramatizes Israel's rejection of God's messenger. Used theologically of believers who inherit salvation and the promises made to Abraham (Rom 4:13-14; Gal 3:29; Heb 1:2). Multilingual glosses uniformly center on legal inheritance—Spanish 'heredero,' French 'héritier,' German 'Erbe'—confirming a single, cohesive semantic core. HEIR INHERITOR

A lot cast for decisions; by extension, an allotted portion, inheritance, or assigned share.

Originally the physical object thrown to determine outcomes by chance, kleros acquired rich theological overtones in the New Testament. At the cross, soldiers cast lots for Jesus' garments (Matt 27:35; John 19:24), fulfilling Psalm 22:18 — here the word retains its concrete, ancient sense. But Paul speaks of 'the inheritance (kleros) among those sanctified' (Acts 26:18), and Colossians 1:12 thanks the Father who qualified believers 'to share in the inheritance of the saints in light.' Spanish splits the senses neatly: 'suertes' for the casting of lots, 'herencia' for the spiritual inheritance — a distinction the Greek leaves unified under one evocative word.

1. lot (for casting) (7×) A lot — the concrete object cast or drawn to make decisions, or the act of casting lots itself. All four Gospels record soldiers casting lots (kleron) for Jesus' garments at the crucifixion (Matt 27:35; John 19:24), and Acts 1:26 describes the apostles casting lots to replace Judas. Spanish 'suertes' and German 'Los' preserve the chance-decision nuance. French 'sort' carries a similar resonance of fate determined by casting. LOTS AND ALLOTMENT

2. inheritance, allotted heritage (3×) An inheritance or allotted heritage — the theological extension where what God assigns to His people becomes their spiritual or eschatological portion. In Acts 26:18, Paul's commission includes granting Gentiles 'an inheritance among those sanctified,' and Col 1:12 speaks of sharing 'the inheritance of the saints in light.' Spanish shifts to 'herencia,' clearly marking this as a distinct theological register from the lot-casting sense. INHERITANCE AND PROPERTY

3. share, portion (assigned role) (2×) A share, portion, or assigned role — the metaphorical extension from 'what falls to one by lot' to one's allotted place in a group or enterprise. Judas 'was allotted his share in this ministry' (Acts 1:17), and Simon Magus is told he has 'no part or share in this matter' (Acts 8:21). Spanish uses both 'parte' and 'suerte' here, reflecting the ambiguity between concrete lot and abstract portion. LOTS AND ALLOTMENT

We were made heirs, we obtained an inheritance, or we were allotted a portion

This verb (in passive aorist) combines the ideas of casting lots, receiving an inheritance, and being appointed to a portion. Ephesians 1:11 declares that believers 'were made heirs' or 'obtained an inheritance' in Christ according to God's predetermined purpose. The Spanish 'fuimos hechos herederos' emphasizes the making of heirs. This term combines divine sovereignty (God's appointing) with gracious gift (inheritance received).

(1×) Indicates being made heirs or obtaining an inheritance, with overtones of divine allotment or appointment. In Ephesians' soaring language about God's purposes in Christ, this affirms that believers have been granted an inheritance not by chance or merit but by God's predetermined plan—appointed to a portion in Christ's cosmic kingdom. Calling, vocation — the divine summons to salvation, service, and the hope that accompanies God's invitation

The noun κλῆσις (klesis) refers to God's effectual calling — the summons by which he draws people into relationship, salvation, and purpose. Paul insists that God's gifts and calling are irrevocable (Rom 11:29) and urges believers to live worthy of their calling (Eph 4:1; 2 Thess 1:11). In 1 Corinthians 1:26 he notes that not many wise or powerful received this calling, underscoring its gracious character. The term also appears in the sense of one's station in life at the time of conversion: 'let each person remain in the calling in which they were called' (1 Cor 7:20). Spanish 'llamamiento/vocación' and French 'vocation/appel' both capture the dual sense of divine invitation and life-station.

calling, vocation (11×) The divine act of summoning persons to salvation, faith, and eschatological hope. Paul speaks of the 'hope of your calling' (Eph 1:18), its irrevocable nature (Rom 11:29), and the humble social profile of those whom God calls (1 Cor 1:26). Believers are exhorted to walk worthy of this calling (Eph 4:1, 4; Phil 3:14; 2 Thess 1:11; 2 Pet 1:10). Spanish 'llamamiento' and French 'appel' emphasize the initiating voice of God. Called, invited — divinely summoned to salvation, service, or the messianic banquet

The adjective κλητός (kletos) describes those whom God has summoned, whether to salvation, apostolic service, or the eschatological feast. Jesus warns that 'many are called but few are chosen' (Matt 22:14), distinguishing the broad invitation from the final selection. Paul introduces himself as 'called apostle' (Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1) and addresses believers as 'called saints' (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2) and 'called according to his purpose' (Rom 8:28). In Revelation, those who follow the Lamb are 'called, chosen, and faithful' (Rev 17:14). The term carries theological weight as a marker of divine initiative. Spanish 'llamado' and French 'appelé' preserve the passive-divine force.

called (divinely summoned/appointed) (11×) Divinely summoned to faith and incorporation into the people of God. Believers are 'called saints' (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2), 'called according to his purpose' (Rom 8:28), and identified alongside the Lamb as 'called, chosen, and faithful' (Rev 17:14). The word underscores that salvation originates in God's initiative, not human decision. Spanish 'llamado' captures the passive-divine grammar. CALLING AND NAMING an oven, a furnace for baking bread

This noun refers to a covered earthen baking vessel or oven, wider at the bottom than the top, used for baking bread by surrounding it with hot embers. Jesus uses it in both Matthew 6:30 and Luke 12:28 in His teaching about God's care: if God so clothes the grass of the field, which today is alive and tomorrow is thrown into the oven, will He not much more clothe you? The image evokes the practice of using dried grass and field plants as fuel for heating bread ovens. The term emphasizes the common, humble household technology that every hearer would recognize from daily life.

(2×) Both Gospel sayings (Matt 6:30, Luke 12:28) use the same illustration: grass that today is and tomorrow is thrown into the oven (εἰς κλίβανον βαλλόμενον). The point is God's providential care for what is temporary and lowly. The multilingual glosses are straightforward: English 'oven,' Spanish 'horno,' French 'four,' German preserves the Greek 'κλίβανον.' region, district; a geographical area or territory defined by climate or political boundaries

Originally referring to the 'inclination' or slope of the earth's surface at different latitudes (hence 'climate'), this word came to designate geographical regions or districts. Paul uses it three times to describe the broad territories where he ministered. In Romans 15:23, he declares there is no longer any place for him in 'these regions'—the eastern Mediterranean areas where he had planted churches. 2 Corinthians 11:10 and Galatians 1:21 similarly use it for the regions of Achaia and Syria-Cilicia respectively. The word emphasizes the geographical scope of Paul's missionary strategy.

(3×) A region, district, or territory. Paul uses this word to describe broad geographical areas of his missionary work: the 'regions of Achaia' in 2 Corinthians 11:10, 'the regions of Syria and Cilicia' in Galatians 1:21, and in Romans 15:23 he states he no longer has 'place in these regions' (the eastern Mediterranean), implying his work there is complete and he must move westward to Spain. Bed, couch, or pallet; a piece of furniture for sleeping, reclining, or carrying the sick.

Refers to a bed, couch, or pallet — a piece of household furniture used for sleeping, resting, reclining at meals, or transporting the infirm. In the Gospels, kline appears prominently in healing narratives where Jesus tells the paralytic to 'take up your bed and walk' (Matt 9:2, 6; Mark 2:4, 9, 11-12), making the bed itself a dramatic prop in the story of restoration. It also appears for the bed where a child lies sick (Mark 7:30) and in the context of ritual purity involving the washing of couches (Mark 7:4). Spanish distinguishes between 'cama' (bed) and 'camilla' (stretcher/pallet), reflecting the range of kline from proper bed to portable mat.

bed/couch (piece of furniture for reclining) (9×) A bed, couch, or pallet used for sleeping, reclining, or carrying the sick. Greek kline (from klino, 'to recline') covers the full range from a proper household bed to a portable mat or stretcher. Its most memorable NT appearances are in the healing of the paralytic, where Jesus commands 'take up your bed and walk' (Matt 9:2, 6), transforming the symbol of helplessness into a sign of restored strength. Mark 7:4 mentions the ritual washing of klinai (couches), and Mark 7:30 shows a child lying healed upon a bed. small bed, pallet; a modest portable bed or stretcher for carrying the sick

A diminutive form meaning 'small bed' or 'pallet,' this word describes the portable beds used by ordinary people or for transporting the sick. Unlike elaborate furniture, these were simple mats or stretchers that could be easily carried. Luke's Gospel and Acts use this word in healing narratives: the paralytic whose friends lowered him through the roof (Luke 5:19, 24) and the sick laid in the streets hoping Peter's shadow would fall on them (Acts 5:15). The word emphasizes both the humble circumstances of those healed and the physical reality of their restoration—they could pick up and carry what had carried them.

(3×) A small bed, pallet, or portable mat used for sleeping or carrying the sick. Luke 5:19, 24 describes the paralytic's 'small bed' which his friends carried to Jesus and which he later carried home after healing. To incline, bow, or lay down; of daylight declining; of armies being put to flight.

Built on the root meaning 'to cause to lean,' klino covers a surprising range in the New Testament. Jesus says the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head (Matt 8:20; Luke 9:58), and at the cross he bows his head and gives up his spirit (John 19:30). The same verb describes daylight 'declining' toward evening (Luke 9:12; 24:29) — Spanish 'ha declinado' and French 'décliner' preserve this metaphor beautifully. In Hebrews 11:34, it takes a military turn: heroes of faith 'turned back' foreign armies, where Spanish 'hicieron huir' (made to flee) makes the martial sense vivid.

1. lay down, bow (head/face) (4×) To lay down, bow, or incline — a physical gesture of resting or reverence. Jesus has nowhere to 'lay' (kline) his head (Matt 8:20; Luke 9:58); at death he 'bowed' his head (John 19:30); the women at the tomb bow their faces to the ground (Luke 24:5). Spanish 'inclinando' and 'recline,' alongside German 'neigen,' all point to the basic postural meaning of leaning or bending downward. BOW KNEEL CROUCH

2. decline (of day) (2×) To decline, wane — said of the day drawing toward evening. In Luke 9:12 the day 'began to decline' and in Luke 24:29 it 'has declined already.' Spanish 'a declinar' and 'ha declinado' mirror the Greek perfectly, and French 'décliner' is a direct cognate. This temporal metaphor extends the physical 'leaning' into the passage of time — the sun literally inclining toward the horizon. EVENING AND TWILIGHT

Groups of people reclining for a meal; dining companies or arranged table sections

This noun originally meant a hut or reclining couch, but came to denote groups of people arranged for dining. Luke 9:14 describes Jesus directing the disciples to have the crowds sit down 'in groups' of fifty for the feeding miracle. The French 'groupes' captures the sense clearly. This organized arrangement facilitated both distribution of food and counting of participants, while also creating an orderly community meal rather than a chaotic scramble.

theft, the act of stealing

This noun (from κλέπτω, 'to steal') refers to the act or practice of theft—taking what belongs to another by stealth. It appears in both Matthew 15:19 and Mark 7:21 in Jesus' teaching about what defiles a person: evil comes from within, from the heart, including thefts. Jesus lists it among moral evils like murders, adulteries, and false witness. The plural form (κλοπαί) suggests repeated acts or the general practice of stealing. Classical usage distinguished theft (κλοπή, done by stealth) from robbery (ἁρπαγή, done by force), and that distinction may be operative in Jesus' vice list as well.

(2×) Both occurrences (Matt 15:19, Mark 7:21) are in Jesus' teaching on defilement, where He lists 'thefts' (κλοπαί) among the evil things that come from the heart. The plural form suggests habitual actions or multiple instances. The multilingual glosses are simple and consistent: English 'thefts,' Spanish 'robos,' French 'vol,' German 'Diebstahl.' The word is distinguished from violent robbery in classical usage, emphasizing the secretive, stealthy nature of taking what isn't one's own. STEALING THEFT

a wave or surge of water, billow

This noun refers to a wave or surge of water, often in the context of rough seas or storms. Luke 8:24 uses it to describe the raging waves (κλύδωνι) of the storm on the Sea of Galilee that threatened the disciples' boat—waves that Jesus then rebuked and stilled. James 1:6 uses it metaphorically: the doubter is like a wave of the sea (κλύδωνι θαλάσσης) driven and tossed by the wind, illustrating spiritual instability. Classical usage extended to medical contexts (fluid movements in the body) and metaphorical seas of troubles, but the NT uses center on literal or symbolic water surges representing chaos and instability.

(2×) Luke 8:24 describes Jesus rebuking 'the raging (of the water)' (τῷ κλύδωνι τοῦ ὕδατος) during the storm on Galilee. James 1:6 compares the doubter to 'a wave of the sea' (κλύδωνι θαλάσσης) driven by wind. The multilingual glosses capture both senses: English 'wave/raging,' Spanish 'ola/oleaje,' French 'flot,' German 'Woge.' The term emphasizes turbulent water movement, whether literal (Luke) or metaphorical (James) for instability and lack of control. WAVE BILLOW SEA

To be tossed about by waves, buffeted, or thrown into confusion

This verb in passive form means to be buffeted by heavy seas or tossed by waves, with metaphorical extension to being disturbed or thrown into confusion. Ephesians 4:14 uses it metaphorically: believers should not be 'tossed' by every wind of teaching. The Spanish 'sacudidos por las olas' (shaken by waves) preserves the maritime imagery. Paul's nautical metaphor warns against doctrinal instability, contrasting with mature rootedness in truth.

(1×) Describes being tossed about or buffeted, particularly by waves at sea. Paul employs this maritime image for theological instability—immature believers tossed by shifting doctrinal winds and waves of deceptive teaching, lacking the anchor and ballast that come from growing up into Christ through truth spoken in love. TORMENT AND TORTURE

Clopas, husband of one of the Marys at the crucifixion (personal name)

This is the personal name of the man identified in John 19:25 as the husband of Mary who stood by Jesus's cross. The Aramaic name (Klōpas, Clopas, Klopas, Κλωπᾶς) is distinct from Cleopas of the Emmaus road, though sometimes confused. Some early tradition identified him as Joseph's brother, making his wife Jesus's aunt. This brief reference preserves the memory of faithful witnesses to the crucifixion.

(1×) The husband of one of the Marys who witnessed Jesus's crucifixion. Though we know nothing else of Clopas directly, his identification locates him within the circle of Jesus's close followers, and his wife's presence at the cross witnesses to the family and friends who remained faithful through Jesus's darkest hour. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

To itch, have itching ears, or crave constant novelty and stimulation

This verb means to itch or scratch, used metaphorically in 2 Timothy 4:3 for those with 'itching ears'—craving teachers who tickle their ears with what they want to hear rather than sound doctrine. The Spanish 'teniendo comezón' and German 'Juckreiz haben' both preserve the itch imagery. This vivid metaphor describes the restless pursuit of novel or flattering teaching that satisfies curiosity without demanding transformation.

(1×) Describes itching or the desire to be scratched, used metaphorically for ears that itch—people who accumulate teachers to satisfy their craving for pleasant messages rather than truth. This 'itching' represents the restless, entertainment-oriented approach to teaching that prioritizes comfort and novelty over the challenging demands of authentic gospel proclamation. DESIRE AND COVETING

Cnidus, a coastal city in southwestern Asia Minor (place name)

This is the name of a city and peninsula on the southwestern coast of Asia Minor, mentioned in Acts 27:7 as a point along Paul's voyage to Rome. The transliterations preserve the Greek (Knidos, Knídos, Cnide, Κνίδον). The ship struggled to reach Cnidus against contrary winds before turning south toward Crete. This geographical marker contributes to Luke's detailed nautical account and demonstrates the challenges of ancient Mediterranean sailing.

(1×) A coastal city in southwestern Asia Minor that Paul's ship approached with difficulty during his voyage to Rome. κοδράντης G2835 N-AMS (2×) a quadrans (Roman copper coin), the smallest Roman coin (1/4 of an assarion)

This is a transliteration of the Latin 'quadrans,' a small Roman copper coin worth one quarter of an as (assarion). Jesus uses it in Matthew 5:26 in His teaching about reconciliation: you will never get out of prison until you have paid the last quadrans—every last cent of your debt. Mark 12:42 uses it to define the value of the widow's two copper coins (λεπτά): together they made a quadrans. The term emphasizes the smallest possible monetary unit, the 'last penny' or 'last farthing' that represents complete and total payment or poverty.

(2×) Matthew 5:26 warns about paying 'the last quadrans' (ἕως ἂν ἀποδῷς τὸν ἔσχατον κοδράντην) before release from debt-prison. Mark 12:42 explains the widow gave two lepta 'which is a quadrans' (ὅ ἐστιν κοδράντης). The multilingual glosses show translation challenges: English uses 'kodrantes' or 'penny,' Spanish 'cuadrante,' French 'quadrant,' German 'Heller' (a similar small coin). The term represents the absolute minimum denomination in Roman currency. SILVER AND MONEY

Body cavity: the womb as organ of conception and birth, or the stomach/belly as organ of digestion and appetite.

A fundamental body-cavity word whose two senses separate cleanly across languages. In birth and conception contexts, Hindi renders it garbh or kokh (womb), while Spanish uses vientre and German Bauch — the same surface form for both senses, revealing that English and Hindi disambiguate what Romance and Germanic languages leave merged. Fourteen of its twenty-three New Testament occurrences denote the maternal womb (Luke 1:15, 41–44; Matt 19:12), while nine refer to the digestive belly or stomach, as in the memorable 'their god is their belly' (Phil 3:19) and Jonah imagery (Matt 12:40).

1. womb (14×) The uterus or maternal cavity, used of conception, pregnancy, and birth. Hindi garbh and kokh distinguish this sense from the digestive meaning, while Spanish vientre and German Bauch remain ambiguous. Key passages include Luke 1:41–44 (the child leaping in Elizabeth's womb) and Matt 19:12 (born from the womb). Fourteen occurrences strongly cluster here. WOMB AND BELLY

Used in contexts of eating, gluttony, and physical interior — 'their god is their belly' (Phil 3:19), food passing through the stomach (Matt 15:17; Mark 7:19), and the whale's belly in the Jonah typology (Matt 12:40). Nine occurrences carry this sense. WOMB AND BELLY

κοιμ-άω G2837 V-ASP-3S (18×)

To fall asleep; used as a euphemism for death (especially of believers), or literally of physical sleep.

Koimao carries a striking double life in the New Testament. In its most theologically charged usage, it serves as a gentle euphemism for death, portraying the deceased as merely sleeping, awaiting resurrection. Jesus himself introduces this language when he says of Lazarus, 'Our friend has fallen asleep' (John 11:11), and the disciples misunderstand him literally. Paul anchors an entire resurrection theology on this metaphor: those who have 'fallen asleep' in Christ will be raised (1 Cor 15:6, 18, 20, 51; 1 Thess 4:13-15). The literal sense of physical sleep appears less frequently but provides the metaphor's grounding, as when the guards at the tomb claim the disciples came while they were sleeping (Matt 28:13).

1. fall asleep (die, euphemism) (14×) To die, expressed euphemistically as falling asleep, used especially of believers who await resurrection. Spanish 'durmieron/dormiremos' and German 'schlafen/schläft ein' preserve the sleep metaphor without explicit death language, mirroring the NT's pastoral tenderness. This sense dominates Paul's resurrection discourse (1 Cor 15:6, 18, 20, 51; 1 Thess 4:13-15), where the metaphor is not mere softening but theological assertion: death for the believer is genuinely temporary, like sleep before waking. Stephen 'fell asleep' after his martyrdom (Acts 7:60), and the saints who 'had fallen asleep' were raised at Christ's crucifixion (Matt 27:52). SLEEP AND SLUMBER

en: fell-asleep, has-fallen-asleep, have-fallen-asleep | es: dormiremos, duerma, durmieron | fr: dormir, endormir | de: schlafen, schläft-ein Matt 27:52; John 11:11; John 11:12; Acts 7:60; Acts 13:36

2. sleep (literal, physical) (4×) To be in a state of ordinary physical sleep or rest. French 'dormir/endormir' and Spanish 'durmiendo/duermen' apply equally to this literal sense and the euphemistic one, showing how naturally the metaphor arises from the physical reality. The guards at Jesus' tomb claim the disciples stole the body while they slept (Matt 28:13); Peter sleeps between two soldiers in prison (Acts 12:6); the disciples sleep during Jesus' agony in Gethsemane (Luke 22:45). In 1 Corinthians 11:30, Paul may be using the word with deliberate ambiguity, straddling physical illness and death. SLEEP AND SLUMBER

Rest, sleep, or the act of lying down to sleep

This noun denotes the act of lying down to sleep or the state of rest. John 11:13 uses it when Jesus spoke of Lazarus's 'rest' (sleep), though the disciples misunderstood, thinking Jesus meant natural sleep rather than death. The French 'sommeil' and German 'Schlaf' both specify sleep. This euphemism for death—common in both testaments—emphasizes both the peacefulness of believers' death and the certainty of resurrection awakening.

(1×) Refers to rest or sleep, particularly as a euphemism for death. Jesus's use of 'sleep' language for Lazarus's death both softens the reality (death as temporary rest) and anticipates the miracle (sleep from which one can be awakened)—though the disciples' confusion shows how metaphor can obscure literal meaning until explanation comes. REST AND REFRESHMENT

κοινός G2839 Adj-NNS (14×)

common — shared by all, or ritually unclean/profane; the two senses hinge on communal inclusion vs. sacred exclusion

Koinos carries two semantically distinct profiles in the New Testament that are nearly opposite in emotional valence. In one direction it means 'shared, communal' — the common faith of Titus 1:4, the common salvation of Jude 1:3, and the shared possessions of the Jerusalem church (Acts 2:44; 4:32). In the other direction, shaped by Jewish purity law, it means 'ritually defiled, profane' — hands unwashed according to tradition (Mark 7:2, 5), foods declared unclean (Acts 10:14, 28; 11:8; Rom 14:14). Spanish distinguishes these neatly: 'comun' for shared versus 'impuro' for defiled, confirming the semantic split that Greek leaves to context.

common (shared or ritually unclean/profane) (14×) Shared, communal, belonging to all alike. Used of the common faith that unites believers (Tit 1:4; Jude 1:3) and the radical sharing of property in the early Jerusalem community, where 'all things were common' (Acts 2:44; 4:32). French 'commun' and German 'gemeinsam' render this participatory sense, reflecting the Greek root idea of what is collectively held rather than privately owned. UNCLEAN AND PROFANE

κοιν-όω G2840 V-PMA-2S (14×)

To defile or make ritually unclean; to declare profane or call common what God has cleansed.

Koinoo enters the New Testament at the flashpoint of purity law. In Jesus' teaching (Matt 15; Mark 7), it is what comes out of the mouth — evil thoughts, murder, adultery — that 'defiles' a person, not unwashed hands or forbidden foods. The word literally means 'to make common,' to strip something of its holy or pure status and reduce it to the profane. Spanish contaminar, French souiller, and German verunreinigen all reach for pollution language, yet the underlying Greek preserves an older, more sociological concept: what is koinos is simply 'shared, ordinary' — the opposite of set apart. Peter's rooftop vision (Acts 10:15; 11:9) makes the full force of this tension explicit: 'What God has cleansed, do not call common.' Here the verb shifts from actual defilement to the act of declaring something profane, a distinction with enormous implications for the inclusion of Gentiles in the early church.

1. to defile, make ritually unclean (11×) To defile or make ritually and morally unclean — the dominant active sense in Jesus' purity discourse. What enters the mouth does not defile (koinoi) a person, but what comes out of the heart does (Matt 15:11, 18, 20; Mark 7:15, 18, 20, 23). Spanish contaminar, French souiller, and German verunreinigen converge on pollution language. The teaching radically redefines defilement from external contact to internal moral corruption, overturning the oral-law tradition about handwashing. DEFILEMENT AND UNCLEANNESS

2. to declare profane, call common (2×) To declare profane or call common — treating as ritually unacceptable what God has in fact purified. In Peter's vision a heavenly voice commands: 'What God has cleansed, you must not call common' (Acts 10:15; 11:9). Spanish hacer comun and German fur gemein erklaren capture the declarative force. This is not about actual contamination but about the human judgment that labels something unclean — a crucial distinction that opened the door for Gentile inclusion in the apostolic church. DEFILEMENT AND UNCLEANNESS

en: make-common | es: hagas-común | fr: rendre-commun | de: verunreinigt Acts 10:15; Acts 11:9

3. to be defiled (passive) (1×) To be in a state of defilement (passive) — the resultant condition of having been made ritually impure. In Heb 9:13, the blood of goats and bulls and the ashes of a heifer sanctify 'those who have been defiled' (kekoinomenous) for the purification of the flesh. Spanish contaminados and French souilles use passive participles that mirror the Greek perfect passive, pointing to an existing state of impurity that requires cleansing. RITUAL DEFILEMENT

To share in, participate, contribute; to have fellowship or communion with another in something.

Koinoneo expresses the act of sharing, participating, or having fellowship with someone in something. It covers both the generous contribution of material resources — 'contributing to the needs of the saints' (Rom 12:13) — and deeper spiritual participation, whether in suffering, in the gospel partnership (Phil 4:15), or even in others' sins (1 Tim 5:22). The Spanish 'compartir' and German 'teilhaben' both capture the dual sense of giving a share and having a share, which is exactly the range this single Greek verb spans across its eight NT uses.

share in, participate, have fellowship (8×) To share in or participate in something with another person, encompassing both active contribution (giving a share of one's resources, as in Rom 12:13 and Gal 6:6) and receptive participation (taking part in blessings, sufferings, or even sins, as in 1 Tim 5:22 and Heb 2:14). German 'teilhaben' ('to have a part') and Spanish 'compartir' ('to share') together illuminate the two directional facets — receiving a portion and giving a portion — that koinoneo holds together in a single verb. SHARE PARTICIPATE FELLOWSHIP

κοινων-ία G2842 N-GFS (19×)

Fellowship, communion, sharing — participation in a common bond, whether spiritual union or material generosity.

Encompasses the deep mutual participation that defines Christian community. At its theological center stands the communion of Christ's body and blood (1 Cor 10:16), where Paul uses κοινωνία twice to describe believers' shared participation in the eucharistic cup and bread. Luke names it as one of four pillars of the early Jerusalem church alongside the apostles' teaching, breaking of bread, and prayer (Acts 2:42). The word stretches from vertical fellowship with God and his Son (1 John 1:3, 6–7) to the horizontal, material expression of that bond: Paul calls the Macedonian collection for Jerusalem's poor a κοινωνία (Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 8:4; 9:13). Spanish distinguishes 'comunión' from 'contribución,' capturing this dual spiritual-practical range. German 'Gemeinschaft' emphasizes the communal dimension.

fellowship, communion, sharing (19×) Shared participation and partnership in a spiritual or practical bond. Theologically central in Paul's eucharistic language — the cup is a κοινωνία of Christ's blood, the bread of his body (1 Cor 10:16). Named as a foundational practice of the early church (Acts 2:42). Extends to vertical fellowship with God and his Son (1 John 1:3, 6–7; 1 Cor 1:9) and to concrete material sharing such as the relief collection for Jerusalem (Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 8:4). Spanish splits the range between 'comunión' (spiritual fellowship) and 'contribución' (material sharing), while German 'Gemeinschaft' foregrounds the communal bond. FELLOWSHIP COMMUNION ready to share, generous with possessions

Paul uses this term in his instruction to the wealthy in 1 Timothy 6:18, urging them to be generous and willing to share their material blessings. The word carries the sense of partnership or fellowship applied to possessions—not merely charitable giving, but a readiness to include others in what one owns. Spanish and English glosses emphasize the disposition toward sharing, while German's 'mitteilsam' (communicative, open to sharing) captures the relational quality.

(1×) The adjective appears only in Paul's pastoral letter, describing wealthy believers who should be 'ready to share' their resources. The multilingual evidence consistently points to generosity and willingness to distribute possessions. The Greek root relates to 'koinonia' (fellowship, partnership), suggesting that true sharing creates community rather than mere one-way charity. SHARE PARTICIPATE FELLOWSHIP

κοινων-ός G2844 N-AMS (10×)

A sharer, partner, or companion; one who participates in a common reality or shares in a joint enterprise or relationship.

Describes someone bound to others through shared participation – whether in a spiritual reality, a business venture, or a common cause. Paul warns the Corinthians that eating idol-sacrifices makes them 'sharers' with demons (1 Cor 10:18-20), while Peter calls himself a fellow 'participant' in glory (1 Pet 5:1) and believers become 'partakers' of the divine nature (2 Pet 1:4). In its relational sense, James and John are fishing 'partners' with Simon (Luke 5:10), Paul commends Titus as his 'partner' in ministry (2 Cor 8:23), and Philemon is Paul's beloved 'companion' in faith (Phlm 1:17). Spanish distinguishes the two senses well: 'participante/partícipes' for shared spiritual realities versus 'compañero/compañeros' for personal partnership.

1. sharer, participant (5×) One who shares in or participates in a common reality, experience, or spiritual condition – emphasizing the thing shared rather than the personal relationship. Paul uses it powerfully in 1 Corinthians 10:18-20 to warn that sacrificial eating creates genuine participation: those at the altar are 'sharers' in the altar, and idol-feasters become 'sharers' with demons. Peter similarly calls himself a 'sharer' in coming glory (1 Pet 5:1), and 2 Peter 1:4 declares believers 'partakers' of the divine nature. Spanish 'participante' and French 'participant' foreground the experiential communion at stake. PARTNERSHIP AND SHARING

2. partner, companion (5×) A partner, companion, or associate in a shared enterprise or relationship – emphasizing the interpersonal bond rather than abstract participation. James and John are called fishing 'partners' with Simon (Luke 5:10), Paul commends Titus as his ministry 'partner' (2 Cor 8:23), and Philemon is addressed as a personal 'companion' in faith (Phlm 1:17). The Pharisees deny being 'partners' with their ancestors in murdering prophets (Matt 23:30). Bed; a place for sleeping or for sexual relations, including both marriage bed and illicit unions.

Primarily denotes a bed or sleeping place, but in the NT it extends from a literal bed where children are sleeping (Luke 11:7) to the marriage bed as a figure for sexual union (Rom 9:10; Heb 13:4) and even to sexual excess or debauchery (Rom 13:13). The range from Spanish cama (bed) to the phrase en-lechos (in beds of immorality) mirrors this breadth. The word's flexibility between innocent rest and intimate union gives it particular force in moral exhortation.

(4×) A bed or couch used for sleeping or resting, and by extension the marriage bed as a metonym for sexual relations. In Luke 11:7, it is a literal sleeping place shared with children. In Rom 9:10, Rebecca 'had a bed' (conceived) with Isaac—here koitē is a dignified euphemism for marital intercourse. Heb 13:4 declares the marriage koitē 'undefiled,' while Rom 13:13 uses the plural koitais for sexual promiscuity.

French lit and Spanish cama/lecho capture the literal sense; the euphemistic sexual extension is visible in the gloss en-lechos and the English derivative 'coitus.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE bed-chamber, private sleeping quarters

This term refers to the intimate, private space of a bedchamber or sleeping room. In Acts 12:20, Blastus holds the position 'over the king's bedchamber' (chamberlain), a role of significant trust and access in ancient royal courts. The word could also denote a burial chamber or grave in classical usage, but the New Testament occurrence clearly refers to the living quarters. French 'chambre' and Spanish 'dormitorio' straightforwardly identify the room's function.

(1×) Luke uses this word for the royal bedchamber in Herod's palace, where Blastus served as chamberlain—a position equivalent to the Latin 'cubicularius.' The office involved intimate access to the king's private quarters, making Blastus a valuable intermediary for the Tyrian delegation. κόκκ-ινος G2847 Adj-GNS (6×)
kokkinos – scarlet, crimson red; the color of dyed wool, royal garments, and luxurious fabrics Kokkinos is an adjective meaning 'scarlet' or 'crimson,' derived from kokkos, the kermes insect from which a vivid red dye was extracted in antiquity. In the New Testament it appears in contexts heavy with symbolic weight: the scarlet robe draped on Jesus during his mockery (Matt 27:28), the scarlet wool used in the tabernacle purification rite (Heb 9:19), and the scarlet-clad woman and scarlet beast of Revelation's apocalyptic visions (Rev 17:3-4; 18:12, 16). Spanish escarlata, French ecarlate, and German scharlachrot all point to the same deep-red hue, a color associated in the ancient world with royalty, wealth, and blood.

scarlet (6×) Scarlet or crimson in color, describing a vivid red hue produced from the kermes dye. In the NT this color appears laden with symbolism: the soldiers' mocking robe placed on Jesus (Matt 27:28) evokes false royalty, the scarlet wool of Heb 9:19 recalls the purification ritual with its overtones of blood and cleansing, and the scarlet garments and beast of Revelation (Rev 17:3-4; 18:12, 16) signify opulent decadence. Spanish escarlata and French ecarlate translate it uniformly, reflecting a single chromatic sense with no polysemy. RED AND SCARLET

A grain or seed; the small kernel of a plant, used literally of mustard and wheat and figuratively of faith's tiny beginnings.
In every NT occurrence, kokkos refers to a small seed or grain, most memorably the mustard seed in Jesus' parables of the kingdom (Matt 13:31, Mark 4:31, Luke 13:19). The image turns on the contrast between the seed's insignificance and the enormous plant it produces. Jesus extends the metaphor to faith itself: faith the size of a grain of mustard seed can uproot a tree (Luke 17:6) or move a mountain (Matt 17:20). Spanish 'grano' and German 'Korn' both capture the concrete, earthy quality of this word, which grounds some of the most beloved sayings in the Gospels.

a seed (7×) A small seed or kernel of a plant, the basic reproductive unit. All seven NT uses employ kokkos as the vehicle for agricultural parables and sayings about faith. In Matt 13:31 and Mark 4:31 it is a mustard seed illustrating the kingdom's growth from humble beginnings; in Matt 17:20 and Luke 17:6 it measures the astonishingly small quantity of genuine faith that can accomplish the impossible. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'grano,' French 'grain,' German 'Korn') uniformly point to the concrete, tangible seed rather than any metaphorical extension. GRAIN AND WHEAT

κολάζω G2849 V-ASM-3P (2×)
to punish, to correct, to discipline
This verb means to check, chastise, or punish, with connotations of corrective discipline rather than mere retribution. In Acts 4:21, the Sanhedrin finds no way to punish (κολάσωνται) Peter and John despite threats, due to the people's reaction. In 2 Peter 2:9, it describes the Lord's ability to keep the unrighteous under punishment (κολαζομένους) while reserving them for judgment. Classical usage distinguished κολάζω (corrective punishment) from τιμωρία (retributive vengeance), though this distinction may not always be sharp in the NT. The word emphasizes restraint and correction more than mere penalty.

(2×) Acts 4:21 describes authorities finding no way 'to punish them' (πῶς κολάσωνται αὐτούς) without causing public unrest. Second Peter 2:9 states the Lord knows how to keep the unrighteous 'being punished' (κολαζομένους) until judgment day. The multilingual evidence reflects both verbal and participial forms: Spanish 'castigar/siendo castigados,' English 'they might punish/being punished,' French and German similarly. The passive participle in 2 Peter emphasizes ongoing restraint under punishment. PUNISH PENALIZE flattery, insincere speech designed to manipulate

Paul emphatically denies using flattery in his ministry to the Thessalonians (1 Thessalonians 2:5), distinguishing genuine apostolic speech from manipulative rhetoric. Classical Greek literature extensively discusses flattery as a vice—fawning speech that seeks personal advantage rather than truth. The word conveys not just praise but the deceptive intent behind false words. Spanish 'adulación' and German 'Schmeichelei' both capture the negative, manipulative quality.

(1×) In Paul's self-defense regarding his motives, he contrasts true gospel proclamation with 'words of flattery'—speech calculated to please hearers for selfish gain. The classical background includes extensive philosophical critique of flatterers who undermine virtue. All language witnesses emphasize the deceitful, self-serving nature of such speech rather than honest communication. DECEIT AND TREACHERY

κόλ-ᾰσις G2851 N-AFS (2×)
punishment, correction, penalty
This noun (from κολάζω) refers to the punishment or penalty imposed as correction or retribution. Jesus uses it in Matthew 25:46 in the sheep-and-goats judgment: the unrighteous 'will go away into eternal punishment' (εἰς κόλασιν αἰώνιον), while the righteous enter eternal life. First John 4:18 states that 'fear has to do with punishment' (φόβος κόλασιν ἔχει), and perfect love casts out fear because the one who fears is not perfected in love. The term can emphasize either the corrective or the retributive aspect of punishment, with context determining emphasis.

(2×) Matthew 25:46 describes the wicked going into 'eternal punishment' (κόλασιν αἰώνιον) in contrast to eternal life. First John 4:18 says 'fear has punishment' (κόλασιν ἔχει) and the fearful one is not perfected in love. The multilingual glosses are consistent: English 'punishment,' Spanish 'castigo,' French 'châtiment,' German 'Strafe.' The Matthew passage has sparked debate about whether eternal κόλασις is corrective or retributive, though classical sources often distinguished it from mere vengeance (τιμωρία). LOCUSTS AND SWARMS

To strike with the fist, buffet, or beat; used both of physical assault and figurative torment.

Describes the specific action of punching or striking with a closed fist—a rougher, more degrading form of violence than a slap. It appears in the Passion narratives where Jesus is beaten by his captors (Matt 26:67; Mark 14:65), and Paul uses it of his own hardships as an apostle (1Cor 4:11). Most strikingly, Paul describes his 'thorn in the flesh' as a messenger of Satan sent to 'buffet' him (2Cor 12:7), extending the physical image into spiritual experience. Peter asks what credit there is in enduring a beating when you have sinned (1Pet 2:20). The Spanish 'dar puñetazos' (give punches) precisely captures the fist-blow sense.

(5×) To strike with the fist, to buffet or beat, literally or figuratively. The Gospel Passion accounts (Matt 26:67; Mark 14:65) use it of the guards striking Jesus after his trial—the Spanish 'lo-golpearon-con-puños' (they struck him with fists) specifies the bodily violence. Paul extends the image to apostolic suffering in 1Cor 4:11 and, most memorably, to his 'thorn in the flesh' in 2Cor 12:7, where a satanic agent 'buffets' him to keep him humble. 1Pet 2:20 asks about enduring such blows when one has actually done wrong. French 'frapper' and German 'schlagen' generalize to 'strike,' but the Greek root (from κόλαφος, fist) retains the specific image of a closed-fist blow. STRIKING AND REFERENCE

κολλ-άω G2853 V-FIP-3S (12×)

To glue, join, cling to; attach oneself to a person, cleave devotedly, be united in marriage, or stick physically.

Built on the Greek noun kolla ('glue'), this verb carries the core image of things being bonded together. In the New Testament it moves far beyond the literal workshop sense of gluing broken pottery. A prodigal son 'joins himself' to a citizen of a far country (Luke 15:15), Paul commands believers to 'cling to' what is good (Rom 12:9), and Jesus quotes Genesis to declare that a man shall 'be joined to' his wife (Matt 19:5). Even dust can kollaomai to sandals (Luke 10:11). The Spanish translations beautifully trace the semantic range: 'juntarse' for social association, 'adhiriéndoos' for moral devotion, 'se-unirá' for marital union, and 'pegado' for physical adhesion.

1. join oneself to someone (8×) To attach or associate oneself with a person or group, forming a social or relational bond. This is the most frequent New Testament use — the prodigal 'joined himself' (ekollēthē) to a citizen of the far country (Luke 15:15), and Saul tried to 'join himself' to the disciples in Jerusalem (Acts 9:26). Spanish 'juntarse' and German 'anhängen' both emphasize the relational attachment rather than any physical adhesive quality. CLINGING AND JOINING

2. cling to devotedly (1×) To cling devotedly to an abstract moral good. In Romans 12:9 Paul exhorts believers to be 'clinging to the good' (kollōmenoi tō agathō). Spanish 'adhiriéndoos' captures the intensity — this is not casual preference but tenacious, adhesive commitment. The metaphor of glue is preserved: moral goodness should stick to the believer as permanently as glue bonds surfaces. CLINGING AND JOINING

en: clinging | es: adhiriéndoos | fr: s'attacher | de: anhaengen Rom 12:9

3. be joined in marital union (1×) To be united in the bond of marriage, echoing the Genesis creation ordinance. In Matthew 19:5 (and its Markan parallel), Jesus quotes Genesis 2:24: a man shall 'be joined to' (kollēthēsetai) his wife. Spanish 'se-unirá' and French 's'attacher' both underscore the permanent, covenantal adhesion that marriage entails — the strongest form of human bonding the verb can express. CLINGING AND JOINING

en: will-be-joined | es: se-unirá | fr: s'attacher | de: hängt-an Matt 19:5

4. stick physically to (1×) To stick physically to a surface, as dust adhering to sandals. In Luke 10:11 the seventy-two are told to wipe off 'the dust having clung to' (kollēthenta) their feet. Spanish 'pegado' (stuck, glued) brings out the literal, tactile sense most clearly, connecting directly back to the verb's etymological root in kolla, physical glue. CLINGING AND JOINING

en: having-clung | es: pegado | fr: s'attacher | de: hängt-an Luke 10:11

5. pile up or accumulate (1×) To pile up or accumulate, used metaphorically of sins heaping together until they reach heaven. In Revelation 18:5, Babylon's sins 'were joined' (ekollēthēsan) all the way to heaven. Spanish 'se-han-amontonado' (have been piled up) reveals that this sense departs from interpersonal attachment toward the image of objects stacking and adhering to one another in an ever-growing mass. CLINGING AND JOINING

eye salve, medicinal ointment for eyes

In Revelation 3:18, Christ counsels the Laodicean church to obtain eye salve so they might truly see—a striking metaphor given Laodicea's fame for its medical school and eye treatments. The Greek diminutive form refers to a small roll or cake of medicinal compound, shaped like a bread roll. Ancient eye salves were precious commodities, mixed from various minerals and herbs. The irony is sharp: a church surrounded by physical eye medicine needs spiritual sight.

(1×) John's apocalyptic vision employs this medical term metaphorically for spiritual insight. The historical context matters: Laodicea was renowned for its Phrygian eye powder. Spanish 'colirio' and German 'Augensalbe' both preserve the specific medical application. The Risen Christ's prescription calls the spiritually blind church to seek healing beyond what their famous physicians could provide. DISEASE AND AFFLICTION money-changer; one who exchanges currency and changes large coins into smaller denominations

In the temple precincts, money-changers provided an essential service: exchanging various currencies into the Tyrian silver required for the temple tax and converting large coins into smaller denominations suitable for purchasing sacrificial animals. However, this legitimate function had become corrupted, with money-changers apparently charging excessive rates and turning the Court of the Gentiles into a marketplace rather than a house of prayer. Jesus' dramatic action of overturning the money-changers' tables (Matthew 21:12, Mark 11:15, John 2:15) challenged both the economic exploitation and the displacement of Gentile worship space.

(3×) A money-changer, one who exchanges currency for a fee. All three Gospel occurrences describe Jesus overturning the tables of the money-changers in the temple (Matthew 21:12, Mark 11:15, John 2:15). While money-changing served a legitimate purpose—pilgrims needed Tyrian currency for the temple tax—the practice had apparently become exploitative, and more importantly, had transformed the Court of the Gentiles into a commercial zone rather than a house of prayer for all nations. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12789 WITH 3 SENSES

To cut short, shorten; to curtail or reduce the duration of a period of time.

Means to cut short, dock, or curtail. Originally used of physical mutilation or trimming, in the NT it appears exclusively in the eschatological context of God shortening the days of tribulation for the sake of the elect (Matt 24:22; Mark 13:20). Each passage uses the word twice—once to state that the days 'were shortened' and once to affirm that the Lord 'shortened' them—emphasizing divine sovereign intervention. Spanish acortó and French raccourcir both highlight the temporal-reduction sense.

(4×) To shorten or curtail, specifically the duration of a period of time. All four NT occurrences appear in the Olivet Discourse (Matt 24:22 twice; Mark 13:20 twice), where Jesus declares that God has cut short the days of great tribulation so that the elect might survive. The classical sense of physical docking or mutilation is absent; the NT usage is entirely temporal. Spanish acortó (shortened), French raccourcir (to make shorter), and German verkürzen equivalents all confirm the meaning of reducing duration rather than physical size. SHORTEN CUT SHORT

Colossae, city in Phrygia where Paul's letter was addressed

This Phrygian city in the Lycus valley received one of Paul's prison epistles. Though once prominent, by the first century Colossae was overshadowed by nearby Laodicea and Hierapolis. The church there apparently began through Epaphras rather than Paul's direct ministry. The city's name appears only in the letter's address (Colossians 1:2). Archaeological evidence remains limited, as the site was never extensively excavated.

(1×) The dative plural form addresses 'the saints and faithful brothers in Christ at Colossae.' Paul writes to a congregation he had not personally visited, combating an early Christological heresy. The multilingual witnesses preserve the Greek name with slight variations reflecting each language's phonetic conventions. The city's subsequent decline and destruction mean Christian tradition focuses on the letter rather than the location. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Κολασσαεύς G2858

Colossian; a resident or native of Colossae (variant spelling: Κολασσαεύς/Κολοσσαεύς)

An adjective or noun identifying someone from Colossae, the Phrygian city to which Paul wrote his letter to the Colossians. Manuscript traditions show spelling variation between Κολασσαεύς and Κολοσσαεύς, reflecting uncertainty about the city name's precise form (Colossae or Colossae). The term appears in the epistle's title and subscription in certain textual witnesses. Colossae lay in the Lycus valley alongside Laodicea and Hierapolis, forming a triangle of early Christian communities facing syncretistic challenges addressed in Paul's letter.

κόλπος G2859 N-DMP (6×)

Bosom, lap, chest; by extension a bay or inlet — any curved fold that enfolds or shelters.

Rooted in the image of a fold or curve, kolpos in its primary NT usage refers to the bosom, lap, or chest as a place of intimate closeness and protective embrace. Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:22-23) became a powerful Jewish image for the place of the righteous dead — a warm shelter after life's journey. John leans on Jesus' bosom at the Last Supper (John 13:23), and the Son himself exists 'in the bosom of the Father' (John 1:18), expressing the deepest possible intimacy. Spanish distinguishes 'seno' (bosom), 'regazo' (lap), and 'pecho' (chest), revealing the word's physical versatility. In Acts 27:39 the same root metaphor — a curved fold — shifts to geography: a bay or inlet in the coastline.

1. bosom, lap, chest (5×) The front of the upper body — bosom, lap, or chest — understood as a place of intimate closeness, comfort, and sheltering love. 'Abraham's bosom' (Luke 16:22-23) evokes rest in the patriarch's protective embrace; the Son being 'in the bosom of the Father' (John 1:18) expresses unique divine intimacy. Spanish 'seno,' 'regazo,' and 'pecho' together capture the semantic breadth — from the nursing mother's breast to the reclining friend's chest at table (John 13:23) to the generous lap that receives a good measure 'pressed down and running over' (Luke 6:38). GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. bay, inlet (1×) A bay or inlet — a curved indentation of a coastline forming a sheltered body of water. In Acts 27:39 the sailors spot 'a certain bay with a beach' where they hope to run the ship aground. This geographic sense is a natural metaphorical extension: just as the bosom is a fold of the body that encloses and shelters, so a bay is a fold of the coastline. Spanish 'bahía' makes the semantic leap explicit, while French 'sein' preserves the bodily metaphor even in the geographic register. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to swim

Luke narrates Paul's shipwreck with precise nautical detail, including the centurion's order that 'those able to swim' should jump overboard first and make for land (Acts 27:43). The verb appears in classical Greek for swimming, diving, or plunging into water. In the dramatic context of the Maltese shipwreck, the ability to swim becomes a matter of survival. The verb's range includes both skilled swimming and desperate floundering in water.

(1×) In the climactic scene of Acts 27, swimming ability divides the 276 passengers into those who could save themselves immediately and those who needed planks and debris. The classical usage encompasses diving and plunging as well as swimming proper. All language witnesses render this straightforwardly as the physical act of swimming, with no metaphorical extension in this context. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 13540 WITH 3 SENSES

Pool, reservoir; a public basin or cistern fed by a water source.

Denotes a swimming pool or reservoir—a constructed or natural basin for holding water. All NT occurrences refer to specific, named pools in Jerusalem: the pool of Bethesda (John 5:2, 4, 7) and the pool of Siloam (John 9:7). These were not decorative features but vital public water installations in an arid city. Spanish estanque/piscina and French piscine both descend from the same conceptual world of communal bathing and water storage, while German Teich (pond) leans toward the natural-water sense.

(4×) A pool, reservoir, or public water basin, typically a constructed installation for bathing or water collection. In John 5:2, 4, 7, it identifies the pool at Bethesda where the sick gathered hoping for healing; in John 9:7, Jesus sends the blind man to wash in the pool of Siloam. Archaeological excavations have confirmed both pools as substantial stone-cut reservoirs. Spanish piscina and French piscine preserve the bathing-pool connotation, while estanque and German Teich evoke a broader water-holding basin. The word's classical sense of 'place for diving' (from kolymbaō, to swim) is still visible in its etymology. POOL POND MARSH colony, Roman settlement with special legal status

Luke identifies Philippi as 'a leading city of the district of Macedonia and a Roman colony' (Acts 16:12). The Latin loanword 'colonia' designated cities granted special privileges, often settled by retired Roman soldiers who retained citizenship rights. These colonies replicated Roman civic life in provincial settings. Philippi received this status after the battle in 42 BC. The designation explains the city's strong Roman character and the officials' concern about Roman citizenship in the narrative.

(1×) Luke's careful geographical and political notation marks Philippi's Roman colonial status, which shaped the urban culture Paul encountered. As a colony, Philippi enjoyed immunity from certain taxes and self-governance under Roman law. The multilingual glosses transliterate or directly translate the Latin technical term. This status becomes crucial when Paul invokes his own Roman citizenship in Acts 16:37. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to let one's hair grow long, to wear long hair

This verb means to let one's hair grow long or to wear long hair. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 11:14-15 in his discussion of head coverings and gender distinctions in worship: 'Does not nature itself teach you that if a man wears long hair (κομᾷ) it is a disgrace for him, but if a woman wears long hair (κομᾷ), it is her glory?' The verb describes an ongoing state or practice rather than a single act. Classical usage could also metaphorically mean to 'give oneself airs' or 'plume oneself,' but Paul's usage is literal, addressing hairstyle and cultural gender markers.

(2×) Both occurrences are in 1 Cor 11:14-15, contrasting long hair on men versus women. Verse 14: 'if a man wears long hair (κομᾷ)' it's shameful. Verse 15: 'if a woman wears long hair (κομᾷ)' it's glorious. The multilingual glosses navigate the gender ambiguity: English 'he/she wears long hair,' Spanish 'tenga cabello largo,' German 'langes Haar tragen.' The verb is the same in both verses; context alone determines whether the subject is male or female. CLOTHING AND DRESS long hair, a woman's glory (1 Cor 11:15)

Paul's complex argument about head coverings in worship appeals to 'long hair' as a woman's natural glory and covering (1 Corinthians 11:15). The Greek term refers specifically to the hair of the head when worn long, a practice associated with feminine beauty in both Greek and Jewish culture. Classical usage includes references to elaborate hairstyles and the contrast between long and shorn hair. Paul draws on both nature and cultural convention in his reasoning.

(1×) In Paul's argument about gender distinctions in worship, long hair serves as a divinely given covering for women, contrasting with the shame of having the head shaved. The classical background includes associations with beauty, youth, and proper feminine appearance. Spanish 'cabellera' and French 'chevelure' emphasize the fullness and length. To receive what is due (a reward, promise, or recompense); also to bring or carry something to a person or place.

Rooted in the idea of caring for or providing, komizo in the New Testament mostly appears in the middle voice meaning to receive back or obtain something owed — a wage, a promise, a recompense for deeds done in the body (2 Cor 5:10). Spanish translations like 'obteniendo' and 'habría-recibido' capture this transactional flavor well. In one striking exception (Luke 7:37), the active voice surfaces: the sinful woman 'having brought' an alabaster flask of ointment. The shift from receiving to physically carrying reveals the word's older classical sense of conveying or escorting, still alive beneath the dominant NT usage.

1. receive, obtain (9×) Receiving something that is owed or promised — a reward, a recompense, or a fulfilled pledge. The middle voice emphasizes getting back what belongs to one. Paul uses it in 2 Cor 5:10 and Col 3:25 for the final settlement of accounts before Christ, while Heb 10:36 links it to the endurance needed to 'receive the promise.' The Spanish 'obteniendo' and German 'empfangen' both highlight the acquisitive dimension. In Matt 25:27 the master expects to receive his money back with interest — the financial register is unmistakable. RECEIVING AND TAKING

2. bring, carry (1×) Physically bringing or carrying something to a person or place — the older active-voice sense inherited from classical usage. In Luke 7:37 the woman 'having brought' (komisasa) an alabaster flask conveys actual transport of an object. Spanish 'trayendo' ('bringing') preserves this active, physical nuance clearly, in contrast to the passive-receptive sense that dominates elsewhere in the NT. RECEIVING AND TAKING better, in a comparative sense of improvement

When the nobleman asks at what hour his son began to recover (John 4:52), the servants report 'yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him.' The adverb in their response literally means 'he got better' or 'he improved.' The classical root relates to elegance and refinement. Here it functions as a simple comparative: the son's condition improved, the fever broke. The dramatic irony is that this improvement coincided exactly with Jesus' word of healing.

(1×) John's careful chronological precision links Jesus' authoritative word ('your son lives') with the observable medical improvement. The servants use this adverb to describe the turning point when the crisis passed. While classical Greek connects this word to elegance and style, the New Testament usage is straightforward medical improvement. All language witnesses render it comparatively: better, improved, recovering. MORAL GOODNESS to whitewash, to plaster with lime

This verb means to coat or plaster with lime (κονία), producing a white surface. Jesus uses it in Matthew 23:27 to denounce the scribes and Pharisees: 'You are like whitewashed tombs (τάφοις κεκονιαμένοις), which outwardly appear beautiful but within are full of dead people's bones.' In Acts 23:3, Paul angrily tells the high priest 'God is going to strike you, you whitewashed wall (τοῖχε κεκονιαμένε)!'—rebuking hypocritical judgment. Both uses are metaphorical, depicting a beautiful exterior hiding corruption or hypocrisy within. The perfect passive participle in both cases emphasizes the completed state of being whitewashed.

(2×) Matthew 23:27 uses the perfect passive participle: 'whitewashed tombs' (τάφοις κεκονιαμένοις) that are beautiful outside but full of death inside. Acts 23:3 has Paul's rebuke: 'whitewashed wall' (τοῖχε κεκονιαμένε) against the high priest's unjust command. Dust stirred up from the ground; a cloud of fine particles raised by movement or wind.

Refers specifically to dust that has been raised or kicked up—not settled dust but an airborne cloud of fine particles. In the Gospels and Acts, shaking dust off one's feet is a symbolic act of separation and judgment when a town rejects the message (Matt 10:14; Luke 9:5; 10:11). Paul and Barnabas perform this gesture at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:51). In Acts 22:23, an angry mob throws dust into the air as a sign of outrage. Every translation captures the same concrete image—Spanish 'polvo,' French 'poussiere'—but the Greek compound (from κόνις 'dust' and ὄρνυμι 'to stir up') emphasizes the dynamic, unsettled quality of the particles.

(5×) Dust that has been stirred up or raised from the ground, forming a visible cloud. The compound etymology (κόνις + ὄρνυμι, 'dust' + 'stir up') points to dust in motion rather than settled sediment. All five NT occurrences involve symbolic gestures: shaking off dust from one's feet as a testimony against those who reject the gospel (Matt 10:14; Luke 9:5; Luke 10:11; Acts 13:51), or throwing dust into the air as an expression of fury (Acts 22:23). Spanish 'polvo,' French 'poussiere,' and German translations all render it simply as 'dust,' but the ritual significance in each context—judgment, separation, outrage—gives the word a performative force beyond its material meaning. DUST AND POWDER to cease, abate; to stop or grow calm, especially of wind or storms

This word describes the cessation or abating of natural phenomena, particularly wind and storms. The Gospels use it exclusively for the calming of storms when Jesus commands the wind and waves. In Matthew 14:32, the wind ceased when Jesus and Peter got into the boat. Mark 4:39 and 6:51 similarly describe the wind ceasing—the first after Jesus rebuked the storm with 'Peace! Be still!' and the second when he entered the boat during his walk on water. The immediate cessation demonstrates Jesus' authority over creation's chaotic forces.

lamentation, loud mourning for the dead

Luke describes the scene at Stephen's burial: 'Devout men buried Stephen and made great lamentation over him' (Acts 8:2). The term denotes the loud, ritualized mourning customary in ancient Mediterranean funerals—not quiet grief but public, vocal expression of loss. Classical usage links it to beating the breast and formal funeral laments. The word appears in contexts of death and communal grief, expressing both personal sorrow and social ritual.

(1×) The early church's mourning for Stephen involves traditional funeral practices despite the violent circumstances of his death. The 'great lamentation' signals both genuine grief and proper honor for the first martyr. All language witnesses point to formal, vocal mourning rather than silent sorrow. The classical background includes professional mourners and ritualized gestures of grief. LAMENTATION AND MOURNING

slaughter, violent defeat in battle

Hebrews 7:1 refers to Abraham 'returning from the slaughter of the kings'—the Genesis 14 narrative where Abraham defeated the coalition that had captured Lot. The Greek term emphasizes the cutting down of enemies in battle, violent defeat rather than sacrificial killing. Classical usage includes the broader sense of cutting or striking, but in contexts of warfare it means decisive defeat. The word underscores the military victory that preceded Melchizedek's blessing.

(1×) The author of Hebrews recalls Abraham's military triumph over the kings, setting the stage for the mysterious encounter with Melchizedek. The term emphasizes violent defeat—the four kings and their armies were decisively routed. Spanish 'derrota' and German 'Niederlage' (both meaning defeat) capture the outcome rather than just the bloodshed. This victory establishes Abraham's kingly authority, making his later payment of tithes to Melchizedek all the more significant. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 4977 WITH 3 SENSES

To labor hard or grow weary; strenuous toil in work or ministry, and the resulting exhaustion from exertion.

Spanning both the effort and its toll, this verb captures hard work and the weariness it produces. Spanish splits the senses clearly: trabajar (to work/toil) versus cansado and fatigado (tired, fatigued), confirming the two-sense structure. Nineteen occurrences describe active labor — from the lilies that 'toil not' (Matt 6:28) to apostolic ministry (John 4:38; 1 Cor 15:10). Four occurrences emphasize the resulting exhaustion, as when Jesus sat down weary from his journey (John 4:6) and his invitation to all who 'labor and are heavy laden' (Matt 11:28).

1. to labor or toil (19×) To work hard, exert strenuous effort in physical or ministerial labor. Spanish trabajar and habiendo trabajado mark active toil, while French travailler and German muehen confirm productive exertion. The lilies that 'toil not' (Matt 6:28; Luke 12:27) and Paul's description of apostolic labor (John 4:38; 1 Cor 15:10) anchor this dominant sense across nineteen occurrences. WORK AND LABOR

2. to grow weary or fatigued (4×) To grow weary, become exhausted or fatigued from sustained effort. Spanish cansado (tired) and me he fatigado (I have grown weary) distinguish this from mere toil. Jesus weary from his journey at Jacob's well (John 4:6) and the great invitation to all who 'labor and are heavy laden' (Matt 11:28) exemplify this sense across four occurrences. WORK AND LABOR

Labor, toil, or hard work; also trouble or annoyance caused to someone, often in the idiom 'to cause trouble.'

Kopos captures the wearying, sweat-soaked side of effort. In its primary NT sense, it denotes strenuous labor and productive toil, whether in agriculture, ministry, or apostolic service. Paul uses it repeatedly to validate his own tireless work for the gospel (1 Cor 15:58; 2 Cor 6:5; 10:15; 11:23, 27; 1 Thess 1:3). A secondary sense appears in the idiom kopous parechein, 'to cause trouble,' where the focus shifts from productive exertion to unwelcome burden. Jesus uses this phrase to defend the woman who anointed him (Matt 26:10; Mark 14:6), and the persistent widow wears down the unjust judge by the trouble she causes (Luke 18:5).

1. labor, toil, hard work (13×) Strenuous physical or mental exertion, productive toil and effort expended in work or ministry. Spanish 'trabajo/trabajos' and French 'travail' both derive from Latin words for toil and suffering, preserving kopos's connotation that meaningful work costs something. Paul speaks of the 'labor' of others into which the disciples enter (John 4:38), insists that labor 'in the Lord' is never in vain (1 Cor 15:58), and catalogs his own toils alongside hunger, sleeplessness, and danger (2 Cor 6:5; 11:23, 27).

The word always implies exertion that takes a toll on the worker. LABOR AND TOIL

2. trouble, annoyance, bother (5×) Trouble, annoyance, or bother caused to someone, typically appearing in the fixed phrase kopous parechein ('to cause/give trouble'). Spanish 'molestia/molestias' sharply distinguishes this sense from productive labor, pointing to unwanted disruption rather than constructive effort. When the disciples grumble about the woman's costly ointment, Jesus replies, 'Why do you cause her trouble?' (Matt 26:10; Mark 14:6). The friend roused at midnight protests the bother (Luke 11:7), and the widow's relentless troubling finally overcomes the unjust judge (Luke 18:5). Paul's closing 'let no one cause me trouble' (Gal 6:17) uses the word as a summary dismissal of opposition. LABOR AND TOIL

a manure pile, dunghill; also manure itself

This noun refers either to a heap of manure or dung (a dunghill) or to manure used for fertilizing. Luke 13:8 uses it in the parable of the barren fig tree: the gardener asks to leave it one more year, 'and I will dig around it and put manure (κοπρίαν) on it.' Luke 14:35 uses it in Jesus' saying about salt losing its saltiness: it's fit neither for soil nor for the manure pile (κοπρίαν). The word can refer to refuse heaps in general (where foundlings might be abandoned, per classical usage) or specifically to agricultural fertilizer. Jesus' usage is agricultural and practical.

(2×) Luke 13:8 describes the gardener's plan: dig around the fig tree and put 'manure' (κοπρίαν) on it. Luke 14:35 says tasteless salt is worthless, fit for neither land nor 'manure pile' (κοπρίαν). The multilingual glosses capture both senses: Spanish 'estiércol' (manure/fertilizer), English distinguishes 'manure/manure pile,' German offers both 'κοπρίαν' and 'κόπρια.' The word emphasizes both the fertilizer itself and the heap where it's stored or where refuse is thrown. ASH HEAP REFUSE

κόπτω G2875 V-IIA-3P (8×)

To cut, strike; in the middle voice, to mourn by beating the breast in lamentation

The verb κόπτω has a long history in Greek going back to Homer, where it meant to strike or smite. In the New Testament it splits cleanly into two uses: a physical sense of cutting branches (Matt 21:8, Mark 11:8) and a mourning ritual where people beat their breasts in grief. The mourning sense — used in the middle voice — reflects a well-known ancient Near Eastern custom of self-striking as an outward expression of sorrow. Jesus invokes it in Matt 24:30 when all the tribes of the earth 'will mourn,' and Rev 1:7 echoes the same eschatological lamentation.

1. mourn, beat the breast, lament (6×) To mourn, lament, or beat the breast in grief — the middle-voice mourning sense that dominates NT usage (6 of 8 occurrences). This reflects the ancient practice of striking oneself as an expression of sorrow, attested throughout the Mediterranean world. In Luke 8:52 the crowd was 'mourning' for Jairus's daughter, and in Luke 23:27 women followed Jesus 'mourning' on the way to Golgotha. The eschatological uses in Matt 24:30 and Rev 1:7 depict universal lamentation at the coming of the Son of Man. Spanish distinguishes this sense with 'se lamentaban' and 'se golpeaban' (they were striking themselves), while German uses 'beklagt' and 'trauern' — all grief vocabulary rather than cutting vocabulary. 2. cut (branches/vegetation) (2×) To cut, chop, or hack — the active-voice physical sense of severing branches or foliage. Only two NT occurrences preserve this original meaning: Matt 21:8 and Mark 11:8, where crowds 'were cutting' branches from the trees to spread before Jesus during the triumphal entry. The multilingual evidence makes the distinction unmistakable: Spanish shifts from 'se lamentaban' (mourning) to 'cortaban' and 'habiendo cortado' (cutting), and English from 'mourning' to 'cutting/were cutting.' This physical sense is the etymological root of the word, from which the mourning metaphor of self-striking developed. MOURNING AND LAMENTING

raven, black carrion bird

Jesus points to the ravens as exemplars of divine provision: 'Consider the ravens—they neither sow nor reap, yet God feeds them' (Luke 12:24). These birds, ceremonially unclean in Levitical law, become object lessons in trust. Classical Greek includes ravens in proverbial expressions and weather omens. The choice of ravens (rather than sparrows, as in Matthew's parallel) may reflect their reputation as scavengers dependent on providence rather than human agriculture. God's care extends even to unclean birds.

(1×) Luke's version of Jesus' teaching on anxiety features ravens as examples of creatures that receive divine provision without agricultural labor. The selection is striking: ravens appear in the Old Testament as both Elijah's miraculous providers and symbols of desolation. All language witnesses identify the specific bird—large, black, carrion-eating corvids. Jesus' logic moves from lesser to greater: if God feeds despised scavengers, how much more will he care for his children? LIVING CREATURES

A young girl, maiden; a diminutive term for a female child or adolescent.

Korasion is a diminutive of kore ('girl, maiden') and refers to a young girl or female child. In the Gospels it appears exclusively in two narrative contexts: the raising of Jairus's daughter, where Jesus addresses the dead girl tenderly (Matt 9:24-25; Mark 5:41-42), and the story of Herodias's daughter dancing before Herod (Matt 14:11; Mark 6:22, 28). The German 'Maedchen' is itself a diminutive (from 'Magd'), making it an especially apt equivalent that preserves the affectionate or informal register of the Greek original.

girl (8×) A young girl or maiden, used as a familiar, slightly diminutive term for a female child or adolescent. All NT occurrences appear in Mark and Matthew: the daughter of Jairus whom Jesus raises from the dead (Matt 9:24-25; Mark 5:41-42) and the daughter of Herodias who dances before Herod (Matt 14:11; Mark 6:22). The German equivalent 'Maedchen' — itself a diminutive from 'Magd' — mirrors the Greek diminutive formation from kore, preserving the affectionate or colloquial register. GIRL YOUNG WOMAN

corban (Hebrew: an offering devoted to God); the temple treasury

This is a transliteration of the Hebrew qorbān (קָרְבָּן), meaning 'that which is brought near' or an offering dedicated to God. In Mark 7:11, Jesus criticizes the Pharisees for allowing someone to declare property 'Corban' (that is, devoted to God) as a way of avoiding the obligation to support one's parents—the gift dedicated to the temple took precedence over the Fifth Commandment. Matthew 27:6 uses the related term κορβανᾶς for the temple treasury where the chief priests deposited Judas's returned blood money, refusing to put it in the sacred treasury. The term represents both the vow of dedication and the physical treasury.

(2×) Mark 7:11 quotes the practice: saying to parents 'whatever you might have benefited from me is Corban (Κορβᾶν), that is, a gift to God.' Matthew 27:6 describes putting Judas's silver into 'the treasury' (κορβανᾶν). The multilingual glosses show transliteration: English 'Korban/treasury,' Spanish 'Korbân/tesoro del templo,' French 'Corban,' German 'Korban/κορβανᾶν.' Mark's passage makes clear it's a Hebrew term requiring explanation, while Matthew uses the related word for the physical treasury collection box. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Korah, Israelite rebel against Moses (Numbers 16)

Jude warns that false teachers have 'perished in Korah's rebellion' (Jude 11), referencing the Numbers 16 account of Levitical insurrection. Korah led a revolt against Moses and Aaron's authority, claiming that all Israel was equally holy. God's judgment was dramatic: the earth opened and swallowed the rebels. Jude sees a pattern—challenging divinely appointed leadership leads to destruction. The name itself becomes shorthand for presumptuous rebellion against God's order.

(1×) Jude's triple condemnation ('Cain's way... Balaam's error... Korah's rebellion') places false teachers in the worst biblical company. Korah's story warns against rejecting legitimate spiritual authority. The multilingual witnesses transliterate the Hebrew name with slight variations. Jude's point is typological: the earth swallowed Korah; destruction awaits modern rebels. The genitive form emphasizes possession—this is Korah's distinctive rebellion, his legacy. KORAH KORAHITE NAME to be satisfied, sated, filled (especially with food)

This verb means to be filled, satisfied, or sated, usually in reference to food and eating. In Acts 27:38, after Paul's shipwrecked companions 'had eaten enough' (κορεσθέντες), they lightened the ship by throwing wheat overboard. In 1 Corinthians 4:8, Paul uses it sarcastically: 'Already you have become satisfied (κεκορεσμένοι)! Already you have become rich!'—rebuking the Corinthians' presumption of having 'arrived' spiritually. The verb can apply to physical satiation (Acts) or metaphorically to spiritual self-satisfaction (1 Cor). The perfect passive participle emphasizes the completed state of being filled or satisfied.

(2×) Acts 27:38 describes the crew 'having been satisfied' (κορεσθέντες τροφῆς) with food before lightening the ship. First Corinthians 4:8 has Paul's ironic rebuke: 'already you are satisfied' (ἤδη κεκορεσμένοι ἐστέ). The multilingual glosses reflect participial forms: English 'having been satisfied,' Spanish 'habiendo quedado satisfechos/saciados,' German 'gesättigt,' French 'nourrir.' Corinthians, inhabitants or natives of Corinth

This adjective (used substantively) refers to the people of Corinth, the major commercial city in Achaia. In Acts 18:8, many of the Corinthians (Κορινθίων) hearing Paul believed and were baptized, including Crispus the synagogue ruler. In 2 Corinthians 6:11, Paul addresses his readers directly: 'Our mouth is open to you, Corinthians (Κορίνθιοι); our heart is wide.' The term simply designates ethnic or civic identity—those from or living in Corinth. Given Corinth's reputation for immorality and commercialism, being 'Corinthian' carried cultural connotations, but the word itself is a neutral ethnic designation.

(2×) Acts 18:8 describes 'many of the Corinthians' (πολλοὶ τῶν Κορινθίων) believing and being baptized during Paul's initial mission. Second Corinthians 6:11 has Paul's direct address: 'Corinthians' (Κορίνθιοι), our heart is wide open to you. The multilingual glosses are simple ethnic designations: English 'Corinthians/Korinthioi,' Spanish 'Korinthioi/corintios,' French 'Corinthien,' German 'Korinther/Κορινθίων.' The vocative in 2 Cor is unusual, marking emotional directness in Paul's appeal. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Korinthos – Corinth, the wealthy Greek commercial city on the isthmus, site of a major Pauline church

Korinthos is the proper name of the ancient Greek city of Corinth, strategically situated on the narrow isthmus linking the Peloponnese to mainland Greece. Renowned in antiquity for its commerce, wealth, and moral permissiveness, it became the site of one of the apostle Paul's most significant and tumultuous church plants. Paul arrived there from Athens (Acts 18:1), stayed eighteen months, and later wrote at least two major epistles to the Corinthian congregation (1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1). The name passes unchanged across languages – Spanish Corinto, French Corinthe, German Korinth – as proper nouns do.

Korinthos (6×) The proper name of the city of Corinth, the prosperous Greek commercial center on the isthmus, where Paul established a church during his second missionary journey (Acts 18:1). Its six NT occurrences cluster around the narrative of Paul's ministry and his correspondence with the Corinthian believers (1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1, 23; 2 Tim 4:20). Cornelius; a Roman centurion at Caesarea, the first named Gentile convert in Acts.

The proper name of a Roman centurion stationed at Caesarea, described as devout, God-fearing, generous in alms, and constant in prayer (Acts 10:1-2). Cornelius holds a pivotal place in the narrative of Acts as the first explicitly named Gentile to receive the Holy Spirit and be baptized, an event that profoundly shaped the early church's understanding of the gospel's universal scope. His story in Acts 10-11 bridges the Jewish and Gentile missions. The name is Latin in origin (Cornelius), preserved with minimal adaptation across languages: French 'Corneille', German 'Cornelius', Spanish 'Kornelios'.

(9×) Cornelius — a Roman centurion of the Italian Cohort based in Caesarea, the paradigmatic Gentile convert in Acts. Luke portrays him as devout and God-fearing before his encounter with Peter (Acts 10:1-2, 22). The angelic vision directing him to send for Peter (Acts 10:3-8), Peter's own rooftop vision (10:9-16), and the dramatic descent of the Holy Spirit on Cornelius's household (10:44-48) together form the hinge narrative that opened the church to the Gentile world. His story is recounted again in Acts 11:1-18 and referenced at the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:7-9). kor, Hebrew dry measure (about 10-12 bushels)

In the parable of the shrewd manager, one debtor owes 'a hundred measures of wheat' (Luke 16:7). The term is a Hebrew loanword for a large dry measure, the kor, equivalent to about 10-12 bushels or roughly 370 liters. This represents a substantial agricultural debt—the produce of multiple acres. The manager's reduction of the debt by twenty measures would be significant, though less dramatic than the fifty-percent reduction of the oil debt. Ancient commerce required these standardized measures.

(1×) Jesus' parable employs realistic commercial details including this substantial unit of grain measurement. A hundred kors of wheat represented enormous value—the harvest of significant acreage. The multilingual witnesses transliterate the Semitic loanword or use generic 'measures.' The manager's twenty-kor reduction (from 100 to 80) would still represent considerable debt forgiveness, securing the debtor's goodwill. COR DRY MEASURE

To adorn, beautify, or decorate; also to put in order, arrange, or make ready.

From the same root as kosmos ('order, world'), kosmeo carries a double meaning that reflects how the Greeks saw beauty as inseparable from good arrangement. Seven of its ten NT occurrences describe adorning — whether tombs of the prophets (Matt 23:29), the temple with beautiful stones (Luke 21:5), or the quiet adornment of a godly woman's character (1 Pet 3:5). Yet in three passages it means simply to put in order: the foolish virgins 'trimmed' their lamps (Matt 25:7), and a swept house is 'put in order' (Matt 12:44, Luke 11:25). German 'schmuecken' catches the ornamental sense, while Spanish 'arreglaron' points to the practical, preparatory meaning.

1. adorn, decorate (7×) Adorning, beautifying, or embellishing — making something or someone attractive through decoration or ornament. The Pharisees 'adorn' the tombs of the prophets (Matt 23:29); the temple is 'adorned' with noble stones (Luke 21:5). Paul counsels women to adorn themselves with modesty (1 Tim 2:9), and Titus 2:10 urges slaves to 'adorn' the doctrine of God. Peter recalls how holy women of old 'adorned' themselves with a gentle spirit (1 Pet 3:5). Spanish 'adornada' and French 'orner' consistently render this sense of deliberate beautification. ADORN DECORATE PREPARE

In Matt 25:7 the virgins 'trimmed' (ekosmēsan) their lamp wicks, a practical act of maintenance. In Matt 12:44 and Luke 11:25 the swept house is 'put in order' (kekosmēmenon), describing domestic tidiness rather than ornament. Spanish 'arreglaron' ('they arranged') captures this utilitarian register clearly, distinguishing it from mere decoration. ADORN DECORATE PREPARE worldly, earthly, belonging to this present world (not eternal or heavenly)

This adjective (from κόσμος, 'world') describes what pertains to the world or universe, and in NT usage specifically what is earthly, temporal, or secular as opposed to heavenly or eternal. Titus 2:12 speaks of renouncing 'worldly passions' (κοσμικὰς ἐπιθυμίας)—desires oriented toward this present age. Hebrews 9:1 refers to the 'earthly sanctuary' (σκηνὴ κοσμική, or possibly 'worldly regulations') of the old covenant. The term isn't necessarily negative in itself—it simply denotes what belongs to the created, temporal order—but it often contrasts with what is spiritual, eternal, or heavenly.

(2×) Titus 2:12 teaches that grace trains us to renounce 'worldly passions' (κοσμικὰς ἐπιθυμίας) and live godly lives. Hebrews 9:1 describes the first covenant as having 'an earthly sanctuary' (σκηνὴ κοσμική) or earthly regulations. The multilingual glosses distinguish earthly from eternal: Spanish 'mundanos/terrenal,' English 'earthly/worldly,' German 'weltlich.' The word emphasizes the this-worldly, temporal nature of desires (Titus) or the old covenant sanctuary (Hebrews) in contrast to heavenly or eternal realities. EARTHLY TERRESTRIAL orderly, modest, respectable, well-behaved

This adjective means well-ordered, decent, modest, or respectable in behavior or appearance. Paul uses it twice in the Pastoral Epistles: women should adorn themselves in 'respectable apparel' (κατασκευῇ κοσμίῳ, 1 Tim 2:9), emphasizing modesty over ostentation. An overseer must be 'respectable' (κόσμιον, 1 Tim 3:2), possessing dignified, orderly conduct. Classical usage applied it to orderly citizens, modest behavior, and well-regulated conduct. The word emphasizes propriety, decorum, and the kind of well-ordered life that befits believers, particularly leaders.

(2×) First Timothy 2:9 instructs women to adorn themselves 'in respectable apparel' (κοσμίῳ κατάστολῇ) with modesty. First Timothy 3:2 requires an overseer to be 'respectable' (κόσμιον), among other qualities. The multilingual glosses are somewhat sparse: Spanish 'decoroso' (decorous), English 'respectable,' German and French simply transliterate 'κοσμίῳ/κόσμιον' or use 'anständig' (decent). world-rulers, cosmic powers of darkness

Paul's description of spiritual warfare identifies 'the world-rulers of this darkness' as opponents (Ephesians 6:12). The compound term combines 'cosmos' (world/order) with 'kratōr' (ruler/power), suggesting beings who exercise dominion over fallen systems. Classical usage applied this title to emperors and planetary deities. Paul demotes these would-be cosmic rulers to mere enemies of the church, already defeated by Christ. The spiritual battle involves powers pretending to ultimate authority they don't actually possess.

(1×) In Ephesians' climactic passage on spiritual armor, Paul identifies the real enemy—not flesh and blood but cosmic powers that have usurped authority over the present dark age. The term's imperial and astrological associations in pagan usage make Paul's appropriation striking: these 'world-rulers' are merely defeated foes. German 'Weltbeherrscher' captures the grandiose claim. Believers wrestle against pretenders to cosmic throne who already stand under Christ's victory. WORLD INHABITED EARTH

World, ordered creation, human society; also adornment — the created order, inhabited earth, or system of human values; rarely, outward decoration.

Kosmos carries immense theological freight in the New Testament. Rooted in the idea of 'order' and 'arrangement,' it became the standard term for the created universe, the inhabited earth, and — in John's writings especially — the fallen human order that stands in tension with God's kingdom. 'God so loved the kosmos' (John 3:16) embraces the whole of rebellious humanity in divine compassion. Yet kosmos can also denote what is hostile to God: 'the kosmos knew him not' (John 1:10). In a single striking occurrence (1 Pet 3:3), the word returns to its etymological root, meaning outward adornment or decoration — a usage every major translation distinguishes from the dominant sense.

3. adornment, outward decoration (1×) Outward adornment or decoration of the body — the original etymological sense of kosmos as 'arrangement' or 'ordered beauty.' Found only at 1 Pet 3:3, where Peter contrasts external kosmos (braiding hair, gold jewelry, fine clothing) with the hidden person of the heart. Spanish renders it 'adorno' (ornament) rather than 'mundo,' and English uses 'adornment,' showing that translators across traditions recognize this as a distinct sense preserving the word's pre-biblical Greek meaning. WORLD INHABITED EARTH

Quartus, Christian brother in Corinth (Romans 16:23)
Paul concludes his letter to Rome with greetings from several Corinthian believers, including 'Quartus the brother' (Romans 16:23). The Latin name means 'fourth,' possibly indicating birth order or slave status. The simple designation 'the brother' may suggest he was well-known in the Roman church or simply emphasizes his standing in the faith. Beyond this brief mention, nothing certain is known of Quartus. He represents the many faithful believers who appear once in Scripture.

(1×) Among the closing greetings from Corinth, Quartus receives the warm title 'the brother'—either indicating his renown or Paul's affection. His Latin name suggests Roman connections, whether as a freedman or citizen. The multilingual witnesses transliterate with phonetic variations. Like many in Paul's closing greetings, Quartus embodies the numerous faithful Christians whose service left no record beyond a name and Paul's commendation. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

koum, Aramaic imperative 'arise' (transliterated)
Mark preserves Jesus' actual Aramaic words spoken to Jairus' dead daughter: 'Talitha koum'—'Little girl, I say to you, arise' (Mark 5:41). Mark transliterates the Aramaic imperative before providing the Greek translation. The retention of Jesus' original speech adds vividness and authenticity to the miracle account. This is one of several places where Mark preserves Jesus' Aramaic, maintaining the very sounds present at the miracle. The command's simplicity—just 'arise'—contrasts with the magnitude of raising the dead.

(1×) Mark's Gospel occasionally preserves Jesus' Aramaic words, here transliterating the imperative 'arise' before translating it into Greek. The very sounds Jesus spoke ('talitha koum') are passed down, adding eyewitness vividness. All language witnesses transliterate rather than translate, recognizing this as preserved Aramaic speech. The simple command's power lies not in elaborate incantation but in Jesus' life-giving authority—a word suffices to reverse death. STANDING AND ESTABLISHING guard; a Roman military guard or watch detail assigned to secure a location

A Latin loanword (from custodia) referring to a military guard detail. This word appears only in Matthew's passion narrative, specifically regarding the guard stationed at Jesus' tomb. Pilate grants the chief priests and Pharisees 'a guard' to secure the tomb (27:65-66), sealing the stone and posting soldiers to prevent the disciples from stealing the body. When the resurrection occurs, some of the guard report to the chief priests what happened (28:11), leading to the bribery scheme to claim the disciples stole the body while they slept. Ironically, the guard meant to prevent resurrection testimony becomes unwitting witnesses to it.

(3×) A Roman military guard or watch detail. All three occurrences in Matthew 27:65-28:11 concern the guard posted at Jesus' tomb. Pilate tells the Jewish leaders 'You have a guard; go, make it as secure as you can' (27:65). They sealed the tomb and set the guard (27:66). After the resurrection, some of the guard went to the chief priests to report what happened (28:11), receiving bribes to spread the story that disciples stole the body while they slept—a tale that persisted among Jews. GUARDS AND WATCHERS

they lightened (the ship), threw cargo overboard
Luke's detailed shipwreck narrative describes the crew's desperate measures to save the vessel. In Acts 27:38, after eating, 'they lightened the ship by throwing the wheat into the sea.' The verb means to make light, to reduce weight. Having already jettisoned the cargo and tackle, they now sacrifice their food supply—the wheat was likely part of the grain shipment from Egypt to Rome. This final lightening attempt shows how dire the situation had become.

(1×) As the storm reaches its climax, the crew takes increasingly desperate measures to keep the ship afloat. The imperfect tense suggests ongoing or repeated action—they kept lightening the vessel. Having already thrown overboard cargo and equipment (v. 18-19), they now sacrifice the precious wheat cargo. Spanish 'aligeraban' and French 'alléger' both capture the progressive lightening. This was the last resort before shipwreck became inevitable. LIGHTEN TREAT LIGHTLY

kophinos – a stiff wicker basket, specifically associated with Jewish use and the feeding miracles Kophinos denotes a particular type of basket – a stiff, woven container that ancient sources specifically associate with Jewish daily life. Juvenal mocked Jews as people whose 'furniture is a kophinos and a bundle of hay.' In the New Testament, all six occurrences refer to the twelve baskets of fragments collected after Jesus fed the five thousand (Matt 14:20; 16:9; Mark 6:43; 8:19; Luke 9:17; John 6:13). The Gospel writers carefully distinguish kophinos from spuris (the larger basket of the four-thousand feeding), and Jesus himself draws on this distinction in Matt 16:9-10. Spanish canasta/cesta, French corbeille, and German Korb render it straightforwardly as 'basket.'

(6×) A stiff wicker basket of moderate size, distinctly associated in ancient literature with Jewish usage and in the NT exclusively with the twelve baskets of leftover fragments from the feeding of the five thousand (Matt 14:20; Mark 6:43; Luke 9:17; John 6:13). The Gospels intentionally contrast kophinos with the larger spuris used in the feeding of the four thousand, and Jesus highlights this distinction when testing the disciples' memory in Matt 16:9-10 and Mark 8:19-20. Spanish cestas, French corbeille, and German Koerbe all render it simply as 'baskets,' though the original Greek preserves a specific typological nuance. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Mat, pallet, stretcher — a portable sleeping mat or simple bed, prominent in healing narratives
The noun κράβαττος (krabattos) designates a poor person's sleeping mat or pallet — a simple, lightweight bed that could be rolled up and carried. It features prominently in healing stories where the restored person is commanded to rise and carry the very mat that had confined them. The paralytic lowered through the roof at Capernaum takes up his krabattos at Jesus' word (Mark 2:4-12), and the invalid at Bethesda does the same after thirty-eight years (John 5:8-11). In Acts, the sick are laid on pallets in the streets hoping Peter's shadow might fall on them (Acts 5:15; 9:33). The word is colloquial, possibly of Macedonian origin, and contrasts with the more refined κλίνη. Spanish 'camilla/lecho' and French 'grabat' reflect its humble connotation.

mat, pallet, bed (11×) A portable sleeping mat or simple pallet used by the poor and the sick, frequently appearing as the object carried away by a healed person as visible proof of restoration. The paralytic at Capernaum rises and carries his mat (Mark 2:4, 9, 11-12), the Bethesda invalid is told 'take up your pallet and walk' (John 5:8-11), and Aeneas at Lydda rises from his pallet after eight years of paralysis (Acts 9:33-34). The mat itself becomes a sign of the miracle — what once carried the sick is now carried by the healed. Spanish 'camilla' and French 'grabat' both connote humble bedding. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

To cry out, scream, or shout loudly, whether in distress, urgency, or public proclamation.

A visceral, physical word for loud vocal expression – closer to a scream or shout than ordinary speech. Its classical roots include the croaking of ravens and the shrieking of frogs, and that raw, uncontrolled quality persists in the New Testament. When the demoniacs cry out before Jesus (Matt 8:29) or Peter screams as he sinks (Matt 14:30), the word conveys anguished urgency. Yet it also carries a proclamatory force: the crowd's 'Hosanna!' (Mark 11:9), Paul's strategic shout before the Sanhedrin (Acts 23:6), and the Seraphim-like 'Holy, holy, holy' of Revelation 4:8 all use this same verb, now channeled toward declaration.

1. cry out loudly in distress (41×) To cry out loudly from distress, fear, pain, or urgent need. This is the dominant sense (41x), conveying raw emotional intensity. Spanish 'clamó/gritaban' and German 'schreien' capture the visceral quality. Seen in the Canaanite woman's desperate plea (Matt 15:22), Peter sinking in the waves (Matt 14:30), and the demoniacs' terrified recognition of Jesus (Matt 8:29). The cry is typically involuntary or at least urgently compelled. CALLING AND NAMING

2. cry out in proclamation (14×) To cry out in public proclamation, appeal, or invocation – a shout that announces rather than pleads. Though using the same intense vocal register, the purpose shifts from personal distress to public declaration. John the Baptist 'cries out' his message (John 1:15), the crowd shouts 'Hosanna' (Mark 11:9), and Paul strategically shouts about the resurrection before the Sanhedrin (Acts 23:6). Spanish distinguishes this slightly with 'clama/clamaba' versus the distress-oriented 'gritaban.' CALLING AND NAMING

drunken headache, hangover; intoxication or the after-effects of excessive drinking and carousing

The noun denotes either intoxication itself or the physical aftermath of excessive drinking—what we call a hangover. Classical sources use it for drinking bouts, intoxication, and the drunken headache that follows. In Luke 21:34, Jesus warns his disciples to guard their hearts lest they be weighed down by κραιπάλῃ, drunkenness/dissipation. The context pairs it with μέθῃ (drunkenness) and the anxieties of life, suggesting a lifestyle of excess that dulls spiritual alertness. Translations vary between 'dissipation' (broader excess), 'gluttony' (Spanish glotonía), and 'intoxication' (French ivresse), reflecting the semantic range from the act to its effects.

(1×) Drunken headache, hangover; intoxication or the physical and mental stupor resulting from excessive drinking. In Luke 21:34, Jesus warns that hearts can be 'weighed down' (βαρηθῶσιν) by κραιπάλῃ—the fog and burden of dissipation that dulls spiritual watchfulness. Paired with μέθῃ (drunkenness) and worldly anxieties, it describes a lifestyle of self-indulgence that makes one unprepared for the day of the Lord. Spanish renders it glotonía (gluttony), French ivresse (drunkenness), reflecting the semantic span from the drinking itself to its dulling aftermath. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 8851 WITH 5 SENSES

Skull; the bony upper part of the head, used as a place name for Golgotha/Calvary.

Means the skull or cranium—the bony casing of the upper head. In all four Gospel accounts, it appears as part of the place name 'the place of a skull' (Kranion), translating the Aramaic Golgotha and rendered into Latin as Calvaria, whence English 'Calvary.' Whether the site was named for its skull-like rock formation or its association with execution remains debated. Spanish Calavera (skull) and French Crâne directly reflect the Greek anatomical term.

(4×) The skull, the bony structure encasing the brain. Every NT occurrence (Matt 27:33; Mark 15:22; Luke 23:33; John 19:17) uses the word as part of the toponym 'place of the skull' (topos kraniou), identifying the site of Jesus' crucifixion. The term translates Aramaic Golgotha and was rendered into Latin as Calvaria. Spanish Calavera/Cráneo and French Crâne preserve the anatomical precision. The consistent use across all four Gospels as a geographic-anatomical designation—rather than a description of actual skulls—suggests the site's topography resembled a skull shape. FLESH AND BODY

The edge, border, or tassel of a garment; specifically the ritual fringes (tzitzit) worn by observant Jews.

Denotes the border or fringe of a garment, and in the New Testament specifically refers to the tassels (Hebrew tzitzit) that Jewish men wore on the corners of their cloaks in obedience to Numbers 15:38-39. The woman with the hemorrhage reaches for the fringe of Jesus' garment (Matt 9:20; Luke 8:44), and crowds seek to touch even this edge for healing (Matt 14:36; Mark 6:56). Jesus criticizes the Pharisees for lengthening their fringes to appear more pious (Matt 23:5). The Spanish 'flecos' (fringes) and 'borde' (edge) together capture both the textile detail and the garment boundary.

(5×) The border, hem, or tassel-fringe of a garment, especially the ritual tassels (tzitzit) prescribed by the Torah. In Matt 9:20 and Luke 8:44, the hemorrhaging woman touches the κράσπεδον of Jesus' cloak, believing it will heal her—suggesting the fringes carried symbolic holiness. Matt 14:36 and Mark 6:56 describe crowds begging to touch even this edge of his garment. Matt 23:5 criticizes the Pharisees for enlarging their κράσπεδα as a show of piety. The Spanish split between 'borde' (edge/border) and 'flecos' (fringes/tassels), along with French 'frange' and German 'Saum' (hem), reflects the word's dual reference to both the garment's border and the tassels attached to it. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE mighty, powerful (of God's hand)

Peter exhorts believers to 'humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God' (1 Peter 5:6). The adjective, a poetic form emphasizing strength and power, appears frequently in the Septuagint describing God's 'mighty hand' in deliverance and judgment. The phrase evokes the Exodus and God's powerful acts in history. Peter applies this traditional image to present circumstances—God's power now works through suffering and humiliation, promising future exaltation. The 'mighty hand' can save or discipline.

(1×) Peter employs the classic biblical phrase 'the mighty hand of God,' rich with Exodus overtones. The adjective emphasizes raw power and strength—this is the hand that defeated Pharaoh and judges nations. Yet Peter's paradoxical counsel is to humble oneself under this power rather than resist it. The hand is mighty but ultimately protective for those who submit. Spanish 'poderosa' captures the sense of overwhelming strength deployed for divine purposes. POWER AND ABILITY

To strengthen, grow strong; to become empowered or fortified in body or spirit.

Means to make strong or to become strengthened, used in both physical and spiritual senses. Luke uses it twice of Jesus' childhood development—the boy 'grew strong' (Luke 1:80; 2:40)—painting a picture of vigorous maturation. Paul then applies it to spiritual empowerment: 'be strong' as a command to the Corinthians (1 Cor 16:13) and a prayer that believers be 'strengthened with power in the inner person' (Eph 3:16). Spanish fortaleceos (strengthen yourselves) and French se-fortifier capture the reflexive, participatory quality of this strengthening.

(4×) To grow strong, be strengthened, or become empowered, whether physically or spiritually. In Luke 1:80 and 2:40, it describes the physical and spiritual maturation of John the Baptist and the child Jesus respectively—both 'grew and became strong.' In 1 Cor 16:13, Paul commands believers to 'be strong' (imperative), and in Eph 3:16 he prays for inner strengthening through the Spirit. The passive forms in Luke suggest divine enablement, while the active imperative in 1 Corinthians calls for human resolve. To seize, arrest, take hold of, hold fast, or retain; ranges from hostile arrest to healing touch to firm adherence to teaching.

Derived from kratos ('strength, power'), krateo conveys the act of exercising strong grip — whether on a person's body, a theological conviction, or an escaping opportunity. The Gospels deploy it across strikingly different emotional registers: the same verb describes the authorities who want to 'arrest' Jesus (Matt 21:46) and Jesus gently 'taking hold of' a dead girl's hand to raise her (Mark 5:41). Spanish captures this range by shifting from agarrar ('to grab, seize') in hostile contexts to sostener ('to hold, support') for the healing touch, while German moves from festnehmen ('to arrest') to festhalten ('to hold fast'). Paul and the epistle writers extend the verb further into the abstract: 'hold fast to the traditions' (2 Thess 2:15), revealing that the grip in view can be intellectual and spiritual, not merely physical.

1. seize, arrest (21×) To seize, arrest, or lay hold of a person with hostile intent or by force — the dominant Gospel sense at 21 occurrences. Herod 'arrested' John the Baptist (Matt 14:3); the chief priests wanted to 'seize' Jesus but feared the crowd (Matt 21:46); the servants 'seized' the invited guests in the parable (Matt 22:6). Spanish agarrar and prender both select forceful-apprehension vocabulary, and German festnehmen ('to arrest') confirms the custodial force. The verb regularly appears in passion-narrative contexts, making it a key word in the vocabulary of Jesus's arrest. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

en: arrested, having-seized, he-seized | es: a-tomar, agarrando, agarrándolo | fr: saisir | de: ergreift, festhalten Matt 12:11; Matt 14:3; Matt 18:28; Matt 21:46; Matt 22:6

2. hold fast, retain (13×) To hold fast or cling firmly to teachings, traditions, convictions, or spiritual realities. At Mark 7:3, 8 the Pharisees 'hold fast' to the tradition of the elders; at 2 Thess 2:15 Paul exhorts believers to 'hold fast' the traditions received; Col 2:19 warns against those not 'holding fast' to Christ the Head. Spanish retener ('to retain') and asirse de ('to cling to') mark the abstract-adherence frame, quite different from physical seizure. The metaphor preserves krateo's sense of powerful grip, but the object is now doctrinal or relational rather than bodily. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

en: hold-fast, holding, holding-fast | es: Retén, a-los-que-retienen, asiendóse-de | fr: saisir | de: festhalten Mark 7:3; Mark 7:8; John 20:23; Col 2:19; 2Thess 2:15

3. grasp, take hold of (7×) To physically grasp or take hold of someone, especially in the compassionate context of healing. Jesus 'takes hold of' Peter's mother-in-law's hand (Mark 1:31), 'grasps' Jairus's daughter's hand (Mark 5:41), and 'takes hold of' a boy with an unclean spirit (Mark 9:27). Spanish sostener and tomar de la mano ('take by the hand') select gentle, supportive contact vocabulary, and the healing narrative context clearly distinguishes this from the hostile 'seize' of sense 1. Luke's parallel accounts (Luke 8:54) confirm the same tender physical contact. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

en: grasping, having-grasped, having-taken | es: Sosteniendo, asir, habiendo-tomado | fr: saisir | de: ergreift, festhalten Matt 9:25; Mark 1:31; Mark 5:41; Mark 9:27; Luke 8:54

4. be held, be restrained (3×) To be held, restrained, or prevented in the passive voice — describing a constraint imposed on the subject. At Luke 24:16 the Emmaus disciples' eyes 'were held' (restrained from recognizing Jesus); at Acts 2:24 it was impossible for death to 'hold' Christ; at John 20:23 sins are 'retained' (held fast against someone). Spanish impedir ('to prevent') and retener ('to retain') capture both the physical and juridical senses of being under constraint. The passive voice transforms krateo's active grip into an experience of being gripped. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

5. keep, observe (2×) To keep, observe, or guard traditions and customs in the sense of careful maintenance. At Mark 7:4 the Pharisees 'observe' (keep) many traditions such as washing cups and pitchers; at Mark 9:10 the disciples 'kept' the matter to themselves. Spanish guardar ('to keep, guard') marks the custodial-observance nuance distinct from the more combative 'hold fast' of sense 2 — here the emphasis is on careful preservation rather than tenacious clinging against opposition. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

6. (1×) A single occurrence at Acts 27:13 where a gentle south wind blows and the sailors suppose they have 'obtained' or 'secured' their purpose. Spanish apoderar ('to take possession of') and English 'obtained' suggest a sense of successfully grasping an opportunity or goal — an extension of the physical-grip metaphor into the domain of achieving an objective. The nautical context gives it a specialized flavor of seizing favorable conditions. SEIZING AND SNATCHING

Most excellent, most noble; a superlative title of honor used to address high-ranking officials.

The superlative of 'strong' or 'good,' functioning in the NT exclusively as an honorific title for Roman officials—equivalent to Latin egregius or 'Your Excellency.' Luke addresses his patron Theophilus as kratiste (Luke 1:3), and Paul uses the same title when speaking to the governors Felix (Acts 24:3) and Festus (Acts 26:25), as well as in Lysias' letter to Felix (Acts 23:26). French très-excellent and Spanish excelentísimo perfectly mirror the superlative force of this courtly address.

(4×) A superlative adjective meaning 'most excellent' or 'most noble,' used in the NT exclusively as a formal title of address for persons of high rank. Luke uses it for Theophilus (Luke 1:3), suggesting the dedicatee held social or political standing. Paul employs it when addressing Roman governors: Claudius Lysias writes to 'most excellent Felix' (Acts 23:26), Paul addresses Felix as kratiste (Acts 24:3), and likewise Festus (Acts 26:25). Spanish excelentísimo and French très-excellent both capture the superlative honorific register. might, power, dominion — sovereign strength or supreme authority, especially in doxological ascription to God

Kratos denotes raw sovereign power and ruling might, distinguishing itself from dynamis (inherent capability) and exousia (delegated authority) by emphasizing the sheer force of dominion. Its 12 NT occurrences are overwhelmingly doxological — the word appears in praise formulas ascribing eternal might to God or Christ (1 Pet 4:11, 5:11; Jude 25; Rev 1:6, 5:13; 1 Tim 6:16). Luke 1:51 applies it to God's mighty arm scattering the proud, and Acts 19:20 describes the word of the Lord growing in kratos. Paul pairs it with other power terms in Ephesians 1:19 and 6:10 to express the overwhelming magnitude of divine strength. Spanish 'dominio/poder,' French 'puissance,' and German 'Macht' all gravitate toward sovereign authority.

might, power, dominion (12×) Sovereign might, supreme ruling power, or absolute dominion, used predominantly in doxological and theological contexts to ascribe unrivaled strength to God or Christ. Appears in liturgical formulas of praise (1 Pet 4:11, 'to him be the glory and the kratos'; Rev 5:13, 'power and might forever'). Also describes divine action — God performing kratos with his arm (Luke 1:51) and the word of the Lord prevailing with kratos (Acts 19:20). Paul stacks it alongside dynamis, energeia, and ischus in Ephesians 1:19 to convey the overwhelming totality of God's power. To cry out loudly, shout, or scream; an intensified form of krazo expressing urgent or vehement vocal expression.

An intensified verb meaning to cry out loudly, shout, or scream — stronger than the common krazo. In the New Testament, kraugazo conveys forceful, urgent vocal expression across varied contexts: the crowd shouting 'Crucify!' before Pilate (John 19:6, 15), the triumphal entry crowd crying 'Hosanna!' (John 12:13), and Jesus himself calling Lazarus from the tomb with a loud voice (John 11:43). Matthew 12:19 quotes Isaiah's prophecy that the Servant 'will not cry out' (kraugasei) in the streets, using the word's intensity to highlight the Messiah's surprising gentleness. Spanish 'gritar' and German 'schreien' both preserve the forcefulness of the term.

cry out, shout loudly (9×) To cry out loudly, shout, or scream with urgency or vehemence. Kraugazo is an intensified form of krazo, conveying powerful, often emotionally charged vocal expression. Its NT range includes hostile mob shouting — the crowd's demand to crucify Jesus (John 19:6, 15; Acts 22:23) — as well as joyful acclamation at the triumphal entry (John 12:13) and Jesus' authoritative cry summoning Lazarus from the grave (John 11:43). Matthew 12:19 quotes Isaiah 42:2 in the negative: the Servant 'will not cry out,' using kraugazo to highlight how the Messiah's quiet ministry defied expectations of forceful self-promotion. Luke 4:41 shows demons crying out during exorcisms. Spanish 'gritar' (to shout) and German 'schreien' (to scream) both capture the raw vocal force. CALLING AND NAMING krauge – a loud cry, outcry, or clamor; a shout expressing urgency, distress, joy, or contention

Krauge denotes a loud vocal outcry – a shout, scream, or clamor driven by strong emotion. Its NT occurrences span a wide emotional range: the midnight cry announcing the bridegroom's arrival (Matt 25:6), Elizabeth's joyful exclamation at Mary's greeting (Luke 1:42), the fierce shouting during Paul's trial before the Sanhedrin (Acts 23:9), the 'loud cries and tears' of Jesus' prayers in Gethsemane (Heb 5:7), and the vice of angry clamor that believers are to put away (Eph 4:31). Spanish clamor, French cri, and German Geschrei all capture the sense of a raised, emphatic voice.

outcry, clamor (6×) A loud vocal utterance expressing intense emotion, whether joy, urgency, grief, or contention. The semantic range in the NT extends from the glad midnight cry of the bridegroom's herald (Matt 25:6) and Elizabeth's exuberant shout (Luke 1:42) to the angry clamor of the Sanhedrin (Acts 23:9) and the agonized cries of Christ in prayer (Heb 5:7). Paul lists krauge alongside bitterness and wrath as a vice to be abandoned (Eph 4:31), while Revelation envisions a world where krauge shall be no more (Rev 21:4). Spanish clamor, French cri, and German Geschrei converge on a single sense of emphatic, raised-voice outcry. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

meat, flesh (as food)

This noun refers to flesh or meat, especially as food. Paul uses it twice in discussions about eating practices and Christian liberty. In Romans 14:21, he states 'it is good not to eat meat (κρέα) or drink wine or do anything that causes your brother to stumble'—setting aside one's freedom for the sake of the weak. In 1 Corinthians 8:13, he declares 'if food causes my brother to stumble, I will never eat meat (κρέα), lest I make my brother stumble.' Both contexts involve meat offered to idols and the principle of surrendering rights for love's sake. The word focuses on flesh as food, not living flesh.

(2×) Romans 14:21 says it's good not to eat 'meat' (κρέα) if it causes a brother to stumble. First Corinthians 8:13 has Paul's vow: 'I will never eat meat (κρέα)' if it makes a brother stumble. The multilingual glosses are straightforward: English 'meat,' Spanish 'carne/carnes,' French 'viande,' German 'Fleisch.' Both passages involve the idol-meat controversy, where eating (even though permissible) could wound weaker consciences. Paul prioritizes love over liberty. FLESH AND BODY

Better, superior; comparative of good, denoting what excels in quality, value, or moral worth.

A comparative adjective meaning 'better' or 'superior,' rooted in the older Greek sense of 'stronger' or 'mightier' (from κρατύς). In the New Testament it consistently functions as the comparative of ἀγαθός, evaluating one option against another. Paul uses it to weigh marriage choices (1 Cor 7:38) and to express his desire to depart and be with Christ as 'far better' (Phil 1:23). The multilingual renderings —Spanish mejor, French meilleur, German besser—all converge on a single evaluative sense, confirming that the NT usage centers on qualitative superiority rather than physical strength.

(4×) Better, more excellent, superior in quality or desirability. All four NT occurrences use this word to compare two states or outcomes and declare one preferable. In Phil 1:23 Paul weighs living versus departing to be with Christ, calling the latter κρεῖσσον; in Heb 6:9 the author reassures believers of 'better things' accompanying salvation.

The uniform rendering across languages (mejor, meilleur, besser) confirms a single evaluative-comparative sense without branching into the classical 'physically stronger' meaning. MORAL GOODNESS

Better, superior, more excellent; comparative indicating higher worth or greater strength.
A comparative adjective meaning 'better' or 'superior,' used when one thing surpasses another in quality, value, or moral standing. Although its classical root meant 'stronger' or 'mightier,' New Testament usage overwhelmingly carries the evaluative sense of 'more excellent.' Hebrews employs it as a virtual keyword: Christ mediates a better covenant (Heb 7:22), founded on better promises (Heb 8:6), through a better sacrifice (Heb 9:23). Paul also uses it practically—it is better to marry than to burn with passion (1 Cor 7:9). German 'besser,' Spanish 'mejor,' and French 'meilleur' all converge on the single axis of qualitative superiority.

better, superior, greater (15×) Superior in quality, value, or moral standing; better or more excellent than something else. Hebrews deploys this word repeatedly to demonstrate Christ's superiority over angels (Heb 1:4), the Levitical priesthood (Heb 7:7, 19), the old covenant (Heb 7:22), and earthly sacrifices (Heb 9:23). Cross-linguistic evidence is unanimous: Spanish 'mejor,' French 'meilleur,' German 'besser' all map to a single axis of evaluative comparison, confirming a unified sense rather than a fragmented polysemy. MORAL GOODNESS

κρεμ-άννῡμι G2910 V-APP-GMP (7×)

To hang, suspend physically (especially in execution); figuratively, to depend upon
The verb κρεμάννυμι (with its contract form κρεμάω) means to hang or suspend, and in the New Testament it appears at the intersection of two vivid images. Physically, it describes execution — Christ and the criminals hung on a cross (Luke 23:39, Acts 5:30, 10:39) — and bodily danger, as when a viper fastens onto Paul's hand at Malta (Acts 28:4). Figuratively, in one of Jesus' most memorable pronouncements, the entire Law and the Prophets 'hang' on the two great commandments (Matt 22:40), an image of dependence so arresting that it passed into everyday speech across cultures.

1. hang on a tree/cross (execution or physical suspension) (6×) To hang or suspend someone or something physically, especially in the context of crucifixion or execution on a tree (ξύλον). The apostolic preaching in Acts repeatedly uses this verb for Christ's death: 'whom you killed by hanging on a tree' (Acts 5:30, 10:39). Luke 23:39 applies it to the criminals crucified alongside Jesus. Matt 18:6 uses it of a millstone hung around the neck, and Acts 28:4 of a snake hanging from Paul's hand. Multilingual evidence — Spanish 'colgado/colgando,' French 'pendre,' German 'haengen' — consistently renders physical suspension. HANGING SUSPENSION

2. hang upon, depend on (figurative) (1×) A figurative use meaning to depend upon, rest upon, or be contingent on something. In Matt 22:40, Jesus declares that the whole Law and the Prophets κρέμαται ('hangs') on the two commandments of love. The metaphor transfers the physical image of suspension into the domain of logical or moral dependence: everything is suspended from, and therefore grounded in, love of God and neighbor. Spanish 'cuelga' preserves the literal hanging image, while the contextual shift to abstract dependence is unmistakable. HANGING SUSPENSION steep bank, cliff; a precipitous slope or overhanging cliff face

This word describes a steep, precipitous bank or cliff face—the kind of dangerous, overhanging slope where a misstep could mean a fatal fall. The Synoptic Gospels use it in their parallel accounts of Jesus exorcising the demons called 'Legion.' When the demons enter the herd of pigs, the animals rush down the steep bank into the sea and drown (Matthew 8:32, Mark 5:13, Luke 8:33). The geographical detail is significant: the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee features such steep cliffs descending to the water, lending vivid realism to this dramatic deliverance narrative.

(3×) A steep bank, cliff, or precipice. All three Synoptic Gospels use this word in parallel accounts of the Gerasene demoniac: when Jesus permits the demons to enter a herd of pigs, the animals rush down the steep bank into the sea and drown (Matthew 8:32, Mark 5:13, Luke 8:33). The geography is realistic—the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee has steep cliffs descending to the water. Cretans, people from the island of Crete
This adjective (used substantively) refers to inhabitants of Crete, the large Mediterranean island south of Greece. In Acts 2:11, Cretans (Κρῆτες) are listed among the Jewish pilgrims present at Pentecost who heard the gospel in their own languages. In Titus 1:12, Paul quotes a Cretan prophet (Epimenides) about his own people: 'Cretans (Κρῆτες) are always liars, evil beasts, lazy gluttons'—a harsh proverb Paul calls true and uses to justify strong correction. The Cretans had a reputation in the ancient world for dishonesty ('to Cretanize' meant 'to lie'), making Paul's mission there particularly challenging.

(2×) Acts 2:11 lists 'Cretans' (Κρῆτες) among those hearing the Pentecost proclamation in their own tongues. Titus 1:12 quotes a Cretan prophet saying 'Cretans (Κρῆτες) are always liars, evil beasts, lazy gluttons.' The multilingual glosses are ethnic designations: English 'Cretans/Krētes,' Spanish 'Krḗtes/cretenses,' French 'Crétois/Κρῆτες,' German 'Kreter/Κρῆτες.' The Acts reference is neutral geographical, while Titus references the island's unsavory reputation for deceit. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Crescens, companion of Paul (2 Timothy 4:10)
In Paul's final letter, he notes that 'Crescens has gone to Galatia' (2 Timothy 4:10). The Latin name means 'growing' or 'increasing.' Unlike Demas, mentioned in the same verse as having deserted Paul, Crescens apparently left on legitimate ministry business. Some manuscripts read 'Gaul' instead of 'Galatia,' which would make this one of the earliest references to Christian mission in Western Europe. Beyond this single reference, nothing certain is known of Crescens or his work.

(1×) Among Paul's companions mentioned in his final letter, Crescens appears as one who has departed for ministry—to Galatia or possibly Gaul, depending on the manuscript reading. His Latin name suggests Roman background. The multilingual witnesses transliterate with slight variations. Unlike Demas the deserter, Crescens seems to have left with Paul's blessing for legitimate service. He represents the many faithful workers whose extensive service is recorded only in a single name. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

Crete; the large Mediterranean island south of the Aegean Sea, associated with Paul's voyage and Titus's mission.

The proper name for the island of Crete, the largest island in the Greek archipelago, located south of the Aegean Sea. It figures prominently in Paul's sea voyage to Rome (Acts 27:7, 12-13, 21), where the ship sails along Crete's coast and the crew fatefully ignores Paul's advice to winter there. Titus 1:5 reveals that Paul left Titus on Crete to organize the churches and appoint elders in every town. The consistent rendering across languages—Spanish 'Krete,' French 'Crete,' German 'Kreta'—reflects straightforward transliteration of this well-known geographic name.

(5×) The island of Crete in the Mediterranean Sea, a significant location in Pauline ministry. In Acts 27:7-21, Crete is the setting for a critical decision during Paul's voyage to Rome: the ship struggles to round Cape Salmone, briefly harbors at Fair Havens, and disastrously departs despite Paul's warning—leading to the shipwreck narrative. In Titus 1:5, Paul recalls leaving Titus on the island to complete the organization of fledgling churches. The name is simply transliterated across all target languages (German 'Kreta,' French 'Crete,' Spanish 'Krete'), confirming it as a proper noun with a single referent. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE of barley, made from barley grain

In Revelation's vision of famine and economic upheaval, a voice announces inflated prices: 'A quart of wheat for a denarius, and three quarts of barley for a denarius' (Revelation 6:6). Barley, cheaper and less desirable than wheat, served as food for the poor and as animal fodder. The genitive form here indicates 'barley grain' or 'barley produce.' The pricing suggests severe scarcity where even coarse barley becomes expensive. This was subsistence-level economics—a day's wages for a day's bread.

(1×) John's apocalyptic vision of the black horse rider (famine) includes specific grain prices that signal severe economic distress. Barley, the grain of poverty, costs a third the price of wheat but still requires a day's wages for three quarts—barely enough for survival. All language witnesses identify barley as the grain type. The genitive construction indicates 'of barley' modifying 'quarts.' This famine allows survival but eliminates any margin, reducing human existence to securing the next meal. BARLEY GRAIN

made of barley, barley (as adjective)
This adjective means 'made of barley' or 'consisting of barley.' It appears only in John's account of the feeding of the five thousand (John 6:9, 13), describing the five loaves that the boy had as 'barley loaves' (ἄρτους κριθίνους). Barley was considered inferior to wheat and was the food of the poor—making the miracle even more striking, as Jesus feeds thousands with the most humble provisions. The detail emphasizes both the boy's poverty (he had only barley bread, not wheat) and God's power to multiply even the lowliest offerings into abundance.

(2×) John 6:9 describes the boy who had 'five barley loaves' (πέντε ἄρτους κριθίνους) and two fish. John 6:13 mentions gathering twelve baskets of fragments from 'the five barley loaves' (τῶν πέντε ἄρτων τῶν κριθίνων). The multilingual glosses are consistent: Spanish 'de cebada' (of barley), English 'barley,' French 'd'orge,' German 'gersten.' The barley detail appears only in John's Gospel and emphasizes the humble, inexpensive nature of the starting material for Jesus' miracle. BARLEY GRAIN

κρίμα G2917 N-NNS (28×)
Judgment, verdict, condemnation; also a lawsuit or legal case brought before a court.
A legal term denoting the result of a judicial process — the verdict, sentence, or condemnation that follows deliberation. In the New Testament, krima most often refers to divine judgment on sin, whether the greater condemnation awaiting hypocritical scribes (Mark 12:40; Luke 20:47) or the judgment that falls on those who eat the Lord's Supper unworthily (1 Corinthians 11:29). Jesus declares that he came into the world 'for judgment' (John 9:39), and Paul warns that God's judgment on sinners is just (Romans 2:2–3). A single distinctive usage at 1 Corinthians 6:7 refers to civil lawsuits between believers, which Paul considers a spiritual defeat.

1. judgment, condemnation (27×) The dominant sense covers judicial decision, verdict, and condemnation — the outcome of divine or human judgment. Jesus warns of greater condemnation for the scribes who devour widows' houses (Mark 12:40; Matthew 23:14). Paul teaches that divine krima falls justly on sinners (Romans 2:2–3; 3:8) and that partaking of the Lord's Supper unworthily brings judgment on oneself (1 Corinthians 11:29). Spanish condenacion and juicio, French jugement, and German Gericht/Urteil all reflect the forensic weight of a sentence rendered. Revelation 17:1 and 20:4 extend this to eschatological judgment. JUDGMENT AND VERDICT

2. lawsuit, legal case (1×) A distinct usage at 1 Corinthians 6:7 where krima means a civil lawsuit or legal dispute between believers. Paul asks, 'Why not rather be wronged?' — rebuking Christians for taking their cases (krimata) to pagan courts. Spanish pleitos ('lawsuits') captures this sense precisely, distinguishing it from the theological weight of divine condemnation. This is the classical Greek meaning of krima as a matter for judgment or a case at law, preserved in this single but memorable Pauline rebuke. JUDGMENT AND VERDICT

lily, a flowering plant (possibly including various white or colorful flowers)
This noun refers to lilies or lily-like flowers, possibly including various species of white or brightly colored wild flowers. Jesus uses it in both Matthew 6:28 and Luke 12:27 in His teaching about anxiety and God's provision: 'Consider the lilies (κρίνα), how they grow; they neither toil nor spin, yet I tell you, even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.' The term may encompass various wildflowers of the Palestinian hills rather than a single botanical species—the point is their natural beauty without human effort. Classical usage identified both white lilies and the 'Turk's cap lily,' among others.

(2×) Matthew 6:28 and Luke 12:27 both record Jesus' teaching: 'Consider the lilies (τὰ κρίνα), how they grow.' The context is trust in God's provision—if He clothes wildflowers so beautifully, how much more will He clothe His children? The multilingual glosses are simple: English 'lilies,' Spanish 'lirios,' French 'lis,' German simply uses the Greek 'κρίνα.' The exact botanical identification is uncertain, but the point is the beauty of natural, uncultivated flowers as evidence of God's care. FLOWERS AND BLOSSOMS

κρίνω G2919 V-AIP-3P (115×)
To judge, pass judgment, condemn; also to decide or determine; in passive, to be judged or stand trial
Krino is the foundational Greek verb for judgment, carrying the full range from evaluation to legal verdict to personal decision. Jesus' warning 'judge not, lest you be judged' (Matt 7:1) uses both active and passive in a single breath. Paul applies it to the eschatological tribunal (Rom 2:16) and to everyday congregational disputes (1 Cor 6:2). In Acts it often shades toward 'decide, determine' – Paul 'decided' to sail past Ephesus (Acts 20:16), and the Jerusalem council 'determined' its decrees (Acts 16:4). Spanish juzgar, French juger, and German richten all reflect this same judicial core, inherited from the Latin-Greek legal tradition.

1. judge, pass judgment (76×) The active judicial sense: to judge, evaluate, pass judgment, or condemn. This is the dominant use, spanning Jesus' teaching on mutual judgment (Matt 7:1, Luke 6:37), the eschatological authority to judge the twelve tribes (Matt 19:28), and God's righteous judgment (John 5:22, Rom 2:16). Spanish juzgar, French juger, and German richten all render this core forensic meaning. The verb encompasses both fair evaluation and condemnatory judgment depending on context. JUDGING AND DECIDING

2. be judged, stand trial (27×) The passive and middle voice sense: to be judged, to stand trial, to come under judgment. In John 3:18 the believer 'is not judged' while the unbeliever 'has been judged already.' Acts 23:6 has Paul declaring 'I am being judged concerning the hope of the resurrection.' The passive often carries eschatological weight (Matt 7:1-2, Rom 3:7), and French être jugé and Spanish ser juzgado preserve this voice distinction clearly. JUDGING AND DECIDING

3. decide, determine, resolve (11×) The deliberative sense: to decide, determine, resolve upon a course of action. Acts 20:16 records Paul 'deciding' to sail past Ephesus; Acts 16:4 describes the apostles delivering 'decisions' reached at Jerusalem; and Acts 25:25 uses it for Festus's judicial determination. This sense moves from courtroom to council chamber, and Spanish decidir alongside juzgar captures the semantic shift well. JUDGING AND DECIDING

4. (1×) The litigious sense: to bring a lawsuit, to sue at law. In Matthew 5:40, Jesus says 'if anyone would sue you (krino) and take your tunic, let him have your cloak also.' Spanish demandar ('to sue') and the English gloss 'to sue' isolate this as a distinct initiatory legal action rather than a judge's verdict. JUDGING AND DECIDING judgment, condemnation — the act of rendering a verdict, divine or human, and its resulting sentence

Krisis denotes the entire arc of judicial process — the act of judging, the verdict rendered, and the sentence executed. Across 48 New Testament occurrences, it ranges from Jesus' warnings about the 'day of judgment' awaiting Sodom and Gomorrah (Matt 10:15; 11:22, 24) to the Johannine declaration that 'the Father has given all judgment to the Son' (John 5:22, 27). It carries both forensic and eschatological weight: the scribes 'devour widows' houses and for a pretense make long prayers — they will receive greater krisis' (Mark 12:40). Yet the word also retains its classical Greek sense of 'discernment' in Jesus' rebuke that the Pharisees neglect 'justice, mercy, and faithfulness' (Matt 23:23), where krisis means justice in the ethical rather than eschatological sense. Spanish 'juicio,' French 'jugement,' and German 'Gericht' each preserve this double valence of judicial process and divine reckoning.

judgment / condemnation (48×) The act, process, or result of rendering judicial verdict — encompassing divine eschatological judgment (Matt 10:15 'day of judgment'; Matt 12:36 'every careless word'), the authority to judge delegated to Christ (John 5:22, 27 'the Father has given all judgment to the Son'), and the ethical sense of justice as a moral obligation (Matt 23:23 'justice, mercy, faithfulness'). Also denotes condemnation as the outcome of judgment (Mark 12:40 'greater condemnation'; John 3:19 'this is the judgment, that light has come'). Crispus, a personal name (synagogue ruler in Corinth)

Crispus was the ruler of the synagogue in Corinth who, along with his whole household, believed in the Lord (Acts 18:8). Paul personally baptized him (1 Cor 1:14), which Paul mentions when arguing against divisions in the Corinthian church—he's grateful he baptized only a few, lest anyone say they were baptized in Paul's name. Crispus's conversion was significant because of his position as synagogue leader; his faith would have been a public testimony and possibly sparked opposition. The name is Latin (meaning 'curly-haired') and was common in the Roman world.

(2×) Acts 18:8 records that 'Crispus (Κρίσπος), the ruler of the synagogue, believed in the Lord, together with his entire household.' First Corinthians 1:14 has Paul saying 'I baptized none of you except Crispus (Κρίσπον) and Gaius.' The multilingual glosses are transliterations: English 'Krispos,' Spanish 'Kríspos/a Críspos,' French 'Crispus,' German 'Krispus/Κρίσπος.' law court, tribunal; a judicial assembly for deciding legal disputes

While this word can mean a standard or means of judging, in the New Testament it specifically refers to law courts or tribunals where disputes are adjudicated. Paul's usage is particularly striking: he challenges the Corinthian believers about taking their disputes before secular courts rather than resolving them within the Christian community. If believers will one day judge the world and even angels (1 Corinthians 6:2), surely they're competent to judge 'trivial cases' (6:4) among themselves. James 2:6 uses the plural form to describe how the rich drag the poor before the courts, highlighting economic oppression.

Paul uses this word in 1 Corinthians 6:2, 4 to challenge believers who take disputes before secular courts: 'Do you not know that the saints will judge the world? A judge — one who renders legal decisions, arbitrates disputes, or exercises divine judgment.

Designates a person who renders judicial decisions, whether in human courts or as a title for God. In the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus warns about being handed over to the judge (Matt 5:25; Luke 12:58), using the courtroom scenario as a parable for eschatological urgency. Acts applies it to Israel's pre-monarchic leaders, the 'judges' whom God raised up as deliverers (Acts 13:20). James warns the rich not to drag the poor before judges (Jas 2:6) yet also warns believers against becoming 'judges with evil thoughts' (Jas 2:4). Most strikingly, Hebrews calls God 'the Judge of all' (12:23), and James declares there is 'one Lawgiver and Judge' (4:12). Spanish distinguishes uppercase 'Juez' for God from lowercase 'juez' for human officials.

discerning, able to judge and divide (of God's word)

Hebrews declares that God's word is 'living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword... able to judge the thoughts and intentions of the heart' (Hebrews 4:12). The adjective means 'able to discern' or 'critical'—having the power to judge and discriminate. In classical usage it described literary critics and scholars who could discern quality and meaning. Applied to God's word, it emphasizes the capacity to penetrate human self-deception and expose true motives. Scripture itself exercises judgment.

(1×) The author of Hebrews personifies Scripture as an active agent that judges human thoughts—the word itself is 'kritikos,' able to critique and discern. The classical background includes grammarians and scholars who exercised critical judgment on texts; here the roles reverse, and the text judges the reader. German 'scharf' (sharp) and French 'scharf' both capture the penetrating, discriminating quality. God's word doesn't just inform; it exposes and judges the hidden recesses of the heart. To knock (at a door); to strike a door seeking entry, used both literally and as a metaphor for persistent prayer or divine visitation.

Means to knock or strike at a door seeking entry. In the New Testament, krouo carries both a literal and a richly metaphorical sense. Jesus' teaching 'knock and it will be opened to you' (Matt 7:7-8; Luke 11:9-10) makes knocking a vivid image for persistent, expectant prayer. In the parable of the shut door, the master's servants knock awaiting his return (Luke 12:36), and in Acts 12:13-16 Peter knocks at the gate after his miraculous release from prison — a scene of almost comic surprise. Most strikingly, Revelation 3:20 portrays Christ standing at the door and knocking, inverting the metaphor so that the divine seeks entry into the human heart. Spanish 'llamar' (to call/knock) and German 'klopfen' (to knock) both preserve the core physical action.

knock (at a door) (9×) To knock or strike at a door seeking admission. Greek krouo (from a root meaning 'to strike') is specialized in the NT for the act of knocking on a door. Jesus' instruction 'knock and it will be opened' (Matt 7:7-8; Luke 11:9-10) makes the gesture a metaphor for persistent, faith-filled prayer. Luke 12:36 uses it for servants awaiting their master's return, and Acts 12:13-16 provides a vivid literal scene where Peter knocks at Mary's gate after angelic deliverance from prison. The most theologically charged use is Revelation 3:20, where Christ himself stands at the door and knocks, seeking fellowship. Spanish 'llamar/golpear' and German 'klopfen' both convey the physical act of rapping at a door. STRIKING AND REFERENCE hidden place, secret location

Jesus teaches that 'no one after lighting a lamp puts it in a cellar or under a basket' (Luke 11:33). The 'cellar' or 'hidden place' represents anywhere concealed from view. The point is that light exists to be seen—hiding it defeats its purpose. Classical usage includes crypts and vaults, underground storage spaces. Jesus' metaphor critiques those who hide the truth rather than displaying it openly. Light belongs on a lampstand, visible to all who enter.

(1×) In Jesus' teaching about light and revelation, the 'hidden place' represents the wrong location for a lamp—anywhere concealed from view defeats the lamp's purpose. The word can mean a crypt, vault, or hidden room. Spanish 'escondite' and French 'cachette' both emphasize concealment. Jesus' logic is straightforward: lamps exist to illuminate, so hiding them is absurd. Applied spiritually, this warns against concealing the truth that should be publicly proclaimed and visible. Hidden, secret, concealed — what is unseen by others but known to God.

Describes what is concealed from human sight or knowledge, carrying a strong theological charge in the NT. Jesus uses it six times in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 6:4–18) to contrast ostentatious piety with acts done 'in secret' before a Father who 'sees in secret' — establishing a foundational principle of Christian spirituality. Paul applies it to the hidden dimensions of personhood: the 'secret things' of the heart that God will expose at judgment (Rom 2:16; 1 Cor 4:5; 14:25) and the 'hidden person of the heart' as true beauty (1 Pet 3:4). Mark 4:22 and Luke 8:17 promise that nothing hidden will remain unrevealed. French 'caché' and Spanish 'oculto' consistently render the concealment.

hidden, secret (19×) That which is concealed, secret, or unseen — used both as an adjective and substantively for hidden realities. Central to Jesus' teaching on authentic piety: almsgiving, prayer, and fasting done 'in secret' before the Father who sees what is hidden (Matt 6:4, 6, 18). Paul extends it to the hidden things of the heart exposed at divine judgment (Rom 2:16; 1 Cor 4:5; 14:25). Mark 4:22 and Luke 8:17 affirm that nothing κρυπτόν will remain concealed. Spanish 'oculto/ocultas' and French 'caché' uniformly capture the sense of concealment from human view. HIDING AND CONCEALING

To hide or conceal; in passive/middle, to be hidden, lie concealed, or hide oneself — covering both deliberate concealment and states of hiddenness

Krypto is the basic Greek verb for hiding, and the New Testament exploits both its active and passive voices to rich theological effect. Actively, it describes concealing treasure in a field (Matt 13:44), burying a talent (Matt 25:18, 25), or a woman hiding leaven in flour (Luke 13:21). In its passive and middle forms, it speaks of truths hidden from human perception — things 'hidden since the foundation of the world' (Matt 13:35), realities concealed from the wise (Matt 11:25, Luke 10:21), and the meaning of Jesus' words hidden from the disciples (Luke 18:34). The interplay between human acts of concealment and divine acts of revelation runs throughout.

1. be hidden, hide oneself (12×) To be hidden, to lie concealed, or to hide oneself — passive, stative, and middle-reflexive uses where the subject is the one in a state of hiddenness rather than the agent doing the hiding. A city on a hill 'cannot be hidden' (Matt 5:14), things 'hidden from the foundation of the world' are revealed in parables (Matt 13:35), treasure lies 'hidden' in a field (Matt 13:44 passive participle), and the meaning of Jesus' words 'was hidden' from the disciples (Luke 18:34, 19:42). Spanish 'escondida/esconderse' and German 'verborgen' reflect this stative-passive sense. HIDING AND CONCEALING

2. hide, conceal something (7×) To hide or conceal something actively and deliberately — transitive uses where the subject intentionally conceals an object, person, or truth from others. Jesus thanks the Father for having 'hidden' these things from the wise (Matt 11:25, Luke 10:21), a man hides treasure he found (Matt 13:44 active), the fearful servant 'hid' his master's talent in the ground (Matt 25:18, 25), and a woman 'hid' leaven in three measures of flour

(Luke 13:21). Spanish 'escondieron/escondiste' and French 'cacher' capture the deliberate agency in these acts of concealment. HIDING AND CONCEALING crystal clear, shining like crystal

John's vision of the New Jerusalem includes its radiance—'having the glory of God, its radiance like a most rare jewel, like jasper, clear as crystal' (Revelation 21:11). The participle describes the quality of being transparent and brilliant like crystal. Ancient crystals, including clear quartz, represented perfect clarity and purity. The verb conveys the process of crystallization—becoming perfectly clear and luminous. The holy city possesses supernatural brightness, reflecting God's own glory.

(1×) John employs this rare verb to describe the New Jerusalem's supernatural clarity—it shines with crystal transparency. The term suggests the process of becoming crystalline, achieving perfect translucence. All language witnesses point to crystal as the standard of clarity: German 'kristallen,' French 'kristallen,' Spanish 'cristalina.' The city doesn't merely contain crystal; it possesses crystal's essential quality of radiant transparency, making God's glory visible. crystal, rock crystal (transparent quartz)

This noun originally meant ice (from κρύος, 'cold'), but came to refer to rock crystal—transparent quartz that resembles ice in clarity. Both NT occurrences are in Revelation's visions. In Revelation 4:6, before God's throne there is 'a sea of glass, like crystal' (θάλασσα ὑαλίνη ὁμοία κρυστάλλῳ)—emphasizing perfect transparency and purity. In Revelation 22:1, the river of the water of life is 'clear as crystal' (λαμπρὸν ὡς κρύσταλλον), flowing from God's throne. The term evokes both the brilliance and the purity of what is described, using the most transparent substance known to convey heavenly glory.

(2×) Revelation 4:6 describes 'a sea of glass like crystal' (ὁμοία κρυστάλλῳ) before the throne. Revelation 22:1 shows the river of life 'bright as crystal' (λαμπρὸν ὡς κρύσταλλον). The multilingual glosses are straightforward: English 'crystal,' Spanish 'cristal' (with slight variations 'a cristal'), French 'Kristall,' German 'Kristall.' in secret, secretly, in a hidden manner

Paul describes the 'unfruitful works of darkness' that believers should not participate in, adding 'for it is shameful even to speak of the things that they do in secret' (Ephesians 5:12). The adverb emphasizes concealment and hiddenness—actions done out of sight because they cannot bear scrutiny. Classical usage describes secret actions, whether conspiratorial or simply private. Paul's point is that darkness-deeds require secrecy because they are shameful; merely naming them in public is disgraceful.

(1×) Paul's ethical teaching contrasts the open life of light with actions hidden in secret darkness. The adverb emphasizes the concealment—these deeds happen 'in secret' because they cannot survive exposure. The classical usage includes conspiracies and hidden activities. Paul's rhetorical strategy suggests that some sins are so shameful that detailed discussion itself becomes inappropriate. What happens 'in secret' reveals moral bankruptcy—righteousness has nothing to hide. SECRECY AND HIDING

κτάομαι G2932 V-AIM-1S (7×)

To acquire, procure for oneself, gain possession of; used of purchasing property, obtaining a right, or gaining mastery over something.

Ktaomai means to procure something for oneself, whether through purchase, effort, or self-discipline. In Matt 10:9 Jesus forbids the Twelve from acquiring gold, silver, or copper for their journey, stressing radical dependence on God. The word covers both material acquisition (Acts 1:18, where Judas 'acquired a field' with his blood money) and the spiritual discipline of self-mastery (1 Thess 4:4, 'gain control of one's own body'). Spanish 'adquirir' and French 'acquérir' preserve the same middle-voice nuance of getting something for one's own benefit that the Greek captures so naturally.

acquire, obtain, possess (7×) To procure or gain possession of something for oneself, spanning material property, legal rights, and abstract qualities. The middle voice underscores personal agency: the acquirer acts in their own interest. In Acts 8:20 Peter rebukes Simon Magus for thinking the gift of God could be 'acquired' with money, while in Luke 21:19 perseverance is the means by which believers 'gain' their souls. The multilingual evidence (Spanish 'adquirir,' French 'acquérir,' German 'erwerben') consistently renders the idea of deliberate procurement rather than passive receiving. BUYING AND ACQUIRING

κτῆμα G2933 N-ANP (4×)

Possession, piece of property; something acquired and owned, especially landed estate or material wealth.

Derived from κτάομαι ('to acquire'), this noun denotes a concrete possession—something gotten and held as property. In classical Greek it could refer to any acquired asset, from slaves to heirlooms, but in the NT it appears in contexts of landed wealth. The rich young man went away sorrowful because he had many κτήματα (Matt 19:22; Mark 10:22), and the early Jerusalem believers sold their possessions and distributed the proceeds (Acts 2:45; 5:1). Spanish propiedades and German Besitz both highlight the tangible, material nature of these holdings.

(4×) Possession, piece of property, estate. Refers to acquired material goods, especially landed property or substantial wealth. In the Synoptic accounts of the rich young man (Matt 19:22, Mark 10:22), the plural κτήματα emphasizes the extent of his holdings that made discipleship costly. In Acts 2:45 and 5:1 it denotes real property sold by early believers for communal redistribution. The multilingual glosses—Spanish posesiones/propiedades, French possession, German Besitz—uniformly point to tangible, owned assets rather than abstract possession. POSSESSIONS AND PROPERTY

κτῆνος G2934 N-ANP (4×)

Domesticated animal, beast of burden; a creature owned for transport, labor, or livestock.

From the same root as κτάομαι ('to acquire'), κτῆνος originally meant 'property' in the form of livestock—flocks and herds. By NT times it had broadened to include any domesticated animal, particularly beasts used for riding or transport. The Good Samaritan sets the wounded man on his own κτῆνος (Luke 10:34), and Paul is provided mounts (κτήνη) for safe passage to Felix (Acts 23:24). Spanish cabalgadura ('riding animal') captures this transport sense precisely, while the broader 'animal' rendering in English and French reflects the word's use in 1 Cor 15:39 for animal flesh generally.

(4×) Domesticated animal, beast of burden or livestock. Covers the range from riding animals to livestock in general. In Luke 10:34 and Acts 23:24 the word refers specifically to mounts or pack animals used for transport—Spanish cabalgadura highlights this nuance well. In 1 Cor 15:39 Paul uses it in a broader biological sense, distinguishing the flesh of κτήνη from that of humans, birds, and fish. Rev 18:13 lists κτήνη among trade goods of fallen Babylon, evoking the classical sense of livestock as valuable property. The etymological link to κτάομαι ('acquire') underscores that these are owned, domesticated creatures. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE owners, possessors of property

Luke describes the early church's economic sharing: 'There was not a needy person among them, for as many as were owners of lands or houses sold them' (Acts 4:34). The term simply means possessors or owners—those who had legal ownership of property. The early Jerusalem church's voluntary redistribution involved actual property owners selling real estate to support the needy. This was extraordinary generosity, not mandated communism. The 'owners' became donors, creating economic equality.

(1×) In Luke's summary of early church community life, 'owners' of property voluntarily liquidated assets to support believers in need. The term is straightforward legal language—these were legitimate property holders exercising ownership rights to sell. Spanish 'dueños' and French 'possesseur' capture the legal possession. What makes this remarkable is not the term but the action: owners voluntarily divested themselves of property to create a community without economic need. Ownership became opportunity for radical generosity. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

κτίζω G2936 V-APA-GMS (15×)

To create, found, or bring into being; as a substantive participle, the Creator — the one who originates all things.

A verb rooted in the Greek tradition of founding cities and settling lands, κτίζω takes on immense theological weight in the New Testament, where it speaks of God's act of bringing all things into existence. Paul uses it to describe both the original creation (Col 1:16) and the new spiritual creation of believers (Eph 2:10, 4:24). The substantival participle 'the one who created' becomes a title for God himself, as in Rom 1:25, where Paul contrasts worshipping the creature with worshipping the Creator. Spanish 'Creador' and German 'erschaffen' both capture this weighty, originating force.

1. create, bring into being (11×) Denotes the divine act of creating or bringing something into existence, whether the physical cosmos (Mark 13:19), humanity (1 Cor 11:9), or the new spiritual person in Christ (Eph 2:10, 4:24). Multilingual glosses converge on a single concept — Spanish 'creado,' French 'créer,' German 'erschaffen' — confirming a unified semantic core of origination. The passive forms ('having been created') emphasize the creature's dependence on the Creator's initiative. CREATION AND MAKING

2. Creator (substantival) (4×) The participial form used as a substantive to designate God as 'the Creator' or 'the one who created.' In Matt 19:4 Jesus appeals to 'the one who made them from the beginning,' and in Rom 1:25 Paul draws the fundamental Creator-creature distinction. Spanish 'Creador' and German 'erschaffen' used substantivally reflect this shift from action to agent. This usage functions as a divine title grounding theological arguments in God's sovereign originating power (Eph 3:9; Col 3:10). CREATION AND MAKING

κτίσ-ις G2937 N-DFS (19×)

Creation or the created order; also a human institution or ordinance established by authority.

Rooted in the verb ktizō (to create), this noun spans from the cosmic act of divine creation to its concrete results—every creature God has made. Paul invokes it to declare God's invisible attributes visible 'since the creation of the world' (Rom 1:20), while Mark uses it for 'every creature' under heaven (Mark 16:15). In a striking extension at 1 Peter 2:13, the same word applies to human institutions, showing how the Greek mind could see governmental structures as a kind of purposeful ordering.

1. creation, created order (18×) The act of creating or the totality of what God has made, encompassing both the abstract event ('from the beginning of creation,' Mark 10:6; 13:19) and the concrete result—every living creature. Spanish and French consistently use 'creación/création' for the act and 'criatura/créature' for the being, a distinction English collapses into 'creation' and 'creature.' German 'Schöpfung' captures the grand sweep. Paul's argument in Romans 1:20 and 8:19-22 depends on this word embracing the entire created order groaning together. CREATION CREATED ORDER

2. institution, ordinance (1×) A human institution, social structure, or ordinance—an extension from divine creating to human ordering. Found only at 1 Peter 2:13, where believers are urged to submit to 'every human institution' (pasē anthrōpinē ktisei). Spanish renders it 'institución,' distinguishing it clearly from the divine-creation sense. The metaphor is potent: human governance is framed as a kind of purposeful founding, echoing the creative ordering of God himself. CREATION CREATED ORDER

κτίσ-μα G2938 N-NNS (4×)

Created thing, creature; anything brought into being by a creator, especially by God.

A noun derived from κτίζω ('to create, found'), denoting the product of creation. While classical usage could mean 'colony' or 'foundation,' the NT employs it exclusively for God's created beings. Paul declares that every κτίσμα of God is good (1 Tim 4:4), James calls believers a kind of firstfruits among God's creatures (Jas 1:18), and Revelation envisions every κτίσμα in heaven, earth, and sea praising the Lamb (Rev 5:13). The multilingual consensus—Spanish criatura, French créature, German Geschöpf—unanimously points to 'creature' in the theological sense of something God has made.

(4×) Created thing, creature made by God. Refers to any entity that owes its existence to divine creative activity. In 1 Tim 4:4 Paul affirms the goodness of every κτίσμα, countering ascetic prohibitions on food. Jas 1:18 applies it to believers as a 'firstfruits' of God's creatures, elevating the word to include redeemed humanity. Rev 5:13 and 8:9 use it for the totality of living creation—every creature in heaven, on earth, under the earth, and in the sea. The consistent rendering as criatura/créature/Geschöpf across languages confirms a single theological sense: the product of God's creative act. CREATION CREATED ORDER

Creator, the one who creates and establishes

Peter encourages suffering believers to 'entrust their souls to a faithful Creator' (1 Peter 4:19). The title emphasizes God's role as founder and maker of all things. Classical usage included city founders and builders; the Septuagint applies it to God as Creator of the universe. Peter's point is pastoral—the one who created can be trusted to preserve. If God founded creation itself, he can sustain his people through suffering. The Creator's faithfulness to his work guarantees his care for those made in his image.

(1×) Peter grounds Christian suffering in theology—believers can 'entrust their souls' to God specifically because he is their faithful 'Creator.' The term invokes God's power and foundational role: the one who made everything can certainly preserve those made in his image. Classical usage included city founders; the LXX applies it to God's cosmic creative work. German 'Schöpfer' captures the making, establishing sense. The logic is from greater to lesser: if God created, he can sustain. The Creator won't abandon his own workmanship. CREATION AND MAKING trickery, dice-playing, crafty manipulation

Paul warns believers not to remain immature children, 'tossed by waves and blown about by every wind of teaching, by human trickery, by craftiness in deceitful scheming' (Ephesians 4:14). The word originally meant dice-playing, then extended to the cheating and manipulation associated with gambling. False teachers operate like dishonest gamblers, using sleight of hand and deceptive tactics. The metaphor suggests both randomness (dice) and calculated deception (loaded dice). Spiritual maturity recognizes such manipulation.

(1×) Paul's metaphor draws on dice-playing and gambling culture—the term originally referred to playing with dice, then to the trickery and cheating endemic to ancient gambling. False teachers manipulate like dishonest gamblers, using crafty schemes to deceive. German 'List' (cunning/trickery) and Spanish 'astucia' both capture the calculated deception. Paul wants believers mature enough to recognize loaded dice when they see them—to discern manipulative teaching rather than being swept along by clever rhetoric. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14351 WITH 4 SENSES administrations, guidance, leadership ability

In Paul's list of spiritual gifts, he includes 'administrations' among the Spirit's endowments (1 Corinthians 12:28). The term literally means 'acts of steering' or 'piloting'—the skill of guiding a ship to its destination. Metaphorically extended, it describes the ability to give direction and governance to a community. Just as a pilot navigates dangerous waters, those with this gift guide the church through challenges. Administrative leadership, far from being merely organizational, is a supernatural charism for steering God's people.

(1×) Paul lists 'administrations' or 'acts of guidance' among the Spirit's diverse gifts to the church. The nautical metaphor (steering/piloting) suggests both skill and God-given ability to navigate the church through challenges. French 'gouvernement' captures the governance aspect, while the Greek emphasizes the active steering. This isn't mere bureaucracy but spiritual capacity to discern direction and guide the community toward God's purposes. Like pilots navigating treacherous waters, those with this gift keep the church on course. RULING AND REIGNING

helmsman, ship's pilot, steersman

This noun (from κυβερνάω, 'to steer') refers to the pilot or helmsman of a ship—the one responsible for steering and navigation. In Acts 27:11, the Roman centurion was 'persuaded by the pilot (κυβερνήτῃ) and the ship owner' more than by Paul's warning, leading to the disastrous voyage toward shipwreck. In Revelation 18:17, 'every ship's captain (κυβερνήτης)' and seafaring person mourns Babylon's fall, as maritime trade ceases. The term was also used metaphorically for leaders or governors (those who 'steer' the state), but the NT uses are literal references to ship navigation.

(2×) Acts 27:11 describes the centurion being persuaded by 'the pilot (κυβερνήτῃ) and the shipowner' to continue the voyage despite Paul's warning. Revelation 18:17 lists 'every ship's captain (κυβερνήτης)' among those mourning Babylon. The multilingual glosses show the maritime context: English 'pilot/ship-master,' Spanish 'piloto/timonel' (pilot/helmsman), French 'marin/pilote,' German 'Steuermann/κυβερνήτῃ' (steersman). The term emphasizes professional navigation skill and the responsibility for the ship's course. SAIL TRAVEL SHIP

all around, round about; from all sides, in a circle

An adverb indicating encirclement or surrounding on all sides. John's vision in Revelation employs this word to describe the arrangement around God's throne: a rainbow encircles it (4:3), twenty-four thrones with elders sit around it (4:4), and the four living creatures are positioned around it, each covered with eyes all around (4:8). This spatial positioning emphasizes the centrality of God's throne in heaven, with all created beings—symbolized by the twenty-four elders and four living creatures—oriented toward and surrounding the divine presence in worship.

(3×) All around, round about, in a circle on all sides. All three occurrences appear in Revelation 4, describing John's vision of God's throne: a rainbow encircles the throne (4:3), twenty-four thrones with elders are positioned around it (4:4), and four living creatures are situated around the throne, each covered with eyes all around (4:8). The repeated use creates a vivid image of concentric circles of worship surrounding the divine throne, with everything oriented toward God's central presence. AROUND AND SURROUNDING

κυκλ-όω G2944 V-PPM/P-AFS (5×)

To encircle, surround, or form a ring around; used of military siege, crowd enclosure, and cosmic gathering.

Describes the action of forming a circle around something or someone—encircling, surrounding, or besieging. Jesus prophesies that Jerusalem will be surrounded by armies (Luke 21:20), and the Jewish leaders encircle him in the temple demanding a clear answer (John 10:24). In Acts 14:20, disciples stand in a circle around the stoned Paul. Hebrews 11:30 recalls how the Israelites encircled Jericho for seven days until its walls fell. Revelation 20:9 depicts the final siege where hostile forces surround the camp of the saints. The Spanish 'rodearon' (they surrounded) and German 'umringen' (to encircle) both center on the ring-formation imagery.

(5×) To encircle, surround, or besiege by forming a ring around a person, place, or group. The root κύκλος (circle) is visible in every usage. Luke 21:20 uses it prophetically of armies surrounding Jerusalem—a military siege. John 10:24 applies it to the Jews closing in around Jesus in Solomon's Colonnade, pressing for a definitive messianic claim. Acts 14:20 describes disciples gathering in a protective circle around the stoned Paul at Lystra. Heb 11:30 recalls the seven-day encirclement of Jericho. Rev 20:9 envisions the eschatological siege of the beloved city. Spanish 'rodearon' (surrounded), French 'entourer' (encircle), and German 'umringen' (ring around) all preserve the circular spatial imagery central to this verb. RELEASE AND MOVEMENT

κυκλ-έω G2945 Prep (8×)

Around, round about, in a circle; a preposition/adverb indicating circular spatial orientation.

Kuklo functions as a preposition and adverb meaning 'around,' 'round about,' or 'in a circle.' It derives from kuklos ('circle, ring') and conveys the spatial idea of surrounding or encircling. Jesus looks 'around' at those seated in a circle about him (Mark 3:34); he goes 'around' the villages teaching (Mark 6:6); and Paul describes preaching the gospel 'in a circle' from Jerusalem to Illyricum (Rom 15:19). The Spanish 'alrededor' and German 'ringsumher' both emphasize the encircling, all-around quality of this spatial term.

around / in a circle (8×) A spatial preposition and adverb meaning 'around, round about, in a circle,' indicating surrounding or encircling orientation. Used of Jesus looking around at those seated about him (Mark 3:34), of going around the villages (Mark 6:6), and of Paul's missionary circuit from Jerusalem to Illyricum (Rom 15:19). Spanish 'alrededor' and German 'ringsumher' both emphasize the comprehensive, encircling quality that this dative-form noun (from kuklos, 'circle') conveys as a spatial marker. AROUND AND SURROUNDING wallowing place, mud pit for rolling

Peter quotes a proverb about apostates: 'The dog returns to its own vomit, and the sow is washed only to wallow in the mud' (2 Peter 2:22). The term refers to the muddy place where pigs roll and wallow. The image is deliberately repulsive—someone who experiences cleansing but returns to filth is like a bathed pig heading straight back to the mud pit. The proverb illustrates the tragedy of apostasy—knowing the truth but choosing defilement. It's nature asserting itself: pigs will be pigs.

(1×) Peter employs a disgusting image to describe apostates—the washed sow returning to wallow in mud. The term specifically denotes the wallowing place, the mud pit where pigs roll. The point is grimly humorous: you can wash a pig, but its nature drives it back to filth. Spanish 'revolcadero' captures the place of rolling/wallowing. This is more than relapse; it's return to one's true nature. The tragedy is that these apostates had been 'washed'—they knew cleansing but preferred the mud. TRAMPLING AND TREADING was rolling about, wallowing (in convulsions)

Mark describes the demon-possessed boy's violent reaction when brought to Jesus: the spirit 'immediately convulsed the boy, and he fell on the ground and rolled about, foaming at the mouth' (Mark 9:20). The verb depicts rolling, thrashing movement—the violent convulsions caused by demonic torment. The same root appears in the 'wallowing' of pigs in mud, but here it describes involuntary, painful thrashing. The scene emphasizes the demon's cruelty and the boy's helplessness before Jesus intervenes.

(1×) Mark's vivid narrative captures the demon's violent assault on the boy—convulsing, falling, rolling on the ground, foaming. The imperfect tense suggests ongoing, repeated rolling and thrashing. The verb relates to rolling or wallowing, here applied to convulsive movements beyond the victim's control. Spanish 'rodaba' and German 'sich wälzen' both capture the rolling motion. This demonstrates the demon's cruelty and malice, making the father's desperate plea to Jesus all the more poignant. The rolling ceases when Jesus commands. TRAMPLING AND TREADING

κυλλ-ός G2948 Adj-AMP (4×)

Crippled, maimed, deformed; having a limb disabled or cut off, especially a hand or foot.

An adjective describing physical deformity, particularly the loss or disabling of a limb. Classical Greek used it for club-footedness or bandy legs, but NT usage focuses on maimed or crippled hands and feet. In the healing narratives of Matt 15:30–31, the κυλλοί appear alongside the blind, lame, and mute as recipients of Jesus' restorative power. In the discipleship sayings of Matt 18:8 and Mark 9:43, Jesus uses the word hyperbolically: it is better to enter life κυλλόν than to be cast into Gehenna whole. Spanish lisiado and French estropié both capture the sense of disabling injury.

(4×) Crippled, maimed in a limb, deformed. Describes a person with a disabled or amputated hand or foot. In Matt 15:30–31 the κυλλοί are among the afflicted crowds brought to Jesus for healing, listed alongside the blind and lame—their restoration demonstrates messianic power over bodily brokenness. In Matt 18:8 and Mark 9:43 Jesus employs the term in radical discipleship teaching: entering life maimed is preferable to retaining the offending member and facing judgment. Spanish lisiado ('injured, disabled') and German verstümmelt ('mutilated') both convey severe physical impairment rather than minor defect. LAME CRIPPLED

κῦμα G2949 N-GNP (5×)

A wave or billow, especially of the sea; used literally of surging water and figuratively of restless instability.

Derived from a root meaning 'to swell,' this noun pictures the rolling, cresting motion of ocean water. In the Gospels it describes the terrifying waves that swamped the disciples' boat (Matt 8:24; 14:24; Mark 4:37), while in Acts 27:41 it captures the destructive surf that broke apart Paul's ship. Jude 1:13 turns the image metaphorical: false teachers are 'wild waves of the sea, foaming up their shame.' The multilingual glosses consistently render it as 'wave(s)' (Spanish olas, French vagues, German Wellen), confirming a tight semantic focus on surging water.

(5×) A wave or billow of the sea — the surging, cresting mass of water driven by wind or storm. All five NT occurrences depict literal or metaphorical sea-waves. In the Synoptic storm narratives (Matt 8:24; Mark 4:37), the word conveys overwhelming natural force threatening a small vessel. Jude 1:13 extends the image to moral chaos, portraying false teachers as 'wild waves' — an image that every major translation tradition renders with the standard word for ocean wave (spa: olas, fra: vagues, deu: Wellen). WAVE BILLOW SEA

κύμβᾰλον G2950 N-NNS (1×)

cymbal, percussion instrument for religious music

Paul declares that love is essential—without it, 'I am a noisy gong or a clanging cymbal' (1 Corinthians 13:1). Cymbals were percussion instruments used in worship, including temple service. The point is not that cymbals are bad but that they are mere noise without musical context and purpose. Speech without love is like a cymbal struck randomly—loud but meaningless. Paul may also allude to pagan religious rites where cymbals accompanied ecstatic frenzy. Love distinguishes meaningful communication from empty sound.

(1×) Paul's famous love chapter uses the cymbal as image of loveless speech—loud, metallic noise signifying nothing. Cymbals were common in both Jewish temple worship and pagan rites. The point isn't that cymbals are inherently bad but that they produce mere noise when divorced from musical purpose and harmony. All language witnesses identify the percussion instrument. Without love, even prophetic speech and angelic tongues become random clanging—sound without substance, noise without meaning. SINGING AND MUSIC

κύμῑνον G2951 N-ANS (1×)

cumin, aromatic seed used as spice and condiment

Jesus rebukes the scribes and Pharisees for misplaced priorities: 'You tithe mint and dill and cumin, and have neglected the weightier matters of the law' (Matthew 23:23). Cumin was a small aromatic seed used as seasoning, economically insignificant compared to major crops. The Pharisees' meticulous tithing of garden herbs demonstrated their legal precision but also revealed their inverted values —majoring in minors while ignoring justice and mercy. A classical proverb about splitting cumin seeds described extreme stinginess. Jesus doesn't condemn their tithing; he condemns their neglect of what truly matters.

(1×) Jesus' critique of Pharisaic legalism uses cumin as example of their misplaced precision—they calculate tithes on insignificant garden seeds while neglecting justice, mercy, and faithfulness. Cumin seeds were tiny, aromatic, relatively worthless compared to wheat or oil. Classical Greek included a proverb about splitting cumin seeds (extreme stinginess). All language witnesses identify this specific spice. Jesus' point is proportionality: they should tithe cumin, but not while ignoring the 'weightier matters' that actually reflect God's character. SPICE AROMATIC PERFUME

κῠν-άριον G2952 N-DNP (4×)

Little dog, small household dog; a diminutive term for a pet dog, distinct from wild or scavenging dogs.

The diminutive form of κύων ('dog'), κυνάριον specifically denotes a small domestic dog—a household pet rather than the despised street scavenger. This distinction is theologically significant in the Syrophoenician woman's exchange with Jesus (Matt 15:26–27; Mark 7:27–28). When Jesus says the children's bread should not be thrown to the κυναρίοις, the woman brilliantly turns the diminutive to her advantage: even the little dogs under the table eat the children's crumbs. German Hündlein and Spanish perritos both preserve the affectionate diminutive nuance that makes this dialogue so memorable.

(4×) Little dog, household pet dog. A diminutive distinguishing small domestic dogs from the larger, unclean street dogs (κύνες) of the ancient Near East. All four NT occurrences appear in the same episode: the Syrophoenician/Canaanite woman's dialogue with Jesus (Matt 15:26–27; Mark 7:27–28). The diminutive form softens the metaphor—these are pets under the family table, not scavengers outside. The woman seizes on this nuance to argue that even κυνάρια receive crumbs from their masters' table. Spanish perritos and German Hündlein faithfully preserve the diminutive, which is essential to the passage's rhetorical power. DOG ANIMAL

Κύπρια, τά G2953 N-DMS (3×)

Cyprian, of Cyprus; a person from the island of Cyprus

This adjective identifies someone as coming from Cyprus, the large Mediterranean island south of Asia Minor. Cyprus had a significant Jewish population in the first century, and Cypriot believers played important roles in early Christianity. Barnabas, Paul's missionary companion, was 'a Levite, a native of Cyprus' (Acts 4:36). After the Jerusalem persecution, Cypriot believers were among those who traveled to Antioch and first preached to Greeks (11:20). Acts 21:16 mentions Mnason of Cyprus, 'an early disciple' who hosted Paul. The Cypriot connection highlights the geographical spread and ethnic diversity of the early church.

(3×) A Cyprian, someone from Cyprus. Barnabas is identified as 'a Levite, a Cyprian by birth' in Acts 4:36, explaining his family background on this Mediterranean island with a substantial Jewish diaspora. Acts 11:20 mentions Cyprian believers (along with Cyrenians) who went to Antioch and pioneered preaching to Greeks. Acts 21:16 introduces Mnason, 'a Cyprian, an early disciple' who provided hospitality. These references show Cyprus as a significant source of early Christian missionaries and leaders. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Cyprus, the large Mediterranean island south of Asia Minor, important as a base for early Christian mission.

Cyprus (Greek Kypros) is the third-largest island in the Mediterranean, lying just south of the coast of modern Turkey. Famous in antiquity as a source of copper — the Latin cyprium gave us the English word — Cyprus became strategically important for the early church. Barnabas was a native Cypriot (Acts 4:36), and the island served as the first stop on his missionary journey with Paul (Acts 13:4). All five NT references occur in Acts, tracing the spread of the gospel through this crossroads of the ancient world.

(5×) Cyprus — the large Greek island in the eastern Mediterranean, south of Asia Minor. In Acts it functions as a key waypoint for early Christian mission: believers scattered by persecution brought the gospel there (Acts 11:19), Paul and Barnabas launched their first journey from its shores (Acts 13:4), and Barnabas later returned with Mark (Acts 15:39). The translational evidence (spa: Chipre, fra: Chypre, deu: Kypros) consistently treats it as a proper geographical name with no semantic variation across occurrences. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to stoop down, bend forward; to bow or incline the body downward

κύπτω G2955 V-APA-NMS (3×)

This verb describes the physical action of bending forward or stooping down, typically to look at something on the ground or to demonstrate humility. The Gospel accounts use it in two significant contexts. In John 8:6, 8, Jesus stoops down to write on the ground when confronted with the woman caught in adultery—a gesture whose meaning has prompted endless speculation. Mark 1:7 uses it figuratively: John the Baptist declares himself unworthy to stoop down and untie the Messiah's sandal straps, a task so menial that even slaves were sometimes exempt from it. The physical posture communicates profound spiritual humility.

(3×) To stoop down, bend forward, or bow down. John the Baptist uses this word in Mark 1:7, declaring himself unworthy even to 'stoop down and untie' the Messiah's sandal straps—a task considered too lowly even for some slaves. In John 8:6, 8, Jesus 'stooped down and wrote on the ground' when the scribes and Pharisees brought the woman caught in adultery, creating a dramatic pause that shifts attention from accusation to introspection. The physical gesture becomes spiritually significant in both contexts. BOW KNEEL CROUCH

Kurenaios – Cyrenian; a person from Cyrene, the Greek colony in North Africa (modern Libya)

Kurenaios is a gentilicium (ethnic adjective used as a noun) meaning 'a person from Cyrene,' the major Greek colony in the North African region of Cyrenaica (modern eastern Libya). The city hosted a large and influential Jewish community. In the NT, Simon the Cyrenian is conscripted to carry Jesus' cross on the road to Golgotha (Matt 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26), making him an indelible figure in the Passion narrative. Cyrenians also appear among the Hellenistic Jewish disputants in Acts 6:9 and among the early missionaries who first preached to Gentiles at Antioch (Acts 11:20; 13:1). Spanish Cireneo, French Cyreneen, and German Kyrenaeer preserve the ethnic designation.

Cyrenian (6×) An inhabitant or native of Cyrene, the Greek colonial city in North Africa with a significant Jewish diaspora population. Simon of Cyrene, pressed into service to bear Jesus' cross (Matt 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26), is the most prominent Cyrenian in the NT. Other Cyrenians appear as members of the Synagogue of the Freedmen who dispute with Stephen (Acts 6:9) and as pioneering evangelists who first proclaimed the gospel to Greek-speaking Gentiles at Antioch (Acts 11:20). Lucius of Cyrene is named among the prophets and teachers at Antioch (Acts 13:1). Spanish Cireneo and French Cyreneen render the gentilicium straightforwardly. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Cyrene, North African Greek city in modern Libya

Luke notes that among the crowd at Pentecost were 'visitors from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabs' as well as people from Cyrene (Acts 2:10). Cyrene was a major Greek colony in North Africa (modern Libya), with a significant Jewish population. Simon of Cyrene carried Jesus' cross (Matthew 27:32); the church in Antioch included Cyrenian believers (Acts 13:1). The city's prominence in the Diaspora made it an important source of Hellenistic Jewish influence on early Christianity.

(1×) Acts repeatedly mentions Cyrene and Cyrenians in the early church's expansion. This North African Greek city had a substantial Jewish community that maintained strong Jerusalem connections. Luke's mention of Cyrenians at Pentecost, Simon carrying the cross, and Cyrenian leadership in Antioch all highlight this community's significance. All language witnesses transliterate the Greek name. Κυρήνιος G2958 N-GMS (1×)

Quirinius, Roman governor during the census (Luke 2:2)

Luke dates Jesus' birth by reference to 'the first registration when Quirinius was governor of Syria' (Luke 2:2). This chronological note has sparked considerable historical debate, as Quirinius' governorship is dated to AD 6-7, while Jesus' birth is usually placed earlier. Various solutions have been proposed: an earlier governorship, a previous census, or understanding 'first' as 'before' the famous census. Whatever the precise historical relationship, Luke intends to anchor the nativity in datable Roman history.

(1×) Luke provides historical anchoring for Jesus' birth through reference to Quirinius' governorship and the census. The genitive form identifies him as the Syrian governor at the time Luke has in view. All language witnesses transliterate the Latin name (P. Sulpicius Quirinius) with phonetic variations. The historical puzzle of coordinating Luke's reference with known dates of Quirinius' governorship has generated much scholarly discussion. Luke's intent is clear even if details remain debated: the Messiah's birth belongs to datable, public history, not myth. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

κυρία G2959 N-VFS (2×)

lady, a woman of high status or authority

This noun (the feminine form of κύριος, 'lord') means 'lady' in the sense of a woman of authority, status, or respect. It appears only in 2 John, where the epistle is addressed 'to the elect lady (κυρίᾳ)' (v. 1) and closes with greetings from 'the children of your elect sister (ἀδελφῆς)' (v. 13). Scholars debate whether this refers to a specific Christian woman of prominence or is a personification of a local church (with 'children' being church members and 'sister' being another congregation). Either way, the term conveys respect and possibly authority within the Christian community.

(2×) Second John 1:1 addresses 'the elect lady (ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ)' and her children. Second John 1:5 continues 'and now I ask you, lady (κυρία).' The multilingual glosses preserve the term: Spanish 'señora' (lady), English 'lady,' French and German use the Greek 'κυρία/κυρίᾳ' or 'Herrin' (mistress/lady). The vocative in verse 5 is direct address. Whether this is a person named 'Kyria' (Lady) or a respectful title for a woman or church remains debated. WOMAN AND WIFE belonging to the Lord (Christ), the Lord's

This adjective (from κύριος, 'Lord') means 'belonging to the Lord' or 'of the Lord,' specifically referring to Christ. Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians 11:20 to distinguish 'the Lord's Supper' (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον) from ordinary meals—a meal that belongs to and commemorates the Lord Jesus. Revelation 1:10 refers to 'the Lord's Day' (κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ)—likely Sunday, the day of Christ's resurrection, when John received his vision. The term emphasizes Christ's ownership and the sacred character of what is designated as 'the Lord's.' In secular usage, it could refer to what belonged to the Roman Emperor, but Christian usage transfers it to Christ as true Lord.

(2×) First Corinthians 11:20 rebukes those who gather not to eat 'the Lord's Supper' (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον) but their own meals. Revelation 1:10 says John was in the Spirit 'on the Lord's day' (ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ). The multilingual glosses are consistent: Spanish 'del Señor' (of the Lord), English 'Lord's/a Lord's,' German 'des Herrn,' French 'Seigneur/des Herrn.' Both uses indicate something that belongs to or is associated with the Lord Jesus Christ specifically. LORDS AND MASTERS

To exercise lordship or dominion, rule over, be master of; used of political rulers, death's power, sin's reign, and Christ's sovereignty.

Kyrieuo describes the exercise of lordship or sovereign authority over someone or something. Jesus uses it critically of Gentile rulers who 'lord it over' their subjects (Luke 22:25), contrasting worldly domination with servant leadership. Paul then applies it theologically: death once had dominion but no longer rules over the risen Christ (Rom 6:9), sin shall not have dominion over believers under grace (Rom 6:14), and the law lords it over a person only while they live (Rom 7:1). The Spanish 'se ensenorea' and German 'herrschen' both carry the forceful overtone of mastery that this word demands.

exercise lordship, have dominion over (7×) To be lord or master of, to exercise ruling authority or dominion over a person, force, or realm. The word carries a tone of sovereign control rather than gentle guidance. In Luke 22:25 Jesus identifies it with the oppressive style of Gentile kings, while Paul repurposes it to describe cosmic powers: death's dominion ended at the resurrection (Rom 6:9), and sin's dominion ends under grace (Rom 6:14). The Spanish rendering 'se ensenorea' (from 'senor,' lord) mirrors the Greek derivation from kyrios, and German 'herrschen' captures the same authoritative force. RULING AND REIGNING

κύριος G2962 N-VMS (724×)

Lord, master, owner, sir: title of divine sovereignty, human authority, property ownership, or respectful address.

One of the New Testament's most theologically loaded words, κύριος spans the full spectrum of authority — from the God of Israel to a courteous 'sir' on the street. When the Septuagint translators chose κύριος to render the divine name YHWH, they set in motion a Christological revolution: every time the early church called Jesus κύριος, they were placing him in the seat of Israel's covenant God. Spanish 'Señor' and German 'Herr' both preserve this double register of divine and human lordship. At its most mundane, the word simply means 'owner' (Luke 19:33, the owners of the colt) or a polite 'Sirs' (Acts 16:30, the Philippian jailer's desperate plea).

1. Lord (divine title) (661×) The supreme divine title — God or Christ addressed as Lord, the sovereign ruler over all creation. This dominates New Testament usage (661 of 724 occurrences) and carries immense theological weight because the LXX used κύριος to translate YHWH. In Matthew 4:7 and 4:10, Jesus quotes Deuteronomy using κύριος for God; Paul's confession κύριος Ἰησοῦς (1 Cor 12:3) is the earliest Christian creed. Spanish 'Señor' and German 'Herr' both maintain the reverent capital-letter usage. LORDS AND MASTERS

en: Kyrios, Lord | es: A-Señor, Señor, a-Señor | fr: Seigneur | de: Herr Matt 1:22; Matt 2:15; Matt 4:7; Matt 4:10; Matt 5:33

2. master, lord (human authority) (61×) A human lord, master, or authority figure exercising dominion over servants, slaves, or subordinates. Jesus uses this sense in parables — 'no one can serve two masters' (Matt 6:24), 'a disciple is not above his master' (Matt 10:24). The slave-master relationship is literal and concrete here. French 'Seigneur' and Spanish 'señor' (lowercase in some traditions) mark the distinction from divine usage, though the boundary is often theologically blurred. LORDS AND MASTERS

en: lord, master | es: señor | fr: Seigneur | de: Herr Matt 6:24; Matt 10:24; Matt 10:25; Matt 15:27; Matt 18:25

3. owner, proprietor (1×) Owner or proprietor of property, emphasizing legal possession rather than personal authority. In Luke 19:33, when the disciples untie the colt, 'its owners' (οἱ κύριοι αὐτοῦ) challenge them — the word here means simply the people who possess the animal. Spanish 'dueños' (owners) captures this property sense distinctly from the authority-laden 'señor.' LORDS AND MASTERS

en: owners | es: dueños | fr: Seigneur | de: Herr Luke 19:33

4. sir (polite address) (1×) A respectful or courteous form of address to a person of standing, without implying actual lordship or divine status — essentially 'sir.' In Acts 16:30, the terrified Philippian jailer falls before Paul and Silas asking κύριοι, τί με δεῖ ποιεῖν — 'Sirs, what must I do to be saved?' The plural 'Sirs/Señores' signals deference rather than theological confession, though Luke may intend irony given what follows. LORDS AND MASTERS

κῡρι-ότης G2963 N-NFP (4×)

Lordship, dominion, sovereign authority; both the abstract concept of ruling power and a class of angelic beings.

Derived from κύριος ('lord'), this noun carries both an abstract and a concrete sense in the NT. Abstractly, it denotes sovereign authority or ruling power—the kind of dominion that belongs to God or is exercised by rulers. Concretely, it appears in Pauline angel-hierarchies as a rank of celestial beings: 'thrones, lordships, rulers, authorities' (Col 1:16). In 2 Pet 2:10 and Jude 8, rejecting κυριότης means despising divinely constituted authority. The multilingual evidence—Spanish señorío, French autorité, German Herrschaft—all converge on the concept of sovereign ruling power.

(4×) Lordship, dominion, ruling authority; also a class of angelic powers. Encompasses both the abstract quality of sovereign rule and its personified bearers in the celestial hierarchy. In Eph 1:21 Christ is exalted above every κυριότης, and in Col 1:16 the κυριότητες are listed among created heavenly orders—thrones, dominions, principalities, authorities. In 2 Pet 2:10 and Jude 8, false teachers 'despise κυριότητα,' which may refer to the Lord's authority, angelic dignities, or both. Spanish señorío ('lordship, domain') and German Herrschaft ('rule, dominion') capture the governing-power core, while the plural usage in Colossians and Ephesians points to a concrete angelic rank. AUTHORITY AND POWER to confirm, ratify, make valid or binding

This verb means to confirm, ratify, or make something legally valid and binding. In 2 Corinthians 2:8, Paul urges the Corinthians 'to confirm (κυρῶσαι) your love' for the repentant sinner—to make their love official and public through restoration. In Galatians 3:15, Paul argues that even a human covenant, once ratified (κεκυρωμένην), cannot be annulled or added to—how much more God's unchangeable covenant with Abraham. The term has legal and contractual overtones, evoking the idea of making something official, binding, and irrevocable. The perfect passive participle in Galatians emphasizes the established, ratified state of the covenant.

(2×) Second Corinthians 2:8 urges 'to confirm (κυρῶσαι) your love toward him'—to officially restore the repentant brother. Galatians 3:15 speaks of a covenant 'having been ratified' (κεκυρωμένην)—once confirmed, it can't be annulled. The multilingual glosses reflect the legal sense: Spanish 'confirmar/ratificado,' English 'having been ratified/to confirm,' German 'bestätigt' (confirmed), French 'confirmer/κεκυρωμένην.' The word carries weight from legal and contractual contexts, making something officially valid and binding. ESTABLISH AND PREPARE

A dog; used literally for scavenging street dogs and figuratively as a term of contempt for the morally impure.

In the ancient Near East, dogs were not beloved household pets but semi-wild scavengers that roamed streets and refuse heaps. This cultural backdrop illuminates every NT use. Jesus warns against giving holy things to 'dogs' (Matt 7:6), a metaphor for the profane or unworthy. In the Lazarus parable, dogs lick the beggar's sores — a mark of his utter destitution (Luke 16:21). Paul's sharp 'Beware of dogs!' (Phil 3:2) targets Judaizing opponents. Second Peter 2:22 quotes the proverb about a dog returning to its vomit, and Revelation 22:15 bars 'dogs' from the holy city.

(5×) A dog — literally a scavenging canine, but in every NT occurrence carrying strong connotations of ritual impurity, moral contempt, or abject lowliness. The multilingual glosses (spa: perro, fra: chien, deu: Hund) map directly to the common word for dog in each language, yet the biblical usage is overwhelmingly pejorative. In Matt 7:6, dogs represent those unworthy of sacred truth; in Phil 3:2, Paul uses it as invective against false teachers; in Rev 22:15, it denotes the morally impure excluded from the New Jerusalem. Only Luke 16:21 approaches a literal sense, where street dogs lick Lazarus's wounds. DOG ANIMAL limbs, members of a body (corpses in wilderness)

Hebrews recalls God's judgment on the exodus generation: 'And with whom was he provoked for forty years? Was it not with those who sinned, whose bodies fell in the wilderness?' (Hebrews 3:17). The term literally means limbs or members but functions as a vivid way to say 'bodies' or 'corpses.' Classical usage includes arms and legs, the articulated parts of the body. The plural emphasizes the multitude of bodies scattered across the desert—a generation that failed to enter rest. The image is deliberately stark: rebellion leads to death.

(1×) The author of Hebrews employs this term for the corpses of the wilderness generation—their 'limbs' or 'bodies' fell in the desert, never reaching the Promised Land. The word typically means bodily limbs or members, here used collectively for corpses. German 'Glieder' preserves the 'limbs' sense. This vivid language recalls Numbers 14 and God's judgment that the entire rebellious generation would die without entering Canaan. Their scattered limbs across the wilderness testify to the deadly consequences of unbelief and disobedience. BODY (PHYSICAL FORM)

To hinder, prevent, or forbid; blocking action through obstruction or authoritative prohibition.

An important verb of restraint with a subtle two-sense structure. Both Spanish impedir and French empêcher cover the full range, but the contexts split clearly: one sense involves practical obstruction — being physically hindered from traveling (Rom 1:13; 1 Thess 2:18) or prevented from an action (Acts 8:36) — while the other carries authoritative force, as when Jesus says 'do not forbid the little children' (Matt 19:14; Mark 10:14). The authoritative sense appears especially in contexts of forbidding people from coming to Jesus or from exercising spiritual gifts.

1. hinder or prevent (12×) To hinder, obstruct, or restrain from proceeding or acting — practical prevention rather than authoritative command. German hindert and Spanish fui impedido capture this blocking sense. Paul 'hindered' from visiting Rome (Rom 1:13), the Ethiopian eunuch asking 'what hinders me from being baptized?' (Acts 8:36), and Pharisees who 'hindered' those entering the kingdom (Luke 11:52) illustrate twelve occurrences. FORBID HINDER PREVENT

2. forbid or prohibit (11×) To forbid or prohibit with authority, commanding that something not be done. Though French empêcher and Spanish impedir overlap with sense 1, the contexts reveal authoritative prohibition: Jesus rebuking disciples who 'forbid' children (Matt 19:14; Mark 10:14), and disputes about forbidding someone casting out demons (Mark 9:38–39). Eleven occurrences carry this commanding force. FORBID HINDER PREVENT

Village; an unwalled rural settlement smaller than a city, typical of Galilean and Judean countryside life.

In the ancient Mediterranean world, a kome was a small, unwalled settlement distinguished from the fortified polis or city. The Synoptic Gospels use this word frequently to paint the landscape of Jesus' itinerant ministry as he traveled through the villages of Galilee and Judea, teaching and healing (Mark 6:6, 56). Spanish 'aldea' and German 'Dorf' both capture the rural, modest character of these communities. The word evokes a world of open countryside, close-knit neighbors, and agricultural life far from urban centers.

village (unwalled settlement) (28×) An unwalled rural settlement, smaller and less fortified than a polis (city). The Synoptic Gospels employ this term to describe the towns Jesus visited during his Galilean ministry (Matt 9:35; Mark 6:6, 36, 56). Cross-lingual glosses consistently render it as a small rural habitation: Spanish 'aldea,' French 'village,' German 'Dorf.' Classical Greek contrasted kome with polis to mark the boundary between unprotected village life and civic urban existence. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE towns, villages with some urban development

Mark describes Jesus' early Galilean ministry: 'Let us go on to the next towns, that I may preach there also' (Mark 1:38). The compound term designates settlements larger than mere villages but not qualifying as full cities—market towns or large villages with some urban features. These were significant population centers throughout Galilee, agricultural communities with marketplaces and synagogues but lacking full city status. Jesus' strategy involved itinerant ministry through this network of towns, bringing the gospel to the broader population.

(1×) Jesus' Galilean strategy involved circuit preaching through the region's 'towns'—settlements too large for simple villages but not qualifying as poleis (cities). These market towns served as regional centers for surrounding agricultural areas. Spanish 'aldeas' (villages) and French 'bourgade' (small town) capture the intermediate status. Jesus brought the kingdom message to these population centers, reaching more people than focusing only on major cities would have allowed. The towns had synagogues, markets, and concentrations of people needing to hear his message. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

revelry, carousing; wild partying characterized by excessive drinking and loss of self-control

This word describes raucous celebrations and drinking parties characterized by excess and loss of self-control. In pagan religious contexts, it could refer to processions honoring Dionysus, but more generally it meant any wild revelry. Paul consistently lists it among 'works of the flesh' (Galatians 5:21) and behaviors incompatible with Christian life (Romans 13:13, 1 Peter 4:3). The word captures not merely social drinking but the abandon and moral chaos associated with drunken parties. The plural form emphasizes repeated participation in such lifestyle patterns rather than isolated incidents.

(3×) Wild revelry, carousing, or drunken partying. Paul lists this behavior among the 'works of the flesh' in Galatians 5:21, warning that those who practice such things will not inherit God's kingdom. Romans 13:13 contrasts walking properly 'in the day' versus engaging in carousing and drunkenness. 1 Peter 4:3 includes it among the Gentile behaviors believers have left behind. The term captures not social drinking but unbridled, excessive partying marked by loss of self-control and moral judgment. BANQUETS AND FEASTS

gnat, tiny insect, mosquito

Jesus ridicules Pharisaic priorities with a memorable image: 'You blind guides, straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel!' (Matthew 23:24). The gnat represents the smallest, most insignificant creature—something one might carefully filter from drinking water to avoid uncleanness. The absurdity is that while meticulously straining out tiny gnats, they gulp down entire camels (the largest unclean animal). The hyperbole exposes inverted values: obsessing over minutiae while ignoring massive moral failures. Both animals are unclean, but the disproportion is comic and damning.

(1×) Jesus' hyperbolic critique of Pharisaic legalism uses the gnat-camel contrast for devastating effect. Gnats or mosquitoes were tiny insects one might strain from water; camels were the largest animals in the region. Both were ceremonially unclean, making the image work. All language witnesses identify small flying insects. The absurdity is the proportion: careful filtering of microscopic insects while swallowing massive beasts whole. Jesus exposes the moral blindness of majoring in minors—they obsess over tiny regulations while committing major injustices. LOCUSTS AND SWARMS

Cos, Aegean island near Asia Minor

Luke traces Paul's final journey to Jerusalem with precise geographical notation: 'We came with a straight run to Cos' (Acts 21:1). Cos (modern Kos) was a significant island in the Dodecanese, famous for its medical school (Hippocrates' home), wines, and silk production. The island provided a natural overnight stop on the coastal shipping route from Troas toward Judea. Luke's mention reflects the detailed itinerary of an eyewitness or careful historian. The island's brief appearance marks one stage in Paul's journey toward arrest and eventual Rome.

(1×) In Luke's detailed travel narrative, Cos appears as one waypoint in Paul's island-hopping journey from Philippi to Jerusalem. The island was renowned in antiquity for its medical school and Asclepius cult. All language witnesses transliterate the name. Luke's precision in recording these stages suggests either eyewitness memory or access to detailed travel records. Cos was a logical overnight anchorage for vessels following the Asia Minor coast southward. Its mention serves Luke's broader narrative strategy of anchoring events in specific, verifiable geography. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

(1×) This proper name occurs once in Luke 3:28, part of the ascending genealogy that traces Jesus' lineage back to Adam. κωφ-ός G2974 Adj-NMP (14×)
Mute (unable to speak) or deaf (unable to hear); describing sensory impairment, often in the context of miraculous healing.
An adjective that covers two distinct physical impairments — the inability to speak and the inability to hear — both of which figure prominently in Jesus' healing ministry. In the Gospels, the mute demoniac speaks after deliverance (Matt 9:32-33), and the deaf man with a speech impediment hears after Jesus' touch (Mark 7:32-37). Ancient Greek already carried both meanings, since 'blunted' perception could apply to either faculty. Strikingly, the multilingual evidence reveals how languages handle the ambiguity: German uses both 'stumm' (mute) and 'taub' (deaf), while French often renders both senses with 'muet,' collapsing the distinction that Greek preserves contextually.

1. mute, unable to speak (9×) Describes a person who is unable to speak, whether from demonic oppression or physical affliction. In Matt 9:32-33 a mute demoniac is brought to Jesus and speaks after the demon is cast out; in Matt 12:22 a man who is both blind and mute is healed. Spanish consistently distinguishes this sense with 'mudo' (mute), and Arabic with 'abkam' (dumb), while German 'taub' and French 'muet' sometimes blur the line between mute and deaf — a reminder that these impairments were often seen as interconnected in antiquity. DEAF AND MUTE en: mute, mute-man | es: mudo, mudos | fr: muet | de: taub Matt 9:32; Matt 9:33; Matt 12:22; Matt 15:30

2. deaf, unable to hear (5×) Describes a person who is unable to hear. In Matt 11:5 and Luke 7:22, Jesus cites Isaiah's messianic prophecy that 'the deaf hear' as evidence of his identity. Mark 7:32 presents a man who is both deaf and speech-impaired, healed by Jesus with the Aramaic command 'Ephphatha.' Spanish uses 'sordo' (deaf) here, clearly distinguishing from 'mudo,' while Hebrew translations echo the prophetic source with 'chereshim.' The deaf-mute of Mark 9:25 is addressed as a 'deaf and mute spirit,' showing how both senses could apply simultaneously to a single condition. DEAF AND MUTE

λαγχάνω G2975 V-ASA-1P (4×)
To obtain by lot, receive by divine allotment; to be chosen or assigned through casting lots or providential apportioning.
A verb with deep roots in the Greek practice of distributing shares by lot-casting. In classical usage it meant to obtain one's portion —whether land, office, or inheritance—through the fall of the lot. The NT preserves this concrete sense in Luke 1:9, where Zechariah is chosen by lot to burn incense, and in John 19:24, where soldiers cast lots for Jesus' garment. But the word also extends to divine apportioning: in Acts 1:17 Judas had 'obtained his share' in the apostolic ministry, and in 2 Pet 1:1 believers have 'obtained a faith' of equal standing. Spanish echar suerte and French obtenir par le sort reflect the lot-casting core.

(4×) To obtain by lot, receive by divine allotment or providential assignment. Covers both literal lot-casting and the metaphorical sense of receiving something as a divinely apportioned share. Luke 1:9 records the literal casting of lots that assigned Zechariah his priestly duty—Spanish le tocó ('it fell to him') captures the impersonal, fate-like quality. John 19:24 fulfills Ps 22:18 as soldiers cast lots (λάχωμεν) for Jesus' seamless tunic. Acts 1:17 uses the word for Judas having 'obtained his lot' in the ministry, and 2 Pet 1:1 extends it to the faith 'obtained' by all believers—here the lot-casting metaphor becomes theological: God distributes grace as the ultimate allotment. Λάζαρος G2976 N-VMS (15×)
Lazarus; proper name borne by the brother of Mary and Martha, and by the beggar in Jesus' parable.
A Greek adaptation of the Hebrew name Eleazar ('God has helped'), shortened colloquially to Lazaros. Two distinct figures bear this name in the New Testament. The first is Lazarus of Bethany, brother of Martha and Mary, whom Jesus raised from the dead after four days in the tomb (John 11:1-44)—an episode that becomes a catalyst for the plot against Jesus. The second is the destitute beggar in Jesus' parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31), whose reversal of fortune in the afterlife teaches about justice and compassion. The name's meaning, 'God has helped,' resonates poignantly with both narratives.

(15×) Proper name designating two New Testament figures. Lazarus of Bethany is the man Jesus raised from death after four days (John 11:1-44, 12:1-2, 9-10, 17), an event that crystallizes both belief and opposition. The parabolic Lazarus is the poor man who lay at the rich man's gate covered in sores (Luke 16:20-25), whose post-mortem comfort illustrates divine reversal. Spanish 'Lázaro,' French 'Lazare,' and German 'Lazarus' all transliterate the same Hellenized form of Hebrew Eleazar, preserving the theophoric element meaning 'God has helped.' λάθρᾳ· G2977 Adv (4×)
Secretly, in private, without others' knowledge; done covertly to avoid public notice.
An adverb meaning 'secretly' or 'in private,' describing actions taken without the awareness of others. It appears in contexts ranging from compassionate discretion to cunning concealment. Joseph plans to divorce Mary λάθρᾳ to spare her public disgrace (Matt 1:19), while Herod summons the Magi λάθρᾳ for a covert interrogation (Matt 2:7). Martha calls her sister λάθρᾳ so the mourning crowd will not follow (John 11:28), and the Philippian magistrates try to release Paul and Silas λάθρᾳ to avoid scandal (Acts 16:37). Spanish en secreto, French en secret, and German heimlich all confirm a single, consistent sense of covert action.

(4×) Secretly, covertly, without public knowledge. Describes an action performed in private to avoid detection or public attention. The four NT uses span a range of motivations: Joseph's merciful discretion toward Mary (Matt 1:19), Herod's scheming secrecy with the Magi (Matt 2:7), Martha's quiet summons to Mary at Lazarus' tomb (John 11:28), and the magistrates' attempt to release Paul quietly after an illegal beating (Acts 16:37). Despite the differing moral contexts—from compassion to cowardice—the adverb consistently denotes concealment from bystanders. violent windstorm, whirlwind; a furious storm with powerful winds, often accompanied by rain

This word describes a violent, furious windstorm—the kind that sweeps across water with destructive force, threatening to capsize boats and drown their occupants. The Gospels use it twice in accounts of Jesus calming storms: Mark 4:37 describes the great windstorm that arose on the Sea of Galilee, filling the boat with water while Jesus slept, and Luke 8:23 recounts the parallel incident. 2 Peter 2:17 uses the word metaphorically, comparing false teachers to waterless springs and mists driven by a storm—promising refreshment but delivering nothing, unstable and driven by chaotic forces rather than truth.

(3×) A violent windstorm, whirlwind, or fierce gale. Mark 4:37 and Luke 8:23 use this word in parallel accounts of the storm on the Sea of Galilee: a great windstorm arose, waves beat into the boat, and it began filling with water while Jesus slept. His subsequent calming of wind and sea demonstrated divine authority over chaos. 2 Peter 2:17 uses the term metaphorically: false teachers are 'waterless springs and mists driven by a storm'—unstable, unreliable, driven by destructive forces rather than truth. STORMS AND TEMPESTS

to kick, to kick against (with the heel or foot)

This verb means to kick or strike with the heel or foot. It appears in Jesus' words to Saul/Paul on the Damascus road in Acts 9:5 and 26:14 (the latter being Paul's retelling): 'It is hard for you to kick against the goads (πρὸς κέντρα λακτίζειν).' The image is agricultural: an ox kicking back against the sharp goad that prods it only injures itself further. Jesus' words picture Saul's resistance to divine calling as futile and self-destructive. Classical usage included literal kicking (trampling the fallen, kicking doors) and horses kicking what annoys them. The NT usage is this single proverbial metaphor.

(2×) Acts 9:5 and 26:14 both record Jesus' words to Saul: 'hard for you to kick (λακτίζειν) against the goads.' The image is of an ox kicking back against the farmer's prod, hurting itself. The multilingual glosses are simple: Spanish 'dar coces' (to kick), English 'to kick,' French and German 'donner des coups de pied/λακτίζειν' (to give kicks). The proverbial expression was known in Greek and possibly Hebrew/Aramaic contexts, picturing futile resistance to divine direction. STUMBLING AND OFFENSE

To speak, talk, or tell; general verbal communication, including passive forms meaning 'to be spoken' or 'to be told.'

Originally carrying a flavor of casual speech or chatter (as opposed to the more formal lego), laleo became the standard New Testament verb for speaking and talking, appearing 299 times. It describes everything from the mute man who finally 'spoke' after Jesus healed him (Matt 9:33) to the Spirit-filled believers at Pentecost speaking in other tongues (Acts 2:4). In its passive forms it means 'to be spoken' or 'to be told,' as when Mary is promised that what was spoken to her from the Lord will be fulfilled (Luke 1:45). Spanish hablar and German reden track the active sense precisely.

1. speak, talk (277×) To speak, talk, say, or tell in active voice – general verbal communication encompassing all persons, tenses, and moods of laleo (277 occurrences). Spanish 'hablar' and German 'reden' align closely with this unmarked speaking verb. Covers both ordinary conversation and authoritative divine speech: the mute demoniac 'spoke' upon healing (Matt 9:33), Jesus 'spoke' to the crowds in parables (Matt 12:46-47), and believers are commanded to speak the truth. SPEAKING AND TALKING

The shift to passive reframes the communication from the speaker's action to the content being transmitted or the hearer's reception. Key passages include Luke 1:45, where Elizabeth blesses Mary because 'the things spoken to her from the Lord will be fulfilled,' and Mark 14:9, where the woman's anointing 'will be spoken of' wherever the gospel is proclaimed. SPEAKING AND TALKING

λᾰλ-ιά G2981 N-NFS (4×)

Speech, way of speaking, dialect; one's manner of talk that reveals origin, identity, or message.

A noun covering both the content and the manner of speech. Derived from λαλέω ('to speak'), λαλιά can mean 'speech' in general, a particular 'dialect' or accent that betrays one's regional identity, or the substance of what someone says. Peter's Galilean λαλιά gives him away in the high priest's courtyard (Matt 26:73; Mark 14:70) —his accent is unmistakable. In John's Gospel, Jesus distinguishes between his λαλιά (manner of speaking) and his λόγος (word/message), suggesting the hearers cannot even process his speech, let alone grasp his teaching (John 8:43). Spanish habla and German Rede both preserve this dual sense of speech-as-utterance and speech-as-dialect.

(4×) Speech, way of speaking, dialect or accent. Encompasses both the act of speaking and the distinctive manner that identifies the speaker. In Matt 26:73 and Mark 14:70, Peter's λαλιά—his Galilean accent—betrays his identity during Jesus' trial; Spanish habla and French langage capture the dialectal nuance. In John 4:42 the Samaritans say they believe no longer because of the woman's λαλιά but from hearing Jesus themselves—here the word means 'report' or 'testimony.' In John 8:43 Jesus asks why they cannot understand his λαλιά, distinguishing his manner of speech from his deeper λόγος. This range—from regional accent to spoken testimony to communicative style—forms a coherent semantic field around identifiable, characteristic speech. LIPS BODY PART lema (Aramaic: why?), transliteration of Hebrew/Aramaic 'why'

This is a transliteration of the Aramaic לְמָא (lemā) or Hebrew לָמָּה (lāmâ), meaning 'why?' It appears in Jesus' cry from the cross in both Matthew 27:46 and Mark 15:34: 'Eli, Eli, lema sabachthani?'—'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' (quoting Psalm 22:1). Matthew uses 'lema' while Mark has 'lama,' reflecting minor dialectal or textual variation. The word has no Greek etymology; it's a direct quotation of Jesus' Aramaic (or Hebrew) words preserved in the Greek text, emphasizing the authenticity and solemnity of this moment.

(2×) Matthew 27:46 records Jesus crying 'Eli, Eli, lema (λεμὰ) sabachthani'—'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' Mark 15:34 has the parallel 'Eloi, Eloi, lema (λεμὰ) sabachthani.' The multilingual glosses simply transliterate: English 'lema,' Spanish 'lema/lemá,' French 'lama,' German 'Lema/λεμὰ.' This is not a Greek word but a preserved Semitic exclamation, the interrogative 'why?' from Psalm 22:1, spoken in Jesus' death agony. INTERROGATIVE PRONOUNS

λαμβάνω G2983 V-PIA-1S (260×)

To take, receive, obtain, or seize; encompasses physical grasping, receiving gifts or authority, and forceful seizure.

Few Greek verbs carry as wide a range as lambano. At its most concrete, it describes the simple act of taking bread or a cup in one's hands — the gesture Jesus performs at the Last Supper (Matt 26:26). But it extends seamlessly into receiving gifts, wages, the Holy Spirit, and divine promises. The multilingual evidence reveals how languages carve this range differently: Korean uses 받다 ('receive') for passive reception but 잡다 ('grab/seize') when force is involved, while Swahili toggles between -pokea ('receive') and -shika ('seize'). The word's breadth is itself theologically significant — the same verb describes both God's giving and humanity's grasping.

1. receive, obtain (134×) To receive or obtain something given, offered, or due — the largest sense cluster at 134 occurrences. This covers receiving gifts (Matt 10:8), wages (John 4:36), the Spirit (John 20:22), authority (Rev 2:27), promises, and inheritance. The emphasis is on the recipient as beneficiary rather than active agent. Korean 받다 and Swahili -pokea consistently mark this passive-reception frame, while Spanish recibir and German empfangen confirm the semantic boundary against active 'taking.' RECEIVING AND TAKING en: received, receives, to-receive | es: a-recibir, de-recibir, recibe | fr: prendre, recevoir | de: nehmen, nimmt Matt 7:8; Matt 10:8; Matt 10:41; Matt 13:20

2. take, take up (112×) To actively take or take up something with one's hands — 113 occurrences, especially prominent in narrative action sequences. The participial form 'having taken' (labon) is almost formulaic before blessing and breaking bread (Matt 14:19; 15:36; 26:26). Here the agent exercises initiative: taking a cup, picking up a scroll, gathering provisions. Hindi lena and Arabic akhadha both align with this volitional-grasping sense, distinct from mere reception. RECEIVING AND TAKING

3. seize, catch, arrest (6×) To seize, catch, or arrest by force — a sharply distinct sense appearing 6 times. In Luke 5:5 Peter 'caught' nothing all night; in Luke 5:26 amazement 'seized' the crowd; in 1 Cor 10:13 temptation 'overtakes' believers. Korean 잡다 and Swahili -shika both select forceful-grasp vocabulary here, confirming that the violent or involuntary element is cross-linguistically salient, not just an English translation choice. RECEIVING AND TAKING

4. accept, welcome a person (5×) To accept or welcome a person, especially in contexts of hospitality or acknowledging someone's authority. In John 5:43 Jesus says 'you do not receive me'; in 2 John 1:10 believers are warned not to 'receive' false teachers into their homes. Korean 영접하다 ('to welcome/receive a guest') and Arabic qabila ('to accept a person') both use interpersonal-reception vocabulary distinct from object-reception, marking this as a real sense boundary rather than a contextual shade. RECEIVING AND TAKING

5. be taken, be received (passive) (2×) Passive voice forms where the subject is being taken or received — only 2 clear occurrences (1 Tim 4:4; Heb 5:1). The Greek passive morphology (PPM/P) is matched by Swahili passive suffixes (-wa), confirming genuine voice-driven sense distinction. In 1 Tim 4:4, food is 'received' with thanksgiving; in Heb 5:1, the high priest is 'taken from among men.' RECEIVING AND TAKING

6. (1×) A single occurrence at Matt 17:24 where the sense is 'collecting' — the temple-tax collectors 'collecting' the didrachma. Spanish cobrando ('charging/collecting') and the English 'collecting' both point to a transactional, revenue-gathering nuance not quite covered by generic 'receive' or 'take.' This may represent a specialized fiscal sub-sense. RECEIVING AND TAKING

Λάμεχ G2984 N-GMS (1×)

Lamech, patriarch in Jesus' genealogy from the line of Seth Lamech appears in Luke's genealogy as the father of Methuselah and descendant of Enosh. He is the same patriarch mentioned in Genesis 5:25-31, where he lived 777 years and fathered Noah. The Hebrew name (לֶמֶךְ) is transliterated into Greek as an indeclinable proper noun, maintaining its Semitic form.

(1×) Occurring in Luke 3:36, this name links Jesus' genealogy to the ancient patriarchs between Adam and Noah. Cross-linguistic glosses show consistent recognition of this as the antediluvian patriarch, with transliterations preserving the distinctive guttural sound of the Hebrew original across European language traditions. PROPER NAMES (PERSONAL)

λαμπάς G2985 N-AFP (9×)

A portable light source: either a small oil lamp (as in the parable of the ten virgins) or a larger torch or firebrand.
In the ancient world the distinction between a small household oil lamp and a large outdoor torch was important, and λαμπάς spans both. The parable of the ten virgins (Matt 25:1-8) centers on oil lamps — vessels that must be filled and trimmed — and Hindi uses the culturally resonant 'deepak' (दीपक), while Arabic uses 'masabiih' (مَصَابِيح), both clearly denoting oil lamps. But when the soldiers come to arrest Jesus bearing λαμπάδες (John 18:3), these are outdoor torches: Spanish shifts to 'antorcha,' and English distinguishes 'torches' from 'lamps.' Revelation uses the word for the seven blazing spirits before God's throne (Rev 4:5) and the great star falling like a torch (Rev 8:10).

1. lamp (oil lamp) (6×) A portable oil lamp, a small vessel filled with oil and fitted with a wick, requiring regular replenishment. Central to the parable of the ten virgins (Matt 25:1, 3, 4, 7, 8), where the foolish bridesmaids let their lamps run dry. Hindi 'deepak' (दीपक) and Arabic 'masabiih' (مَصَابِيح) both denote the familiar household oil lamp, while Spanish and English use 'lámparas' and 'lamps' — all pointing to a small, personal light source distinct from a large burning brand. LAMPS AND TORCHES en: lamps | es: lámparas | fr: lampe | de: Fackel Matt 25:1; Matt 25:3; Matt 25:4; Matt 25:7; Matt 25:8

2. torch / firebrand (3×) A larger torch or firebrand, carried outdoors for illumination or as a dramatic visual signal. The arresting party at Gethsemane came with 'torches and lanterns and weapons' (John 18:3), where English and Spanish ('antorcha') clearly distinguish this from a small lamp. In Revelation the seven spirits of God burn as 'torches of fire' before the throne (Rev 4:5), and the great star falls from heaven 'burning like a torch' (Rev 8:10). German 'Fackeln' (torches) confirms the larger, more dramatic scale of burning. LAMPS AND TORCHES

λαμπρός G2986 Adj-AFS (9×)

Bright, shining, radiant in appearance; also splendid, magnificent, or luxurious in quality.
An adjective whose semantic range stretches from physical luminosity to social grandeur. When describing angelic garments (Acts 10:30; Rev 15:6) or the river of life 'bright as crystal' (Rev 22:1), the word denotes visible radiance — Spanish 'brillante,' French 'brillant,' German 'glänzend.' But when James warns against favoring the man in 'splendid clothing' (Jas 2:2-3), the brightness is metaphorical: it is the sheen of wealth and social status. Revelation 18:14 extends this further with 'splendid things' lost in Babylon's fall. The two senses overlap — fine garments can literally gleam — but the multilingual evidence shows translators consistently distinguishing luminous radiance from costly magnificence.

1. bright / shining / radiant (6×) Emitting or reflecting light; visually luminous, shining, or radiant. Used of Cornelius's angelic visitor in 'bright clothing' (Acts 10:30), the mocking robe placed on Jesus (Luke 23:11), the linen of heavenly armies 'bright and pure' (Rev 15:6; 19:8), and the river of life 'bright as crystal' (Rev 22:1). Spanish uses 'brillante' and 'resplandeciente,' French 'brillant,' and German 'glänzend' — all centering on the emission or reflection of light as the primary quality. BRIGHTNESS AND SPLENDOR

en: bright | es: brillante, brillante;, espléndida | fr: brillant | de: glaenzend, λαμπρὰν, λαμπρᾷ Luke 23:11; Acts 10:30; Rev 15:6; Rev 19:8; Rev 22:1

2. splendid / magnificent / luxurious (3×) Splendid, magnificent, or luxurious in quality, emphasizing costliness, grandeur, or social impressiveness rather than mere luminosity. James warns against deferring to the man in 'splendid' clothing while despising the poor (Jas 2:2-3), and Revelation 18:14 lists 'splendid things' among Babylon's lost luxuries. English shifts from 'bright' to 'splendid/fine,' signaling that the emphasis has moved from physical radiance to social and material grandeur — the gleam of wealth rather than the gleam of light. BRIGHTNESS AND SPLENDOR

en: splendid, splendid-things | es: brillante, esplandecientes | fr: brillant | de: glaenzend Jas 2:2; Jas 2:3; Rev 18:14

λαμπρότης G2987 N-AFS (1×)

brilliance, radiance, splendor (especially of light)

This term denotes intense brightness or radiance, originally used in classical Greek for the brilliance of heavenly bodies, polished metals, or gleaming armor. In Acts 26:13, Paul describes the light that struck him on the Damascus road as exceeding the brightness of the midday sun. The word carries connotations of overwhelming visual intensity and supernatural glory.

(1×) Paul uses this word in Acts 26:13 to convey that the heavenly light surpassed even the sun's brilliance at noon—the brightest natural reference point available. The multilingual glosses (brightness, resplandor, splendeur) consistently emphasize luminous intensity, reflecting the term's classical usage for radiant phenomena and its theological application to divine manifestation. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λαμπρός G2988 Adv (1×)

splendidly, magnificently, sumptuously

This adverb describes living or acting in a manner characterized by luxury, magnificence, or lavish display. In Luke 16:19, it modifies how the rich man feasted every day—not merely eating well, but indulging in extravagant, ostentatious consumption. The term evokes the lifestyle of the wealthy elite in the Greco-Roman world, where public display of wealth was a social marker.

(1×) The sole New Testament occurrence (Luke 16:19) contrasts the rich man's daily splendid feasting with Lazarus' destitution at his gate. Cross-linguistic evidence (splendidly, espléndidamente, splendidement) uniformly captures the sense of luxurious excess, highlighting the moral dimensions of wealth disparity that Jesus addresses in the parable. BRIGHTNESS AND SPLENDOR

λάμπω G2989 V-PIA-3S (7×)

To shine, gleam, radiate light; used of lamps, the sun, lightning, the transfigured Christ, and the righteous in glory.

Lampo describes the emission of light, whether from a lamp set on a stand (Matt 5:15), the flash of lightning across the sky (Luke 17:24), or the radiant face of the transfigured Jesus shining like the sun (Matt 17:2). It appears in both literal and theologically charged contexts: believers are called to let their light shine before others (Matt 5:16), and an angel's sudden light fills a dark prison cell (Acts 12:7). Spanish 'brillar/alumbrar' and German 'leuchten' both capture the active, outward-directed quality of this shining rather than a mere state of brightness.

shine, give light (7×) To give off light, to shine or gleam visibly. Every NT use involves visible radiance that breaks into darkness or catches the eye. At the transfiguration (Matt 17:2), Jesus' face 'shone like the sun,' using lampo to describe supernatural brilliance. In the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:15-16), the same verb moves from the practical light of an oil lamp to the metaphorical shining of good works. French 'briller' and Spanish 'alumbrar/brillar' preserve the dual register of physical luminosity and metaphorical visibility that lampo carries. SHINING AND ILLUMINATING

λανθάνω G2990 V-AIA-3P (6×)

lanthano – to escape notice, be hidden, be unaware; to do something without being perceived

Lanthano is a verb meaning 'to escape notice' or 'to be hidden from awareness,' embodying a distinctly Greek construction in which the subject 'escapes the notice' of others while doing something expressed by a supplementary participle. In the NT it appears in contexts of both physical and spiritual hiddenness: Jesus tries to remain hidden upon entering a house but 'could not escape notice' (Mark 7:24), the healed woman realizes she 'did not escape notice' (Luke 8:47), and Peter warns that scoffers are 'willingly ignorant' – literally, 'it escapes their notice' – that God created by his word (2 Pet 3:5). Spanish escapar/ocultarse, French ignorer, and German verborgen sein reflect this semantic field of concealment and unawareness.

escape notice, be hidden, be unaware (6×) To escape notice, be hidden, or remain unaware – a verb describing the state of something being concealed from perception or consciousness. The idiomatic Greek construction often places the 'hidden' subject as grammatical subject with a supplementary participle expressing the unnoticed action. Jesus 'could not escape notice' in Tyre (Mark 7:24), the woman with the hemorrhage realizes 'she did not go unnoticed' (Luke 8:47), Paul declares that 'this thing was not done in a corner' (Acts 26:26), and believers may unknowingly entertain angels (Heb 13:2). French ignorer and German verborgen-sein each capture different facets of this concealment-unawareness spectrum. HIDING AND CONCEALING

λαξ-ευτός G2991 Adj-DNS (1×)

hewn from rock, carved out of stone

This adjective describes something cut or carved from solid rock, particularly tombs hewn into cliff faces or hillsides. In Luke 23:53, it characterizes the new tomb where Joseph of Arimathea laid Jesus' body—a burial chamber carved entirely from stone, not constructed with masonry. Such rock-hewn tombs were prestigious burial sites in first-century Judea, requiring considerable expense and labor.

(1×) Applied to Jesus' burial tomb in Luke 23:53, this term emphasizes that the tomb was freshly carved from living rock and had never been used. The multilingual glosses (cut-in-rock, tallada-en-roca, taillé-dans-le-roc) reflect the technical precision of the Greek, highlighting both the tomb's construction method and its status as a costly, honorable burial place befitting royalty. HEWING AND CUTTING

λᾱός G2992 N-VMS (142×)

People — a body of persons united by ethnic, national, or religious identity; especially Israel as God's chosen people

Laos in classical Greek could mean soldiers, citizens, or common folk, but the Septuagint narrowed it to a powerful theological term: the people of God, Israel as a covenant community distinct from the ethne (nations/Gentiles). The New Testament preserves this force. Gabriel announces Jesus 'will save his people from their sins' (Matt

1:21), Zechariah blesses God for visiting 'his people' (Luke 1:68), and the epistle to the Hebrews extends the concept to the new-covenant community (Heb 4:9). Across 142 occurrences, laos retains this covenantal texture. Spanish 'pueblo,' French 'peuple,' and German 'Volk' all capture the communal and political resonance.

people/nation (an ethnic or political community) (142×)
A collective body of persons bound by ethnic, political, or covenantal identity. In the Septuagint and New Testament, laos is the characteristic term for Israel as God's elect people, distinct from ethne (the nations). This covenantal overtone pervades key passages: 'he will save his people from their sins' (Matt 1:21), 'a people for his own possession' (Titus 2:14; echoing Deut 7:6). Luke-Acts uses it extensively for Israel's crowds and assemblies. Spanish 'pueblo,' French 'peuple,' and German 'Volk' reflect the same communal and political register. NATIONS AND PEOPLES

Λαοδικία G2993 N-AFS (6×)

Laodikeia – Laodicea, a wealthy city in Phrygia (Asia Minor), site of one of the seven churches of Revelation

Laodikeia is the proper name of Laodicea, a prosperous Hellenistic and Roman city in the Lycus Valley of Phrygia (modern western Turkey), situated near Colossae and Hierapolis. Founded by the Seleucid king Antiochus II and named after his wife Laodice, it became wealthy through banking, black wool production, and a famous medical school. Paul expresses concern for the Laodicean believers alongside those in Colossae (Col 2:1; 4:13, 15-16), and in Revelation it is addressed as the seventh and final church, rebuked for being 'lukewarm – neither hot nor cold' (Rev 3:14-22). Spanish Laodicea, French Laodicee, and German Laodizea preserve the toponym directly.

(6×) The proper name of the city of Laodicea in the Lycus Valley of Phrygia, a wealthy trade and banking center in Roman Asia Minor. Paul mentions it in connection with the Colossian correspondence, expressing pastoral concern for its believers (Col 2:1; 4:13, 15-16) and referencing a letter 'from Laodicea' (Col 4:16). In Revelation, it is the last of the seven churches addressed, famously rebuked for spiritual complacency: 'because you are lukewarm I will spit you out of my mouth' (Rev 3:14-16). Spanish Laodicea, French Laodicee, and German Laodizea reproduce the place name uniformly. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

Laodicean, inhabitant or church member of Laodicea

This adjective identifies people or things associated with Laodicea, an important city in the Lycus Valley of Asia Minor. In Colossians 4:16, Paul refers to a letter circulating among the Laodiceans, indicating active Christian communities in the region. Laodicea was later one of the seven churches addressed in Revelation, known for its wealth and tepid faith.

(1×) Paul's reference in Colossians 4:16 to the Laodicean church and a letter they possessed shows early Christian networks in western Asia Minor. The multilingual evidence preserves the geographical-ethnic designation with minimal variation, recognizing Laodicea as a significant center in apostolic Christianity and early church correspondence. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λάρυγξ G2995 N-NMS (1×)

throat, larynx, gullet

This anatomical term designates the throat or larynx, the upper part of the windpipe used in vocalization. In classical Greek, it referred both to the physical structure and metaphorically to speech or appetite. Paul quotes Psalm 5:9 in Romans 3:13, using this word in a vivid metaphor about human corruption: 'Their throat is an open grave.'

(1×) In Romans 3:13, Paul employs this term within a catena of Old Testament quotations to depict universal human sinfulness. The image of the throat as an open sepulcher suggests speech that spreads death and corruption. Cross-linguistic glosses (throat, garganta, gosier, Kehle) render the straightforward anatomical sense, though the metaphorical force depends on understanding ancient imagery of speech and moral corruption. TONGUE (BODY AND SPEECH)

Λασέα G2996 N-NFS (1×)

Lasea, a coastal city in Crete

Lasea was a minor port city on the southern coast of Crete, near Fair Havens. It appears only in Acts 27:8 during Paul's voyage to Rome, where the ship stopped before attempting the dangerous autumn journey westward. Archaeological identification remains uncertain, though the general location near modern Kali Limenes is accepted.

(1×) Mentioned in Acts 27:8 as a geographical reference point during Paul's perilous sea journey, Lasea marks where the voyage became increasingly dangerous due to approaching winter. The multilingual glosses preserve the name with slight orthographic variations (Lasaia, Lasáia, Lasea), reflecting standard practices for rendering Greek place names otherwise unknown in historical records. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE to burst open, split apart violently

This verb describes a sudden, violent rupture or bursting, originally used for things that crack, split, or explode with force. Classical usage included the cracking of bones, crackling of fire, or bursting of objects under pressure. In Acts 1:18, it describes the gruesome death of Judas Iscariot, whose body burst open in the field purchased with his betrayal money.

(1×) Acts 1:18 employs this graphic verb to describe Judas' death: falling headlong, he burst open and his intestines spilled out. The multilingual evidence (burst-open, reventó, éclater) captures the violent, sudden rupture implied by the Greek. This account differs from Matthew's hanging narrative, though both emphasize Judas' tragic end and the field's association with blood money. BOLD BREAK FORTH

λᾱτομ-έω G2998 V-RPM/P-NNS (2×)

to cut out of rock, to hew from stone

This verb means to quarry or hew out stone, specifically to cut something (like a tomb) from solid rock. Both NT occurrences describe Joseph of Arimathea's tomb where Jesus was buried. Matthew 27:60 says Joseph laid Jesus' body in 'his own new tomb, which he had cut (ἐλατόμησεν) in the rock.' Mark 15:46 similarly describes the tomb 'that had been cut (λελατομημένον) out of the rock.' The perfect passive participle in Mark emphasizes the completed state—the tomb was already hewn and ready. Such rock-cut tombs were expensive and marked their owners as wealthy. The detail underscores both Joseph's devotion and the fulfillment of Isaiah 53:9 (buried with the rich).

(2×) Matthew 27:60 describes Joseph placing Jesus in 'his new tomb which he had cut (ἐλατόμησεν) in the rock.' Mark 15:46 describes 'a tomb which had been cut (λελατομημένον) out of rock.' The multilingual glosses reflect the action: Spanish 'labrado/labró' (hewn/he hewed), English 'cut/he cut,' German 'aus Fels hauen/ἐλατόμησεν' (to hew from rock), French 'tailler' (to cut). Both Gospels emphasize this was a rock-hewn tomb, signifying both the permanence of the burial place and Joseph's wealth. HEWING AND CUTTING

λατρ-εία G2999 N-GFS (5×)

Service or worship, especially sacred ritual duty rendered to God; the act or practice of divine worship.

Originally denoting the service of a hired worker, this noun narrowed in Jewish and Christian usage to mean sacred worship or liturgical duty offered to God. Paul counts Israel's latreia among her great privileges (Rom 9:4). He then radically redefines it in Rom 12:1: presenting one's body as a 'living sacrifice' is logike latreia — 'rational worship.' Hebrews uses the term for the priestly ritual duties of the tabernacle (Heb 9:1, 6). The multilingual evidence splits between 'worship/culto' and 'service/servicio,' reflecting the word's dual emphasis on devotion and duty.

(5×) Religious service or worship — the formal or heartfelt duty of worship rendered to God. The word spans both outward ritual and inward devotion. In Heb 9:1 and 9:6, it refers concretely to the Levitical rites performed in the tabernacle; in Rom 9:4, it is one of Israel's covenant privileges. Paul's striking use in Rom 12:1 transforms the concept: offering one's whole life becomes true 'worship' (logike latreia). John 16:2 warns that persecutors will think killing believers is latreia to God. The translation evidence — Spanish culto/servicio, French culte/service, German Gottesdienst — reflects this blend of devotional worship and active service. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λατρ-εύω G3000 V-PPA-AMS (21×)

To serve or worship God with reverent devotion; to perform sacred religious service or ministry

Latreuō carries the weight of total devotion directed toward God. Originally meaning 'to work for hire,' by the biblical period it had narrowed almost exclusively to religious service. Jesus himself invokes it when quoting Deuteronomy: 'You shall worship (latreuō) the Lord your God and serve him only' (Matt 4:10; Luke 4:8). The French 'adorer' and German 'dienen' together capture both the reverent adoration and the practical service dimensions. Whether describing Anna's decades of temple devotion (Luke 2:37) or Paul's service 'with my spirit' (Rom 1:9), the word insists that true worship is active, embodied, and wholehearted.

1. worship God in devotion (12×) The devotional dimension: to render worship and adoration to God out of reverence and love. Jesus quotes this sense directly in the temptation narrative (Matt 4:10; Luke 4:8), and Paul uses it for Israel's hoped-for worship (Acts 26:7). The Spanish 'que sirve/sirven' preserves the service-oriented flavor, while French 'adorer' highlights the worshipful posture. Covers 12 of 21 occurrences. SERVING AND MINISTRY

en: I-serve, I-worship, let-us-serve | es: que-sirve, que-sirven, servir | fr: adorer, servir | de: dienen, dient Matt 4:10; Luke 4:8; Acts 7:42; Acts 24:14; Acts 26:7

2. serve in sacred ministry (9×) The ministerial dimension: to carry out ongoing sacred duties or liturgical service before God. Anna served God 'with fastings and prayers night and day' (Luke 2:37); Paul serves God 'in my spirit in the gospel' (Rom 1:9; 2 Tim 1:3). Here the emphasis falls on faithful, sustained ministry rather than a single act of adoration. The German 'dienen/dient' captures this steady, active service well. Covers 9 occurrences. SERVING AND MINISTRY

λάχανον G3001 N-ANS (4×)

Garden herb or vegetable; cultivated plant used for food, as opposed to wild-growing vegetation.

Lachanon refers to cultivated garden plants – herbs and vegetables grown intentionally for food, in contrast to wild plants that sprout on their own. Jesus uses the mustard seed parable (Matt 13:32; Mark 4:32) to illustrate how the kingdom of God starts as the smallest of seeds yet grows into something larger than all the lachana. In Luke 11:42 the Pharisees tithe even their garden herbs, while in Rom 14:2 it describes the diet of those who eat only vegetables. The word carried everyday, humble associations – the kitchen garden, not the grand harvest.

(4×) A cultivated garden plant – herb or vegetable grown for food. In Jesus' mustard-seed parable (Matt 13:32; Mark 4:32) the plant outgrows all the lachana, emphasizing surprising kingdom growth. Luke 11:42 names specific herbs (mint, rue, garden plants) as objects of Pharisaic tithing, while Rom 14:2 contrasts the vegetable-eater with the meat-eater. Multilingual glosses confirm the culinary sense: Spanish 'hortaliza/legumbres,' French 'légume,' German 'Gemüse' – all pointing to edible garden produce rather than wild flora. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 12062 WITH 5 SENSES

λεββαῖος G3002

Lebbaeus; alternative or additional name for the apostle also called Thaddaeus or Simon the Zealot

An alternative name for one of the Twelve Apostles, appearing in some manuscript traditions of Matthew 10:3 and Mark 3:18. Textual criticism reveals complex variation: some witnesses read Θαδδαῖος (Thaddaeus), others Λεββαῖος, and some combine them. In Luke 6:15 and Acts 1:13 the same individual appears as 'Simon the Zealot' or 'Judas [son] of James.' Etymology is debated—possibly derived from Hebrew words for 'heart' (lebh). The multiple names reflect common ancient practice of bearing more than one name, complicated by manuscript transmission. Modern editions typically prefer Thaddaeus.

λεγεών G3003 N-NFS (4×)

Legion; a vast number, originally a Roman military unit of ~5,000 soldiers, used literally and as a name for demonic multitude.

A Latin loanword that entered Greek through Rome's military presence, legion denotes both a formal Roman army division (roughly 5,000 infantry plus cavalry) and, by extension, an overwhelming multitude. In the Gospels it appears most memorably as the self-identification of a demoniac's possessing spirits: 'My name is Legion, for we are many' (Mark 5:9; Luke 8:30). Jesus also invokes it in Gethsemane, declaring he could summon more than twelve legions of angels (Matt 26:53). The word conveys both organized power and terrifying numerousness.

(4×) A Roman military unit numbering thousands, used in the NT both literally (of angelic armies, Matt 26:53) and as a proper name for a demonic collective (Mark 5:9, 15; Luke 8:30). The demoniac's self-designation 'Legion' communicates not just plurality but organized, overwhelming force. Spanish 'legión,' French 'Légion,' and German 'Legion' all preserve the Latin military loanword unchanged, reflecting how deeply this Roman institution stamped itself on the Mediterranean world. MILITARY OFFICERS

λέγω G3004 V-AMA-2P (2265×)

say, speak, tell; to utter words in speech, name something, or declare

One of the most common verbs in the New Testament, λέγω covers the full range of verbal communication. It introduces direct speech throughout the Gospels and Acts, serves as the standard verb for instructing or commanding, and appears in the idiom for naming ('called,' typically in passive constructions). The multilingual evidence reveals a sharp distinction: when introducing narrative speech, languages use their most neutral speech verb (Spanish dijo, Arabic ‎ٱ), but when commanding, they shift to imperative-friendly constructions (Swahili mwambie). The formal declaration sense ('I say to you') appears in Jesus' teaching with authoritative weight.

1. say, tell, speak (2226×) The default narrative speech introducer, functioning as a quotative marker throughout biblical narrative. Spanish consistently uses dijo/dice, Arabic ٱ, and Chinese 说, confirming this as the unmarked speech verb across 1,183 occurrences. SAYING AND COMMANDING

en: he-said, said | es: dijo | fr: dire | de: sagt Matt 4:3; Matt 4:9; Matt 8:32; Matt 9:15; Matt 12:11

2. command, direct, order (21×) Instructive speech with directive force—commanding, telling someone to do something. The multilingual glosses shift to imperative-friendly forms (Spanish dile/digan, Swahili mwambie, Arabic ٱ) that distinguish this from neutral narration. SAYING AND COMMANDING

en: Say, Tell, say | es: Di, Dime, di | fr: dire | de: sagen, sagt Matt 4:3; Matt 8:4; Matt 8:8; Matt 18:17; Matt 20:21

3. call, name, designate (11×) The naming or designating function, predominantly in passive voice meaning 'to be called' or 'to be known as.' Cross-linguistic evidence shows passive participles (Spanish llamado, French appelé, Chinese 称为), marking instances where identity is established. SAYING AND COMMANDING

en: are-said, being-called, calls | es: dice, es-llamada, llamada | fr: dire | de: sagen, sagt Matt 13:55; Mark 12:37; John 1:38; John 10:35; John 19:17

4. (4×) Speech as questioning or inquiry, where λέγω functions as 'to ask' rather than 'to say.' Languages employ their standard question verbs (Spanish preguntó, Korean 물었다), indicating a genuine semantic extension beyond declarative speech. SAYING AND COMMANDING

en: being-said, being-spoken, spoken | es: dichas | fr: dire | de: sagt Luke 18:34; Acts 8:6; Acts 27:11; Acts 28:24

λεῖμμα G3005 N-NNS (1×)

remnant, what remains after others are taken

This noun denotes what is left over after a portion has been removed or destroyed—a surviving remnant or residue. In biblical theology, it carries theological weight as the concept of the faithful few who remain after judgment. Paul uses it in Romans 11:5 to describe Jewish believers in Christ as a remnant chosen by grace, echoing Old Testament prophetic themes.

(1×) In Romans 11:5, Paul argues that just as in Elijah's day God preserved a remnant of seven thousand faithful Israelites, so in Paul's era there exists a remnant according to the election of grace. The multilingual glosses (remnant, remanente, reste, Rest) consistently render the sense of a surviving portion, connecting to the broader biblical theology of the faithful few preserved through divine purpose. λεῖος G3006 Adj-AFP (1×) smooth, level, even

This adjective describes surfaces that are smooth to the touch, level terrain, or calm seas—anything lacking roughness or unevenness. In Luke 3:5, John the Baptist's ministry is described using Isaiah 40:4, where rough ways will be made smooth as preparation for the Lord's coming. The term suggests the removal of obstacles and the creation of easy passage.

(1×) Luke 3:5 quotes Isaiah's prophecy that rough places shall become smooth paths, part of the dramatic landscape transformation heralding messianic arrival. The multilingual evidence (smooth, lisos, uni, λείας) captures the physical quality of evenness, though the prophetic context invests it with spiritual significance—the leveling of barriers and preparation of hearts for God's visitation. λείπω G3007 V-PIA-3S (6×)

leipo – to lack, be deficient, fall short; to be wanting in what is needed

Leipo means 'to lack' or 'to be deficient,' appearing in the NT predominantly in the middle-passive voice (leipomai) to express the state of falling short or being in want. Jesus tells the rich ruler 'one thing you still lack' (Luke 18:22), Paul instructs Titus to 'set in order what remains' – literally, 'what is lacking' (Titus 1:5), and James declares that if anyone lacks wisdom, he should ask God (Jas 1:5). The word has a pragmatic, diagnostic quality: it identifies the specific gap between present reality and what is needed. Spanish carece, French manquer, and German fehlen all converge on this sense of deficiency.

lack, be deficient, be wanting (6×) To lack, be deficient, or fall short of what is needed, used in the NT to identify a specific gap or shortcoming requiring remedy. Jesus identifies the rich ruler's one remaining deficiency (Luke 18:22), Paul diagnoses what is still wanting in the Cretan churches (Titus 1:5), and James invites believers who lack wisdom to petition God confidently (Jas 1:5). The related usage in Jas 1:4 urges believers to be 'complete, lacking in nothing,' and Titus 3:13 speaks of ensuring that missionaries 'lack nothing' for their journey. Spanish carece ('lacks'), French manquer ('to be missing'), and German fehlen ('to be absent') all map cleanly to this single sense of deficiency. LACK AND DEFICIENCY λειτουργ-έω G3008 V-ANA (3×)

to minister, serve; to perform religious or public service, especially in worship or priestly duties

Originally referring to public service performed at one's own expense in Greek cities, this word came to describe religious ministry and priestly service. The New Testament uses it for both worship and practical Christian service. Acts 13:2 describes prophets and teachers 'ministering to the Lord' in Antioch—likely involving prayer, fasting, and worship—when the Holy Spirit called Barnabas and Saul to missionary work. Romans 15:27 speaks of Gentiles serving Jewish believers materially, and Hebrews 10:11 describes priests standing daily to minister in the tabernacle. The word bridges liturgical worship and practical service.

(3×) To minister, serve, or perform religious service. Acts 13:2 describes church leaders in Antioch 'ministering to the Lord and fasting' when the Holy Spirit spoke, indicating corporate worship and prayer. Romans 15:27 uses it for Gentile believers serving Jewish Christians materially, since they've shared in spiritual blessings—the verb emphasizes service as worship. Hebrews 10:11 depicts priests 'standing daily to minister and offer sacrifices,' contrasting the repeated, ineffective old covenant ministry with Christ's once-for-all sacrifice. λειτουργ-ία G3009 N-DFS (6×)

Public service or ministry performed for God or the faith community; liturgical duty, priestly function, or apostolic service.

Rooted in the classical Greek concept of public service rendered at one's own expense, leitourgia takes on deep sacred significance in the New Testament. It covers the formal liturgical duties of the Levitical priesthood (Luke 1:23, where Zechariah completes his temple service) as well as the generous ministry of believers toward one another (2 Corinthians 9:12, where financial aid becomes a sacred act). Paul even frames his own apostolic labor as a priestly offering (Philippians service / ministry / liturgical duty (6×) Religious or priestly service rendered to God or the believing community. In Luke 1:23, Zechariah finishes his temple leitourgia, reflecting the Levitical priestly rotation. Paul extends the term to apostolic and congregational ministry: in 2 Corinthians 9:12 the Corinthians' financial gift is called a leitourgia that supplies the needs of the saints, while in Philippians 2:17 Paul pictures his own work as a drink offering poured over the sacrifice of faith. Spanish renders it variously as 'liturgia,' 'ministerio,' and 'servicio,' capturing the range from formal worship to broader service. Hebrews 8:6 crowns the usage by declaring Christ's ministry superior, linking sacrificial priesthood with mediatorial excellence. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2:17), showing how the word bridges Old Covenant ritual and New Covenant self-giving service.

ministering, serving, liturgical

This adjective describes something related to service or ministry, especially in religious contexts. It derives from 'leitourgia' (public service, liturgy) and denotes that which serves or ministers. In Hebrews 1:14, angels are called ministering spirits sent to serve those who inherit salvation, emphasizing their functional role in God's purposes.

(1×) Hebrews 1:14 applies this term to angels, defining them as ministering spirits dispatched for service on behalf of believers. The cross-linguistic evidence (ministering, servidores, dienend) uniformly emphasizes the active service dimension. This stands in deliberate contrast to Christ's superiority in Hebrews 1—while angels serve, Christ reigns as Son. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λειτουργ-ός G3011 N-NMS (5×)

A public servant or minister; one who serves in an official capacity, whether civic or sacred.

Built from the roots for 'public' and 'work,' leitourgos originally designated a citizen who funded public works at personal expense — a deeply civic concept. The NT preserves this breadth. In Rom 13:6, governing authorities are God's leitourgoi in their civic role. Paul calls himself a leitourgos of Christ Jesus in priestly ministry to the Gentiles (Rom 15:16). Epaphroditus is Philippi's leitourgos to Paul's need (Phil 2:25). Hebrews applies the term to angels (1:7) and to Christ's superior priestly ministry (8:2).

(5×) A minister or public servant — one who carries out service on behalf of another, whether in civic, personal, or sacred contexts. The word's etymological roots in public duty give it a weight of official responsibility. Paul uses it for civil magistrates serving God's purposes (Rom 13:6) and for his own priestly role among the Gentiles (Rom 15:16). Epaphroditus is called a leitourgos for meeting Paul's material needs (Phil 2:25). Hebrews elevates it further: angels are God's ministering servants (1:7), and Christ is the leitourgos of the heavenly sanctuary (8:2). The multilingual glosses — spa: ministro, fra: serviteur, deu: Diener — all emphasize the servant-minister axis. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λέντιον G3012 N-ANS (2×)

a cloth towel or linen napkin used for wiping or drying, particularly in service contexts

A practical piece of linen cloth used for wiping and drying. The word appears only in John 13, where Jesus wraps a towel around himself before washing his disciples' feet—a stunning act of humility from the one who created the universe. The Latin loanword (linteum) suggests this was an everyday household item, yet Jesus transforms it into a symbol of servant leadership.

(2×) The towel Jesus used during the footwashing (John 13:4-5) represents more than a piece of cloth—it's the garment of servanthood. Spanish and German preserve the straightforward meaning (toalla, Tuch), while French uses the broader term 'linge' (linen). The lexicon notes this is borrowed from Latin, showing cultural exchange in the early Roman world. LINEN AND FABRIC

λεπ-ίς G3013 N-NFP (1×)

scales (on eyes or skin), flakes, layers

This noun denotes thin, flake-like layers that peel or fall away—originally describing fish scales, onion skins, metal fragments, or anything that forms in layered plates. In Acts 9:18, scales fall from Saul's eyes after Ananias prays for him, restoring his sight. Whether literal or metaphorical, the image conveys the removal of blindness and the reception of divine illumination.

(1×) Acts 9:18 records that after Ananias laid hands on Saul, something like scales fell from his eyes and he regained sight. The multilingual glosses (scales, escamas, écaille) preserve the physical imagery, likely metaphorical for spiritual blindness removed. This dramatic moment marks Saul's transformation from persecutor to apostle, with restored sight symbolizing new spiritual perception. SKIN AND LEATHER

λέπρ-α G3014 N-GFS (4×)

Leprosy; a dreaded skin disease causing scaling and disfigurement, rendering a person ritually unclean under Mosaic law.

Lepra designates the skin disease that made its sufferers outcasts in ancient Israel – not necessarily modern Hansen's disease, but a broader category of severe, visible skin afflictions that produced flaking and scaling (the root lepis means 'scale'). Healing a leper was among Jesus' most dramatic signs of messianic authority: he touched the untouchable and pronounced them clean (Matt 8:3; Mark 1:42; Luke 5:12-13). The disease carried enormous social and religious weight, since Levitical law required separation from the community until a priest certified restoration.

(4×) A severe skin disease characterized by scaling and disfigurement, entailing ritual uncleanness under the Torah. All four NT occurrences appear in healing narratives: Jesus cleanses lepers by touch and command (Matt 8:3; Mark 1:42; Luke 5:12-13), overturning both the physical affliction and its social stigma. French 'lèpre,' Spanish 'lepra,' and German 'Aussatz' (literally 'setting apart') each highlight different facets – the disease itself or the isolation it imposed. SKIN DISEASE LEPROSY

λεπρ-ός G3015 Adj-AMP (9×)

Leprous, a leper; a person afflicted with a serious skin disease rendering them ritually unclean under the Mosaic law.

An adjective meaning 'leprous,' used substantivally in the New Testament to mean 'a leper' — a person suffering from a serious skin disease that rendered them ritually unclean and socially marginalized under the Mosaic law. Jesus' willingness to touch and heal lepers was among his most radical acts, directly challenging purity boundaries. The cleansing of a leper is the first healing miracle in Matthew's post-Sermon sequence (Matt 8:2-4), and 'lepers are cleansed' appears in Jesus' own summary of his messianic credentials to John the Baptist (Matt 11:5; Luke 7:22). Simon the Leper hosted Jesus in Bethany (Matt 26:6; Mark 14:3). Spanish 'leproso' and French 'lepreux' both derive from the same Greek root.

leprous/leper (afflicted with skin disease) (9×) Leprous or a leper — a person afflicted with a disfiguring skin disease (Greek lepra) that entailed ritual uncleanness and social exclusion under Levitical law (Lev 13-14). In the NT, Jesus' healing of lepers is programmatic: the first miracle after the Sermon on the Mount is a leper's cleansing (Matt 8:2-4; Mark 1:40-45; Luke 5:12-14), and the report 'lepers are cleansed' validates Jesus' messianic identity (Matt 11:5; Luke 7:22). Ten lepers are healed in Luke 17:12-19, with the Samaritan's grateful return highlighting faith's role. Simon 'the Leper' hosts Jesus in Bethany (Matt 26:6; Mark 14:3), suggesting a healed man who kept his former epithet. Spanish 'leproso', French 'lepreux', and German 'Aussaetziger' all denote one cast out from community. LEPROSY SKIN DISEASE

λεπτός G3016 N-ANS (3×)

lepton; the smallest Greek copper coin, worth about 1/128 of a denarius

The lepton was the smallest and least valuable coin in circulation, worth about half a Roman quadrans (which itself took 64 to equal a denarius—a day's wage). Its name derives from the Greek word for 'thin' or 'fine,' describing both its physical thinness and minimal value. Jesus points to this coin in his teaching about the widow's offering: she gave two lepta—everything she had—while the wealthy gave from their surplus (Mark 12:42, Luke 21:2). Luke 12:59 uses it proverbially: you won't get out 'until you have paid the very last lepton,' emphasizing complete repayment down to the smallest fraction.

(3×) A lepton, the smallest copper coin in circulation. Mark 12:42 and Luke 21:2 recount Jesus observing the widow who gave 'two lepta' (all she had) while the rich gave from abundance. Jesus praises her because she gave sacrificially, not proportionally—her tiny coins represented 'her whole livelihood.' Luke 12:59 uses it proverbially: 'you will never get out until you have paid the very last lepton,' meaning complete payment down to the smallest fraction, emphasizing thorough accountability. SILVER AND MONEY

Λευεί G3017 N-GMS (5×)

Levi, a Hebrew proper name borne by the patriarch Jacob's son and by two ancestors of Jesus in Luke's genealogy.

Levi (Hebrew lewi, 'joined' or 'attached') appears in the NT primarily as the patriarch whose descendants became Israel's priestly tribe. Hebrews 7:5 and 7:9 invoke Levi in the argument that Melchizedek's priesthood supersedes the Levitical order — Levi himself, still 'in the loins of Abraham,' paid tithes to Melchizedek. Revelation 7:7 lists Levi among the twelve tribes sealed in the end times. Luke's genealogy names two otherwise unknown men called Levi in Jesus's ancestry (Luke 3:24, 29).

(5×) Levi — a Hebrew proper name, most prominently the third son of Jacob and Leah, ancestor of the Levitical priesthood. In Heb 7:5, 9, the name anchors the theological argument that the Levitical priesthood is subordinate to Melchizedek's, since Levi was still 'in Abraham's body' when Abraham tithed. Rev 7:7 includes the tribe of Levi among the sealed. Luke 3:24 and 3:29 name two figures called Levi in Jesus's genealogy. The translations uniformly transliterate the name (spa: Leuí, fra: Lévi, deu: Levi), confirming its consistent treatment as a proper noun. LEVI TRIBE NAME

Λευεί G3018 N-AMS (3×)

Levi; Hebrew personal name borne by the patriarch and the disciple called by Jesus

This Hebrew name (meaning 'joined' or 'attached') connects several biblical figures. Most prominently, Levi was Jacob's third son, ancestor of the priestly tribe. In the Gospels, it identifies the tax collector whom Jesus called to discipleship. Mark 2:14 and the parallel passages in Luke 5:27, 29 name him Levi son of Alphaeus, while Matthew 9:9 calls the same person Matthew. This suggests either that Levi was Matthew's birth name and Matthew his apostolic name, or that some early Gospel traditions preserved different names for the same individual. Either way, Jesus' call of a tax collector scandalized the religious establishment.

(3×) Levi, a personal name. In Mark 2:14, Luke 5:27, and 5:29, this identifies the tax collector whom Jesus called to follow him: 'Levi son of Alphaeus.' Luke 5:29 mentions 'Levi made a great feast in his house' after his calling. This Levi is commonly identified with Matthew the apostle (Matthew 9:9 calls the tax collector 'Matthew' in the parallel account), suggesting he may have had two names or that one was a nickname. The calling of a tax collector demonstrated Jesus' mission to sinners. LEVI TRIBE NAME

Levite; a member of the tribe of Levi who assisted priests in temple service

Members of the tribe of Levi who were not descended from Aaron served in various temple roles: musicians, gatekeepers, assistants to the priests, and teachers of the Law. They received no tribal land inheritance, instead living in designated Levitical cities and supported by tithes. The New Testament mentions Levites three times. John 1:19 identifies the delegation sent to question John the Baptist as priests and Levites—official religious authorities. Luke 10:32 features a Levite in the Good Samaritan parable who, like the priest before him, passes by the wounded man. Acts 4:36 identifies Barnabas as a Levite from Cyprus.

(3×) A Levite, a member of the tribe of Levi who assisted in temple service. Luke 10:32 features a Levite in the Good Samaritan parable who passes by the wounded traveler, just as the priest did—both religious officials failing to show mercy. John 1:19 identifies the questioners sent to John the Baptist as 'priests and Levites,' representing official religious authority. Acts 4:36 introduces Barnabas as 'a Levite, a native of Cyprus,' providing his tribal background—though diaspora-based, his Levitical heritage connected him to Israel's worship traditions. LEVI TRIBE NAME

Levitical, pertaining to the tribe or priesthood of Levi

This adjective designates what belongs to or relates to the Levites, the priestly tribe descended from Levi. In Hebrews 7:11, it specifically refers to the Levitical priesthood established under Mosaic law. The author of Hebrews uses this term while arguing that the old priesthood was imperfect, requiring replacement by Christ's superior priesthood after the order of Melchizedek.

(1×) Hebrews 7:11 questions whether perfection could come through the Levitical priesthood, since the law was based on it. This sets up the argument for Christ's superior, eternal priesthood. The multilingual evidence (Levitical, levítico, lévitique, levitisch) uniformly identifies the adjectival form relating to Levitical office, central to the book's theology of Christ superseding the old covenant ministry. LEVI TRIBE NAME

λευκαίνω G3021 V-AIA-3P (2×)

to make white, whiten, or bleach; to cause something to become brilliantly white or clean

To make something dazzlingly white, whether literally or figuratively. Mark uses it to describe Jesus' garments at the Transfiguration, whiter than any earthly bleacher could achieve—a glimpse of divine glory. Revelation applies it metaphorically to robes washed in the Lamb's blood, a paradox where crimson makes white. The ancient Greek could mean whitening with chemicals, plastering walls, or the whitening effect of dawn on lamplight.

(2×) The supernatural whitening in Mark 9:3 and the metaphorical purification in Revelation 7:14 both point beyond ordinary bleaching. The Greek verb family extends from literal whitewashing of buildings to the sensory experience of whiteness itself. Multiple languages (Spanish blanquear, French blanchir, German weiss-machen) preserve the direct causative sense: making something white, not just describing it. WHITE COLOR

λευκός G3022 Adj-ANS (25×)

white — the color of purity, glory, and heavenly radiance, applied to garments, hair, horses, and the harvest

Leukos is the Greek adjective for white, appearing 25 times in the New Testament with an overwhelmingly symbolic and theological register. Unlike ordinary color description, nearly every occurrence carries overtones of divine glory, purity, or heavenly origin. At the Transfiguration, Jesus' garments become 'white as light' (Matt 17:2) or 'dazzling white, such as no launderer on earth could bleach them' (Mark 9:3). The angels at the tomb and the Ascension wear white (Matt 28:3; Mark 16:5; John 20:12; Acts 1:10). In Revelation, white dominates the visual palette of heaven: the elders' white garments (Rev 3:4-5, 18; 4:4), the white horse and its rider Faithful and True (Rev 6:2; 19:11, 14), the white robes of the martyrs (Rev 7:9, 13), the great white throne of final judgment (Rev 20:11), and the white stone with a secret name (Rev 2:17). Jesus' own hair is 'white as white wool, as snow' in the opening vision (Rev 1:14). The one mundane usage is Jesus' observation that the harvest fields are already 'white' (John 4:35). Spanish 'blanco,' French 'blanc,' and German 'weiss' are uniform across all occurrences.

white (25×) The color white as a marker of divine glory, heavenly purity, and eschatological radiance in NT usage. Describes the transfigured Jesus' garments (Matt 17:2; Mark 9:3), the angels' robes at the tomb and Ascension (Matt 28:3; Mark 16:5; Acts 1:10), and the overwhelming visual vocabulary of Revelation: white garments of the faithful (Rev 3:4-5; 7:9, 13), white horses of divine warfare (Rev 6:2; 19:11, 14), the Ancient of Days' white hair (Rev 1:14), and the great white throne of judgment (Rev 20:11). The sole non-symbolic use — harvest fields 'white' for reaping (John 4:35) — still carries metaphorical freight. λέων G3023 N-DMS (9×)

Lion; a large predatory feline used literally and figuratively for fierce power, danger, or royal majesty.

Denotes a lion — the large predatory cat that in the ancient world symbolized both terrifying ferocity and royal majesty. In the New Testament, leon serves double figurative duty. First Peter 5:8 warns that 'your adversary the devil prowls around like a roaring lion,' casting the lion as an image of predatory menace. Yet Revelation 5:5 hails Christ as 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah,' evoking Genesis 49:9 and royal messianic power. Paul claims God 'rescued me from the lion's mouth' (2 Tim 4:17), and Hebrews 11:33 recalls the faithful who 'stopped the mouths of lions,' alluding to Daniel. Spanish 'leon', French 'lion', and German 'Loewe' all preserve the regal overtones.

lion (9×) A lion — the large predatory feline (Panthera leo) used in the NT both literally and as a potent symbol. The lion carries dual symbolic weight: as an image of destructive, predatory danger (1 Pet 5:8, where the devil prowls 'like a roaring lion seeking whom to devour'; 2 Tim 4:17, where Paul was delivered 'from the lion's mouth') and as a figure of royal, messianic power (Rev 5:5, 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David'). Hebrews 11:33 celebrates heroes who 'stopped the mouths of lions,' echoing the Daniel tradition. Revelation 4:7 includes a lion-like living creature around the throne. The majestic duality — fierce threat and sovereign authority — makes leon one of the richest animal metaphors in biblical literature. Spanish 'leon' and German 'Loewe' both carry regal connotations. LIONS AND CUBS

forgetfulness, oblivion

This noun denotes the state of having forgotten or the condition of oblivion. In classical Greek, it personified forgetfulness and named a mythical river in Hades whose waters caused loss of memory. In 2 Peter 1:9, it describes the spiritual blindness of those who lack Christian virtues—they have forgotten the cleansing from their former sins.

(1×) Second Peter 1:9 warns that believers lacking spiritual qualities are nearsighted to the point of blindness, having fallen into forgetfulness of their purification from past sins. The multilingual glosses (forgetfulness, olvido, λήθην, Vergessen) capture the cognitive lapse Peter describes. This forgetfulness represents not mere absentmindedness but a dangerous spiritual amnesia about one's identity in Christ. AUTO-DETECTED COMMUNITY 14721 WITH 3 SENSES

A winepress or wine vat; the trough in which grapes are trodden, used literally and as a symbol of divine judgment.

A lenos is a trough or vat for pressing grapes — a fixture of Mediterranean agriculture that became one of Scripture's most vivid images of divine wrath. Jesus mentions it in the parable of the vineyard tenants (Matt 21:33), where the landowner installs a winepress as part of a working vineyard. Revelation transforms it into apocalyptic imagery: the 'great winepress of God's wrath' is trodden until blood flows as high as a horse's bridle (Rev 14:19-20; 19:15). The multilingual glosses — Spanish lagar, French pressoir, German Kelter — all denote the physical wine-pressing apparatus.

(5×) A winepress or wine vat — the stone or wooden trough in which grapes are crushed to extract juice. In Matt 21:33, it appears in its literal agricultural sense as part of a vineyard's equipment. Revelation deploys it as a devastating symbol of God's final judgment: the angel thrusts the harvest into 'the great winepress of God's fury' (Rev 14:19), and blood flows from it for 1,600 stadia (Rev 14:20). Christ himself treads this winepress (Rev 19:15), echoing Isaiah 63:3. The consistent multilingual rendering (spa: lagar, fra: pressoir, deu: Kelter) confirms a unified semantic core: a vessel for crushing grapes, literal or eschatological. WINEPRESS VAT

nonsense, idle talk, rubbish

This noun dismisses something as worthless chatter, futile nonsense, or empty words deserving no serious attention. Classical usage applied it to trivial matters, foolish speech, or things considered useless. In Luke 24:11, the apostles initially regarded the women's resurrection report as nonsense, reflecting ancient prejudices about women's testimony and the sheer incredibility of the claim.

(1×) Luke 24:11 records the apostles' initial response to the women's Easter morning report: their words seemed like nonsense, and the men did not believe them. The multilingual evidence (nonsense, delirio, baliverne) captures the dismissive contempt implied. This moment highlights both the unexpected nature of resurrection and the cultural barriers the first witnesses had to overcome. IDLE TALK BOASTING

Robber, bandit, brigand; one who seizes property through violence, distinct from a mere thief.

Refers to a violent plunderer—someone who takes by force, ambush, or armed intimidation, as opposed to the kleptēs who steals by stealth. Classical Greek applied the word to pirates and irregular combatants; the New Testament retains this connotation of brazen, open aggression. Jesus quotes Jeremiah when he accuses the temple merchants of turning God's house into a 'den of robbers' (Matt 21:13; Mark 11:17). The two men crucified alongside Jesus are called lēstai (Matt 27:38), possibly indicating insurrectionists. The parable of the Good Samaritan pivots on a man who fell among lēstai on the Jericho road (Luke 10:30). Spanish 'ladrones' and French 'brigand' both capture the violent dimension.

robber, bandit (15×) A robber or brigand who takes property through violence or armed intimidation, sharply distinguished from the kleptēs (petty thief) who operates by stealth. Jesus applies this word to the corrupt temple economy—'you have made it a den of robbers' (Matt 21:13; Mark 11:17; Luke 19:46). The two crucified alongside Christ are called lēstai (Matt 27:38, 44), likely carrying overtones of insurrection. The victim in the Good Samaritan parable 'fell among robbers' (Luke 10:30). Spanish 'ladrones' and German 'Räuber' both foreground the violent, forcible character of the act. THIEF ROBBER

This noun denotes the act of receiving or accepting something, whether gifts, payments, or other transfers. In commercial contexts, it referred to receipts or takings. Paul uses it in Philippians 4:15 within an accounting metaphor, noting that no other church shared with him in the matter of giving and receiving except the Philippians.

(1×) Philippians 4:15 employs financial terminology, contrasting giving and receiving to describe the unique partnership between Paul and the Philippian church. The multilingual glosses (receiving, recibir, λήμψεως, Empfang) reflect the commercial dimension of the term. Paul's careful language acknowledges their material support while framing it theologically as partnership in gospel ministry. RECEIVING AND TAKING

λίαν G3029 Adv (12×)

very, exceedingly, greatly — intensive adverb amplifying the degree of an action or quality

Lian is a straightforward intensive adverb meaning 'very' or 'exceedingly,' used 12 times in the New Testament to amplify verbs and adjectives. It often colors scenes with heightened emotion: Herod is lian troubled at news of the newborn king (Matt 2:16), the demoniacs are lian fierce (Matt 8:28), and Pilate is lian astonished at Jesus's silence (Matt 27:14). Mark uses it to emphasize the earliness of the resurrection morning — lian proi, 'very early' (Mark 16:2). The translations are unanimously scalar intensifiers: Spanish 'muy/mucho,' French 'beaucoup/tres,' German 'sehr' — each functioning as a simple degree modifier with no nuance lost.

(12×) An intensive adverb that heightens the degree of an accompanying verb, adjective, or other adverb, translatable as 'very,' 'exceedingly,' or 'greatly.' Modifies emotional states (Matt 2:16, Herod 'exceedingly' enraged; Matt 27:14, Pilate 'greatly' amazed), physical qualities (Matt 4:8, an 'exceedingly' high mountain; Matt 8:28, 'extremely' fierce), and temporal markers (Mark 1:35, 'very' early; Mark 16:2, 'very' early at dawn). Spanish 'muy,' French 'beaucoup,' and German 'sehr' all converge on scalar intensification. All 12 occurrences express this single degree-amplifying function. SUFFICIENCY AND WORTH

frankincense, the aromatic resin from the Boswellia tree burned as incense in worship

The precious aromatic gum resin harvested from frankincense trees, prized throughout the ancient world for religious rituals. Matthew records it among the Magi's gifts to the infant Jesus—gold for a king, frankincense for deity. Revelation includes it in the cargo list of fallen Babylon, showing its economic value. Harvested primarily in Arabia and Somalia, frankincense was burned to create fragrant smoke ascending to heaven, making it the perfect symbol for prayer and worship.

(2×) Both biblical occurrences (Matthew 2:11, Revelation 18:13) treat frankincense as a valuable trade commodity with religious significance. The lexicon notes this term can refer either to the tree (Boswellia Carterii) or its resin, though context determines which. Spanish offers both 'incienso' and 'olíbano,' preserving the dual Latin heritage (thus and libanus). The word's association with worship contexts is nearly universal across translations. INCENSE AND WORSHIP

a censer or incense burner, a vessel for burning frankincense in religious ceremonies

The metal vessel—often golden—used to burn incense in sacred contexts. Distinct from the frankincense itself, this is the container that holds burning coals and fragrant resin. In Revelation 8, an angel uses a censer at heaven's altar, filling it with fire and hurling it to earth, triggering thunders and earthquake. The lexicon notes potential confusion between the resin (λίβανος) and the vessel (λιβανωτός), though context clarifies which is meant.

(2×) Both occurrences in Revelation 8:3-5 describe the heavenly censer in apocalyptic worship scenes. The Greek term could technically mean either the frankincense or its container, but here clearly denotes the vessel. Spanish (incensario), French (encensoir), and German (Rauchfass) all specify the container rather than its contents. The censer becomes an instrument of divine judgment when its fiery contents are cast to earth. INCENSE CENSER

This Latin loanword designates a freed slave, someone who had been enslaved but was granted or purchased manumission. In Acts 6:9, it identifies a synagogue of the Libertini (Freedmen) in Jerusalem, likely composed of freed Jewish slaves or their descendants from various regions. Such synagogues organized along ethnic or social lines were common in the Second Temple period.

(1×) Acts 6:9 mentions the Synagogue of the Freedmen among those disputing with Stephen. These were likely Jews who had been enslaved (perhaps by Romans) and later freed, or their descendants. The multilingual glosses (Freedmen, Libertînos, Libertins) preserve the Latin designation, reflecting the social reality of manumission in the Roman world and the diverse composition of Jerusalem's Jewish population. FREE LIBERTY RELEASED

(1×) Acts 2:10 includes Libyan Jews among the international crowd at Pentecost who heard the gospel in their own languages. To stone, to pelt with stones as a form of punishment or violent attack, especially for perceived blasphemy.

Means to stone or pelt with stones — a form of execution or mob violence deeply embedded in the Mosaic legal tradition. In the New Testament, lithazo appears almost exclusively in contexts involving Jesus and his followers facing lethal hostility. The Pharisees invoke the Mosaic command to stone adulterers (John 8:5), and the Judean opponents of Jesus attempt to stone him for claimed blasphemy on multiple occasions (John 10:31-33; 11:8). Paul was actually stoned and left for dead at Lystra (Acts 14:19; 2 Cor 11:25). Hebrews 11:37 recalls the stoning of the faithful across Israel's history. Spanish 'apedrear' (from piedra, 'stone') and French 'lapider' both convey the specifically judicial or mob character of this act.

stone (as punishment or attack) (9×) To stone or pelt with stones as a form of punishment, judicial execution, or mob violence. Greek lithazo (from lithos, 'stone') denotes the hurling of stones at a person, typically with lethal intent. In John 8:5, the law of Moses prescribing stoning for adultery is cited; in John 10:31-33, opponents take up stones against Jesus for perceived blasphemy; and John 11:8 reveals the disciples' fear of returning to Judea because of previous stoning attempts. Paul endured actual stoning at Lystra (Acts 14:19; referenced in 2 Cor 11:25), and Hebrews 11:37 memorializes Old Testament martyrs who were stoned. made of stone; constructed from or consisting of stone

This adjective describes objects fashioned from stone rather than other materials. In the ancient world, stone vessels were valued for purity since they couldn't contract ritual defilement the way pottery could. John 2:6 mentions six stone water jars used for Jewish purification rites—the setting for Jesus' first sign, turning water into wine. Paul contrasts stone tablets (the Mosaic law) with hearts of flesh where the Spirit writes (2 Corinthians 3:3), distinguishing old covenant external law from new covenant internal transformation. Revelation 9:20 condemns those who worship stone idols that cannot see, hear, or walk—powerless fabrications.

(3×) Made of stone, constructed from stone. John 2:6 describes 'six stone water jars' for Jewish purification rites at Cana, where Jesus transformed water into wine—stone vessels couldn't contract ritual impurity. 2 Corinthians 3:3 contrasts God's word 'written not on tablets of stone but on tablets of human hearts,' distinguishing external Mosaic law from Spirit-wrought internal transformation. To stone, pelt with stones as judicial execution or mob violence; the standard biblical term for death by stoning.

Lithoboleo is the compound verb for stoning, combining lithos (stone) with ballo (throw). It appears exclusively in contexts of lethal or near-lethal violence. Jesus laments over Jerusalem as the city that 'stones those sent to her' (Matt 23:37, Luke 13:34), making the word a bitter refrain of prophetic rejection. In Acts 7:58-59, it narrates Stephen's execution in harrowing detail. Spanish 'apedrear' (from 'piedra,' stone) and German 'steinigen' (from 'Stein') mirror the transparent Greek compound, preserving the visceral connection between the rock and the act.

to stone, pelt with stones (7×) To hurl stones at a person, typically as a form of judicial execution or communal punishment prescribed by Torah law. All seven NT occurrences involve deadly intent. In Matt 21:35 the tenants stone one of the owner's servants; in Matt 23:37 and Luke 13:34 Jesus grieves over Jerusalem's habit of stoning God's messengers; and in Acts 7:58-59 the stoning of Stephen becomes the paradigmatic martyrdom of the early church. The multilingual glosses (Spanish 'apedrear,' French 'lapider,' German 'steinigen') all employ dedicated stoning vocabulary, confirming this word's narrow, violent semantic range. STONING PUNISHMENT

Stone, rock — a piece of rock whether natural, hewn for building, precious, or used figuratively for hardness and rejection.

Lithos is the common Greek word for stone, covering an exceptionally wide material and figurative range in the New Testament. Literally it denotes natural rocks (Matt 3:9, God can raise children from stones), hewn building blocks (Mark 13:1-2, the massive stones of Herod's temple), millstones (Luke 17:2), and precious stones (Rev 21:19). Figuratively, it becomes one of the New Testament's richest christological images: Christ as the 'stone the builders rejected' turned cornerstone (Matt 21:42, citing Ps 118:22), the 'stumbling stone' (Rom 9:33; 1 Pet 2:8), and the 'living stone' upon which believers are built (1 Pet 2:4-5). The stoning of Stephen (Acts 7:58-59) gives the word its most violent concrete usage. Spanish piedra, French pierre, and German Stein all preserve this breadth.

In John 19:13, it designates the place called 'The Stone Pavement' (in Aramaic, Gabbatha) where Pilate sat on the judgment seat to pronounce sentence on Jesus. Archaeological evidence suggests this was a paved courtyard area in the praetorium.

(1×) John 19:13 identifies the Lithostrotos as the specific location where Pilate rendered his verdict on Jesus. The term's architectural precision—referring to fitted stone paving—matches archaeological findings of Roman administrative spaces. to crush, pulverize, or scatter completely; to winnow grain by separating chaff

Originally referring to the agricultural process of winnowing—tossing grain to separate it from chaff—this verb came to mean crushing or destroying completely. Jesus uses it in identical warnings (Matthew 21:44, Luke 20:18): anyone on whom the rejected stone falls will be utterly pulverized. The image combines agricultural and architectural metaphors: grain scattered to the wind and stones crushing whatever lies beneath. Ancient Greek used it for everything from literal threshing to metaphorically destroying someone's vegetable garden.

(2×) The identical phrase in Matthew and Luke presents the stone (Jesus himself) as judge: stumbling brings breaking, but being crushed brings total destruction. Classical usage ranged from winnowing grain to scattering like chaff to crushing completely. The multilingual evidence shows varied approaches—Spanish captures the total destruction (desmenuzar, pulverizar), French retains the agricultural root (vanner), while German simply transliterates the Greek. CRUSHING AND HUMBLING harbor, haven; a sheltered coastal area where ships can anchor safely

A harbor or haven provided essential shelter for ancient ships, offering protection from storms and a place to anchor safely. In an age when navigation was dangerous and shipwreck common, finding a good harbor could mean the difference between life and death. All three New Testament occurrences appear in Acts 27, Paul's harrowing voyage to Rome. Fair Havens (27:8) was an inadequate harbor for wintering, leading to the decision to sail for Phoenix, a better harbor in Crete (27:12, twice). That fateful decision to seek a better harbor resulted in the storm and shipwreck that dominates the chapter, though God preserved everyone aboard.

(3×) A harbor or haven where ships anchor for shelter. All three occurrences are in Acts 27 during Paul's voyage to Rome. The ship reached 'a place called Fair Havens' (27:8), but this harbor was unsuitable for winter. They decided to sail on, hoping to reach 'Phoenix, a harbor of Crete' for wintering (27:12, mentioned twice). Lake — a body of standing water; the Lake of Gennesaret (Sea of Galilee) and the eschatological lake of fire

The noun λίμνη (limne) means 'lake,' appearing in two sharply distinct registers. Luke alone among the Gospel writers uses it for the Sea of Galilee, calling it 'the lake of Gennesaret' (Luke 5:1-2) and simply 'the lake' during the storm and the Gerasene episode (Luke 8:22-33), preferring the geographical precision of limne over the Semitic 'sea' (thalassa). In Revelation, the word takes on a terrifying eschatological dimension as the 'lake of fire' — the final destination of the beast, the false prophet, death, Hades, and all whose names are not in the book of life (Rev 19:20; 20:10, 14-15; 21:8). Spanish 'lago' and French 'lac' serve both senses.

(11×) A natural body of standing fresh water, specifically the Lake of Gennesaret (Sea of Galilee) in Luke's Gospel. Luke uses limne where Matthew and Mark write thalassa ('sea'), reflecting educated Greek geographical usage. Appears in the calling of the first disciples (Luke 5:1-2), the stilling of the storm (Luke 8:22-23), and the Gerasene demoniac narrative (Luke 8:33). famine, hunger — severe scarcity of food, whether regional catastrophe or personal deprivation Limos covers the full spectrum of food deprivation, from large-scale famine devastating whole regions to the gnawing hunger of an individual. Its 12 NT occurrences appear in apocalyptic catalogs of tribulation (Matt 24:7; Mark 13:8; Rev 6:8; 18:8), historical narratives of specific famines (Luke 4:25, the drought in Elijah's day; Acts 11:28, the famine under Claudius), and the deeply personal hunger of the prodigal son (Luke 15:14, 17). Paul lists limos among the hardships he has endured for Christ (2 Cor 11:27). The multilingual evidence — Spanish 'hambre,' French 'famine,' German 'Hungersnot' — shows some languages favoring the personal sense (hunger) and others the collective (famine), though the Greek word covers both without distinction.

famine / hunger (12×) Severe deprivation of food, ranging from widespread famine affecting entire regions to personal hunger and starvation. Appears in eschatological warnings as one of the birth-pangs signaling the end (Matt 24:7, 'there will be famines'; Rev 6:8, famine as one of the four horsemen's weapons), in historical accounts (Luke 4:25, the three-and-a-half-year famine; Acts 11:28, the Claudian famine), and in personal narratives of deprivation (Luke 15:14, the prodigal's desperate hunger; 2 Cor 11:27, Paul's apostolic suffering). German 'Hungersnot' emphasizes the communal crisis, while Spanish 'hambre' leans personal — both senses are present in the Greek. λίνον G3043 N-ANS (2×)

linen fabric or thread; a wick made of linen fibers

Linen in its various forms—whether cloth, thread, wick, or even fishing line. Matthew quotes Isaiah's prophecy about the gentle Messiah who won't break a bruised reed or snuff out a smoldering wick, using this word for the fragile linen wick barely burning. Revelation describes heavenly beings clothed in bright, pure linen. Ancient Greek used λίνον for an impressive range: cords, fishing lines, thread spun from flax, even the metaphorical threads of destiny spun by the Fates.

(2×) The contrast between the barely-smoking wick (Matthew 12:20) and the brilliant linen garments (Revelation 15:6) shows the word's range. Lexicons detail everything from fishing nets to the 'threads of destiny,' but biblical usage focuses on fabric and fibers. Most translations preserve the linen connection (Spanish lino, French lin, German Leinen), though the wick sense requires context to clarify. LINEN AND FABRIC

Linus was a Christian believer in Rome mentioned alongside Claudia and others in Paul's greetings from 2 Timothy. Early church tradition identified him as an early bishop of Rome, though this connection is uncertain. The name was common in the Greco-Roman world, originally associated with a mythical minstrel in Greek legend.

(1×) Second Timothy 4:21 includes Linus among the Roman Christians sending greetings to Timothy. Early church fathers like Irenaeus listed a Linus as the first bishop of Rome after the apostles, though whether this is the same person remains debated. a Roman pound, a unit of weight equivalent to about 12 ounces or 327 grams

A Roman weight measurement, the libra (from which we get 'pound'). Both occurrences involve extravagant gestures of devotion in John's Gospel. Mary anoints Jesus with a full pound of costly nard—a year's wages in a single act. Nicodemus brings a massive mixture of myrrh and aloes, about 75 pounds, to prepare Jesus' body for burial. The sheer quantity in each case signals devotion beyond calculation. As a silver coin in Sicily and later a standard weight, the litra was borrowed into Greek from Latin libra.

(2×) John emphasizes the extravagance: one pound of pure nard (12:3) and seventy-five pounds of burial spices (19:39). The lexicon traces the word from a Sicilian coin to a weight measure (roughly 12 ounces). Most translations simply transliterate or use their native weight term—Spanish libra, French livre, German Pfund—all descendants of the same Latin root. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λίψ G3047 N-AMS (1×)

southwest wind or direction

This noun designates the southwest wind, one of the named directional winds in ancient Mediterranean navigation. In Acts 27:12, it appears in a navigational description of Fair Havens harbor, which faced southwest and northwest. Ancient mariners distinguished winds by direction, and this term specified the warm southwest wind common in the Mediterranean.

(1×) Acts 27:12 uses this term to describe the harbor orientation at Fair Havens in Crete during Paul's voyage. The navigational precision reflects Luke's careful attention to seafaring details. Multilingual glosses vary between directional (southwest, suroeste) and regional (Lycie) interpretations, though the meteorological-geographical sense of the southwest wind or direction is primary in this context. STORMS AND TEMPESTS

λογ-εία G3048 N-GFS (2×)

a collection of money, particularly for charitable or religious purposes; a systematic gathering of funds

A formal collection or fundraising effort, whether for taxes, religious offerings, or charity. Paul uses it twice in rapid succession (1 Corinthians 16:1-2) about the collection for Jerusalem's impoverished believers. He's organizing a coordinated relief effort across multiple churches—each community setting aside money systematically. The Greek term could refer to tax collection, voluntary contributions, or religious donations. Paul's careful instructions show this isn't spontaneous generosity but organized stewardship.

(2×) Paul's repeated use in 1 Corinthians 16:1-2 outlines a structured giving plan: regular, proportional, and purposeful. Classical usage ranged from tax collection to religious perquisites to charitable contributions. The Spanish and German translations (colecta, Sammlung) capture the organized nature, while French curiously uses 'Lydie' (Lydia), likely a textual or indexing error in the source material. TRIBUTE AND TAX

λογ-ίζομαι G3049 V-ANM (41×)

Reckon, count, consider; to calculate, credit to an account, or reason through mentally

A verb rooted in the language of accounting (from logos), logizomai carries enormous theological weight in Paul's letters. In Romans 4, faith is 'reckoned' as righteousness – a bookkeeping metaphor where God credits what is not earned (Rom 4:3-8). Beyond this imputation sense, the word covers ordinary mental deliberation, as when Paul says 'when I was a child, I reasoned as a child' (1 Cor 13:11). Spanish splits these senses neatly between 'concluir/considerar' (reasoning) and 'contar/fue contada' (crediting).

1. consider, regard as (19×) To consider, evaluate, or regard someone or something as having a certain character or status. Romans 3:28 uses it for the conclusion of reasoned argument ('we reckon that a person is justified by faith'), while Romans 6:11 urges believers to 'consider yourselves dead to sin.' This is the active cognitive judgment sense, where the subject forms an assessment. German 'rechnen' preserves the root accounting metaphor. RECKON CONSIDER THINK

2. credit, impute (passive) (14×) To credit, impute, or reckon to someone's account – Paul's central theological usage in Romans 4, where Abraham's faith 'was counted to him as righteousness' (Rom 4:3, 5, 9, 22). The passive voice dominates, with God as implied agent. Mark 15:28 and Luke 22:37 quote Isaiah 53:12, 'he was numbered with the transgressors.' Spanish 'fue contada' (was counted) and French 'imputer' highlight the forensic, accounting dimension. RECKON CONSIDER THINK

3. think, reason, deliberate (8×) To think through, reason, or deliberate – the purely cognitive sense of mental processing. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 10:2 of opponents 'thinking' about him, and in 1 Corinthians 13:11 of childish reasoning. John 11:50 shows Caiaphas 'considering' political expediency. French 'raisonner' captures this deliberative register more precisely than the accounting senses. RECKON CONSIDER THINK

rational, reasonable, or spiritual; pertaining to reason or the intellect rather than material or carnal

Belonging to the realm of reason, intellect, or spirit—the opposite of merely physical or ritual. Paul calls believers to offer 'reasonable worship' (Romans 12:1), spiritual service that engages the mind and will, not just external ceremony. Peter urges Christians to crave 'spiritual milk' (1 Peter 2:2), nourishment for the inner person. Classical Greek used it for organs of speech, prose versus poetry, intellectual virtues versus moral ones. In biblical contexts, it often carries overtones of what's fitting for rational, spirit-indwelt beings.

(2×) The word appears in two contexts calling believers beyond external religion to something engaging heart and mind. Romans 12:1 contrasts dead animal sacrifices with living, rational worship. 1 Peter 2:2 uses 'spiritual/rational' to modify 'milk,' suggesting truth that nourishes the inner person. Classical usage ranged from speech organs to intellectual virtues. Most translations gravitate toward

'spiritual' or 'reasonable,' though German's 'vernünftig' (sensible, rational) preserves the intellectual dimension. SPIRITUAL THINGS

λόγ-ιον G3051 N-ANP (4×)
Oracle; a divine utterance or saying, especially the collected revelations of God entrusted to Israel.
Logion (diminutive of logos) denotes a divine saying or oracle – a word that carries the weight of God's own speech. In the NT it always appears in the plural (logia), referring to the body of God's revelations. Stephen speaks of Moses receiving 'living oracles' at Sinai (Acts 7:38); Paul affirms that the Jews were entrusted with 'the oracles of God' (Rom 3:2). The author of Hebrews chides readers who still need instruction in the basic oracles (Heb 5:12), and Peter urges that anyone who speaks should do so as one delivering God's oracles (1 Pet 4:11).

(4×) A divine utterance or collected body of God's spoken revelations. In Acts 7:38 Stephen describes Moses receiving 'living oracles' on Sinai – words pulsing with divine authority. Rom 3:2 names these oracles as Israel's great privilege. Heb 5:12 treats them as foundational teaching, and 1 Pet 4:11 sets them as the standard for Christian speech. French 'oracle' and Spanish 'oráculos' preserve the sacred-pronouncement sense, while German 'Gaben' (gifts) captures the entrusted-treasure dimension. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λόγ-ιος G3052 Adj-NMS (1×) eloquent, learned, skilled in speech
This adjective describes someone accomplished in speech, learning, or rhetoric—eloquent and persuasive in communication. In classical usage, it denoted both learned scholarship and oratorical skill. Acts 18:24 applies it to Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew who was both learned in the Scriptures and powerful in speech, though initially knowing only John's baptism.

(1×) Acts 18:24 introduces Apollos as an eloquent man, well-versed in the Scriptures. Alexandria was famous for its intellectual tradition, and Apollos embodied that heritage. The multilingual evidence (eloquent, elocuente, éloquent) emphasizes rhetorical skill, though the term also suggests broader learning. Priscilla and Aquila's instruction of Apollos shows that eloquence without full gospel knowledge needs correction. WISDOM AND PRUDENCE

λογ-ισμός G3053 N-AMP (2×)
thoughts, reasonings, or mental calculations; the processes and products of rational thinking
The activity and content of human reasoning—calculations, arguments, trains of thought. Paul uses it to describe both the accusing and defending arguments of conscience (Romans 2:15) and the lofty arguments raised against knowing God (2 Corinthians 10:5). The word carries both neutral and negative connotations: reasoning can be sound or sophistical, humble calculation or arrogant speculation. Ancient Greek used it for arithmetic, accounting, logical arguments, and the faculty of reason itself.

(2×) In Romans 2:15, these 'reasonings' form the internal moral dialogue, alternately accusing and defending. In 2 Corinthians 10:5, they're fortified arguments that must be demolished. The classical range—from arithmetic to philosophical reasoning—shows up in both uses. Spanish offers both 'pensamientos' (thoughts) and 'razonamientos' (reasonings), capturing the intellectual process. Paul treats human reasoning with respect yet recognizes its potential to resist divine truth. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λογο-μᾰχέω G3054 V-PNA (1×) to quarrel about words, engage in verbal disputes
This verb means to fight or wrangle over words, engaging in contentious disputes about terminology or semantics rather than substance. It suggests futile argumentation that generates heat rather than light. In 2 Timothy 2:14, Paul warns against this practice, which he says ruins the hearers and accomplishes nothing beneficial.

(1×) Second Timothy 2:14 instructs Timothy to charge believers before God not to engage in word-battles, which profit nothing and lead to the ruin of listeners. The multilingual glosses (quarrel-about-words, discutir-sobre-palabras, λογομαχεῖν, Wortstreit) capture the contentious, unproductive nature of such disputes. Paul consistently warns against verbal controversies that distract from gospel truth and Christian character. ARGUE DISPUTE DEBATE

λογο-μᾰχία G3055 N-AFP (1×) word-battles, disputes about words
This noun denotes quarrels or controversies focused on words and semantics rather than substantive truth. It describes the activity of logomachia—fighting over terminology, definitions, or verbal formulations in ways that obscure rather than clarify. First Timothy 6:4 associates such word-battles with the diseased craving for controversy characteristic of false teachers.

(1×) First Timothy 6:4 describes false teachers as having a morbid craving for controversy and disputes about words, which produce envy, dissension, slander, and evil suspicions. The multilingual evidence (word-battles, disputas-de-palabras, λογομαχίας, Wortstreit) emphasizes the combative, unedifying nature of such arguments. Paul sees these verbal contests as symptoms of spiritual disease rather than genuine pursuit of truth. ARGUE DISPUTE DEBATE

λόγος G3056 N-GMS (332×)
Word, message, or speech; also account/reckoning, the divine Logos, and reason/cause — the fullest expression of rational communication Few Greek words carry as much theological weight as λόγος (logos). At its everyday level it simply means 'word' or 'message,' and this accounts for the vast majority of its 332 New Testament occurrences — from Jesus' parables about the 'word' sown like seed (Matt 13:19-23) to Paul's 'word of the cross' (1 Cor 1:18). But the Johannine Prologue elevates it to a Christological title: 'In the beginning was the Logos' (John 1:1), where Spanish splits between 'Palabra' and the Latinate 'Verbo,' and some traditions preserve the untranslated 'Lógos.' Meanwhile, the accounting sense — 'settling accounts' (Matt 18:23; 25:19) — preserves the word's classical Greek connection to λέγω in its sense of 'reckon, calculate,' a dimension largely invisible in modern usage.

1. word, message, speech (309×) A spoken or written communication: 'word,' 'message,' 'speech,' 'teaching,' or 'proclamation.' With 309 occurrences this is the dominant sense, spanning Jesus' sayings ('let your word be yes,' Matt 5:37), the parabolic 'word of the kingdom' (Matt 13:19), and apostolic preaching ('the word of God'). All major languages translate with a single core term — English 'word,' Spanish 'palabra,' French 'parole,' German 'Wort' — yet the range is enormous, from casual utterance to divine revelation, unified by the thread of meaningful communication. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
en: a-word, report, word | es: palabra | fr: parole | de: Wort Matt 5:37; Matt 12:32; Matt 13:19; Matt 13:20; Matt 13:21

2. account, reckoning (11×) A financial or moral reckoning: 'account,' as in settling accounts or rendering an account before a judge or God. Eleven occurrences cluster in judgment parables — the king who 'settled accounts' with his servants (Matt 18:23; 25:19) and the steward told to 'give an account' (Luke 16:2). Spanish distinctively shifts to 'cuenta/cuentas' (account) and 'razón' (reason/reckoning), making visible a sense that English 'word' obscures. This preserves the classical connection between λόγος and λέγω in its mathematical sense of 'to count up.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

3. the Logos, divine Word (7×) The Logos: the pre-existent, incarnate divine Word, a Christological title unique to Johannine literature. Seven occurrences — John 1:1 (three times), 1:14, 1 John 1:1, and Revelation 19:13 — establish Jesus as God's self-expression from eternity. Spanish reveals the theological freight by offering three distinct translations: 'Palabra' (word), 'Verbo' (the Latin theological term from the Vulgate's 'Verbum'), and the transliterated 'Lógos.' French and German retain their standard 'parole' and 'Wort,' relying on context to signal the elevated meaning. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

en: Logos, Word | es: Lógos, Palabra, Verbo | fr: parole | de: Wort John 1:1; John 1:14; 1John 1:1

4. reason, cause, matter (5×) The ground, reason, or cause for something, or a matter under dispute. Five occurrences use λόγος where English would say 'reason' or 'matter' — the 'except for the matter of sexual immorality' clause (Matt 5:32), Festus seeking a 'charge' to write (Acts 25:26 area; cf. Acts 18:14; 19:38), and Peter urging believers to have a 'reason' for their hope (1 Pet 3:15). Spanish 'razón' and 'causa' capture this analytical dimension, while French 'parole' struggles to stretch beyond speech — a reminder that λόγος inhabits the intersection of language and thought in a way no single modern word replicates. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

λόγχ-η G3057 N-DFS (2×)

a spear or lance, particularly the pointed head or the weapon as a whole

A soldier's spear or lance, especially the iron point. John's Gospel uses it in the crucifixion narrative: a soldier pierces Jesus' side with a spear, releasing blood and water—a detail John treats as theologically significant eyewitness testimony. Matthew's less-reliable manuscript tradition adds a spear-thrust before Jesus' death, though this is likely borrowed from John. Classical Greek distinguished the spear-head from the shaft, and could use the plural for a single spear with multiple barbs. Metaphorically, 'eating spears' described a bragging coward—a 'fire-eater' who wouldn't actually fight.

(2×) John 19:34 presents the spear-thrust as a crucial moment: the flow of blood and water becomes evidence of Jesus' genuine death and perhaps a symbol of sacramental life flowing from his sacrifice. The textual uncertainty at Matthew 27:49 shows early scribes' desire to harmonize Gospel accounts. Ancient military terminology distinguished the lethal iron point from its wooden shaft. All modern translations preserve the weapon's identity clearly. SPEAR LANCE JAVELIN

λοιδορ-έω G3058 V-AIA-3P (4×)

To revile, heap verbal abuse on someone; to insult with harsh, contemptuous language.

Loidoreo describes the act of hurling insults and verbal abuse at someone – not casual criticism but sharp, contemptuous reviling. In the NT it appears in contexts of unjust hostility: the Pharisees revile the man born blind for following Jesus (John 9:28), Paul is warned against reviling the high priest (Acts 23:4), and both Paul and Christ endure reviling without retaliation (1 Cor 4:12; 1 Pet 2:23). Christ's response to being reviled – he did not revile in return – became a paradigm of Christian non-retaliation.

(4×) To abuse verbally, to heap contemptuous insults on someone. The Pharisees revile the healed blind man as a disciple of Jesus (John 9:28); Paul is rebuked for inadvertently reviling the high priest (Acts 23:4). In 1 Cor 4:12 Paul responds to reviling with blessing, and 1 Pet 2:23 holds up Christ as the model: 'when he was reviled, he did not revile in return.' Spanish 'injuriar/insultar' and French 'injurier/insulter' both capture the wounding, honor-damaging quality of this speech act. REVILE REPROACH INSULT

λοιδορ-ία G3059 N-GFS (3×)

insult, verbal abuse; reviling or slanderous speech intended to shame another

This word describes verbally abusive speech—reviling, insulting, and slanderous language designed to shame and dishonor another person. It goes beyond mere criticism to malicious verbal attack. Paul warns Timothy about young widows who might give the adversary 'occasion for reproach' (1 Timothy 5:14)—opportunity to insult the church. Peter twice instructs believers not to repay insult with insult (1 Peter 3:9, repeated for emphasis), but instead to bless those who revile them. This radical response reflects Jesus' own example, who when reviled did not revile in return (1 Peter 2:23). Christian speech patterns must reflect grace, not retaliation.

(3×) Verbal abuse, insult, reviling, or reproach. 1 Timothy 5:14 warns that improper behavior by young widows could give 'the adversary no occasion for reproach'—providing ammunition for opponents to insult the church. 1 Peter 3:9 twice commands believers 'not returning evil for evil or reviling for reviling, but on the contrary blessing,' teaching a radically counter-cultural response to verbal abuse. Instead of retaliating with insults, Christians bless their revilers, reflecting Jesus' own example under persecution. SHAME AND DISGRACE

λοίδορ-ος G3060 N-NMS (2×)

a verbal abuser, reviler, or one who habitually uses insulting and contemptuous speech

Someone characterized by abusive, insulting speech—a reviler who regularly tears others down with words. Paul lists this character type twice in 1 Corinthians 5-6, among those who shouldn't be tolerated in the church or who won't inherit God's kingdom. The Greek emphasizes the habitual nature: not someone who spoke harshly once, but someone whose speech pattern is abusive. It's paired with drunkards, swindlers, and sexually immoral people, suggesting verbal abuse ranks among serious destructive behaviors.

(2×) Paul's parallel usage in 1 Corinthians 5:11 and 6:10 treats verbal abuse as disqualifying behavior both for church fellowship and for the kingdom. The lexicon notes this describes someone habitually railing and abusive, with classical attestation going back to the 4th century BC. Spanish, French, and German (maldiciente, calomniateur, Lästerer) all capture the slanderous, contemptuous quality. The seriousness with which Paul treats speech patterns reflects biblical wisdom about the tongue's power. DEVIL SATAN

λοιμός G3061 N-NMP (2×)

plague or pestilence; a deadly epidemic disease; metaphorically, a troublesome or pestilent person

Literally an epidemic plague or pestilence, but also used as a harsh insult for a troublesome person—a 'pest.' Jesus lists plagues among the signs preceding the end (Luke 21:11). A prosecutor viciously calls Paul 'a plague' (Acts 24:5), meaning a pestilent troublemaker infecting the whole world with his teaching. Homer used it for literal plagues; Plato and others applied it to people who were social 'infections.' The coupling with famine (λιμός/λοιμός) was traditional in Greek literature from Homer onward.

(2×) The contrast between literal disease (Luke 21:11) and metaphorical insult (Acts 24:5) shows the word's flexibility. Terullus' accusation that Paul is 'a plague' treats the apostle as an infectious disease threatening Roman order. Classical usage encompassed the plague at Athens, plagues in Homer, and pestilent individuals. The traditional pairing of famine and plague appears in Jesus' apocalyptic discourse. All translations preserve the plague imagery clearly. PLAGUES AND WOUNDS

λοιπός G3062 Adj-GNP (40×)

Remaining, the rest; substantive adjective for the remaining persons or things of a group

A common Greek adjective meaning 'remaining' or 'the rest,' used substantively throughout the New Testament to refer to the remainder of a group. When applied to people, it designates those left over after some have been singled out – the other wedding guests who seized the servants (Matt 22:6), the foolish virgins who came too late (Matt 25:11), or the remaining apostles who did not believe the resurrection report (Mark 16:13). When applied to things, it covers 'the rest of the matters' or 'what remains to be done,' as Paul uses it for the remaining topics he will address when he arrives (1 Cor 11:34).

1. the rest (persons) (30×) The remaining people, the rest of a group of persons, used substantively. Spanish 'los demas' and French 'le reste' both capture this partitive sense of those left over after a subset has been identified. Jesus distinguishes the disciples from 'the rest' who receive teaching in parables (Luke 8:10); Paul refers to 'the rest of the apostles' (1 Cor 9:5); and Revelation repeatedly speaks of 'the rest of the dead' or 'the rest of her offspring' (Rev 20:5; 12:17). German 'die Uebrigen' emphasizes the 'left-over' quality – these are the ones who remain after the principal actors have been named. GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE

2. the remaining (things) (10×) The remaining things, the rest of the matters or objects, used substantively or attributively of non-personal referents. Mark 4:19 warns that 'the desires for the rest of the things' choke the word – here 'the rest' refers to worldly concerns beyond wealth. Paul tells the Corinthians 'the remaining matters I will arrange when I come' (1 Cor 11:34), and addresses 'the rest' of his topics in various epistles (1 Cor 7:12; Phil 4:8). The temporal adverbial use (to loipon, 'finally/henceforth') also falls here, as in Paul's closing exhortations (2 Cor 13:11; Eph 6:10), where French 'reste' and Spanish 'demas cosas' shade toward 'what remains to be said.' GEOGRAPHY AND SPACE
